"I've seen all kinds, but never anyone as strange as you."

"From everyone else's perspective, I'd say we're both equally strange. Send a messenger-pigeon survey to everyone in Murim and ask which one of us is the bigger freak."

"Freak?"

"My tongue slipped. Sorry."

The aura Mungyeong let loose made every hair on my body stand on end.

He silently watched me swallow hard, then tossed out a single phrase.

"Middle Dantian."

"Huh?"

“Until a few days ago—no, until half a day ago—your Middle Dantian was closed. What trick did you use to accomplish such a great feat overnight?”

So this was why he’d called me aside.

I knew he’d noticed.

The hierarchy of martial realms was perfectly vertical.

It was like sitting in a lofty place and looking down upon everything beneath you.

The Fire King and the Slaughter Saint were peerless masters who had climbed the highest peaks in the rugged mountain range known as Murim.

Both had opened their Middle Dantians long before a person named Jin Taekyung had even been born into Murim. Of course they had noticed the change in me.

The problem was…

What am I supposed to tell him?

It wasn’t as though I had farted in my sleep and somehow opened my Middle Dantian. Other people could attain that kind of enlightenment only through grueling training or while hovering between life and death.

I hesitated, then spotted the large acupuncture needle in Mungyeong’s hand and hurriedly answered.

“It just happened.”

“What?”

“It just opened.”

“…And you expect me to believe that?”

Obviously not.

So I threw in a cliché straight out of a martial arts novel.

“Actually, I did have a strange dream.”

I glanced around and lowered my voice. Mungyeong’s brow furrowed.

“A dream?”

“Yes. A white-haired old man who looked incredibly ancient suddenly started swinging a sword at me without warning. I didn’t even realize it was a dream, so I focused on dodging first.”

It didn’t matter whether it was a spear, a sword, or a back-scratcher. This was a world overrun with all kinds of superstition.

A white-haired old man with the air of an immortal appearing in my dream was enough to pique anyone’s curiosity.

Sure enough, Mungyeong asked with the eager expression of a webnovel reader waiting for the next update.

“And then?”

“I summoned every last ounce of strength I had and fought back, but I was no match for him. No matter how I attacked, he dodged without a care. And whenever I tried to get away, he glided up to me like a ghost and slashed me with his sword. Swish, slash—ugh! You know what I mean?"

"You didn't realize it was a dream?"

"I didn't have time to realize anything. Besides, the pain felt incredibly real. Before I knew it, he'd cut me hundreds of times. I thought, So this is how I die. But then I noticed I hadn't shed a single drop of blood. That was when I realized it was a dream."

"Continue."

"But it was driving me insane. He kept cutting me, and it hurt like hell. Even after I realized it was a dream, I couldn't wake up."

"Yes. Exactly."

Mungyeong flinched as if he'd been cut himself.

This guy gives surprisingly good reactions.

Having reconfirmed the instincts of the webnovel reader hidden behind the terrifying name of Slaughter Saint, I continued without hesitation.

"I don't even know how much time passed. Days? Months? I lost all sense of time as he cut me over and over and I kept swinging back. Then, all of a sudden, I felt something strange."

"Explain it in detail. What was it like?"

This part, at least, I could describe in detail and tell him the truth. It was something I had personally experienced during my battle with the Arch Lich.

An ordinary person might have dismissed my explanation as vague, airy nonsense, but after listening, Mungyeong quietly muttered, "Enlightenment. You gained a fortuitous encounter."

"Whoa, I've got goose bumps. He said something similar."

"He left you a message?"

"Yes. He looked at me and smiled for the first time, then said that this fortuitous encounter was a blessing he was bestowing upon me and that I should devote myself even more fully to my training."

"Was that all?"

"Huh?"

"Did he say anything else?"

"Uh, well…"

Hold on. I didn't plan for this.

I'd squeezed this entire story out of my brain on the spot, and I'd already used everything I had prepared.

But Mungyeong was demanding another installment, and I had nothing left in reserve.

The problem was, Mungyeong wasn't an ordinary reader.

He was the Slaughter Saint.

What happens if I end it here?

What else? I'd sink to the bottom of the Yangtze and drift all the way to Hubei.

As Mungyeong's eyes narrowed, I hurriedly opened my mouth.

"He did say one more thing."

"What did he say?"

"Well, that is…"

Fuck it. I don't know.

I swallowed dryly and cautiously spoke.

"You have to suffer to be a Murim man."

"What?"

"He really said that. Those exact words. Then he climbed onto his sword and flew off…"

"I can sense profound wisdom in those words."

"Huh?"

I let out a stupefied sound while keeping a wary eye on the large needle in Mungyeong's hand.

What the hell is he talking about now?

When I raised my head, I saw Mungyeong murmuring under his breath and nodding slightly as though he were groaning.

After muttering something unintelligible, he suddenly spoke.

"It was Lü Yan."[2070]

"I know about stomach cancer and lung cancer, but… are you sick somewhere?"

"…You don't know Lü Yan?"

Mungyeong looked at me as though I were insane, then continued.

"Lü Yan. His courtesy name was Dongbin, and his Taoist name was Chunyangzi. He attained his own Dao[2071] and reached the realm of an immortal. People called him the Sword Immortal."

"Wait. You mean Lü Dongbin?"

"You finally understand."

I might not have known Lü Yan, but I knew Sword Immortal Lü Dongbin. Along with Jang Samfeng of Wudang and Bodhidharma of Shaolin Temple, he was one of the three perennial fixtures of martial arts novels.

Mungyeong continued, his expression deadly serious.

"The old man you saw in your dream must have been Lü Dongbin. He vanished by riding his sword at the end, so he must have been the Sword Immortal."

[2070] The Korean reading of Lü Yan's name, Yeo-am, ends in am, the Korean word for "cancer"—hence Taekyung's misunderstanding.

[2071] Dao means "Way"; in Taoist thought, it can refer to a path of spiritual cultivation.

“Uh… I suppose so.”

I’d only made that part up because it sounded cool, but somehow it had turned into this.

I knew from novels that there was an immortal named Lü Dongbin, but this was the first I’d heard of him being a master of sword-riding arts.

Talk about making the facts fit the theory.

That was exactly what was happening.

Having decided that the old man from my dream—or rather, my story—was Lü Dongbin, Mungyeong was now fitting everything together with absolute seriousness without even realizing it.

“Did his beard reach down to his chest?”

“Yes.”

“How tall was he?”

“He was short.”

“Boy! I’m asking how short!”

“Oh, just short. I was being cut to pieces the entire time. When was I supposed to study his height?”

Mungyeong nodded and let most of my answers pass, but there was one dangerously close call.

“What did he carry besides the sword?”

“Let me think… His scabbard.”

“Do you want to die? Of course he had that. Was there nothing else?”

“…I think that was all.”

The light in Mungyeong’s eyes darkened.

“Lü Dongbin did not carry only a sword. He always held a Taoist fly-whisk in his right hand.”

“…!”

“Have you been lying to this old man all along?”

It was a life-or-death crisis.

I had no idea why a man known as the Sword Immortal would walk around carrying a fly-whisk, but my top priority was avoiding Mungyeong’s suspicions. Without letting a single change cross my face, I answered.

“Everything I said was true.”

“Then why does your description contradict Lü Dongbin’s usual appearance?”

“He must have left his fly-whisk behind today.”

“What kind of bullshi—”

“No, wait. Have you ever seen Lü Dongbin?”

“…!”

"I have."

Fuck, I'm the one who saw him. What are you going to do about it?

Seizing the advantage, I bore down on Mungyeong while he was momentarily at a loss for words.

"And did I ever say he was Lü Dongbin? I thought he was just some old man. You were the one who called him Lü Dongbin first."

"You?"

"That isn't the point. That's what happened, isn't it? Honestly, I don't care whether he was Lü Dongbin or Kim Dongbin. I met some unidentified old man in a dream and gained a fortuitous encounter. That's all. But you're hounding me like I've committed some terrible crime, so I really… Ha."

"…"

"Can you see the tears in my eyes? I don't want to act like this as a grown man, but this is so unfair I'm actually crying."

The truth was, I was scared.

That, combined with the self-loathing of having to invent lies under threat despite committing no crime, eventually sent a tear rolling down my cheek.

Is this what life is?

I had wet myself below earlier, and now I was wetting myself above.

It had started as an act, but somehow it had become real. Bewilderment flashed across Mungyeong's nearly expressionless face.

"You little bastard. What trick are you pulling?"

"Ugh, there you go again. I'm done. I quit. I answered all your questions, so I'm leaving."

"You're leaving?"

"I don't care anymore. Do whatever you want. Kill me, spare me, use Impure World Reincarnation[2072] on me—whatever."

Just as I was about to take a step, someone appeared while scattering a powerful aura.

"What the hell is this dogshit?"

The gazes of the Fire King and the Slaughter Saint collided in midair.

[2072] Impure World Reincarnation is a resurrection technique from Naruto.

Chapter 438

Jeok Cheongang's eyes blazed as he glared at Mungyeong.

"How dare you threaten someone else's dis, dis… Disciple Taekyung while this old man was away?"

"…What the hell is 'Disciple Taekyung'?"

My tears dried up at once as I muttered in disbelief. Jeok Cheongang roared.

"Quiet!"

Mungyeong and I answered at the same time.

"You're louder, Old Master. You're practically shouting 'Disciple Taekyung' from the center of the world."

"Judging by that voice, you'll live another ten years."

Did he roast a train smokestack in an air fryer and eat it?

It was a good thing Mungyeong had used his internal energy to raise a qi barrier and keep the sound from escaping. Otherwise, people would have gathered around us long ago.

Jeok Cheongang's face flushed bright red. Mungyeong quietly clicked his tongue.

"We merely had a brief conversation. What would this old man gain from threatening such a young pup?"

Jeok Cheongang turned toward me.

"You answer me. Is what that old man said true?"

"It's true that we only talked, but he said I'd sink to the bottom of the Yangtze if he didn't like my answer."

At my tattling, Mungyeong shamelessly added,

"Of course, I did frighten him a little."

"Would you look at this damned old man! You think you'll get away with pulling something like this?"

"Calm yourself. I merely had something to ask him about his Middle Dantian."

Jeok Cheongang had leaned forward as though he were about to charge, but he stopped dead.

"Middle Dantian?"

"Yes. Surely you didn't fail to notice."

"…"

"Opening one's Middle Dantian in such a short time is impossible. Even heavenly fortune cannot explain it."

Jeok Cheongang looked back and forth between Mungyeong and me, then let out a short laugh.

"So it was nothing."

"…What?"

"So you're trying to say that the boy learned demonic martial arts or something?"

"That…"

"I'll put it simply. No."

Mungyeong was left speechless by Jeok Cheongang's calm, utterly confident response. Jeok Cheongang crooked a finger at me.

"What are you waiting for? Come here."

"Huh?"

"You asked me to oversee your training, didn't you? We're starting now."

"Oh. Right."

The situation moved on so smoothly that even I was caught off guard. As though he had read my thoughts, Jeok Cheongang asked,

"I am curious, though. How exactly did you open your Middle Dantian?"

"Uh, well. I had a dream, and there was this old man with a sword…"

"Did you meet the Sword Immortal Lü Dongbin?"

"…Well, judging by what that guy over there said, maybe."

"You gained a fortuitous encounter. It seems the heavens are helping you. Things beyond human understanding do happen in this world from time to time."

Jeok Cheongang was looking at me, but his answer was directed at Mungyeong.

After tossing out that remark for Mungyeong to hear, Jeok Cheongang suddenly swung his wrinkled hand.

Smack!

"Ow! Why did you hit me?"

"You irritated me, so I felt like hitting you. Got a problem with that?"

"What if I do?"

"Then you can take another hit."

Whack!

"Aaagh!"

"You blockheaded brat. Quit whining. Stop fooling around and follow me."

Can I really just leave like this?

I glanced at Mungyeong, who stood there wearing an unreadable expression. A thunderous shout immediately crashed down on me.

"And yet, you brat!"

"Okay, okay, I get it. Please stop shouting."

"Dragging your feet like this, do you even intend to train?"

I turned my back on Mungyeong and followed close behind Jeok Cheongang, whispering,

"But aren't you going to ask anything else?"

Jeok Cheongang answered gruffly without turning around.

“About what?”

“No, I mean… the Middle Dantian…”

“Stop talking nonsense and follow me. From now on, don’t go anywhere near that old man.”

“Yes, sir.”

That was exactly what I wanted. I wasn’t some Mermaid Princess of the Yangtze, and I had absolutely no intention of getting on his bad side and drifting all the way to Hubei with the fish.

“If I catch you in a situation like this again, I’ll teach you a lesson. Understand?”

“…I’m the victim here. Why are you blaming me?”

“Quiet. I was about to smash everything to pieces earlier, but I held myself back.”

“Come to think of it, you really did show restraint.”

“Would the ship have survived if I hadn’t?”

“True. We should take Senior Mu Song’s circumstances into consideration. Did you see his face when the swift ship caught fire?”

Jeok Cheongang whipped his head around and frowned.

“What kind of nonsense are you talking about? Why should this old man care about those river bandits’ circumstances?”

“Huh?”

“If we lose another ship here, we’ll have to move everyone aboard to a different one. All that extra weight would slow us down.”

“…Oh.”

“Think before you speak. We need to get off this wretched Yangtze as quickly as possible. It’s damp, it rocks, and it never seems to end.”

What a lovely personality.

I watched the Fire Pokémon walk away, shuddering from head to toe, when a thought suddenly occurred to me.

If we burn everything down, couldn’t we travel by land?

I decided not to say it. Jeok Cheongang was more than capable of actually doing it.

I did my best to ignore Mungyeong’s prickling gaze on the back of my head as I followed Jeok Cheongang.

The swift ship cut through the water without slowing.

Every vessel that saw the flag of the Yangtze River Channel League flying high above the deck hurriedly cleared a path. Even the government warships with their cozy ties to the League were no exception.

The river bandits knew the lower Yangtze and its waterways like the backs of their hands. Following Mu Song's orders, they pulled hard on their oars, while the sails billowed wide in the wind blowing from far away.

Like the churning waters of the Yangtze, the hours of that day rushed past.

And…

Just as he had the previous night, Mungyeong sat at the bow and gazed out at the Yangtze shrouded in darkness. When his uninvited guest arrived again, he spoke in a low voice.

"You're later than I expected."

"It took time to find the liquor that fellow Mu Song—or whatever his name is—had hidden away. He fought tooth and nail to keep it from me until the very end."

Jeok Cheongang perched on the railing and broke the seal on a small jar he had taken out as carefully as though it were a treasured family heirloom.

A fragrant aroma of liquor immediately spread through the air, cracking Mungyeong's usually impassive expression.

"Jiannan Chun?"

"Of course. When you come to Sichuan, you drink Jiannan Chun. This is what makes the trip worthwhile."

"That doesn't seem like ordinary Jiannan Chun."

"According to that fellow, it was a gift from his Master. A man as eminent as the Seafaring King wouldn't have given his Disciple ordinary liquor… Thanks to him, this old man's tongue is enjoying a rare treat."

Jeok Cheongang lifted the jar to his mouth and gulped down the liquor, then smacked his lips.

"Damn, that's good. Want a drink?"

Mungyeong stared intently at the jar of Jiannan Chun, then shook his head.

"…I believe I told you I quit drinking a long time ago."

"You took too long to answer. For an old man known as the greatest assassin in history, you make your thoughts awfully easy to read."

"That still makes me better than an old man who carries on like a reckless brat at his age."

"What did you say?"

"Enough nonsense. Let's get to the point. You have something to say to me, don't you?"

Jeok Cheongang's visit the previous day had been unexpected. Today was different.

Several shichen[2073] earlier, Jeok Cheongang had used Sound Transmission to tell Mungyeong that he would come. Mungyeong had been waiting for him.

"You're impatient. That isn't very assassin-like, either."

[2073] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

"I'm a medical apprentice, not an assassin."

"Then call yourself a life-taker."

"Disciple and Master alike. Your words and actions are exactly the same."

Ignoring Mungyeong's frown, Jeok Cheongang took another drink and wiped his mouth with his sleeve before answering.

"Our words and actions may resemble each other, but we're worlds apart. That brat is a monster who has strayed beyond all common sense."

Mungyeong nodded silently.

He couldn't disagree with the word monster. Reaching the Supreme Peak realm just after passing the age of twenty was astonishing enough, but Jin Taekyung had taken another step before he had even caught his breath.

When did he reach the Supreme Peak realm?

Mungyeong searched his memories of the distant past.

He had been younger then—sharper and quieter than he was now. He had devoted his heart and soul entirely to martial arts.

Sometimes covertly and sometimes through direct confrontation, he had accumulated experience through countless real battles. At last, he had set foot in that exalted realm said to admit only the chosen.

I was in my mid-thirties.

Even Mungyeong, hailed as the greatest assassin in history and known as the Slaughter Saint, had not reached the Supreme Peak realm until after turning thirty.

He had opened his Middle Dantian several years later, when he was nearing forty.

Yet Jin Taekyung had left his mark on Murim's long history when he was barely past twenty.

In Mungyeong's estimation, this could only be the work of demonic, heterodox arts—and an unparalleled demonic martial art at that.

"I have a feeling this conversation will take a while."

"No, it'll be over quickly. This old man doesn't have much to say."

Mungyeong's gaze darkened at Jeok Cheongang's answer.

"Why not?"

"What can I say about something I've never seen or heard of? There's nothing to do but accept it."

"Surely you don't believe that nonsense about the Sword Immortal Lü Dongbin appearing in his dream and granting him enlightenment."

"It may have happened, or it may not have. But even if it's true, it wouldn't be all that surprising. Heh heh."

"Fire King!"

The thunderous cry struck the qi barrier surrounding the two men and reverberated with a deep hum.

But the anger that flashed across Mungyeong's face vanished without a trace at Jeok Cheongang's next words.

"Two years."

"…What did you say?"

"It took that brat only two years to break through the wall of the Supreme Peak realm and open his Middle Dantian. If this old man were Lü Dongbin, I would have come to him in person instead of appearing in a dream, saying, 'What an incredible fellow there is in the lower world.'"

Mungyeong first questioned his own ears, then Jeok Cheongang's state of mind.

But the small old man before him continued speaking, his eyes clearer than Mungyeong had ever seen them.

"Don't doubt him. When you face that brat, erase everything you've seen and heard throughout your life from your mind. Do you understand what I mean?"

"…!"

"Taekyung. That boy and the Sword Saint's Disciple are Divine Dragons in the truest sense. No one has ever seen one. All anyone can do is imagine what they must be like."

Whoosh.

White foam splashed against the bow. A long time passed before Mungyeong broke the silence.

"I can't believe it."

"I didn't tell you to believe it. I only told you to accept it."

"Every part of that is impossible."

"There's one truth this old man learned while growing older for no good reason. You can't control another person's heart."

Jeok Cheongang had learned that only after sending his first Disciple away.

And only after he met a young man by chance and, one day, truly accepted him into his heart did he realize something else.

The pain that throbbed whenever he remembered that day had grown faint.

"You'll understand if you keep watching him. Just as I did."

Mungyeong silently watched Jeok Cheongang's back as he rose from the railing and ambled away. Then he suddenly spoke.

"What is that brat doing right now?"

"Taekyung?"

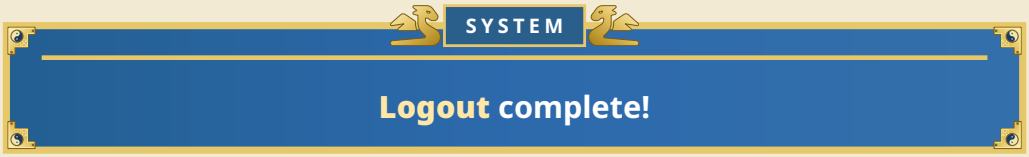
Jeok Cheongang turned his head and laughed heartily beneath the moonlight.

"He's sleeping like the dead."

If training at Fire Gate Cavern had been a marathon, this was a sprint relay.

During the little over a week it would take to reach Hubei, I had decided to travel back and forth between the modern world and Murim, juggling two lives.

Ding.



I opened my eyes to the familiar chime. I was inside the private jet bound for Korea.

I saw people sleeping soundly from all the fatigue they had accumulated, along with one monster staring at me with his eyes wide open.

“What are you looking at, you punk?”

The Skeleton King answered.

“So that was it. Hmm. Do all humans sleep like the dead, just like you?”

“I’m special.”

“Not weird?”

Whack!

This bastard really went out of his way to get hit.

Chapter 439

Smack!

The blow caught the Skeleton King square in the forehead, sending him staggering.

But only for a moment. He lowered his head, which had snapped back from the impact, into its proper position and grinned smugly.

“Heh heh. That barely tickled.”

“Oh, right. Your disguise is so convincing that I forgot for a second.”

There was no way an undead monster—already dead, whether it had a soul or not—could feel pain. Magic Johnson really had done one hell of a job with his full-body plastic surgery.

As I clicked my tongue softly, the Skeleton King shrugged.

“You must not place this king on the same level as a weak human.”

“Of course I don’t. You’re an undead monster.”

“An undead monster? This king is Stone-King, born and raised in Atlanta, Georgia, in the United States!”

“Hey, hey!”

What the hell was wrong with this lunatic? Why was he suddenly shouting?

I hurriedly raised my internal energy to block the sound, then sighed in relief when I saw that everyone was still sleeping soundly.

“You can’t even speak English properly.”

“I learned several things on the internet. They said communication would pose no problem as long as I knew two phrases.”

“Go ahead, then.”

Mr. Stone-King, a proud native of Atlanta, Georgia, United States, opened his mouth.

“How are you. I’m fine, thank you. And you?”

“…You’re Korean, aren’t you, you bastard?”

He had a Hollywood face, but his skill and pronunciation were purely homegrown Korean.

As I shook my head in disbelief, the Skeleton King asked with a shocked expression,

“Is this king’s English truly that terrible?”

“Yeah. So let’s just say you’re half Korean. It’s not like anyone’s going to care about your background anyway.”

“Then I was adopted by a family in Atlanta, Georgia…”

“No, for fuck’s sake. Did you hide honey in Atlanta or something? Is every treasure in the world supposed to be there?”

“But it sounds impressive, does it not? I read on the internet that white men are popular with women all over the world. Besides, this king is handsome.”

“What good is that when you can’t even get it up?”

“…!”

Rendered speechless, the Skeleton King pointed at me with a trembling finger.

“How could you say something so cruel?”

“I can say worse, so stop talking nonsense. If you don’t want people finding out you’re a monster, wear this.”

The Skeleton King accepted the object I summoned from my Inventory and tilted his head, his anger forgotten.

“Vile human, what is this?”

“A gift from Magic Johnson. He said it took a while because he had to have it flown in from the United States on short notice.”

“That gracious human? A ring for me?”

The Skeleton King stared gravely at the ring I had given him.

“Is this perhaps what humans call a proposal?”

“What the hell are you talking about, you lunatic? It’s just a ring enchanted with translation magic.”

“Hmm. I appreciate the gift, but it looks rather crude. It does not sparkle like a diamond, either. It is unbefitting of a king’s dignity.”

“Magic Johnson commissioned a Grand Mage he knows to make it specially, so its performance is top-class. It’s probably worth whatever price they care to name.”

“Now that I look again, I can sense its noble dignity. It will uphold my royal authority nicely.”

“…”

What an irritating bastard.

There was no doubt about it. He had become far stronger—and far crazier—than he had been as the Skeleton Warlord.

Regardless, he slipped the ring onto his middle finger with a satisfied expression, then pulled a smartphone from the lining of his suit.

That, too, was an expensive, cutting-edge smartphone with a Magic Gem built into it, another gift from Magic Johnson.

“What are you doing?”

“This king must personally express his gratitude to the gracious human.”

“You’ve got better manners than I expected. Are you going to text him?”

“Vile human.”

“Huh?”

The Skeleton King looked at me as though I were pathetic.

“Who sends texts in this day and age? Naturally, one uses social media.”

"…Uh, sure."

"We already follow each other. I have also learned how to send direct messages."

I stared at the Skeleton King's phone, my mouth falling open.

Holy shit. It was real. An undead monster with a social media account. Did this app not even require identity verification?

But something else was even more surprising.

"…You have five thousand followers?"

"State the number accurately. It is 5,134. A record achieved in less than a week."

"What the hell? Is this fake?"

"Is being handsome not the greatest advantage? I merely used this king's face as my profile picture, and countless requests to follow one another came pouring in from around the world. Heh heh."

The Skeleton King answered with an arrogant look and began sending a message to Magic Johnson.

> └ Good human. I'm fine thank you. and you?

After checking the message, I let out a small sigh.

"Don't send messages to anyone else."

"Why not?"

"If I say don't, then don't, you bastard."

So much for Atlanta, Georgia.

Calling himself a native of Atlanta District, Georgia City, Gyeonggi Province, would have sounded more believable.

Apparently, even translation magic couldn't save English so painfully Korean that it made my head spin.

"At this rate, even the Akabutakchi tribe, who have preserved their traditions in the Amazon rainforest for hundreds of years, won't believe you're American."

"Hmm. I do not know exactly what you mean, but the oddly specific nature of it makes me even angrier."

"Just do as I say. If your identity gets exposed, it won't end with a little trouble."

No matter how good my public image was right now, if the Skeleton King's identity became known, we would clearly have to brace ourselves for considerable repercussions.

I turned my head.

"Isn't that right, Team Leader Choi?"

In the seat diagonally beside us, Team Leader Choi had been awake by himself for several minutes. He answered,

"I was already considering the matter of the Skeleton King—"

“Stone-King. Call me Mr. King.”

The Skeleton King cut him off firmly. Team Leader Choi stared at him for a moment, then continued with a sigh.

“In any case, we are considering every possibility regarding Mr. King’s future arrangements. For now, it would be best to avoid exposure to the press and other media.”

“I refuse. I will proudly reveal myself to the world.”

“Really? Team Leader Choi, what are the penalties for entering the country illegally?”

Team Leader Choi answered at once.

“Deportation, without question. He would also have to expect a fine or imprisonment.”

“What about entering illegally from the Demon Realm?”

“It has never happened before, but instead of the police, a large-scale raid team would be dispatched.”

“You heard him.”

The Skeleton King’s eyes swiveled back and forth in silence before he finally spoke.

“…It cannot be helped. The world is not yet prepared to accept this king, so I shall exercise restraint for a while.”

“That’s what you should do. Unless you want to spend the rest of your life lying low in my Inventory.”

“A-All right.”

The biggest headache was dealt with.

Now there was the second headache… and this one I had no choice but to face head-on.

Not because I lacked alternatives, but because doing so would help with my plans going forward.

It’s a pain, but it can’t be helped.

I quietly tapped the armrest, lost in thought, then abruptly spoke.

“What’s the atmosphere like back home right now?”

Team Leader Choi gave me a terse, emphatic answer.

“…That bad?”

“When someone passes the judicial exam,[2074] banners go up in their neighborhood and at their alma mater, and the local newspaper runs a short article. More than fifteen hundred people pass that exam every year. How much more attention do you think you would receive, Mr. Jin Taekyung?”

[2074] Korea’s judicial exam was a competitive national examination for entry into the legal profession.

With that perfectly apt comparison, Team Leader Choi clicked in midair.

The holographic screen built into the seat filled with countless online articles.

[At Last, He Has Returned.]

[Who Is Jin Taekyung? Chairman Xiao Yang Bows His Head on Behalf of the Chinese People. The Reverent Farewell of S-Rank Hunters…]

[The Young Hero Who Fought to Rescue Survivors Until the Very End Finally Returns to the Arms of His Homeland.]

It wasn't just the Korean media. China, where the incident had taken place, and countries around the world were flooding the internet with article after article about my return and what I would do next.

I had known this was coming and expected it, but I still couldn't help gaping when I saw a photograph attached to an online article posted five minutes earlier.

"Wait. Are all those people actually human?"

"They aren't monsters, so they probably are."

"Holy shit…"

The photograph showed a crowd packed into Incheon Airport without so much as a gap between them.

Thousands? No, tens of thousands.

As I stared blankly at the screen, Team Leader Choi continued.

"Traffic throughout the surrounding area has come to a standstill, and a car parade is being prepared under military and police control."

"What? A car parade?"

"Did I not tell you?"

"You mentioned it in passing, so I thought you were joking. I mean… isn't this a bit much?"

Team Leader Choi shook his head firmly.

"It has to be this much. You are the new S-rank Hunter representing Korea."

"Even so, this is excessive. At this rate, the President will show up too."

"Ah, I really did fail to mention that."

"What?"

"He is coming. The Blue House[2075] contacted us first this morning. I meant to tell you on the plane, but I dozed off and forgot."

For a moment, my thoughts ground to a halt.

Tens of thousands of people waiting for me at Incheon Airport. Paralyzed roads and a spectacular car parade. And now the President was coming too.

I sat there speechless, then finally forced the words out.

"…Really? You're not joking?"

[2075]The Blue House was the office and residence of Korea's president.

“Team Leader Choi, I don’t know anything about politics. If I get tangled up in something and it goes wrong, I’ll be completely screwed.”

“I know how you feel, Mr. Jin Taekyung. That is why I tried to turn them down politely, but they seemed quite determined. It was not easy.”

“You still should have refused. Even if I belong to Peace Guild, how could you make that decision on your own?”

No matter how much we trusted each other or how little time there had been, this was something he should have consulted me about.

At the sight of my rigid expression, Team Leader Choi lowered his head apologetically.

“I’m sorry. They offered several favorable conditions, including tax breaks, so I thought it would benefit you as well.”

“Forget that. Call them right now and tell them it’s off… Wait. Tax breaks?”

“Yes. You know the bounty that was placed on the Arch Lich. If the Chinese government pays it to you, then under Korean law, it would count as foreign-source income for a Korean resident…”

“Wait. So how much tax would I have to pay in total?”

“I cannot say for certain, but it would be several trillion won.[2076] The bounty alone is fifty trillion won.[2077] Even if we simplify things and assume only ten percent is deducted, it would still be an enormous amount. Of course, the amount left over would be much larger.”

“…That’s true.”

“Once again, I apologize for failing to get your approval. I will tell the Blue House[2078] that this is no longer happening.”

I nodded, my expression hard.

“Team Leader. This must never happen again.”

Right. I was about to get my hands on tens of trillions of won.[2079] Even if I paid every cent of tax I owed, I would still be incredibly wealthy.

No matter how insignificant the conditions they were offering might be, I couldn’t get involved with politicians just to save a little on taxes. That was something I needed to avoid.

[2076] A few or several trillion won is approximately $1.4–6.4 billion or €1.3–5.8 billion, taking the phrase as roughly two to nine trillion won.

[2077] Fifty trillion won is about $36 billion or €32 billion.

[2078] The Blue House was the office and residence of Korea’s president.

[2079] Tens of trillions of won is approximately $14–64 billion or €13–58 billion, taking the phrase as roughly twenty to ninety trillion won.

A few trillion won?[2080] I can just pay it and be done with it.

I cast my worries aside and leaned back against the soft seat.

Pop! Pop-pop-pop!

At Incheon Airport, hundreds of cameras flashed at once.

At the photo line set up under strict security, two men whose professions could not have been more different shook hands with broad smiles.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung. You’ve truly been through a lot.”

“Oh, not at all. You’ve been busy lately too, haven’t you, Mr. President?”

As the Skeleton King watched the scene, he thought,

What a vile human.

The thought applied just as much to Team Leader Choi, who was smiling contentedly as though everything had gone according to plan.

[2080] A few or several trillion won is approximately $1.4–6.4 billion or €1.3–5.8 billion, taking the phrase as roughly two to nine trillion won.

Chapter 440

The day Jin Taekyung's private jet landed at Incheon International Airport, cameras from around the world turned toward Korea.

Countless flashes erupted without pause, bright enough to make people forget the sun was already setting. Despite the midwinter cold, hundreds of thousands packed the surrounding area and greeted the returning hero with thunderous cheers.

And at the center of it all stood one man, staring blankly at the welcome that had far exceeded anything he'd imagined.

"…What the hell is all this, goddammit?"

His voice was no louder than an ant's, but the world's media outlets had brought their best equipment. They didn't miss the young hero's offhand remark.

"What the sibu-leol?"[2081]

"Que veut-elle dire par là?"

"Was meint sie damit?"

Korean profanity was famously diverse—so much so that even translation devices struggled with it.

The Western reporters hesitated, unable to grasp the full-bodied meaning of sibu-leol[2082], but the Korean reporters, who had mastered all manner of wildly inventive curses since their school days, moved like lightning.

"An article! Get it online now! We have to be first!"

"W-With this?"

"You idiot, don't you know that everything Jin Taekyung does is breaking news right now? Stop wasting time. Get a shot of his mouth as he swears, grab the audio, and upload it immediately!"

"Yes, Senior! But, Senior… won't this cause trouble?"

"Trouble? What trouble?"

"If it looks like we're attacking Jin Taekyung, there could be a backlash. You know, something like Jin Taekyung Profanity Controversy…"

The veteran reporter scowled at his junior.

Was that kid in his second year now, or his third? After working in the field this long, he should've learned to think, but he was still hopelessly slow on the uptake.

The veteran barely held back a curse when he remembered that the idiot in front of him was the bureau chief's nephew.

"Hey. Reporter Hong."

"Yes."

[2081] Sibu-leol is a Korean profanity, roughly equivalent to "fuck."

[2082] Sibu-leol is a Korean profanity, roughly equivalent to "fuck."

"Jin Taekyung is allowed to swear."

"What?"

"When a politician or celebrity swears in public in this country, they become the worst person alive. But when Jin Taekyung does it, people nearly die of happiness. Understand?"

"Yes, yes, Senior!"

Only then did the junior nod. The veteran let out a deep sigh and looked at his smartphone.

The chatroom for the live stream currently airing on iTube, the world's largest video-sharing website, was already going berserk.

[2086] "Magdonaldo" and "Ssankyu" imitate Japanese pronunciations of "McDonald's" and "thank you."

[2087] Seoul and Busan are separate cities; Busan is not a district of Seoul.

[2088] "Hell Joseon" is a cynical nickname for South Korea, comparing modern society to the rigid and oppressive Joseon era.

> ㄴ Don’t get baited by weirdos. Watch the broadcast. The car parade is about to start.
>
> ㄴ It really is. Don’t get angry over pointless stuff, hyungs.[2093] Let’s just watch King Taekyung.

Broadcast networks, cable channels, and general programming channels were all showing the scene. On top of that, viewers around the world were watching through iTube’s live stream.

With untold numbers watching, the massive limousine bus carrying Jin Taekyung and his companions began to move.

The cheers grew louder, flashes burst everywhere, and drones filled the sky overhead, painting patterns across the night.

> ㄴ Wow, this is insane. There are so many people that the cameras can’t even fit them all in the frame □□;[2094]
>
> ㄴ This is bigger than the Olympics. How many drones are there, anyway?
>
> ㄴ A lot, I guess?
>
> ㄴ I know that much…
>
> ㄴ I got goose bumps the moment the bus started moving. My chest actually swelled up. Is this for real?

The limousine bus carrying Jin Taekyung and his companions moved at ten kilometers per hour[2095] through a wall of people.

Brilliant fireworks exploded without pause, and flower petals scattered by the crowd whirled through the air on the wind.

At first, Jin Taekyung watched the scene with an awkwardly stiff expression. Before long, however, he smiled and waved at the crowd.

They’re people who like me.

Six months ago, Jin Taekyung had been no more than a grain of sand on a beach.

An F-rank Hunter who could be found anywhere, ignored by everyone and swept away whenever a wave rolled in.

He had never once imagined that a day like this would come.

All I ever dreamed of was retiring without dying…

[2092] This twists the name of an attack from One Piece into a reference to an uncle by marriage, alluding to the execution of North Korean leader Kim Jong-un’s uncle by marriage.

[2093] Hyung is a term a man uses for an older brother or an older male acquaintance. Hyungs is its plural.

[2094] □□ represents trembling and is used online to express shock or awe.

[2095] Ten kilometers per hour is about 6.2 mph.

He had gained so much. He'd been forced to walk a thorny path with death on every side, but the fruit hanging along the way had been sweet. Power beyond his wildest imagination, enormous wealth, and even fame.

And…

"You've worked hard, my son."

"I'm really proud of you too, Mr. Jin Taekyung, but these flashes are so bright I can barely see your face. How long are those reporters planning to keep this up?"

His family, who had always been with him.

His mother's warm hand stroking his back made his throat tighten, while the sight of his sister scrunching up her face against the flashes drew a quiet laugh from him.

"Mom worked harder than I did. You too, Sis."

"I know. Mom and Oppa[2096] worked harder."

"I thought you were barely human, but you do have a shred of conscience after all."

"Wow, listen to him."

"Smile, you idiot. Do you have any idea how many cameras are filming us right now?"

With that joking remark, Jin Taekyung pulled them both into a hug. Then he met a pair of eyes watching him from behind his family.

"You've truly been through a lot, Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"You too, Team Leader Choi. I'm just a big, dumb brute. Without you, I really would've had a hard time."

"I only did what I had to do. And I'll continue to do the same."

"You're saying something scary with a smile."

"You know this isn't the end."

He knew.

That was why his resolve hardened even further.

Jin Taekyung had made it this far across a perilous field of thorns. He couldn't allow his precious family and friends to walk the same path.

Even if his feet became covered in blood and he collapsed from the pain, he would protect them from the threats drawing ever closer.

Sometimes they would join forces. And even if it meant sacrificing himself…

"I'll be counting on you for a long time to come."

Team Leader Choi stared at the hand Jin Taekyung held out. Then a deep dimple appeared beside his mouth.

"Yes. Always."

[2096] Oppa is a term a woman uses for an older brother or an older male acquaintance.

Just as the two firmly clasped hands, a grumbling voice rang out inside Jin Taekyung's head.

You're all having a grand old time.

Are you still sulking?

Who is sulking?! Does this body, reborn as a great king, look as though it would feel such a petty human emotion?

You're definitely sulking.

I am not!

The attention seeker—no, the Skeleton King—who had been forced by circumstances to hide in the Inventory had been sulking bitterly for quite a while.

Jin Taekyung smiled faintly and spoke inwardly.

Hey.

Do not speak to me!

Thanks for everything so far. I'm counting on you from here on out, too.

H-Hmm.

The Skeleton King cleared his throat and continued hesitantly.

Since you put it that way, I shall consider it.

Consider what?

Staying with you, you vile human.

Oh, you don't need to consider that.

What?

You're joining Peace Guild no matter what. I've already had the contract drawn up, so go put your thumbprint on it. No, wait. Your fingerprints won't show up in a records check, so I guess you'll have to stamp it with your skull.

What is this?! Is this not a free and democratic country?!

Nope. I'm going to work you like a slave and suck out every last drop, right down to your marrow.

Release this body immediately! Turn the car around!

Unable to hold it in any longer, Jin Taekyung burst out laughing and leaned toward the driver's seat.

"Could we head straight to the next destination?"

"Pardon?"

The startled driver stammered out a reply.

"That's different from the instructions we received beforehand."

"Can't we?"

"I'm sorry, but we can't."

"We really can't?"

"I'm afraid not…"

“Seriously, truly, we can’t?”

The driver answered in a voice halfway to surrender.

“…I think we might be able to.”

“Then please take us to Peace Guild’s guild house.”

The driver relayed the request to his superior. After it passed through several levels of reporting, the higher-ups were bewildered but readily agreed.

And the roughly three thousand drones followed the seemingly endless car parade.

The limousine bus carrying Jin Taekyung and his companions eventually stopped in front of Peace Guild’s guild house.

Every moment of their meeting with the Guild members waiting there was captured on camera and broadcast around the world.

Even after midnight passed and the long-awaited Christmas Eve arrived, the fervor showed no sign of dying down.

If anything, people seemed to compete to feed fresh wood and wind to the fading flames.

The name Jin Taekyung was everywhere, and for someone still suffering from severe aftereffects, it was unbearable torment.

“This morning, the United States’ S-rank Hunter Magic Johnson announced through his official social-media account that he is pursuing some kind of agreement with Peace Guild—”

Bang!

The announcer’s face vanished from the holographic television. The man who had smashed the machine screamed.

“Jin Taekyung, Jin Taekyung, Jin Taekyung!”

Bang! Crash!

His eyes were bloodshot. Powerful qi shot from his wildly swinging fists, smashing everything around him and reducing it to dust.

That name was more hateful than any other.

At the same time, it belonged to the man who had shown him a fear he could never forget.

“Aaaaaaaagh!”

Just as Go Jun howled amid the devastated room, a faint sound of movement reached him, followed by a cautious voice.

“T-Team Leader.”

Chapter 441

"T-Team Leader. May I come in for a moment?"

The voice was taut with tension.

Go Jun glared at the door with bloodshot eyes and thrust out a hand.

Crack!

A tremendous force tore through the air, ripping apart the iron door and crumpling it like a sheet of paper.

The security-team employee who witnessed the incredible sight from a few feet away swallowed a startled breath.

"Gasp."

"I told you not to let anyone approach."

The moment he met Go Jun's blazing red eyes, a chill ran down his spine.

He had heard his colleagues talk about the extreme change in their direct superior, who had always been as precise and cold as a machine. But facing him like this, the team member's voice trembled with fear despite himself.

"I-It's just that… there's something I need to report…"

"Put it off."

His voice was low, as though dragged up from the depths of an abyss.

The team member would have loved to do exactly that. But if it had been anything trivial, they would never have drawn lots to decide who had to deliver the report.

He swallowed hard and summoned his courage.

"The head of the investigation team contacted us urgently. He said they found a strange object they couldn't identify…"

Go Jun, who had been about to turn away, came to an abrupt stop.

"A strange object?"

"Yes, Team Leader."

"Could it be—"

"No, sir."

Afraid Go Jun's anger might turn on him, the team member hurriedly continued.

"We checked. None of the late Vice Guild Master's belongings have been found yet."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes. We're constantly monitoring the team members dispatched to the site in case they try to pocket anything. There's no doubt."

"And?"

"Pardon?"

"There's only one report I need from those bastards. A report saying they found what I need."

Go Jun's eyes darkened.

Even now, with the Crown Prince Party—closely tied to Ares Guild—on the decline, the Guild's influence and power remained intact.

The person in charge could change. The government could be replaced. But the greed that lived in every human heart would never disappear.

Even the straightest bamboo bent beneath enough weight. Go Jun had created that weight with tens of billions of won.[2097]

The head of the investigation team managing the city that had once been the Arch Lich's stronghold, along with the senior officials under him, had proved no different.

"Tell those bastards to find it, no matter what it takes. Until then, I don't want to hear from them again."

There was no such thing as a favor in this world without a price. Go Jun had bought them with a fortune, and if they failed to deliver what he wanted, he intended to retaliate accordingly.

That was how important the object was.

Not merely because it was a keepsake of the Master he had followed like a father. It could also become a powerful weapon—one capable of driving someone into a corner with no escape.

A holographic recorder.

Lee Jungryong had been the true master of the immensely influential Ares Guild. In case the unexpected ever happened, he had always carried a miniature holographic recorder on his person.

The day he died at Jin Taekyung's hands had been no exception.

All the evidence is in there. If I can find it, then afterward…

At that moment, the fire in Go Jun's eyes wavered violently.

Afterward… what am I supposed to do?

Before he knew it, the face of one man—someone he hated beyond measure and feared even more—flashed before his eyes.

…Jin Taekyung.

Merely thinking the name made his heart plummet and his hands and feet tremble.

The indifferent gaze that had looked down at him beneath the faint moonlight and the dry voice that had accompanied it clouded his eyes and ears like an apparition.

I'll say this one last time.

[2097] Tens of billions of won is roughly ₩20–90 billion: about $14–64 million or €13–58 million.

The voice had burrowed into Go Jun's ears while he screamed in unimaginable agony.

Let it end with Lee Jungryong. Hide your teeth and put away your claws. If you do that… nothing will happen.

Every bone in his body had been crushed like matchsticks, and his raw flesh had been torn away as though wrung from his body. Without even getting the chance to wield his weapon properly, he had been left thrashing in an endless swamp of pain.

Lee Jungryong had been an insurmountable wall and a Master Go Jun revered.

Jin Taekyung was something no one had ever seen before.

No. He was like…

"A monster."

The single word that escaped Go Jun without his realizing it was steeped in all the emotions and fear he felt.

Then he came to his senses and understood.

His hatred for Jin Taekyung was nothing compared to his terror.

Jin Taekyung's existence was fear itself, branded forever into Go Jun's soul like a mark burned into flesh. At the same time, it was another name for the perfect helplessness he had felt for the first time in his life.

"T-Team Leader?"

Go Jun did not answer. Teeth clenched, he lowered his head and stared at his trembling hands.

What the fuck is this…

Crunch.

He bit his lip until it bled, then raised his head. Ignoring the team member's bewildered stare at the sight of his frightened superior, he spoke.

"Tell the head of the investigation team to bring me that damned strange object. I don't know what it is, but I should at least see it for myself."

"But a moment ago, you said—Ah, understood."

Realizing his mistake, the team member hurriedly bowed and left the room.

Only after walking a considerable distance down the corridor did he finally release the breath he had been holding. He gestured to the hotel employees waiting nearby.

"Wait here for a while. Go in once he's calmed down. And the new room is ready, right?"

The Chinese hotel employees nodded calmly.

This was not the first time Go Jun had gone on a rampage. It had already happened several times over the past week.

But what did that matter?

Until a few days ago, the hotel had belonged to a local notable in Sichuan Province. Once Ares Guild bought it, the Koreans before them became their new employers.

And excellent employers they were, lavishing the staff with extra pay in exchange for their silence.

“I’m tired of repeating myself. We all know the situation, so let’s do our jobs properly.”

The team member tossed them a thick envelope, wiped the sweat from his brow, and walked away.

Being unable to leave this godforsaken land of China was bad enough. What troubled him even more was the unstable condition of the man poised to succeed Lee Jungryong as the new captain of Ares Guild.

Could that rumor really have been true?

He recalled the story quietly circulating within the security team.

And the unease stirring within him.

The treatment is incredible, but if Team Leader stays like that from now on…

There would be no problem if Go Jun remained the head of security. The enormous warship called the Ares Guild was not so fragile that one mistake by a helmsman could make it capsize.

But if the man at the helm became its new captain, that was a different story.

Damn it. I’ve never had to worry about this before.

The team member muttered to himself and pulled a smartphone from inside his suit jacket. It was a work phone that left no records and could not be traced.

After a long series of rings, someone answered.

“Ah, Mr. Park. I’ve been waiting for your call.”

“I’ll get straight to the point. Our team leader wants to see the object you mentioned for himself.”

“In person?”

“Yes. In person. Our team leader wants to avoid public attention as much as possible right now, so you understand what I’m saying, don’t you?”

The head of the investigation team cleared his throat on the other end of the call.

“Ahem. That may be difficult. Since this is the Arch Lich’s former stronghold, there are foreign personnel dispatched by the United Nations as well, and security is tighter than you might think…”

“Name your price. But there can’t be a single mistake.”

A short while later, the team member ended the call and clicked his tongue.

“Greedy bastards. Money is all they care about. Then again, I guess that works in our favor.”

The world did not change easily. Before overwhelming wealth and power, the word impossible lost all meaning.

Since joining Ares Guild's security team, he had witnessed the impossible being made possible countless times.

And that fortresslike power would naturally be inherited by one man.

Team Leader Go Jun.

The new captain of Ares Guild.

He himself was merely one of countless rowers, but Go Jun was different. As his thoughts reached that point, he found himself wondering about the one man Go Jun feared so much.

Jin Taekyung.

No one could silence people completely.

The rumor had begun when three Hunters who had secretly left with Go Jun one day a week earlier started talking.

For now, only a tiny handful within the security team—Go Jun's closest associates—knew the truth. But soon enough, it would spread like an epidemic.

If it's true… Haa. Things have gotten seriously complicated.

The team member took a deep breath and focused.

From now on, he would have countless decisions to agonize over. Should he stay aboard his current ship or leave for another?

If he wanted to avoid becoming anyone's enemy, his only choice was to leave the field entirely.

I need to keep my head on straight. Yeah.

Right now, his first priority was retrieving the object the head of the investigation team had smuggled out.

As he headed toward the agreed meeting place, he suddenly found himself envying Jin Taekyung.

Damn. If I had fifty trillion won[2098] like that bastard, I'd move straight to Europe and live like royalty.

He was wealthy himself and owned several buildings, but human greed was not so easily satisfied.

Once someone owned an expensive foreign car, they wanted a luxury yacht and a helicopter. Then they wanted a private jet of their own.

The team member smacked his lips in envy.

I wonder what Jin Taekyung is doing right now. Throwing a party on a luxury yacht with Playboy models?

Well-tanned bronze muscles rippled beneath the blazing sunlight.

[2098] Fifty trillion won is about $36 billion or €32 billion.

Their identity was that of beautiful model women from around the world who had gathered to enjoy a yacht party with me…

“One, two!”

“Heave-ho!”

…or not.

They belonged to the river bandits of the Water Dragon Stronghold.

I watched the musclebound monsters bustling around the deck with a mournful gaze.

A yacht party, my ass.

I had only ever seen that kind of thing online, and I intended to keep it that way.

Reality wasn’t a boat party with beautiful women. It was staring out at the Yangtze from a deck packed with musclebound river bandits doing boat PT.[2099]

No. There was one more thing.

Whoosh!

I had to dodge the finger flicks our boisterous Old Master, Fire King Jeok Cheongang, sent flying whenever he got bored.

“Well, look at you. Dodging, are we?”

“…Isn’t dodging them the whole point of this training? You said I needed to maintain a mind like a clear mirror and still water while heightening my senses so I could get used to my Middle Dantian.”

Jeok Cheongang answered without a shred of shame.

“That one was meant to hit you. How dare you look away during training?”

“I was looking away with both eyes.”

“Why, you little… Want me to gouge them out for you?”

Eyes blazing, Jeok Cheongang crooked his fingers like claws and continued.

“Do you think this training is easy? Even when you concentrate fully, you can barely dodge them.”

“Fine, fine. I understand. I said I understand.”

Grumbling, I closed my eyes.

Then, a moment later, I quietly opened them again.

“But…”

“What?”

“Didn’t I just dodge that perfectly even while looking away?”

“Oh. You did, didn’t you?”

“…?”

“…?”

“…!”

[2099] PT means personal training, a common abbreviation in Korean gym usage.

"…!"

What the hell was this?

Jeok Cheongang pressed his lips tightly together beneath my incredulous stare, then abruptly exploded.

"Not like that! Do it like that brat! Like him!"

He pointed at a young man sitting cross-legged without so much as twitching.

For some reason, Cheongpung had been forced to join me in training.

"Look at that brat. He may be a little strange most of the time, but when it matters, he does everything perfectly. His posture hasn't wavered, and his breathing remains long, light, and steady. An unwavering mind and posture, no matter what happens around him. That is what it means to possess a mind like a clear mirror and still water."

After showering Cheongpung with praise without pausing for breath, Jeok Cheongang pointed at him again.

"Watch carefully how he dodges. Now, when I send a finger flick…"

Whoosh! Thud!

The finger flick struck Cheongpung squarely in the temple, and his eyes flew open.

He looked around through eyes still heavy with sleep, then rubbed his head when the pain finally seemed to register.

"Ow. That hurts…"

Then he returned to dreamland faster than light.

I stared at Jeok Cheongang.

"Clear as a mirror? What?"

"A clear mirror… Forget it. You and that brat both. To hell with all of it!"

The Yangtze was peaceful today, too.

Chapter 442

Like the majestic waters of the Yangtze, time flowed slowly but steadily onward.

It was late afternoon on the fourth day since we had left Sichuan by Murim reckoning. As I sat on the deck, a familiar presence approached.

“What are you doing?”

I knew who it was just from his footsteps.

Without taking my eyes off the Yangtze, I answered, “What does it look like I’m doing?”

Hyuk Mujin limped over and answered without hesitation.

“Looks like you’re just sitting there.”

“I’m thinking.”

“About what?”

“The peace of Murim.”

After a brief silence, hearty laughter burst out.

“Puhaha! That’s the funniest joke I’ve heard all year. That’s our Captain.”

“No. Forget it. I just thought of something else.”

“What?”

“There’s a certain bastard who always takes everything I say for dog shit. But maybe because he’s been feeling better lately, he doesn’t seem able to control his mouth. So I’m wondering whether I should beat him a few times. What do you think?”

Hyuk Mujin considered the question for a moment.

“It isn’t the person I’m thinking of, is it?”

“Probably.”

“Who is it?”

“Someone named Hyuk Mujin.”

“…”

“Be quiet unless you want another taste of the Yangtze.”

Hyuk Mujin nodded frantically, practically having a seizure.

“Please, anything but that…!”

A few days earlier, I had sentenced him to a Yangtze dunking and immediately logged out, leaving him to spend an entire shichen[2100] sightseeing at the Yangtze Aquarium.

The moment Mungyeong’s superb medical skills had restored him to reasonable health, he had even cast a fishing line, declaring that he would catch every last bastard that had bitten his nose and slice them into sashimi.

[2100] A shichen is a traditional time period of approximately two hours.

“Fine, calm down. Why are you here?”

“Huh?”

“I’m asking what you want. There must be a reason.”

Hyuk Mujin asked in a wounded voice, “Do I really need a reason to come see you? Between us?”

“If you don’t have one, you get a taste of the Yangtze.”

“I have one! I do!”

“Then spit it out.”

“This might just be me, but…”

Hyuk Mujin hesitated before continuing.

“Is something bothering you lately?”

“Why?”

“No reason. It’s just that whenever I look at you these days, you seem to have a lot on your mind.”

“Me?”

“Yes. And, well… To be honest, not much has happened lately compared to before. But somehow, you’re the only one who seems tired and busy. I guess that’s the best way to put it.”

“Hmm…”

“You seem to be sleeping more often, too.”

When had this bastard gotten so perceptive?

Under my strange gaze, Hyuk Mujin scratched the back of his head.

“Well, that’s just the impression I got. Am I wrong?”

“Yeah. You are.”

Naturally, my answer was a lie. Hyuk Mujin’s guess was exactly right.

Since first setting foot in Murim, I had never traveled between the two worlds as often as I had lately.

Looking back, though, every one of those trips was my own choice.

Sometimes a Quest had blocked the Logout function, but most of the time, I had made the decision myself.

If I had crossed over to the other world and spent time there while walking across thin ice, my tension would have collapsed, and I would have been unable to overcome the crisis.

But recently, the situation had changed.

Both the modern world and Murim have made it over a mountain.

How long had it been since both worlds had fallen quiet at the same time?

Murim had been a minefield of constant upheaval from the very beginning. Even the relatively peaceful modern world had started growing turbulent after my conflict with Lee Jungryong.

For the first time in ages—no, for the first time since I had obtained the System—I had found peace in both worlds.

But deep down, I had a suspicion bordering on certainty.

This peace would not last long.

The calm before the storm. The brief peace I had been given was like the stillness of the night before a storm broke.

That was why I was busily traveling between the two worlds, preparing for the storm soon to come. It was also why, even with the breathtaking scenery of the Yangtze spread out before me, I was still hunched over a mystery that refused to yield.

What the hell is this?

I stared at the paper in my hand.

The not particularly high-quality xuan paper[2101] was covered with strange patterns and symbols I had drawn myself.

There were all kinds of them, each subtly different in shape. They looked like some mysterious script out of a detective novel.

No. I almost wished that were all they were. Then I wouldn't have to worry so much.

"What's that?"

"A storm."

"Huh?"

"Honestly, I don't really know either."

Or perhaps I already knew and simply didn't want to believe it.

These patterns and symbols were the sole point of overlap between two worlds with different flows of time, different histories, and different cultures.

In the modern world, they had been found in the Arch Lich's magic circle. In Murim, they had appeared in Dark Heaven's formations.

And now, deep in my heart, I was turning over a single word.

Black magic.

I had no idea how bizarre or far-ranging Murim's demonic, heterodox arts—commonly called demonic martial arts—could be.

But the more I looked back on everything I had personally seen and experienced, the more it resembled black magic.

The Blood Lord. The Western Heaven Demon Lord. Even the formation we found in the cave.

[2101] Xuan paper is a traditional paper used for Chinese calligraphy and painting.

The Blood Lord's recovery after being struck by Jeok Cheongang's Dance of the Fire God and Demon had resembled a Troll's regeneration more than anything human. The Lord of Heaven, whom the Western Heaven Demon Lord worshiped so fervently, had appeared before me through the body of a subordinate who was already dead.

On top of that, the formations used by the black-robed men who had followed their respective leaders and drenched Shaolin and Sichuan in blood were astonishingly similar to what the modern world called Warp Gates.

At this point, it would be stranger not to suspect anything.

At the same time… the fact that I did not want to believe it easily was my reality.

Black magic in Murim.

This was more serious than having a female friend I secretly had a crush on use the bathroom at my house, only to find the toilet seat left up afterward.

Where did it come from? How? Why?

My head was full of question marks. An investigation was already underway in the modern world, but I felt as though I were wandering through endless fog.

More frightening still was the unknown something lurking beyond that fog, yet to reveal itself.

If all my fears turned out to be true, then…

"What are you staring at so intently?"

The voice shattered my deep thoughts and brought me back to reality. I frowned.

Not because my train of thought had been interrupted, but because of the rancid stench assaulting my nose.

Suppressing an instinctive gag, I asked, "You haven't washed again, have you?"

Gung Gibang, who had subtly pressed his butt against the spot beside me, nodded.

"It's only natural for a beggar not to wash. Is there a problem?"

Hyuk Mujin opened his mouth with a queasy expression.

"Young Hero Gung, are you some kind of poison man? The moment you came within three jang,[2102] my head started spinning and I began dry-heaving."

"A Beggars' Sect disciple washes only three times in his life: when he is born, when he joins the Beggars' Sect, and when he dies."

I turned to Gung Gibang, who was spouting this bullshit.

"Then go dunk yourself in the river before I kill you right now. Since you're going in anyway, scrub off some of that grime while you're at it."

"No. I hate water. Especially after that day."

Ah. Right. He was another victim of the Yangtze dunking.

[2102] A jang is a traditional Korean length of approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft); three jang is approximately 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

Gung Gibang answered with a grave expression, then glanced at the paper in my hand.

"Were you looking at that again?"

"Again? Young Hero Gung, you knew about it?"

At Hyuk Mujin's question, Gung Gibang nodded.

"Of course. A few days ago, he suddenly told me to follow him and showed it to me. Asked if I'd ever seen it anywhere before. Naturally, I told him I'd never seen anything like it in my life."

"Captain, how could you discriminate against me like this?"

I gave the wounded Hyuk Mujin a warm smile.

"Easily."

"…"

"I showed it to him because he's the Successor Beggar. I thought he might know something. Satisfied?"

Having found something to tease Hyuk Mujin about, Gung Gibang snickered.

"He showed it to Mungyeong, too."

"Hey, that was…"

I opened my mouth, but I couldn't exactly reveal Mungyeong's identity, so I closed it again.

It wasn't only because Mungyeong was watching us from several jang[2103] away while pointedly stroking a large acupuncture needle.

Seriously.

"See that, you Hyuk bastard? That's where you stand. Not in his heart, but in his little toe—urk!"

Grab. Whoosh!

Listening to him was getting so irritating that my ears hurt. I grabbed Gung Gibang by the collar and hurled him over the railing.

He flailed in midair, then plunged into the river with a short scream.

Splash!

He must have struck the water fairly hard, because the spray reached the ship's railing.

The next moment, Cheongpung, who had been giggling at the surprise entertainment, suddenly screamed.

"No! Mimi!"

What now?

I peered more closely to see what had happened, then doubted my eyes.

[2103] A jang is a traditional Korean length of approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft); three jang is approximately 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

A horned snake, pure white from head to tail, was thrashing wildly as it swam toward us for dear life.

The clear waters of the Yangtze were turning pitch-black around Gung Gibang, while several fish that had been swimming peacefully nearby floated belly-up.

"…What the fuck?"

Even the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake was reacting like that. Had Hyuk Mujin been right? Was Gung Gibang really some kind of poison man?

The river bandits who witnessed this absurd case of water pollution unfold in real time began seriously debating whether Gung Gibang belonged to the Beggars' Sect or the Sichuan Tang Clan.

I let out a deep sigh and gestured to them.

"Get him out quickly. If you want to keep working as river bandits on the Yangtze."

Realizing that their home waters were under threat, the river bandits sprang into action.

After that, I continued traveling between the modern world and Murim once or several times a day, handling everything I needed to do while continuing my investigation.

News that my Peace Guild and the Wizard Guild led by Magic Johnson had entered into some kind of agreement became a major topic of conversation among Hunters around the world.

But for ordinary people, the bigger story was still me—the individual named Jin Taekyung.

> World Hunter Association: "Jin Taekyung is an undeniable S-rank Hunter and a hero who has saved countless lives. The fact that he is still classified as an A-rank Hunter is absurd." He is expected to visit the Association headquarters for a brief test, after which he will be issued an S-rank Hunter license. The World Hunter Association sends Jin Taekyung a fervent invitation!

> Breaking News: Jin Taekyung flatly rejects the Association's offer. "Circumstances make it difficult for me to go right now. I'll stop by when I have time." World Hunter Association left bewildered.

> World Hunter Association issues new statement: “This is unprecedented. S-rank Hunter testing and licensing have always been conducted at Association headquarters.”

> Jin Taekyung: “I didn’t say I wouldn’t take the test. I said I’d go later. I can take it in Korea, so what’s the problem? Instead of arguing about precedent, let’s try being efficient.”

> A senior Hunter Association official, wounded in his pride, issues a threat: “Then we cannot issue you an S-rank Hunter license.”

> Urgent Breaking News: Brief social-media post reads, “Then don’t. Who the hell do you think you are, threatening me? Fucking hell.” Account confirmed to be Jin Taekyung’s official social-media account… Public reaction? “That was unbelievably satisfying.” “More refreshing than the soda we drank during the Thousand-Ri March.”[2104]

> World Hunter Association: “The official’s statement was a personal slip and does not represent the organization’s position. We apologize.” Final decision made to dispatch a testing team to Korea for Jin Taekyung.

> Japanese Prime Minister Koizumi: “Jin Taekyung is fun, cool, and sexy. I will make certain that he becomes a naturalized Japanese citizen. Because that is my ‘promise’…”

Leaving behind the countless incidents and remarks surrounding me, I returned to Murim.

And then…

“I can finally breathe again. Damn Yangtze.”

With Jeok Cheongang’s refreshing remark ringing out, the bow of the swift ship finally entered Hubei Province after nearly ten days of sailing.

[2104] The Thousand-Ri March refers to a long-distance Korean military march. A thousand Korean ri is approximately 393 km (244 mi).

Chapter 443

Ten days of sailing had been anything but easy.

We weren't aboard some massive cruise ship. We'd been stuck on a wooden vessel, shuttling between musty cabins and damp decks. Ports? Our schedule was so tight that we'd kept our eyes ahead and sailed straight on.

Under the circumstances, even Jeok Cheongang—and the river bandits who called the Yangtze their home turf—brightened.

Of course, one person was happier than all the rest.

"Ohhh, finally…"

Mu Song, who had been forced to volunteer his talents all the way to Hubei Province, trembled with emotion.

He had been sunk in grief ever since one of his swift ships sank, but now, as if he had forgotten every hardship he'd suffered along the way, he shouted in a powerful voice.

"Drop anchor! Hurry up so we can leave this damn…!"

Jeok Cheongang, who had been nodding in satisfaction, turned toward him.

"This damn what?"

Mu Song realized he had let his true feelings slip and shook his head at tremendous speed.

"N-no, sir. I meant the Yangtze."

"Of course you meant the Yangtze. That's what this old man meant, too."

"…"

"Unless you were calling us damnable?"

"W-why would I ever do that?"

It certainly looked like he would.

While Mu Song broke out in a cold sweat beneath Jeok Cheongang's narrowed gaze, the river bandits sensed their leader's peril and sprang into action.

The swift ships gradually slowed, lined up along the pier, and dropped anchor. A murmur rose from the people gathered near the harbor.

"That flag…"

"The Yangtze River Channel League. It's the Yangtze River Channel League!"

"What does it say underneath? Water Dragon Stronghold? Never heard of it."

"It's a river stronghold based in Sichuan. Water Dragon Stronghold is led by Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song, the Seafaring King's second Disciple."

"Now that you mention it, I think I've heard of them. But why are those bastards in Hubei when they're supposed to be in Sichuan?"

“How should I know? Damn river bandits. Things have been tense enough lately as it is…”

“Shh. Keep your voice down. Some young man is looking this way. Nothing good comes from getting tangled up with Murim.”

The group of merchants who met my eyes hurried away.

And they weren’t the only ones.

A fisherman whose face had been blackened by the sun grabbed his net and scurried off, while a vendor selling his catch packed up his stall at the speed of light.

In the distance, an official in formal robes watched us closely, surrounded by an escort of government troops.

Their eyes held undisguised wariness.

What the hell? This atmosphere is completely different from Sichuan.

The Yangtze River Channel League might have been a band of river pirates founded on plunder, but it had rules and an established system of its own.

I’d heard they didn’t simply pounce whenever they spotted an opportunity, kill everyone in sight, and strip the ship bare. Sometimes they even protected vessels from unaffiliated river bandits, and under normal circumstances, they only collected a set toll before letting ships pass.

They tested the waters during the Great Faction War, but in the end, they sided with the orthodox faction.

Give and take made the world go round.

During the upheaval that decided the future of Murim, the Yangtze River Channel League had backed the orthodox faction and slipped the government enough bribes to keep it satisfied.

In other words, they were hired thugs in a cloak of legality, tolerated by both sides and allowed to carry on.

They couldn’t exactly be called good people, but this was Murim, where every kind of lunatic imaginable ran wild. They might not be gentlemen, but by Murim standards, they were at least run-of-the-mill scoundrels.

That’s why ordinary people in Sichuan barely reacted to them.

Their attitude had been more like, Those beggar bastards are still alive and back again? They certainly hadn’t openly avoided us like this.

I tilted my head as I watched the people scatter in every direction.

Is it just a difference in atmosphere from one region to another?

But if that were all, Mu Song’s expression wouldn’t have looked so grim.

He stared at the suddenly deserted harbor with a deep frown, then called over his right-hand man.

“Have we received no word from our brothers in the League?”

“No, Stronghold Lord. They must have known we were coming, but for some reason, there has been no contact.”

“Not even from Dangyang Stronghold or Honghu Stronghold?”

“That is correct.”

“Even if the others didn’t know, Uncle Hwang is at Donghu Stronghold. There’s no way he failed to hear that we were coming…”

Mu Song muttered with a grave expression, then continued.

“Once we disembark, send out our fastest men to find out what’s happening. Contact our nearby brothers immediately as well.”

“Yes, Stronghold Lord.”

At Mu Song’s gesture, the river bandits under his command moved as one. We were no exception, having finished our preparations to disembark long ago.

Jeok Cheongang, finally leaving the Yangtze behind, led the way. I followed, then Jin Wikyung, Cheongpung, Hyuk Mujin, and Gung Gibang.

Mungyeong came too, blending so quietly into the crowd that one could almost forget he was there.

At last, Jeok Cheongang—the Fire Pokémon[2105] finally free of his type disadvantage—wore a radiant smile.

“Whew. I can finally breathe again. This is why people are meant to live with their feet on solid ground.”

But his happiness didn’t last long.

“You there. Stop.”

The voice was filled with authority. An official who had approached without us noticing swallowed nervously as he looked at us.

Then he glanced at the hundreds of government troops behind him, puffed out his chest, and continued.

“I hear you came from Sichuan. Is that correct?”

“‘You’? ‘Is that correct’?”

Jeok Cheongang blinked and echoed the official’s words back at him.

“Were you addressing this old man just now?”

“That is correct.”

“‘That is correct’?”

The official’s eyes wavered uneasily. But he quickly steeled himself and raised his voice.

“Ahem! Answer only what this official asks. State clearly where you came from and what purpose brings you here!”

“‘Ahem’? ‘Answer me’? ‘State your purpose’?”

[2105] Pokémon are creatures from a Japanese game franchise. In its battles, elemental types have strengths and weaknesses; water has an advantage over fire.

"N-no, this old man…"

"'Old man'?"

Don't. Don't do it. Please, just stop.

They said women got butterflies when a handsome man repeated someone's words like that, but from where I stood, this was a horror movie.

I hurriedly stepped in before Jeok Cheongang could drive a Flame God Palm into the arrogant official's chest.

"Talk to me instead."

"I have nothing to discuss with some wet-behind-the-ears brat!"

"…"

I'd just pulled him out of a tiger's jaws, and this was how he talked to me?

I wanted to knock his head clean off, but I held back and continued.

"We did come from Sichuan, and we have business here."

"Then what business would that be?"

"Well…"

At that moment, someone shouted excitedly.

"Steamed fish topped with lots of minced chili peppers!"

"Cheongpung, you son of a bitch!"

"Why, Benefactor? It really is delicious. It's so good that if two people were eating it and one dropped dead, the other wouldn't even notice…"

I didn't know if it was really delicious enough that one person could die without the other noticing, but from the official's expression, it was clear that we looked like people who deserved to die.

His face turned bright red as he bellowed.

"How dare you mock this official!"

"Wait, mister. That's not what he meant…"

"It is suspicious enough that you came from Sichuan under the flag of the Yangtze River Channel League, and now you claim you came here to eat steamed fish? You're the sort who won't shed a tear until you see the coffin. Guards, arrest them at once!"

"Yes, sir!"

What the hell was this development?

Before I could say another word, hundreds of government troops with military discipline drilled into them surrounded us with spears. Jin Wikyung clicked his tongue softly and stepped forward.

"You're rather quick-tempered."

Jin Wikyung was tall even by modern standards. In Murim, he was considered a giant.

The official swallowed hard as he took in Jin Wikyung's Ural Mountain shoulders[2106] and the muscles bulging beneath his clothes.

"W-who are you?"

"I am Jin Wikyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan in Shanxi. I won't waste words, so why don't you withdraw your men?"

Before the official could answer, Jin Wikyung continued in his deep voice.

"It seems you haven't been informed yet, but we are martial artists who received direct permission to pass from the City Lord of Sichuan Province."

"The City Lord of Sichuan Province?"

"If you doubt me, you may verify it. But before you do, I suggest you withdraw your men. There's no need to throw away perfectly good lives."

The official flinched, and the spearpoints of the government troops surrounding us trembled.

They knew it too. No matter how rigorous their training or how elite they were, they couldn't defeat us.

But that was how the world worked. The men at the bottom shed the blood, while the men at the top guarded their pride. I saw the official's eyes harden.

"How dare you… Do you even know who this official is?"

Without the slightest change in expression, Jin Wikyung replied.

"I do. Naturally, you belong to the Hubei Provincial Administration Commission, which oversees the province's civil and financial affairs. Judging by your robes, you are a Judicial Inquirer of the secondary sixth rank. Though I don't know why a man responsible for judicial affairs has come all the way out here to arrest innocent people."

"…!"

"Oh, that reminds me. Do you know a man surnamed Yi, with the given name Hongcheon?"

A trembling voice slipped between the official's lips.

"T-that person is the Provincial Administration Commissioner who was newly appointed not long ago."

"I see. I thought I'd heard something about that. From Assistant Provincial Administrator in Shanxi to Provincial Administration Commissioner of Hubei. Quite the promotion. An occasion worth celebrating."

"M-might I ask what your relationship is with the Provincial Administration Commissioner?"

Jin Wikyung smiled faintly. At some point, his posture and tone had naturally shifted into those of a man looking down at the official.

[2106] The Ural Mountains are a long mountain range in Russia that forms the traditional boundary between Europe and Asia; the comparison describes broad, massive shoulders.

“I’ve met him a few times and shared a drink or two with him. I also helped him when he needed it.”

“Gasp!”

“Why? Is there something else you’d like to hear?”

“N-no, sir!”

The official’s rigid back folded like a mollusk.

After snapping into a deep bow toward Jin Wikyung, he spun around and roared at his subordinates.

“You fools! What are you doing? Put away those vicious blades at once!”

“Y-yes, sir!”

“What sort of idiots can’t even read a situation like this? Please forgive our rudeness!”

Jin Wikyung benevolently patted the official on the shoulder.

“This man Son is deeply moved by your generosity, as vast as the sea!”

“Don’t apologize to me. Apologize to these men directly. Especially the gentleman you addressed first. He is a highly respected elder of Murim.”

“I-I had no idea. Then might I ask his sobriquet…?”

“He is Great Hero Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King.”

“…!”

“We came straight to Hubei after the Sichuan Blood Tragedy, aboard a ship borrowed from the Yangtze River Channel League. Oh, and of course, we didn’t come solely to eat steamed fish.”

Stop it. You’re going to make him cry.

The official looked from one of us to another with an expression that said he wanted to die, performing the remarkable feat of bowing five times a second.

Jin Wikyung nudged me lightly in the ribs.

“What do you think, my youngest? Your big brother looks cool, doesn’t he?”

“…”

“You would’ve looked cool if you hadn’t said that.”

“Once you establish connections with the government, they make many things more convenient. If you ever find yourself in trouble, try using my name.”

If he could say that with such confidence, he must have planted quite a few seeds.

According to Gung Gibang, the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s meteoric rise in such a short time was virtually unprecedented.

If Jin Mukyung, who was undoubtedly continuing his grueling training at the Jin Family even now, was a martial arts genius, then Jin Wikyung was an all-rounder who possessed everything a Family Head needed.

“My youngest, don’t you think I look cool? Hm?”

"…"

Yes. Apart from things like this, he was the perfect Family Head.

I was still trying to push away the increasingly clingy Jin Wikyung when it happened.

"Everyone, stand aside."

At the voice infused with profound internal energy, the people murmuring some distance from the harbor parted to either side.

At the same time, dozens of martial artists carrying considerable qi approached us with measured steps.

That's…

I narrowed my eyes.

Written in cloud-like calligraphy across their pure-white silk martial robes were the words:

Zhuge Clan.

Chapter 444

The Zhuge Clan.

It was a famous family bound to appear at least once in every modern wuxia[2107] novel.

Not a single character with the surname Zhuge was ever stupid, and none of them were conspicuously strong, either.

They were supposedly one of Murim's great families, yet martial arts seemed more like their minor than their major.

That made sense. The Zhuge Clan's true strength came not from their bodies, but from their minds.

They were a family of wise men versed in a broad range of scholarship, strategy, and mechanisms and formations.

As a result, the world called them the Divine Mechanism Zhuge, and in Murim, they handled practically every role that required brains.

If the strategist of the Murim Alliance in a novel you were reading didn't have a name that began with Zhuge, it almost felt wrong.

Perhaps that image of the Zhuge Clan had been lodged so firmly in my mind that seeing these martial artists stride toward us without hesitation felt strangely unfamiliar.

But unfamiliarity wasn't the only emotion I felt.

Clack-clack-clack-clack!

The Zhuge Clan's martial artists lined up on either side of the road like iron towers. A lone figure slowly walked between them.

The slender young man wore robes so white they were almost blinding.

"The stars shone unusually bright last night. It seems they were heralding the arrival of honored guests. I am the Zhuge Clan's Lesser Family Head…"

Delighted, I thrust a hand into the air and shouted.

"Galgyun!"

"Not 'Galgyun'… My name is Zhuge Gyun."

A heavy silence fell.

The Zhuge Clan's martial artists, who still had no idea who I was, looked at me as if I were some kind of madman. Jeok Cheongang looked at me with a hint of confusion.

"You know this fellow?"

"Yes. I met him at the Star-Array Grand Banquet last time. But this is the first I've heard that he's the Zhuge Clan's Lesser Family Head."

[2107] Wuxia is a genre of Chinese fiction and film about martial artists and their adventures.

“Even someone like you has friends?”

“He’s not my friend. I just call them the Three Idiots…”

“Ahem! Ahem-ahem!”

One of the Three Idiots I had met at the Star-Array Grand Banquet—the Divine Marvel Dragon Zhuge Gyun—hurriedly cleared his throat and cut me off.

Before I could say anything, he turned toward Jeok Cheongang and offered his greetings.

“Zhuge Gyun, a newcomer to Murim, pays his respects to Senior.”

Jeok Cheongang looked Zhuge Gyun up and down, then tossed out a question.

“What relation are you to Gonghu?”

“Pardon?”

“I mean the Fan-Wisdom King, Zhuge Gonghu. The bastard who served as the Murim Alliance’s chief strategist during the Great Faction War.”

I had heard both the title and the name of the Fan-Wisdom King Zhuge Gonghu.

He had served as the mind of the Murim Alliance during the Great Faction War and had been the foremost contributor to turning around the grim course of the war.

That was one reason he had been hailed as one of the Ten Kings alongside the other Supreme Peak masters.

And he calls a man like that a bastard.

I had seen Jeok Cheongang act this way so many times that I was used to it, but to everyone else, it must have been a whole new world.

Jin Wikyung swallowed hard, while the Zhuge Clan’s martial artists stood with their mouths hanging open, doubting their own ears.

Of course, our Fire King Jeok Cheongang didn’t care about any of that. Ramming straight into things with blazing force was practically the Fire Gate Clan’s trademark.

“Well? Why aren’t you answering?”

His expression was unpleasant enough already, but when he actually frowned, he looked like a murderous demon.

Even Zhuge Gyun—a lunatic who was no slouch himself—was so flustered that he stammered.

“M-my great-grandfather.”

“Is that so? No wonder you look a little like him. You look like you’ve got a decent head on your shoulders. Like you’ve got no manners, either.”

“…!”

Now that was imposing.

Since Jeok Cheongang was a man from two generations ago who had lived well past a hundred, even the elders of most prestigious clans and sects couldn't dare object when he called them, "Hey," "you," or "bastard."

He chewed people up with martial arts and digested them with seniority. He was Murim's very own Bodhidharma skull water.[2108]

As the atmosphere grew increasingly awkward, I gave Jeok Cheongang a light poke in the side.

"Come on. That's enough."

"What? Can't this old man say even that much?"

"Even so, he passed away ten years ago…"

"What do these greenhorns know? If this old man had died, Zhuge Gonghu would have done the same. He and I have been calling each other bastard for years."

"…"

"…"

Not brotherly terms. Bastardly terms.

While everyone flinched once again at his innovative choice of words, Jin Wikyung was the first to recover and address Zhuge Gyun.

"Thank you for the Zhuge Clan's hospitality."

A true professional was a true professional. At the Star-Array Grand Banquet, Zhuge Gyun had seemed like a man with a screw loose, but as the Lesser Family Head of his clan, he responded appropriately.

"Think nothing of it. I hope your journey here was not too uncomfortable."

"If a person is comfortable in both body and mind, how can he call himself a martial artist—"

"It was damn uncomfortable. How dare you make this old man come all the way here? I'll hear the reason, and if it's nothing important, then a Flame Divine Palm will…"

"Oh, seriously! I said that's enough!"

"You dare grab this old man's sleeve! Let go, you all-brawn bastard!"

While I tried to restrain Jeok Cheongang, who had suddenly flown off the handle, Jin Wikyung hurriedly continued.

"I know this is rude, but let's put the pointless conversation aside and hurry. Please, let's hurry."

"A wise decision. Zhuge Wuhou,[2109] who laid the foundations of our family, would have slapped his feather fan down and agreed."

[2108] Taekyung mixes up two Buddhist figures: the Korean monk Wonhyo is associated with an anecdote about drinking water from a skull in the dark, not Bodhidharma.

[2109] Zhuge Wuhou and Zhuge Kongming are names for Zhuge Liang, the historical Chinese strategist commonly depicted holding a feather fan.

The government troops and Zhuge Clan martial artists were the first to clear a path at the dramatic show of unity between the two Lesser Family Heads. The river bandits from the Water Dragon Stronghold who had joined our party followed behind them.

As we moved, I felt countless wary gazes following us and heard the whispers all around.

What the hell is going on?

Was this why Jin Wikyung had said we needed to pass through Hubei?

I didn't have long to wonder. The moment we climbed into the carriage, Mungyeong quietly spoke.

"It seems we're one person short."

"What?"

I looked around and only then noticed that someone was missing.

"Wait. Where did he go?"

"Over here, Benefactor!"

"…?"

When the hell had that bastard gotten over there?

Cheongpung was standing in front of a street stall that had not yet been folded, stuffing himself with freshly steamed fish. He raised one hand high and shouted.

"I'll finish eating and come!"

"Stop talking bullshit and get your ass over here!"

Please.

Just for one day, let's live like human beings. Like human beings.

With my heart in tatters, the carriage began to move.

Even as it raced down the well-kept road and disappeared into the distance, the people's gazes clung to us like shadows.

Unlike Emei, Qingcheng, and the Tang Clan—the prestigious powers of Sichuan Province—which had established their bases on mountains or in remote areas, the Zhuge Clan occupied the heart of a broad thoroughfare.

Just the people passing outside the carriage window numbered well over several hundred.

Their faces were deeply tanned, and whenever they spotted the carriage bearing the Zhuge Clan's emblem, they bowed their heads.

"Why are there so many people here?"

Zhuge Gyun, who sat across from me, answered my mutter.

"The Yangtze is Hubei's lifeline. It makes the vast surrounding lands fertile, so people naturally gather here. And since every year brings a plentiful harvest, smiles never leave their faces."

"Really? The people I saw at the ferry about one shichen[2110] ago looked like their smiles had left forever."

"That…"

Zhuge Gyun fell silent and looked away, wearing a grave expression that didn't suit him.

"I'll tell you after we reach the family compound."

Something must have happened. At the Star-Array Grand Banquet, he had been an endless fountain of nonsense, so it was telling that even he looked like this now.

Given the mood, I didn't press him and turned toward the window.

Something definitely feels wrong.

And the more time passed, the more that suspicion deepened.

The government troops, who were usually so lax, had their eyes wide open as they checked people's hopae[2111] at various points, while martial artists in ordinary clothes hid among the commoners.

The martial prowess I briefly sensed from them as we passed was far from low. Dark Heaven immediately came to mind, but Jeok Cheongang's Sound Transmission cleared up the matter a moment later.

—They're Zhuge Clan people. For some reason, they're hiding their identities and even moving covertly.

They're going this far in what's practically their own front yard?

I suddenly remembered what had happened a few days earlier and asked,

—Old Master, didn't you hear anything?

—About what?

—You know. You left with my eldest brother for a while last time.

—I did.

—Didn't you hear why we had to come to Hubei then? Something about Wudang or the Zhuge Clan?

Jeok Cheongang's brow furrowed slightly as he looked at me.

—What good would it do this old man to hear any of that?

—Pardon?

—If we're going, we're going. Why bother prying into every last detail? I merely badgered him to get here as quickly as possible. I told him I'd sink every one of the swift ships if he didn't.

—…Ah. Right.

[2110] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours.

[2111] A hopae was a personal identification tablet carried in premodern Korea.

I wasn't sure whether to call that cool or hotheaded.

Shaking my head, I glanced at Mungyeong.

The boy had been chatting with Hyuk Mujin with a bright smile, showing no sign of irritation. But then one of his eyebrows lifted slightly.

A private Sound Transmission reached my ears.

—What.

—…I haven't even said anything yet.

—Don't stare at me for no reason. Not if you want to see the sun rise tomorrow.

How was I supposed to breathe with him scaring me like this?

I sighed inwardly and turned my gaze beyond the carriage's latticed window.

Mount Longzhong, also called Mount Fulong because the greatest strategist under heaven—a man who had shaped the history of an era—had once lived there in seclusion.

And spread across a vast stretch of land, the Zhuge Clan finally came into view.

They said this was the wealthiest family in Hubei Province.

Their ancestor, Zhuge Kongming,[2112] had been renowned for his frugality. But his descendants had not devoted their naturally sharp minds solely to scholarship, mechanisms, and formations.

They had taken full advantage of the fertile land that yielded plentiful harvests every year and the Yangtze's waterways, which crossed the entirety of Hubei Province, to amass enormous wealth.

I began to grasp the extent of that wealth before we even passed through the Zhuge Clan's main gate.

"Why aren't we getting out? Haven't we arrived?"

Zhuge Gyun answered with an expression that seemed to say he had no idea what I was talking about.

"Pardon? It would take quite a while to walk from here to the Inner Hall. We still have seven more gates to pass through, so just remain seated."

"…It's that big?"

"This is after we reduced it. Our family suffered considerable damage during the Great Faction War."

"That's insane. You're raking in gold and silver. Didn't your ancestor leave instructions telling you to live frugally or something? Wasn't he supposed to be an incorruptible scholar?"

Without the slightest change in expression, Zhuge Gyun answered in a solemn voice.

“Studying isn’t cheap. Do you know how expensive books are? Besides, our family also provides separate support to scholars.”

“…”

“You need a comfortable environment to pass the civil-service examinations and advance in martial arts. When you’re hungry, you can’t think about anything. You only become anxious.”

“Uh… right.”

It wasn’t what I had expected, but when I thought about it, every one of his points made sense.

After patiently explaining the importance of capital, Zhuge Gyun concluded his speech by saying that even his ancestor, Zhuge Kongming, had been born with a silver spoon in his mouth.

By then, the carriage had passed through all eight gates and was entering the Inner Hall.

“Now, please get down and follow me. The Family Head is waiting.”

“The Family Head would be…”

“My father.”

I had heard about him from Jeok Cheongang.

During the Great Faction War, Zhuge Gonghu had lost his only son. In accordance with the principle of eldest-son succession, he had bestowed the position of Lesser Family Head upon his young grandson.

That young grandson was Zhuge Feng, the Crouching Dragon Guest—the current Family Head of the Zhuge Clan and Zhuge Gyun’s father.

“Family Head, I’ve brought the honored guests.”

At Zhuge Gyun’s grave voice, now completely devoid of humor, the firmly closed doors slowly opened.

Chapter 445

Clack.

“Ah.”

Someone let out a small gasp.

The enormous library revealed when the doors opened was impressive enough, but so was the fact that they had opened without anyone touching them or using internal energy.

Even to someone who had spent his entire modern life passing through automatic doors tens of thousands of times, it was a remarkably novel experience.

Some kind of machine?

No, this was Murim. Should I call it a mechanism?

The doors contained an intricate arrangement of iron and wooden components, all precisely interlocked.

And that wasn’t all. As I slowly looked around the library, I saw unmistakable traces of similar mechanisms throughout the place.

Of course, they were crude compared to the cutting edge of modern civilization. But I had certainly never seen anything like them in any of the other prestigious great families or sects I’d visited.

That aside…

Why is nobody here?

There wasn’t even a servant or guard in sight, let alone the Family Head himself.

As everyone, myself included, stared around, Zhuge Gyun shouted.

“Family Head!”

His voice, infused with internal energy, echoed through the library.

The space wasn’t merely large. Vast was the only word for it. It was bigger than a modern soccer stadium.

Zhuge Gyun’s shout carried between the endless rows of bookshelves, but no answer came.

“What the hell? Is he not here?”

“He seems to be somewhere inside, but… Ah, this is driving me crazy.”

As if he had known this would happen, Zhuge Gyun let out a deep sigh and continued.

“He often gets like this when he becomes absorbed in something. I’m sorry, but if you could wait here for a moment, I’ll find the Family Head and—”

Jeok Cheongang, who had been looking around the library, cut him off.

“Enough. Is that really necessary?”

“Pardon? Even so, with Great Hero Jeok visiting…”

“He’ll come out when the time is right. He must have his reasons.”

For a moment, I wondered if I had heard him correctly. Of all people, I never expected those words to come from Jeok Cheongang.

Even Cheongpung dropped the candied fruit he had been bringing to his mouth.

Am I dreaming?

I was seriously considering the question when Jeok Cheongang continued with a warm smile.

“Come to think of it, this old man has never seen such a large and magnificent library in his life. Would it be all right if I looked around for a while?”

Zhuge Gyun answered with a dazed expression.

“Of course.”

“Even if I burn it down?”

“…Pardon?”

“It was a joke, you little punk. Ho-ho. How could I burn everything in sight when I’m here as a guest?”

Jeok Cheongang laughed heartily, then added,

“Knocking over a bookshelf by accident would be another matter.”

In the next instant, Jeok Cheongang shot upward like a streak of light.

At the same time, a palm strike carrying the tremendous force of ten thousand geun[2113] slammed into the nearest bookshelf.

Boom!

It happened before anyone could stop him. I stared at the scene unfolding before me, my mouth hanging open.

Oh, fuck.

Rumble…

The bookshelf, which looked to be at least three zhang[2114] tall, began to tilt.

And there were hundreds of them.

In the blink of an eye, the countless shelves packed together at regular intervals became one enormous row of dominoes.

“W-wait, wait, wait, wait!”

Crash! Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The deafening roar swallowed Zhuge Gyun’s scream.

As every bookshelf came crashing down, years of accumulated dust erupted into the air and filled the library in a dense cloud.

No, I wasn’t even sure it could still be called a library. A graveyard of books would have been more appropriate.

[2113] A geun is a traditional weight unit equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is 6,000 kg (about 13,200 lb).

[2114] A zhang is a traditional length unit equal to ten chi. Three zhang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

It might even have become one person’s grave.

“Fatherrrr!”

Jeok Cheongang patted the wailing Zhuge Gyun on the shoulder.

“You’re the new Family Head of the Zhuge Clan now.”

“Nooo!”

Whack!

Jeok Cheongang smacked him on the back of the head and gave him an incredulous look.

“You really can’t take a joke, can you? Can’t you see your father over there, alive and well?”

Jeok Cheongang was telling the truth.

A couple of coughs came from within the thick cloud of dust, and a slender figure emerged, waving one hand as he walked toward us.

“Well, now. Cough. I’m sorry I couldn’t come out to greet you sooner. There have been an unusual number of matters requiring my attention lately. Cough.”

“At least you know. What an ill-mannered brat.”

Jeok Cheongang answered curtly and flicked his sleeve.

Whoosh!

Compressed air burst outward, scattering the dust cloud. At last, the man came fully into view.

“Ha. Seeing you like this makes me realize how much time has passed. Do you remember this old man?”

A clear voice answered.

“Of course. It was the fifth Mid-Autumn Festival[2115] after my birth. Senior ate two plates of roast duck and drank five jars of Yeoahong,[2116] then fought a duel with Great Hero Peng as the gathering drew to a close and ended up with a bloody nose.”

“What? That Thunderbolt Saber King bastard was there too? We even fought?”

“Yes. Great Hero Peng laughed loudly and struck the table, spilling wine on Senior’s knee. It was a minor disagreement.”

“That sounds like a major incident where it wouldn’t have been strange for someone to die.”

Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh before continuing.

“Quite a few years have passed, but that incredible head of yours is still as sharp as ever. All right, enough nonsense. Come here. You have guests waiting for you.”

“I was planning to greet them regardless.”

[2116] Yeoahong is a traditional Chinese rice wine, also known as Daughter’s Red.

Though the middle-aged man was covered in dust, it couldn't conceal his refined appearance.

He was the youngest Sect Leader of any prestigious great family or sect I had met so far. His eyes, unusually clear and radiant, turned toward us.

"My apologies for keeping such honored guests waiting. I am Zhuge Feng."

It was a remarkably plain greeting for the Family Head of the Zhuge Clan, the foremost great family in Hubei Province and one of the central pillars of the orthodox faction.

Then, before anyone could respond, Zhuge Feng continued. The moment I heard his next words, I suddenly understood why his sobriquet was Crouching Dragon Guest.

"Time is as precious as gold, and I have no desire to take anyone else's gold. Only those who wish to remain need stay. Oh, and I've always believed people should make themselves comfortable when they talk, so please don't take this the wrong way."

I wondered what he meant until Zhuge Feng promptly flopped onto his side, paying no attention to the dust coating the floor. A laugh escaped me.

"Sure, why not? This is comfortable."

I lay down at an angle and propped my chin on one hand. The corners of his eyes curved like crescent moons.

Though everyone looked dumbfounded, they sat down one by one and listened to Zhuge Feng.

Mu Song tried to leave, saying he had to visit a Yangtze River Channel League stronghold in Hubei, but one remark from Zhuge Feng stopped him in his tracks.

"I won't stop you if you wish to leave, but what I am about to say concerns you deeply as well, Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song."

"…!"

Mu Song hesitated, then remained behind. Surprisingly, Mungyeong, who had seemed the most likely to leave first, stayed quietly where he was.

Then again, with everyone else remaining, leaving alone might have drawn even more attention.

The Zhuge Clan's intelligence network had already informed Zhuge Feng that this young medical apprentice was the Divine Physician's Disciple. He gave Mungyeong a curious look, but soon turned away and began to speak.

"It was exactly one month ago. I was in the library, reading the Records of the Grand Historian[2117] for the eighty-fifth time, when I heard the news."

[2117] The Records of the Grand Historian is a history of ancient China compiled by Sima Qian.

The Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families were the leading powers of their respective provinces.

With roots stretching back anywhere from a hundred years to several centuries, each possessed a dense intelligence network that allowed them to know their territory like the palm of their hand.

The Zhuge Clan was no exception.

“The Sea Serpent Society had disappeared.”

“The Sea Serpent Society? What’s that, Benefactor?”

“I don’t know either.”

Unlike the bewildered Cheongpung and me, everyone else’s eyes widened.

Mu Song’s reaction stood out more than anyone else’s.

“Th-the Sea Serpent Society?”

“Yes, the very one you know. The association formed by the countless fishermen and boatmen of Hubei Province.”

Ah. Now I understood.

I had never heard of the Sea Serpent Society, but I could guess what kind of organization it was.

To put it simply and dispense with all the old-fashioned explanations, it was a sort of professional association.

Just as each region had a Hunter Association, Hubei Province had—or rather, used to have—an association of fishermen called the Sea Serpent Society.

And this was unquestionably good news, at least for Mu Song. The faint smile tugging at the corners of his mouth was proof enough.

“I cannot say what the Zhuge Clan thinks of this, but as someone devoted to the League, I welcome the news. The Sea Serpent Society caused my Master no end of trouble.”

“I thought you would feel that way. At least within Hubei Province, it was the only organization capable of standing against the Yangtze River Channel League.”

Tributaries of the Yangtze ran throughout Hubei Province like a spiderweb.

No matter how powerful the Yangtze River Channel League was, it must have been vastly outnumbered by the people who made their living from fishing.

Though Hubei was outside the Sichuan territory under his responsibility, Mu Song laughed heartily at the news that one powerful rival had disappeared.

“But how did they end up disbanding? Did they happen to smuggle salt or something…?[2118]”

Zhuge Feng shook his head.

[2118] Salt was a state monopoly in imperial China, and smuggling it was a serious crime that could bring execution; powerful smuggling gangs were notorious.

“Of course not. Even if they had been smuggling salt, the Sea Serpent Society would never have handled it so carelessly. And if they had been caught, a fleet dispatched by order of the Son of Heaven would already be filling the Yangtze throughout Hubei.”

“Then was it an internal conflict?”

“I don’t think you properly understood what I said.”

His clear, transparent eyes fixed on Mu Song.

As he faced Mu Song’s confusion, Zhuge Feng continued slowly.

“The Sea Serpent Society disappeared. Someone crushed it utterly.”

“…!”

“The night before I received that report, a banquet was held to celebrate the Society Head’s eightieth birthday. Forty-five shipowners who had sworn loyalty to him and roughly a thousand members of the Sea Serpent Society attended. They drank until past midnight and launched dozens of pleasure boats onto the waters of Red Cliffs. And that was the last of it.”

The next morning, an old boatman who rose at dawn found the waters of Red Cliffs choked with corpses and the wreckage of brutally shattered boats.

The Society Head and the organization’s core members, including dozens of shipowners, had all met their deaths at Red Cliffs. The Sea Serpent Society had lost both its head and its body.

Nothing can move without either.

The Sea Serpent Society, which had stood shoulder to shoulder with the Yangtze River Channel League and wielded power throughout Hubei Province for decades, disappeared just like that.

“H-how could such a thing happen…?”

“It is strange that you, of all people, knew nothing about it.”

Zhuge Feng stared steadily at the speechless Mu Song.

“Do you know who moved first after the incident at Red Cliffs became known? The authorities? The Sea Serpent Society members who were lucky enough to survive? No. It was the Yangtze River Channel League. They invaded the Sea Serpent Society’s territory and took control of the Yangtze with astonishing speed.”

“…Great Hero Zhuge.”

Mu Song’s face hardened.

Like the rest of us, he seemed to have finally realized why he had needed to remain.

“Are you saying you suspect me? The League?”

“Of course I didn’t. The Great Hero Hwang of Donghu Stronghold whom I know is not such a foolish man. He is different from the other foolish, violent Stronghold Lords.”

Zhuge Feng brushed the dust from his shoulder and smiled faintly at Mu Song.

“That was certainly what I thought—until the Dongting Fisherman, who had publicly condemned the Yangtze River Channel League, disappeared three days ago.”

“…!”

At that moment, unrest spread through the group, and a familiar notification rang in my ears.

Quest
Another Chaos
An ominous air hangs over the once-peaceful Hubei Province. The clear waters of the Yangtze have been dyed red with blood, the once-mighty Sea Serpent Society has fallen amid countless deaths, and the Dongting Fisherman, who publicly condemned the Yangtze River Channel League, has disappeared.
If someone uncovers the truth behind these events and finds the culprit, the chaos will subside.
Grade: Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Uncover the truth behind the events (Incomplete)
Reward: ???
Failure: The chaos in Hubei Province will worsen, and further incidents will occur
Will you accept the Quest?

A Quest…

I slowly looked around.

Mu Song sat with his lips pressed tightly together, while Crouching Dragon Guest Zhuge Feng stared at him with a cold smile.

Jeok Cheongang frowned as he watched the two of them, and Mungyeong sat expressionlessly.

And finally… there was Jin Wikyung, calmly observing the entire situation.

So he did know.

According to Zhuge Feng, the Sea Serpent Society Head and a thousand of his men had been buried beneath the waters of Red Cliffs a fortnight ago. Jin Wikyung must have heard about it on his way to Sichuan.

And adding Hubei to our return route means the leadership in Henan approved it too.

Now that the bloody incidents in Shaolin and Sichuan had exposed Dark Heaven's existence to the entire world, the series of events unfolding in Hubei could not be taken lightly.

If this was Dark Heaven's scheme, we had to stop it.

And if the Yangtze River Channel League had taken advantage of the chaos caused by Dark Heaven to carry out some plot of its own, they had to be punished as an example to others.

Jin Wikyung had not come here as the Lesser Family Head or acting Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

He had come as an inspector for the new Murim Alliance that would soon be formed.

What that meant was simple.

I have to stand with Jin Wikyung too.

Besides, the Quest carried no penalty. There was little point in asking whether I would accept when I was already in the same boat as him.

I muttered inwardly.

Yes.

Quest Another Chaos has been registered in the Quest Window! Quest information may be updated depending on the situation.

I wasn't sure what else there was to update.

Judging by Zhuge Feng's words and the atmosphere I had sensed on the way to the Zhuge Clan, all of Hubei Province had already branded the Yangtze River Channel League as the culprit and was pointing fingers at them.

But…

"Are you certain the Yangtze River Channel League is responsible?"

Personally, I didn't think we could jump to conclusions just yet.

My question broke the heavy silence. Crouching Dragon Guest Zhuge Feng smiled faintly.

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. You seem to have many questions about this matter.”

“I can’t say I don’t.”

“Go ahead, provided we do not waste each other’s valuable time.”

“First, I would like to ask whether there is any evidence.”

“Evidence?”

“Yes. All you have is circumstantial evidence, don’t you? At the very least, shouldn’t there be a witness who saw the Yangtze River Channel League attack the Sea Serpent Society on the night of the incident at Red Cliffs?”

“A witness. What else?”

“You still haven’t determined what happened to the Dongting Fisherman, who publicly condemned the Yangtze River Channel League.”

“Continue.”

I glanced at Jeok Cheongang before going on.

“According to what I once heard from the old—no, from my Master, the Dongting Fisherman was a Supreme Peak master who belonged to neither the orthodox nor the unorthodox faction.”

“Correct. The Dongting Fisherman spent his entire life near Dongting Lake and built friendships with renowned figures from all walks of life.”

The Dongting Fisherman was well known even in Murim, where strange and extraordinary figures were hardly rare.

It was unusual enough that he had never joined either the orthodox or unorthodox faction and had spent his entire life near Dongting Lake. But the formidable martial arts he performed with the single fishing rod he always carried were also famous throughout Murim.

“I couldn’t understand how a Supreme Peak master like the Dongting Fisherman could disappear without anyone noticing.”

“What about it do you find difficult to understand?”

“If someone killed the Dongting Fisherman, his opponent must have been a master of equal or greater skill. When two Supreme Peak masters really go at it, all hell breaks loose. There’s no way no one would notice.”

“You certainly speak plainly. Continue.”

“And this might be disrespectful to Senior Mu Song.”

Mu Song, who had regained some of his composure after I stepped in, nodded.

“Speak. I don’t mind.”

“Really?”

“Of course.”

“Well, if you say so.”

I spoke cautiously.

“Honestly, does the Yangtze River Channel League have a master of that caliber? From what I’ve seen, it sure didn’t seem like it.”

“…!”

“…!”

What? You said you didn’t mind. You told me to speak.

Mu Song looked considerably less fine than before, so I quietly amended my statement.

“Ah, of course, I’m only talking about Hubei. I respect the Seafaring King. I even enjoyed the drama—no, anyway, I’m a huge fan.”

“…”

“Actually, when I was little, I dreamed of becoming a river bandit. The Grand Line![2119] The great Yangtze!”

“…”

All right. My fault.

Why did I feel guilty when I was technically trying to help him?

Zhuge Feng rescued me from the crisis with a single sentence.

“There is a master of that caliber.”

“What? There is? You’re not lying? Seriously?”

“…”

Leaving Mu Song looking dejected once again, Zhuge Feng continued slowly.

“Yangtze One Saber Hwang Chung.”

“Yangtze One Saber. Yangtze One Saber…”

The sobriquet sounded vaguely familiar, but the name itself was new to me. Surely he wasn’t the Hwang Chung from Romance of the Three Kingdoms.[2120]

He does seem to be the Uncle Hwang Mu Song mentioned when we first arrived in Hubei.

As I tilted my head at the unfamiliar name, Jeok Cheongang cut in sharply.

“Yangtze One Saber? That bastard who’s the Seafaring King’s sworn brother?”

“Yes. I imagine you know him as well, Senior.”

“I crossed paths with him once during the Great Faction War. He was calm and clever for a river bandit. I remember thinking the young fellow had a decent personality and considerable martial talent… It seems he finally crossed the wall.”

“If he had not helped the Seafaring King, the Yangtze River Channel League as it exists today would not be here.”

[2119] The Grand Line is an ocean route in One Piece, a Japanese pirate story also adapted for television.

[2120] Hwang Chung is the Korean reading of Huang Zhong, a general from Romance of the Three Kingdoms.

“You call that something worth saying? Without someone to keep him in check, how could the Seafaring King, that foul-tempered bastard, have ruled the Yangtze?”

Wow. That was practically spitting in his face.

Mu Song’s lips twitched as though he had something to say after hearing his Master insulted right in front of him, but Jeok Cheongang silenced him with a single fierce glare.

I seized the opening and quickly spoke up.

“Then are you saying Yangtze One Saber killed the Dongting Fisherman?”

Zhuge Feng considered the question for a moment, then nodded.

“Most likely.”

“Most likely?”

“Nothing has been proven. We have no certainty, only suspicions and circumstantial evidence. But many witnesses can testify to where the Dongting Fisherman went before he disappeared.”

“And where was that?”

Zhuge Feng looked at Mu Song and continued slowly.

“Donghu Stronghold. He headed for the headquarters of Donghu Stronghold, where Yangtze One Saber, Great Hero Hwang Chung, serves as Stronghold Lord. And he was never seen again.”

“That’s impossible!”

Those words had not come from me.

Mu Song shot to his feet, the veins standing out on his neck as he shouted.

“Uncle Hwang would never do such a thing!”

He, too, was one of the disciples who had inherited the Seafaring King’s ultimate technique.

The qi pressure radiating from Mu Song, who had reached the upper limits of the Peak realm, stirred the dust settled around us.

Zhuge Feng covered his mouth with his sleeve, gave a small cough, and answered calmly.

“Why do you say that?”

“You know as well as I do, Family Head! During the Great Faction War, Uncle Hwang persuaded my Master to side with the orthodox faction. He is also one of the moderates within our League! There is no possibility that a man like him would destroy the Sea Serpent Society in this manner and kill the Dongting Fisherman!”

“‘No possibility’? What an empty and meaningless thing to say. Circumstances change, and so do people. A wise man such as myself deduces the outcome from the circumstances.”

Zhuge Feng remained so composed that Mu Song's anger seemed almost pointless.

"I will say this plainly: I am not convinced that the Yangtze River Channel League is behind this. But every circumstance points to your League."

"Why? Because once the Sea Serpent Society, which opposed our League for so many years, disappeared, our brothers moved in to fill the void? Or because the Dongting Fisherman happened to disappear on his way to visit Uncle Hwang?"

"Both."

"Did you even ask our brothers what happened?"

"Not yet."

"Then why—!"

Just as Mu Song was about to shout, Zhuge Feng's quiet voice pierced the ears of everyone in the room, including me.

"If no one from the Yangtze River Channel League has shown themselves, whom could I possibly ask?"

"…!"

"…!"

"A full month has passed. Did you think our family, Wudang, and the authorities had done nothing all this time and were simply casting baseless suspicion upon the Yangtze River Channel League?"

Silence settled over the room.

Everyone stared wordlessly at Zhuge Feng and Mu Song.

Unlike Mu Song, who had frozen like a statue, Zhuge Feng continued smoothly.

"Two days after the incident at Red Cliffs, Dangyang Stronghold and Honghu Stronghold—which had swiftly seized the Sea Serpent Society's territory—vanished without a trace. Every last person."

"…Then what about Donghu Stronghold?"

"Someone once told me that Donghu Stronghold was a natural fortress built on the water. I tried to see for myself, and they were right. Now that even the Sea Serpent Society's core boatmen have all been drowned, we could not enter Donghu Stronghold by crossing the waters of Tianling Falls."

The mysterious grandeur of nature sometimes refused all human intrusion.

The Tianling Falls Zhuge Feng mentioned were clearly the passage to Donghu Stronghold, one that only a tiny number of boatmen could navigate.

Someone counted among the finest boatmen in the Yangtze River Channel League or the Sea Serpent Society—or someone who had spent his entire life on the Yangtze in Hubei…

The Dongting Fisherman must have been one of them.

"The Dongting Fisherman and the late Sea Serpent Society Head were close friends. Enraged by his friend's death, he publicly condemned your League, launched a boat, and crossed Tianling Falls—the very same Tianling Falls where we have sunk dozens of ships over the past month.”

Zhuge Feng abruptly rose and began walking at a leisurely pace.

He clicked his tongue softly at the fallen bookshelf, then rummaged through the towering piles of books as he continued.

“But did you know this? Although we failed to cross Tianling Falls, the Yangtze, after accepting dozens of ships as tribute, tossed us a gift as if out of generosity.”

Scrape. Crash!

A precariously balanced stack of books came tumbling down, sending dust billowing into the air.

Covered in pale dust, Zhuge Feng adjusted his cap and straightened.

Something dark and battered lay in his hand.

“That’s…”

“Your guess is correct, Successor Beggar.”

Zhuge Feng nodded at Gung Gibang’s murmur.

“The Black Bamboo Fishing Rod. The Dongting Fisherman’s signature weapon, the only one of its kind in all Murim.”

“…!”

“Well then, Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song.”

Zhuge Feng slowly raised the broken Black Bamboo Fishing Rod.

He pointed it at the wide-eyed Mu Song as though about to run him through.

“You will take the lead and guide us beyond Tianling Falls to Donghu Stronghold. I intend to see with my own two eyes exactly what happened there.”

Chapter 447

Whoosh.

Silence hung over the swift ship as it cut rapidly through the current.

The river pirates of Water Dragon Stronghold rowed like machines, their mouths clamped shut, while Mu Song stared straight ahead with a rigid expression.

What a fantastic atmosphere.

I clicked my tongue inwardly and looked around.

Four swift ships were currently bound for Donghu Stronghold.

But the mood aboard them was worlds apart from when we had been sailing toward Hubei.

The unfamiliar faces now filling the ships were the reason.

The Zhuge Clan. And Wudang.

Disciples of the two prestigious factions that divided Hubei Province between them filled all four vessels.

One glance was enough to tell that they were elites, handpicked in preparation for possible bloodshed. Every last one of them was an exceptional martial artist.

And at their center stood two men.

“The wind seems unusually strong today, Family Head Zhuge.”

Zhuge Feng answered the old Daoist in an untroubled voice.

“You need not worry. If the wind is blowing like this, things will actually be easier for us.”

“Why is that? I understand dozens of ships have already sunk in winds weaker than this.”

“The boatmen’s skill is one factor, but the swift ships that symbolize the Yangtze River Channel League are in a class of their own. Rather than being swept away by strong winds, they can catch the wind and surge forward with even greater force.”

“I have heard some talk about swift ships as well… but I do not know the details, as my experience is limited. I have spent my entire life in Murim, yet it feels as though I have wasted it.”

“You have spent all that time at Wudang’s headquarters, so it is only natural that you would not know. But… may I ask what became of the matter you mentioned last time?”

“Our Sect Leader is personally working on it together with the disciples of our main sect. As for me, I was sent here instead, since all I was doing was sitting around and consuming the sect’s grain.”

“Doing nothing but consuming grain? With Perfected Being Hyeongong joining us, this junior feels as though he has gained an army of thousands.”

Zhuge Feng was not merely being polite. He meant every word.

Perfected Being Hyeongong.

That was the Daoist name of the old man in the heavily patched robe, with a single worn Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword hanging at his waist.

Neither his position within Wudang nor his generational seniority in Murim was inferior to Zhuge Feng's.

If anything, he stood equal to Zhuge Feng—or even above him.

Unlike Zhuge Feng, who had yet to turn sixty, Perfected Being Hyeongong was a master of the previous generation who had distinguished himself during the Great Faction War. He was also the current Wudang Sect Leader's Junior Brother.

And one of the Supreme Peak masters Wudang is so proud of.

Perfected Being Hyeongong was the swordsman said to have reached the ultimate stage of Wudang's greatest technique, the Taiji Wisdom Sword.

Even as Family Head of the Zhuge Clan, Zhuge Feng spoke to him with marked respect in front of everyone. That alone showed the regard he had for Hyeongong.

Of course, there was one exception to all this.

"That little punk has grown."

At the words of Jeok Cheongang—Murim's own Bodhidharma-tier[2121] old-timer—I muttered in disbelief.

"He sure has. He's grown so much his beard turned white."

"How old was he the last time I saw him? Thirty? Hah. Time certainly flies. Those soft-fuzzed little brats have all become Sect Leaders and Elders."

"Soft fuzz? At thirty, wouldn't he have had a full bush down there?"

Jeok Cheongang glared at me with fire in his eyes.

"Judging by the way you keep nitpicking my every word, you must want every hair below your waist plucked out."

"No, why would you say something like that?"

I had absolutely no desire to receive a Fire King Zilean[2122] waxing on the deck of a swift ship.

I waved my hands at the speed of light, then stole a sidelong glance at Jeok Cheongang.

"Since we're on the subject, may I ask your venerable age?"

"Venerable?"

Even under normal circumstances, Jeok Cheongang treated being called old as another way of asking him to kill you. I awkwardly tried again.

"…Then, your age?"

"My age?"

[2121] Bodhidharma is a legendary Buddhist monk associated with Shaolin in martial-arts tradition.

[2122] Zilean is an elderly, bearded character in the video game League of Legends. The name combines his with Jeok Cheongang's Fire King title.

Seriously, what more did he want? The man was over a hundred.

I asked with all the exasperation I could muster.

“Cheongang, how old are you?”

Whack!

Right. I knew that would happen.

Jeok Cheongang smacked the back of my head like a bolt of lightning, then answered in a bored voice.

“I stopped counting after I passed one hundred.”

“So how long ago was the last time you counted?”

“Five thousand years ago. Satisfied?”

Cheongpung, who had been dangling from the nearby bow, dropped his jaw.

“Wow! Five thousand years old!”

“…Does that little punk not know how to doubt anything?”

“…That’s just how he is. Anyway, you look unbelievably young for your age.”

Jeok Cheongang stared hard at me.

“Would you like to know more?”

“Of course not.”

Honestly, I did want to know, but judging by his expression, this was something I was better off not knowing.

He was sensitive about his age at the best of times. Worse, being aboard a swift ship racing over rougher currents and through stronger winds than ever seemed to be causing him tremendous stress.

“When the hell is this goddamned piece of wood going to stop?”

Right then, as though it had heard his complaint, the goddamned piece of wood sped up even more.

Whoooosh!

A column of water shot high into the air, and the once-steady hull began rocking from side to side.

Cheongpung cheered at the sudden violent motion like a child visiting an amusement park on Children’s Day.[2123]

Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang, who still had not recovered from their little dip in the Yangtze, let out ear-splitting screams. Mungyeong alone remained perfectly balanced, but when he noticed everyone looking at him, he tactfully grabbed the railing.

And Jeok Cheongang…

“Uhh! Uhhhhhhhh!”

[2123] Children’s Day is a South Korean holiday celebrating children, observed on May 5.

He was panicking so badly that no one would have guessed his title was the Fire King.

Good heavens, look at those bulging eyes. He could be used in a Gangnam plastic surgeon's subway advertisement as a successful double-eyelid surgery case.

Dodging the water splashing into my face, I shouted at Mu Song.

"Senior! Could you slow down a little—"

"That will be difficult."

Mu Song cut me off sharply.

Like a man born and raised on the Yangtze, he stood tall as though his feet were planted on level ground. He raised one hand and pointed ahead.

"Can you see it?"

See what?

I narrowed my eyes and stared where he was pointing.

I drew up my internal energy and focused it into my eyes. My dramatically enhanced vision pierced the dense fog blanketing the churning river.

That's…

I saw it.

A passage so narrow that even swift ships, among the sleekest of all vessels, could barely squeeze through two abreast.

And directly before it, a violent whirlpool twisting like a blade.

Whoooosh! Crack!

A massive log that had drifted in from parts unknown was caught in the whirlpool, which stretched more than a hundred zhang[2124] in radius. Unable to withstand the crushing water pressure, it snapped apart.

Some of the splintered pieces were flung away and smashed into a huge rock standing behind the whirlpool like a gatekeeper, shattering into fragments.

A whirlpool like that in a river? Not the sea, but a river?

The sight was as wondrous as it was chilling.

And everyone aboard the swift ships knew the identity of that monstrous whirlpool.

"Tianling Falls!"

Someone shouted the words like a scream.

That was right. This was Tianling Falls.

A work of nature that had transformed Donghu Stronghold of the Yangtze River Channel League into a natural fortress—and a monster that had swallowed countless lives and ships over the centuries.

[2124] A zhang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred zhang is about 303 m (994 ft).

Looking as though he might suffocate at any moment, Jeok Cheongang declared, “Turn the ship around. I would rather fight the Great Faction War all over again than cross that.”

Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin spoke next, their faces suggesting they had already suffocated.

“Senior Mu Song. Please save us. I would rather beg in a beggars’ den.”

“Captain, thank you for everything. I’m done with Murim. I want to go home and sell silk.”

“…It looks like your soul will be sold before the silk.”

Not that I wasn’t scared myself.

Watching that enormous whirlpool rush toward us made me feel like an ant tumbling into an antlion’s pit.

Fuck. We’re going to smash against that rock and get blown to pieces, then get sucked straight down like someone flushed a toilet.

Before the terror of nature itself, even the System and Supreme Peak martial arts seemed useless.

If someone dropped me into the middle of the Yangtze, I was confident I could somehow swim to shore. But if I got caught in a whirlpool like that…

Then I really was finished.

“Whew. Whew.”

As I took deep breaths, a thick hand settled on my shoulder.

“My youngest.”

Even as a fairly tall man myself, I had to tilt my head back to look up at the giant beside me. Jin Wikyung spoke with a calm expression.

“Do not worry about a thing.”

His composure alone made me want to call him Eldest Brother.

Putting aside Jeok Cheongang, who had a pathological hatred of water, even I had reached the Supreme Peak realm and was still feeling my blood run cold. Yet Jin Wikyung, whose martial arts were far below ours, did not waver in the slightest.

So this is why he’s my eldest brother. Why he’s the Lesser Family Head.

“Eldest Brother…”

“Yes.”

Jin Wikyung smiled faintly and nodded.

“Even in death, the bond between our brothers will last forever.”

“What?”

“I can see our deceased parents hovering before my eyes. It is as though they are beckoning to us from Tianling Falls.”

“…Isn’t Father still alive?”

“We lost contact with him again a long time ago. Let us simply consider him dead.”

Eldest brother, my ass. He's just a big bastard.

And while he was at it, he had declared our perfectly alive father dead just because the man had dumped the family responsibilities on him and run away.

Shit…

I looked around. Most of the people aboard were already half out of their minds, surrendering their bodies to the beat of Mother Nature.

With my last shred of hope, I looked at Mu Song.

"Senior Mu Song."

"I'm sorry, but it is too late to stop."

Whoooosh! Crack!

"Oh, fuck. He's right."

Mu Song nodded, his expression grim.

"Hold on tight. My men and I will do our best as well."

"What? What do you mean, do your best?"

"Do you think every province has its own Tianling Falls? I have only crossed it three or four times, when I came to Hubei to visit Uncle Hwang. We have no choice but to trust in the League's swift ships and the skills we have honed over the years."

"W-wait. So you're saying… you're a Tianling Falls newbie?"

"I do not know why you are suddenly bringing up Liu Bei,[2125] but of course I am unfamiliar with it. Ever since leaving headquarters and becoming a Stronghold Lord, I have spent all my time in Sichuan."

He had a point.

A fucking punchable point.

Half out of my mind, I barely squeezed out my voice.

"You've got to be kidding me. Why are you only telling us something this important now?"

"Great Hero Zhuge told me not to tell anyone else."

What?

My head snapped around at lightning speed. The disciples of both factions stood rigid with tension, and at their center was one man.

Zhuge Feng met my gaze and laughed heartily as the rising spray pelted his face.

"A wise man leads his allies, while a strategist deceives even his allies! Now that we have all climbed onto the tiger's back, let us ride it to the bitter end!"

"…!"

"…!"

Was this really happening?

[2125] Korean nyubi ("newbie") sounds like Yubi, the Korean name for Liu Bei.

Every last one of us was left speechless.

Jeok Cheongang, meanwhile, lost his mind.

“That fucking son of a bitch…!”

It was one of the greatest fits of rage I had ever witnessed.

But just as Jeok Cheongang rolled his eyes back until only the whites showed and prepared to charge—

“Everyone, hold on tight!”

At Mu Song’s urgent shout, the whirlpool of Tianling Falls opened its maw wide and slammed into the swift ship.

KRA-KOOOOM!

Chapter 448

A Supreme Peak master could perform feats straight out of an old folktale—erasing several zhang[2126] of distance in a single step, leaping upward by stepping on empty air, and bringing down a cliff with one punch.

But…

“Hold on ti—aaaaah!”

KRA-KOOOOM!

We were not on solid ground, but in the middle of the Yangtze, a river as vast as the open sea.

Before a massive whirlpool hundreds of zhang[2127] across, the swift ship carrying me was no more than a tiny leaf.

BOOM!

“Whoa, whoa, whoaaaa!”

“Aaaaargh!”

The tremendous pressure of the water slammed into the swift ship’s side. The racing vessel was hurled into the air and began to tilt.

As the world slowly turned upside down, Jin Wikyung clung to my torso as though I were a life jacket and screamed.

“Mother! I’m coming!”

“Where do you think you’re going? Let go!”

“Father! If you’re watching, tell me the answer!”

What fucking answer? There isn’t one.

But the bigger problem was that Jin Wikyung was not alone. Gung Gibang, Hyuk Mujin, and even the disciples of the Zhuge Clan and Wudang had all been driven half out of their minds.

The only ones who had managed to keep their composure were the Supreme Peak masters, myself included.

“Uhh! Uhhhhh! Water! Wateeer!”

“…”

Correction. There was one exception.

I grabbed Jeok Cheongang, who was screaming at the top of his lungs with his eyes squeezed shut, and thrust my free hand into the air with all my strength.

Flame Divine Palm!

BOOM!

Compressed air exploded outward on a wave of powerful internal energy.

[2126] A zhang is ten traditional length units of approximately 30.3 cm each, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[2127] A zhang is ten traditional length units of approximately 30.3 cm each, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Part of the blade-like whirlpool scattered, and the vessel, which had been plunging upside down toward the river, barely managed to right itself.

But it was far too soon to feel relieved.

A second and then a third whirlpool were bearing down on the falling swift ship.

I can't do this alone. At a time like this…

A thought flashed through my mind like lightning, and I shouted a single name.

"Cheongpung!"

"Yes!"

Cheongpung nodded as though he understood perfectly and flung both arms into the air.

"Kiya-hoo!"

"Not 'kiya-hoo,' you lunatic! Do what I did!"

"Ah. Yes, Benefactor!"

Cheongpung had been enjoying the Wolmido Disco Pang Pang[2128] all by himself, but now he snapped both sleeves.

The Taeeul Miri Palm, one of Huashan's proudest techniques, transformed into dozens of flower petals that lashed through the air.

BOOM-BOOM-BOOM!

It could not match the destructive power of the Flame Divine Palm, but in a situation like this, the Taeeul Miri Palm's far wider range made it ideal.

When the blade-like currents of Tianling Falls faltered, the disciples of the Zhuge Clan and Wudang seemed to recover the senses that had briefly abandoned them.

"Ha-ha-ha! The tiger is running wild! Disciples of our family, unleash the Great Heavenly Star Divine Palm!"

Crouching Dragon Guest Zhuge Feng issued the order as he swept the feather fan in his hand.

Though he had yet to cross the wall into the Supreme Peak realm, his mastery of fan techniques alone was said to rival that of a Supreme Peak master.

WHOOOOSH!

A breeze stirred along the fan's ribs, then swelled into a mighty wind that held back the whirlpool.

A towering surge rose like a triangular wave, threatening to swallow the swift ship, only to be stopped by the wind.

At that moment—

SWISH!

A streak of light shot from Perfected Being Hyeongong's waist and swept through the air.

[2128] Wolmido Disco Pang Pang is a Korean amusement-park ride in which riders sit on a rotating platform while the operator jolts and spins it.

Taiji Wisdom Sword.

The streak of light flashed through everything in its path, cleaving space and slicing through the wind. The wall of water raised by Tianling Falls seemed to split apart for an instant, then shattered completely.

SPLAAASH!

Spray burst in every direction.

Drenched in an enormous volume of cold water, Jeok Cheongang's eyes flew open like a man waking from sleep.

Then he glared at the whirlpool, flames streaming from his eyes, and roared.

"You wet, smelly, filthy things!"

"…"

He wasn't exactly wrong, but why did he sound so pathetic?

Contrary to what I thought, however, the internal energy erupting from Jeok Cheongang's sleeves was overwhelmingly powerful.

"Get the hell out of here!"

FWOOOSH—KRA-KOOOOM!

Several jiazi[2129] of Scorching Yang Qi burst forth at once.

The moisture filling the air evaporated, and the tremendous recoil sent the swift ship shooting forward like an arrow.

"Kiya-hoo!"

"Cheongpung, you lunatic!"

"Oh. Sorry, Benefactor!"

BOOM-BOOM-BOOM!

Palm forces erupted without pause as we fought to protect the vessel, while Tianling Falls sought to sink the uninvited guests who had trespassed upon its domain.

Mu Song gritted his teeth hard enough to draw blood, the veins bulging in his neck.

"Hard to port! Turn together!"

"Aaaaargh!"

BANG!

Amid the chaos, the young medical apprentice blended in by screaming with everyone else while secretly firing off a palm force. Only Jeok Cheongang, Cheongpung, and I knew what he had done.

"One, two!"

"Now! Row with every last bit of strength you have!"

SPLAAASH!

[2129] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; here it measures accumulated internal energy.

Their efforts paid off.

The four swift ships carrying hundreds of passengers drove onward through the whirlpools, farther and farther ahead.

The moment we cleared Tianling Falls, the exhausted passengers sprawled across the decks without the slightest concern for appearances.

But there was an exception to everything.

His eyes red around the edges, Jeok Cheongang stared at the waters of the Yangtze, now calm as though nothing had happened. Then he abruptly spoke.

“As the current Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan, I hereby declare that, as of this time tomorrow, the Zhuge Clan shall be our sect’s public enemy.”

“…”

“Every bastard bearing the Zhuge name should be seized and thrown into that godforsaken Tianling Falls. Any objections?”

“What if I have one?”

“I’ll throw you in with them.”

“Then I have no objections.”

“Good. Seize that goddamn bastard at once and bring him before me.”

At the end of Jeok Cheongang’s blazing gaze was a swift ship following several dozen zhang[2130] behind us. Zhuge Feng sat at its bow, waving his feather fan.

“Ha-ha, Senior! Please set aside your anger!”

“…Are you laughing?”

Even I wanted to kill him.

Bringing down a cliff would have been easier. Just imagine being sucked into a whirlpool in the middle of the vast Yangtze, with nowhere to flee.

People tossed around names like Stepping on Empty Air and Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water as though they were simple tricks, but both techniques consumed tremendous amounts of internal energy. Rescuing several hundred people would have been unthinkable.

What the hell is something like that doing in a river? It isn’t even the sea.

There was a reason it was called Tianling Falls.

Then again, if it had merely been a rough stretch of water, the Zhuge Clan and Wudang would have stormed Donghu Stronghold long ago.

Even as I thought this, Jeok Cheongang’s fury continued racing toward its peak.

[2130] A zhang is ten traditional length units of approximately 30.3 cm each, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“Turn the ship around at once! Zhuge Feng, Crouching Dragon Guest—whatever that bastard calls himself, this old man will break both his legs today and leave him bedridden for the rest of his life!”

“Calm down. Please calm down.”

“Do I look like I can calm down right now? I already hate water, and now I’ve suffered through this because we came to some godforsaken place! The man who claims to have crossed it several times can’t even find the right channel and just stands there groaning! At this point, are you a river bandit or a ferryman to the afterlife?”

At the sight of Jeok Cheongang raging like a madman, Mu Song, who had been lying spread-eagled on the deck, flinched and pushed himself upright.

“P-please calm yourself, Great Hero. I never dreamed Tianling Falls would be this bad, either.”

“You’ve been here several times and didn’t know? If you don’t know, does your life as a river bandit end here? Should I end your life here, too?”

“T-that’s not it. The currents of Tianling Falls have grown abnormally strong compared to before…”

“Grown stronger? What kind of bullshit is that? It has barely rained this year, and you dare try to deceive this old man with sweet talk that will be exposed at once?”

“I-I’m telling the truth! How could I dare lie to the Fire King?”

Hmm.

Mu Song had a point. Who would dare lie to Fire King Jeok Cheongang?

If he caught you lying, losing a hand would be the least of your worries. Your whole body would end up roasted medium-rare.

Still, can the current really get that much stronger when there hasn’t been much rain?

Forget it. I wasn’t a meteorologist or an ecosystem researcher. Thinking about it would get me nowhere.

I clicked my tongue softly and addressed Jeok Cheongang, who had not stopped berating Mu Song.

“Old Master.”

“When we return, do your job properly. If you make this old man suffer through something like that again, I’ll storm the headquarters of the Yangtze River Channel League, burn every ship to ashes, and throw that Seafaring King bastard into Tianling Falls along with the Zhuge Clan bastards… What is it? Tell me later.”

“That’s not it. I think we’ve arrived.”

“What!”

Tap-tap-tap-tap!

He moved at Quick Attack speed.

Jeok Cheongang flung Mu Song aside, crossed the swift ship in a single step, and stared straight ahead with his eyes wide open.

Soon, an emotional exclamation spilled from his lips.

“Oh. Ohhh!”

Anyone watching him might have thought he had discovered a treasure island, but what appeared beyond the thick fog was simply an island.

It was neither small like the islands scattered along Korea’s Han River nor deserted, without any sign of human habitation.

“That over there… Could it be…?”

At Hyuk Mujin’s murmur, Gung Gibang nodded beside him.

The existence of a ferry landing where ships could dock meant, in other words, that people lived there—or that the island was frequently used as a stopover.

And everyone present already knew who had established their home in a place that could only be reached by crossing that insane Tianling Falls.

“Wow, Donghu Stronghold!”

Cheongpung’s shout broke the silence of the Yangtze and rang out across the water.

Jin Wikyung spoke, his expression stiff.

“By now, Donghu Stronghold must know we have arrived. It would be wise to prepare for any unforeseen developments.”

“…”

No one needed to ask what he meant.

If Donghu Stronghold really was responsible for the two incidents that had occurred over the past fifteen days, just as the circumstances revealed so far suggested… then a clash of martial force might take place, in accordance with the laws of Murim.

“Stronghold Lord. We did not come here to spill blood. I trust you understand what I mean.”

Mu Song had remained silent until now. He met Jin Wikyung’s gaze and answered.

“My subordinates and I took the lead in coming here to prove our League brothers’ innocence. If you persecute us without even hearing the full circumstances…”

“I can promise you that will not happen. Wudang and the Zhuge Clan have already guaranteed as much, and everyone present, myself included, will serve as a witness.”

After a brief hesitation, Mu Song gave a small nod.

“…I will trust you.”

Perhaps Mu Song was the person here most desperate to prevent bloodshed.

No matter how skilled the river bandits of Donghu Stronghold might be, and no matter how powerful their leader, Yangtze One Saber Hwang Chung, was as a Supreme Peak master, they could not withstand our current force.

Even if some utterly incomprehensible disaster—a genuine one-in-ten-thousand chance—sent everyone here to the bottom of the Yangtze, the Yangtze River Channel League would then have to face the whole of Murim. If the Nine Sects and One Gang joined forces with the Five Great Families, the League would vanish without a trace.

“Raise the flag high and let them know we are here.”

The river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold immediately carried out their lord’s order.

Soon, the flag of the Yangtze River Channel League fluttered above the four swift ships, and seven low drumbeats echoed beyond the fog.

And then…

Nothing happened.

The Yangtze, the fog, and the quietly flowing water remained unchanged.

The only things that changed were the question on Jin Wikyung’s face and the wavering in Mu Song’s eyes.

“Stronghold Lord. What is happening?”

“I’m not sure, either. We definitely sent the signal, so a reply should have come…”

At that very moment—

“I’m afraid that will be difficult.”

Everyone turned toward the sudden voice.

Countless gazes fell upon the young medical apprentice whom no one had paid any attention to until now.

He continued in a clear, composed voice.

“It seems something has happened.”

“What do you mean…!”

Mu Song’s shout died unfinished.

The young medical apprentice, Mungyeong, raised a finger and pointed.

Something previously concealed by the fog and aquatic plants had floated into view.

It was someone’s corpse.

Chapter 449

From the moment they crossed the unnaturally powerful current of Tianling Falls and entered the territory of Donghu Stronghold, Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song's heart had been beating faster and faster.

Uncle Hwang. I've come.

Hwang Chung, the Yangtze One Saber and Lord of Donghu Stronghold, was like a master to Mu Song. No—perhaps he was even more than that.

Mu Song's true master, the Seafaring King, was not an affectionate man, and their relationship was as dry and barren as sand.

When Mu Song was young, it had been Hwang Chung's warm advice and consideration that allowed him to endure his master's harsh scolding and grueling training.

I believe in you, Uncle. You're not the kind of man who would do such a thing.

Hwang Chung was more serious and thoughtful than anyone else in the Yangtze River Channel League.

There was no way a man like him would make the worst possible move by eliminating the Sea Serpent Society and the Dongting Fisherman in such a manner.

It was because of his unshakable faith in Hwang Chung that Mu Song had chosen to come here in person.

But despite that faith, his unease continued to swell with every passing moment.

Why is it so quiet?

The Hwang Chung he knew, the Yangtze One Saber, was thorough and cautious in everything he did. He would never neglect the stronghold's defenses simply because Tianling Falls protected it.

Donghu Stronghold was a natural fortress built on the Yangtze.

If unauthorized intruders crossed Tianling Falls, they would soon see a gorge several hundred zhang[2131] long, along with countless arrowheads waiting to greet them from above.

But…

We're already right in front of it. Why hasn't there been any reply?

Even after they raised the Yangtze River Channel League's flag and beat the drums to signal their arrival, the surroundings remained as quiet as before.

Mu Song's heart hammered against his ribs as he stared at the island shrouded in thick fog.

Something has gone wrong.

The thought flashed through his mind.

It was not long before his vague unease took shape.

[2131] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length equal to about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft).

“It seems something has happened.”

“What do you mean…!”

Mu Song turned toward the young medical apprentice Mungyeong, but the rest of his words died in his throat. He swallowed hard.

A moment later, alarm spread like wildfire among the people aboard the ships.

“Th-that’s…”

“A corpse! It’s a corpse!”

Everyone present was a martial artist accustomed to blood and death. They had seen enough corpses to be sick of them, but this time was different.

This was Donghu Stronghold. With the Sea Serpent Society’s key figures wiped out and the Dongting Fisherman all but confirmed dead, there should have been no one in Hubei Province capable of crossing the now even fiercer Tianling Falls to reach this place.

And yet a corpse had appeared out of nowhere.

Amid the commotion, Mu Song forced out a strained command.

“…Pull it aboard at once. We need to identify it.”

“Y-yes, sir!”

Before the river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold could move, someone strode forward.

“Stand back.”

Fire King Jeok Cheongang had been raging only moments ago. Now he spoke in a low, somber voice as he extended one hand.

Powerful internal energy shot across the distance and seized the corpse submerged in the water.

Whoosh—thud!

The body landed heavily on the deck of the swift ship.

Half of its upper body was gone, and its face was bloated. Mu Song’s eyes widened the moment he saw it.

“This man…”

“Do you know him?”

Jin Taekyung strode over, and Mu Song nodded dazedly.

“Little Tide Demon Wang Pil. Uncle Hwang’s right-hand man and the Deputy Stronghold Lord of Donghu Stronghold.”

Donghu Stronghold ruled the Yangtze in Hubei Province. Naturally, the name and sobriquet of its Deputy Stronghold Lord—and the right-hand man of Yangtze One Saber Hwang Chung—were widely known.

Ignoring the sighs that escaped at the name Little Tide Demon, Jin Taekyung stared at Mu Song with a stiff expression.

“The Deputy Stronghold Lord? Are you certain?”

“Without a doubt. The body is badly damaged, but not enough to keep me from recognizing his face.”

“…Damn it.”

Jin Taekyung’s expression hardened. So did the faces of everyone who understood what this meant.

The death of even an ordinary river bandit would have been ominous enough. But this was the Deputy Stronghold Lord of Donghu Stronghold, a Supreme Peak master of the Yangtze River Channel League whose name was renowned throughout Hubei Murim.

What this sequence of events meant was obvious.

Something has happened at Donghu Stronghold.

Jin Taekyung was the first to act on the thought that had flashed through all their minds.

Whoosh!

He crossed the deck at blinding speed, reached the stern of the swift ship, and thrust both arms out with all his strength.

Boom! Booooom!

The Scorching Yang Qi carried by the Flame Divine Palm evaporated the river water and propelled the swift ship forward.

Only then did the others recover from their shock and begin moving after him.

“Boatmen, return to your positions and take up the oars! Every second counts!”

“Tell the other ships! Send the signal at once!”

Boom, boom, boooom!

Urgent shouts and drumbeats shattered the silence.

Amid the chaos, Mu Song raised his head, his heart pounding harder and louder than the drums echoing around him.

And then—

“…!”

He saw it.

No—all of them saw it.

Beyond the fog parting before the bow of the swift ship lay a shattered ferry landing and countless corpses filling the river.

“What the fuck…!”

The curse burst from my mouth at full volume before I could stop it. But no one gave me a disapproving look or blamed me.

Maybe they were too overwhelmed to care. Or maybe I had simply said what they all wanted to say.

That was how horrific the scene before us was.

“This is a hellscape.”

“…How could this happen?”

Jeok Cheongang muttered in a grim, subdued voice, while the usually cheerful Cheongpung looked around with trembling eyes.

Everywhere he looked, there were collapsed houses and corpses.

The bodies we had seen around the ferry landing were only a fraction of the dead scattered across the island.

“C-Captain. Over there…”

“I know.”

I forced myself to ignore Hyuk Mujin, who was calling to me in a trembling voice.

I had already seen what he was pointing at. My teeth clenched before I even realized it.

Children and commoners who never learned martial arts.

Donghu Stronghold was not inhabited solely by river bandits.

They had brought their families and relatives to this safe, natural fortress, and the people who gathered here had formed a village of their own.

And…

They’re all dead.

Children who looked as though they had only just been weaned. Frail old people and women. Even the hundreds of river bandits who should have risked their lives to protect them.

Every single one of them was dead.

That was the conclusion my companions and I had reached after searching every corner of the island for more than half a day, along with the martial artists of Wudang and the Zhuge Clan and the river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold under Mu Song.

And among those countless dead was one particular person.

“Uncle Hwang!”

Mu Song’s beastlike roar echoed from far away. Gung Gibang muttered in a heavy voice.

“Looks like he finally found him.”

Some people said that no human life was more valuable than another.

But that was not true. There was a difference in weight. A person’s death weighed differently depending on who they had been in life and what relationship they had shared with you.

For Mu Song, at least, Yangtze One Saber Hwang Chung must have been such a person.

"The Family Head has ordered me to bring you to him at once."

At the words of the Zhuge Clan martial artist who came hurrying toward us, Jin Wikyung nodded.

"This concerns Great Hero Hwang, I presume."

"Yes. Great Hero Hwang's body was just found. However…"

"Let's go. We'll hear the rest directly from the Family Head."

We set off without another word.

Not to mourn Hwang Chung's death, but because even in death, the Yangtze One Saber was important enough to demand our immediate attention.

Jeok Cheongang was the only one among us who had known him, but grief was not the reason his expression had hardened, either.

"What do you think?"

The sudden Sound Transmission slipped into my ear. I slowed my steps and answered.

"The same as you, Old Master."

"You know what this old man is thinking?"

"You're thinking the same thing I am."

"I feel an urge to use the Flame Divine Palm."

"I've needed to piss for a while, too, but I've been holding it in. You should hold it in as well, Old Master. I'm still organizing my thoughts."

I calmly laid out what I had been considering over the past half a day.

"Donghu Stronghold is a natural fortress that can only be reached by crossing Tianling Falls. I don't know every detail of the situation here, but no ordinary force could dream of defeating the Supreme Peak master Hwang Chung and the river bandits under his command."

"Even a mongrel has the advantage in its own yard. To face men who have spent their entire lives on the Yangtze, you would need overwhelming strength."

"The Yangtze One Saber in particular is a veritable water ghost. During the Great Faction War, he won overwhelming victories against the Demonic Cult in every battle fought on water. To wipe out Donghu Stronghold, the attackers would have needed at least twice its strength."

Twice the strength of Donghu Stronghold…

I had only realized it after coming here, but Donghu Stronghold was on a scale utterly incomparable to the other water strongholds.

The number of bodies discovered so far had already surpassed a thousand. In terms of size alone, it would not have been an exaggeration to call it a faction in its own right.

Mu Song said something like that before, too. Donghu Stronghold is the strongest water stronghold in the Yangtze River Channel League after its headquarters.

One look around was enough to understand why.

Everything had been shattered and destroyed, but this one water stronghold had once maintained a fleet of some fifty ships and built a settlement filled with houses that would not have looked out of place in a bustling city.

It might not have compared to prestigious great factions such as the Nine Sects and One Gang[2132] or the Five Great Families,[2133] but the river bandits under the Yangtze One Saber must have been formidable elites in their own right.

And very few groups could deploy twice that much force against Donghu Stronghold.

No—only a handful.

“If we’re talking about places capable of mobilizing that many men and ships…”

“As far as this old man knows, there are only four in Hubei Province. One of them is already as good as gone.”

“Wudang, the Zhuge Clan, the government, and the Sea Serpent Society. Correct?”

“Correct. But most of the Sea Serpent Society are fishermen and boatmen who banded together for their livelihoods, so they have far too few masters. Wudang and the Zhuge Clan have the strength, but neither has any reason or justification to attack Donghu Stronghold.”

“The government is the same.”

“Of course. Even a child knows that Murim and the authorities maintain a relationship of mutual noninterference. Even if the Son of Heaven[2134] had issued an imperial edict to subjugate the stronghold, it could never have been carried out this secretly, hidden from the eyes of the entire realm.”

Murim was a tree rooted deep within the forest of the world.

It had grown too tall to prune, and anyone who tried to chop it down carelessly risked damaging the blade of their own ax instead.

That was one of the reasons Murim had endured even though the owner of the forest had changed many times.

A towering tree that even the Son of Heaven,[2135] the woodcutter, could not easily raise his ax against.

[2132] The Nine Sects and One Gang is a grouping of major martial-arts organizations.
[2133] The Five Great Families is a grouping of prominent martial-arts clans.
[2134] Son of Heaven is a traditional title for the Emperor.
[2135] Son of Heaven is a traditional title for the Emperor.

That was Murim. The countless branches and leaves that had sprung from this great tree had grown by joining forces—and, at times, by breaking one another.

The Yangtze River Channel League was one of the thicker branches.

If all the water strongholds scattered across the realm were gathered in one place, they would be a major force in their own right, and the number of masters among them would not fall far behind the Nine Sects and One Gang[2136] or the Five Great Families.[2137]

And now that very branch of the Yangtze River Channel League had been broken.

By someone whose identity remained unknown.

“Do you think the culprit is one of those four? Wudang, the Zhuge Clan, the authorities, or the Sea Serpent Society?”

“This waterway sees hundreds of ships pass through every day. Mobilizing enough force to cross Tianling Falls while avoiding all those eyes would be… extremely difficult.”

“It might have been extremely easy.”

I finally let out the words that had been hovering on the tip of my tongue.

“If it was Dark Heaven.”

“…!”

“They had no need to load hundreds or thousands of men onto ships and cross Tianling Falls. If a warp—no, if the formation they call a Moving Formation is hidden somewhere around here, that would explain everything.”

Dark Heaven had already proved it could be done in Shaolin and Sichuan.

If my guess was correct, it would also fully explain how they had gone unnoticed by the countless eyes traveling along the Yangtze.

Jeok Cheongang remained silent for a while before letting out a low groan.

“So this old man isn’t the only one who thinks so.”

“In a situation like this, we can’t rule out Dark Heaven. It stinks too damn much.”

“But why the Yangtze River Channel League?”

“I don’t know.”

I continued as I watched the familiar faces slowly approaching from the distance.

“That’s what we need to find out now.”

Chapter 450

Several dozen people had gathered near the sandy shore at the far end of the island.

When the martial artists surrounding us opened a path, I finally spotted some familiar faces.

“Uncle Hwang! How could you leave your nephew behind? How could you!”

Mu Song wailed in a hoarse voice. Perfected Being Hyeongong of Wudang watched him with a sorrowful expression, while Crouching Dragon Guest Zhuge Feng watched with a profound, unreadable gaze.

And then…

Mungyeong.

Mungyeong usually faded into the background, barely making his presence felt among the others. But from the moment he realized something had happened at Donghu Stronghold, he had moved faster than anyone.

Not as the Slaughter Saint, but as a medical apprentice, he had rushed everywhere in an effort to save even a single life.

But as if to mock his efforts, there wasn’t a single survivor.

The corpse Mu Song clutched as he wept was merely one of the countless victims of the tragedy.

“You’ve arrived.”

Jeok Cheongang gave Zhuge Feng a displeased glance before speaking.

“Is that Yangtze One Saber Hwang Chung?”

“It may be difficult to recognize him, but from what we’ve determined, there can be no doubt.”

That.

It might have sounded inappropriate to use such a word for the dead.

But anyone who saw Yangtze One Saber Hwang Chung’s corpse in person would have found it hard to object. I was no different.

What kind of lunatic did this?

The corpse was so badly mutilated that it was difficult to believe it had once been a living person.

His face looked as if it had been pounded with a boulder, and there was simply nothing below his chest.

The stench of rotting flesh and entrails stabbed at my nose.

“Urgh—ugh!”

I couldn’t blame Hyuk Mujin for staggering backward with a retch.

Even my stomach churned, and I had seen more corpses and gruesome scenes than I could count.

The sworn brother of the Seafaring King. A Supreme Peak master who had ruled the vast Yangtze with his formidable martial arts.

Yangtze One Saber Hwang Chung now looked more like a lump of meat than a corpse.

“Benefactor, this is…”

“It’s horrifying. What kind of godforsaken bastard would do this?”

Cheongpung and Gung Gibang murmured, their faces pale.

I stared at the corpse with my face stiff as stone, then suddenly felt something strange and opened my mouth.

“What are those corpses?”

The island was littered with bodies, so a few more were hardly surprising.

But the two corpses I had noticed were laid side by side next to Yangtze One Saber Hwang Chung.

They must have been important, too.

Zhuge Feng followed my gaze and answered.

“Mad Water Saber Demon Hwang Cheol and Wave Fox Do Ripgun.”

“Mad Water Saber Demon… Wave Fox…”

I had heard those names a few times before, and fairly recently.

After a brief search of my memory, my head snapped up.

“Could they be…?”

“That’s right. They were the Stronghold Lords of Dangyang Stronghold and Honghu Stronghold, the two strongholds on Dongting Lake.”

“Weren’t they the ones who vanished without a trace after seizing the Sea Serpent Society’s territory?”

“Yes. They certainly were.”

Zhuge Feng continued, his deep gaze fixed on the bodies of the two Stronghold Lords.

“The Mad Water Saber Demon was hot-tempered, while the Wave Fox was cunning. That was why everyone had no choice but to suspect them when the Sea Serpent Society incident occurred a month ago.”

Gung Gibang suddenly spoke up.

“My Master once told me that only two people in the Yangtze River Channel League could keep the Mad Water Saber Demon and the Wave Fox under control.”

“That is correct. Whatever their personalities, both possessed formidable martial arts. Without a leash to restrain them, they would have run wild like vicious hounds.”

In that sense, Yangtze One Saber Hwang Chung would have made the perfect leash.

He was the second strongest master in the Yangtze River Channel League after the Seafaring King, and he must have been exceptionally skilled at handling people as well.

But the sturdy leash had snapped, and the two vicious hounds had also been found dead.

The Yangtze River Channel League's forces in Hubei Province, which had fought the Sea Serpent Society over local interests for years, had also been laid to waste.

And there was only one group that could commit such an act without reason or justification.

"Dark Heaven. Is it them again?"

Perfected Being Hyeongong's sigh carried unmistakable anger and sorrow.

After Henan and Sichuan, Dark Heaven's shadow had finally fallen over Hubei Province.

No—perhaps Dark Heaven had stood astride the world for a very long time.

Perhaps we simply had not felt its shadow because it had been night, with not a single ray of light.

Just as the Head Elder joined hands with Dark Heaven long ago.

This scheme hadn't begun yesterday or the day before. It had been taking shape since the time of the Great Faction War.

"An age of chaos. We have truly entered an age of chaos."

Crouching Dragon Guest Zhuge Feng muttered under his breath, then raised his head and looked around.

His eyes gleamed with an inscrutable light as he stared into the thick fog on every side.

It was as if he could see through it to something crouching beyond.

Everyone, including my companions and me, sprang into action.

But even after thoroughly searching the island and the surrounding cliffs for a single survivor or witness, we found nothing.

If anything, we were left with even more questions and frustration.

It's one thing for there to be no survivors, but how can there be no trace of a formation, either?

If Dark Heaven had reached this place through a Moving Formation instead of passing through Tianling Falls, traces like the ones we had found in Sichuan had to remain somewhere nearby.

Yet even after retainers of the Zhuge Clan, renowned for their knowledge of formations and mechanisms, joined the search, we had nothing to show for it.

Even Zhuge Feng eventually came to question me.

“Are you certain such a formation truly exists?”

“I told you, it does. We left Henan as soon as everything was over, so we couldn’t search for it there. But during the Sichuan Blood Tragedy, I saw it clearly with my own two eyes.”

“I knew of it from the letters I received, but no such bizarre formation exists in our family’s records.”

“Then this is your chance to add it.”

“…”

“I agree. But the people gathered here are not enough.”

The sheer size of the island Donghu Stronghold had made its headquarters was one problem, but the surrounding terrain was an even greater one.

Cliffs stretching hundreds of jang[2138] surrounded it on every side, making it impossible to approach by land, while an even greater expanse of river lay beyond them.

With only four swift ships and roughly three hundred people, there was a limit to how much we could search.

“It was a mistake to select people for their martial prowess. We should have brought retainers well versed in formations.”

Regretting it now wouldn’t change anything.

Zhuge Feng, myself, and everyone else here had been worried about a bloody clash with the Yangtze River Channel League. None of us had dreamed that this would be waiting for us.

“Then we’ll go to the Zhuge Clan and bring back the people we need.”

“It would be best if I went myself as Family Head, but under the circumstances, that appears to be our best option. I’ll assign several of our retainers to accompany you.”

Jeok Cheongang, who had been listening quietly, suddenly spoke to me.

“Does that ‘we’ of yours include this old man?”

“Of course. Don’t you know the saying? Wherever the needle goes, the thread follows.”

“I see. Then have you heard this saying?”

“…?”

“Talk bullshit and you die.”

“…!”

I flinched, and Jeok Cheongang clenched his fist menacingly.

“This old man isn’t going. If you want to go, go by yourself.”

[2138] A jang is ten traditional Korean ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“What, are you planning to live here for the rest of your life? Are you never leaving?”

“Who said this old man would stay forever? There’s no need for everyone to rush off together. If even one more person remains behind to help search for the formation, we can uncover the culprit and restore peace to Hubei, can’t we?”

Ever since his friend, the Dharma King Hong Dao, had been killed by Dark Heaven, Jeok Cheongang had ground his teeth at the mere mention of its name. Yet something about his reaction this time didn’t add up.

After thinking for a moment, I clapped my hands.

“Ah. Now I get it. It’s because of Tianling Falls.”

“…!”

“You should have just said so instead of beating around the bush. I forgot to take that into account, too.”

“W-who says I care about a little water? Have you forgotten who this old man is?”

“Hmm. A Coward?”

“You little—!”

Bam! Bam! Baaam!

After taking about seven blows to the back of the head, I fled and headed toward my next destination.

The familiar faces gathered nearby turned toward me.

“Captain. What do we do now?”

I gave Hyuk Mujin a light kick in the butt as I answered.

“I just talked it over with them. We have to leave immediately, so get ready.”

“Leave? Where are we going?”

“The Zhuge Clan. It seems we need to bring back people skilled in formations and mechanisms. If necessary, we’ll also bring in reinforcements from Wudang. I heard they have several Daoists who are well versed in formations.”

“Wudang might be difficult.”

I frowned at Gung Gibang’s sudden interruption.

“What kind of bullshit is that?”

“I’m not the one who said it. Perfected Being Hyeongong did.”

“Hmm. Now that I think about it, he must have had a good reason.”

“…”

“Whatever. Explain. What do you mean?”

“It seems Wudang has troubles of its own. Even before the Sea Serpent Society incident, some madman they’re calling the Killing Ghost had been murdering people throughout Hubei Province… Apparently, the situation has grown serious. More than thirty people have already died by his hand, so I suppose that’s no surprise.”

“The Killing Ghost? Is he a martial artist?”

“He certainly seems to be a martial artist of considerable skill. Most of his victims were commoners, but a fairly renowned First Rate wandering martial artist was reportedly found dead after accepting a government commission to hunt him down.”

A First Rate wandering martial artist would be considered a First Rate master wherever he went.

If the rumored Killing Ghost had truly disposed of one with ease and escaped, there was a good chance he was a Peak master.

Still, Wudang wouldn’t mobilize the entire sect just to catch one man.

The question vanished at Gung Gibang’s next words.

“Was it three days ago? Twenty pilgrims climbing Mount Wudang were massacred. Among them were children of high officials and nobles who intended to enter Wudang as lay disciples.”

“Ah.”

This hadn’t happened just anywhere. The massacre had taken place on Mount Wudang itself.

As if pilgrims being massacred right in Wudang’s own front yard weren’t enough, the victims included children of high officials and nobles. Wudang’s fury was only natural.

He’s completely insane. Bold, too.

For a moment, the words Dark Heaven crossed my mind, but I soon shook my head.

This was Murim. It was full of lunatics who made modern serial killers look like amateurs.

Even if someone were murdered in broad daylight on a main road, it would not be all that surprising.

If Dark Heaven had done this, an incident incomparably larger would have erupted.

In any case, that was Wudang’s situation. We could reconsider the matter after reaching the Zhuge Clan.

“Well, now that I know, everyone pack your things. They’re already preparing outside to take us back.”

Jin Wikyung had already decided to remain behind before I went to meet Zhuge Feng, so I only needed to bring the people gathered here.

But one bastard—or rather, one gentleman—seemed to have other ideas.

“I’ll stay.”

“Which bastard— Oh. It’s Mungyeong.”

“Is there any reason I need to accompany you?”

“Nope. Stay. Stay.”

Please stay.

Chapter 451

“Benefactor, where are you going?”

“Huh?”

I flinched as I quietly edged toward the door. Cheongpung, who had gathered up his belongings, tilted his head at me.

“What? Why?”

“Are you going somewhere?”

“I, uh… something urgent came up.”

“You said we had to leave right away.”

“Listen, Young Hero Cheong. I wasn’t going to go into this, but…”

I deliberately hardened my expression.

“I’m going to relieve myself. Happy?”

“But the privy isn’t in that direction.”

“…”

He was annoyingly sharp.

Martial arts were his minor, while eating and shitting were his major. He had to know the location of every privy on the island.

After a moment’s hesitation, I answered.

“…I’m going to piss outside.”

Even I had to admit it was a desperate excuse.

Only then did Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin realize something was off. They stopped packing their bags and turned toward me.

“Young Hero Gung, doesn’t the Captain seem unusually talkative today?”

“Yeah. Why does he look so restless?”

“That’s because I’m trying to decide which of you two to hit first.”

Normally, they would have backed down the moment I said something like that. But after being thoroughly conditioned by my violence, the two of them had grown considerably.

“Hmm. If this were our usual Captain, his hands would have moved before his words. But he’s trying to talk his way out of it? There’s definitely something going on.”

“Right?”

“Absolutely. Do you think I’ve only been beaten once or twice? There’s a logic and flow to these things.”

As Hyuk Mujin stared at me through narrowed eyes, Gung Gibang’s eyes suddenly widened, and he glanced around.

“Wait. Where did Mungyeong go?”

"Oh, you're right. He was here a moment ago. Where the hell did he go?"

Where else? He was already outside waiting for me.

Let's talk.

I sighed as I recalled the Sound Transmission Mungyeong had sent me earlier.

Denying it any longer would only make them more suspicious.

"He's outside. We have something to discuss in private."

"In the privy? Just the two of you?"

"…What the hell are you talking about, you lunatic? You're making it sound suggestive."

Hyuk Mujin gave me a dubious look.

"Captain, I've already been conditioned to insults and violence, so I'll be fine. But please don't expose Mungyeong to any strange influences."

"…"

What the hell was this lunatic talking about? I was the one about to end up covered in blood.

I was too dumbfounded to speak, and Gung Gibang added his two cents.

"Hyuk's right. The more I see that kid, the more thoughtful and kind he seems. Don't pick on him for no reason."

"Wow. You bastards, seriously…"

I stopped myself.

"Forget it. What would you two know?"

Cheongpung had at least finally noticed what was going on and kept his mouth shut like a mute with honey in it…

No, now that I looked closer, he really was stuffing candy into his mouth.

Where does he keep getting that candy?

If I stayed here any longer, I was going to lose my mind.

Shaking my head, I ignored the voices behind me and left the house.

Outside, Mungyeong stood waiting in the courtyard, dressed in spotless white robes.

"You're late."

"It didn't take that long…"

"You're late."

"Sorry…"

"You're late."

"…"

Please save me.

The pressure of that broken-record routine was no joke. His aura bore down on me so subtly that no one else could detect it, and I swallowed hard.

“S-sorry I’m late. But what’s going on?”

“Pardon?”

“Huh?”

“What do you mean? You called me out earlier because you had something to say.”

Had Cannes named him Actor of the Year or something?

He blinked as if he truly had no idea what I was talking about. For a moment, even I nearly fell for it.

The monster wearing the skin of a young medical apprentice smiled brightly and continued.

“Oh, you want us to move somewhere else for a moment? Understood.”

“No. If possible, I think it would be better to talk right here…”

“Oh, you want us to move somewhere else for a moment? Understood.”

“…Fine. Let’s go.”

I miss my mother.

Holding back tears, I followed Mungyeong.

We avoided the occasional disciples of the Zhuge Clan and Wudang, along with the river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold, until we reached a deserted area. Only then did Mungyeong finally speak.

“Dark Heaven. Was this their doing?”

“Yeah. It looks that way.”

I corrected myself at the speed of light.

“It appears so, sir.”

“So it is not certain yet.”

“There is always some possibility of error. But although we haven’t found the formation, I’m convinced Dark Heaven was responsible.”

“Dark Heaven. Dark Heaven…”

Mungyeong muttered the words under his breath, then suddenly raised his head.

He silently gazed at the dark night sky, where even the full moon had hidden itself. After a moment, he abruptly asked, “Did you notice anything strange about the corpses?”

“Something strange?”

Every death left traces. This was especially true of deaths caused by battles between martial artists.

I had heard that a widely experienced master with a deep understanding of various martial arts could identify the weapon used—and even determine which form had killed the victim—simply by examining the wounds on a corpse.

And the young medical apprentice before me possessed both the discernment and martial prowess to make him one of the finest examiners of the dead in Murim.

"I have never seen wounds like these before. They seem to follow the principles of the very basic Three Calamities Sword Technique, yet they undulate like waves. They are exceedingly strange."

Mungyeong slowly raised one hand and swept it through the air. Thread-thin strands of internal energy flowed from it, glowing faintly in the darkness.

"If I had to guess, the culprit did not use an ordinary weapon. It was an unusual weapon with a winding blade, something akin to a Snake Sword."

"I thought they'd been cut with Force."

"Your guess is correct. It was Force—or something every bit as sharp."

The only thing as sharp as Force was Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

And no matter how thoroughly Dark Heaven had prepared, there was no way so many of its forces could have been armed with weapons made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

No matter how much gold you have, Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron is difficult to obtain.

This was not a question of capital. It was a question of resource scarcity.

As I stood lost in thought, Mungyeong asked, "Did you examine all the corpses?"

"Not all of them. I looked at the ones that stood out. I'm not particularly knowledgeable, so even after examining them myself, I couldn't tell which martial arts or forms had been used."

"One of the corpses you examined belonged to Hwang Chung, the Yangtze One Saber. What did you make of it?"

"He'd been cut cleanly in two at the waist by Force. But the decay was so severe that I couldn't determine anything beyond that…"

"And the Mad Water Saber Demon and the Wave Fox?"

"Those two…"

I suddenly frowned.

A detail shared by all three corpses had just occurred to me.

…Only their upper bodies remained.

The lower halves of all three corpses were nowhere to be found.

I had seen several other corpses like that, so it had not struck me as strange at the time. Now that I thought about it, though, it was certainly suspicious.

"Didn't the fish eat them?"

"That would not be entirely wrong. From what I determined, the massacre at Donghu Stronghold took place ten days ago. The cold has been gone for some time, so severe decay is only natural. The corpses submerged in water would have fared even worse."

Warm sunlight and damp air had erased many of the traces left behind by death.

But they had not erased everything.

“By comparison, the commoners’ corpses still had their limbs relatively intact. Did you notice that?”

“Yes. Those who hadn’t learned martial arts weren’t cut apart. They were crushed.”

Unlike the corpses of the river bandits, the bodies of the children, women, and elderly had not been severed. Their entire bodies had simply been crushed and pulverized.

And there was one more thing.

“The houses and the surrounding ground had caved in everywhere. That would have been impossible without a force of ten thousand geun,[2139] and it is not a method an internal-arts master with profound internal energy would choose.”

“So, an external-arts master?”

“There’s no one here, remember?”

“…I was just talking to myself.”

He was awfully sensitive about this.

After hurriedly making that excuse, I fell silent and considered the matter.

Martial arts in Murim could broadly be divided into two categories.

Internal arts emphasized the efficient use and application of internal energy. External arts also used internal energy, but focused on tempering the body to their absolute limits.

Most people faced those two paths upon entering the world of martial arts, and most chose the former.

Partly because training in external arts was excruciating, but also because achieving any meaningful results required long years of grueling perseverance.

Which means there are only a handful of Supreme Peak external-arts masters capable of this level of destruction.

There were hardly any Supreme Peak masters in the world to begin with, even if you turned the whole realm upside down and shook it out.

I glanced at Mungyeong, silently asking for an answer. A faint crease appeared on the young medical apprentice’s smooth forehead.

“Looking at me will do you no good. I do not know his identity either. No—I should say their identities, not his.”

“There are two?”

“At least two. Three at most.”

“Three Supreme Peak masters…”

[2139] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

“Based on my guess, they are even more formidable than the Qilian Three Fiends we faced in Sichuan. At least one of them uses an unusual weapon.”

For fuck’s sake. This isn’t some five-star establishment. Why are there three Supreme Peak masters?

It was only because Mungyeong and Jeok Cheongang were holding down the fort that I could afford to leave at all. Without them here, I would have been too worried about what might happen to go anywhere.

“With this much information, the Third Fiend might know something. He must have at least heard who his comrades were.”

The Third Fiend we had captured in Sichuan was one of the reasons I was going to the Zhuge Clan.

I had heard that he had become like a bipolar patient after his balls were crushed, but if I worked him over with enough care and dedication, he would not last long.

Maybe we can even put him out front and have him lead us to the formation.

That hopeful thought had barely crossed my mind when Mungyeong spoke.

“Perhaps it is someone everyone already knows.”

“What?”

“I mean the one who uses that unusual weapon.”

It took me quite a while to grasp what he meant.

The realization struck like a hammer to the back of my head.

I stared blankly at Mungyeong.

“Are you serious?”

“A seasoned Supreme Peak master. Forms and wounds so unusual that they are difficult to read. There cannot be many people at that realm who wield such a weapon.”

“Then it really is…”

A dry voice emerged from between Mungyeong’s lips.

“The Dongting Fisherman. For now, he is the most likely suspect.”

“…!”

The eccentric master who had never left the area around Dongting Lake in his entire life.

Unusually, he used a fishing rod made of black wood as his signature weapon. He was a Supreme Peak master who had crossed Tianling Falls and disappeared after becoming enraged by the tragic news concerning his friend, the head of the Sea Serpent Society.

Everything fits perfectly.

I had forgotten for a moment.

I had forgotten about his existence.

This was no baseless suspicion.

Unlike the others, the Dongting Fisherman's corpse had never been found. The only trace he had left behind was his broken black-wood fishing rod.

It was only a guess, but what if the Dongting Fisherman really was a member of Dark Heaven?

"But the Dongting Fisherman Zhuge Feng told me about had absolutely no reason to do something like this…"

"Everything has a reason. The Dongting Fisherman is only human. He must have had a shadow he showed no one. Zhuge Feng is likely suspicious of him by now as well."

Mungyeong turned away, his voice cold.

"Always be suspicious, and stay alert. May martial fortune be with you."

Chapter 452

Unlike the journey in, the way out wasn't as difficult as I'd expected.

Part of that was because the whirlpools of Tianling Falls mostly spiraled outward. It also helped that the veteran river bandits from Water Dragon Stronghold, who had spent years working aboard ships, were making full use of their skills.

"Turn to port!"

"Starboard! Don't row until the signal!"

"More, more, more… Now!"

"Yaaah!"

Whoooosh! Splash!

"The boat—the boat's tilting!"

"Great Hero Jin!"

"Help us!"

"…Damn it, you bastards."

Come to think of it, maybe it was a little difficult after all.

Still, it was nothing we couldn't handle. Even without powerful allies like Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong, Cheongpung and I could overcome most crises if we stepped in.

The first time is hard. Why would the second be?

The river bandits weren't the only ones who had grown accustomed to the violent whirlpools of Tianling Falls. I had prepared in advance as well, and thrust both palms forward with all my strength.

Boom!

The tilting swift ship regained its balance. Now it was time to pick up speed and escape this damned whirlpool.

I called out to the man I had stationed at the stern for precisely this situation.

"Cheongpung, now!"

"Yee-haw!"

"You crazy bastard! Stop hanging there and playing around!"

"Oh, sorry, Benefactor. I didn't mean to. Before I knew it…"

"Just hurry up and do it!"

"Yes!"

Boom, boom, boom!

Cheongpung was about as far from normal as a person could get, but his skills were undeniable.

Dozens of palm shadows infused with powerful internal energy struck through the air and lashed the surface of the water. The resulting thrust sent the swift ship vaulting over the whirlpool of Tianling Falls before landing on the other side.

Boom! Splash!

A towering spray engulfed the hull. Drenched from head to toe in river water, Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin muttered under their breath.

“Damn it. Last time we got dunked, and now we’re getting drenched. We really do get everything.”

“I swear, once this is over, I’m never coming back to the Yangtze. Not ever. Every day feels like living the life of a goddamn beggar.”

“…Are you picking a fight with me?”

“No. Honestly, doesn’t it feel like we’re living as beggars?”

“That’s true. It pisses me off, but you’re right. You’re right, and it still pisses me off.”

“Damn. I really do feel like a beggar.”

“…I get it, so shut up.”

Those two acted like this every chance they got.

Leaving behind the bickering of our two human pieces of sweet-and-sour pork—dunked on the way in and drenched on the way out—the swift ship cleared Tianling Falls safely and sped across the Yangtze.

About three shichen[2140] later, the ship that had departed at dawn reached the ferry landing at Zaoyang. By then, it was already close to noon.

“The waterways of the Yangtze do not reach Mount Longzhong, where the Zhuge Clan is located. From here, you will have to travel by land.”

The deputy Stronghold Lord of Water Dragon Stronghold had come in Mu Song’s place. I nodded at his explanation.

Hubei Province had highly developed land and water transportation, but that didn’t mean every tributary of the Yangtze was connected. A boat couldn’t travel where there was no water.

It’s not like these people are Vikings.[2141]

Fortunately, the broad, level highways were well maintained. We could reach our destination quickly by carriage or by using movement techniques.

Zaoyang and Mount Longzhong were relatively close, so the journey shouldn’t take long.

The Zhuge Clan retainer whom Zhuge Feng had ordered to accompany us wasn’t standing around idle, either.

[2140] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; three shichen is about six hours.

[2141] The Vikings were known for hauling their longships overland between rivers and lakes, a practice called portaging.

“I will send word to the Zaoyang branch immediately and have carriages prepared. Relay stations have been established all along the main roads, so if we change carriages along the way, we will reach our family home in no time.”

“Oh, right.”

The Zhuge Clan was a prestigious major faction that divided control of Hubei Province with Wudang.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan had also established branches and sub-branches throughout Shanxi Province to solidify its control over the region. The Zhuge Clan’s network was probably even more extensive.

It’s like a major brand opening chain stores.

Then we should arrive in half a day at the latest.

I had just stepped off the ship after roughly calculating the travel time in my head when—

Clack, clack, clack.

A group appeared to the sound of perfectly synchronized footsteps and surrounded the ferry landing.

I frowned as I stared at the unwelcome guests.

What is this now?

There were nearly thirty martial artists.

Every one of them wore a lustrous blue silk martial uniform and carried a high-quality steel longsword at their waist. Hyuk Mujin’s eyes widened.

“That’s…”

“What? Do you know them?”

“No. I was just surprised by those silk uniforms.”

“What?”

“That’s Shu brocade from Sichuan. It’s considered one of the finest silks under heaven. My father dreamed of filling an entire warehouse with it. That’s how expensive and precious it is… And they made martial uniforms out of it. I don’t know who their employer is, but they must be loaded.”

“…”

I’d told the bastard to identify them, and he was evaluating the quality of their silk instead.

As I stared at him in disbelief, Gung Gibang clicked his tongue and cut in.

“I can’t tell whether that bastard is a martial artist or a cloth merchant. Don’t expect anything from that Hyuk brat. Ask this elder instead.”

“I don’t know about making you an elder, but I can make you a cripple. Tell us before my fist gets there.”

“…They’re martial artists from Qingxia Hall. I told you, so please loosen that fist a little.”

"Qingxia Hall? What do those bastards do?"

Gung Gibang glanced at my still-clenched fist and answered.

"They aren't an official sect, but they wield considerable influence in Hubei Province in various ways."

"They look pretty pathetic for people with that kind of influence."

I glanced at the martial artists standing in formation in the distance.

They wore uniforms made of expensive Shu brocade and carried quality swords, but that was all.

Most were Second or Third Rate swordsmen who fell short of First Rate. Perhaps they cared more about their appearance than their martial arts, because every one of them was well built and handsome.

They're even wearing makeup.

At this point, weren't they idols rather than martial artists?

It almost made me wonder if the K-pop craze that had begun in Korea had crossed worlds and spread all the way to Murim.

Qingxia Bulletproof Martial Artist Corps. Maybe they had come to play a gig under a name like that.

"Those guys' group name—or rather, their organization's name—was Qingxia Hall, right? They're actually a big deal in Hubei?"

"I've heard they throw considerable weight around."

"They look like they'd piss themselves the moment a real fight started…"

Did Hubei decide its sect rankings through popularity votes?

While I was seriously pondering the question, the Zhuge Clan retainer spoke.

"Qingxia Hall is a sort of social club."

"A social club?"

"Yes. It was formed by the sons and daughters of influential people with varying degrees of power throughout Hubei Province. They are always running around together and causing all kinds of trouble, but they have such powerful backing that matters usually fizzle out without consequence."

"Oh. A gold-spoon club."

"I'm sorry, what did you say?"

"Nothing important. In that case, we can just continue on our way."

So that was all they were. A noisy empty cart decked out in gaudy finery.

Pathetic people like that could be found anywhere. Having lost interest in Qingxia Hall, I took the lead and started walking.

"Which way do we go to reach the Zaoyang branch?"

"It will take less than fifteen minutes from here. First, we should head to the main road over there…"

The Zhuge Clan retainer trailed off.

An extravagantly luxurious procession was approaching from the main road he had just indicated—more lavish than anything I had ever seen.

“The heroes of Qingxia Hall are passing through!”

At the shrill cry of a middle-aged man with weasel whiskers, musicians walking along both sides of the procession began to play. Beautiful women scattered flower petals through the air.

The main road was instantly swept up in a festive atmosphere.

The commoners traveling along it watched the procession with expressions mingling anticipation and discontent.

Their countless gazes converged on ten young men and women riding in four-bearer palanquins carved with dragons and phoenixes.

Wreathed in the easy smiles only the rich could afford, they looked down at the poorly dressed commoners and tossed something from their hands.

Clatter, clatter, clatter!

Not hidden weapons… money. Gleaming silver nyang, each worth a hundred iron coins.

Only then did I understand the anticipation on the commoners’ faces.

“Waaah!”

“Silver nyang! It’s silver!”

“Jang-pal, you vile bastard! How dare you try to snatch someone else’s silver nyang? Take your hand off it right now!”

“Bullshit. Didn’t you see my hand get there first?”

“You fucking son of a—!”

Cheers and curses rose over the ceaselessly falling petals and silver nyang.

A woman bit into her unexpected windfall to test it. Men loudly insisted that they were the rightful owners, then promptly began fighting over it.

Meanwhile, the young men and women in the palanquins laughed as they watched the spectacle.

“What a complete shitshow.”

The sight made me shake my head.

The rich kids scattering money and enjoying the people’s reactions as if they were watching a circus looked pathetic. The sight of the commoners fighting tooth and nail for a single silver nyang left a bitter taste in my mouth and made me feel sorry for them.

But it had nothing to do with me.

“Forget about that. Let’s just get going…”

I trailed off and blinked.

What the hell was this?

Gone.

The bastards who had been beside me moments ago were nowhere to be seen. Only the Zhuge Clan retainer remained, standing there awkwardly.

“Wait, where did every one of those bastards go?”

The retainer hesitated, then raised a hand and pointed in one direction.

“They’re over there.”

“…?”

I turned my head and was rendered speechless.

Whoosh, whoosh-whoosh!

“No! You can’t!”

“My silver!”

One person was darting through the crowd with ghostlike movements, snatching silver nyang out of the air.

No. Not one person.

One fucking beggar.

The Myriad-Li[2142] Chasing Wind Movement Technique?

That lunatic was actually using a secret technique of the Beggars’ Sect for this?

He was faster and more agile than I had ever seen him. He had complained endlessly that he’d only mastered the technique to the fifth stage, yet the movements he was displaying now were at least seventh-stage.

That bastard is single-handedly disgracing the Beggars’ Sect.

Even for a beggar, how could he be this devoted to his calling?

But I had no time to worry about another sect’s reputation. The Jin Family of Taiyuan’s own dark horse was no less impressive.

“Haap!”

Whoosh! Rat-a-tat-tat!

Hyuk Mujin kicked off the ground and soared into the air, swinging his sword. The silver nyang caught in its powerful, fluid arc popped into the air, then showered down onto the flat of his blade.

Hyuk Mujin’s face lit up when he checked the silver.

“Wow! Ten silver nyang!”

“…”

That bastard had ten hits coming. Guaranteed.

I swallowed the curses rising to my throat and searched for the last remaining person.

Where is that Cheongpung bastard?

[2142] Li is a traditional Chinese distance unit of approximately 500 m (0.311 mi). Here it is part of the technique’s name.

Unlike Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin, who were scooping up silver nyang with all their might, Cheongpung was nowhere to be seen.

But I knew the habits of the creature called Cheongpung inside and out, so it didn't take me long to find him.

"First, ten sweets, please. Oh, and some jeonbyeong[2143] too. Not the ones you just picked up—the big ones over there, and give me plenty. Wow, thank you! By any chance, where's the dumpling shop?"

Snap.

Something inside my head broke. My eyes rolled back until only the whites showed, and I roared.

"You fucking bastards!"

[2143] Jeonbyeong is a Korean thin pancake or crepe.

Chapter 453

“You fucking baaaastards!”

For a moment, it felt as though a cold wind had swept through.

Or maybe my shout had simply been loud enough to feel like one.

Probably the latter.

Whoooosh.

Dozens of people who had been scrambling for silver nyang[2144] froze, and silence fell over the noisy main road.

Then one short command broke the stillness.

“I’m counting to three.”

“…?”

“Fall in.”

“…!”

Give a dog three years at a village school and it can recite poetry. Beat it for long enough and it can memorize the Four Books and Three Classics.[2145]

That was why the village-school dog—or rather, Hyuk Mujin—who had been conditioned by a year of my violence and profanity moved faster than anyone else.

“Faaall iiiin!”

Screaming his acknowledgment, Hyuk Mujin came running and stopped dead in front of me.

A beat later, Gung Gibang grasped the situation and used his movement technique, arriving almost simultaneously with Hyuk Mujin. As for Cheongpung…

“Pancakes! Please give me the pancakes, quick! Benefactor is angry!”

That sibu-leol[2146] bastard. He was still making sure to get his snacks.

Once they had been wrapped, Cheongpung raced toward me like a streak of light. I spoke to him gently.

“Take your time. I’m not angry.”

“Wow! Really?”

“Yeah. I’m not angry. I’m fucking pissed.”

“Ah, ah…”

I looked at the fidgeting Cheongpung and the other two, who were subtly avoiding my gaze.

When the hell are these bastards going to become human?

[2144] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; the money here is silver.

[2145] The Four Books and Three Classics are foundational texts of Confucian learning.

[2146] Sibu-leol is a Korean profanity, roughly equivalent to “fuck.”

They should have been squeezing out every last ounce of strength to reach the Zhuge Clan, yet here they were using martial arts to pick up a few silver nyang.[2147]

Gung Gibang had even sneakily snatched silver nyang[2148] out of someone else's hand. At this point, he was not a beggar. He was a bandit.

Life, for fuck's sake…

I'd gone to such lengths lately to improve employee benefits, and this was what I got.

I looked up at the clear sky and spat into my palm.

"Hyuk Mujin. Stick out your forehead."

"Pardon?"

Hyuk Mujin jerked his head up, looking incredulous.

"Just me?"

"Yeah. You first."

"What about Gung Gibang?"

"He's a beggar down to the bone. Honestly, it's hard to criticize a beggar for picking up silver nyang."[2149]

"An accurate and wise judgment."

Gung Gibang, who had been watching my mood, cut in with a solemn voice. Hyuk Mujin opened his round eyes.

"No, what do you mean, 'hard to criticize'? You get angry every time I call you a beggar."

"Me? What nonsense. I'm a beggar from head to toe. I was born a beggar, and I'll live as one until the day I die."

"…You really are a beggar."

"Thank you for the compliment."

"Gung Gibang, you beggar bastard."

"Ah, how sweet."

After glaring at Gung Gibang as if he wanted to kill him, Hyuk Mujin spoke again.

"What about Cheongpung?"

"Cheongpung is Cheongpung."

Huashan or whatever, Cheongpung had always been like that.

That one sentence said it all. Hyuk Mujin muttered,

"That makes no sense, but somehow I understand…"

"People are watching. Let's get this over with."

"How many?"

"You tell me. How many blows will it take for you to reflect on your actions?"

[2147] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; the money here is silver.
[2148] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; the money here is silver.
[2149] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; the money here is silver.

“Then… one?”

“Three.”

“Damn it. Understood.”

“You cursed, so five.”

“…Just hit me ten times. Beat me to death.”

“Bonus points for such resolve, worthy of a martial artist. So, one blow. How many?”

“One!”

Hyuk Mujin shouted his reply with all his might and thrust his forehead forward.

That was when it happened.

“You there. Stop.”

“…?”

I lowered my hand and turned around.

The main road had gone deathly silent. Ten men and women seated in four-bearer palanquins were staring at us with a mixture of displeasure and interest.

All of them wore lavish clothing that flaunted their immense wealth, but one young man stood out in particular.

He was the one who had just spoken.

“I stopped. Why?”

The young man’s eyes widened at my question. He blinked for a while, as if unable to believe what he had heard, then let out a quiet laugh.

“It seems you do not know who this Young Master is.”

“Do I need to?”

“What an arrogant bastard!”

The young man wasn’t the one who said that.

I watched as a man kicked off from one of the palanquins and shot into the air.

What’s this now?

Whoosh, clang!

The sparrow-eyed man performed three somersaults in midair before landing and drawing his sword, his eyes blazing with fury.

The onlookers gasped at the flashy display.

“You appear to be a wandering martial artist, but as if causing a disturbance in broad daylight were not enough, you dare address a person of noble standing with such insolence—”

“You’ve got a lot of jewels on that thing. Are they supposed to distract people?”

I stared at the jewels decorating his sword. Dozens of gems in a variety of colors were shining in the sunlight.

“What?”

“It’s dazzling. Put it away.”

Clang!

The sparrow-eyed man’s eyes widened.

Unable to withstand the force of my finger flick, the sword flew from his hand and buried itself deep in the ground.

“Who the fuck points a sword at someone like that? In broad daylight, no less.”

Oh, look at him throwing a fit.

He was probably somewhere around First Rate.

He seemed to have polished his skills to a decent level, but he was an extreme poseur obsessed with appearances.

“T-this bastard…!”

“And you were the ones making all the noise. I just quieted things down. Don’t make this any more complicated than it needs to be. Just leave, all right?”

I meant it.

It wasn’t as if I’d never had a fly or two buzzing around me before. This wasn’t my home, and I was only passing through. There was no reason to spray insecticide on every mosquito that came at me.

Better to wave them away and keep going.

But no matter how sincerely you tried to explain something, there were always people who failed to understand the first time.

Shing, shing-shing!

Dozens of sword blades flashed from every direction. Martial artists from Qingxia Hall, dressed in blue silk martial uniforms, surrounded us in layer after layer. The sparrow-eyed man’s earlier panic gave way to smug satisfaction.

“You seem to be a fairly well-known wandering martial artist. Kneel and beg forgiveness while you still can. Who knows? Perhaps the Young Master will mercifully spare you.”

I glanced over the sparrow-eyed man’s shoulder. Led by the young man who appeared to be their leader, the others were watching us with sparkling eyes.

They looked exactly like zoo visitors watching monkeys.

“I don’t think the people over there are feeling particularly merciful.”

“What?”

“Of course, neither am I. And from what I’ve learned, this is the most effective medicine. Isn’t that right?”

I slowly raised my fist, and the Bermuda Triangle, which had been watching only my expression, responded enthusiastically.

“Exactly. They won’t come to their senses until they’ve been beaten like dogs on the hottest day of summer."[2150]

"I was the first one to take that medicine. Cured me on the spot."

"Benefactor, can I go buy dumplings while you do that?"

"No. Stay there. This'll be over soon anyway."

Step.

"W-wait!"

The moment I stepped forward, panic filled the sparrow-eyed man's eyes.

A Third Rate thug would charge in out of sheer stubbornness because he would not know his opponent's level. But that man was a martial artist who had learned martial arts to a certain degree.

He had clearly realized that neither he nor the Qingxia Hall martial artists serving as an ornamental backdrop were any match for me.

"W-we're Qingxia Hall!"

"Oh. So?"

"H-have you never heard of Qingxia Hall's reputation?"

"Nope. My hearing hasn't been too good lately."

Step.

"Stop! I said stop!"

"Ahem."

By then, the sparrow-eyed man wasn't the only one getting desperate.

The Zhuge Clan retainer, who had been clicking his tongue as he watched, cleared his throat and spoke.

"I will explain the situation, so perhaps it would be best if you stopped…"

Whack! Thud!

"Pardon me? What did you just say?"

"…"

The Zhuge Clan retainer looked back and forth between me, standing there with my fist clenched, and the sparrow-eyed man, who lay unconscious with his nose crushed.

He muttered awkwardly,

"I said it might be best if you stopped…"

"Pardon?"

"There may be various complications…"

"Pardon?"

"It would be better to avoid any unnecessary conflict…"

"What was that?"

[2150] Boknal are the hottest days of the Korean summer, historically associated with eating dog-meat soup.

"…Never mind."

"Ah. All right."

I wiped the blood from my fist on my trouser leg and looked around.

Gung Gibang was muttering that he'd known the man would end up like that, while Hyuk Mujin beamed at his unexpected reprieve.

And Cheongpung…

"Hey! Where do you think you're going?"

"Gasp! Benefactor!"

Was that bastard seriously trying to buy dumplings right now…?

Cheongpung was silently inching away. Watching his retreating back, I began to wonder if he was really human.

I'm definitely catching that bastard.

I stepped forward with grim resolve. The ornamental guards surrounding us sucked in their breaths and moved aside.

But they weren't the only Qingxia Hall martial artists present.

"Ha-ha-ha! How amusing. Truly amusing. Don't you agree?"

At the young man's laughing question, the four huge men carrying his palanquin answered in unison.

"Yes, my lord."

"We cannot send off the benefactor who gave this Young Master such a good laugh. I am fine, so go and bring him here."

"Loyalty!"

Their shout rang with internal energy. The huge men set down the palanquin and charged toward me with the speed of the wind.

They had transformed from mere sedan bearers into outstanding Peak masters, attacking while covering all four directions.

Whoooooosh!

Each threw a punch carrying fierce qi, the four strikes interlocking with exquisite precision.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

With exactly four sounds of impact, four bodies sprawled face-first onto the ground at the same speed with which they had charged.

None of them got back up.

"What the sibu-leol?"[2151]

"…!"

"…!"

"…!"

[2151] Sibu-leol is a Korean profanity, roughly equivalent to "fuck."

Complete silence descended over the main road.

I nudged the unconscious giants with my foot, then shrugged at the young man. The corners of his mouth, which had been raised so high moments before, were now trembling.

“Interesting. Very interesting. Don’t you all think so too?”

The Zhuge Clan retainer put a hand to his forehead, while Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin nodded mechanically.

“This is the most fun I’ve had in all my thirty years as a beggar.”

“Captain, I laughed so hard my belly button fell off. I can’t see where it rolled, so I’m still looking for it.”

“Right. In times as bleak as these, how could we simply let the man who gave us such wonderful entertainment leave? So… grab that bastard by the collar and escort him over here.”

“Loyalty, loyalty!”

“I give up. Whatever happens, you’ll deal with it yourself.”

Hyuk Mujin, desperate to avoid even a single blow, threw himself into the task with greater enthusiasm than anyone else. Gung Gibang stepped forward as well, despite his grumbling.

The situation had completely reversed from how it had begun.

Once even their trusted guards were defeated, the men and women of Qingxia Hall began shrieking at the tops of their lungs.

“Y-you bastard! Do you know who I am?”

“You wretched scoundrel! How dare you defy the laws of the Great Nation!”

“If you lay a hand on me, do you think my family will stand by and do nothing?”

I had only meant to grab one person, but these people were apparently set items that came attached in a chain.

I turned to the first one who had shouted.

“Who are you?”

“I am the Young Bureau Head of the Daejuksan Escort Bureau…”

“Oh, Juksan Escort Bureau?”

“So you do know us!”

“I don’t, you sibu-leol[2152] bastard. Get down before I beat you into juk.”[2153]

They might have thrown their weight around in Hubei Province, but if I’d never heard of them, they were nobodies.

I continued quietly.

“Get down now, and I’ll only destroy the palanquin. Refuse, and I’ll destroy your legs along with it. What’ll it be?”

[2152] Sibu-leol is a Korean profanity, roughly equivalent to “fuck.”

[2153] Juk is Korean rice porridge, continuing Taekyung’s wordplay on “Juksan.”

The Young Bureau Head of the Daejuksan Escort Bureau widened his eyes and answered,

“I’ll get down.”

“You should’ve done that from the start. Why are your eyes so wide?”

“I’m sorry. If I don’t do this, I think I might cry…”

Ah. That was understandable.

After dealing with one of them easily, I turned to the sharp-voiced woman.

“What family did you say you were from?”

“Hmph! No matter how much of a scoundrel you are, surely you’ve heard of the name of the Hyungmun Sword Family!”

“Never heard of it. Stop talking nonsense and get down.”

“…!”

“Next. Where are you from?”

“I-I’m from the Eungseong Merchant Association…”

“Eungseong, Eung-shit, whatever. Get down unless you want me to beat you until you crap yourself.”

“Yes, sir.”

After two or three of them climbed down from their sedan chairs, the rest began touching their feet to the ground one by one without even speaking.

All except one.

“So, who are you?”

Every trace of laughter had vanished from the young man’s face. His eyes gleamed coldly.

“You have crossed a line you should never have crossed.”

“Looks like you’ve crossed your lifeline too. So who are you?”

“Heh. What a ridiculous situation.”

The young man gave a hollow laugh, then shouted in a dignified voice,

“I, Ju Wongong, am a noble scion of the dragon’s blood and a third cousin of His Majesty the Emperor! If you know your crime, kneel even now!”

“Okay, Celestial Dragon.[2154] Get down.”

[2154] The privileged World Nobles in One Piece, infamous for treating ordinary people as beneath them.

Chapter 454

The young man who had frozen with his eyes wide—or rather, Ju Wongong—asked in a trembling voice,

“W-what did you say?”

Had this bastard’s ears been plugged this whole time? He kept making me repeat myself.

Ignoring the people staring back and forth between Ju Wongong and me with their mouths hanging open, I spoke again.

“Get down.”

“I-I am Ju Wongong!”

“Main character, Ju Wongong, whatever. Get down.”

“You are a subject of the Great Nation! How dare you show such disrespect to a member of His Majesty the Emperor’s own bloodline?”

“I have a friend named Johnson.[2155] If he were here, he’d have violated something else.”

“…!”

“I’ll say it one last time. Get down.”

He had no idea what I meant, but anyone with human instincts could sense danger.

Ju Wongong’s butt twitched instinctively, and he slowly rose to his feet.

Yet even as his eyes darted around in anxiety at this unprecedented situation, he didn’t forget to threaten me until the bitter end. Apparently, he still trusted his imperial pedigree to protect him.

“D-do you think you’ll get away with this?”

“Yeah. I think I will.”

“To insult an imperial relative? This is treason!”

“As long as it’s not hair loss.”

“What kind of bastard says things like that…!”

Although I answered casually, I was not entirely wrong.

The imperial family bore the same Zhu surname as the Son of Heaven and carried the blood of dragons. That alone made them noble.

Even though Murim and the government maintained a relationship of mutual noninterference, disrespecting or threatening an imperial relative was treated as a serious crime.

There was a reason the Zhuge Clan retainer had been whining like a dog desperate to relieve itself.

[2155] Johnson is the name of an American talk-show host Taekyung has encountered; “johnson” is also slang for a penis.

"P-perhaps it would be best if you stopped now."

I frowned at his whisper.

"Why?"

"Pardon?"

"What did I do? I didn't swear at him or threaten to kill him. His side even attacked first. All I did was tell him to get down from the four-person sedan chair."

"…Well, if you put it that way, you're right. But he is still an imperial relative."

"Imperial relatives come in all grades. If he's eight degrees removed, he's not really a blood relative. They just have a few drops of blood in common. If I spat into the Yangtze right now, the river and I would probably be about eight degrees apart too."

"Gasp. Great Hero Jin, please."

"It's fine. I said it quietly, so no one could've heard us anyway."

At that moment, Ju Wongong misread our whispering and shouted triumphantly.

"It seems you have finally grasped the gravity of the situation. But it is already too late! The imperial court will soon dispatch a hundred thousand troops to exterminate the nine branches of your kin,[2156] along with those of every other traitor!"

"Oh. A Buster Call.[2157]"

"What have you been babbling about this whole time, you traitorous bastard?"

"Gasp!"

"Eek!"

When unmistakable fury filled Ju Wongong's eyes, the commoners sucked in their breaths and threw themselves flat on the ground. Some had already begun fleeing in every direction.

They seemed eager to avoid being dragged into someone else's trouble. That meant fewer eyes watching us, so I had no complaints.

They keep threatening people with the nine branches of their kin[2158] whenever they get bored.

Did they not bother with anything less?

As I let out a deep sigh, the Zhuge Clan retainer whispered,

"Don't be too frightened. His talk of a hundred thousand troops is only a bluff."

"…Do you think I'm an idiot? Why would I believe that?"

[2156] Punishing nine branches of a person's kin refers to extending a treason sentence across the offender's family.

“Master Ju was exiled for using his imperial authority to embezzle a fortune, so he won’t want to make this matter any bigger. Please apologize and withdraw while you still can.”

“Wait. Exiled?”

“Yes.”

“Him?”

“He is an imperial relative. No matter how distant his branch may be, his blood cannot be ignored. Besides, he is a distant branch with no chance of inheriting the throne, so even when he commits a crime, they allow him to enjoy a certain amount of special treatment.”

“In short, he’s such a fucking nobody that no one around him even bothers with him?”

“…Great Hero Jin, please choose your words more carefully.”

I let the retainer’s complaint go in one ear and out the other, then laughed quietly.

I had wondered why someone who was supposedly an imperial relative was hanging around with a gang of thugs on a main road in Hubei instead of living in the imperial palace. It turned out he was even less important than I had imagined.

Though I had already suspected as much when he started talking about being eight degrees removed.

“First, I shall gouge out those arrogant eyes of yours for failing to recognize this noble self. Then I shall tear you limb from limb, and afterward—”

“Yeah, yeah. I get it. Look at this first, then we can talk about the rest.”

I pulled something from inside my robe and tossed it at Ju Wongong as he delivered his grand speech.

At the same time, the man who had been puffing out his chest flailed both arms and sat down hard.

“A hidden weapon! A hidden weapon! This bastard is trying to assassinate an imperial relative!”

“…You really are something else.”

And then—

The “hidden weapon” landed with a soft clack in front of Ju Wongong’s feet, scattering a brilliant light beneath everyone’s gaze.

“Huh?”

Ju Wongong stared at the object with puzzled eyes, his mouth hanging open.

“Huh? Huh? Huhhhhhh!”

It didn’t take long for his question marks to become exclamation marks, or for his anger to turn to shock.

He looked back and forth between me and Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao’s token, engraved with clouds and a dragon. Then he spoke in a grave voice.

“I shall show you mercy and forgive you.”

“…”

What a load of crap.

“So you were on your way to Dongting Lake?”

“That is correct! No, I mean, yes, that is so!”

Ju Wongong nodded vigorously at my gentle tone.

The decorative showpieces from Qingxia Hall whom he had hired were warning people to keep their mouths shut alongside the government troops, who had arrived late. Meanwhile, Cheongpung, who had somehow succeeded in buying dumplings in bulk, opened his eyes wide at the mention of Dongting Lake.

“Wow! Dongting Lake!”

Ju Wongong had finally learned the identity of this dumpling ghost. His uneasy gaze flicked toward the sword hanging at Cheongpung’s waist.

“W-well, I could invite you along if you wished…”

I muttered,

“You don’t mean that at all.”

“That is a misunderstanding! No, I mean, you misunderstand.”

“Do you misunderstand things this often? Considering you attacked people who were trying to pass by peacefully, it certainly seems that way.”

“That was… I shall apologize once again. I never dreamed that you possessed His Highness Prince Shangshan’s token.”

“Oh, I see. So if I hadn’t had the token, you would’ve brought a hundred thousand troops to exterminate nine branches of my family,[2159] gouged out my eyes, and torn me limb from limb?”

“W-why would you say such a thing? Ha, ha-ha-ha.”

His forced laughter was almost pitiful.

I didn’t know the token would have this much power either.

There was a reason Ju Wongong had become so submissive.

Even animals were judged as purebred or mixed-breed. How much more would the imperial family—the noblest bloodline in the world—care about such distinctions?

Even though the same imperial blood ran in their veins, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao was the Son of Heaven’s only younger full brother and the sole prince he had personally appointed.

[2159] Punishing nine branches of a person’s kin refers to extending a treason sentence across the offender’s family.

After the late Emperor's death, the ruthless man who now sat upon the throne had eliminated countless blood relatives in the struggle for succession. Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao was that ruthless Emperor's one soft spot.

Ju Wongong, on the other hand, came from a collateral branch eight degrees removed.

The direct imperial line possessed legitimacy and authority. Even by counting degrees of kinship, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao was a distant and exalted elder of the household to Ju Wongong.

This is what they call using barbarians to defeat barbarians.

Defeat barbarians with barbarians, and a weak Celestial Dragon[2160] with a strong Celestial Dragon.[2161]

The chairman of my fan club was this formidable. Just thinking about it made my heart swell.

"Well, putting that aside, what are you planning to do at Dongting Lake?"

"W-well, the weather is pleasant, so I thought I might go boating…"

At my incredulous expression, Ju Wongong hurriedly corrected himself.

"I intended to go boating while also inspecting the people's welfare, since I heard the mood in Hubei Province has been rather grim lately."

"…Shouldn't you inspect your own life first? I heard you were exiled for siphoning off a fortune through back channels."

"Ahem! Ahem!"

"And you brought all these people along for a boat ride? At a time like this?"

Everyone in Hubei Province with eyes and ears was trembling with anxiety over the grim rumors that refused to die down, yet this exiled imperial relative was planning a lavish boating excursion on Dongting Lake.

If Mr. Current Situation heard about this and smashed Ju Wongong's skull with a sledgehammer, Ju Wongong would have no right to complain.

That's rich people for you.

I shook my head and rose from my seat.

The matter had been settled without too much fuss, so I intended to leave and forget about it. Ju Wongong seemed to take it differently.

"W-wait a moment. Where are you going?"

"I'm a busy man. I have more important things to do than go boating on Dongting Lake. Why?"

"If I have offended you, I shall apologize once again. And in that spirit…"

Ju Wongong trailed off and gave a meaningful glance.

[2160] The Celestial Dragons in One Piece are privileged nobles who claim exceptional status by birth.

[2161] The Celestial Dragons in One Piece are privileged nobles who claim exceptional status by birth.

The Qingxia Hall martial artists who had been waiting for his signal carried over one of the ornate sedan chairs positioned throughout the procession.

They hadn't even drawn back its curtains, yet a faint fragrance drifted into my nose.

Don't tell me…

There was an old saying that the thing you dismissed with "surely not" was the thing most likely to get you. This time was no different.

"Show yourself."

The moment Ju Wongong spoke, the sedan chair's door slid open.

A woman carefully stepped down, and an exclamation escaped my lips before I could stop it.

"…Whoa."

People often describe celebrities as pretty or handsome.

But the woman before me possessed something beyond those ordinary standards.

Beautiful.

Yes. That was probably the right word.

She was beautiful enough to draw admiration even from me, despite the fact that I had already guessed Ju Wongong's intentions.

Beautiful enough to make Gung Gibang hurriedly wash his face with spit and Hyuk Mujin stare in a daze. Beautiful enough to make Cheongpung—who had been holding a meat dumpling in one hand and a vegetable dumpling in the other, trying to choose between them—drop them both.

As the quiet shock rippled through the crowd, Ju Wongong's voice reached me.

"She is the singing courtesan I keep at my side. As you can see, her beauty deserves to be called unrivaled beneath the heavens. She is also extraordinarily skilled in music. Anyone who hears her play loses himself completely."

I wasn't so sure she needed the music. She looked capable of stealing a person's soul without playing a single note.

Ju Wongong laughed quietly at the admiration plain on my face, then turned to the woman.

"What are you waiting for? Hurry and greet him."

Her red lips slowly parted.

"This humble girl is called Honglan. It is my greatest pleasure to meet such an honored guest."

"…Oh."

"…Wow."

"…Amazing."

Before the shock of her appearance had even faded, exclamations burst out from every direction.

Her voice was clear and pure, yet alluring.

Honglan. Red Orchid. The name suited her better than anyone.

Of course, it wasn't her real name, and she wasn't an ordinary singing courtesan either.

Like most courtesans, including Wolhwa, Honglan concealed her true name.

And unlike Ju Wongong, who knew absolutely nothing about martial arts, she had received at least some training.

Lower District Sect?

Her slender shoulder twitched at my Sound Transmission, and Honglan gave a slight nod.

The Lower District Sect. I had a feeling that was it.

The Lower District Sect had more disciples than any organization apart from the Beggars' Sect.

Ju Wongong didn't seem aware of it, but like the Lower District Sect's other courtesans, Honglan had learned enough martial arts to protect herself.

"So? What do you think, Great Hero Jin? Give me the opportunity, and this Young Master will treat you properly. Of course, Honglan will sit beside you…"

Let's see you refuse to come along after this.

The words were written plainly across Ju Wongong's smug face.

I gazed at Honglan for a moment, then smiled.

"Forget it. Let's each continue on our way."

"Then we can all go somewhere else together—hm? W-wait. What did you just say?"

"Why are you so flustered? I'm pretty sure I said I had something urgent to do. Is my memory failing me?"

"N-no. But Honglan is here…"

I raised a hand and cut Ju Wongong off.

I had already wasted enough time getting dragged into this nonsense. If I were the kind of man who lost his head over a beautiful woman and followed her wherever she went, I wouldn't have survived this long.

"Don't overdo the partying. You'd be better off going home and keeping your head down. See you."

I was about to turn away when Ju Wongong held something out to me.

"Wait! Then at least this."

"…?"

"I heard that His Highness Prince Shangshan received your autograph, Great Hero Jin. Please give me one as well…"

"…!"

At this rate, my fan café would be reaching Leaf Level 2 soon.[2162]

Chapter 455

"Cough, cough."

Hunched over like a shrimp, the old man coughed with difficulty.

Whenever he moved, the chill rising from the underground prison's cold stone floor seeped into his bones.

Yet no illness could take root in his body.

The several jiazi[2163] of internal energy accumulated in his dantian over the long years no longer obeyed his control, but they were more than enough to protect his aged body.

And that only enraged him further.

Damn it…!

The already ugly old man's features twisted into the face of a fiend.

Once, he had crossed the continent and left countless storms of blood in his wake. Now he was being treated like livestock that could be slaughtered at any moment.

"Then kill me! If you're going to subject me to such humiliation, just kill me already!"

As the old man writhed and let out a tearing scream, the chains binding his body tightly grated against one another.

But like the internal energy sealed within his dantian, the dozen or so iron balls attached to those chains did not budge an inch.

"You bastaaaardsss!"

Though his martial arts had been sealed and he could no longer display his former might, his innate viciousness remained unchanged.

The old man glared through the thick iron bars with bloodshot eyes. Faces that must have been laughing at him somewhere flashed before his eyes like hallucinations.

"You bastards…!"

A grudge etched into his bones and soul.

They had killed his two brothers, born on the same day and hour as him, with whom he had spent his entire life. The old man himself had been captured and subjected to every humiliation imaginable.

They had even crushed his testicles as though castrating livestock. Calling them mortal enemies did not begin to describe it.

"Fine. Then I'll survive, no matter what it takes."

Flames poured from the old man's eyes.

"I will escape this place and rip you bastards apart alive!"

[2163] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

His shout, thick with killing intent, echoed through the underground prison.

That was when a voice spoke.

“I heard your escape pledge. Quite moving.”

“…!”

When did he—?

The old man blinked. One of the faces that had flashed before his eyes moments ago was now staring at him from beyond the bars.

The smile on the young man’s lips sent a chill through his chest.

“Y-you…”

“How’s the busted part? Must hurt every time you take a piss.”

The old man almost nodded without realizing it.

But this young man’s name stood alongside the others at the very top of his kill list. He was someone the old man had to kill, whatever the cost.

The old man glared at him through the bars, eyes gleaming.

“If you’re curious, lift the seal on my martial arts right now. I’ll show you myself.”

“I’m not particularly curious about that…”

The smile on the young man’s lips—Jin Taekyung’s lips—vanished as if wiped away.

“You’ll have to tell me everything else you know, Third Fiend.”

In the modern world, torturing prisoners was classified as an illegal act. If such a fact became known, even a Great Nation would be condemned by the international community.

But this was Murim. The authority of the law was hazy, and the line between man and beast even hazier.

And as far as I was concerned, the Third Fiend was closer to a beast wearing human skin.

There’s no reason to hesitate.

He had harmed countless people over the course of many years.

He was a fiend who had slaughtered hundreds—thousands—of people merely to satisfy his bloodlust.

There was no room for flimsy morality on the bloody road he had walked, or in this damp, dark underground prison.

I stared coldly at the Third Fiend.

“Guhk… Hnggg…”

His body hung limp, bound to an iron chair.

Bloodstained saliva dripped from his open mouth, and his limbs, torn and broken all over, spasmed with pain.

"How is he?"

At my question, the old man examining him scratched his head with a bloodstained iron skewer.

"He has already reached his limit. At this point, we must assume he has confessed everything he knows."

If torture skill were divided into realm stages, I was barely First Rate. The old man before me was a Supreme Peak master.

He had handled prisoners with such efficient cruelty during the Great Faction War that Zhuge Gonghu, the Fan-Wisdom King, had taken note of his methods and invited him to join the Zhuge Clan after the war.

"If we keep going…"

"He will die. Without fail. And in this old man's opinion, beating him any further will yield nothing more."

The old man's voice rang with certainty.

The appearance of the Third Fiend, who had become half a corpse, and his aura, which seemed ready to go out at any moment, lent even greater weight to those words.

But this wasn't enough. I stared at the Third Fiend as he trembled, nearly senseless.

Is this really everything?

It wasn't as though he had known nothing.

For the first few shichen,[2164] he had held out through sheer spite. But as the torture neared its final stages, he had grown talkative enough to fill five bamboo slips with densely packed writing.

Yet most of it was useless or concerned events from the past, and the information I needed most had never come out.

The series of incidents happening in Hubei Province right now.

The Sea Serpent Society had fallen, and Donghu Stronghold had been massacred.

The casualties had already far exceeded a thousand, including innocent commoners who did not know even a single martial move or half a stance.

As far as I knew, only one group possessed both the power and the sheer brutality to commit such madness.

Dark Heaven.

The problem was that I could not get hold of their trail.

Where and how had they attacked the Sea Serpent Society and Donghu Stronghold? Where had they hidden the Moving Formation?

[2164] A shichen is a traditional time unit of roughly two hours.

And finally, where were the perpetrators now, and what were they doing?

“This won’t do.”

Muttering under my breath, I grabbed the unconscious Third Fiend by the wrist. The old man, who had been standing nearby with a bored expression, hurriedly tried to stop me.

“Great Hero, if you do that—!”

“It’s fine. I’m not trying to kill him.”

I sent internal energy through the Third Fiend’s wrist. As the warmth of Scorching Yang Qi flowed along his acupoints, color returned to his pale cheeks and his eyelids lifted.

My face appeared in his unfocused, trembling gray eyes.

“Y-you…”

“Wake up. It’s still too early.”

“J-just kill me.”

“Tell me everything you know, and you’ll get your wish. But if you insist on pretending to be a loyal servant…”

I poured more force into the faint stream of internal energy. The Third Fiend’s eyes flew open with a sharp gasp.

His body was already ruined inside and out. It could not endure the heat of Scorching Yang Qi.

“Ghk… Gack.”

His painful, gasping breaths carried the smell of meat being cooked. But I continued staring at the Third Fiend without wavering.

“That’s not the answer I want.”

“This old man—I have already told you everything.”

“Not that either.”

“Ghk. P-please…”

“If you can still hold out like this, you’re nowhere near death yet. Just like there’s still information I haven’t heard.”

“What else could you possibly want me to say…?”

“I’ve told you several times already. Everything about Dark Heaven. What’s happening in Hubei Province, and the Dongting Fisherman.”

“I told you, I don’t know—kuweeegh!”

With every exchange, the Scorching Yang Qi grew stronger.

The Third Fiend trembled violently, eyes rolling back until only the whites showed. A scream tore from his lips.

“Kill me! Hurry up and kill me! Even as a vengeful ghost, I’ll chew through your flesh and bones…!”

Damn it. That was as far as I could go.

I abruptly withdrew the internal energy I had been forcing into him. The Third Fiend immediately went limp, like a puppet with its strings cut.

Changing the flow, I gently stabilized his body from within. The old man, already standing by, quickly took his pulse and checked his condition.

“He’s a hard one to kill. Stopped right on the threshold of the afterlife.”

I knew. I had controlled my strength as carefully as possible to keep him alive.

He can’t die here.

The Third Fiend was one of the great fiends of the previous generation and a Supreme Peak master of Dark Heaven.

If we kept him alive and escorted him to Henan, there might be a way to learn even more information.

Of course, I couldn’t dismiss the possibility that those bamboo slips contained everything he knew.

No. That was probably the likeliest possibility.

If he still didn’t talk after all this… maybe he really has told us everything.

The mental strength and endurance of a Supreme Peak master defied imagination.

Yet the Third Fiend had begged me—someone no different from his mortal enemy—to stop. He had screamed for me to kill him instead.

And still, he had never changed his story.

I—I and my brothers only followed orders under the Demon Lord! I don’t know anything about Dark Heaven’s headquarters or what happened elsewhere, I tell you!

Remembering the cries he had repeated throughout the torture, I called out a name.

“Gung Gibang. Any news?”

Gung Gibang, leaning against the iron bars, shook his head.

“Nothing. Our Hubei branch still hasn’t found them.”

“Three Supreme Peak masters—or hundreds of people and ships—must have been mobilized. There’s no way they could’ve avoided attention. If we focus on outsiders, we might have a chance…”

“We already are, but it isn’t easy. Hundreds of large ships travel the Hubei stretch of the Yangtze every day, and the people moving by land are too numerous to count. And if this happened a good ten days ago… there’s a strong chance they’ve already left Hubei by one means or another.”

“Damn it.”

Unlike Shanxi Province, which was treated as a borderland, Hubei Province was part of the region known as the Central Plains, and its industries were well developed.

With merchants and travelers constantly pouring in and out of such a vast territory, even the Beggars’ Sect was bound to struggle.

Gung Gibang watched my expression, then spoke cautiously.

"Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin went to the Lower District Sect, so all we can do is hope they found something. Their findings probably won't be much different from those of our Hubei branch, but… we have to hold on to hope."

Gung Gibang was right.

Half a shichen later, Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin returned to the Zhuge Clan carrying a large bundle of bamboo slips.

A single man's sobriquet was written on the cord binding them together.

Dongting Fisherman.

"This…"

Hyuk Mujin swallowed hard before continuing.

"It seems the Lower District Sect had some sort of dispute with the Dongting Fisherman. They said they've been keeping a close watch on him for several years under the Sect Leader's orders… You should probably read it yourself."

I quickly skimmed the contents of the bamboo slips.

Their records on the Dongting Fisherman went back no fewer than three years, and the bundle in my hands contained only a portion of them.

The records from one month ago through today revealed one fact.

The Dongting Fisherman is still in Hubei Province.

Which meant…

Clatter!

I shoved the bamboo slips into my robe and immediately went in search of one man.

Zhuge Gyun, the Divine Marvel Dragon and Lesser Family Head of the Zhuge Clan, had been issuing orders in place of the Family Head, Zhuge Feng. His eyes widened at my noisy arrival.

"What brings you here in such haste? My ancestor Zhuge Wuhou said that a junzi[2165] should always conduct himself properly and remain tranquil…"

"Shut up. Are the people ready?"

"The people my fath—no, the Family Head mentioned are already prepared to leave. Do you intend to depart immediately?"

"Yeah. But I think I need to stop somewhere else first."

"Pardon? Where…?"

"Dongting Lake."

[2165] A junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright gentleman.

Chapter 456

“Dongting Lake, out of nowhere? What do you mean?”

Zhuge Gyun’s confusion lasted only a moment. Though he occasionally behaved like an eccentric, his mind was as sharp as one would expect from a scion of the Zhuge Clan.

His epithet, the Divine Marvel Dragon, had not been bestowed on him merely because of his deep understanding of mechanisms and formations.

“Are you trying to find the Dongting Fisherman?”

Several shichen[2166] earlier, when I first arrived at the Zhuge Clan, Zhuge Gyun had heard the full circumstances of the case from me. He also knew that the Dongting Fisherman had been identified as one of the culprits.

“Yeah.”

“Given how suddenly you’re acting… I assume your information came from the Beggars’ Sect and the Lower District Sect.”

“More precisely, the Lower District Sect. They’ve been watching the Dongting Fisherman for three years.”

“Not watching. Monitoring. Our family had also noticed that something had happened between the Dongting Fisherman and the Lower District Sect Leader.”

“Either way, it works in our favor. Read this.”

Zhuge Gyun took the bamboo slip from me, and his eyes moved rapidly across it.

He read every last word in mere moments, then rubbed his temple and muttered, “The Dongting Fisherman is still in Hubei Province?”

“That’s what the Lower District Sect’s intelligence says.”

“This is insufficient. According to what is written on this bamboo slip, the Lower District Sect has not determined the Dongting Fisherman’s exact whereabouts. They merely failed to detect him leaving Hubei Province.”

“I’ve considered that too. But what if the information is accurate?”

“If it is…”

The Dongting Fisherman, whom everyone believed to be dead, was alive and well somewhere in Hubei Province?

That could mean only one thing.

“If the Dongting Fisherman really is a Dark Heaven underling and one of the culprits who massacred Donghu Stronghold, then it would certainly be possible. No—in fact, it would make it even more certain that he is a culprit.”

Zhuge Gyun nodded gravely.

[2166] A shichen is a traditional time unit of roughly two hours.

“Indeed. If he were not affiliated with Dark Heaven, he would already have informed the world of the tragedy at Donghu Stronghold and requested assistance from our family and Wudang.”

After the Sea Serpent Society, three strongholds of the Yangtze River Channel League—including Donghu Stronghold—had been annihilated.

If we had not arrived when we did—and if it had not been for Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song and the swift ship under his command—the tragedy at Donghu Stronghold beyond Tianling Falls would have remained unknown for much longer.

“But one question remains. This is not something that can be concealed forever. It might take time, but the truth was bound to come out. If Dark Heaven had truly intended to cover it up, they would have handled everything more quietly, without drawing public attention. They could have laid the blame for the Sea Serpent Society’s destruction on the Yangtze River Channel League.”

He was right. The Zhuge Clan and Wudang had been unable to cross Tianling Falls only because they lacked vessels sturdy enough for the journey and skilled boatmen to pilot them.

Even if they could not rely on Mu Song and the river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold, they would eventually have found suitable men elsewhere.

Zhuge Gyun stared pensively at the bamboo slip before raising his head to look at me.

“Then why go this far?”

I took a drink from the cup on the table to wet my throat.

“Under ordinary circumstances, they would’ve done it to buy time.”

“Exactly. Dark Heaven would have needed time to escape. But the fact that the Dongting Fisherman is still in Hubei Province is strange.”

“Yeah. It’s strange. So strange that the pieces don’t fit.”

When I answered without hesitation, Zhuge Gyun’s eyebrows rose slightly.

“You have another theory.”

“I said under ordinary circumstances.”

“Then…”

“Dark Heaven isn’t made up of ordinary people. You experienced them in Henan, so you should know that.”

“…!”

“They throw a pebble first to draw everyone’s attention, then get a boulder ready. This won’t end with the Sea Serpent Society and three strongholds. They’re definitely after something bigger.”

Dark Heaven’s power and audacity defied common sense.

Two Supreme Peak masters of the previous generation, both counted among the Ten Kings, had already died. Thousands more had fallen in sprays of blood.

And the two blood-soaked disasters Dark Heaven had caused shared one clear objective.

“Divine artifacts…”

At Zhuge Gyun’s low murmur, I quietly nodded.

In Henan, Dark Heaven had stolen Shaolin Temple’s divine artifact, the Green Jade Buddha Staff. When they attacked Sichuan, they had attempted to seize the Myriad-Poison Ring.

Fortunately, their operation in Sichuan had failed, but what they were after was obvious.

Divine artifacts—or the destruction of the prestigious great sects known as the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families.

It was hard to believe that people like that had gone to such lengths merely to wipe out a sect like the Sea Serpent Society, whose members were just trying to make a living, and three strongholds.

It might have made sense if they had targeted the headquarters of the Yangtze River Channel League, where the Seafaring King was based.

Zhuge Gyun’s expression stiffened.

“Then the culprits, including the Dongting Fisherman, have ample reason to remain in Hubei Province.”

“It’s still only speculation, but for now, we have to assume they drew everyone’s attention elsewhere in preparation for something bigger. The delay was just a smokescreen meant to convince us they’d already left Hubei Province.”

“The darkest place is directly beneath the lamp… But could they not have already vanished through that bizarre Moving Formation?”

“You might as well tell me Cheongpung walked past a dumpling shop.”

“Oh. Now that you put it that way, I understand completely.”

I stared hard into empty space.

“What happened to the Sea Serpent Society and Donghu Stronghold was the pebble. The boulder comes next.”

The pond called Hubei Province was vast. Even if a pebble fell into it, the ripples would not travel far before subsiding.

If a boulder fell, however, it would send water surging into the air—and the fish in the pond would not escape unharmed.

We had to stop the boulder from falling before the pond was dyed with blood.

“I will inform the local authorities and Wudang in preparation for the worst. I will also strengthen our defenses inside and out.”

“Watch the government troops carefully. You’ve heard what happened in Sichuan, haven’t you?”

The forces of Dark Heaven, led by the Western Heaven Demon Lord, had disguised themselves as government troops and swept through the Tang Clan, Emei, and Qingcheng.

It was already common knowledge. There was no way Zhuge Gyun, the Lesser Family Head of the Zhuge Clan, could be unaware of it.

“I am already taking precautions, though I doubt they will use the same method twice.”

“Inform Donghu Stronghold too. The swift ship from Water Dragon Stronghold should be waiting at the Zaoyang ferry, so entrust the letter to our family retainers.”

A messenger pigeon would have been faster and more convenient, but it could be intercepted along the way. Besides, the Zhuge Clan had no messenger pigeons trained to fly to and from Donghu Stronghold.

The other two strongholds that had been able to communicate with Donghu Stronghold had already been wiped out, too.

The gruesome sea of corpses and blood flashed before my eyes, and my fist tightened before I realized it.

Shanxi. Henan. Sichuan. Then the monster wave in Sichuan Province in the modern world. Traveling between two worlds, I had already witnessed far too many deaths.

Scrape.

As I rose from my seat, Zhuge Gyun asked, “Are you leaving right now?”

“The sooner, the better. I don’t know where the Dongting Fisherman is, but we need to start at Dongting Lake and look for traces.”

“That will not be easy. The Dongting Fisherman spent his entire life around Dongting Lake, so he likely knows several secret refuges unknown to the rest of the world.”

I clenched my fist.

“Hey. Are you Dark Heaven?”

“Pardon?”

“I asked if you’re Dark Heaven.”

“Ah, no.”

“Then stop saying ominous things and cheer me on, you bastard.”

Zhuge Gyun glanced at my fist and answered at once.

“Yes, sir. For now, I will mobilize all of our family’s intelligence resources and cooperate with the Beggars’ Sect and the Lower District Sect to search every region outside Dongting Lake.”

“Do a good job. I’m leaving.”

I was about to turn away when I realized I had forgotten one important question.

“Wait. Does the Zhuge Clan have any divine artifacts?”

“Of course. There is the Four-Wheeled Cart our ancestor Zhuge Wuhou rode during his lifetime, the Twenty-Four Chapters on the Art of War, in which he compiled his insights, and the White Feather Fan.”

“…That’s quite a collection.”

I had no idea how impressive a wheelchair, a book, and a fan could be as divine artifacts, but it was worth checking just in case.

I turned to Zhuge Gyun.

“Let me see them for a minute. There’s something I need to confirm.”

“We had them, but we don’t anymore.”

“…?”

“The Twenty-Four Chapters on the Art of War were lost during a war, and the White Feather Fan crumbled with age. As for the Four-Wheeled Cart, I heard that one of our former Family Heads rode it and broke it around two hundred years ago. I cannot remember his name.”

“…”

What the fuck.

Was this some grand strategy to destroy their own treasures before Dark Heaven could steal them?

Judging by the artifacts themselves, they seemed to have been significant only because Zhuge Wuhou had left them behind. Still, the whole thing was absurd.

“The Four-Wheeled Cart is still here in its broken state. Would you like me to show it to you?”

“No. Forget it.”

I answered firmly and left the pavilion. Outside, beneath the night sky that had once again grown dark, three people stood waiting with all their preparations complete.

Or was it four?

“That bastard’s still breathing, right?”

“Yes, Benefactor.”

Just as I had in Sichuan, Cheongpung carried a wooden pack frame on his back. The Third Fiend lay atop it, every acupoint sealed and his body bound in chains.

“He is very weak, but he should be fine if I use my internal energy from time to time to bolster his vitality.”

“That’s enough.”

There was a simple reason for bringing the Third Fiend along. I wanted to find out whether there were any codes or markings that only members of Dark Heaven could recognize.

That was the sole value of keeping him alive.

“Let’s go to Dongting Lake.”

We left the Zhuge Clan and raced like comets along the straight highway.

The wind rushing over my body seemed tinged with the smell of blood.

Whoooosh!

We raced without conserving our strength.

Hyuk Mujin had less internal energy and an inferior movement technique compared to me, Cheongpung, and Gung Gibang, so he kept falling behind. But it was not much of a problem.

“Get on my back.”

Drenched in sweat from head to toe, Hyuk Mujin shook his head with effort.

“Huff, huff. No, sir. I can keep running!”

“I know you’re struggling. Get on.”

“Huff, I am truly fine. I am the Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan! I cannot cause trouble for my family or Captain—”

“Did a guy like you run around trying to pick up silver nyang[2167]?”

“…”

“Get on if you don’t want to die. Otherwise, I’m leaving you behind.”

“Yes, sir.”

Hyuk Mujin was a fairly large man, but I possessed an extraordinary Strength stat. Carrying one person while running was no great burden.

Why do I suddenly feel like Red Hare?[2168]

I don’t know how long we ran with that strange feeling.

The sky had been only slightly dim when we left the Zhuge Clan, but now it was completely dark. Even the travelers on the highway had disappeared.

After more than two shichen had passed, Gung Gibang, who had been exerting his movement technique at full strength, opened his mouth.

His words, reeking of filth and sickly sweetness, pierced my ears.

“Wuhan.”

Wuhan was the capital of Hubei Province, a city a stone’s throw from Dongting Lake.

But perhaps because of the recent string of ominous incidents, the streets that should have bustled all night were silent. Not even a rat showed its face.

Of course. No ordinary person wants to wander around at night and die like a dog for no reason.

[2167] A silver nyang is a historical unit of silver currency.

[2168] Red Hare is a famously swift horse associated with the Three Kingdoms era.

I was thinking that as we crossed Wuhan’s maze of streets when it happened.
“Dongting Lake! A ship has sunk in Dongting Lake!”
“…!”
A scream rang out in the distance, shattering the deep, dark silence.

Chapter 457

“Dongting Lake! A ship has sunk in Dongting Lake!”

“P-please, help us! People have fallen into the water!”

Clang, clang—!

Screams rang out in the distance, and the sharp peal of warning bells echoed through the darkness.

But another sound had reached my ears a moment earlier.

Ding.

This is…

A familiar notification.

A chill of foreboding ran down my spine. I stared at the translucent System window floating before my eyes.

SYSTEM

An unexpected Quest, The Tragedy of Dongting Lake, has been generated!

You cannot refuse the Quest!

Quest

The Tragedy of Dongting Lake

Dongting Lake is one of the most celebrated scenic destinations under heaven.

Poets and men of letters climb Yiyang Tower to enjoy its beautiful vistas and compose verses about nature, while those blessed with power and wealth launch large, splendid pleasure boats and revel for days and nights.

But today, this clear, blue-green lake is filled with shattered wreckage and corpses.

Unless someone steps forward, those still alive will meet the same fate!

Grade: Peak

Restriction: Jin Taekyung

Mission: Rescue People (Incomplete)

Reward: ???

Failure: The deaths of the people

A considerable amount of time has already passed. You must rescue the people before it is too late!

As I finished reading the final line of the Quest window, a small holographic window appeared in the air.

SYSTEM

Time Limit: 45 minutes 36 seconds

Damn it. Less than an hour.

If we waste even a moment… everyone will die.

There wasn't even time to wonder how such a catastrophe had happened. Someone's life might depend on every minute—maybe even every second.

I drew as much internal energy as possible from my dantian and opened my mouth.

"From this moment on, run to Dongting Lake as if your lives depend on it. We save the people first."

Whoosh!

No one answered. Their faces simply hardened as they accelerated again.

Using the distant cries and warning bells as our compass, we ran and ran.

By the time the first digit of the time limit changed from four to two, we could finally see it.

Fwoom, roar!

Dozens of vessels, large and small, burned across the broad waters, engulfed in flames as countless shouts rang out from every direction.

"Bring boats! Even a ferryboat will do, so hurry!"

"We don't have enough boatmen!"

"More! Bring more people! Things have come to this, so where are the military vessels? What are they doing?"

"Ahhh! Ahhh!"

With every step, the scene came into sharper focus.

More than a hundred people raced frantically along the shore of Dongting Lake, while several small ferryboats moved slowly across the water.

That won't be enough.

They were doing everything they could, but their efforts fell woefully short of what was needed to rescue so many people.

Even I, with martial arts that more than qualified me as a superhuman, felt my breath catch at the sight.

How are we supposed to save them?

I had heard plenty about the vastness of Dongting Lake, but seeing it for myself, I realized it was far larger than I had imagined.

There was no way the vessels would be packed close together on such a vast lake. Judging from the distances between them, every ship must have been out enjoying itself at least several hundred zhang[2169] from the others.

And this was only what I could see immediately. How many more boats and people were submerged beyond my sight?

Damn it.

I bit down hard on my lip and accelerated.

The murmurs grew louder as people spotted us racing toward them like the wind.

A military officer who appeared to belong to the local authorities cried out urgently.

“A-are you martial artists? Please, help—”

“No time for explanations. We’re borrowing some boats.”

“Pardon?”

Leaving the dumbfounded officer behind, I thundered an order.

“Gung Gibang, Hyuk Mujin! Smash the ferryboats!”

Whoosh!

There was no hesitation or doubt in either man’s movements.

Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin shot past me with forceful shouts, unleashing palm force and sword strikes.

Slash, boom!

The two ferries being hurriedly moved by the people were transformed into hundreds of pieces of wood in an instant.

The military officer, momentarily stunned by what had happened before he could even say anything, screamed,

“What in the world are you doing!”

Shocked cries erupted from every direction.

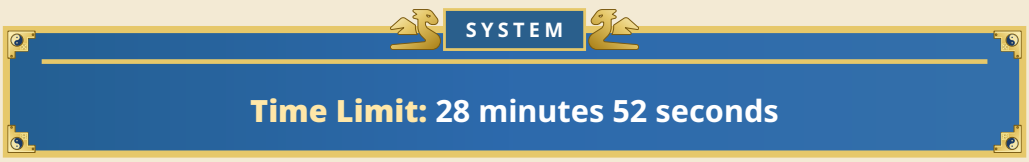
“T-the ferryboats…!”

“Those bastards are the villains who caused this disaster! They must be trying to keep us from rescuing the people!”

Shock and anger spread rapidly. All manner of curses poured in from every side, along with gazes brimming with killing intent.

But I didn’t care.

No—it would be more accurate to say I had no time to care.



Barely thirty minutes remained.

Explaining myself now would only cost more lives.

[2169] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length, approximately 3.3 meters (10.8 ft).

Fortunately, there were three martial artists here who could understand my intentions and act on them.

“Cheongpung, Gung Gibang!”

“Got it!”

“Yes, Benefactor!”

Realizing what I meant, Gung Gibang and Cheongpung scooped up the ferryboat fragments and hurled them with all their strength toward the dark waters of Dongting Lake.

Whoosh, splash!

Dozens of wooden fragments sliced through the darkness and scattered across the lake.

“W-what!”

“Could this be…?”

A few people finally realized what we were doing, their eyes widening. But there still weren’t enough fragments.

Some might even sink before our feet reached them.

In that case…

We’ll have to make the path as we go.

The instant I reached that decision, I stamped down hard.

Boom!

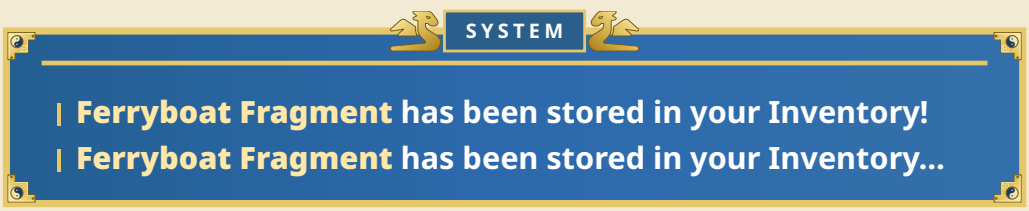
The sand and dust piled along the shore surged into the air all at once, making the unprepared people cough.

Taking advantage of the moment when everyone’s vision was obscured, I reached out.

As my hand met damp, solid wood, I spoke the command only I could use.

Store in Inventory.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



Notifications rang in my ears as the wooden fragments dissolved into thin air.

I left behind only enough fragments to avoid arousing suspicion, then shouted forcefully,

“Cheongpung and Gung Gibang, come with me! Hyuk Mujin, stay here and gather boats and people!”

“Y-yes, sir!”

Hyuk Mujin had been gasping for breath for some time now, and he barely managed to squeeze out the words. By then, Cheongpung, Gung Gibang, and I were already shooting toward the dark waters of Dongting Lake.

Whoosh!

Heat surged from my lower abdomen and flowed down into my legs.

Formidable internal energy flooded a body whose muscles and elasticity were so perfect they could be mistaken for a Heavenly Martial Physique.

Now!

Boom!

A massive shock wave burst from my toes, pressed down against the ground, and shoved back the rippling water. Sand and gravel scattered as dust, while a cool wind swept across my entire body.

If I reached out, I felt as though I could pluck the stars scattered across the night sky from the heavens.

But only for a moment.

Every leap was followed by a fall.

Whoooosh!

The black water, surging violently, rushed toward us.

My eyes, as keen as a wild animal's, easily picked out a half-submerged piece of wood.

Tap. Thump!

My landing was light, but the second leap that followed was heavy.

Cheongpung, Gung Gibang, and I launched ourselves forward again.

Using the scattered ferryboat fragments as stepping stones, we leaped once, twice, three times…

Only after repeating the process several times did the vessel that had seemed so far away draw close enough to make out clearly.

But as the distance shrank, the foreboding in my heart grew.

I can't feel any life force.

There were no survivors' screams, no movement—nothing that should have been there if anyone was still alive.

And it did not take long for the foreboding I felt to become reality.

Tap.

On the vessel, most of whose hull was already submerged, Gung Gibang and Cheongpung landed on the bow and muttered like men groaning in pain.

"This is…"

"…Benefactor."

Their voices sounded faint, as if they were coming from hundreds of zhang[2170] away.

In that suffocating silence, I stared blankly around me.

Everywhere I looked, countless corpses floated among the wreckage of shattered ships.

They were dead.

All of them.

A potbellied man who appeared to be a merchant, dressed in splendid silk. A gaunt, shabby-looking boatman. Musicians and courtesans who seemed to have been hired to liven up the festivities.

There were hundreds within sight alone.

No lively music drifted across the black water. No laughter.

All that remained was destruction and death—and the fear plainly etched into the faces of the dead.

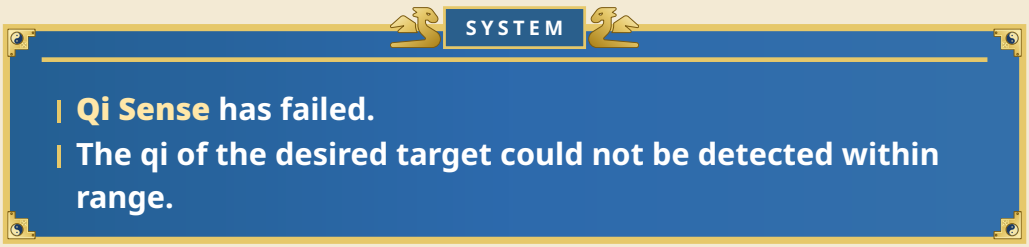
How could this have happened?

For a moment, my mind went completely blank.

As if possessed, I raced across the water from fragment to fragment, using Qi Sense without restraint in search of even a single survivor.

But…

Beep.



The System was more merciless than ever.

The translucent holographic window and grating failure notification told me that there was not a single survivor nearby.

“What in the world…”

I muttered in despair—and then a thought flashed through my mind like lightning.

Wait. The System?

I hurriedly raised my head and stared into the air.

The translucent holographic window was still there.

[2170] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length, approximately 3.3 meters (10.8 ft).

SYSTEM

"…!"

It felt as if someone had struck me hard in the back of the head.

If there truly were no survivors, the Quest should have been canceled or a failure notification should have appeared. The System was faster and more direct than anything.

But the Quest was still in progress, and the System window displaying the time limit hadn't disappeared.

That could only mean one thing.

As I stood there, frozen stiff, Gung Gibang spoke to me in a cautious voice.

"Unfortunately, it seems pointless to keep searching for survivors…"

"There are survivors."

"What?"

"We just can't see them. There are survivors somewhere much farther away. I'm sure of it."

Gung Gibang had been about to say something, but his expression hardened when he saw the certainty on my face.

Cheongpung spoke in a voice more serious than usual.

"If what you say is true, Benefactor…"

"Then we find them and save them. No matter what it takes."

Gung Gibang stared at me for a moment, then nodded.

"We'll have to split up. If we tear apart the sunken boats around here and use the pieces, we might be able to keep going for another half a shichen.[2171]"

"You have fifteen minutes. Search as far as you can before then. If you don't find any survivors, come back."

The time limit showed how much time the survivors had left. Searching beyond that would be meaningless.

My unusually firm tone puzzled them, but they soon accepted the order without another word.

"We'll do that."

"Fifteen minutes. I'll remember, Benefactor."

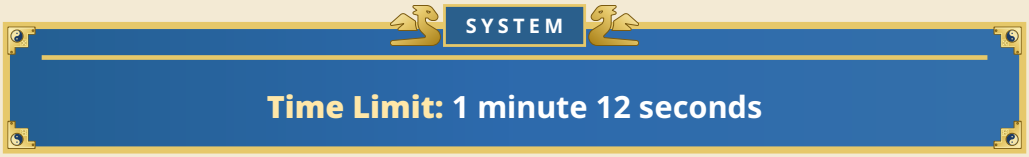
"Then we split up and each take a different direction. See you soon."

Thump, whoosh!

With that, I kicked off the bow and leaped.

[2171] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Watching the time limit dwindle by the second, I pushed my internal energy and senses to their limits and raced on and on across Dongting Lake, vast as the open sea.



Am I too late?

And just as I was about to give up on everything—

“P-please, save me…”

A tiny, faint voice reached my ears.

Chapter 458

P-please, save me…

Like a dying ember, the voice was tiny and faint.

But that alone was enough. My heart, weighed down by the helplessness of having failed to save anyone, began pounding fiercely, and strength surged through my limp body.

I launched myself toward the voice.

Inventory: Open. Summon!

Thud!

One of the few remaining fragments of the ferryboat skimmed across the moon's reflection on the water.

I leaped through the air like a bird, drew up the last of my internal energy, and focused it in my eyes.

My drastically enhanced vision took in the scene below with perfect clarity.

That's…

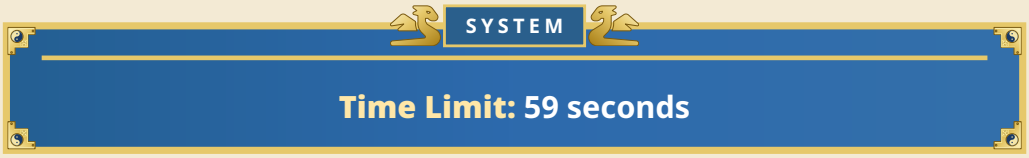
Wreckage and corpses.

Though the vessel had been smashed apart beyond recognition, there was no doubt it had once been the largest and most splendid ship I had seen on Dongting Lake.

There's a survivor somewhere among them.

The problem was that there were far too many corpses and pieces of wreckage in sight.

But there was no time to hesitate.



Fifty-nine seconds. The survivor's life depended on this brief span of less than a minute.

I closed my eyes and steadied my breathing. Then I drew up every last bit of my internal energy, which was already nearly depleted.

Fwooooooosh!

Qi Sense.

The Scorching Yang Qi extending from my entire body raced across the rippling water.

It swept through more than a hundred corpses whose souls had already departed and the countless pieces of wreckage, searching every inch.

And finally—

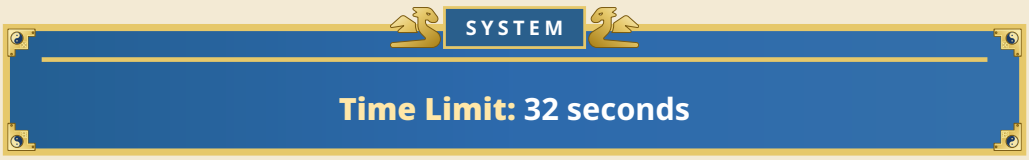
"…!"

I saw it.

No—I felt it.

Dozens of zhang away,[2172] a faint presence was sinking farther beneath the surface with every passing moment.

I opened my eyes halfway.



The Scorching Yang Qi circulating through my body rushed toward my lower half.

When I stepped on empty air with the tips of my toes, the compressed air exploded outward, and a cold wind swept across my entire body.

Boom! Fwooooooosh!

I shot forward like a meteor. The wind split apart, and space vanished.

The scenery flashed past on either side, but my gaze remained fixed on a single point.

The rough, surging black water.

There was a survivor in there.

Damn it. I can't even swim.

The thought had barely crossed my mind when the waters of Dongting Lake slammed into my entire body.

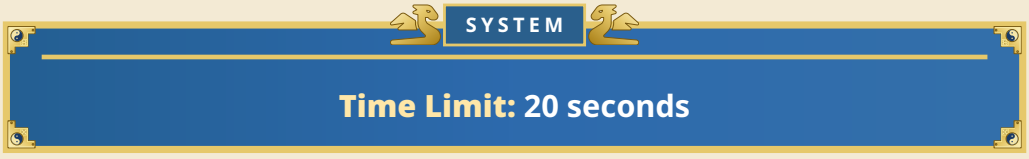
Splash! Gurgle!

The impact knocked the breath out of me.

If I had not learned martial arts, my bones would have broken and my internal organs would have been badly jarred.

I sank beneath the surface, trailing a cloud of bubbles.

A school of fish scattered in alarm at the sudden arrival of an unwelcome visitor, revealing two figures slowly sinking into the depths.



More. More. More…

I summoned every last ounce of strength and pushed forward. Grabbing the wrists of the two unconscious, limp figures, I surged upward with all my might.

[2172] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length, approximately 3.3 meters or 10.9 ft.

Ten seconds. Nine, eight…

The faint moonlight reflected on the surface drew closer.

My arms and legs felt as heavy as if iron balls had been tied to them, while the two people in my hands weighed like thousand-catty boulders.[2173]

And then—

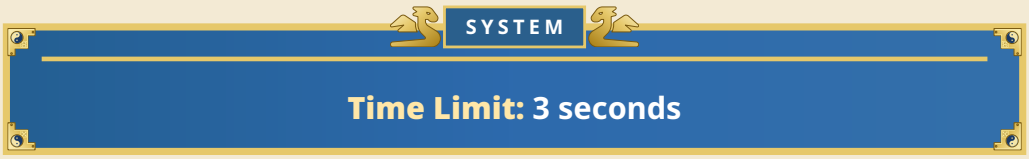
Splash!

“Puaaah!”

I expelled the breath I had been holding.

Air cold enough to sting flowed deep into my lungs.

But pulling the survivors out of the water did not mean everything was over.



In that moment, I instinctively realized what I had to do.

Save them.

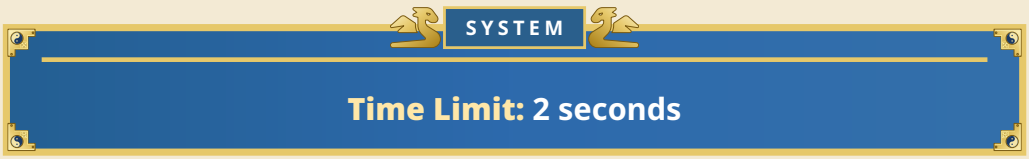
That single thought moved my body, which had briefly gone still.

I thrust both palms, infused with what little internal energy I had left, toward the two people.

Boom!

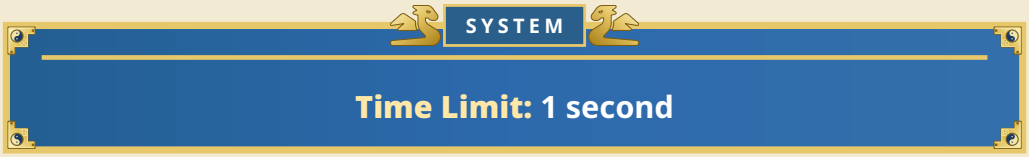
Their bodies jerked, and water splashed.

But the survivors showed no response. Instead, the number on the System window floating in the air changed.



One more time…

Boom!



Everything slowed down.

That paltry digit, 1, seemed larger and heavier than ever, crushing me beneath its weight.

I stared blankly at the System window, eyes wide, when—

[2173] A catty is a traditional unit of weight. Here, a thousand catties is approximately 500 kg or 1,100 lb.

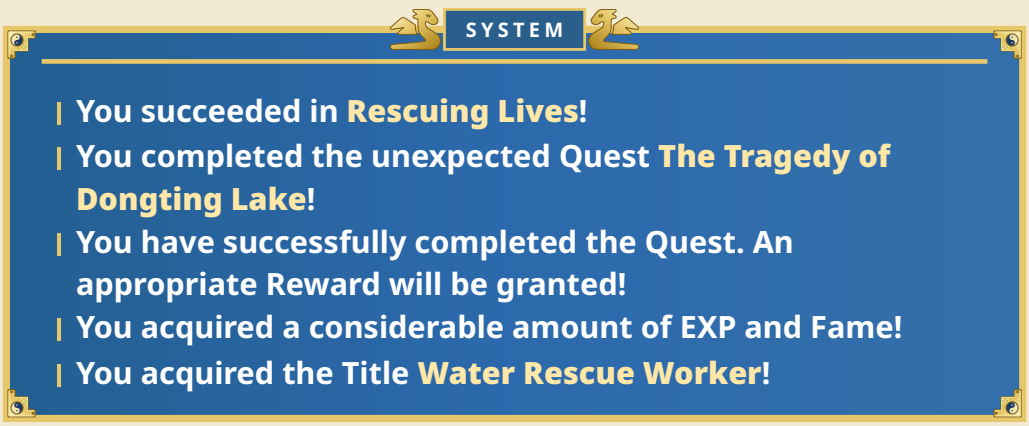
"Puh."

"Cough, cough."

The survivors finally began breathing again. At the same moment, the System window froze just as it was about to change to its final number.

Then a bell rang out like a celebratory salute.

Ding.



As the notifications rang in my ears, I muttered,

"Fuuuck."

Joy and relief at having finally succeeded were secondary. Worn down by the forced march that had begun at the Zhuge Clan, my body felt unbearably heavy.

Maybe it was because the tension I'd barely managed to hold suddenly let go.

...Damn it. It'll take forever to get back to land.

At this rate, would I end up needing to be rescued too?

I was floating there with the two survivors, buoyed by the water, when—

Whoooooosh!

Something sliced through the water in the distance as fast as a jet ski and stopped right in front of me.

A pure-white body and scales, along with two horns.

"A water snake...? No, a Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake?"

Hiss. Hiss. Hiss-hiss!

No, don't go!

I hurriedly shouted at the creature as it flicked its tongue and turned away.

"Hey! Hey! Water snake! Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake!"

Hiss!

"You little bastard, did you just spit at me—wait."

Was this its way of showing that it was sulking?

One thought suddenly came to mind, and I opened my mouth in an earnest yet cautious voice.

“Mimi… Mimi-chan?”

Hiss-rik! Hiss-ririk!

Only then did the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake—or rather, Mimi-chan—nod in satisfaction and extend its tail toward me as if telling me to grab on.

Right on cue, someone shouted from far away.

“Mimi! Rescue Benefactor!”

Hiss-rik!

“…”

Yeah, fuck it. I didn’t care what the move was called. Just get me out of here.

I sat on a damp rock and stared at the rippling water.

Two people. Only two.

Of the countless people who had buried their bones in Dongting Lake today, the two I had saved were the only survivors.

…Only two out of all those people.

I had suspected it from the moment the Quest was completed, but reality was even more brutal and merciless than I had imagined.

And the countless deaths left behind by today’s tragedy had given rise to even greater sorrow.

“Ugh…”

“Sniff, sob!”

“Oh, poor Chil-Sam’s father!”

“What kind of monstrous bastard could have done this?”

By then, over a thousand people had gathered along the shore of Dongting Lake, giving voice to every kind of emotion.

A Confucian scholar lamented, unable to continue speaking. Behind a government soldier clutching a fallen comrade’s corpse and weeping came the wails of a woman with an infant strapped to her back. An old man, the veins standing out on his neck, even swung his long-stemmed tobacco pipe at some unseen culprit.

There was no longer any laughter or singing to be found at Dongting Lake, one of the most famous scenic sites under heaven.

Only the sorrow and lamentation of those left behind remained, along with the anger carried in all those emotions.

But nothing changed.

The waters of Dongting Lake had grown calm, as if nothing had happened, while the faint dawn mist spreading across the lake created a beautiful scene.

Is this what the Wuling Peach Blossom Spring, where immortals are said to live, looks like?

I stared silently at the scene before me, then spoke without warning.

“This feels like… something, doesn’t it?”

I was not talking to myself.

Cheongpung, who had not left my side for more than fifteen minutes, answered,

“Yes. It feels like shit.”

Under normal circumstances, I would have snorted with laughter despite myself. But now, there was only emptiness.

I fidgeted with a pebble and asked,

“I only said ‘something.‘ I didn’t know Cheongpung knew how to swear.”

“I didn’t at first, but I know a little now. I learned by watching someone.”

“You’d better keep that a secret from Great Hero Mae Jonghak.”

“Why, Benefactor?”

“Why do you think? How would you feel if Mimi suddenly called you a fucking bastard one day?”

“Hmm. I don’t think I’d like it.”

“…Wouldn’t most people be surprised that a snake was talking before getting angry? Either way, you’d be surprised and angry. Great Hero Mae Jonghak would feel the same.”

“Oh. I see.”

“Yeah. That’s how it is.”

“What should I do if I accidentally swear in front of Grandpa?”

“Say Gung Gibang taught you. Or Hyuk Mujin.”

“Okay.”

Silence descended.

That conversation had been nothing more than whatever nonsense came to mind. I had felt that I needed to say something—anything. Maybe doing so would make things a little better.

Both Cheongpung and I knew the truth.

We also knew that none of this would make us feel any better.

“Fuck…”

I muttered the curse like a lament.

I did not know whether today was simply an unusual day, or whether those creatures also understood the circumstances and were grieving.

There was no birdsong.

Only the wails and sobs of the people filled the air around us.

I listened quietly to those stifling, unbearable sounds, then clenched the pebble in my palm as hard as I could.

Crack. Crunch.

A handful of powder spilled from my fist.

No—it was carried by a breeze that had blown in from somewhere and settled lightly on the surface of the water.

As if they were mortal remains imbued with someone's spirit.

Cheongpung watched in silence before suddenly speaking.

"Benefactor."

"What?"

"What should I do at times like this?"

"…"

"So many people have died. In Henan, in Sichuan, at Donghu Stronghold, and today, here."

His voice trembled faintly as he continued.

"I keep thinking about the dead. And I get angry. I hate the people who keep killing others, and I feel pathetic because I can't do anything."

"…I was like that too. No, I still am."

"What did you do whenever you felt this way, Benefactor?"

"Me?"

I turned my head and finally met Cheongpung's gaze.

His usually crystal-clear eyes were swirling with a mixture of emotions.

Within that confusion, I saw my past self—and the present me staring at Cheongpung now.

Was I like this?

The person I saw reflected in Cheongpung's eyes was simply impassive.

I was not exhausted like Gung Gibang or Hyuk Mujin, nor was I trembling with anger and sorrow like those who had lost their families and companions.

No, it was not that I could no longer feel emotions.

I had merely learned to contain them.

There I stood, like a rock battered again and again over the years, worn and ground down until it had finally grown accustomed to the blows.

"Who knows? What did I do back then?"

After thinking for a moment, I slowly continued.

"I wasn't any different from you, Cheongpung. I swore nonstop at those bastards who deserved to die, blamed myself for my helplessness, and then made a vow."

"A vow?"

"Yeah. A vow."

I raised a finger and pointed at the grieving people and the corpses laid out along the shore.

“I vowed to kill every last bastard who did this. That was my vow.”

“…!”

“I’m no saint. I won’t be satisfied until I pay them back at least in equal measure. This time is no different.”

The words slipped from my lips in a dry, cold voice that sounded foreign, almost as if it belonged to someone else.

Just then—

“Captain.”

Hyuk Mujin approached us, exhaustion plainly visible on his face.

“The survivors have regained consciousness.”

“That’s good. Both of them?”

“No, sir. Only one of them, for now.”

It was unfortunate, but I had suspected as much. The treatment I had given them after the rescue had only been an emergency measure.

“Then let’s go.”

“Yes, sir. This way.”

Cheongpung and I followed Hyuk Mujin.

At last, we came face-to-face with the survivor who had regained consciousness.

“We’ve met again rather quickly, haven’t we?”

At my greeting, Honglan, the dazzlingly beautiful singing courtesan, bowed with the utmost respect.

“It is an honor to see you, Benefactor.”

Chapter 459

A flower's natural beauty does not fade merely because it has been drenched in water.

The same was true of Honglan. She looked haggard after everything she had endured, yet even so, she was as lovely as a hydrangea blossom.

"It is an honor to see you, Benefactor."

At that moment, I finally understood what people meant when they described a voice as sounding like rolling jade beads.

Her face, bare of makeup, was dazzlingly fair, and beneath her long lashes shone two eyes like morning stars.

"Good heavens."

"How can anyone be this beautiful…?"

Exclamations rose from every direction.

Those admiring Honglan's beauty hurriedly closed their mouths and left when they noticed my gaze.

Perhaps they were ashamed of behaving that way while hundreds of people had been drowned.

Then again, it also showed just how extraordinary Honglan's beauty was—that it could make them forget everything that had happened.

If we weren't in a situation like this, I wouldn't have been any different.

I composed myself and spoke.

"I'm glad you regained consciousness. How are you feeling?"

Honglan lowered her head slightly before answering.

"Although I cannot compare to my Benefactor, this lowly woman has also trained in martial arts. I do not seem to have much trouble moving."

From what I had sensed, her martial arts barely qualified as First Rate.

She might not have been skilled enough to be called a seasoned First Rate master, but a martial artist who had strengthened her body and cultivated internal energy possessed far greater vitality than any ordinary civilian.

Thank heavens.

Honglan's being a martial artist had been a stroke of incredible luck, both for her and for the other survivor we had rescued with her.

I asked the military officer who was still standing nearby,

"Where is Ju Wongong?"

Ju Wongong. A carefree distant relative of the imperial family who had taken a pleasure boat out onto Dongting Lake despite the troubled mood of the times.

He was the other survivor.

“If you mean Young Master Ju, we placed him under heavy guard and moved him somewhere safe. According to the physician, he is out of immediate danger, but no one can say when he will regain consciousness.”

He was the same military officer who had been directing everyone when we first arrived at Dongting Lake.

Responsible for the security and defense of Dongting Lake, one of the major areas of Hubei Province, he continued with a rigid expression.

“When we reported what happened, the City Lord was furious. Though the attempt failed, trying to assassinate a member of the imperial family is among the gravest of crimes. We will immediately mobilize the entire fleet and every soldier in the city to make an example of these insolent rebels—”

“Assassinating a member of the imperial family wasn’t their objective.”

“What?”

I stared at the confused officer and continued.

“They’re called Dark Heaven. You may have heard of them.”

“Dark Heaven…? Aren’t they a gang of thugs that has been causing trouble in the martial world recently?”

“A gang of thugs?”

A scoff escaped me at his choice of words.

Dark Heaven’s name had begun spreading among ordinary people after the Shaolin Bloodshed, but the officer before me had no idea how powerful or terrifying they truly were.

Gung Gibang, standing beside me, spoke with an incredulous expression.

“Officer, did you know that this ‘gang of thugs’ killed Master Hong Dao, the Abbot of Shaolin Temple[2174] and the Dharma King?”

“Th-that…”

“The Poison King, Great Hero Tang Sadok, the Grand Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan, was killed too. So was the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun of Emei Sect. Three Supreme Peak masters of the previous generation who once shook the martial world, along with more than two thousand martial artists, are dead. And you call them a gang of thugs?”

“I-I heard those rumors, but I did not know the full extent of their power. Then are you saying Dark Heaven was responsible for this?”

“That’s enough.”

I raised a hand to stop Gung Gibang, then addressed the officer, whose face had turned red with embarrassment.

[2174] Shaolin Temple is a Buddhist monastery known for its martial arts tradition.

“Regardless, my point is that Ju Wongong was not their target.”

“Th-then what makes you think that?”

“If Dark Heaven had wanted Ju Wongong dead, he would already be gone from this world.”

“…!”

“If they wanted to kill him, they could have done it any way they pleased. He couldn’t have stopped them even if they ambushed him in broad daylight. Why wait until he took a pleasure boat out onto Dongting Lake, then destroy it along with all the other vessels? Why not even confirm whether their target was dead or alive?”

To Dark Heaven, Ju Wongong’s life was like an object in a cloth bundle—something they could take out or put away whenever they pleased.

Besides, there was no particular reason for them to target a distant imperial relative who had committed a crime and been exiled.

If their goal was to create chaos, the Emperor or Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao would have been far more attractive targets.

I spoke firmly.

“Their objective wasn’t to assassinate a member of the imperial family. Ju Wongong was merely one of the fish that happened to get caught in the net they cast.”

“Then what in the world were they after…?”

“We’ll find out once we catch the culprit.”

“What?”

“I mean the culprit who carried this out directly. Dark Heaven being behind everything is already a foregone conclusion.”

The officer had been staring blankly with his mouth open. Now he hurriedly asked,

“G-Great Hero, are you saying you know who the culprit is?”

“There is someone I suspect, but testimony from someone who saw it happen firsthand would be more reliable.”

I turned my head and looked at Honglan.

With Ju Wongong hovering between life and death, she was the only witness who held the key to unraveling everything.

“Did you see the culprit?”

The question was brief, but it was enough. With everyone’s eyes fixed on her, Honglan’s red lips slowly parted.

“Yes.”

“…!”

“…!”

Shock and agitation spread through the room in an instant. Amid the commotion, I clenched my fist tightly.

Finally.

The string of incidents that had begun with the Sea Serpent Society. The bastard—or bastards—behind them had never shown so much as a hair.

Now they were finally beginning to reveal themselves.

I couldn't let go of this tail now that I had found it. I had to seize it with all my strength, drag the body out after it, and finish the job.

Remembering the countless corpses they had left behind, I asked again.

"Tell us exactly what you saw."

"It was…"

A shallow furrow appeared on Honglan's smooth, unlined brow.

She seemed to be recalling what had happened. After hesitating for a moment and steadying her breathing, she began to speak.

"Everything happened in an instant. The festivities were in full swing when the two military vessels nearby sank one after the other, only moments apart. That was how it began."

I listened closely to Honglan's story.

Ju Wongong might have been a distant relative, but he was still a member of the imperial family. The two military ships assigned to escort him had been overwhelmed by a sudden ambush, and the pleasure boat, where the festivities had been reaching their peak, had fallen into chaos as well.

"But no one could stop it. Nothing was visible, yet the ship suddenly tilted with a tremendous roar. Then a single streak of Force flew in from somewhere and swept through the vessel. That was all it took."

"Force…!"

"I am certain. That single attack killed most of the Peak masters guarding Young Master Ju and the martial artists of Qingxia Hall.[2175]"

The scene seemed to unfold before my eyes.

Nothing was more destructive than Force. Even someone who had never seen it before would recognize that dazzling light for what it was the moment they faced it.

The same was true of Honglan, and it must have been an attack that Ju Wongong's guards and the bumbling martial artists of Qingxia Hall[2176] had been powerless to stop.

Perhaps because she was recalling that horrifying moment, Honglan's voice began to tremble faintly.

[2175] Qingxia Hall is an unofficial Hubei social club formed by the children of influential families.

[2176] Qingxia Hall is an unofficial Hubei social club formed by the children of influential families.

“But in the final moment, the guards risked their lives to push Young Master Ju away, and I embraced him before throwing myself into the river.”

Honglan’s quick thinking had saved both her and Ju Wongong.

Most of those who froze in terror were slaughtered soon afterward. Those who were still breathing could not long endure the bitter cold of the night or the injuries they had suffered in the fall.

And then…

Honglan said that, through the black waters of Dongting Lake, she had seen something rapidly receding into the distance.

“It was a person. Just one.”

“…!”

The tail had finally revealed itself. I bit my lip hard and asked again.

“Are you certain?”

“How could I lie to you, Benefactor? It was only for the briefest moment, but I saw him clearly with my own two eyes.”

Honglan was the sole witness, and she was also a martial artist who had reached the First Rate realm. If she was that certain, it was highly likely to be true.

That’s right. It was him.

Just as one man came to mind, the military officer, who had been listening with a dazed expression, abruptly spoke.

“A-are you all out of your minds? No matter how powerful martial artists may be, this is not land. This is Dongting Lake! Dongting Lake is as deep and vast as the open sea!”

“Does anyone here not know that?”

Gung Gibang muttered the words like a sigh, while Hyuk Mujin clicked his tongue.

“And?”

“What do you mean, ‘and’? I have heard plenty about the miraculous abilities of martial artists like you, but this is absurd! Even the water bandits of the Yangtze River Channel League whom I encountered from time to time were never capable of such feats. How could anyone swim so quickly across such a vast expanse of water, much less sink dozens of vessels single-handedly, including the Great Nation’s military vessels—”

“He could. If he is the man I’m thinking of.”

A clear voice rang out. Under everyone’s gaze, Honglan slowly parted her lips.

“He is a master of water arts who can breathe like a fish, swim faster than one, and easily sink dozens of vessels by himself. I do not know how formidable the water bandits you encountered may have been, but here on Dongting Lake, even the Seafaring King himself could not stand against him.”

Honglan’s gaze turned toward the blue-green waters beyond the camp.

Dongting Lake. A scenic site known throughout the land for its long history and beautiful landscapes.

And one old fisherman who had guarded Dongting Lake all his life.

No.

A Supreme Peak master of the previous generation, and a master of water arts who stood shoulder to shoulder with the Seafaring King.

I quietly murmured his alias.

“The Dongting Fisherman.”

“…!”

The Lower District Sect’s information had been correct. The Dongting Fisherman had not yet left Hubei Province.

He had faked his death and remained here at Dongting Lake, hiding in plain sight while evading everyone’s suspicion and attention.

And at last, I had found Dark Heaven’s tail—the Dongting Fisherman.

I’ve finally made it this far. You damn old bastard.

We had already paid far too high a price in lives. Before any more time passed, I had to capture the Dongting Fisherman and uncover every detail of Dark Heaven’s movements and plans.

It was the only way to prevent an even greater tragedy.

That was why Honglan’s next words were like a torch lighting the path ahead.

“Did you know, Benefactor, that the Dongting Fisherman has hidden secret refuges throughout Dongting Lake?”

“Are you saying you might know where they are?”

“I do not know their exact locations, but I know several places where they might be. Once you have finished preparing, please tell me. This humble woman can guide you there herself.”

“…!”

I clenched my fist tightly. Then I immediately sprang to my feet.

“Let’s go. Right now.”

Chapter 460

The weather was bad in more ways than one.

The waters of Dongting Lake, which had swallowed dozens of vessels and claimed lives overnight, were rough, and the wind blowing in from the distance was violent.

Even the old boatman who knew Dongting Lake like the back of his hand seemed to think that setting out in such weather was a terrible idea.

“I—I can’t do it, sirs.”

Those were the first words from the boatman, who had clearly been dragged here against his will. He continued with an anxious look on his face.

“The places you wish to visit are unusually narrow, with treacherous currents even by Dongting Lake’s standards… In weather like this, it’s simply impossible.”

“That is precisely why we are asking for your help. Merchant ships and military vessels may not be able to enter, but a sturdy ferryboat piloted by the finest boatman on Dongting Lake should manage it.”

“No matter how you put it…”

“Boatman?”

“Y-yes?”

“Please.”

A man was still a man, no matter how old he got.

Dazed by Honglan’s gentle voice and dazzling beauty, the old boatman did not come to his senses until after he had climbed aboard the ferryboat.

“I must be mad. Completely mad. I know what happened last night, yet here I am, about to set out on the water. What will I do if we run into the Hidden Shadow Ghost…?”

The Hidden Shadow Ghost?

An unfamiliar name had slipped into his grumbling. I turned and found the terrified boatman staring back at me.

He swallowed hard before answering.

“Just as the name suggests, it’s a ghostly creature. Plenty of boatmen have fallen victim to it lately. One was an old friend of mine. He went out at night hoping to earn a few extra coins, and then…”

The old boatman stared at the rippling waters of Dongting Lake with eyes steeped in fear.

“They call it the Hidden Shadow Ghost because its victims die without ever seeing so much as its shadow. This is only the humble opinion of an old man, but it must be responsible for everything that’s been happening lately. All of it is the work of that evil spirit.”

Gung Gibang clicked his tongue and cut in.

“Evil spirit, my ass. Listen, boatman. Do you think I’ve only heard stories like this once or twice? If all those tales were true, half the fish under heaven would have human faces, and the mountains would be crawling with thousand-year-old white tigers and dragons.”

“I swear there isn’t a word of falsehood in it. With one heaven-defying atrocity after another, the Divine Spirit of Dongting Lake must have been angered.”

“An evil spirit wasn’t enough, so now there’s a divine spirit too? Forget it. Let’s stop talking.”

“But every boatman in Hubei Province has heard the story…”

“Do I look like a boatman to you?”

“N-no, sir. Anyone can see you’re the most beggarly of beggars.”

“Ah, he’s not wrong, but now I’m suddenly pissed off.”

“P-please calm yourself, honored sir. This old man is guilty of nothing more than repeating what he heard.”

The old boatman sounded deeply aggrieved.

He had spent his entire life as a boatman in the Murim, where all sorts of legends and superstitions were treated as fact.

Perhaps that was why he seemed firmly convinced that the recent string of gruesome incidents was the work of the evil spirit known as the Hidden Shadow Ghost.

Come to think of it, it might not be complete nonsense.

Judging by Honglan and Cheongpung’s expressions, they had reached the same conclusion.

The moment our eyes met, they both spoke at once.

“Benefactor, could it be…”

“Benefactor, could the Hidden Shadow Ghost that boatman mentioned be…”

“Wait. I know what both of you are trying to say, so you don’t need to say it. And if you absolutely insist on calling me Benefactor, take turns. It’s confusing.”

One Benefactor parrot had already been more than enough. Now there were two.

At times like this, I almost felt like I had become someone important.

Then again, Honglan had good reason after I saved her life. But was Cheongpung seriously planning to treat me as his Benefactor forever just because I had given him a few sweets when he was hungry?

I sighed and continued.

“Anyway, there’s a good chance the Hidden Shadow Ghost is the Dongting Fisherman. If not, it could be bandits taking advantage of the chaos.”

“That’s exactly what I was going to say, Benefactor.”

Not to be outdone by Cheongpung, Honglan nodded as well.

“This humble woman thinks so too, Benefactor.”

“I said one person at a time.”

Whatever the case, it was unlikely to have been a simple accident of nature.

From what we had heard, more than a few boatmen had died. The old boatman’s next words lent even more weight to our suspicions.

“Come to think of it, all the dead boatmen disappeared in roughly the same area. Hm? Wait a moment. The place you honored guests are heading toward is nearby too…”

The old boatman suddenly froze and slowly raised his head.

He looked us over one by one without a word, then quietly lowered the oar he had been holding to set off and stood up.

“Where are you going?”

At my question, the old boatman gave an awkward smile.

“Well, I seem to have forgotten to relieve myself.”

“Mujin.”

“Yes, Captain.”

“The boatman needs to pee.”

“Does he?”

By now, Hyuk Mujin and I understood each other without needing to say much.

When Mujin—practically a giant beside the old boatman—blocked his path, the boatman’s eyes grew moist like those of a calf being led to the slaughterhouse.

“Do you still need to go?”

At Hyuk Mujin’s low voice, the boatman shook his head.

“…Come to think of it, I don’t.”

“Good. We’ll let you go before whatever you fear comes to pass, so don’t worry too much.”

I felt bad for treating an old boatman this way, but an experienced guide was essential if we wanted to reach the Dongting Fisherman’s refuge.

Our destination lay along a narrow passage that could accommodate only a few ferryboats at a time.

Even if the government mobilized a fleet of a hundred ships and tens of thousands of soldiers, they would never be able to enter. They would only become a burden.

If we end up fighting the Dongting Fisherman, bringing more people will only increase the casualties.

Our best option was for the government to seal off every route between Dongting Lake and the Yangtze in case he tried to flee, while a small elite force—including Cheongpung and me—pursued and either captured or killed him.

And just as important as dealing with the Dongting Fisherman was preventing any more pointless sacrifices.

Having finished thinking it through, I abruptly spoke.

“Hyuk Mujin, Gung Gibang, Young Lady Hong. You three…”

“No.”

“Where’s that dog barking?”

“I will contribute what little strength I have.”

Their answers came before I could finish, leaving me momentarily speechless. Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang clicked their tongues at the sight.

“I can see exactly what you’re about to say.”

“We came all this way. How could we turn back now? What kind of man would that make me?”

“I feel the same. The Successor Beggar of the mighty Beggars’ Sect cannot be frightened off by something like this.”

“Captain, whenever something looks even slightly dangerous, you always tell us to stay behind. At this point, it’s practically your defining trait. Captain’s special.”

“You’re surprisingly timid.”

“But why have you been copying everything I say, Young Hero Gung? It’s really starting to bother me.”

“You damned bastard. Why pick a fight when things were going so well? Have you lost your mind?”

“Beggars’ Sect special. Not content with picking up discarded food from inns, you pick up other people’s words too.”

“…I’ve never seen such a bastard who’s worse than a dog.”

“Regardless, I’m going with you no matter what you say, Captain. When I was young, a gifted fortune-teller read my fate and told me I would live in wealth and glory, eating well and living comfortably past the age of one hundred. There’s no way I’m dying today.”

Gung Gibang stared incredulously at Hyuk Mujin as he made this bold declaration, then shook his head.

“Forget it. I shouldn’t have said anything. And I agree with that Hyuk bastard, so don’t even think about leaving me behind. I have inherited the supreme arts of the Beggars’ Sect. Even if I’m not as strong as you or Cheongpung, protecting my own life will be no trouble.”

…

My lips moved, but I could not bring myself to speak.

When it came down to it, neither of them was someone others could afford to underestimate.

Hyuk Mujin had begun learning martial arts relatively late, yet he had grown explosively while passing through countless crises alongside me. Gung Gibang was talented enough to become the Successor Beggar, as well as a Peak master who had entered a mature realm.

But I'm afraid.

I was afraid of losing people close to me. Afraid that what happened that day would happen all over again.

As I hesitated, Cheongpung suddenly spoke.

"Benefactor. If you go, I can follow you to the very depths of hell."

"Young Hero Cheongpung."

"Please don't tell me I can't. I am a proper man and a martial artist too."

"Young Hero Cheongpung."

Cheongpung smiled faintly and shook his head.

"Benefactor, please don't say anything. All you need to do is trust us as much as I trust you."

"No, that isn't what I meant. You're obviously coming with us, so why did you step forward and…"

"Oh. Ah…"

"Stop saying pointless things and sit down. Don't ruin the mood."

"…Yes, Benefactor."

A quiet laugh escaped me at his crestfallen expression. I nodded to Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang.

"Remember one thing. No matter what happens, follow my judgment. Even if I order you to abandon me and run."

"Captain, that…"

Gung Gibang discreetly jabbed Hyuk Mujin in the side.

"Of course. We'll remember. The Hyuk bastard will too. Right?"

"Hm? Ah, yes."

Their intentions were obvious, but I pretended not to notice.

I would do everything in my power to prevent that situation from arising. I was confident I could separate them before they fell into danger.

But the last person posed a problem.

"You already know what I'm going to say, don't you?"

Honglan's red lips slowly parted.

"You will need someone who knows the exact route."

"We'll be fine. According to you, Young Lady Hong, the finest boatman on Dongting Lake is already with us."

"What if something unexpected happens?"

"We'll deal with it."

“I may be insignificant compared to you and the others, but I too have reached the First Rate realm…”

“I know. And I also know that this First Rate master spent several shichen[2177] submerged in the river while holding on to a strong man, and has only been conscious for half a shichen.”

“…!”

Honglan bit down softly on her lip, struck where it hurt.

She knew better than anyone.

Being able to move around as she did now and fighting a fierce battle were two entirely different things.

“Once again, it seems all I can do is watch.”

“Once again?”

“Yes. Back then, long ago. Last night. And now.”

Reading the question in my eyes, Honglan smiled. It was more bitter than any smile I had seen from her before.

“A great many things happened before a little girl who lost her clan and her parents overnight could become the woman she is today…”

“Ah.”

“Please excuse me for a moment.”

She looked up at me with shining eyes and quietly reached out a hand.

Her pale, slender fingers brushed through my tangled hair and grazed my neck. I flinched despite myself.

“Young Lady Hong, what are you…”

“All done. Ah, much better. Would you like to see?”

I followed Honglan’s fingers with my gaze and looked down at the clear waters of Dongting Lake.

Someone’s reflection floated on the surface.

My hair had been neatly arranged and secured with a beautiful silver hairpin.

When I raised my head, Honglan was smiling brightly.

“Benefactor—no, Great Hero Jin.”

Her hair, now unbound, swayed gently in the wind. It rippled and shimmered until it seemed almost radiant.

“I wish you good fortune in battle.”

Her quiet voice slowly faded from my ears.

Leaving Honglan behind, the boatman drove his oar powerfully through the water.

[2177] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

Chapter 461

When it came to speed, a ferryboat couldn't match the Yangtze River Channel League's swift ships—or even an ordinary vessel. Especially in weather as foul as today's.

Hoooooosh! Splash!

The ferryboat rocked in the fierce wind and churning current.

Its small hull offered little resistance to the elements. Veins bulged along the arms of the old boatman gripping the oars.

As befitted an experienced boatman, he had guided the ferryboat skillfully despite the bad weather. But the closer we came to our destination, the more violent the current grew, and he was nearing his limit.

This is probably as far as he can take us.

It would have been insane to come this far relying on nothing but a single ferryboat and an old boatman.

I rolled my neck from side to side and stepped forward.

"Shall we begin?"

At those words, three people opened their eyes. They had been circulating their qi without moving an inch despite the rocking hull.

"I'm ready, Benefactor."

"To use one of the Beggars' Sect's finest arts for something like this… Master would certainly have a thing or two to say if he saw me."

"Captain, what should I do?"

Cheongpung, Gung Gibang, and Hyuk Mujin had replenished their qi. I quickly gave them their orders.

"Cheongpung, follow me to the stern. Gung Gibang, take the bow. Mujin, protect the boatman. I'll call when I need you, so move the instant I do."

As the three took their positions, the old boatman, who had been struggling at the oars, blinked.

"E-excuse me, what exactly are you talking about…?"

Before he could finish, a fierce blast of palm force shot from Cheongpung's hands and slammed into the water.

Boom! Fwooooooosh!

"Waaaaaagh!"

The so-called palm-force booster.

The ferryboat was far smaller and lighter than even the sleek-hulled swift ships. It soared through the air.

The boatman's scream mingled with the wind tearing past us.

Using that scream as my signal, I stepped forward.

Now.

Whoooosh!

Just as the airborne ferryboat was about to drop back onto the water, I drew up the internal energy filling my dantian and sent it surging into my palms.

Boom! Booooom!

My Flame Divine Palm had now reached eighty percent mastery. Its heat made the surrounding air blaze, and the descending ferryboat leaped upward again like a flying fish.

The boatman's eyes bulged. He pointed ahead with a trembling finger.

"Reefs! There are reeeefs ahead!"

Did anyone really think the Dongting Fisherman would establish one of his secret refuges somewhere easy to reach?

The route we were taking was too narrow for ordinary vessels to enter. The current was also unusually strong, making it difficult for a light boat like a ferryboat to escape once it was caught in the flow.

Once the current swept a boat away, it would be easy for it to crash against one of the reefs scattered throughout the passage.

"You fucking bastards! I told you I wasn't coming!"

The old boatman's heartfelt scream rang out. At that exact moment, I shouted a name.

"Gung Gibang!"

"Got it!"

Gung Gibang answered energetically and flung his sleeves, which were little more than rags.

The Eighteen Dragon-Subduing Palms—said to be passed down to only two people among the Beggars' Sect's hundred thousand disciples, the Sect Leader and the Successor Beggar—erupted through the air.

Kwoooooo-boooom!

Palm force poured down like a rainstorm, shattering the reef that towered like an iron wall into countless fragments.

The second and third reefs that appeared beyond it could not withstand the might of the Eighteen Dragon-Subduing Palms either.

Kraaaaaash!

The ferryboat broke through the scattered fragments of reef and landed on the surface.

Spray surged up on both sides of the hull, and several fish that had leaped from somewhere slapped the old boatman across the cheeks.

"Gah… Uhhh…"

He was completely out of it.

I shook the drooling boatman by the shoulder. His eyes had gone half vacant.

“Wake up. Stay with us.”

“Ugh… Uhhh. You fucking…”

“This isn’t working. Mujin.”

“By your command.”

Hyuk Mujin rolled up both sleeves and planted a solid slap across the boatman’s face.

Smack!

The boatman’s eyes snapped back into focus.

“Gah! What was that—”

Smack!

“…I-I’m already awake.”

“Stop.”

“Yes, sir.”

Nothing brought someone to their senses like a good slap across the face.

I turned to the boatman as he rubbed his reddened cheeks.

“Where do you think we are?”

“No matter how honored you gentlemen may be, treating a man like this is—”

“Mujin.”

“By your command.”

“I’ll check immediately, sir.”

The boatman sprang to his feet and looked around.

The channel was barely wide enough for two or three ferryboats to pass side by side.

Sheer cliffs loomed on either bank, and violent currents churned across the water. Thick fog hung over everything.

The old boatman narrowed his eyes and carefully examined the area before nodding.

“Yes. This is the first of the places you mentioned.”

According to the Lower District Sect’s information Honglan had relayed to us, there were five likely locations for the Dongting Fisherman’s secret refuge.

We had reached the closest of them.

That was certainly good news, but it was too early to celebrate.

“Getting here quickly is all well and good, but… how are we supposed to find it now?”

At Gung Gibang’s question, I scanned our surroundings.

“I don’t know. The information Young Lady Hong gave us wasn’t exact, either. We’ll have to search the area thoroughly.”

"Ugh. This is going to take forever."

"Don't jinx us. Just be grateful Young Lady Hong's information got us this far."

A secret refuge wasn't called a secret refuge for nothing.

Honglan's information had not included its exact location, but merely narrowing down the Dongting Fisherman's hidden retreat to this area was already a major gain.

Even if the first location turned out to be a dead end, something would eventually be caught once we drew the net tight enough.

Unless it jumps out on its own before we catch it.

As I carefully surveyed the area, my face suddenly began to prickle.

I glanced aside. Four pairs of eyes had been staring at me strangely, but they immediately darted away.

"What?"

"W-what do you mean? I was just… thinking it was nice that you were still thinking about Young Lady Hong in the middle of all this."

"Ahem. Captain, you have my full support."

"Ah, youth is a fine thing. I was popular with the ladies myself until about thirty years ago. They used to call me the Fisher of Women's Hearts on Dongting Lake. Hahaha."

"…"

It was obvious what they were all thinking.

I was inwardly clicking my tongue when my eyes happened to meet Cheongpung's. He flinched like a bird that had been shot and frantically waved both hands.

"No! No, Benefactor! I wasn't thinking about anything!"

"What on earth were you thinking about? I haven't even said anything yet."

"Really, I wasn't! I swear I wasn't imagining Young Lady Hong and Benefactor falling passionately in love, getting married, having two children, and living happily ever after! Or imagining myself living next door and visiting Benefactor all the time!"

"…"

"Gasp!"

Only then did Cheongpung realize his mistake. He clapped both hands over his mouth, but it was already too late.

He imagined all that in the space of a few seconds?

At that rate, he could quit being a martial artist and become a novelist.

His pen name could be Huashan Divine Dragon. If he published under Huashan's name and got Sword Saint Mae Jonghak to write a blurb, his books would sell like crazy.

Of course, if he made me the protagonist, he would get the shit beaten out of him just as quickly.

"Good grief. What is wrong with you people…? Never mind. Forget it."

There was no point wasting my breath. I sighed and quickly issued new orders.

It wasn't because my face had somehow grown hot, or because the faint scent clinging to Honglan's silver hairpin kept tickling my nose.

…Really.

"Cheongpung and Gung Gibang, use the Wall Lizard Technique to search the cliffs. Mujin, take the boat around and search below. We don't know what might appear or when, so don't let your guard down for a single moment."

At my serious tone, the faint smiles vanished from everyone's lips.

If the Dongting Fisherman really was here, a fight would be unavoidable.

I did not know exactly how powerful he was, but if a Supreme Peak master of the Dongting Fisherman's caliber launched a surprise attack, Cheongpung and I were probably the only ones who could properly respond.

"Remember this. If you let your guard down, you die."

Of course, we would do everything in our power to prevent that from happening. But in the world of martial artists, life and death could be decided in an instant.

Everyone nodded gravely. I was about to turn away when Hyuk Mujin suddenly spoke.

"What are you doing?"

"We're searching together. Did you think I was going to sit around and have fun by myself?"

"No, that isn't what I meant. Weren't you planning to remain on the ferryboat?"

"Cheongpung and Gung Gibang have the cliffs covered, and you'll be searching below, so I need to look somewhere else."

"Somewhere else? Where else is there to…"

Hyuk Mujin stopped mid-sentence.

"Don't tell me…"

"That's right."

I looked down at the churning river.

"We have to search underwater too. If it were anyone else, I might not consider it, but this is the Dongting Fisherman's refuge. It's a perfectly reasonable possibility."

"But you've never learned water arts, have you?"

"Hmm. Probably not."

At my confident answer, Cheongpung and Gung Gibang—who had been about to climb the cliffs with the Wall Lizard Technique—each added a warning. Even the old boatman, holding his oar aloft like a weapon, joined in.

"Benefactor, my grandfather once told me that you must never fight a master of water arts underwater."

"I agree. You haven't learned water arts, so you couldn't possibly search this entire stretch by yourself. And if your opponent is the Dongting Fisherman, you should avoid it all the more."

"I know you are an exceptional martial artist, honored sir, but the water here is deep and the current is fierce. One wrong move, and you could truly be in grave danger."

I couldn't find a single flaw in any of their arguments.

A battle between Supreme Peak masters could be decided by the smallest detail.

And the difference between fighting on land and fighting underwater was as vast as the difference between heaven and earth.

The martial arts I've learned are particularly vulnerable underwater too.

Most of the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts were based on Scorching Yang Qi—in other words, fire qi.

By their very nature, they could not display the same power underwater as they could on land.

That was also why Jeok Cheongang hated the Yangtze so much. He knew that if a life-and-death duel broke out there, he would be fighting at a disadvantage.

"…"

Hmm. I take that back. Thinking about it again, he probably just hated water itself.

Regardless, it would not have been particularly surprising if the Dongting Fisherman had established a secret refuge underwater, away from other people's eyes and footsteps.

He was a master of water arts who could breathe like a fish and move even faster than one.

But I hadn't volunteered without a plan.

My entire swimming career consisted of a children's swimming class I had taken when I was seven. There was another reason I had decided to enter those deep, raging waters.

I've never used it before, but… if the description is accurate, this should be more than possible.

I exhaled briefly and removed my shirt and shoes.

Before Hyuk Mujin could recover from his surprise and stop me, I leaped straight into the river.

Splash! Whoooooosh!

The water was as cold as ice, yet crystal clear.

Schools of brightly colored fish swam together. Far below, unidentifiable aquatic plants swayed in the depths.

And then… at last, the sound I had been waiting for rang out.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

As the System notifications appeared, my body began to change.

Shhhhhhh.

A faint light visible only to me swept over my entire body. Transparent webbing formed between my fingers and toes.

This is…

Even underwater, I felt as light and mobile as I did on land.

My vision grew even clearer. When I exhaled the breath I had been holding, the cold water turned into air and rushed into my lungs.

This works even better than I expected.

I had never imagined the Water Rescue Worker Title I'd earned by completing the sudden Quest The Tragedy of Dongting Lake would prove useful so soon.

This should be more than enough.

Grinning, I began to swim smoothly.

My transparent webbing sliced through the fierce current, propelling me into the distance faster than a fish.

Chapter 462

The old boatman could not believe what was happening before his eyes.

What in the world is going on?

He had worked as a boatman for nearly forty years, ever since he was around twenty, but in all that time, he had never experienced anything as bizarre as this.

Tap-tap-tap-tap!

Two figures raced across the sheer cliff above him. It was not the first time he had seen them today, but the sight amazed him every time.

The boatman stared upward, his mouth hanging open.

Are those apes or people?

He had encountered countless martial artists during his years as a boatman, but this was the first time he had ever witnessed such astonishing martial arts firsthand.

Most of the martial artists who used his ferryboat were wandering martial artists with mediocre skills and shallow pockets, or disciples of small and middling sects.

I had my suspicions when the government troops suddenly showed up and ordered me to follow them…

He had seen it clearly: Officer Gwak, who was in charge of Dongting Lake, had been visibly flustered as he addressed these people with honorifics.

Considering how arrogant the man usually was, there was no doubt that today's passengers were important figures who carried considerable weight even in the Murim.

If this goes well, I might make a tidy sum.

He had been considering retirement lately. Whenever he heard about the nonstop tragedies of the past month, unease had settled in one corner of his heart, and his old bones had begun aching more than usual.

He had nearly made up his mind after hearing that hundreds of people had been slaughtered en masse on Dongting Lake the previous night.

The spirit of Dongting Lake must have grown enraged. The heavenly patterns are ominous, so evil spirits like the Hidden Shadow Ghost are running wild.

Boatmen were famous for believing in all sorts of superstitions, and old men were prone to retelling legends as though they were facts.

It was only natural that a man who had spent his entire life as a boatman—and had grown old doing it—would decide to retire.

But if important people were calling for him, what choice did he have? When they had dragged him away like a criminal and ordered him to launch the ferryboat, he had been prepared to die.

Tap-tap-tap-tap!

But seeing those figures filled him with hope.

Hope that he could survive, of course, but also that he might make enough money to retire in comfort.

They must possess incredible martial arts!

They said martial masters of the highest realms could fold the earth beneath their feet and walk through the air.

What those people were doing was not much different from the rumors the old boatman had heard secondhand.

Even the young man who seemed to be their leader was cutting through the rough water as though he were a fish.

No, that's not right. This is already the fourth location. He isn't like a fish—he is a fish.

What kind of human being had webbed feet and gills? Whenever that young man entered the water, he stayed under for at least a full shichen.[2178]

He had already repeated that impossible feat three times. If anyone deserved to be called a martial master, it was him.

Masters like these could deal with some miscellaneous Fiend like the Hidden Shadow Ghost in an instant.

If he could only make it out alive, retiring with a fortune would be easy.

Just as the old boatman was brimming with hope, a shout rang out from the cliff above.

"Young Hero Cheongpung! Is there anything over there?"

"I'll tell you when I see something!"

"If you find anything, tell us right away!"

"Yes, I certainly will… Ah!"

"Gasp! What is it? What happened?"

A heavy tension abruptly settled over the area.

Hyuk Mujin, who was scanning the surroundings from the slowly moving ferryboat, swallowed hard. So did Gung Gibang, whose eyes were gleaming sharply from the opposite cliff.

Then, under everyone's gaze, Cheongpung shouted,

"Wow, it's a swallow's nest! I've never seen one this big before!"

"…"

"…"

"…"

The air froze solid.

The boatman suddenly thought,

[2178] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

…Spirit of Dongting Lake, please protect this old man.

At this rate, he was about to lose what little faith he had left in them.

While the old boatman prayed to the spirit without anyone knowing, it happened.

Splash! Tap!

A shadow shot out of the water amid a spray of droplets and landed lightly on the ferryboat.

The figure had a build large enough to be called massive, with flexible muscles that looked as hard as steel. A beautiful silver hairpin that suited him strangely well held his disheveled hair in place.

“Welcome back.”

At Hyuk Mujin’s greeting, Jin Taekyung silently nodded.

Seeing his furrowed brow, the old boatman cautiously asked,

“Nothing this time either?”

It was a pointless question. If he had found something, his expression would not have been so dark.

Jin Taekyung stood deep in thought, his brows drawn together, before finally speaking.

“This is the fourth location, right?”

“Yes, that it is.”

The old boatman answered while carefully watching Taekyung’s mood.

These incredible passengers had already come up empty-handed three times. Including this place, they had now failed to find anything at four locations.

Riding in the same boat as martial masters in a foul mood was hardly pleasant.

The one thing that was both fortunate and unfortunate was that one final location remained.

Fwoosh. Hissss!

Jin Taekyung lightly circulated his internal energy, evaporating the water clinging to him, and asked,

“How long will it take to reach the last location?”

“If we continue the way we have been, half an hour should be enough. But…”

The old boatman swallowed before continuing.

“The wind and current are growing stronger the farther we go. It’ll be getting dark by the time we arrive, so perhaps it would be better to try another day.”

“No. It has to be today.”

“But…”

“We have to go. Right now.”

His tone was as sharp and decisive as a knife stroke. The old boatman closed his mouth.

For some reason, the weather was ominously foul today. The sky, which should have been clear, was choked with dark clouds, while the fierce wind and current showed no sign of settling down.

I've got a bad feeling about this.

The foreboding he had felt only in the past, when floods or storms were bearing down on them, pricked at every inch of the veteran boatman's body.

But he forced himself to ignore the unease seeping into his chest.

Have I grown timid with age? No, that can't be it.

A sudden flood or storm? It made no sense.

Boatmen like him were more sensitive to changes in the river than anyone.

The current had certainly grown unusually rough over the past month, but it was not the rainy season. A disaster of that scale was impossible.

The boatman was still mulling it over when he realized that a large hand had settled on his shoulder.

"Boatman. Aren't you going?"

"…I'm going."

At Hyuk Mujin's weighty voice, the boatman slowly began turning the ferryboat.

Of course, he did not forget to curse inwardly at the rude fellow who looked like the weakest of the group.

"Boatman. Were you cursing me just now?"

"…!"

The boatman's oar slipped, and the ferryboat rocked.

The rapids had grown even rougher than when they first set out, dragging at the small hull. Jin Taekyung stepped forward and swept both palms outward.

Boom!

The ferryboat regained its balance and surged ahead.

As Taekyung gazed at the gradually darkening sky, his eyes grew somber.

Did we get it wrong?

The information Honglan had passed on from the Lower District Sect pointed to five locations in total.

But even after searching thoroughly above and below the water, they had found no trace of the Dongting Fisherman's secret refuge.

After coming up empty-handed one place after another, it was only natural to wonder whether the information had been wrong from the beginning.

Taekyung thought for a moment, then shook his head.

No. It's too early to decide that.

One final place remained. Of the five locations suspected of concealing the Dongting Fisherman's secret refuge, it was the deepest and most treacherous.

It might even have been more important than the other four combined.

If it really was the Dongting Fisherman's refuge—and if they encountered him there…

It'll be a life-and-death duel. We'll have to fight with our lives on the line.

Against a Supreme Peak master, giving everything they had was only natural. But if at all possible, they needed to capture him alive.

The true reason they were searching for the Dongting Fisherman was to reach the larger body behind him.

Dark Heaven was like a three-headed, six-armed monster. Killing the Dongting Fisherman would merely cut off one of its arms. Capturing him would give them a chance to strike at its body.

"The body. The body, huh…"

His quiet mutter scattered into the wind.

Without realizing it, Taekyung touched the silver hairpin holding back his hair and suddenly thought of one person.

He also remembered the hundreds of corpses that had filled the clear waters of Dongting Lake, and the wails of those left behind.

"I'm going to catch you, you bastards. No matter what."

A faint fragrance drifted from the silver hairpin and lingered at the tip of his nose. The bow of the ferryboat cut forcefully through the river as its waters began turning black.

Donghu Stronghold.

The largest water stronghold in Hubei, which had once wielded tremendous influence under the command of the outstanding Supreme Peak master Hwang Chung, the Yangtze One Saber, had been crowded with unfamiliar visitors for the past two days.

"Pull when I count to three. One, two. Heave!"

Some were tying logs together to make a temporary path across the river. Elsewhere, middle-aged men dressed in neat scholar's robes were writing on bamboo slips.

A young Daoist in a robe approached one of them and asked,

"Excuse me, sir. Has the search of the left cliff already been completed?"

"About half of it. I can stake our family name on the fact that we haven't found any trace of a Formation so far. How is Wudang doing?"

"The search is progressing smoothly. We are also maintaining a strict watch in case anything unexpected happens, so you need not worry."

They were disciples of the Zhuge Clan, known collectively as Divine Mechanism Zhuge, and Daoists from Wudang who had accompanied Perfected Being Hyeongong to Donghu Stronghold.

These unfamiliar visitors, who had been nowhere to be seen two days ago, had formed groups to search the cliffs and were devoting all their efforts to finding traces of Dark Heaven.

Yet even the countless eyes and ears spread throughout the area, aided by brightly burning torches, failed to notice one person.

Swish.

His movements made no sound and gave off no presence.

The small, lithe figure quietly and stealthily headed toward the cliff. He passed dozens of people at the very least, yet not one of them noticed who he was.

Nor did anyone detect the Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step, wielded by the greatest assassin in history.

What a nuisance.

Mungyeong muttered inwardly as he stepped forward.

Treading on empty air, he soared like a bird and swiftly crossed the cliff.

The stealthy search conducted by the young medical apprentice whom no one paid any attention to did not take long.

Nothing. I'm certain.

The area containing Donghu Stronghold's headquarters was vast.

It was an island capable of comfortably housing more than a thousand people. High cliffs surrounded it on every side, with narrow, undeveloped paths running along their upper reaches.

But that was all.

Nowhere could he sense any trace of human presence or the remnants of a Formation known as a Moving Formation.

That was the conclusion reached after two days of searching by a Supreme Peak master who had surpassed Returning to Simplicity and reached the realm of Returned to Youth.

Mungyeong trusted his judgment. At the same time, he realized there was still one place they had not searched.

That's right. One place remains.

The river visible from the cliff was unusually wide and deep.

Deep enough that even he had no desire to enter it.

…I suppose I have no choice.

It was a way to prevent an even greater sacrifice.

The face of the old disciple he had parted from on an unnamed hill overlooking the Sichuan Tang Clan flashed before his eyes.

All right, you rascal.

Mungyeong quietly threw himself into the air.

His figure slipped deep into the river as though melting into the water, then glided smoothly toward the depths.

Chapter 463

Deep within a dark cave where only a faint light seeped in, a small old man sat cross-legged in quiet contemplation.

Energy like the sun raced through hundreds of acupoints and into the Eight Extraordinary Meridians.[2179] It took on physical form, rising to envelop the old man's entire body.

Then the changes began.

Whooooooosh.

Three flower buds bloomed above the old man's snow-white hair, then vanished.

As the buds formed, the energy they scattered took on a new shape: five rings radiant with dazzling, multicolored light.

It was a phenomenon that could only be displayed by one of the chosen few among Supreme Peak masters who had reached the realm of Five Qi Returning to Origin.

But the changes surrounding the old man did not end there.

Fwoosh. Hisssss!

The five rings symbolizing Five Qi Returning to Origin turned red. Tremendous fire qi erupted from the rings of internal energy brimming with Scorching Yang Qi, coiling around the old man before taking on a blue hue.

Furnace Fire Pure Blue.

When the fire in a furnace grew hot enough, it turned blue. The realm of martial arts the old man had attained was no different.

It was no exaggeration to say that the internal energy and insight he had accumulated over more than a hundred years had already reached the ultimate.

And yet…

Is this as far as I go?

The old man, Fire King Jeok Cheongang, withdrew his internal energy. His cross-legged figure descended from where it floated in midair, and the moment he touched the ground, the strange phenomena surrounding him vanished without a trace.

Only Jeok Cheongang's hollow chuckle remained in the silent cave.

"Heh heh."

Why could he not break through the wall before him and advance any farther?

He knew the reason better than anyone. He nodded in acknowledgment, yet he could not help regretting that the wall refused to budge. He even resented the heavens for it.

[2179] The Eight Extraordinary Meridians are channels through which qi is said to circulate in traditional Chinese medicine and martial-arts fiction.

But rather than furrow his brow, Jeok Cheongang soothed his bitterness with a laugh.

What is there to resent? This old man brought it upon himself.

Martial arts grew stronger through ceaseless training, while insight came only when one emptied the heart.

But Jeok Cheongang had been unable to clear away the dregs that had accumulated in his heart over the past several decades.

Anything left to pile up and stagnate would eventually rot. His rotting heart filled with worldly anguish, inviting an inner demon—and once that inner demon took hold, he could no longer ward off the infirmities of old age.

“If I hadn’t met that brat… I’d probably be smearing shit on the walls by now. Heh heh.”

Jeok Cheongang laughed heartily.

One.

If he could attain just one small insight, he might reach the realm of Returned to Youth.

But he knew that desire was greed as well. Proof that he had not completely emptied his heart.

He looked up. The sky was visible through a small opening in the cave, and Jeok Cheongang addressed someone unseen beyond it.

“Does this mean I should be satisfied with what I have? Is that it?”

No answer came.

Or perhaps he had already received one.

He had taken a born killer as his disciple and caused innocent people to die. Yet thanks to his second disciple, he had at least managed to preserve his sanity. The answer was that he should no longer cling to anything more.

No one had spoken, but Jeok Cheongang heard the answer within his own heart.

“What a fucking joke. After all the fiends this old man has dealt with, this is how I’m treated?”

“Don’t you think so?”

A man stood where his gaze came to rest. Crouching Dragon Guest[2180] Zhuge Feng waved his folding fan as he answered.

“When I was nine, my grandfather once sat me beside him and said something similar. ‘I don’t know what bastard is up there, but he must have a truly god-awful temper.‘ You are saying the same thing now, Senior.”

Jeok Cheongang nodded.

“Zhuge Gonghu did occasionally say something right.”

[2180] “Crouching Dragon” was a sobriquet of Zhuge Liang, a strategist of China’s Three Kingdoms period.

“He was a wise man.”

“He was also smarter than you. At least he didn’t have the bad manners to wave a fan in front of someone old enough to be his grandfather. Fold that thing before I break it.”

“It will not break easily. I had two nyang[2181] of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron worked into it.”

“Is your skull made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron too?”

“Ah, I see. Thank you for the lesson.”

Zhuge Feng promptly folded his fan, then looked around the cave.

“But what brings you here? The search is already over, and no one comes here anymore.”

“That is precisely why I came. This old man knows nothing about mechanisms and formations, so I have to prepare in my own way.”

At the word prepare, Zhuge Feng’s eyebrows rose slightly.

“You believe there will be a battle.”

“A martial artist should always be prepared for a fight. Besides, those Dark Heaven bastards are brutal and persistent. This will not end here.”

Jeok Cheongang’s voice was heavy.

Dark Heaven had taken the life of his close friend, Dharma King Hong Dao.

The countless deaths caused by the bloodshed in Henan and Sichuan were more than enough to remind him of the Great Faction War.

“I assume you know that the Heavenly Power Demon was imprisoned in the underground prison beneath the Sichuan Tang Clan.”

“Of course. I also know that before his death, he told Jin Taekyung that Dark Heaven was the successor to the Demonic Cult.”

The Great Faction War, fought for supremacy over the world, had ended in victory for the orthodox faction. But it had not been a sweeping victory. It was a victory that left nothing but wounds.

Had the orthodox faction retained enough strength at the time, it would have pursued the retreating forces of the Demonic Cult and torn out every last root.

But the Heavenly Demon Divine Cult and the orthodox faction—the dragon and tiger—had both lost most of their strength when the war ended. The long interval of more than fifty years had given the defeated survivors ample time to rise again.

Under a new name.

Dark Heaven.

“So much time has passed before we knew it. The wheel has turned, and troubled times have come again.”

At Jeok Cheongang’s quiet words, Zhuge Feng looked up.

[2181] A nyang is a traditional Korean unit of weight. Two nyang are approximately 75 g (2.65 oz).

The sky visible through the cracks in the cave ceiling was dark and chaotic. Even if the black clouds vanished tomorrow and the blue sky emerged, the heavenly patterns had already fallen into such disarray that no diviner in the world could read them.

Troubled times.

After completing its long circle, an age of turmoil had returned. An era of calamity was already upon them.

Blood would flow in rivers, and corpses would pile up like mountains.

Death and destruction would run rampant. Orphans who had lost their parents would wander the world, while plague and famine spread because there would be no one to dispose of the rotting bodies.

What is happening now is only a small part of it.

As Zhuge Feng realized that once more, a chill ran down his spine.

But Dark Heaven was not the only reason.

“I see you already had a guest.”

A voice pierced his ears.

Zhuge Feng froze as though someone had dumped ice water over his head.

How?

Though he had not reached the Supreme Peak realm, Zhuge Feng was still a master standing at the very edge of Peak.

Yet he had sensed no presence. Heard no sound.

Even though he had left three guards who followed him like shadows at the entrance to the cave, he had noticed no sign of anything.

That meant the owner of the voice was at least a Supreme Peak master.

If he’s that powerful…

Aside from Jeok Cheongang, the only possibility was Perfected Being Hyeongong of Wudang.

But the voice was far too young and clear.

It sounded like a boy’s.

Ah.

Insight flashed through Zhuge Feng’s mind, and he spun around.

The moment he saw the young medical apprentice he had encountered several times in passing, the fog in his mind dispersed, and a sobriquet slipped from his lips.

“The Slaughter Saint.”

The young medical apprentice, Mungyeong, twitched an eyebrow.

“You already knew?”

“I did not. Not until just now.”

Zhuge Feng continued excitedly.

“But I have always wondered why the greatest assassin in history disappeared. I also wondered why an extraordinary healer known as the Divine Physician appeared only after the Great Faction War had ended.”

“Not bad.”

“I watched you closely once, but I never imagined that you had reached the realm of Returned to Youth.”

Almost nothing was known about the Slaughter Saint. He was a figure shrouded in mystery.

Zhuge Feng stared at Mungyeong with gleaming eyes, then suddenly hesitated.

“But why would you deliberately reveal yourself to me… Unless?”

“You’re quick. Worthy of the Zhuge bloodline.”

“Blood will tell, after all. He may be a little strange, but the boy is clever. Zhuge Gonghu raised his grandson well. Now, putting that aside…”

Jeok Cheongang shrugged and fixed his gaze on Mungyeong.

“What brings you here? Why has an old man who’s been playing at being a child, despite it not suiting him in the slightest, come rushing over?”

“I’ll keep it short. You must leave this place immediately.”

“What?”

As promised, Mungyeong’s answer was extremely brief.

And for Jeok Cheongang, it was nowhere near reason enough to brave that godforsaken Tianling Falls.

“What kind of bullshit is—”

“I should make it even shorter.”

Mungyeong continued in a low, grave voice.

“Your disciple is in danger. No—perhaps everyone is.”

“…!”

The moment he heard those words, Jeok Cheongang realized that he needed no further reason.

He turned toward Zhuge Feng. Blue flames had already kindled in his aged eyes.

“Launch the boat. Right now.”

By the time we reached the final location, the waters of Dongting Lake had turned purple.

I gazed at the sunset shining through the gaps between the cliffs and jagged rock formations, then spoke.

“Don’t move around carelessly from here on. Tie the ferryboat somewhere safe, get onto land, and prepare for anything.”

Dongting Lake was called a lake, but it was so vast that the name hardly seemed adequate.

There wasn't water in every direction. Small islands were easy enough to find, as were flat stretches of land formed by mud and sand carried in from tributaries of the Yangtze.

If a battle breaks out, fighting on land will put us at a much greater advantage.

None of us had mastered water arts.

I could at least move freely underwater thanks to the Water Rescue Worker Title, but even I could not avoid the debuff that reduced the power of my martial arts by twenty percent.

If things go badly… we need to be able to fight back on land, at the very least.

The others understood my reasoning perfectly well.

Gung Gibang spoke with a determined expression.

"I'll go with you."

"Can you swim?"

"I can dog-paddle a little."

"Go to land before you get beaten like a dog."

"Hmm. That would probably be better."

Gung Gibang stepped back, and Hyuk Mujin came forward.

"Captain."

"You stay on land too. Keep your head down and hide. You won't be any help if you charge in for no reason."

"I know. I only called out to encourage you."

"…"

What a sibu-leol[2182] bastard. I felt what little strength I had left draining away.

I let out a small sigh, then gave Cheongpung one final, earnest warning.

"The Dongting Fisherman may or may not be in there. But if I find him and drag him outside…"

Cheongpung nodded.

"I won't miss the opportunity."

"Good. That's all I need."

I had no idea just how formidable the Dongting Fisherman was, but with Cheongpung's help, things would be much easier.

Of course, he might not be here either.

But… how should I put it?

This time felt different.

It wasn't reason. It was instinct.

[2182] Sibu-leol is a colloquial Korean profanity, roughly equivalent to "fucking."

I looked at each of them in turn, then leaped without hesitation into the purple water.

Splash!

The familiar sensation washed over me as a System notification rang out.

The Title's effect activated. Transparent webbing formed between my fingers and toes, and breathing became easy.

Deeper. Farther in.

I pressed onward without stopping.

I swam swiftly through the cold water, passing countless fish.

Then I spotted something in the distance.

What's that…?

Far ahead, a pitch-black cave came into view.

Chapter 464

Dongting Lake was unquestionably a lake, but it covered a thousand li[2183], and even at its shallowest, the water was easily more than ten zhang[2184] deep.

The place I was swimming through now was one of the deepest parts of Dongting Lake. Naturally, the water was much deeper here, and the current raged like waves.

Finding a small underwater cave under these conditions was nothing short of heaven-sent luck.

That's…

Amid the countless schools of fish, I spotted a gap barely wide enough for a grown man to squeeze through.

A thrill ran down my spine.

I found it.

Cliffs rooted deep in a riverbed naturally split apart over the years through sedimentation and erosion. I had seen it several times at the four places we had already visited.

But this time was different.

My reason and instinct, which usually went their separate ways, were whispering the same thing.

The Dongting Fisherman's secret refuge.

Everything left traces.

The difference was subtle and well concealed, but my accumulated experience and keen eyesight told me that human hands had touched the entrance slowly drawing closer.

The edges are smooth. Someone definitely worked on them.

There was no need to ask who.

I heightened every one of my senses to the limit and cut through the current.

Slowly. Carefully.

It would be stupid to announce my presence to an enemy with whom I would soon be locked in a life-and-death duel.

If he prepared himself, the situation would become even more unfavorable.

Fortunately, there's still plenty of time left on the Title's effect. No need to rush.

I had seen more than a few people try to save ten minutes and end up leaving this world fifty years early.

[2183] In this Chinese setting, one li is approximately 500 meters (0.311 miles); a thousand li is about 500 kilometers (311 miles).

[2184] One zhang is approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

Whether someone lived or died depended on their will and perseverance. I didn't rush. I let the current carry me along.

Swish.

The brightly colored fish that noticed me seemed to hesitate, then cautiously brushed past.

I was barely moving, so they must not have taken me for a threat.

Good.

If I could fool fish this close to me, that was enough. I suppressed my presence even further and approached the cave.

At the entrance, which was barely wide enough for a grown man to squeeze through, I took a small breath and slipped inside.

Another submerged passage lay hidden beyond it.

No sign of anyone so far.

The passage was as narrow as the entrance and much deeper and longer than I had expected.

I sharpened my senses more than ever and searched for any trace of another presence. Only once I was certain there was none did I begin moving again.

I passed several strange-looking fish and clusters of aquatic plants. I had no idea how far I had gone when a faint light appeared in the distance.

Wait. Light?

This was underwater in Dongting Lake, but it was also a passage running through the inside of a cliff. How could there suddenly be light?

The passage did slope upward, but there was no way its structure could have let light leak in.

Then…

I swam smoothly toward the light, searched my surroundings once more, then shot upward through a small opening in the ceiling of the passage.

Splash!

I sucked in a breath.

Damp air filled my lungs.

At the same time, I felt the transparent gills that had formed around my throat disappear.

The next moment, I climbed out of the water and finally saw the source of the faint light. My eyes widened.

Night-shining pearls.

It was a cave.

A narrow, dark path stretched into the distance. Large and small night-shining pearls had been embedded at regular intervals in the ceiling, which was barely high enough for me to straighten my back.

A submerged passage and a cave carved inside a cliff. Night-shining pearls, too… You'd have to be an idiot not to figure it out by now.

The Lower District Sect's information had been correct. This was unquestionably the Dongting Fisherman's secret refuge.

My heart pounded with the thrill of finally finding him and the tension of the battle to come.

No. Those weren't the only reasons.

What's that?

I followed an unfamiliar smell that pricked my nose and turned my head.

A charred piece of wood lay on the waterlogged cave floor, and oil floated on the pooled water.

A torch? Well, it's not like he has an unlimited supply of night-shining pearls.

The night-shining pearls embedded in the ceiling were obviously low quality, but that did not mean they were cheap.

I had never heard that the Dongting Fisherman was fabulously wealthy, so torches must have been essential for lighting such a long cave.

And that half-burned torch told me something important.

It hasn't been out for long.

A faint warmth still lingered in the wood. It wasn't difficult to deduce that the torch had fallen for some reason no more than one or two shichen[2185] ago.

And that pointed to one conclusion.

The Dongting Fisherman is definitely here!

Ultimately, I wasn't looking for a place. I was looking for a man. Finding his secret refuge would mean nothing if the Dongting Fisherman wasn't inside.

But through the torch, the Dongting Fisherman had revealed his presence.

Even if I were in his position, I would never have expected an intruder to enter a secret refuge hidden this well.

That's your mistake.

I rose to my feet and began walking slowly along the path ahead.

I had plenty of excellent equipment—White Flame, my favored weapon, along with the Fire Dragon Armor and the Myriad-Poison Ring—but now wasn't the time to bring any of it out.

It would be better to let my opponent see my empty hands and lower his guard, then exploit the advantage my Inventory gave me.

Drip. Drip-drop.

Listening to the irregular patter of water from the ceiling, I walked on with my presence suppressed as much as possible.

[2185] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

The path had been straight at first, but it soon began to twist and turn, sloping upward in some places and downward in others. I never let down my guard.

But… what are these marks?

It didn't take long for me to realize something was strange.

My sharp eye was part of it, but the passage itself was in an alarming state.

Sections of the walls had been shattered here and there, leaving jagged rocks jutting out. Unlike the rest of the passage, which was covered in green moss, the freshly broken surfaces stood out unmistakably.

Crackle.

The moment I touched one, part of the wall crumbled away.

This couldn't have happened unless someone deliberately used considerable force.

The entire cave was formed from solid rock that had accumulated over at least several hundred years.

Damaging it would require a blow carrying a significant amount of internal energy. But why would the Dongting Fisherman destroy his own precious refuge?

Was there a battle here…? No. This is clearly the work of one person.

I was still far from having the insight to discern the nature and roots of martial arts, but having reached the Supreme Peak realm, I had little trouble inferring what had happened from the traces left throughout the passage.

I furrowed my brow and thought for a moment, then shook my head.

Focus on the Dongting Fisherman first. I can't afford to grow careless or let the tension overwhelm me.

I kept repeating that to myself as I walked.

Then it happened.

Splash! Whoosh!

"…!"

The sudden noise jolted me alert as if someone had dumped cold water over my head.

My fully extended senses analyzed the sound and sent the new information straight to my brain.

Fifty-odd zhang[2186] ahead. Closer than I expected.

The sound also echoed with unusual depth and volume. That meant there was a larger space ahead, beyond this narrow cave passage.

Swish.

One step. Then another.

I focused every nerve in my toes as they touched the damp cave floor.

[2186] One zhang is approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

It was a blessing that I had used my Scorching Yang Qi beforehand to dry the water that had soaked me through. If water dripping from my body had struck the floor and made a sound, the Dongting Fisherman would have discovered me.

I have to finish this inside the cave. Fighting underwater would make things much harder.

My opponent was a Supreme Peak master of water arts, one of the finest in the world.

I was confident in my own martial prowess, but if I fought the Dongting Fisherman underwater, I would have to bear the full twenty-percent reduction in power the System had warned me about.

Here, however, I had solid ground beneath my feet. This was land, and naturally, the debuff was gone.

I can't let this opportunity slip away.

The fifty-odd zhang[2187] between us rapidly dwindled.

Splish. Splaash.

The strange sounds continued, serving as perfect markers of distance and direction. As I approached a bend in the cave passage, I relaxed every muscle in my body.

I was already prepared.

Dozens of possibilities flashed before my eyes—how I would move, how I would end it.

If the Dongting Fisherman proved too formidable, I would use everything I had to kill him. If not, I would capture him and use him to draw out the larger body behind him.

I'll finish it in a single stroke, like a bolt of lightning.

With a short breath, I awakened the fire dragon sleeping deep within my dantian.

The three jiazi[2188] of Scorching Yang Qi I had continually replenished through circulation surged into every limb and bone.

Searing heat flooded hundreds of acupoints and the Eight Extraordinary Meridians[2189], driving every physical ability to its limit.

And then…

Pop!

One step was enough.

I planted a foot lightly against the slanted wall and shot forward.

[2187] One zhang is approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

[2188] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi represent 180 years.

[2189] The Eight Extraordinary Meridians are channels through which qi flows in traditional Chinese physiology.

[2190] One zhang is approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

The passage opened into a chamber some thirty zhang[2190] in radius, presumably the heart of the cave.

At its center, a white-haired old man crouched with his back to me.

The Dongting Fisherman!

The silent cry rang through me.

It was hard to believe that this small, shabby old man had harmed so many people. The anger I had buried for a time surged up as a cold flame.

Inventory open. Summon!

As the world slowed, the unknown power of the System covered my entire body as I charged toward the Dongting Fisherman.

Swish. Clack.

Red armor wrapped around my bare upper body.

The Fire Dragon Armor.

Then a cluster of light visible only to me brushed my finger and transformed into the divine artifact known as the Myriad-Poison Ring. At the same time, a spear with a transparent blade appeared in my grasp.

The next moment, three jiazi[2191] of Scorching Yang Qi flooded into them all.

Whooooooosh!

The damp air vanished. The river water pooled across the floor vanished. Even the droplets falling from overhead vanished.

No—they evaporated.

Blue-white Force blazed like wildfire across White Flame's transparent spear blade, burning through everything in its path.

And one man stood directly in the path of that searing, destructive concentration of power.

Die.

The arrow had already been loosed. The bird resting in its nest could not escape.

To me, the Dongting Fisherman was no different from that bird.

A bird that had believed its nest was safe.

Even if it realized the truth too late, it could not stop an arrow that had already been fired.

Even if it hurriedly spread its wings, it could not avoid death or injury.

Just like the Dongting Fisherman, who was turning his body very slowly right now.

It's already too late.

But in the next instant, I realized my mistake.

I had been too quick to assume.

Boom!

[2191] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi represent 180 years.

A snow-white streak of light flew in from somewhere and slammed into White Flame’s spear blade.

Chapter 465

Boom!

The impact knocked White Flame's spearhead aside.

The streak of light that had flown in along a bizarre trajectory writhed like a living creature, then rained down over my head.

Shh-shh-shh-shing!

A downpour of Force.

As that destructive power lit the dark cave in an instant, I twisted smoothly out of its path.

Swish. Boom-boom-boom!

My shoulder, neck, waist, chest…

The streak of light swept within a hair's breadth of the vital acupoints throughout my body before piercing and smashing through the solid cave floor.

Had I reacted even a moment later, the attack would have killed me instantly.

But the Dongting Fisherman's attack failed to touch even a single hair on my body, and that moment of danger turned into an opportunity.

Just like now.

Whoom!

White Flame's spearhead, knocked off course by the earlier impact, changed direction sharply in midair and swept toward the Dongting Fisherman's throat.

His grayish-white eyes widened as he turned, and the snow-white streak hurriedly moved to block the spearhead.

But…

That won't be enough.

If the Dongting Fisherman was an old monster who had accumulated enormous internal energy over his long life, then I was a monster who had surpassed those long years through System rewards and countless battles on the edge of death.

Even if our internal energy was equal, my body held the strength of a giant who had surpassed the limits of humanity.

Boom!

The instant the blue-white flames struck the streak of light, a thunderous crash rang out as though the sky itself had split apart, and the Dongting Fisherman was sent flying.

The small old man smashed through solid rock and crashed into the wall. The cave shook, and enormous stalactites came tumbling down.

I glared into the grayish-white eyes visible beyond the falling debris and enunciated every word.

"Get up. Drop the pathetic act."

Crack-crack-crack.

His limbs, limp as a corpse's only moments ago, moved with sudden vigor.

The Dongting Fisherman pulled himself from the hollow his body had left in the wall and cracked his neck from side to side.

Bones ground against one another as he started forward. A long fishing rod had somehow appeared in his wrinkled hand.

The black-wood fishing rod.

It could not compare to Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, but this was the Dongting Fisherman's signature weapon, said to be as strong as meteorite iron and extraordinarily flexible.

Despite being partially damaged, it was still one zhang[2192] long. A fishing line and hook with a faint sheen hung from its tip.

That's…

I had never seen it before, but I had heard of it.

Heavenly Silkworm Thread—a rare treasure said to rival the Sichuan Tang Clan's Soul-Severing Thread.

It was strange enough that a mere silkworm cocoon was treated as a spiritual creature, as though the grand name Heavenly Silkworm were not enough. But even that was less astonishing than the thread itself, which was said to be so tough and sharp that not even steel could cut it.

The line attached to the black-wood fishing rod was that very Heavenly Silkworm Thread.

I'll have to be careful.

Caution couldn't hurt. Even if the Fire Dragon Armor was a divine weapon, it wasn't invincible armor capable of blocking everything.

I opened my mouth while staring at the Dongting Fisherman, who had stopped three zhang[2193] away.

"You have two choices. First, you die by my hand right here. Second, you tell me everything you know without leaving out a single detail, then atone to your victims. Which will it be?"

"…"

Instead of answering, he stared blankly at me through hazy grayish-white eyes.

There was no emotion in that gaze. A chill ran up my spine as I looked into eyes I could hardly believe belonged to a human being.

…What is this feeling?

Everyone had emotions.

[2192] A zhang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three zhang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft); five is about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

[2193] A zhang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three zhang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft); five is about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

But the Dongting Fisherman was different. He was clearly breathing, and I could sense life within him, yet he seemed like an empty object.

What the hell is this…?

I had no time to dwell on it. The next moment, I flinched and tightened my grip on the spear shaft.

A nameless fish had suddenly moved only a few steps away.

Its bones were exposed, and the flesh around its belly had been torn away. It thrashed several times, then went still.

Clear teeth marks scarred its body where someone had bitten into it.

No way.

I narrowed my eyes at the Dongting Fisherman.

Red blood and glinting scales clung to the wrinkles around his mouth.

Only then did I realize what had made the sounds I'd heard on my way here—and what he had been doing until moments ago.

He was ripping into it and eating it raw. While it was still alive.

What kind of lunatic old man was this?

A classic fantasy movie that cable channels used to rerun whenever they had an empty time slot suddenly flashed through my mind.

Now that I looked at him, he did resemble the monster from that movie. The small frame, the hunched back, even the sparse hair.

I clicked my tongue softly and addressed the Dongting Fisherman.

"This changes the genre… The divine artifact you people are looking for isn't a ring,[2194] is it?"

"…"

"Fine, don't answer. I was planning to question you while plucking out the few hairs you have left, one by one."

"Guh."

"Oh, shit. What was that?"

My eyes widened at the Dongting Fisherman's sudden reaction.

I'd just blurted out the first thing that came to mind. Had I actually hit a balding man's sore spot?

But I couldn't tell whether the Dongting Fisherman had reacted to the threat against his hair roots or for some other reason.

Before I could say another word, his old grayish-white eyes bulged, and a tremendous roar burst from his throat.

"GRAAAAAH!"

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

[2194] A reference to Gollum and the One Ring in The Lord of the Rings.

This was no shout from the old man who screamed on the hill behind the neighborhood every morning at dawn.

The roar, infused with immense internal energy, traveled through the air and hammered the cavern. Everything around us shook and burst apart—the floor, the walls, everything.

And before the shock wave could even spread, the Dongting Fisherman shot toward me, leaving a pale afterimage behind.

Whooooooosh!

His eyes had turned pitch-black.

As he charged alongside that streak of light, I spoke in a low, heavy voice.

“Turn down the volume, you fucking bastard.”

Fwoosh! Boom!

Blue-white flames enveloped the transparent spearhead as I stepped forward.

Pop!

Three zhang[2195] was by no means a short distance.

But the Dongting Fisherman and I were superhumans who had set foot in the realm of Supreme Peak. The moment we shot toward each other, distance lost all meaning. The gap vanished, and the air exploded.

White Flame’s spearhead, carrying unimaginable heat, and the Heavenly Silkworm Thread, writhing like a living creature as it carried several jiazi[2196] of internal energy, tore through space.

Shh-shh-shh-shh-shing!

The speed deserved to be called extreme swiftness.

The Heavenly Silkworm Thread extending from the tip of the black-wood fishing rod surged like a wave.

Its bizarre, unfathomable movements were unlike anything I had encountered among the countless weapons I’d faced.

The scars left on the countless corpses scattered throughout Donghu Stronghold flashed before my eyes.

He used this martial art to kill weak, innocent commoners.

I wasn’t especially sensitive, nor was I a junzi.[2197] I had no reason to defend the bandits of the Yangtze River Channel League. They were river bandits who had gathered to plunder, and they had undoubtedly taken other people’s lives and property.

[2195] A zhang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three zhang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft); five is about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

[2196] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

[2197] A junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright person.

It might seem as though I had taken lives too, but the difference between me and them was that they had not killed to survive. They had done it because it served their purposes.

But…

People should never have died like that.

Hundreds had been trampled like ants and cut down like livestock. Hundreds more had been drowned in the middle of Dongting Lake.

And most of them hadn't been martial artists. They were commoners who didn't know so much as a single form of martial arts. There had even been children who couldn't write their own names.

People like that should never have died that way.

No human being should kill another like that.

"You get it, you son of a bitch?"

In the slowed world, my voice vanished beneath the raging wind.

Power flooded the hand gripping the spear shaft. As the mighty Scorching Yang Qi boiled throughout my body, I brought the spearhead down at an angle.

Fwoosh. Shhk!

A single tongue of flame blossomed in the air.

At the same moment, the streak of light scattered.

A section of the Heavenly Silkworm Thread, severed along the path of my spearhead, fluttered away.

The Dongting Fisherman, whose form had been countered so easily, let out a strange scream and swung the black-wood fishing rod again.

Shing. Shh-shh-shh-shh-shing!

Streaks of light split the air in every direction.

The Heavenly Silkworm Thread, filled with Force, sliced through space, piercing and cutting everything in its path.

But I evaded every attack and silently swung my spear.

Shhk! Shhk! Shhk!

I could see it all clearly.

I could tell where that strange fishing-rod weapon would move and how the Heavenly Silkworm Thread attached to it would come for me.

My half-lidded eyes took in every detail, and my wide-open senses read each attack before it came.

If this had been me before my Middle Dantian opened, I would've struggled.

When the place where you stand changes, the scenery you see changes as well.

Opening my Middle Dantian had expanded my senses and granted me a new field of vision I hadn't even known existed. The results were unfolding before my eyes.

Here it comes.

Unusual weapons like the black-wood fishing rod were difficult to master. But once their advantages were fully exploited and paired with the proper martial arts, they became extremely troublesome to face.

Even so, I predicted the oncoming trajectory with perfect accuracy and swung my spear.

Shhk!

"GRAAAAAAAH!"

Another fast, razor-sharp strike severed the Heavenly Silkworm Thread.

The line had once stretched five zhang[2198], but I'd reduced it by nearly half without allowing it to inflict any meaningful damage. An even more ferocious aura erupted from the Dongting Fisherman's entire body.

"Now that's more like a person."

But martial arts displayed greater power when the mind and body were stable.

When the mind wavered, the body lost its balance. Movements grew wider and rougher.

And finding a gap in that loosened net wasn't difficult for me.

Whooooooosh!

Flamefire Path.

A single streak of fire raced across the damp cave floor.

Its internal energy consumption was tremendous and its trajectory simple, but like most of the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts, Flamefire Path had two great advantages.

It's fast and destructive.

Boom!

The air grew scorching hot, and every trace of moisture around us evaporated.

I stepped onto the ground, now dry and crumbly as desert sand, and shot forward like an arrow.

Swish!

I turned my head, and the Heavenly Silkworm Thread aimed at the back of my neck swept past.

Having missed, the Dongting Fisherman hurriedly redirected the thread and tried to wrap it around my entire body.

But I kicked off the ground half a beat faster.

Boom! Shhk!

Something as cold as ice traveled through the tip of my foot, then quickly turned hot as fire.

The flesh at the tip of my bare big toe had been sliced clean away.

[2198] A zhang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three zhang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft); five is about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

The pain was severe enough to make an ordinary person scream, but I accepted it without a flicker.

This is nothing.

I'd endured countless injuries and unimaginable pain while traveling between the modern world and Murim.

There had been times when I writhed in agony as though every bundle of nerves in my body were being severed, times when I had genuinely wanted to die.

Compared to that, an injury like this was nothing.

No—it was an absurdly cheap toll.

In exchange for losing only part of my big toe, I'd gained an opportunity to decide the outcome of this life-and-death duel.

Now!

My hands and feet obeyed the command from my brain, moving like flowing water.

Faster and cleaner than ever, without the slightest wasted motion.

I drew back the spear shaft, then hurled it forward with all my strength.

Whooooooosh—thud!

A strike like a flash of lightning.

White Flame left my hand, smashed through the Dongting Fisherman's shoulder as he sensed the danger and tried to retreat, then buried itself deep in the wall.

"GRAAAAAAAH!"

As his scream of pain filled the cave, I raised my fist toward him.

"I told you to turn down the volume."

"…!"

Thud!

Chapter 466

Even without using internal energy—and though I'd held back—I had already far surpassed human limits through pure physical strength alone.

Boom!

My fist struck him square in the face, and the Dongting Fisherman's entire body jerked. To him, it must have felt like being hit with an iron club.

His pitch-black pupils trembled. Blood-soaked yellow teeth tumbled from his gaping mouth.

One more.

Thud!

The Dongting Fisherman, blood pouring from his mouth and nose like a waterfall, staggered and waved his hand.

It was only a small movement, but my sharpened senses took in everything happening around me with perfect clarity.

Swish!

Something sliced faintly but sharply through the air, aiming for my back.

I already knew what it was.

The Heavenly Silkworm Thread.

Instead of dodging, I twisted the wrist of the hand gripping the Dongting Fisherman's black-wood fishing rod.

Crack!

His bones broke. The black-wood fishing rod slipped from his powerless grasp, and the Force-infused Heavenly Silkworm Thread fluttered limply through the air.

"What the fuck are you trying to pull, you son of a bitch? Who do you take me for, a sucker?"

The answer that came back was a heavy sound splitting the air.

Whoom!

The Dongting Fisherman's palm strike shot toward me with terrifying momentum. But I was already prepared. Without hesitation, I thrust out my own palm to meet it.

Boom!

The swift, concise first form of the Flame Divine Palm.

Two Forces—one white, one blue—collided in midair, sending razor-sharp winds whipping around us.

Through my wildly tossing hair, I stared coldly at the Dongting Fisherman.

"What are you doing, you bald bastard?"

"…!"

I didn't need an answer.

I already knew what I had to do, and the tip of my foot was already lashing out at the Dongting Fisherman's knee with lightning speed.

Thud!

His bones crunched. His body staggered, and blood spilled from the corner of his mouth.

The heavy impact momentarily disrupted the flow of his internal energy, and the Palm Force gathered in the palm still pressed against mine began to fade.

"All right. As of today, we're officially a thing."

The scales had already tipped in my favor. I laced my fingers tightly through his, then twisted with all my strength.

Crack!

Sibu-leol.[2199] I'd never even held a woman's hand in my life, yet here in Murim, I'd interlocked fingers with enough men to fill a truck.

Of course, an affectionate finger-lock fueled by the pent-up rage of a man who'd been single all his life never failed to deliver.

Just like now.

"Gyaaaaaaah!"

A scream of agony finally burst from the Dongting Fisherman's mouth.

I clenched my fist and punched him again and again as he stared at me with his pitch-black eyes wide open.

Thud! Thud! Thud-thud-thud!

Under the unceasing rain of fists and palms, the Dongting Fisherman's movements slowly weakened.

Or so I thought.

"Gueeeeeegh!"

What was it?

Had I let my guard down because I thought victory was assured? Had I grown too confident that I could capture him alive?

Whatever the reason, I hadn't been thorough.

And that created an opening.

Splaaash!

My vision turned completely red.

The sticky blood the Dongting Fisherman vomited drenched my face and froze my body for an instant.

And the counterattack of a Supreme Peak master fighting for his life was fiercer than I'd expected.

[2199] Sibu-leol is a colloquial Korean curse, roughly equivalent to "fuck."

Boom!

With a sound like compressed air exploding, a stream of internal energy seemed to pass straight through the surface of the Fire Dragon Armor and slammed into my upper body.

My vision blurred.

As the scenery flashed past, a thought crossed my mind.

Damn it. Inner-Family Heavy Hand.

He still had this much strength left?

I swallowed the blood surging up my throat and drew on my internal energy.

I'd taken an unexpected blow, but compared to the Dongting Fisherman's condition, this was nothing.

That I had suffered only a minor internal injury despite being caught off guard by the Inner-Family Heavy Hand was proof enough.

Whoooosh!

I sent the flow of internal energy, interrupted for only an instant, coursing through every limb and acupoint in my body.

The acupoints damaged by the Inner-Family Heavy Hand throbbed slightly, but that was all.

A carp didn't die just because someone scooped a bowlful of water from its pond.

Neither would I.

I'll finish this.

I twisted around in midair while hurtling backward. The opposite wall of the cave rushed toward me. I planted my foot against it lightly, then detonated the internal energy flowing through my toes.

Boom!

With a roar like the sky splitting apart, the unyielding rocks in the wall exploded.

Hundreds—thousands—of fragments tore through the air in every direction, but I was already gone.

Whooooooosh!

Heavier than a rock, faster than the wind.

My entire body cleaved through the air several times faster than when I'd been thrown back, carrying the weight of ten thousand geun.[2200]

"Dongting Fisherman!"

My shout shook the vast cavern. Several jiazi[2201] of Scorching Yang Qi carried in my voice pressed down the water and pushed the rocks aside.

And at the end of it all stood one man.

[2200] Geun is a Korean unit of weight: one geun is 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

[2201] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle, used here to measure accumulated internal energy.

"…!"

The Dongting Fisherman had just pulled White Flame from his shoulder and the rock wall behind him when he spotted me. His eyes flew wide.

His blackened pupils trembled, flashing a sliver of white.

His mouth quivered open, and his one remaining front tooth trembled pitifully.

"D-d-d-don't…"

Don't come any closer?

Fuck off.

I had no idea why the man who'd been acting like a lunatic only moments ago was suddenly trembling like that, but my mind was already made up.

I was going to bring you back in one piece if possible… but that's not happening now.

It was too late for regret. The Dongting Fisherman should have regretted his actions long ago.

Before joining hands with Dark Heaven. Before brutally slaughtering innocent commoners and children.

That was when he should have regretted his actions and repented.

Now that we'd come this far, there was no need for repentance.

All that remained was punishment for his crimes.

You're fucking dead.

I didn't care if I crushed all four of his limbs. As long as he kept breathing, I could tear out every last strand of hair and every tooth, then drive a stalactite up his ass.

I would take his life only after he'd spat out everything he knew about Dark Heaven.

I'd leave him just alive enough to breathe.

Only until my anger at what he had done had diminished, even slightly.

With exactly that much force behind me, I shot toward him and extended my fist through the slowed world.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Whoooooosh!

Fiercely blazing blue-white hellfire swallowed the palm strike the Dongting Fisherman thrust out with his broken hand.

His Palm Force, now as murky as muddy water, shattered and evaporated beneath the Scorching Yang Qi. Beyond the ceaseless whirlwind and flashes of light, my flame-wreathed fist smashed through the Body-Protecting Qi surrounding him.

Crack! Booooom!

Every blood vessel in the Dongting Fisherman's bulging eyes burst. He vomited blood as he was driven into the wall.

Fine, spiderweb-like cracks spread across the hard rock of the cavern wall. Soon, they widened into a massive fissure that reached all the way to the ceiling.

Rumble. Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The ceiling collapsed, and the ground split apart.

The rocks that had endured tremendous water pressure deep beneath the vast freshwater lake of Dongting Lake began collapsing one after another. Streams of water surged up from every direction.

Collapse.

This space, created at some unknown point in the past, would soon come crashing down.

Just like its owner, who would never return to his secret refuge.

I have to hurry.

Rattle-rattle!

I pressed the Dongting Fisherman's acupoints to stop the bleeding. Then, in case anything happened, I sealed him with Pressure-Point Strikes so he could not move even a hair.

I hoisted the small old man onto my back, then punched forward without hesitation.

Boom! Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A raging current was visible through the sinkhole-like opening in the floor.

I took a deep breath and leaped into the violent water.

Splash!

Cold water closed around my body, and a familiar message rang in my ears.

SYSTEM

Title effect activated: Water Rescue Worker
Special Skill embedded in the Title applied.
Water Rescue Worker's Webbed Feet generated.
Water Rescue Worker's Gills generated.
Remaining duration: 18 hours, 43 minutes, 32 seconds

I had plenty of time.

I moved my body powerfully with the current.

Before long, I noticed the Dongting Fisherman constantly blowing bubbles from his mouth and nose. The sight reminded me of something I'd momentarily overlooked.

What the… Ah.

Even a master of water arts needed enough internal energy and awareness to use those techniques.

He didn't breathe through gills like I did. If he remained underwater too long, he might die.

Wait. If that's the case…

A flash of insight struck me.

At the same time, I began swimming with all my strength.

Interlocking fingers was one thing, but I wasn't about to give up my first kiss too.

Especially not to a crazy old man who was nearly a hundred!

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A vibration that began somewhere deep underwater grew so powerful that it reached the people on the surface.

At the sudden anomaly, the old boatman shrank into himself with fear in his eyes, while the other three men's faces stiffened.

"Um, I think…"

"It seems it's finally begun. Or perhaps it has already ended."

Gung Gibang answered Cheongpung's murmur in a grave voice.

Hyuk Mujin, who had been anxiously watching the trembling cliff and river, abruptly spoke.

"We have to go."

Gung Gibang furrowed his brow.

"What?"

"It's certain that something happened to our Captain. I have a bad feeling."

"But Jin Taekyung, that bastard…"

"He told us not to move and to wait here. I know."

"Then why?"

"I've always been terrible at listening to people."

"Damn. You sound proud of it."

"Isn't it better than sitting here sucking our fingers?"

At Hyuk Mujin's words, Gung Gibang gnawed at his lower lip.

He, too, had been uneasy for some time.

He didn't know exactly when it had begun, but his heart was pounding violently, and every one of his senses was on edge.

What's wrong with me? Did something really happen to that bastard?

A face flashed before his eyes.

The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi.

No—the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

The kind of bastard who looked capable of crawling back alive even if he were thrown into the deepest pit of the underworld. More vicious than A-Gwi[2202] and strong enough to beat Yama[2203] himself into the ground.

I've never once imagined that bastard dying… But nothing is absolute. Surely not?

Gung Gibang hadn't dismissed what Jin Taekyung had said before entering the river. After traveling with him for so long, he knew there was always a reason behind the man's words and actions.

But this time, he couldn't help wavering.

Goddammit. The weather's gone completely to shit too. What the hell am I supposed to do?

Rumble. Crash!

Just as the old boatman had warned a couple of shichen[2204] earlier, even calling the current weather on Dongting Lake the worst imaginable would have been an understatement.

A raging storm. Lightning crashing down from the sky.

Gung Gibang looked around with conflicted eyes and finally opened his mouth.

Or rather, he was just about to when—

"It's all right."

"Huh?"

"What?"

Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin turned their heads at the same time.

Someone was smiling brightly in their field of view.

At the edge of the small island where they stood, Cheongpung had been lying facedown, listening to something. He brushed the sand from his ear and grinned.

"Benefactor is coming."

And then—

Splaaash!

A figure shot from the water atop a towering spray and landed heavily on the sandy shore.

A muscular young man with a small old man slung over his back.

It was Jin Taekyung.

"Captain!"

"You're back!"

"Benefactooor!"

"Stay back, you dickheads. If any of you tries to hug me, all three of you are getting murdered today."

[2202] A-Gwi is a legendary Dogon from Sichuan, invoked here as a measure of ferocity.

[2203] Yama is the Buddhist lord of the underworld.

[2204] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; a couple of shichen is about four hours.

After stopping the three men charging toward him with cries of joy, Jin Taekyung continued in a grave voice.

“We don’t have time, so I’ll get straight to the point. Raise your hand if you’ve ever kissed someone. Or if you want to try it. Hands up.”

Two of them caught on quickly.

One was hopelessly oblivious.

As Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin quietly backed away, one hand shot into the air amid a bright, innocent shout.

“Me! Me! I’ve never kissed anyone before!”

“Fuck. Thank God.”

“Huh?”

Beaming from ear to ear, Jin Taekyung held the Dongting Fisherman out toward the bewildered Cheongpung.

“Your wish just came true.”

Rumble. Crash!

Thunder and lightning shook the entire world.

Chapter 467

I've always been the kind of person who thinks the process matters just as much as the result.

But sometimes, I deliberately look away from the process.

Not every process has to be perfect and beautiful, after all.

What matters is the result. The result.

Yeah, that's all I'm saying.

And behind the process that everyone—including me—had chosen to ignore, an excellent result finally revealed itself.

Cough! Splash!

Water spilled between the Dongting Fisherman's cracked lips as he coughed.

Cheongpung, who had shown a moving spirit of self-sacrifice against the Dongting Fisherman, opened his mouth with a strange expression.

"It feels weird."

I exchanged glances with Hyuk Mujin, Gung Gibang, and the old boatman, then answered solemnly.

"It's always like that the first time."

"Did you feel the same way, Benefactor?"

"…Of course."

I'd never done it before, but even if I did, I wouldn't feel the way Cheongpung did. No, I shouldn't.

I subtly averted my eyes as I answered. Cheongpung nodded, then took a deep breath.

"But I really don't understand this."

"You're excited. That's all."

"It smelled strange, too. Like fish."

What a nose.

I remembered the Dongting Fisherman tearing into a raw fish before our fight and answered.

"You're imagining it."

"My stomach feels sick."

"That's because your body is releasing hormones. Kissing is good for your immune system and helps relieve stress too…"

"What?"

"Nothing."

"My stomach just feels really nauseous. I want some sweets."

Hyuk Mujin patted Cheongpung's shoulder guiltily.

“I’ll buy you some later, Young Hero Cheong.”

“You will, Hyuk Mujin?”

“Yes. I’ll find some way to feed you until your stomach bursts.”

“But you’re poor too, Hyuk Mujin. Last time, I saw you picking up silver nyang[2205] at the ferry landing…”

“My father is rich.”

Hyuk Mujin only seemed poor because following me around had put him through all sorts of hardship. His family business was thriving more by the day, so he was still the son of a wealthy household.

At the proud declaration of a second-generation rich kid planning to bleed his father dry, the other two men, who had been watching Cheongpung with sad eyes, joined in.

“Cheongpung, I’ll contribute too, even if I have to beg for the money.”

“This old man is willing to lower your fare a little as well.”

“Wow! Really?”

“…”

A pang of guilt stabbed at my heart.

But it couldn’t be helped. It had definitely been his choice.

After doing my best to justify myself, I checked the Dongting Fisherman’s condition.

“How is he?”

At Hyuk Mujin’s question from over my shoulder, I nodded.

“He’s fine.”

“Uh… He doesn’t look particularly fine.”

I was momentarily speechless as I looked down at the Dongting Fisherman.

Both arms were twisted at bizarre angles, and countless wounds showed through his clothes, which had been torn to shreds.

Those were merely the injuries visible to the naked eye. The severe internal injuries were a bonus.

“What on earth happened?”

I gave them a brief summary of what had happened inside the underwater cave.

“I was on guard in case anything happened, but he was weaker than I expected, so I beat the shit out of him and dragged him back.”

“…”

After a brief silence, Hyuk Mujin spoke.

“But the Dongting Fisherman is a master of incredible water arts.”

“That’s why I beat him on land. Turns out there was a cave in there.”

[2205] A nyang was a traditional unit of currency; silver nyang refers to money measured in silver.

"You have an incredible talent for making extremely difficult things sound easy."

"It wasn't extremely easy, but it wasn't extremely difficult either."

"…"

"The important thing is that he's still breathing."

"The fact that he's still breathing looks like a miracle."

"Considering what that old man has done, he deserves to die right now."

"That's true. Either way, it's fortunate. I was worried about the Dongting Fisherman, of course, but I was also worried that Dark Heaven's other bastards might be there with him."

That was something I had considered as well.

According to Honglan's testimony, the Dongting Fisherman had been the sole culprit behind the tragedy on Dongting Lake.

But slaughtering Yangtze One Saber and so many others at Donghu Stronghold would have required at least two Supreme Peak masters, if not more.

Mungyeong said the same thing.

No matter how rapidly I had grown, taking on two or more Supreme Peak masters at once was… hard to say.

Even among people who had reached the same realm, ability varied wildly.

The Dongting Fisherman was a step below me.

I'd been lucky. If the Dongting Fisherman had been working with another of Dark Heaven's powerhouses, I might have been the one to go down instead.

Of course, I wouldn't have started a fight with such slim odds in the first place.

"But shouldn't this old man be waking up by now? Why isn't he moving at all? Did he swallow too much water?"

At Gung Gibang's question, Cheongpung, who was rinsing his mouth with lake water, answered.

"He's been hit with Pressure-Point Strikes. Right, Benefactor?"

"Yeah. Exactly."

At present, the Dongting Fisherman's Paralysis, Mute, and Sleep Acupoints had all been struck.

Even if the seal on his Sleep Acupoint wore off and he woke from his forced sleep, his body would remain paralyzed, and he wouldn't be able to move his lips. Forget resisting—he couldn't even squirm like a grub.

"What do you intend to do now?"

"We've accomplished our objective, so we're going back."

We were not the only ones who knew the location of this place. If Dark Heaven had caught wind of it and sent reinforcements, we could easily have ended up trapped instead.

If a monster like the Western Heaven Demon Lord showed up, we might have to prepare ourselves to die.

There were clear limits to what Cheongpung and I could do alone.

Dark Heaven was unquestionably involved in the string of incidents across Hubei Province. The biggest problem was that we knew neither where they were nor who their members were.

But if we could force the Dongting Fisherman to talk, we could uncover every last detail about them and launch a counterattack.

The Fire King and the Slaughter Saint—two peerless Supreme Peak masters—would commit their full strength, as would Wudang and the Zhuge Clan, the undisputed rulers of Hubei Province.

"We're leaving. Right now."

But an obstacle I hadn't considered stood in our way.

"Um, Great Hero."

The old boatman had suddenly spoken. After hesitating for a moment, he continued, his face stiff.

"I beg your pardon, but in this old man's humble opinion, it simply can't be done."

"What?"

"As you know, Great Hero, Dongting Lake right now…"

Rumble-rumble-rumble! Crash!

Thunder booming from all directions swallowed the rest of the boatman's words.

He hunched his shoulders as though frightened, then pointed around us with anxious eyes.

"Look. How can we possibly launch a boat in conditions like these?"

"…!"

He had good reason to be trembling.

The sky had turned pitch-black, and lightning struck at irregular intervals. Heavy rain had begun pouring down at some point, noticeably swelling the waters of Dongting Lake. Violent whirlpools battered the cliffs and rocks.

Of all times for this to happen.

It hadn't been this bad when we entered the Dongting Fisherman's secret refuge. Yet in less than a single shichen,[2206] the situation around us had rapidly deteriorated toward the worst possible outcome.

But…

"We have to go."

"G-Great Hero."

[2206] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

"I understand that you're afraid, but it's possible. You saw with your own eyes how we got here."

I had suffered a minor internal injury, but I was still in good shape.

On top of that, we had Cheongpung, a Supreme Peak master, and Gung Gibang, who possessed exceptional martial arts. Hyuk Mujin could also lend a hand in an emergency.

No matter how bad the weather or how violent the current, it wasn't enough to declare the journey impossible.

The old boatman thought differently.

"I've held an oar on Dongting Lake for more than forty years. Today was the first time I've ever ferried great masters like you, but it was also the first time I've ever launched a boat in weather this vicious."

The old boatman struggled to get the words out, his voice trembling.

"All I know how to do is read the water and row a boat. I'm an unremarkable old man, but I've spent more than half my life on Dongting Lake. If it can't be done, it can't be done."

"Boatman."

Gung Gibang stepped forward, but before he could say anything, the boatman shook his head repeatedly.

"I know what you're going to say. But no matter how skilled you are, it's clear you won't make it very far."

"Why do you think that?"

"The boat won't hold up."

"…!"

At the boatman's firm declaration, everyone—including me—stared with wide eyes.

He was right. No matter how sturdy it was, a ferryboat was still a ferryboat.

To find the Dongting Fisherman's secret refuge, the boat had needed to be light and small. It had been perfect for that purpose, but those same advantages were now its greatest weaknesses.

Even by the shortest route, it'll take at least two shichen[2207] to reach land… What if the boat sinks before then?

The answer to my own question came back immediately.

No.

Even if I used my internal energy to perform Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water,[2208] the distance left is too great. And that was before the weather became like this. The boatman is right. The boat won't hold.

[2207] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[2208] Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water is a martial-arts movement feat for crossing the surface of water.

Even at a glance, I could see patches where wood had been torn from the surface of the ferryboat pulled up onshore.

Like its white-haired owner, the ferryboat was showing its age, and today's currents and voyage had been especially rough.

Damn it.

This wasn't something I could solve by persuading the boatman.

I could use the Water Rescue Worker Title's effect, which still had plenty of time remaining, or try the same method of using the Inventory that I had used at Dongting Lake before.

But no matter how I considered the situation, the risk was too great.

"Captain."

At Hyuk Mujin's voice, I raised my head and saw everyone looking at me.

Under their gazes, I thought for a moment, then bit my lip.

"What about the route leading in?"

"Pardon?"

I spoke clearly to the old boatman, who had hunched his shoulders at another peal of thunder.

"If it's difficult to get out, wouldn't it also be difficult to get in? Especially in conditions like these."

"Ah, of course it would. The passage is so narrow that nothing but a ferryboat like mine could enter, and with these insane currents, getting in would be several times harder than getting out. Launching a boat on Dongting Lake in weather like this is madness to begin with."

Then that was even better.

It meant the weather would naturally prevent any possible incursion by Dark Heaven as well.

We should wait here until the weather settles down.

I had just finished that thought and was about to give the order when—

Jerk. Jerk-jerk-jerk!

Someone nearby suddenly began to move.

I and the others turned our heads toward its source and opened our eyes wide at the same time.

What the hell?

The small old man who had been lying motionless as though dead—the Dongting Fisherman—was twitching.

Even as we watched, the trembling running through his body grew faster and stronger.

"He was definitely under Pressure-Point Strikes… How?"

Cheongpung muttered the words like a groan.

As the person who had struck the Dongting Fisherman's pressure points, I could not easily accept what was happening either.

But my surprise lasted only a moment.

Before my mind could fully process the situation, my body was already moving.

Swish!

I shot forward like a gust of wind and thrust out my hand at top speed.

First, the Sleep Acupoint.

Next, the Paralysis Acupoint.

Finally, the Mute Acupoint.

The instant I finished striking his pressure points again, I realized something I hadn't expected.

His acupoint seals had never come undone in the first place. This was simply… the Dongting Fisherman's body reacting independently of his will.

I faltered in confusion.

Grab!

A hand seized my wrist, which had been left hanging in midair.

The Dongting Fisherman was staring at me, his eyes wide open.

Unlike in the cave, his pupils looked like those of an ordinary person.

They were filled with fear.

And then a hollow voice, empty as though his soul had left his body, pierced my ears.

"Run."

What?

I had no time to form a question.

I wasn't given a chance to react.

The moment every sense in my body went taut, an enormous roar erupted behind me.

Kaboom—!

Chapter 468

Rumble-rumble-rumble, crash!

It was a storm unlike anything anyone had ever experienced.

Every time thunder boomed alongside the lightning, the rain grew heavier, and the river thrashed like a violent dragon.

And one ship was trying to fight its way against it all.

“Hard to port!”

The ship rocked like a willow leaf amid the raging waves. At Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song’s shout from the stern, the river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold gritted their teeth.

“Grrrrgh!”

“Keep rowing! Put your asses into it and row!”

“Anyone who slacks off from this moment on had better watch out! What was it called again? Right! I’ll sentence you to the dip-and-taste punishment![2209]”

“Aaaaaah!”

Every one of them was a seasoned, highly skilled sailor.

But despite Mu Song’s experienced commands and the river bandits’ efforts to summon every last ounce of strength, the worst weather they had ever encountered refused to let the ship advance any farther.

Crash! Boom!

The sail, swollen almost to the point of tearing, was driven back by the force of the wind. Rocks large and small flew in from every direction and slammed into the deck.

Disbelief flashed through Mu Song’s eyes at the impossible sight.

What in the world is this?

Martial arts were not the only thing he had learned from his Master, the Seafaring King.

If anything, he had first learned how to steer all sorts of ships, predict the weather, and read the currents—before he had learned martial arts.

Mu Song had been a sailor before he was a Murim martial artist, and no river bandit would follow an incompetent captain.

The little boy who had once yearned for the Yangtze had grown into a captain skilled enough to earn the respect of even old sailors. Even his coldhearted Master, who had not shown his Disciple the slightest hint of affection, had once said:

[2209] “Dip-and-taste” refers to dipping food into sauce before eating; Mu Song turns the phrase into the name of a joking punishment.

> "It's a shame. If your grit and martial talent had been even half as good as your skill with ships, you might have taken your Senior Brother's place."

There could not be two masters of the Yangtze River Channel League.

The Seafaring King had already chosen his Senior Disciple as his successor, so he sent Mu Song to Sichuan. After founding Water Dragon Stronghold, Mu Song soon distinguished himself and seized control of Sichuan's stretch of the Yangtze at a young age.

Yet even Mu Song had never seen anything like this.

His Master, the Seafaring King, and the old river bandits who had spent their entire lives as sailors before retiring had probably never seen it either.

It wasn't like this when we left the Yangtze tributary. So how…?

The reason was simple.

The weather had changed with shocking speed.

And they were currently on none other than Dongting Lake.

After receiving Zhuge Feng's sudden summons, Mu Song had selected his most capable subordinates, crossed Tianling Falls, and immediately headed for Dongting Lake after asking around for Jin Taekyung's whereabouts.

Not long afterward, they had run into a storm more suited to the middle of the sea.

Is this even possible? On Dongting Lake?

Hubei Province's climate was generally warm. Its annual rainfall was fairly consistent, and although the Yangtze occasionally flooded, the flooding was rarely severe. In fact, it was one of the reasons the region had become such a fertile breadbasket.

Dongting Lake? It was certainly one of the three largest lakes under heaven, but it was still only a lake.

No matter how bad the weather became, it should not have been worse than the Yangtze's currents. Compared to the unpredictable whirlpools of the sea, it should have been laughable.

That was what he had believed.

At least until two shichen[2210] ago.

It wasn't this bad when we first launched the ship.

He had not been particularly worried. Since Dongting Lake was not connected to the Yangtze or the sea routes, there was no way to bring a swift ship here. They had borrowed a small merchant vessel instead and headed for the place where Jin Taekyung's group was said to have gone.

Or rather, they had tried to.

[2210] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours. Two shichen are approximately four hours.

Unlike at the beginning, the weather had grown steadily worse the closer they came to their destination.

It was as though they had crossed some invisible line. Strange phenomena that should not have been possible on a lake were appearing everywhere.

Whooooooosh.

A waterspout rose with a chilling howl of wind.

It towered to a dizzying height, blocking the narrow waterway as it advanced toward the merchant vessel. A groan slipped between Mu Song's clenched teeth.

"What the fucking hell is this…?"

If they were caught in that, it was over. Even if they managed to get past the waterspout, a merchant vessel this flimsy would not survive for long.

Torn between concern for his subordinates' safety and his desire for revenge against Dark Heaven, which had killed Yangtze One Saber, Mu Song finally spoke.

"I'm sorry, but I'm afraid this is as far as we can go."

An old voice answered him.

"That's enough."

And then—

Swish!

Behind Mu Song, a small figure that had remained perfectly balanced leaped from the mast.

He shot toward the waterspout through the driving rain and wind, then clenched his fist.

Hoooooong.

A single stream of wind wrapped around the fist mottled with age spots. The air stopped moving, and not a single drop of rain dared approach.

At the tip of that fist, hellfire capable of burning everything took shape.

"Get the hell out of my way."

With a voice like boiling lava, Fire King Jeok Cheongang threw a punch.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Whooooooosh!

The next moment, Mu Song and the river bandits saw it clearly.

The flames rising from the fist transformed into a fire dragon and bit into the waist of the waterspout.

The churning water collapsed in an instant beneath the overwhelming Scorching Yang Qi, every trace of moisture evaporating. The waterspout, which had been bearing down on the merchant vessel with the force of ten thousand geun[2211], became a dense cloud of steam that spread around them like fog.

[2211] A Korean geun is approximately 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun are approximately 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

Then—

Boom!

The heavy sound of something splitting the air scattered the steam.

Jeok Cheongang stood tall in midair, looking down at the merchant vessel. His voice, more deeply subdued than usual, drifted from his lips.

“What are you waiting for? Hurry up and follow me.”

He was not speaking to Mu Song or the river bandits under his command. Their roles had been decided from the beginning, and they had more than fulfilled them.

Only true masters belonged on the battlefield ahead.

And as everyone watched, one person stepped forward.

“Single Reed Crossing the River. Even Master Bodhidharma of Shaolin used a reed leaf to cross a river. From now on, you’d better come down instead of wasting your internal energy for no reason.”

Not a trace of emotion could be found in the flat, dry voice.

The bright, warm boy who had been caring for the sick as a medical apprentice only a short while ago was nowhere to be found.

As Mu Song and the river bandits flinched and moved aside, Mungyeong clicked his tongue inwardly.

Dong Feng. You foolish Disciple. In the end, things turned out exactly as you wanted.

He had lived as a medical apprentice for more than forty years.

With hands that had taken more than a thousand lives, he had treated and cared for the sick.

Instead of fiends, he had hunted the bastard called plague. He had gained the undeserved reputation of being a Divine Physician, but he had never once accepted wealth or sought fame.

It had merely been atonement.

And a vow.

But now, the stone pagoda he had built deep within his heart over decades of living as a medical apprentice had come crashing down.

No—perhaps it had collapsed the day he boarded the swift ship leaving Sichuan.

This too is the path this old man chose. How could I blame anyone else?

With a dry chuckle, he stepped forward. Behind him appeared a middle-aged man in disheveled scholar’s robes.

“This junior will go with you, Seniors.”

At the words of Zhuge Feng, the current Family Head of the Zhuge Clan and the Crouching Dragon Guest, Mungyeong answered in a dry voice.

“Of course you should. Why else would I bring a burden like you?”

“You certainly have a talent for embarrassing people.”

Mungyeong made a show of frowning. He had no intention of listening to Zhuge Feng ramble, especially when the man was no more than a babe compared to him.

“Enough nonsense. Get on my back.”

“You underestimate this junior. My enlightenment may not match that of the other Family Heads of the Five Great Families, but when it comes to internal energy alone…”

“There’s a reason I brought you here. If I had prioritized martial arts, I would have brought that youngster Hyeongong of Wudang instead. But shouldn’t someone remain back there?”

“…!”

Perfected Being Hyeongong was a master whose seniority placed him alongside the Sect Leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang.

Mu Song and the river bandits had been unable to determine Mungyeong’s identity beyond knowing that he was a Returned to Youth master. They were shocked to hear him refer to Perfected Being Hyeongong, a respected elder throughout Murim, as a child.

“Gasp!”

“Who in the world is that man…?”

But Mungyeong had neither the time nor the inclination to answer.

He extended a hand, and Zhuge Feng’s body came sliding toward him.

After seizing none other than the current Family Head of the Zhuge Clan with Seizing an Object Through Empty Space, Mungyeong lightly pushed off the deck and soared like a bird.

Swish!

A movement technique both stealthy and impossibly elusive.

Not a single person left aboard the ship could recognize the Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step at its pinnacle.

Leaving the stunned men behind, Mungyeong’s body shot forward as though folding space.

“Is this the right direction?”

Splash!

Two—no, three figures sped forward, their feet stepping across the water.

Zhuge Feng, dangling from Mungyeong’s hand, answered Jeok Cheongang.

“According to what Ship-Fire Boy told us, we only need to keep heading straight from here.”

“Are you certain?”

“Of course. However…”

“However?”

After hesitating for a moment, Zhuge Feng continued.

"We still don't know whether Jin Taekyung is there."

"He is. Without a doubt."

Jeok Cheongang immediately shook his head. His tone was nearly one of certainty.

"This weather… It isn't a coincidence. Something unknown came here, and Taekyung is clearly after it."

"It's too early to jump to conclusions. We must first identify what it is."

At Mungyeong's words, Jeok Cheongang unconsciously reached inside his robes.

His hand closed around something as sharp as a sword blade and as hard as armor.

When Mungyeong had first brought it and shown it to the two of them, neither Jeok Cheongang nor Zhuge Feng had been able to believe what it was.

What is this? What in the world is happening?

The unease in the old man's chest swelled rapidly, and his speed increased with it as he crossed the water using Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A tremendous roar rang out from beyond the violent rain and dense fog.

All three men's eyes widened.

"This is…"

It was not thunder and lightning rumbling across the sky.

The black heavens above them were silent. The enormous sound had clearly come from somewhere several hundred jang[2212] ahead.

"You bastards—!"

Jeok Cheongang's furious roar rang out as he shot forward first. Mungyeong followed close behind, holding Zhuge Feng firmly in his grasp as the water split to either side.

But before even an instant had passed, the three men were forced to stop simultaneously.

"…!"

The shock was so immense that none of them could speak.

They did not even need to move closer to confirm what had caused it.

At last, the identity of "it" appeared in the distance.

The three men stood frozen, utterly speechless.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The cliff collapsed with a deafening roar.

[2212] A jang is a traditional Korean length of approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Boulders weighing ten thousand geun[2213], which had clearly been part of it for centuries, came pouring down like a rain shower, and an enormous spray of water surged upward.

But none of that mattered.

I stared with trembling eyes at “it” rising amid the destruction.

More precisely, I stared at the System window floating above its head.

[2213] A Korean geun is approximately 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun are approximately 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

Chapter 469

Everyone saw it. They could see it.

Amid the blackened sky and the violent wind and rain, a shower of strangely shaped rocks came crashing down.

Rumble-rumble-rumble, crash!

When a massive boulder struck the lake, spray erupted several jang[2214] into the air. Birds that had lost their nests tumbled from the collapsing cliff with shrill cries, while torrential rain and lightning battered the world without pause.

And as everything collapsed around them… one being alone reared up.

Whooooooosh!

Water cascaded down its body like a waterfall.

Far below, the humans reduced to tiny dots gazed up at the being that had finally revealed itself, their eyes filled with stunned disbelief.

It was enormous.

Even that word felt inadequate, yet no other came to mind.

Only one question filled everyone's thoughts.

What is that?

Scales gleamed with an ominously beautiful black sheen. Its body was so thick that ten burly men with their arms outstretched could barely have encircled it.

Their gazes traveled up the long, sinuous body, more than thirty jang[2215] of it visible above the surface, until they reached two horns jutting from its forehead.

And beneath them, its eyes.

Blood-red pupils stretched into long vertical slits. As the scales around its mouth slowly parted, they revealed saw-edged teeth and a maw like a dark cavern.

Grrrrr.

The vicious growl echoing down from far above sent a chill deep into the bones of Crouching Dragon Guest Zhuge Feng.

What in the world…?

Zhuge Feng had been called the greatest genius in his clan since infancy.

He possessed an extraordinary mind that never forgot anything he had seen, along with an insatiable thirst for knowledge. Over the years, he had devoured tens of thousands of books and made the vast knowledge of the world his own.

The river of knowledge within Zhuge Feng was endlessly broad and deep.

Or so he had thought.

Until he saw that.

[2214] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft). Several jang means several times that distance.

[2215] Thirty jang is about 91 meters (298 ft).

This cannot be.

For the first time in his life, he felt the fear of confronting the unknown.

At that moment, Zhuge Feng realized that all the knowledge and information he had accumulated had turned to foam.

He also realized that fragments of the countless myths and legends he had dismissed as nonsense now stood before his eyes.

Could those absurd stories… truly have been real?

Zhuge Feng had always placed absolute faith in the power of knowledge.

He was a martial artist, but first and foremost, he was the Family Head of the distinguished Zhuge Clan, and he had used reliable information and knowledge to protect his many clansmen and his family's power.

To a man like him, unverified superstition was not even worth considering. Believing in an illusion no one had ever seen was simply foolish.

But someone a hundred jang[2216] away from Zhuge Feng was different.

Unlike Zhuge Feng, he was not a Family Head responsible for an entire household. He was merely an old boatman who had survived by relying on his own experience and a single ferryboat.

"…!"

The old boatman stared into the sky with trembling eyes.

A colossal being stood tall amid the collapse of everything around it. The sight alone made his legs buckle, while unbearable awe and fear pressed down on his shabby shoulders.

The cry that the crushing pressure kept him from voicing echoed only in his heart.

It's the divine spirit. The divine spirit of Dongting Lake has revealed itself!

The world was filled with more superstitions than anyone could count, and Hubei Province was no exception.

An old man told a child, and when that child grew old, he told another child. Stories passed from mouth to mouth for hundreds of years.

The old boatman was no different.

A native of Hubei Province who had spent his entire life on the water, he knew the identity of the being he called a divine spirit.

The Two-Horned Beast of Dongting Lake.

The Water God Dragon.

The true master of Dongting Lake.

Ah… ahhh…

The old boatman trembled violently. His entire body shook beneath an emotion he could not understand, and something swelled within his chest.

[2216] A hundred jang is about 303 meters (994 ft).

It was an emotion only he, among everyone present, could feel.

Awe and fear too profound to put into words.

A boatman to the marrow of his bones, he could not believe that he had come face-to-face with the master of Dongting Lake. The aura flowing from that being left him struggling to breathe.

The divine spirit is angry. All of this happened because the divine spirit was enraged!

The old boatman realized that his guess had been correct.

The countless deaths that had occurred one after another over the past month. He did not know why, but the divine spirit had certainly been angered beyond measure.

And in the end, it would punish him just as it had punished the others.

With death!

He could not die like this. Somehow, he had to calm the divine spirit's anger.

A cracked cry burst from the old boatman's mouth as he stood there, entranced.

"D-Divine Spirit! This humble one has committed no sin!"

The silence that had settled over everyone shattered. The old boatman's cry scattered into the wind and rain.

Before the others, frozen rigid by the colossal being's appearance, could stop him, the old boatman ran toward the water on trembling legs.

"Divine Spiriiit!"

Tap-tap-tap, splash!

The instant the old boatman's shabby straw sandals touched the water of Dongting Lake—

Swish.

In a world that had slowed to a crawl, a gigantic pair of eyes turned toward him.

The old boatman's reflection appeared in those blood-red vertical pupils. As the creature registered the tiny, insignificant human, the light in its eyes blazed crimson.

Whooooooosh!

A chilling aura erupted in every direction from the thirty-jang[2217] body.

Birds in flight lost their strength and plummeted. Thousands of fish fleeing in schools through the depths of Dongting Lake floated belly-up to the surface.

An aura as immense as its body, an aura akin to death.

Neither insignificant creatures nor even humans could remain unharmed before it.

Before that invisible aura even reached him, the old boatman's entire body had already stiffened like a stone statue.

[2217] Thirty jang is about 91 meters (298 ft).

His mouth hung open, his eyes bulged wide. Just as his pupils began to roll white beneath the grip of terror—

Whoosh! Thud!

A sharp whistle cut through the air, and the old boatman crumpled where he stood.

A young man gently caught his frail body, then raised his head and stared at the enormous being.

“Hey, you fucking eel bastard.”

…!

At the clear voice, the enormous being’s pupils swelled as though it had realized something.

Different.

Every other human on the ground had frozen from shock and fear, but this young man was different. He was neither stunned nor trembling.

Fear of the unknown came from confronting something incomprehensible.

But that young man was free from it all. More than fearless, he almost seemed accustomed to this.

Just like now.

“Can’t you open those eyes properly?”

With that offhand remark from the young man, Jin Taekyung, a streak of light tore through the air.

Whooooooosh! Bam!

When I first saw the thing, only one thought flashed through my mind.

Am I seeing things?

I could hardly have thought otherwise. A monster I had seen somewhere before had appeared right in front of me—not in the modern world, but in Murim.

If it had merely been an illustration in some fantasy novel, that would have been one thing. Unfortunately, I recognized it from the Monster Encyclopedia, compiled over the past several decades by countless leading scholars and Hunters who had fought in the Great Cataclysm.

Could that be…?

Although the monsters I had fought most often during my Hunter career had been low-level creatures like goblins, the section I had looked at most in the Monster Encyclopedia was the one covering the highest-level monsters.

And that thing was one of the monsters given a particularly large entry.

…A Sea Serpent.

As its name suggested, a Sea Serpent was a marine monster.

In the early days of the Great Cataclysm, a Sea Serpent had announced its existence to the entire world by sinking a US carrier battle group. For some reason, it vanished shortly after the Great Cataclysm.

No, let me correct that.

At least, that had been true until a moment ago.

A Sea Serpent in Murim? What the hell is going on…?

I had frozen in shock, but I soon noticed something strange.

Wait. Something's different.

In the modern world where I had been born and raised, the Sea Serpent was not some fictional monster that appeared only in mythology.

It was one of the highest-level monsters serving the Demon King Asmodeus, as well as one of the major culprits responsible for inflicting terrible damage on humanity.

Naturally, there were high-resolution photographs showing exactly what it looked like, along with preserved video recordings of its battles.

But the monster before me was clearly different from the Sea Serpent depicted in the Monster Encyclopedia.

The Sea Serpent looks more like an actual sea snake, but that thing is closer to an Eastern dragon.

The more closely I looked, the more certain I became. There were subtle differences in the size and length of its body, as well as the shape of its face.

But these two similar yet different monsters did share one crucial trait.

Whooooooosh!

It was that.

An inherently ferocious aura possessed only by monsters—fundamentally different from what martial artists called killing intent.

Fear.

Fear was exactly what it sounded like: terror and dread.

Every monster possessed it, but the stronger the monster, the more powerful its Fear became.

It shackled an enemy's body by instilling fear and terror, then shattered the enemy's mind.

Just like the Dongting Fisherman.

The scattered puzzle pieces in my head began falling into place.

The Dongting Fisherman's state, which had seemed almost insane. His clear eyes returning only after all his strength had drained away.

He must have encountered that thing before we did.

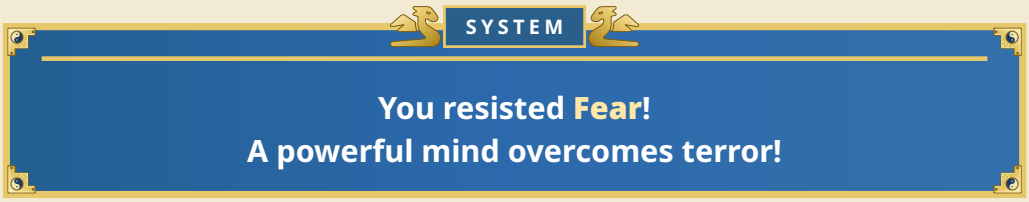
Even a Supreme Peak master with immense martial prowess and an unshakable mind could be overwhelmed by the terror of confronting the unknown for the first time.

When it came to resisting Fear, an S-rank Hunter was probably far better equipped than even a Supreme Peak martial artist.

And…

That goes for me too.

Ding.



Whoosh, thud!

I caught the old boatman's collapsing body as I struck his pressure points.

One second. No, even a quarter of a second later, and the poor old man might have gone mad from Fear—or simply died.

I raised my head and looked at the enormous being towering in the distance.

Damn. It's huge.

I had never fought a Sea Serpent, but this thing was clearly no pushover.

It had just taken a spear I had hurled with all my strength and still hadn't fallen.

Bam!

With a heavy impact, the colossal body, more than thirty jang[2218] long, swayed slightly.

It was like watching a small mountain move. I bit my lip.

I couldn't pierce its scales.

I could tell from the sound alone. Even after pouring all my strength into the iron spear I had pulled from my Inventory and hurled, I had failed to inflict any meaningful damage.

If I had used White Flame, forged from Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, I could have dealt a more decisive blow.

But if I could not finish it in One Strike, that would be a foolish move.

It was more urgent to act before the enormous monster recovered from its confusion.

I turned and drew a deep breath as I pulled internal energy up from my dantian.

"Cheongpung! Hyuk Mujin! Gung Gibang!"

"Hup!"

[2218] Thirty jang is about 91 meters (298 ft).

“Urgh!”

A thunderous shout erupted from my mouth, so loud I could scarcely believe it had come from me. The three men, frozen like stone statues, flinched.

No.

Not three. Two.

Unlike Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin, whose eyes looked as though half their souls had fled their bodies, Cheongpung was staring at me in surprise.

“You startled me. What is it, Benefactor?”

“…?”

What the hell is this guy?

Anyone would freeze after seeing a monster like that. I was the exception because I had grown up in the modern world, surrounded by monsters until I was sick of them.

But Cheongpung had been born and raised in Murim. The fact that he could overcome Fear so easily was astonishing.

“Cheongpung. Are you really all right?”

“Huh? About what?”

“I mean, that thing over there…”

“Oh, right. I was really surprised.”

Cheongpung threw both arms wide and exclaimed emphatically.

“It’s huge! Really huge! I’ve never seen anything like that in my life!”

“…”

I hadn’t thought that through.

Cheongpung had been out of his mind from the beginning.

Chapter 470

What the hell was going on?

Even with every second counting, I blanked out for a moment before finally managing to speak.

“W-Wait a second, Cheongpung.”

“I’ve never seen anything like that in my life! Grandfather was right—the world really is vast! I’m so glad I left Huashan!”

“Yes, the world is vast, but that has absolutely nothing to do with—”

“Whoa! It moved again!”

“…”

He wasn’t listening to a word I said.

I’d known for a long time that Cheongpung was a little unhinged, but I’d never imagined he was this far gone.

What kind of person is this?

Even a veteran Hunter who encountered monsters more often than his own parents would naturally feel fear upon facing a supermassive monster of that size.

But Cheongpung wasn’t merely unaffected by Fear. He was practically beside himself with excitement.

I had underestimated him without realizing it. He wasn’t a little crazy. He was thoroughly insane.

Still, this is much better than having him tremble like the others.

He was different from ordinary people from the very beginning. The fear of the unknown—of an existence no one had ever seen or heard of before—did not apply to Cheongpung.

Because that bastard found everything new and exciting.

Point a gun at a baby who doesn’t even know what a gun is, and it’ll just smile because the thing looks interesting.

I’d stake Hyuk Mujin’s balls on it: even if you turned the entire world upside down and shook it out, Cheongpung would be the only martial artist in all of Murim capable of reacting this way to such an enormous monster.

…Yeah. This is much better.

Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin were still half out of their minds.

When we needed every hand we could get, having Cheongpung unaffected by Fear was a tremendous help.

[2219] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity.

I grabbed Cheongpung by the shoulder as he stared with glittering eyes, looking back and forth between the cowering Mimi-chan[2219] and the Mutated Water God Dragon.

“Staring at it like that won’t make it evolve, so snap out of it. Protect the boatman and the Dongting Fisherman first.”

“What about you, Benefactor?”

“I need to get those two back to their senses first.”

Before I’d even finished speaking, I raced forward and slapped Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin across the face.

Smack! Smack!

Two bodies went tumbling away with a pair of satisfyingly meaty cracks.

The two men flailed like people waking from nightmares, then looked up at me with unsteady eyes.

“Gasp—cough.”

“C-Captain.”

I’d put a fair amount of strength into those slaps.

The blows must have split the insides of their mouths, because blood streamed between their parted lips. But Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin didn’t even have the presence of mind to feel the pain.

“I thought it was a dream. Why am I still seeing things?”

“W-What is that?”

Even if my help had pulled them out of Fear’s grip, it couldn’t erase the primal fear inherent in every human being.

As the two men stared blankly over my shoulder, a low, deep roar shook the air.

—Kraaaaaaah!

Damn it. I didn’t need to turn around to know the enormous monster was furious.

Or what was making that terrifying sound as it tore through the air toward us.

“Cheongpung!”

I shouted as I grabbed Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin by the backs of their necks and threw myself aside.

At the same instant, something enormous slammed into the spot where we’d been standing.

Whooooooosh—crash!

Sand and mud erupted with a deafening boom.

The object that had missed us by only a few steps was a jagged boulder nearly one jang[2220] tall.

…It threw that all the way here?

[2220] One jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The boulder must have weighed several thousand geun[2221] at least, yet it had been hurled from far away.

Its strength was terrifying, but its aim was accurate, too. If I hadn't moved quickly, I would have been crushed to death on the spot.

Look at that control. Did it pitch in the majors?

As I stared at the monster in horror, a familiar notification pierced my ears beneath its enraged roar.

Ding.

Quest
Corrupted Spiritual Creature
For many years, this noble being waited to ascend from the depths of the river. But an unknown power corrupted it.
The spiritual creature that once possessed a brilliant intellect and a beautiful form has become a hideous evil creature.
Because of the countless deaths it has caused, it will never again regain its former appearance.
And now, you must stop this unfortunate yet powerful evil creature.
Dispel the dark clouds hanging over Hubei Province!
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Objective: Defeat the Mutated Water God Dragon (Incomplete)
Reward: Linked Quest
Vast EXP and Fame
???
Failure: Death or an equivalent penalty

I scanned the Quest window at lightning speed. My assessment was short and simple.

"…What a load of crap."

It was the worst Quest imaginable for the worst possible situation.

[2221] One Korean geun is approximately 600 g (1.32 lb).

First, the Quest had been forcibly accepted. Then Logout had been disabled. On top of that, the System had nailed the door shut so I couldn't even run if things went badly.

Either I killed that enormous monster or I died here.

The System was demanding that I choose one of those two options.

And it says death or an equivalent penalty. What the hell kind of penalty is that supposed to be?

I didn't even want to think about it. No—to be precise, I wasn't given another moment to think.

Boom! Whooooooosh!

The next instant, I saw it.

Beyond the semitransparent holographic window, a distant cliff collapsed. Dozens of black dots filled the sky high overhead, plummeting toward us like meteors.

Faced with that incredible sight, Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang muttered blankly.

"Are those stars? Yeah. They must be stars."

"They're too dark to be stars. And they're getting closer."

"Stars are all like that these days."

"Come to think of it, that's true. Captain, you always tell me to throw away my preconceptions, but…"

"You two crazy bastards!"

Grab—whooooooosh!

I seized the two men, who still hadn't come to their senses and were spouting nonsense, and threw myself aside.

Cheongpung was already moving too, with the Dongting Fisherman—who had passed out again after delivering his warning—tucked under one arm and the old boatman under the other.

"Benefactor! They're big! And there are lots of them!"

His language skills were on an elementary-school level, but that was more than enough to understand what he meant. Even I could see that there were far too many of those bizarre boulders falling toward us.

They would blanket every inch of the narrow patch of ground beneath us—and then some.

Whooooooosh!

Damn it. There was nowhere to dodge.

As I threw the two men behind me, I recited the activation command in my mind.

Open Inventory. Summon.

White Flame appeared in my hand just as the shadow of an enormous boulder fell over me.

Without hesitation, I drew up every bit of internal energy in my body and swept the spearhead through the air.

Shh-shh-shh-shing!

Blue-white Force erupted from the spearhead and tore through the air.

It shot toward the jagged boulders that had spent countless ages accumulating sediment and weathering as part of the cliff.

Split.

Schk!

Force was a concentrated manifestation of energy capable of cutting steel like soft tofu. The bizarre boulders caught in the arc traced by my spearhead broke into pieces and began to fall.

Boom!

Sand and river water surged upward with a boom that shook the ground.

Amid the shrill screams of Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang, I saw Cheongpung escape the same way I had.

However…

Crack!

Damn it. I forgot about that.

My stomach twisted at the sight of the ferryboat's shattered remains. It had been smashed so thoroughly that not a trace of its original shape remained.

If the old boatman had been awake to see what had happened to his boat, he might have fainted.

If we stay here, we'll be nothing but targets. I need to use the wreckage to move us, at least for now—

Before I could finish the thought, my body suddenly locked up.

In my brief glance across the water, something that should have been there was missing.

The enormous creature that had towered amid the raging river and flashing lightning had vanished without a trace.

This is—

A red alert blared through my mind.

My eyes flew wide, and I screamed a warning.

"It's coming!"

And in the next instant—

Kwaaaaaaah!

A wall of water more than ten jang[2222] high surged into the air, and a body far darker and larger than the jagged boulders blotted out the blackened sky.

[2222] One jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

A familiar face—mine—was reflected in its long, vertical, blood-red pupils.

—Grrrrrrrr.

The breath spilling from the maw of that corrupted evil beast was chillingly cold. Its enormous body, larger than any monster I had ever seen, radiated killing intent and pressure that crushed down on everything around it.

What kind of monster is this…!

I was staring up at it in shock when it happened.

Shra-ra-ra-ra-ra!

Countless streaks of light rained down from every direction.

The whiskers surrounding the bridge of its nose, which was covered in hard scales, split into hundreds of strands and plunged toward me.

Each was several jang[2223] long. Some shot forward in straight lines, while others curved like living creatures to attack from my blind spots.

"…!"

I wasn't even given time to shout.

Every hair on my body stood on end, and all my senses opened wide. In a world that had slowed to a crawl, I twisted aside.

Thud-thud-thud-thud! Slash!

Scorching pain spread from my shoulder. It was obvious who the drops of blood spattering across the muddy water belonged to.

Still, if I'd escaped an unexpected attack with nothing worse than this, I'd gotten off cheap.

Now it was time to make the monster pay a much higher price.

"Hah!"

Schk!

The spearhead I swung with a battle cry cut through dozens of whiskers.

The long, flaming tail of the Fire Dragon's Single Tail, befitting the form's name, did not stop there. It cut through the air and swept toward the monster's jaw.

Whoooooosh!

Alongside a deafening sound of something splitting the air, everything around me turned black.

In a world so slow it seemed to have stopped, I finally saw it.

Something was sweeping toward me from the side in a massive arc.

Ah, fuck. The tail.

The instant I realized what it was, an enormous impact tore through my entire body.

Boom!

[2223] One jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

My clear vision blurred.

In less than a second, heaven and earth flipped over countless times, and everything around me shook as though an earthquake had struck.

No. That wasn't right.

I was the only thing flipping and shaking.

By the time my thoughts untangled from the impact, I had already flown more than ten jang[2224] and was hurtling toward the cliff.

Damn it. I need to dodge, even now…

But after taking a blow packed with such tremendous force, I couldn't move properly.

I gritted my teeth and braced myself for the second impact.

No.

I tried to brace myself.

Thud. Krrrraaaack!

A light impact reached me through my back. Then my speed began to decrease as the ground was churned up beneath me.

As I blinked, someone's voice reached my ears.

"Are you all right, Benefactor?"

It was Cheongpung.

I released the breath I'd been holding and got my feet under me. Then I realized why the Quest's Grade was Supreme Peak instead of a question mark.

"Hey, you goddamn eel bastard!"

At the sound of that familiar voice, I let out a quiet laugh.

[2224] One jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Chapter 471

Fire King Jeok Cheongang had lived for well over a hundred years.

The boy who had wandered the streets begging for food met a master one day and became the eighteenth successor of the Fire Gate Clan. Years later, when his master returned to the earth, he became the clan's sole Disciple and Sect Leader.

The boy became a young man, the young man reached middle age, and the middle-aged man finally grew old. It had been a long, long journey.

In that time, a great war erupted that would determine the fate of the world. A new nation arose, and even the surname of the Son of Heaven[2225] changed.

Five floods and earthquakes struck. Plagues spread, and bands of Red Turbans[2226] rose throughout the land, pillaging wherever they went.

Among everything Jeok Cheongang had witnessed, there had been disasters wrought by human hands and divine punishments sent down by the heavens.

But one event had left a deeper, greater mark on his life than any other.

The Great Faction War.

An age when corpses formed mountains and blood flowed in rivers.

Amid the maelstrom of that war, Jeok Cheongang had glimpsed a vast world of demonic, heterodox arts unlike anything he had ever known.

The Demonic Path martial arts of the Heavenly Demon Divine Cult rivaled those of Shaolin Temple—the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper[2227] of the Murim's orthodox faction—in depth and breadth. They were sinister and bizarre.

But now, Jeok Cheongang understood.

Even everything he had seen and experienced throughout his long life amounted to no more than a drop in the bucket compared to the scene unfolding before his eyes.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

What in the world…?

The moment that enormous being finally revealed itself, Jeok Cheongang felt the blood freeze in his veins.

What on earth is that thing?

He was a master from two generations past, well beyond his ninety-ninth year.

Given his age and standing, he had seen no small number of spiritual creatures and evil beasts that ordinary martial artists might never encounter even once in their lives.

[2225] Son of Heaven is a traditional Chinese title for the Emperor.

[2226] The Red Turbans were rebel groups associated with the upheaval at the end of China's Yuan dynasty, named for their red headwear.

[2227] Mount Tai and the Northern Dipper are enduring landmarks invoked together as a metaphor for a preeminent authority.

But that being…

It was different. It surpassed every scrap of experience and knowledge Fire King Jeok Cheongang possessed.

The monster was not merely destroying the cliff.

The laws and order of the world he had always believed in were crumbling along with the jagged boulders, shattered and scattered beyond recognition.

And Jeok Cheongang was not alone in his shock.

“Ha.”

“Ah, ahhh!”

The greatest assassin of all time, known as the Slaughter Saint, could not suppress his astonished sigh. Crouching Dragon Guest Zhuge Feng, whose knowledge and genius were said to rival those of Zhuge Wuhou,[2228] was struck speechless.

But that was not the end of their shock.

—Kraaaaaaaaaah!

The enormous monster’s roar drove back the rain and blasted apart the wind.

At the same time, a chilling aura spread outward from the monster and swept over all three men standing more than a hundred jang[2229] away.

Whooooooosh!

“…”

“…”

“…”

The three figures stiffened as one. Their eyes widened involuntarily, all three pairs filled with unmistakable shock.

How can this be!

Their bodies felt as heavy as waterlogged cotton, and their hands clenched on their own.

Zhuge Feng, who still remained at the Peak realm, let out a faint groan as a tremendous chill ran through him. Even Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong, who stood in realms far beyond his, caught their breath in surprise.

Th-This is…!

Impossible.

The two extraordinary martial artists known as the Fire King and the Slaughter Saint immediately realized the identity of the unfamiliar sensation that had come over them.

[2228] Zhuge Wuhou is an honorific for Zhuge Liang, the statesman and strategist of China’s Three Kingdoms period.

[2229] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m or 9.94 ft.

It was an emotion they had forgotten long ago. A stale, ancient emotion they had been unable to feel since becoming beings so powerful that no one dared approach them.

Fear.

The overwhelming power of the Fear radiating from the Mutated Water God Dragon was partly responsible, but the greater cause was Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong's ignorance.

Their martial arts were unquestionably several levels above those of modern S-rank Hunters. Even so, the sudden appearance of a gigantic monster unlike anything they had ever encountered was more than enough to shake the iron minds of two men who had spent decades establishing their own understanding of the world.

—Kraaaaaaow!

The monster did not miss the opening. It rampaged without restraint.

Each time its black-scaled body slammed against the cliff, enormous jagged boulders filled the sky before crashing down.

Kwagwagwagwang!

A ceaseless rain of boulders hurtled toward somewhere hidden from view by the terrain.

Flames blazed in Jeok Cheongang's eyes as he watched.

You bastard!

He already knew what the unknown monster was attacking so relentlessly.

The sole successor of the Fire Gate Clan and his Disciple.

No—his temporary Disciple, Jin Taekyung.

The moment he remembered that fact, lava-like energy erupted from the body Fear had briefly frozen.

Whoom!

Several jiazi's[2230] worth of Scorching Yang Qi surged through his Twelve Regular Meridians and Eight Extraordinary Meridians, driving back the aura pouring from the unknown being.

Scorching heat flooded his immobilized body, if only for an instant. Then he unleashed a battle cry like a thunderclap.

"Ha—!"

Bang!

The internal energy carried in his shout was so immense that the air and raindrops surrounding the three men burst apart.

[2230] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

Jeok Cheongang had not yet escaped Fear's influence completely. Yet despite being exposed to Fear for the first time in his life, he had broken free on his own, without anyone's help.

Any modern Hunter who witnessed it would have doubted their own eyes.

But Jeok Cheongang was not the only one to accomplish such an astonishing feat.

While Jeok Cheongang dispelled part of the Fear through rage, Mungyeong overcame its oppression with cold reason and enlightenment half a step higher than Jeok Cheongang's.

An evil beast unheard of in all of history. It must be brought down here and now.

The young medical apprentice who always tended warmly to the sick was no longer there.

The greatest assassin of all time, feared by everyone beneath the heavens, stepped forward with calm eyes. His slender figure scattered like an illusion.

Tap. Whooooooosh!

The Slaughter Saint's signature martial art, the Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step, shot forward, pressing down the current and treading upon the raindrops.

His figure streaked ahead like a beam of light, leaving only a pale afterimage behind. Beneath him, a single trail of flame raced forward, evaporating every trace of moisture around it.

Whoom!

A furious roar erupted from Jeok Cheongang's lips.

"You heaven-cursed eel bastard! Get away from that boy this instant!"

Rumble, crash!

A sharp, ringing shout pierced the ceaseless thunder as two figures charged toward the gigantic Water God Dragon like bolts of lightning.

Only now did I finally understand why the Quest's Grade was Supreme Peak.

It might have been tough on my own, but this changes everything.

There was Cheongpung, a genuine Supreme Peak master and a genius whose ability to learn and apply martial arts surpassed even mine, despite the System.

And then there were two beings who needed no embellishment whatsoever.

The Fire King and the Slaughter Saint. The Slaughter Saint and the Fire King.

Even by the standards of the modern world, where average life expectancy had risen dramatically, those two were old enough to be playing gateball[2231] in a retirement community.

[2231] Gateball is a mallet-and-ball game related to croquet and played especially by older adults in East Asia.

Yet they were monsters capable of knocking a Peak master's head clean off with a single finger.

Their movements do look a little heavier than before…

Had those two been affected by Fear as well, even if only slightly?

Whatever the case, two more human-shaped monsters had joined the fight against the supermassive monster.

I had taken some damage in the initial clash, but aside from the minor Internal Injury I'd suffered while fighting the Dongting Fisherman and the cut on my shoulder, I was perfectly fine.

If not for my insane Muscles and Bones and the Fire Dragon Armor, I might've broken every limb.

The monster moved far faster than its massive body suggested, and it attacked with its whiskers.

I was thinking that it resembled the Sea Serpent I had read about in the Monster Encyclopedia, yet differed from it in several ways, when—

—Grrrrrrr…!

In that split second, the Water God Dragon's eyes flashed as it finally realized the situation was taking an unusual turn.

I did not miss that brief opening.

"Cheongpung!"

"Yes, Benefactor!"

Sometimes, a single word or exchanged glance was enough for two people to understand each other.

That was exactly what happened as Cheongpung and I charged toward the Water God Dragon the instant I shouted.

Whoooooosh!

Shh-shh-shh-shing!

We moved twice as fast as I had when the dragon's tail sent me flying.

Blue and red Force surged along spearhead and sword blade as we bore down on it, and the Water God Dragon's whiskers thrashed violently.

Shri-ri-ri-rik!

Those whiskers were the absolute worst.

The power carried in each one did not quite equal the Force of a Supreme Peak master, but their destructive power and sharpness surpassed ordinary Sword Energy. They could not be ignored.

On top of that, each strand was roughly three jang[2232] long, and their trajectories were bizarre and impossible to predict, much like the Dongting Fisherman's martial arts when he wielded his black-wood fishing rod.

[2232] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m or 9.94 ft.

The only reason the first attack had landed was that I hadn't known the bastard could control hundreds of whiskers like that.

But…

Come at me again, you son of a bitch.

Streaks of light filled with the Water God Dragon's power poured toward me from every direction. I slashed the spearhead diagonally downward before me.

Whooooooom! Schk!

The streaks of light caught in the path of the blue-white flames lost their power and were sliced apart.

But the Water God Dragon was no pushover. Just as many streaks as I had cut down were already coming for my back.

Whoosh!

I had sensed it from the beginning, but the bastard was definitely intelligent. Perhaps it had instinctively recognized the strength of the Fire Dragon Armor, because its attacks drove toward the bare flesh the armor did not cover.

My back went cold as I felt the killing intent hurtling toward me.

But an instant ahead of it, a powerful force came rushing in.

Shik. Schk!

Brilliant violet Force drove away the darkness and lit up the world.

The Zaha Divine Technique, a secret ultimate art taught only to Huashan's direct Disciples.

Cheongpung.

I felt the killing intent aimed at my back disappear.

There was no need to turn and check. Cheongpung had done his part perfectly.

Now it was my turn to unleash my full strength.

No. Correction.

It was our turn.

—Grrrrrrrrk!

The Mutated Water God Dragon jerked its head up, but it was already too late.

Its greatest mistake had been failing to stop Cheongpung and me quickly enough. Two human-shaped monsters were already closing in behind its enormous body.

Shik!

Silent and stealthy, yet faster than anything else, a single bolt of lightning plunged from the air.

A moment later, the sound of something being severed rang out.

Schk!

One of the Water God Dragon's black horns was cut in half the instant it met the silver Force. A roar that might have been pain or rage burst from the monster's maw.

—Graaaargh!

“Gasp!”

Mungyeong’s figure shook as he tried to thrust a small sword between the Water God Dragon’s scales.

My guess was right.

Unlike me, who was accustomed to a monster’s Fear, or Cheongpung, who had been insane from the beginning, the others had not yet escaped Fear’s influence completely, though it affected each of them differently.

But that did not stop the fist Jeok Cheongang had already launched.

“You godforsaken son of a bitch—!”

Jeok Cheongang spewed the curse like a magic incantation, and his fist slammed into the Water God Dragon’s midsection.

Fwoosh! Boom!

—Kra-ra-ra-ra-ra!

A tremendous burst of flame and steam exploded outward, and the Water God Dragon’s gigantic body tilted toward the ground.

Its maw was falling directly toward me as I charged forward with all my strength.

Whooooooosh!

—Krrk!

My reflection appeared in its enormous blood-red pupil, split vertically down the middle—White Flame thrust forward, wreathed in blue fire.

“I told you not to open those eyes like that, you sibu-leol[2233] bastard.”

Shnk!

[2233] Sibu-leol renders a coarse Korean expletive used here to intensify the insult.

Chapter 472

Shnk!

The heat boring through its pupil was scorching, but the pain that followed was cold enough to numb the senses.

As agony spread through it like fire, the Mutated Water God Dragon unleashed a pain-filled roar.

—Kraaaaaaaaaah!

Its torso was as thick as a dozen or so full-grown trees bundled together, and its length easily exceeded thirty jang[2234].

When that enormous body, like a small mountain, began thrashing wildly, the shock waves swept through everything around it.

Boom! Kwoom-kwoom-kwoom!

The bizarre boulders it had hurled earlier exploded into hundreds, then thousands of fragments, while walls of dirt and water surged into the air.

The entire area was being devastated as though under concentrated bombardment, yet several figures raced swiftly through the chaos.

Shh-shh-shik!

Some charged toward the monster. Others retreated beyond the reach of its thrashing body. Zhuge Feng—the current Family Head of the Zhuge Clan and the Crouching Dragon Guest[2235]—belonged to the latter group.

Having finally regained his senses, he stared in bewilderment at the scene before him.

It isn't enough that the heavenly patterns are becoming distorted. Now beings of supernatural powers are appearing too?

Zhuge Feng possessed extensive knowledge of creatures known as spiritual creatures or evil creatures, but this dragon-like monster defied everything he knew.

If word of what had happened here today reached the outside world, not only Murim but the entire realm would be thrown into an uproar.

How could something like this happen…?

Zhuge Feng was still trembling from the fear that had yet to fade completely when someone spoke to him.

"Stay here with the others. Hide behind cover and keep yourselves as safe as possible."

[2234] A jang is a traditional Korean length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Thirty jang is about 91 m (298 ft), and two jang is about 6.06 m (19.9 ft).

[2235] "Crouching Dragon" alludes to Zhuge Liang, the Chinese strategist associated with that epithet.

Any martial artist would have felt his pride wounded by those words. Martial artists were the sort of people who staked their lives on their martial arts and a single sword as they wandered through a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords.

Zhuge Feng looked at the other person with a stiff expression and opened his mouth.

“Who am I?”

“Pardon?”

“I asked if you know who I am.”

Cheongpung answered.

“Yes. Great Hero Zhuge Pong.”

“It’s Zhuge Feng, not Zhuge Pong. In any case, you do know that I’m the Family Head of the Zhuge Clan.”

“Uh, yes, I do…”

“And yet you’re telling the Family Head of the Zhuge Clan to hide like a coward?”

Cheongpung thought for a moment, then nodded.

“That would be much safer.”

“Good. Then I’d better stay right here and not move.”

“Pardon?”

“Didn’t you say this place was safe? Better to be a coward than die like a dog for no reason.”

“…?”

“Don’t look at me like that. It’s simply that this isn’t a battle I need to fight today. It’s the same reason Zhuge Wuhou[2236], our family’s ancestor, did not stand at the vanguard and cut down the enemy.”

Zhuge Feng knew exactly where he stood and what he needed to do.

He was too clearheaded to wager his life on a martial artist’s pride, and as a Family Head, he was responsible for countless members of his household.

“This great war has only just begun. The day will come when I prove my worth in the battles ahead. So go on. I’ll protect these people.”

Cheongpung regarded Zhuge Feng with a strange look, then turned away with a small bow.

As the young man became a gust of wind and vanished into the distance, Zhuge Feng’s gaze grew somber.

Yes. The beginning of another age of chaos.

The peace that had lasted for more than fifty years was over. Dark clouds filled the blackened sky, and new winds were blowing in from every direction.

[2236]Zhuge Wuhou is an honorific title for Zhuge Liang, a Chinese statesman and military strategist; “Wuhou” is its shortened form here.

Cheongpung, racing toward the distant battlefield, was one of those winds.

Wuhou[2237]. At least for today, it seems there is no place for this unworthy descendant to step forward.

Just as Zhuge Feng murmured those words to himself, a dazed conversation behind him drifted into his ears.

“I can see a monster over there. Is this a dream?”

“I don’t think it’s a dream. No, wait. Maybe it is.”

“But Hyuk, why are your pants so wet?”

“That’s awfully bright yellow for rainwater.”

“That can happen.”

“Can it? How strange. Anyway, isn’t this really a dream?”

“I don’t think it’s a dream. No, wait. Maybe it is.”

“But Hyuk, why are your pants so wet—”

“…”

After listening to the utterly incoherent exchange, Zhuge Feng quietly shifted away from the stench of urine.

He stood atop a hill where layer upon layer of dirt and sand had formed a small mound. In the direction of his gaze, a battle straight out of myth was unfolding.

Shhk, schk!

A silver line cleaved through space, cutting apart everything rushing toward him.

Papat!

Mungyeong vanished like an illusion, then sprang upward from a fragment of stone suspended in midair.

Whooooooosh!

Something enormous came hurtling through the spray and clouds of dust.

It did not take him long to realize that it was a tail covered in black scales.

Fast. Even faster than I expected.

It moved with a speed that seemed impossible for a body of such tremendous size. Drawing a breath, Mungyeong tightened his grip on his short sword.

Tsstsstssts!

Internal energy rose silently, yet with the speed of a lightning bolt, and enveloped the short sword.

[2237] Zhuge Wuhou is an honorific title for Zhuge Liang, a Chinese statesman and military strategist; “Wuhou” is its shortened form here.

Power more destructive and keener than anything else in the world. Force surged along the blade.

A single technique embodying the principle of extreme swiftness flowed from the fingertips of the greatest assassin of all time.

I'll sever it in one stroke.

The next instant, Mungyeong brought his sword down diagonally toward the incoming tail—and realized he had miscalculated.

Schk.

The blade had undeniably cut into it, yet the resistance was absurdly strong.

The Force imbued in his short sword had to cut through more than the black scales.

Beneath those steel-hard scales lay ironlike flesh and muscle, as well as bones of incredible strength.

Damn.

Mungyeong clicked his tongue inwardly.

This was Force—and not just any Force, but Force infused with the enlightenment of the greatest assassin of all time.

No matter how tough the monster's body was, his Force could have cut through it in a single stroke.

The problem was its thickness.

The monstrous tail was two jang[2238] in diameter.

Combined with flesh far tougher than he had anticipated…

I can't sever it in one strike.

Perhaps he could have under normal circumstances, but he had yet to shake off the lingering effects of Fear. He knew better than anyone that he could not bring his full martial prowess to bear.

In that case…

The instant he reached his decision, Mungyeong twisted the wrist holding the sword hilt.

The blade had already cut through the scales and was carving into the flesh and muscle beneath them. It rotated smoothly, using its flat to divert the force behind the tail.

Ka-ga-gak! Whoom!

His small, slender figure was flung backward through the air.

Boom!

[2238] A jang is a traditional Korean length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Thirty jang is about 91 m (298 ft), and two jang is about 6.06 m (19.9 ft).

Mungyeong twisted in midair and landed with a rough movement wholly unsuited to the name Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step. Beside him, Jeok Cheongang melted an incoming boulder with a single palm strike and spoke in a mocking tone.

“Did your martial arts become childish too after you Returned to Youth[2239]?”

“Its strength and speed both far exceeded my expectations. Even with the principle of Four Ounces Deflecting a Thousand Catties, I couldn’t redirect it completely.”

“Your tongue got longer too.”

Mungyeong gave Jeok Cheongang a dry sidelong glance.

“If you’re trying to taunt me, stop here. The timing seems rather poor.”

“It isn’t a taunt. It’s an undeniable fact. Didn’t you see that thing crumple when this old man hit it once?”

“That was after I had already cut off its horn—”

Shri-ri-ri-rik! Boom!

A thunderous explosion swallowed the rest of Mungyeong’s words.

As though they had planned it, both men launched themselves away at the same instant. They clicked their tongues as they watched a streak of light writhe like a living creature.

The spot where they had stood moments earlier had been completely devastated.

“The more I see, the stranger that thing gets. An evil creature using Force?”

“It falls short of Force, yet it’s too powerful to be called Sword Energy. It clearly isn’t using a cultivation technique… but the mere fact that it can perform such a feat with the energy it has accumulated over countless years is almost impossible to believe.”

Harboring energy and being able to use or release that energy were entirely different matters.

In that respect, the monster before them had far surpassed the common sense of both men.

Was that thing also responsible for wiping out Yangtze One Saber and Donghu Stronghold?

Mungyeong dodged another incoming attack and regarded the monster with a deep gaze.

He had assumed that at least two Supreme Peak masters had attacked Donghu Stronghold. But after encountering that unimaginable monster, he finally felt that he understood what had happened.

Those bizarre whiskers and that enormous body… There’s no mistake. They resemble the traces left on the corpses.

[2239] Returned to Youth refers to a martial-arts-fiction phenomenon in which advanced attainment restores a person’s youthful appearance.

He could clearly picture the monster crushing and cutting down everything in its path with its tail and whiskers.

The mystery surrounding Yangtze One Saber's corpse—which everyone had believed had been ravaged by schools of fish—was also solved.

He wasn't torn apart and eaten after he died. He died because he was torn apart and eaten.

Who could possibly have imagined it?

A gigantic dragon-like monster had carried out the slaughter after traveling through a deep underwater tributary inaccessible even to boats—a passage only fish could enter and leave.

If it had never shown itself, then of course there had been no witnesses.

"What a monster."

Mungyeong had no choice but to admit it. The creature possessed strength comparable to hundreds of Peak masters, or perhaps two or three Supreme Peak masters. It was truly a being of supernatural powers.

Jeok Cheongang nodded in agreement.

"That's right. A monster."

"I never imagined such an inexplicable being could truly exist."

"That guy never ceases to amaze me. He always leaves me wondering what might have happened if this old man had been given more time. Just a little more time."

"What are you—"

Mungyeong suddenly remembered something and turned toward Jeok Cheongang. A broad smile filled the old man's wrinkled face, where the passage of time could no longer be concealed.

"Hey, Slaughter Saint. Do you know something?"

Whoooooosh!

An enormous shadow descended with enough momentum to split the world apart.

Jeok Cheongang looked up at the black tail falling toward his small body and slowly continued.

"That one is the strangest and most terrifying monster this old man has ever seen."

"Look out!"

Mungyeong's eyes widened.

Boom-boom-boom! Fwoooosh!

A tremendous roar and vibration spread across a radius of several dozen jang[2240].

At the center of it all, Jeok Cheongang stood tall and completely unscathed.

He had not moved a single step from where he had been standing, yet the black-scaled tail had struck far off to one side.

[2240] A jang is a traditional Korean length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Thirty jang is about 91 m (298 ft), and two jang is about 6.06 m (19.9 ft).

“Yes, that’s right. A monster should be fought by a monster.”

“…!”

Drip-drip-drip.

Above Jeok Cheongang’s head, where he laughed aloud, the monster’s dark-blue blood poured down mixed with the rain and wind.

Mungyeong turned toward the monster’s enormous body. Cheongpung, who had just returned to the battlefield, did the same.

At last, they saw it.

—Gwooooooooooah!

The monster thrashing wildly—and someone dangling from its head at a dizzying height, ripping out its whiskers with his bare hands.

“Bald head! Baldy! Smooth, shiny baldy!”

Pop! Pop! Pop-pop-pop-pop!

—Krooooooooooah!

The Water God Dragon’s mournful wail rang out through the wind and rain.

Chapter 473

Puhuk!

The Mutated Water God Dragon.

The instant I drove the tip of White Flame into its enormous eye, I realized something.

Hard. And deep.

It felt like plunging my hand into a cave with no visible end.

If it had been an ordinary human or beast, this single strike would have melted not only its eye but its entire head without a trace.

But this thing was different.

What the…!

Its head was so enormous that even after I drove White Flame in as far as it would go, the Force wrapped around the spearhead could not reach deep enough inside.

On top of that, the bones and flesh within were absurdly tough.

I was still reeling from resistance far beyond anything I had expected when the Mutated Water God Dragon let out a scream of agony.

—Kraaaaaaaaaah!

I had failed to finish it with my decisive strike, but that did not mean I had failed to inflict any damage.

The Scorching Yang Qi carried by the spearhead had melted one of its eyes.

Its enormous body writhed in excruciating pain. At the same time, a familiar System notification pierced my ears.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Lv. ??? Mutated Water God Dragon is overwhelmed by pain and rage it has never experienced before!

Enters Berserk Status!

Due to Berserk, all of the target's stats increase! However, because it has momentarily lost its reason, its judgment in combat is clouded!

"…Huh?"

The moment I heard the System notification, I nearly lost my own reason.

Damn it. What the hell is this Berserk bullshit?

Do your damn job properly, System. It was already a monster. If it got even stronger, how was I supposed to make a living?

But the System had already activated, and the water was already spilled.

The Water God Dragon's only remaining eye turned completely bloodred, and its Berserk Status began in earnest.

—Kyaaaaaaaaaow!

A roar shook heaven and earth, and an enormous gust of wind slammed into my entire body.

Before I could even blink, a cliff rushed right up to my face.

Oh. I'm fucked.

Kwaang!

A tremendous shock wave crashed over me with a roar that seemed to split the sky apart. My vision blurred, and my eyes lost focus.

The Water God Dragon had slammed its head into the cliff with tens of thousands—perhaps hundreds of thousands—of geun[2241] of force, but it did not stop there.

Whooooooosh!

The length of its torso exposed above the water alone was more than thirty jang.[2242] Counting the portion still submerged, it was comparable in size to a modern aircraft carrier.

Once a monster that enormous began rampaging like a mad thing, nothing could stop it.

Kwaang! Kwang! Kwagwagwagwang!

It repeatedly smashed its head into the cliff and the river, lashed out with its tail, and sometimes flapped its entire body like a fish caught on a hook.

Every movement devastated the surrounding area, sending countless fragments of rock and blasts of wind crashing down on me.

Just like now.

Ppeok!

"…Hng!"

Damn it. Of all places, my back had slammed into a sharp, jutting rock.

Searing pain raced up my spine, but I gritted my teeth and swallowed my groan.

This was the Water God Dragon's desperate attempt to throw me off. If I fell now, it might counterattack instead.

I tightened my grip on White Flame, still driven deep into the bastard's eye, and fought to keep my balance as its enormous body bucked wildly beneath me.

"You… fucking bastard!"

If it thought something this pathetic would throw me off, it had another thing coming.

I wrapped one hand tightly around the spear shaft and grasped at something invisible with the other.

[2241] A Korean geun is a unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb); here it describes the force of the impact.

[2242] A jang is ten cheok, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Thirty jang is about 91 m (298 ft).

At the moment, my hand was clutching nothing but empty air.

But that was about to change.

I had a magical command that only I could use.

Inventory Open. Summon.

Shhk. Tak.

The instant I gave the command, the hilt of a sharp short sword appeared in my hand.

The only sword technique I had ever learned was the basic swordsmanship taught at the Hunter training center.

But in a situation like this, who cared about sword technique?

Faster than anyone else, different from everyone else. It was time to become a sashimi master, working to a whole new rhythm atop his cutting board.

"From now on, your name is live-fish sashimi. Or maybe bone-in sashimi."[2243]

I made the solemn declaration and drove the short sword, its blade wrapped in blue-white Scorching Yang Qi, straight into its flesh.

Puk!

The blade was too short to stab very deeply, but the creature's reaction made it clear that it hurt.

Its firm, pale flesh split apart as though consumed by fire, and dark-blue blood burst out.

"You're pink on the inside? Doesn't suit you, asshole."

—Krrrk!

A groan burst from the creature's maw, and its body faltered for a moment.

I did not miss the opening. I swung the short sword again.

Schk! Puhuk!

—Krrrrrk!

Puh-puh-puh-puh-puhuk!

—Kraaaaaaaaaah!

Sword technique? There was no such thing.

I simply hacked and stabbed wherever my hand went and wherever my eyes landed.

After shattering bone and slicing through flesh, the blade withdrew and shot forward again faster than a flash of light. Each time it did, the creature's screams and thrashing grew more violent.

Huh. This is actually useful at a time like this.

[2243] Hwal-eo-hoe is raw fish prepared from live fish, while sekkosi is thinly sliced raw fish served with the bones left in.

My physical abilities, which could be called superhuman, certainly played a part. But the wrist snap I had trained through the USB—a treasure of humanity—was enough to make even a Peak sword master yield a move.

Ah. So this is All Streams Returning to the Source…[2244]

When had it been?

Shortly after I attained sagehood, I had decided to destroy the USB, and Jinho had tried to stop me.

His words flashed through my mind.

“Taekyung, remember the words left behind by our ancient ancestors. A ghost who dies after getting one off has a healthy glow. Getting one off is always worth it.”

“…Which ancestor said that?”

“Does that matter? The problem is that you’re about to destroy a national-treasure-grade cultural artifact. If you erase that thing, I’ll report you directly to the Cultural Heritage Administration. You’re looking at a minimum of twenty-five years in prison with no chance of parole.”

Is he insane?

What did he mean, getting one off? And what was this nonsense about a healthy glow?

Back then, I had nearly taken a swing at him.

But looking back now, those words were unquestionably the greatest saying since the founding of Korea.

I felt profound gratitude toward Jinho and thought of the women who had now become memories.

Thank you, Uehara. I love you, dutiful daughter of the mapo tofu[2245] restaurant.

Schk! Puh-puh-puh-puh-puhuk!

—Graaaargh!

Ah, what a sugoi[2246] scream.

My gratitude-filled pro-Japanese sword technique gouged into the gaping pupil and drove deeper and deeper inside.

The Mutated Water God Dragon had no choice but to stop attacking its other enemies far below on the ground.

Whooooooosh—Kwaang!

I could not see what had happened, but I could tell from the sound.

As the enormous body convulsed in pain, the tail that had been crashing down toward the ground struck somewhere completely different.

[2244] Mallyu gwijong is a martial-arts expression for different paths or techniques ultimately converging on the same principle.

[2245] Mapo tofu is a Sichuan dish of tofu in a spicy sauce, traditionally made with minced meat.

[2246] Sugoi is Japanese for “amazing” or “impressive.”

Then, amid the rising dirt and spray, a streak of silver light changed targets and flew toward me.

Chiriririrk!

From the outside, it must have been a bizarre sight.

The monster was using its own whiskers to gouge at its melted eye.

But from where I was, there was nothing funny about it.

Damn it.

No matter how enormous the Mutated Water God Dragon's eye was, the space was far too narrow for me to avoid dozens of whiskers.

Even though I twisted my body as much as possible, the streaks of light moved with the same cunning subtlety as the black-wood fishing rod, slipping past my Fire Dragon Armor and slicing into my bare flesh.

Puhwak!

"Ghk!"

Red blood sprayed out, and searing pain flared all over me.

I had circulated my internal energy as I dodged to protect myself as much as possible, which was the only reason the damage ended there.

If I had been even slightly slower, one of my limbs might have been severed.

Chiriririk!

Dozens of streaks of light flew toward me again.

I endured the rapidly spreading pain and twisted my body.

The silver whiskers, each possessing terrifying cutting power, missed me by a hair's breadth. A chill ran down my spine.

The space is too narrow. I'll be cut to pieces if this continues.

Perhaps it was that sense of crisis that made me hesitate.

While I hesitated, a spear of light, twisted together like a rope into the shape of a spearhead, flew toward my face.

Shwing!

"…!"

It was unbelievably fast.

In the slowed-down world, I stared wide-eyed at the streak of light flying toward me with a sharp sound as it tore through the air.

Countless possibilities and thoughts flashed through my mind.

If I pull out White Flame right now and swing it… No. It's already too late. And I might lose my balance before then.

Even now, the bastard's head was shaking like mad.

If I pulled out White Flame, which was practically acting as a support, I would lose my balance for a split second.

That would be the end.

There has to be a better way. There has to be some better way…

But the time I had been given amounted to no more than a fleeting instant, and the short sword I swung in haste was helplessly knocked away the moment it collided with the streak of light.

No—it shattered into hundreds of fragments.

Kwa-chang!

Perhaps it was only natural.

The power contained in each individual whisker did not reach the level of Force, but it surpassed the Sword Energy of a Peak master.

With that much energy gathered together, there was no way the traitorous sword technique I had learned through the USB could stand against it.

Whoom!

Am I going to get hit like this?

I stared blankly at the destructive force erasing the space between us and rushing toward my face.

What moved me was something close to pure instinct.

Fwoosh—Kwaddeudeuk!

Just as the streak of light was about to pierce through my chest, I found myself gripping it with a hand wreathed in blue-white flames.

It was neither Flame Divine Palm nor Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

It was nothing more than a crude contest of strength. I had dragged up every last trace of energy in my body and thrown it against the attack.

It did not take long for the result of that clash to reveal itself.

Pajik—Puhwak!

Two powerful energies collided, filling my vision with a blinding flash.

And beyond that dazzling radiance, I could see my hand hanging in tatters like a rag and the streak of light, its thickness reduced ever so slightly.

There was no question who held the advantage.

Damn it. The amount of energy inside us isn't even comparable.

I had accumulated a tremendous amount of internal energy through the System's accelerated growth.

But I could not compare with the bastard, a spiritual creature that had accumulated qi for hundreds of years.

Kwa-deu-deuk!

Even this grueling contest of strength was slowly reaching its limit.

I gritted my teeth as pain tore through my hand.

"You live-fish-sashimi bastard!"

I could not let it end here.

I summoned every last ounce of strength I possessed, twisted my body, and yanked hard on the creature's whiskers as though executing a shoulder throw.

It was impossible.

But even if it was, I had to try—

Kwadeudeudeudeuk—Ppok!

"…Huh?"

—Krrk?

I was stunned.

The Mutated Water God Dragon was stunned too.

In the slowed-down world, dozens of whiskers had been torn out by the roots and were fluttering helplessly toward the ground.

What the fuck? Why did those pull out?

Countless thoughts flashed through my mind.

Could they really just come out like that? Were its roots weaker than the whiskers themselves? No, but even so, could this really happen…?

At last, I reached one conclusion.

My strength is really fucking insane.

When I thought about it, this was entirely possible.

My Strength was high enough to knead steel like dough. What was pulling out a few whiskers compared to that?

No matter how enormous a monster the size of an aircraft carrier was, everything had its limits.

Unlike its scales and bones, which boasted tremendous durability, its hair roots were apparently weak enough for my Strength to pull out.

So this is how it works.

This was something only I could do, with my superhuman Strength.

Until now, I had thought only about dodging and cutting.

It had never occurred to me to tear the whiskers out.

With that great enlightenment, I retrieved White Flame and stepped forward.

Shwaaaaaaaaaak!

As I emerged from the pupil, I saw the creature's enormous body frozen stiff in confusion and its remaining eye blinking rapidly.

"You bastard…"

I smiled brightly and tore out its whiskers.

Kwadeudeuk!

Chapter 474

Kwadeudeuk!

The instant Jin Taekyung ripped out dozens of whiskers at once, the Mutated Water God Dragon opened wide its one remaining eye.

—Krrrrrk…!

It could not believe it.

That tiny, insignificant human had torn out its whiskers—with his bare hands, without even a weapon.

It was impossible. It should have been impossible. Even for the Water God Dragon, which had lived for hundreds of years, this was a shocking first.

Then, in the next moment, the Water God Dragon realized something.

The human who had ripped out its whiskers through sheer physical strength was completely fucking insane.

“Baldy!”

Pop!

“Baldy!”

Pop-pop!

“Smooth, shiny baldy!”

Pop-pop-pop-pop-pop!

—Gwooooooooooar!

A scream rose from the depths of its soul.

The Mutated Water God Dragon thrashed and howled in agony. For some inexplicable reason, the pain and sorrow surging through it were dozens of times worse than when it had first lost its eye.

It had to get this mad human off it as quickly as possible.

No—before every last whisker was torn out, it had to save at least one!

—Kroaaaaaah!

But despite the Water God Dragon’s desperate wish, Jin Taekyung had no intention of stopping.

Puhuk!

Jin Taekyung drove the spearhead between the scales covering the bridge of its nose, anchoring himself in place, and spoke in a sinister voice.

“Hey, know why you can’t walk?”

—Krrk…?

“Because you don’t have two feet.”

Pop-pop-pop-pop-pop!

—Gwooooooar!

"Multiply the number of hairs on every spiritual creature in the world together and you still get zero. Because you don't have any hair. You just don't. You don't have a single goddamn hair!"

Kwadeudeudeuk!

Jin Taekyung's methods were more ruthless than ever.

Whenever the whiskers flew at him in a tangled mass, he caught them with one hand and yanked them out like weeds. Iron-hard skin split open, and the whiskers —tougher and sharper than Heavenly Silkworm Thread—were ripped out by the roots.

Every last one of them. Not a single strand remained.

—Uooh, uwooooooar!

Even through its reason, now as murky as a sky smothered by storm clouds, the Mutated Water God Dragon was consumed by overwhelming rage and sorrow.

What kind of whiskers were these?

Those whiskers had grown alongside it for hundreds of years. They were companions to its very soul.

They were excellent weapons for destroying intruders who harbored impudent thoughts, and symbols of its power and majesty.

And now they were gone. They had been pulled out as helplessly as weak, useless seaweed.

By the hands of a human far smaller and more insignificant than itself!

—Kyaaaaaaaaaow!

A savage roar shook heaven and earth.

As the master that had ruled Dongting Lake and the Yangtze for hundreds of years radiated its baleful presence, everything around it held its breath.

No. Everything changed in response to its fury.

Krrrrrung! Kwa-gwang!

It was a truly frightening and bizarre sight. Lightning struck without pause from a sky shrouded in unusually thick black clouds, while rain poured down in a deluge unlike anything seen in the past fifty years.

Swollen several times over by the abnormal weather of the past several shichen,[2247] the river formed whirlpools large and small that circled the Water God Dragon.

Kwaaaaaaaaa!

And in the middle of that landscape, which resembled a minor catastrophe, stood an enormous body towering like a steel tower.

At the sight of the monster, its eye glowing bloodred, the people on the ground groaned quietly.

[2247] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

"Good heavens."

"Damn it. This old man really has lived a long time. I never thought I'd see something so absurd."

Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong stared at the unbelievable scene in astonishment.

They had long known that beings called spiritual creatures and evil creatures possessed astonishing power, but what was unfolding before them lay far beyond anything they had imagined.

A monster as large as a small mountain.

When it swung its tail, cliffs collapsed. When it roared, the world shook in every direction.

And that was not all. Mountains, rivers, plants, and trees held their breath beneath its surging baleful presence, while lightning and water responded to its fury.

Something that belonged in an old, faded legend was happening in reality.

At that moment, a single thought arose in the minds of the two old masters.

Supernatural powers.

Things of the strange, prodigious force, rebellion, and ghosts.

Everything embodied by that four-character phrase was unfolding before them.

An inexplicable being and phenomena beyond the understanding of even two men who had spent long years in the Murim were appearing before their eyes.

But the words supernatural powers did not belong to only one being.

Kwadeuk!

The sound of flesh tearing rang out clearly even amid the thunder and lightning.

The next moment, scales drenched in dark-blue blood poured down over Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong's heads.

One, two, three…

Soon, dozens of scales pattered down like a sudden shower.

With eyesight like birds of prey, the two men saw what was happening high above and were rendered speechless.

"Flesh! Let's see the flesh underneath!"

"…!"

"…!"

Kwadeudeudeuk!

A young man shouted like a lunatic as his hands moved furiously.

One hand gripped the shaft of his spear with all his strength. The other held no weapon at all as his bare fingers seized a scale.

Then he yanked hard.

The scale tore free helplessly, trailing dark-blue blood.

—Kwooooooooar!

The Mutated Water God Dragon thrashed its enormous body and let out a savage cry, but it was useless.

Whenever Jin Taekyung caught a hint of an attack, he darted like a ghost into the gaping hollow where its eye had melted away. Once the monster's rampage ended, he popped his head back out and resumed his work.

He even threw in a few furious punches for good measure.

"You fucking bastard!"

Kwaang! Kwang! Kwajijik!

The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, one of the five most destructive techniques among the Fire Gate Clan's various secret arts, combined with strength tremendous enough to call him superhuman.

The monster's head, nearly the size of an average ship, shook violently as shattered scales rained down.

—Kyaaaaaaaaaow!

The Mutated Water God Dragon was at its wits' end.

When it still had its whiskers, it had at least been able to attack.

But now that every last one had been pulled out, it had no idea what to do.

Whenever it thrashed to throw him off, he held on with the spear driven into its flesh. Whenever it seemed to calm down, he emerged and tore off more scales.

What the hell was it supposed to do?

Perhaps because it had smashed its head against the cliff so many times, it was even beginning to feel dizzy.

Kwaang! Kwaaaaaang!

Mungyeong and Jeok Cheongang could only open and close their mouths as they watched.

This fucking lunatic…

What is he doing? It's not like he's pulling radishes out of the ground…

Both men knew just how durable those scales were, which only made the sight more astonishing.

The crude Sword Energy of someone who had only just entered the Peak realm could barely cut them. Only Force could reliably split the scales and damage what lay beneath.

Those bizarre scales were absurdly hard.

And yet that young whelp had simply smashed them apart and ripped them off.

With nothing but his bare hands.

Did he draw up every last bit of his internal energy? Even so, a human's physical strength should be nowhere near enough.

What in the… No, wait. That bastard could do it.

Mungyeong felt as though he were dreaming.

Jeok Cheongang, who had watched Jin Taekyung ever since Shanxi Province, found the whole thing absurd—and astonishing.

"What a goddamn lunatic! Hahahaha!"

It was not enough that Jin Taekyung had torn out every whisker, one of the monster's weapons. Now he had begun stripping away its scales as well.

For a martial artist, it was like breaking all their weapons and stripping away the armor worn over their martial uniform.

From Jeok Cheongang's perspective, Jin Taekyung's current insight into martial arts was clearly inferior to that of both old masters—and even below Cheongpung's.

But his very foundation was different.

He's simply strong.

As a martial artist, Jin Taekyung was a powerful fighter who had reached the Supreme Peak realm.

Yet even if the internal energy and martial insight he had accumulated over several jiazi[2248] vanished, he would still be strong in his own right.

It was as though the power of heaven had taken residence in a human body made of mere flesh.

"Is that truly possible?"

Faint astonishment colored Mungyeong's voice.

Jeok Cheongang laughed with delight.

It was a question he had asked himself countless times while training in the Fire Gate Cavern. And every time, Jin Taekyung had responded with an infuriatingly shameless answer.

Now it was time to pass that answer on to someone else.

"Yeah. Heavenly Martial Physique."

"…!"

"Absurd, isn't it? Good. Don't bother trying to understand. That bastard has always been like that."

Just as Jeok Cheongang shrugged, Cheongpung spoke with a determined expression.

"Come on, let's go too. Mimi! Strike with lightning! Whip up a whirlwind![2249]"

…Chirik, chiriririk?

"Oh. You can't."

"…That idiot's no different."

[2248] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

[2249] Calling out a creature's attacks by name this way imitates a Pokémon trainer commanding a Pokémon in battle.

Just as Jeok Cheongang threatened to make Cheongpung drink liquor made from a Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake if he spouted one more load of bullshit, an eerie silence and oppressive presence bore down upon everything within a radius of several dozen jang.[2250]

Gugugugugung!

Jeok Cheongang, Mungyeong, and Cheongpung felt a chill run down their spines and raised their heads.

Gooooooooong.

The air rippled.

By then, the wind and rain that had been pouring down without pause had stopped.

So did the lightning.

Everything held its breath.

Everyone on the ground saw the monster's bloodred pupil, which had been shedding a crimson aura, slowly turn pitch-black.

At the same time, its enormous maw slowly opened, revealing cavernous darkness, while a sphere of water churned as though being sucked into its depths.

What is that?

A single question flashed through everyone's mind.

Then a shout came from high above.

No—a scream.

"Get out of the way—!"

Before they could even realize that the voice belonged to Jin Taekyung, the three figures shot away like the wind.

Though there were differences between them, great and small, each was a Supreme Peak master and an experienced martial artist with exceptional combat instincts.

They could not discern the true nature of that thing, but they could tell how terrifying the unknown power within it was.

Their prediction proved exactly right.

Kwaaaaaaaaa—!

With a deafening roar, the enormous sphere of water shot toward the ground.

There are many different kinds of monsters.

[2250] A jang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Some are bipedal, with bodies resembling humans. Others are beast-type monsters that walk and run on four legs like animals, yet are hundreds of times stronger than those bipedal monsters.

Their Intelligence varies just as widely from species to species.

Some are simple-minded brutes, but their insane physical abilities have earned them a place among the higher-level monsters.

Others, like goblins, hunt in packs and employ tactics involving poison and ambushes, but are classified among the lowest-level monsters because of their poor physical abilities.

With monsters possessing such diverse traits, arguments are inevitable whenever the subject comes up—both among actual experts and every fucking know-it-all on the internet.

Even so, when people talk about the strongest monsters, there is one type that everyone names first.

Dragonkin.

Beings blessed with extraordinary Intelligence and physiques.

And the mighty power granted exclusively to them.

Breath.

But why on earth?

Why?

Why?

Kwaaaaaaaaaah!

…Why the hell was this bastard using Breath?

Chapter 475

The Mutated Water God Dragon.

When you got right down to it, this bastard was a dragon too.

It might have been closer to an imugi[2251] than a true dragon, considering it could neither roam beneath the azure heavens nor wield a dragon pearl.[2252]

But there was one problem…

This bastard with its murky identity knew how to use Breath.

And not just any Breath. A fucking powerful one.

Kwaaaaaaaaaah!

I stared with my mouth hanging open as an enormous sphere of water spread across a radius of several dozen jang.[2253]

The ground, built up layer upon layer over centuries by sediment flowing from the Yangtze, collapsed by nearly half in an instant.

This is insane.

A force far beyond ordinary water pressure.

That was not merely an enormous quantity of water gathered together and fired all at once.

With the Mutated Water God Dragon's immense qi infused into the sphere, it was only right to call it Water Breath from now on.

Water Breath in the Murim.

It would have been more natural if some insane undead monster had insisted it was from Atlanta, Georgia, in the United States.

I stared in horror as the Water Breath vomited by the Water God Dragon pulverized everything in its path.

At the same moment, three figures shot away from the ground being reduced to a wasteland.

"Mimi, blow up the water orb![2254]"

"…You're completely insane. I felt murderous intent for a moment there without even realizing it."

"That's normal. This old man has wanted to kill you about five times already."

One lunatic pestering a horned snake. One rejuvenated old man. And one old man who could hardly look any older.

Once I confirmed that all three were safe, a sigh of relief escaped me.

[2251] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore associated with dragons.

[2252] A dragon pearl is a legendary orb associated with dragons in East Asian folklore.

[2253] One jang is about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft). Fifty jang is about 150 meters (500 ft).

[2254] Calling out a creature's attack by name this way imitates a Pokémon trainer commanding a Pokémon in battle.

Thank goodness they dodged it.

If they took a direct hit from Breath with that level of destructive power, even a Supreme Peak master could not escape unharmed.

The Water Breath fired by the Mutated Water God Dragon was that powerful. It contained qi that far surpassed the Breath of the Black Wyvern I had personally killed in the past.

What the hell? It was strong before, but I don't remember it being this strong…

Was it the effect of Berserk? Or had it only now drawn out all the power lying dormant within it?

I did not know the exact cause, but it unquestionably had something to do with its pupil suddenly turning black.

And my goal right now was to bring this bastard down by any means necessary.

—Krrrrrrk.

Its pitch-black pupil gleamed.

The monster let out a low growl at the humans who had dodged its attack with the speed of a streak of light, then opened its maw again.

Gooooooong.

Along with an immense flow of qi, the waterspouts circling it surged upward as though being sucked into its gaping jaws.

Already…?

A second Water Breath.

Even wyverns, the modern world's quintessential dragonkin monsters, could not use Breath this quickly or this frequently.

This thing was on an entirely different level.

Before the Water Breath could be completed, I swung with all my strength and slammed my fist into the bridge of its nose as its jaws slowly opened.

"You gaping bastard!"

Kwaang!

The enormous head shook with a deafening boom.

The sudden jolt made the rapidly forming sphere of water falter. But despite accomplishing what I had intended, my expression hardened.

It's different.

That punch had carried all my strength.

Yet the resistance I felt through my fist was nothing like it had been only moments earlier.

Breath was not the only change that had occurred in the Mutated Water God Dragon. Its body had grown stronger as well.

To put it simply, it felt as if a punch that should have smashed through ten pine boards had stopped after breaking only five.

I clenched my teeth.

Damn it.

I should have adapted my approach to the situation, but I had been too complacent. I grabbed White Flame, which I had shoved between the dragon's scales.

Store in Inventory. Open. Summon.

Shhk!

In the blink of an eye, White Flame vanished as though dissolving into empty space, passed through my Inventory, and reappeared in my grasp.

Every movement had been pared down to the absolute minimum. It was something impossible without the System, and even I had only recently begun to master this application.

The moment White Flame's shaft settled into my hand, all my preparations were already complete, and I brought it down in a single strike.

Fwoosh!

Blue-white flames rose over the transparent spearhead, burning the air and evaporating the moisture filling the surroundings.

The flames sliced through the dense, foglike steam toward the black-scaled bridge of the monster's nose.

"Shut your mouth."

Heavenly Strike.

Kwaaaaaaaaaah—schk!

The immense flames summoned by burning internal energy split the scales. They burned through flesh and shattered bone.

Even flesh of astonishing toughness could not stop a strike that fused Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron with Force.

Behind everything cleaved apart to either side of the spearhead was the nearly completed sphere of water.

Cut.

The centuries-old Water God Dragon's Water Breath met the fire dragon's claw plunging down like a lightning bolt from the heavens.

No.

They collided head-on.

Goooooooong—

Along with a deafening boom that numbed my ears, red and blue flashes filled my vision.

That day, those present at the scene were not the only ones who heard the mysterious roar.

Everyone staying near Dongting Lake heard it.

Gugugugugung!

Mountains, rivers, and trees bowed beneath a tremendous boom unlike any peal of thunder.

Commoners who had shut themselves indoors to avoid the ominous atmosphere flung themselves facedown in shock, while government troops roaming near Dongting Lake to investigate the incident dropped their spears and fled in terror.

Elderly men patted their sobbing grandchildren and gazed worriedly at the sky as they muttered,

“It’s the divine spirit. The divine spirit has grown angry and brought heavenly punishment down upon someone. What is going to become of this wretched world…?”

They were half right and half wrong.

The divine being passed down by word of mouth for hundreds of years, from the distant past to the present day, had indeed existed.

But the spirit beast once worshiped as a divine spirit had degenerated into a hideous evil beast, and the heavenly punishment delivered by the enraged Mutated Water God Dragon had been blocked by a single human.

Deep in a part of Dongting Lake that no one ever visited, the battle between that human and the evil beast continued even now.

—Kroaaaaaaaaah!

A pained roar shook heaven and earth in every direction.

The monster, its maw torn open, writhed and threw its body onto the waters of Dongting Lake.

Kwa-gwa-gwa-gwa!

The river water, mixed with dark-blue blood, surged to a distant height in an instant.

Waves fit for the distant open sea rose and crashed in every direction. Three figures no larger than specks beside the monster’s enormous body darted just ahead of them.

Shweeeeeek!

Three figures shot through the air like arrows.

But one of them chose a direction completely opposite to the other two.

Seeing Jeok Cheongang charge alone toward the monster instead of dodging, Mungyeong sent a Sound Transmission.

“Fire King!”

But rather than answer, Jeok Cheongang thrust one palm toward the oncoming wave.

Poom!

With a heavy crack of displaced air, a hole burst through the center of the enormous wave about to swallow his small, aged body, and the water evaporated into steam.

A second and third wave soon came rolling in, driven by the monster's ceaseless, pain-filled thrashing.

But the next moment, they were cleanly sliced apart.

Shraak!

A pure-white streak of light had severed the waves through their middles.

Then Cheongpung's scattered Sword Energy mingled with the spray and reduced the pebbles flying through it to dust. Mungyeong shook the water from his short sword and spoke to Jeok Cheongang.

"There are a few things I want to ask. Did you happen to learn water arts since we last saw each other?"

Jeok Cheongang glanced at Mungyeong and answered bluntly.

"Do you know what this old man hates most in the world?"

"…?"

"First, getting wet. Second, setting a mountain on fire. And third—the last one—watching a mountain burn while I'm soaking wet. Those three things."

"What does that have to do with—"

"It was about fifty years ago. I'd just finished taking a bath I didn't want in a nearby valley, and when I came out, Mount Jiuhua was going up in flames. In the end, I hunted down and killed every last one of those sons of bitches."

It was a story every martial artist knew.

After that day, an old man who had been practicing martial arts deep in the mountains of Mount Jiuhua gained the name Fire King.

"Well, things worked out well enough, and the people around me started praising me as the Fire King and whatnot. But some insane bastards pointed fingers behind my back. They called me a Killing Ghost of an old man who could kill a thousand people without batting an eye."

Mungyeong frowned at Jeok Cheongang's attitude. The old man was not even looking at him, simply saying whatever he pleased.

"I have no idea what you're talking about. What kind of nonsense is—"

"It's nothing. To put it simply, this old man liked Mount Jiuhua. I liked it even more because it was the first home I could call my own. During the Great Faction War, I drilled it into every bastard under heaven that I'd crush anyone who touched what belonged to me, no matter what it took. But…"

Jeok Cheongang walked toward the writhing monster, his eyes blazing as he continued,

“That damned bastard doesn’t seem to know that. Then again, if it had known, it wouldn’t have touched my Disciple without a shred of fear.”

“You really do whatever you please. So after all that, you never learned water arts.”

“Damn it. We’ll manage somehow.”

“We’re hardly friends, but even I feel compelled to tell you to be careful.”

“Do water arts really matter when dealing with one lousy eel? I’ll hunt it down and crush it by any means necessary.”

Cheongpung joined in with an innocent voice.

“Wow. Do eels really get that big? Are they all about fifty jang[2255] long?”

“I feel the urge to kill rising.”

“If you’re going to kill him, ask the Sword Saint for permission and do it quietly. Of course, lend us a hand first.”

Mungyeong lightly adjusted his grip on his short sword, then suddenly spoke.

“Did Jin Taekyung happen to learn water arts?”

“I vividly remember training him in the deep valleys of Mount Jiuhua. I’ve never seen anyone so bad at swimming in my life.”

“…Then we’ll have to drag that monster onto land immediately.”

“I agree. I don’t want to lose my Disciple twice.”

If the battle took place underwater, it went without saying that the Water God Dragon would have the advantage.

But there was no other choice.

If they did not step in, Jin Taekyung would drown.

Just as Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong exchanged determined looks, Cheongpung suddenly spoke.

“Huh? That’s not right. Benefactor is really good at swimming.”

“…?”

“…?”

“It’s true. On the way here, Benefactor… Uh, what was it again? Oh, right. He asked me to call him Aguaman.”[2256]

What the hell was that supposed to mean?

The two old masters stopped short, confusion rising in their eyes.

At that very moment—

—Gwooooooooar!

[2255] One jang is about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft). Fifty jang is about 150 meters (500 ft).

[2256] Aguaman is Cheongpung’s mistaken version of Aquaman, a superhero associated with the sea.

Shraaaaaaaaah!

Along with a roar echoing from deep beneath the river, a human figure shot up through the surface.

Jeok Cheongang's jaw dropped when he recognized the familiar face amid the spray exploding in every direction.

"You, you…"

"Pwah! Form up!"

"W-What did you say?"

There was no time to resolve his confusion.

The instant the words left his mouth, a huge shadow rippled across the rolling surface.

At the same time, a thunderous shout burst from Jin Taekyung's lips as he landed on the ground.

"Form an attack formation!"

What burned in his eyes was not the look of a martial artist.

It was the look of a seasoned Hunter.

Chapter 476

When was it?

I once saw a line like that in an old wuxia[2257] film whose title I no longer remember.

“Martial arts are only vertical and horizontal. In the end, one of us falls and the other remains standing.”

It was true. The countless battles I had fought in Murim had always ended in one of two ways.

Either I knocked them down, or they knocked me down.

Except for the Blood Lord, who had escaped even after losing an arm, the outcome had always been one or the other—and it had never been me who fell.

But when I plunged into the deep river while clinging to the Mutated Water God Dragon, I remembered another possibility I had briefly forgotten.

What if this bastard runs?

He had effectively been the master of Dongting Lake and the Yangtze for hundreds of years.

They said even a mutt had half the battle won in its own yard. If the bastard decided to run, there was no way I could stop him.

At the same time, I realized that I had been laboring under a serious misconception.

This shouldn’t have been a battle. It should have been a hunt.

This was not a life-and-death duel between two martial artists.

To bring down the monster before me, I had to do whatever it took, by any means necessary.

I had lived as a Hunter for seven solid years, yet without realizing it, I had been pretending to be some hidebound martial artist. I couldn’t help laughing quietly at myself.

What a stupid thing to do.

Hunter and martial artist. Martial artist and Hunter.

Both were part of my identity. I was the one and only modern martial artist—and Murim’s Hunter.

Standing once more on the blurred boundary between them, a line that had nearly faded away, I reminded myself of that fact.

That’s right. This is it.

It felt as though I had awakened from a very long sleep. I landed lightly on the shore and let out a thunderous shout.

[2257] Wuxia is a genre of Chinese fiction and film about martial artists and their adventures.

“Form an attack formation!”

“…!”

“…!”

“…!”

The flow of the air changed in an instant, and three pairs of eyes widened. Of the three, Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong stared at me with trembling eyes before speaking.

“I coddle you a little, and now a greenhorn still wet behind the ears dares speak casually to this old man?”

“The Fire King made a complete mess of training his Disciple.”

“…I apologize. It slipped out.”

I’d forgotten who was standing here.

I must have lost my head after getting swept up in the moment.

Unlike the two old men glaring at me with their eyes blazing, Cheongpung responded enthusiastically.

“Benefactor, that was so cool! Mimi! Form an attack formation!”

Chirik!

“I swear to heaven and earth that one day, I will turn that snake bastard into liquor—”

Jeok Cheongang’s oath never reached its conclusion.

The enormous shadow wavering across the rolling surface finally burst through the water and revealed itself.

—Kroaaaaaaaaah!

A roar more savage than any before shook heaven and earth.

Overwhelming qi exploded from its body, as large as a small mountain, and bore down on everything around it. The air trembled beneath the Fear it released.

At the center of it all, dozens of jang[2258] above us in the distant sky, was a pitch-black pupil looking down at us.

When that single eye, formed from darkness without even a speck of light, gleamed, a groan escaped someone’s lips.

“Ugh…!”

Fear of the unknown.

Everyone except Cheongpung and me remained at least partly vulnerable to the Fear emitted by the Mutated Water God Dragon.

Even Supreme Peak masters counted among the greatest in the world were no exception.

But…

[2258] A jang is a traditional length unit equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m or 9.94 ft. Thirty jang is about 90.9 m or 298 ft.

I'm here.

I was a veteran Hunter who had fought monsters until I was sick of them. That was who I was.

I had stood my ground against an undead army numbering in the tens of thousands, rotten flesh dangling from their bodies as they charged. I had no reason to tremble in fear just because one eel the size of an aircraft carrier had joined the fight.

"Now that I look at you again, you're practically a fairy."

The words had barely left my mouth before the back of my head began to prickle. From the listener's perspective, it probably sounded like complete madness.

But what I had just said was one hundred percent sincere.

It's true that this bastard is powerful, but the Arch Lich was much harder to deal with—and much stronger.

If the Skeleton King hadn't helped me back then, I would have died without question.

But the important thing was that I had survived and brought the bastard down. The fear I had felt while facing the Arch Lich had become experience, carved into my body and mind in its entirety.

And I'm a fast learner.

Good or bad, every experience became part of me. Over the past seven years, I had learned how to survive and how to win.

I drew a deep breath and raised White Flame's shaft high into the air.

Then I slammed the end down with all my strength. A level of internal energy never seen before rode the shaft.

Gooooooong!

The wave of qi that shot outward with the deafening boom pushed back the Fear radiating from the dragon.

The crushing pressure that had completely surrounded us dissipated as though an invisible pane of glass had shattered.

"This is…"

"You…"

Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong stared at me in astonishment. I kept my eyes fixed on the dragon and spoke.

"First. Don't get scared for no reason."

"…!"

"…!"

Everyone carried fears, great and small, inside their hearts. Fear was a force that preyed upon those fears and turned them into terror.

But once that fear was stripped away, we could finally recognize something we had forgotten.

—Krrrrrrrr.

The enormous monster letting out that low growl was not as powerful or frightening as we had imagined.

I stared straight into its gleaming, pitch-black pupil and continued.

“Second. From this point on, follow my instructions and beat the shit out of that bastard without mercy.”

Mungyeong’s dry voice pierced my ears.

“I do not particularly care for the process, but the result sounds rather pleasant.”

“You don’t dislike it because of that, do you?”

“What do you take me for?”

“That was a stupid question.”

The Slaughter Saint.

The greatest assassin, past or present, in Murim’s long history.

To an assassin who eliminated a target by any means necessary, the process did not matter. Only the result did.

“Old Master.”

“As far as this old man remembers, I never taught you how to deal with an evil beast like that… We can discuss it after we finish the bastard off.”

Tssssss!

After Jeok Cheongang’s curt reply, Cheongpung answered with purple Sword Force instead of words.

It was a nightmare of a party composition: nothing but DPS, without a healer or a tank. Even so, there could not have been a more powerful raid team.

Four Supreme Peak masters.

A lineup impressive enough to make even a five-star Jangsu stone bed weep.[2259]

Compared to the enormous body of the Mutated Water God Dragon, we were no more than ants. But inside each of us crouched a giant carrying an unprecedented power.

And now, the four giants were going to hunt a colossal monster.

“You’re dead now.”

As if it understood me, the Mutated Water God Dragon raised its enormous body from beneath the surface and roared.

—Gwooooooooooar!

Krrrrung, kwaaaaaaaaaang!

[2259] Jangsu is a Korean stone-bed brand whose advertising is associated with the phrase “five stars.”

With a single roar, dozens of waterspouts rose and came crashing toward us. Between them, the dragon's ragged maw split wide.

Gooooooooong—!

The air vibrated faster and more powerfully than before.

But before the third Water Breath could take shape, a shout burst from my lips and pierced the wind and rain to reach everyone's ears.

"Spread out!"

Shwish-shwish-shwish-shwish!

As though following a prearranged signal, four figures shot away in different directions and took positions around the dragon.

At last, it was time for the hunt.

Raid.

When the unreal invaded reality and Hunters and monsters began fighting one another to the death, this word—once used only in fantasy games—became something even a three-year-old child knew.

But none of the billions of people who had survived the Great Cataclysm could have imagined that another raid was taking place somewhere beyond time and space, against a strange monster resembling a dragon.

Nor could they have imagined that a familiar face was caught up at the center of it all.

Tat-tat, shweeeeeek!

A solidly built figure bounded off fragments of flying rock and shot skyward.

A massive tail passed within a hair's breadth, smashing into a half-collapsed cliff and unleashing a blast of wind.

Through his streaming hair, the eyes of the young man—Jin Taekyung—gleamed.

If I cut that tail now… No. Don't.

Jin Taekyung restrained the hand that instinctively wanted to swing his spear.

He knew exactly what mattered most in this raid.

He had to block the Mutated Water God Dragon's escape, lure it as far onto land as possible, and dispatch it in a flash.

If he struck back and wounded it before then, he might only put the monster on guard.

Of course, someone watching the scene had a slightly different opinion.

"You fucking piece of—!"

I can't lose the Disciple I only managed to gain in my old age like this!

But Jeok Cheongang's movement as he prepared to launch a palm strike at the monster, accompanied by a thick curse, abruptly stopped at the shout that rang out the next moment.

"Old Master!"

"…!"

Fwoosh, kwaaaaaaaaaang!

The Scorching Yang Qi hastily veered aside and burned the innocent ground.

For the briefest instant, puzzlement passed through the dragon's pitch-black eye. Then it changed into the eye of a savage beast.

—Gwooooooooar!

Whoom, bang!

With a roar, its enormous tail swept across the ground like a broom.

Jeok Cheongang leaped into the air at the last instant to evade the attack and exploded in frustration.

"How long are you planning to make us retreat!"

Kwaang!

Far above the ground, Jin Taekyung dodged the monster's body as it came crashing toward him and answered.

"I told you I'd give the signal!"

"And when is that going to be?"

"I'll handle it when the time comes, so please stop shitting all over the place! There's only so much trolling I can take! Do what you're told like everyone else!"

"…!"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes trembled.

Some of the strange words prevented him from understanding exactly what Taekyung meant, but he had heard one thing perfectly clearly.

A dump? This old man is taking a dump?

Until recently, he had been worried that his infirmities of old age might progress to the point where he started smearing feces on the walls. Now the boy he considered his Disciple was saying something that vile to him.

The shout that followed jolted Jeok Cheongang out of his shock.

"Old Master, now! Fall back thirty jang[2260]! Cheongpung, move behind the bastard! Mungyeong, take the flank!"

"Yes, Benefactor!"

"What a strange fellow. I agreed to follow your lead, not to let you speak casually to me."

[2260] A jang is a traditional length unit equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m or 9.94 ft. Thirty jang is about 90.9 m or 298 ft.

“For fuck’s sake, I really can’t stand ranged-DPS assholes who refuse to communicate. Just listen to me!”

“…!”

Seeing Mungyeong struck speechless, clamp his mouth shut, and silently do as he was told improved Jeok Cheongang’s mood slightly.

At least he calls me Old Master.

He should have been angry. But seeing Mungyeong addressed by his bare name like some nobody from next door made Jeok Cheongang grateful that Taekyung had not simply called him Cheongang.

At the same time, he thought he understood Mungyeong’s feelings as he moved without another word.

What is this strange feeling?

How should he put it?

Jin Taekyung was radiating an almost absurd air of command.

And in Jeok Cheongang’s estimation, it was not the overwhelming presence or bearing of a Supreme Peak master.

It was more like…

A veteran. Yes, exactly. A battle-hardened veteran.

Jeok Cheongang had lived his entire life as a martial artist. He had never had any connection to the authorities, nor had he ever been a soldier.

Yet for some reason, he felt as though he understood what it was like for a fresh recruit on the battlefield to stand before a battle-hardened veteran.

“What an incredibly strange fellow, no matter how many times I look at him…”

“Hey, Jeok Cheongang! Snap out of it!”

“…!”

The corner of Jeok Cheongang’s eye twitched. But before he could unleash his anger, the words he had been waiting for finally rang out.

“Now—strike!”

Shwish-shwish-shwish-shwish!

The four giants shot forward at the same time toward the Water God Dragon, which had finally left the waters of Dongting Lake and climbed onto land.

Chapter 477

Shwish-shwish-shwish-shwish!

Front, back, left, right.

The instant the Mutated Water God Dragon noticed four figures shooting toward it from every direction, its one remaining eye widened.

—Krrk!

When did they…?

Even in Berserk Status, the Mutated Water God Dragon could tell the situation was turning against it.

But rage had paralyzed its reason, and the immense power contained within its large, beautiful body led the strange and terrifying evil beast to underestimate its opponents.

Then someone shouted.

That was enough to sever the last thread of reason that had barely registered the danger.

“Even if everyone else curses you, I believe you’re a good guy. Because you don’t have a single rough edge.”

—Krrrrrr…!

A murderous light flashed in its pupil, which was nearly as large as a grown man.

It did not matter what that tiny, insignificant human was babbling about.

All that mattered was that he was the one who had ripped out every last whisker—the dragon’s pride, its finest weapon, and practically its soulmate for hundreds of years.

Kill him.

No matter what it takes, I will kill that fucking human!

Whooooooosh!

Its enormous tail, filled with murderous intent, blasted apart everything in its path.

At the end of that path, one man’s lips curled into a faint smile.

“Got you, you son of a bitch.”

What?

A chill swept through the Mutated Water God Dragon’s entire body, but it was already too late.

With that much force and speed behind it, pulling its tail back was as impossible as recalling an arrow after it had been fired.

Whoom, boom!

Everything was crushed beneath the violently swinging tail.

The cliff that had barely been holding together collapsed completely, and the resulting roar swallowed every other sound.

But what awaited the Mutated Water God Dragon was not the thrill of crushing its enemy.

It was searing pain.

Fwoosh, thk!

No.

It was not imagining things.

The next moment, the Mutated Water God Dragon saw it clearly.

Through the slowly dispersing wind, rain, and clouds of dust, a spear wreathed in blue-white flames had pierced straight through its large, beautiful tail.

And the fucking human gripping that spear was smiling.

“Got you.”

—…!

My mother had always been lenient when it came to raising her children.

She never believed studying was the only path to success. Even when she saw my high school report card—sevens in every subject,[2261] like I’d hit the slot-machine jackpot—she ended her lecture with one short remark.

“Amazing, my son…”

Hmm. Now that I thought about it, she may already have given up on me halfway by then.

In any case, even she made me read books when I was young.

I think it was in elementary school. She saw me folding paper airplanes out of an English workbook and flying them around, so she handed me a book and told me to read that instead.

The title was…

Oh, right.

Gulliver’s Travels.

Even though I had no talent for studying, I enjoyed novels like that. Sometimes, I even reenacted memorable scenes from them with Hayeon.

For example, the scene where the Lilliputians tied Gulliver down with ropes.

“Mom! Look! I caught Hayeon! She’ll be quiet now!”

“Waaaaaah! Mommy!”

“No! Hayeon! My daughter!”

Of course, my curiosity did not end particularly well.

[2261] South Korean high school grades used a nine-band scale, with 1 the highest and 9 the lowest.

When my mother saw her young daughter bound from head to toe in blue packing tape, she screamed. Then she used a hyojason[2262] to beat the calves of the son who had just proven himself decidedly unfilial.

But with a tenacity unusual for an elementary schooler, I did not shed a single tear.

I did, however, reflect on where I had gone wrong.

“Next time, I need to tape her mouth shut too, so she can’t scream!”

Ah, what fond memories.

The vicious elementary schooler who had bound his much younger sister in blue packing tape was long gone, but the memory of that day remained vivid.

Along with the ambition I had held as a child: to tie up Gulliver just like in the novel.

Thk!

That’s right.

Just like now.

Remembering the childhood dream I had thought would never come true, I spoke.

“Got you.”

—…!

My method was more brutal than the one the Lilliputians had used on Gulliver, but it was undeniably effective.

I had predicted that the bastard would swing its tail. I dodged just before the enormous, hideous thing lashed across my body, then drove my spearhead in with all my strength.

White Flame, the sturdy, transparent divine weapon, became a massive nail that pierced through both the monster’s tail and the ground beneath it.

What about a hammer?

Obviously, that would be my fist.

And I still had plenty of nails left.

Open Inventory. Summon.

Thk-thk-thk-thk-thk!

It all happened in an instant.

I summoned five spears from my Inventory in a flash and drove them into the bastard’s tail. Then I brought my fist down in place of a hammer.

Boom! Boom! Booooom!

Anchoring complete.

My powerful punch struck the ends of the spear shafts. The sharp spearheads sank deep into the ground and trembled.

Hayeon, are you watching?

[2262] A Korean back scratcher whose name literally means “filial son’s hand.”

I trembled with satisfaction at the sight.

The Mutated Water God Dragon screamed in agony.

—Gwooooooooar!

But its scream seemed a little premature to me.

Three people who had been waiting for this exact moment were just about to unleash attacks with everything they had.

The fastest among them arrived first and swung his sword at the dragon's waist.

Shk—!

Ghostlike movement.

Speed too great for even my eyes to follow completely.

Nothing could stop the dazzling flash that burst from that gray-white shadow.

Not even scales hardened further by Berserk Status.

Not even flesh and bone as tough as iron.

It was none other than the Slaughter Saint's sword strike.

Shrrk!

A clear sound of cutting pierced through the confusion of battle and reached my ears.

Mungyeong's figure, having dealt a devastating blow with the fastest and most concise sword strike in existence, vanished in a blur.

Dark blood erupted like a waterfall, and a scream of agony burst from the monster's maw.

—Kuaaaargh!

The attack had not severed its torso completely, but a single strike had sliced through nearly one-fifth of its thickness.

Of course it screamed.

But there was one thing I wanted the bastard to know.

This was not over yet.

"Two more strikes."

Before I had even finished speaking, purple Force resembling the glow of sunset shot forward and lit the darkness.

Shwish-shwish-shwish-shwish!

Dozens of red plum blossoms appeared amid the swirling wind and rain.

That was no illusion.

I instantly recognized the trails drawn by the purple Force infused with the Zaha Divine Technique, known as the essence of Huashan.

The Plum Blossom Sword Technique.

If Mungyeong's sword was a razor-sharp guillotine that severed its target in a single blow, Cheongpung's Plum Blossom Sword Technique was a dagger that slashed and carved dozens of times.

Now that dagger had taken the shape of plum blossoms and was plunging into the split wound.

Thk-thk-thk! Shrrk!

Bringing down an enormous opponent was surprisingly simple.

Either hit it with one tremendous blow powerful enough to knock it flat, or keep pounding the same spot.

And make it hurt like hell.

Before the Mutated Water God Dragon could unleash yet another scream, someone came rushing in to deliver a blow that combined both methods.

"Can't you just fucking die, you motherless evil-beast bastard!"

A streak of flame tore across the battlefield, accompanied by a filthy insult about the bastard's parents that was wildly unbecoming of his age.

The Fire King.

The illegal resident of Mount Jiuhua.

The firebug of the Great Faction War.

A national-level thug who had dominated the Murim with seniority as insane as Bodhidharma's skull water[2263] and martial arts even more explosive.

Just looking at him made my heart race and my eyes burn.

Ah, fuck it.

Whatever happens, happens. I'd already dropped the formalities anyway.

Once you were riding a tiger, there was nothing left to be afraid of.

Feeling my blood boil, I shouted at the top of my lungs.

"Go, Fire King! Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist!"

"You fucking little—!"

I could not tell who he was cursing, because the enormous boom that followed drowned him out.

Fwoosh, kwaaaaaaang!

Flames erupted from his fist and shot forward, vaporizing every trace of moisture in their path.

Hellfire carrying unimaginable heat tore into the gaping wound created by the previous two attacks, burning and devouring everything inside.

—Kraaaaaaaaaah!

I remembered hearing somewhere that death by fire was the most painful death in the world.

[2263] An allusion to a Korean Buddhist tale usually told about the monk Wonhyo, who drank water in the dark and later discovered it had come from a skull.

Anyone who saw this scene would have no choice but to agree completely.

Heat filled the air on every side, hot enough to conjure visions of a fiery hell, along with the thick, acrid stench of burning flesh.

And in the middle of it all, a gigantic monster writhed, engulfed in hellfire.

—…!

A terrible scream unlike anything we had heard before shook the ground and drove back the waters of Dongting Lake.

Its agony made it thrash so violently that even I, gripping the embedded spears with all my strength, could no longer hold on.

Thk, thud-thud-thud!

When Gulliver came to his senses and broke free of the ropes the Lilliputians had bound him with, what had they thought as they stared up at the giant rising above them?

I could not know for certain.

But at least I was neither shocked nor flustered.

“Well, look at you.”

It made no difference anyway.

The three hardcore ranged-DPS addicts—or rather, three Supreme Peak masters—had followed my orders perfectly, and the Mutated Water God Dragon had suffered devastating damage.

Even if it pulled out the spears embedded in its tail and gathered Water Breath now, nothing would change.

Shiiiiing, tap!

Seizing an Object Through Empty Space.

Like the other spears, White Flame had been torn free by the force of the dragon’s tail and sent spinning through the air.

Then it was sucked into my hand.

I raised White Flame’s spearhead, slick with dark-blue blood, and pointed it at the bastard.

“From now on… hack apart anything you can reach.”

My voice came out as hot as lava.

The three people who had grown accustomed to waiting for my orders sprang into action like beasts freed from their leashes.

Snap!

Jeok Cheongang, Mungyeong, Cheongpung—and me.

The first and strongest raid team in the history of the Murim shot toward the enormous body of the monster writhing in agony.

Shweeeeeek!

Four superhumans stepped out toward four different points.

And four streaks of Force carried unprecedented power.

Shwish-shwish-shwish-shwish! Shrrk!

Fwoosh, kwaaaaaaang!

East, west, south, north.

Above, below, left, right.

There was no opening through which the dragon could escape and no direction in which it could dodge.

They were everywhere.

And nowhere.

Its body, as large as a small mountain, was the largest target imaginable. Its mangled tail could overturn river and earth alike, but it could not touch the figures flashing around it like streaks of light.

The Mutated Water God Dragon.

The greatest advantage of this corrupted being, which had spent hundreds of years growing to its immense size, had now become its greatest weakness.

—Krooooooooar!

There was no shield that could not be broken.

No door that could not be opened.

In a span too brief to even call a moment, dozens of streaks of Force carved the monster’s body apart and left it in a horrifying state.

Its dangerously beautiful jet-black scales shattered into pieces.

Its flesh and bones, so tough that ordinary blades could not even scratch them, had long since been slashed and crushed beyond recognition.

Craaaack, shaaaaaah!

Dark-blue blood gushed from its wounds and soaked the earth.

The thunder and lightning that had struck without pause began to fade.

The storm winds and driving rain slowly died away.

And so did the life of one being.

Shrrk!

—Krrk…!

Pain struck the Mutated Water God Dragon once more.

Its body writhed feebly, and then a figure appeared in the pupil of its eye.

A young human with a familiar face.

Its mortal enemy.

The one it absolutely had to kill.

—Gwooooooooar!

And the presence of one man alone—Jin Taekyung—roused the monster's last fading reserves of strength.

Gooooooong—!

At the very moment a massive sphere of water, what someone called Water Breath, was about to be completed after the dragon poured out every last bit of its strength…

Then the young human vanished from before its eye.

The next moment, the Mutated Water God Dragon heard a low, steady voice.

"You've worked hard."

Thk!

Chapter 478

I hadn’t been aiming for that spot from the beginning.

No. I hadn’t even known it was there.

It was like trying to find a squirrel hidden in a dense forest.

The Mutated Water God Dragon’s body was simply too enormous for me to spot it, and I had never imagined there could be such a gap in a part of its body it had guarded so thoroughly throughout the battle.

But…

That.

There it was.

A weakness capable of severing the windpipe of this gigantic monster.

And I did not let the perfect opportunity to finish the fight slip away.

Thk!

—Krrk…!

Living creatures were truly remarkable. They constantly evolved, adapting to their surroundings and compensating for their weaknesses.

If even humans, whose average life span was only now approaching a hundred years, could do that, then surely this exalted being, which had lived for centuries, was no different.

Was it coincidence? Or fate?

Either way, it didn’t matter.

The only thing that mattered now was that a gap exactly one scale wide had been left in the monster’s neck, which was otherwise covered in its toughest scales.

And I hadn’t missed it.

“You’ve worked hard.”

Those final words of encouragement were a privilege only the victor could enjoy.

I had driven my spearhead precisely into the underside of its neck—where a human’s Adam’s apple would have been. Tightening my grip on the shaft, I shoved it deeper.

Thk—!

The dragon’s scaled jaw trembled with a short groan, as though it were trying and failing to draw breath.

Then its jet-black pupil quivered, and the sphere of water on the verge of completion inside its wide-open maw began to disperse.

Shhhhhhh!

An incomplete Water Breath was nothing more than ordinary water.

I did not avoid the deluge pouring down over my head. I let it hit me full-on.

The unusually cold water of Dongting Lake soaked me from head to toe, calming my mind.

I won.

At the same time, a thrill surged up my spine.

The end of a long, brutal battle.

Once again, I had survived and buried my spearhead in the neck of a powerful enemy. And as always, the end of a life-or-death battle came down to two words.

Vertical and horizontal.

The victor standing tall and the loser collapsing.

Even an evil beast that had lived for an unfathomable span of time was no exception to that absolute law of the jungle.

Whooooooosh. Splash!

The body that had once possessed such immense strength and resilience gave way and toppled onto the waters of Dongting Lake.

Through the spray rising high into the air, I saw its eye blink slowly and its snout tremble faintly.

No.

I heard it.

—You are just as I remember.

"…!"

The moment someone's voice echoed inside my head, the strength drained from the hand that had been about to drive the spear in again and finish the job.

As though bewitched, I stared into the Mutated Water God Dragon's enormous eye and felt my body lock in place.

What the hell…?

The jet-black gleam and murderous aura that had made it look like a monster born beneath an ill-fated star were nowhere to be found.

Like dark clouds parting after a day of driving rain, an eye as clear and deep as the blue sky gazed back at me.

—There is no need to be surprised. After five hundred years or so, one naturally acquires abilities like this.

"Sound Transmission?"

—Perhaps it would be more accurate to call it mental intent.

The Mutated Water God Dragon—or rather, the divine being also known as the Two-Horned Beast of Dongting Lake—calmly sent its thoughts into my mind.

—You do not know me, but I know you. You look exactly as you did when I saw you in a dream long ago. I dismissed it as an idle dream and forgot all about it… Yes. This, too, must be part of the natural order.

A dream? The natural order?

Damn it, what the hell is going on?

“This is… I mean…”

—Hah.

My fumbling for words must have struck it as amusing. A growling laugh rumbled from the blood-soaked corner of the Water God Dragon’s mouth.

—You cannot understand, so do not try. These are merely the ramblings of an old imugi[2264] whose cultivation proved insufficient to ascend. My only regret is that I have no time left.

The Water God Dragon’s words were true. Its body had already reached its limit and stood on the verge of death, while the light was gradually fading from its deep eyes.

Damn it.

It was too late for regrets.

I bit my lip.

Part of me mourned the Water God Dragon’s impending death. To be coldly honest, another part simply regretted the loss.

This mystical being had regained its senses moments before death. It was an important key to solving the mystery.

Dark Heaven.

There was no way a divine and wise imugi[2265] had turned into a mad evil beast that slaughtered humans for no reason.

Someone must have interfered. And if so, I could hardly leave Dark Heaven off the list when it stood at the very top of the suspects behind everything currently happening in the Murim.

“Who did this to you? And how?”

The question was brief, but it contained everything.

The Water God Dragon’s reply went far beyond anything I had expected.

—See for yourself.

“Excuse me?”

The Water God Dragon answered by blinking.

Srrk.

Blue liquid welled in its enormous eye. The liquid everyone called tears slid slowly down its scales, and the moment it touched me, I understood what the Water God Dragon had meant.

Ding.

[2264] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like being that has not yet become a dragon.

SYSTEM

Water God Dragon wishes to convey a portion of its memories to you.
Memory Fragment Acquired.
The power contained within Memory Fragment is leading you into the Water God Dragon's memories.

As the System notification rang in my ears, the Water God Dragon's tear unfurled like a curtain before my eyes.

Shhhhhhh.

A cool sensation washed over me.

Then the world stopped.

It was exactly what its name suggested: a fragment of memory.

It held the five hundred years the Water God Dragon had lived, but perhaps because of the mutation, parts of it had broken away. Some memories were blurred, while others remained perfectly clear.

And everything began with its birth.

—Guruk?

Somewhere deep beneath the waters of Dongting Lake, a tiny newborn creature looked around in bewilderment.

Aquatic plants swayed as though dancing, and countless underwater creatures had gathered around it.

The subjects who sensed the birth of a divine being swam joyfully through the currents.

It was an auspicious day—the birth of a new master of Dongting Lake and the occasion of a grand enthronement ceremony.

—Guruk? Guk!

The new master of the river tilted its head with all the curiosity of a puppy, then began to swim with its tiny body.

The moment this being, gifted with dazzling wisdom and power at birth, began to move, countless creatures followed behind it, and even the river parted to make way.

Shhhhhhh!

As it cut through the waters of Dongting Lake with supple, powerful movements, its body gradually grew larger.

Silver scales sprouted across its once-small, soft pink body, and imposing whiskers grew long beneath its snout.

It was probably around then.

Those who caught sight of this divine being once every few decades—or even less often—gave it a new name out of reverence.

A name I knew well.

Water God Dragon.

Perhaps because of the two horns on its forehead, it was also called the Two-Horned Beast. But most people were reluctant to call such a beautiful and mysterious being a mere beast. Instead, they worshiped it as the divine spirit of Dongting Lake.

And the imugi[2266], having received a new name from humanity, would occasionally perform deeds that truly seemed divine.

It rescued sailors on the verge of drowning and carried them to remote stretches of dry land. It also used its innate power to calm violent currents on countless occasions.

And that wasn't all. The Water God Dragon was also the one that defeated an evil beast that had once stained the Yangtze with blood.

After a fierce battle, it slew the turtle-shaped evil beast and came to rule both Dongting Lake and the Yangtze.

Time flowed like water.

Over the course of more than five hundred years, the Water God Dragon grew beyond all comparison to what it had once been.

It was a benevolent imugi[2267] possessed of tremendous power and profound wisdom, and an excellent ruler who cared for its subjects.

Yet even the Water God Dragon had one concern.

—Huh. Fighting never ends in the Lower Realm.

The horrors it had witnessed over its long life were truly appalling.

Humans constantly fought among themselves, and whenever they did, blood and countless corpses were scattered across the waters.

Two empires fell and war followed war. The Water God Dragon grew troubled and weary.

—I have already spent an unfathomable span of time in the Lower Realm. When will I finally be able to ascend?

No matter how people worshiped it as the divine spirit of Dongting Lake and called it a dragon, the Water God Dragon was, in truth, still an imugi[2268] that had yet to become one.

For the Water God Dragon, ascension was practically a destiny determined at birth.

[2266] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like being that has not yet become a dragon.
[2267] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like being that has not yet become a dragon.
[2268] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like being that has not yet become a dragon.

But its cultivation progressed so slowly that it came to resent the heavens, and enlightenment remained stubbornly out of reach.

Then a school of fish brought news that was more than enough to stir the weary Water God Dragon's curiosity.

—You say a human has appeared? But no one has visited that place in decades.

An uninvited visitor had entered the deepest and most secluded part of Dongting Lake—a treacherous place where no human had set foot in a very long time.

Its curiosity piqued, the Water God Dragon headed for the place it had once used as its dwelling.

The moment it arrived, it realized something was terribly wrong.

—What is this…!

The Water God Dragon of the past was not the only one shocked by the sight.

Watching through the fragment of memory, I was just as stunned.

That can't be…

A clammy, sickening sensation crept slowly up my spine.

Overcome by disbelief, doubt, and the sheer shock of being blindsided, I muttered blankly.

…A Gate.

There was no doubt.

I had passed through Gates hundreds—no, thousands—of times. I was certain.

The black energy pouring in streams through the cracks between the enormous rocks was unmistakably magical power.

What the fucking hell…!

My vision swam, and every curse I knew echoed through my head.

If I had not been trapped inside the Water God Dragon's memories—if I had been able to move and shout freely—I would have smashed everything around me. I would have screamed until my throat tore open.

Fuck, a Gate. Magical power!

My head felt ready to burst from the flood of thoughts. The scream I could not release died on the tip of my tongue.

Eyes wide with shock and fury, I stared at the scene unfolding before me.

—Stop! I said stop!

The master of the lake used its entire body to hold back the countless subjects charging toward it.

The teeth of the fish exposed to demonic qi were sharper than saw blades, and their scales had turned completely jet black.

—Please, stop!

But its desperate thoughts could no longer reach the fish mutated by demonic qi, and the Water God Dragon was forced to make a terrible decision.

If those unnaturally powerful and violent fish escaped, all of Dongting Lake and the Yangtze would be stained with blood.

A sacrifice had to be made for the greater good.

—…I am sorry.

The battle in the deepest waters of Dongting Lake naturally ended in the Water God Dragon's victory.

But it was not even given time to grieve.

The wise imugi[2269], which had lived for centuries, understood what it had to do. It placed its own body over the enormous rift that ceaselessly poured out its ominous energy.

—I do not know what you are, but you will not have your way.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

It was the longest and fiercest struggle of the Water God Dragon's entire life.

For seven days and nights, the two powers remained locked in a stalemate. The waters of Dongting Lake and the Yangtze churned violently, and the people on land trembled in fear, believing the divine spirit had grown angry.

And I already knew how that struggle ended.

—Krrr…

The Water God Dragon, its dazzling intelligence lost as it fell into corruption and became an evil beast, let out a low growl.

It had protected its territory and subjects by absorbing most of the demonic qi, but it could not contain all that power.

Hissss.

Its eyes slowly turned red.

Yet its last remaining grain of reason drove the Water God Dragon to surge out of the water.

It was the will of an old imugi[2270] determined to find the culprit behind this terrible atrocity.

Shhhhhhh!

On a dark night, the blackened waters parted.

The Water God Dragon rose as though ascending to heaven, and its red pupil reflected a person sitting on a moss-covered rock and splashing their feet in the water.

"The energy here is lovely. Coming all this way was worth it."

A clear, gentle voice.

A dazzlingly white nape.

And a silver hairpin securing long black hair twisted into a knot.

[2269] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like being that has not yet become a dragon.

[2270] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like being that has not yet become a dragon.

…Honglan.

The moment that name surfaced in my mind, the entire world around me shattered into pieces.

Chapter 479

The world collapsed, then rebuilt itself once more.

The ferocious red pupil, the surging river, and the beautifully crafted silver hairpin all vanished. In their place came reality beyond the memory.

Whoooooosh.

I slowly blinked. The curtain of water surrounding my body scattered, and my changed surroundings came into focus.

At the same time, time itself—frozen as though someone had pressed pause—began moving again.

Then, in the next instant, the chill in the air and a flood of System notifications crashed over me like a dam bursting all at once.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

With the Level Up notifications, a mysterious power breathed new vitality into my exhausted body and replenished my depleted internal energy.

And yet, for some reason, I could barely breathe.

Honglan. It was Honglan.

Yes. It had been her.

The Lower District Sect member who had survived the tragedy at Dongting Lake alongside Ju Wongong. A breathtaking beauty capable of swaying an entire nation.

The owner of the hairpin in my hair was the one who had corrupted a benevolent imugi[2271] and stained Dongting Lake and the Yangtze with blood—the culprit behind every incident that had occurred in Hubei Province.

Why hadn't I realized it? Where had the lies begun, and where had the truth ended?

Gate. Magical power. Honglan. Dark Heaven.

[2271] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent-like creature associated with becoming a dragon.

Countless questions and thoughts flashed through my mind in a single instant. My overloaded brain felt ready to burst.

As I trembled at the unbelievable reality, I spotted three figures shooting toward me.

Jeok Cheongang was in the lead, his face contorted with fury.

“You bastard, how dare you—!”

Thinking about it, the scene was easy to misread.

My conversation with the Water God Dragon and the time I had spent inside the Memory Fragment had both taken place within an incredibly brief instant. To everyone else, I had been standing there perfectly fine before suddenly starting to act strangely.

Jeok Cheongang’s furious bellow snapped me back to reality, and I shouted like a bolt of lightning.

“Old Master!”

“…!”

We could understand each other’s intentions with nothing more than a glance.

The moment Jeok Cheongang recognized the emotion in my shout, an exclamation mark appeared in his eyes. At the same time, the fist he had been driving forward forcefully changed direction.

Whoom, kwaaaaaang!

It missed by no more than a hair.

The Fist Force narrowly avoided the Water God Dragon and slammed into the surface of the now-calm lake.

The heat carried by the Scorching Yang Qi was so intense that every trace of moisture within a radius of several jang[2272] evaporated in an instant.

The Water God Dragon was already at death’s door.

If that attack had struck it, there would not even have been time for a final conversation.

“You bastard, why—!”

—Were you worried about your Disciple? A fine master indeed.

“Gasp!”

It was obvious that the mental intent the Water God Dragon had sent out had not reached me alone.

Jeok Cheongang sucked in a short breath and stepped back. Mungyeong and Cheongpung arrived immediately afterward, both looking as though they had seen a ghost.

“What in the world was that just now?”

“Uh, even Mimi can’t do anything like that.”

[2272] A jang is a traditional Korean measure of length equal to about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

…Shlick.

Our reflections appeared in the Water God Dragon's deep, clear eyes. Jeok Cheongang asked in a trembling voice,

"What… What in the world are you?"

—Some call me a divine spirit. Others call me a monster. You must find the answer to that question for yourself.

Grrr.

The Water God Dragon exhaled with difficulty and continued sending its mental intent.

—Before the end, I should thank you. Had you not intervened, I would have remained a hideous evil beast until my final breath…

The mental intent that had rung clearly inside our minds gradually faded.

The light was already draining from the Water God Dragon's clear eyes.

It's dying? Just like this?

I looked at Mungyeong with the last of my hope, but the man who also bore the sobriquet Divine Physician merely shook his head, his expression grim.

"It's already too late. Even a Great Firmament Immortal couldn't stop it now."

—You speak the truth, one who walks between life and death.

One who walks between life and death.

Mungyeong's neatly shaped brows twitched at the words that had seen straight through his identity.

"You… know me?"

—Though I failed to ascend to the heavens, I cultivated for many long years. I saw every one of you here in my dreams.

What exactly had been happening in the dreams the Water God Dragon claimed to have?

It was an imugi[2273] that had lived for five hundred years. Even now, with all its strength exhausted and death close at hand, it possessed a depth and mystery beyond anything I could fathom.

As though gazing at something beyond human understanding, the Water God Dragon stared into the empty air over our shoulders and sent out its mental intent.

—Unfortunately, this is as far as I am permitted to go. Though I cannot speak of the heavenly patterns[2274]… yes, I suppose I may leave one gift behind before I depart.

A gift?

None of us had time to voice the question.

In the next instant, my eyes widened at the faint cluster of light emerging from the blood-soaked corner of the Water God Dragon's mouth.

[2273] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent-like creature associated with becoming a dragon.

[2274] Heavenly patterns are celestial signs read for major changes and omens.

Shhhhhhh.

It was a pearl, glowing softly.

As though lifted by an invisible hand, it slipped free of the Water God Dragon's mouth and floated into the air. Then it began to tremble.

Whoom.

A vibration traveled through the air.

At the same time, the black stain covering much of the pearl melted away. Each time part of it vanished, the pearl visibly shrank.

This is…

What I could see was only part of it.

I could feel the sheer magnitude and depth of the qi contained within the pearl, and the sight unfolding before me brought a single word to mind.

Purification.

At last, when the transformation was complete, an irrepressible gasp escaped someone's lips.

"Ah."

Shhhhhhh.

The pearl now shone with a radiance far brighter than before.

Although it had shrunk to roughly the size of an ordinary pill, the crystal of qi, cleansed of every impurity, contained power of immeasurable clarity and depth.

So pure.

It was an incredibly powerful crystal of qi.

As all of us stared at it in awe—

Slither.

The crystal of energy slowly drifted through the air and stopped in front of me. At the same time, the Water God Dragon's mental intent rang out.

—This is my Origin Essence. Humans call it an inner core.

"…!"

—Though it is insignificant compared to what it once was, it will surely become a great source of strength. Please use it where it is needed.

I had no reason to refuse.

I stared at the crystal with trembling eyes, then reached out and took it.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Water God Dragon's Origin Essence acquired!

The System notification rang in my ears.

Having given me everything it possessed, the Water God Dragon slowly blinked.

A faint smile lingered in its eyes as it gazed up at the clear sky.

—So this is where it ends…

Grrr.

Along with the fading mental intent, the final breath of the imugi[2275] that had failed to become a dragon escaped from its blood-soaked mouth.

Then everything stopped, and silence descended.

I reached out and closed the Water God Dragon's eyes, which had grown cold and stiff.

You've worked hard.

I had witnessed the Water God Dragon's life through the Memory Fragment.

It had been a mysterious being far beyond any ordinary spiritual creature, and a benevolent one that had sacrificed itself to prevent an even greater disaster.

So at least in its final moment, it deserved the right to meet death on its own terms.

Not as a sacrifice for someone else's Level Up, but as a natural death.

But there was one person—no, one bitch—who was the exception, no matter what.

…Honglan.

I pulled the silver hairpin from my hair.

It gave off a scent so faint that even my keen sense of smell could barely detect it. I stared at it in silence, then turned to the still-confused Jeok Cheongang.

"Want to go catch a snake?"

"First tell me what the hell is going on… What? A snake?"

"Yes. A flower snake."[2276]

A clear peal of laughter rang across the deck of the military vessel, drawing everyone's attention.

Though the laughter was not the only reason they were looking.

Every man with eyes had been stealing glances at her since before they boarded the vessel. She was that beautiful.

"Good heavens. Even her laughter is beautiful."

When a middle-aged man in a military uniform muttered wistfully, the colleague beside him scolded him.

"Your wife should have seen you just now."

[2275] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent-like creature associated with becoming a dragon.

[2276] In Korean slang, a "flower snake" is a woman who seduces men and exploits them.

"Don't say such unlucky things. I'd rather lock eyes with Yama."[2277]

"You're old enough to know better, and you have five children as cute as rabbits. Are you seriously acting like this?"

"What about you?"

"I don't have any children yet."

"You have a wife."

His fellow soldier solemnly declared,

"Not for much longer."

"…You've completely lost your mind. Are you serious?"

"What's wrong with me? A man ought to try his luck at least once."

"I guarantee you won't get the chance."

"Are you trying to jinx me before I've even started?"

"No. Someone much younger, better-looking, and more capable than you has already made the first move."

He was telling the truth. A military officer with striking, handsome features was already striding confidently toward the woman.

"Young Lady. I assume something pleasant has happened?"

Officer Song, who was in charge of the military vessel, flashed his white teeth in a broad grin.

He came from a wealthy family and was handsome to boot. The woman before him might be a breathtaking beauty the likes of whom he would see only once or twice in his life, but he still had confidence in himself.

She isn't some young lady from a prestigious household. She's only a singing courtesan.

The very next moment, that confidence crumbled without a trace.

"Yes. Something very pleasant."

Her voice was so pure it seemed to cleanse the soul, and her smile was like hydrangeas in full bloom.

Her beauty was seductive yet pristine, pristine yet so lofty that no one dared approach.

Officer Song began to stammer without realizing it.

"I-is, is that so?"

At his flustered appearance, the woman—Honglan—covered her mouth and laughed.

Her eyes curved like half-moons, drawing anguished groans from the officers who had been stealing glances at her.

How dare those bastards.

[2277] Yama is the Buddhist lord of the underworld.

Officer Song glared at his subordinates, then spoke over the pounding of his heart.

"What a shame. If only I could share that pleasure with you, Young Lady…"

Honglan smiled faintly at his deliberately trailing words.

"I'm not sure. I'm hesitant to say anything careless in case I unsettle our Officer Song's heart."

Our dear Officer Song?

There was no doubt about it. This was the green light that supposedly appeared between a man and a woman who had feelings for each other.

Emboldened, Officer Song bellowed,

"On my ancestors' honor, that will absolutely never happen!"

"Oh my, how brave. Then I'll let only you in on it, Officer Song. Bring your ear a little closer…"

"Yes, yes!"

Officer Song leaned his ear toward Honglan, his heart pounding.

Then her sweet, warm breath tickled his ear.

"The truth is, I used the imugi[2278] living in Dongting Lake to kill a great many people."

"What?"

"But that imugi[2279] just died. I'm sorry to see it go, but at the same time, I'm delighted."

Officer Song slowly lifted his head and stared blankly at Honglan.

He had no idea what the woman before him was talking about, or what he had just heard.

"Young Lady, what does that—"

"It's exactly what you heard. I believe you'll understand me, Officer Song."

For some reason, Honglan's languid voice made Officer Song's expression go hazy.

This was no mere infatuation. It was an irresistible pull, a chain that seized a person's emotions and soul.

"Isn't that right, Officer Song?"

"…Of course. Naturally."

"That's wonderful."

Honglan watched with satisfaction as Officer Song nodded like a man under a spell, then turned her gaze toward the broad river.

And to the man who had become her captive, she made a request—or rather, issued her first command.

"Shall we change our destination?"

“Ugh.”

The wrinkled skin around the old man’s eyes twitched. He tossed and turned with a groan, then finally opened his eyes after a long while.

Where am I…?

Instead of damp, yellow-stained wallpaper, he saw a ceiling so starkly white that it was almost oppressive.

He lay there blankly, unable to make sense of the situation, until a calm voice reached his ears.

“Are you awake?”

“U-uh…?”

It wasn’t hard to find the source of the voice.

The old man sat up with a start and saw a young man seated before a small brazier, watching him.

“Wh-who might you be?”

“There are ultimately only two kinds of people in a clinic: medical apprentices and patients. Since you still belong to the latter category, you should lie back down.”

“Ah.”

Only then did the old man realize that this unfamiliar place was a clinic. He also realized the identity of the young man, who looked barely more than a boy.

“So you’re a medical apprentice, sir. But why am I in a clinic… Ow.”

As he spoke in bewilderment, a sudden headache made him groan.

Only now did he realize that his aged body ached everywhere. He was drenched in sweat and trembling uncontrollably.

Good heavens. What on earth happened?

The young medical apprentice crossed the room and came to his aid.

“I’m going to insert a few needles now. Calm yourself and breathe slowly. All right. One. Two…”

Tap.

“Wha—?”

The old man’s eyes went round. The crown of his head prickled as though an ant had bitten him, and then his headache vanished as if it had been washed away.

Holding a slender needle, the young medical apprentice smiled faintly at the old man’s astonished stare.

“Are you all right?”

“Pardon? Yes.”

“Then lie back down. From what I’ve observed over the past two days, fortunately, there doesn’t seem to be anything seriously wrong… but you still shouldn’t be moving around yet.”

“Ah, I-I understand.”

His medical skills were nothing short of miraculous, and something about his presence inexplicably put both body and mind at ease.

Up close, he looked much younger than expected, yet he seemed more seasoned than even an elderly medical apprentice.

“I’ll help you. Relax and lie down slowly.”

“Yes, yes.”

The old man lay back down as though entranced. The young medical apprentice raised several fingers.

“I need to perform a simple check. Elder, how many fingers am I holding up?”

“It looks like three.”

“And now?”

“Two.”

“Correct. Where do you live, and what is your name and age?”

“…Do I have to tell you that too?”

“I need to make sure your mind is completely clear.”

“Hmm. Let me think.”

Unlike the earlier questions, these required some thought.

The old man had only just awakened, and his condition was still unstable. Feeling a faint headache, he slowly opened his mouth.

“I’ve lived my whole life around Wuhan and Dongting Lake. My name is Gwak Bongchul. No one kept proper track when I was growing up, so I don’t know my exact age, but I reckon I must be past seventy.”

“So you’re Elder Gwak. You’re remarkably fit for your age. What do you do?”

“I… Well, I…”

The old man frowned and hesitated until his occupation came back to him.

“I row a boat.”

“You’re a boatman.”

“Yes. When I was young, I worked as a deckhand on a merchant ship. After I bought my own boat, I mostly carried passengers around Dongting Lake and showed them the sights.”

Before long, the old man—no, the elderly boatman—was delving into old memories and talking without prompting. Each time, the young medical apprentice encouraged him with a gentle smile and a nod.

“There was an older fellow I used to work with. He put it into my head that a man with his own boat was bound to find himself a woman. So I took the plunge and bought a sleek little beauty made by Baekchu.”

“Is that so?”

“I don’t know if you’ve heard of Baekchu, sir. These days, boats like that are common at the Wuhan ferry docks, but when I was young, a man who sailed a Baekchu vessel was considered a first-rate husband prospect. That, or an Audi. You know, the one with four circles on the bow.”

“That sounds somewhat like Five Qi Returning to Origin.[2280]”

“Huh? What’s Five Qi Returning to Origin[2281]?”

“Anyway, that boat I bought was sleek and beautiful. It attracted plenty of women, too. Once, a widow from the neighboring village came to me late at night and asked me to show her the Baekchu. Then, all of a sudden, she yanked her dress ties open…!”

“…Let’s skip a little farther ahead.”

The young medical apprentice listened with patience far beyond his years. As the story continued, the solid dam blocking the boatman’s memories slowly began to crumble.

Then, while the boatman cheerfully rambled on, his aching body forgotten, one particular memory suddenly resurfaced.

He froze like a stone statue.

“…!”

It was a bolt of lightning.

A nightmarish memory.

Rumble. Boom!

Graaaaaaah!

The crash of thunder and a furious roar rang vividly in his ears.

He blinked slowly, and the image of a colossal being silhouetted against the black sky flashed before his eyes.

“Gah!”

The boatman sprang upright without realizing it and stared blankly into the air.

“W-wait. Wait a moment.”

His voice trembled, and his eyes were wide open.

Perhaps because he had exerted himself so suddenly, every part of his body began aching again. But the boatman paid no attention to any of it.

[2280] Five Qi Returning to Origin is a high realm of martial cultivation; its name draws on the Daoist idea of five vital energies returning to their source.

[2281] Five Qi Returning to Origin is a high realm of martial cultivation; its name draws on the Daoist idea of five vital energies returning to their source.

The memories flooding back through the broken dam consumed his thoughts.

“Me-medical apprentice! What did you say to me earlier?”

“What are you referring to?”

“Two days! Didn’t you say two days had passed?”

Grab!

A grip far too strong for a man over seventy clamped around the medical apprentice’s slender wrist.

But the young medical apprentice did not so much as twitch an eyebrow as he calmly replied,

“That is correct.”

“Good heavens. How could this happen?”

“Calm yourself, Elder.”

“T-this is no time to be calm. We must tell the people and report this to the higher-ups at once!”

The boatman was half out of his mind.

His entire body was drenched in sweat and trembling without his realizing it, while his unfocused eyes darted anxiously in every direction.

It was as though something might devour him at any moment.

“We have to run as quickly as possible. Hurry!”

That was when the young medical apprentice reached toward the patient, who was shouting as though in the throes of a fit.

Swish.

A smooth white hand without a single callus touched the boatman’s slightly hunched back. Warmth flowed from it and filled his body.

The inexplicable phenomenon finally calmed the boatman, and he gasped for breath.

“Wh-what was that?”

“Think of it as a miscellaneous technique I’ve practiced from time to time. And, Elder.”

“Gasp.”

The boatman met the medical apprentice’s deep, clear gaze, and for reasons he could not explain, the words caught in his throat.

The young medical apprentice studied him for a moment before slowly continuing.

“The thing you’re worried about will never happen. Do you understand?”

“Pardon?”

“It’s simple. Erase everything you saw, heard, and experienced from your mind. Two days ago, you were summoned to Dongting Lake with the government troops, but you collapsed because you were unwell. You woke up today.”

“P-please wait a moment.”

“Everything I’m telling you is true. It must become true. That day, you carried no passengers, and you never saw the divine spirit of Dongting Lake.”

“…!”

The boatman shuddered as though he had been struck by lightning.

The young medical apprentice’s words were that shocking.

“D-does that mean you saw the Mountain Spirit too, sir…?”

“That may be the case, or it may not. But there is one thing you must remember… You must forget everything you remember about those events.”

The boatman swallowed hard at the young man’s gentle yet blade-cold voice.

Then the suffocating silence in the room was broken by the last bit of courage a man over seventy could muster.

“D-do you intend to kill me?”

“Me? No.”

The young medical apprentice slowly shook his head and continued.

“But someone else may think differently. For example… the City Lord of Hubei Province, who would not want ominous rumors spreading.”

“T-the City Lord!”

The City Lord of Hubei Province.

An official who governed a city by order of the Son of Heaven—a man who, at least within Hubei Province, was as good as a king.

The boatman cried out reflexively at the unexpected appearance of such a high-ranking person. Then he realized his mistake, and his vision went dark.

What a stupid fool! What if someone heard me?

Unlike him, however, the young medical apprentice’s expression remained relaxed.

It was the composure of the person who had ensured that none of their conversation could leave the room.

No—even if their words did leak out, the young medical apprentice would not bat an eye.

The precaution was solely for the sake of the boatman’s life.

Unaware of that, the boatman spoke again in a tightly hushed voice.

“I-I want to live. Why on earth would the City Lord want to kill an insignificant boatman like me?”

“When floods come, droughts strike, and plagues spread, people die in every direction, and wars break out everywhere. Then the rebels who dream of becoming kings and high officials speak with one voice. They say that the will of Heaven has left the Son of Heaven. That we should overthrow this rotten country.”

The young medical apprentice clicked his tongue softly, stood up, and tossed out one final remark.

"Even disasters beyond human power lead to such things. So what do you suppose would happen if the divine spirit of Dongting Lake, a creature as vast as a mountain, went mad and ran wild?"

"…!"

"Thousands died. The Yangtze and Dongting Lake were filled with corpses and blood, and streets that once blazed through the night fell dark. Now, with the frightened people watching Hubei Province, what do you think would happen if everyone learned what you saw and heard?"

He left the rest unsaid, but in the suffocating silence, the boatman found the answer himself.

I'd die. Without a doubt.

He had been born into a poor tenant farmer's family and lived his entire life illiterate, but he had not spent more than seventy years with his eyes and ears closed.

If anything, ferrying countless passengers had taught him how the world worked through the conversations he overheard.

If I so much as breathe a word about what I know…

It would be the end of him.

Neither the Son of Heaven seated upon the throne nor the City Lord of Hubei Province would want people to learn that the mad divine spirit of Dongting Lake had killed thousands.

No, perhaps they would eliminate everyone involved in the matter immediately.

A martial artist from a prestigious sect might be another matter, but an old boatman past seventy could be disposed of without anyone ever knowing.

"Good heavens. Oh, good heavens…"

As the boatman exhaled like a man whose soul had left his body, a lifeline was extended to him.

"Erase it all from your memory. Sell your boat, keep your mouth shut, and live out the rest of your days. Do that, and nothing will happen."

"W-will that really be enough?"

"That is all I have to say."

The young medical apprentice rose from his seat. The boatman stared dazedly at his departing back, then hurriedly called out.

"A-are you really a medical apprentice, sir?"

"Of course."

The young medical apprentice, Mungyeong, answered without hesitation and released the doorknob.

Then he pointed to the brazier still burning in the corner of the room and the kettle slowly boiling atop it.

“I boiled that decoction myself. Three times a day. After meals. Make sure you take it.”

Caring for a patient until the very end was a medical apprentice’s duty.

Chapter 481

Creak. Click.

Mungyeong closed the door, leaving the boatman alone, and thought,

That should be enough.

Perhaps because he had lived so long, the boatman was far quicker on the uptake than Mungyeong had expected.

He would have to spend the rest of his life under the authorities' watch, but that was still a hundred times better than turning up dead without anyone knowing how.

The deal with the City Lord of Hubei Province had already been struck. As long as the boatman kept his mouth shut, he could live out the remainder of his days in peace.

Besides, even if he did talk, everyone would dismiss him as a senile old madman.

And he won't have to worry about money anymore. All things considered, it's not a bad arrangement for him.

Mungyeong wondered what expression the boatman would make when he discovered the money pouch beside the brazier. He also recalled what the person who had asked him to deliver it had said.

"He came along for no good reason and nearly died. The least we can do is give him hazard pay and workers' compensation."

Workers' compensation?

It was a bizarre term Mungyeong had never heard before, but then again, Jin Taekyung had always been like that.

A brat so young he was practically yellow instead of merely green—and one who never stopped surprising him.

I can't make sense of him at all.

Mungyeong could have listed his peculiarities forever, but after everything that had happened, that impression had only grown stronger.

He recalled how Jin Taekyung had not shrunk back before that enormous, unprecedented monster. If anything, he had rampaged even more wildly.

Mungyeong's brow furrowed.

Natural courage? Perhaps. But there was something else… Yes. He looked accustomed to it. Like a battle-hardened veteran who had survived countless battles.

Had fighting Dark Heaven made Jin Taekyung accustomed to the bizarre phenomena known as supernatural powers?

Or did Jin Taekyung possess some secret no one else knew?

Mungyeong was walking along, lost in thought, when voices reached him.

"Physician Song, I heard they caught those bastards who deserve to die."

“Good heavens. ‘Bastards who deserve to die’? Hyang, you’re a medical apprentice. How can you use such harsh language…?”

In the busy courtyard of the clinic, an older, middle-aged medical apprentice was scolding a young female medical apprentice who did not even look twenty. She pouted.

“A medical apprentice is still a person, isn’t she? Besides, those men deserve to die.”

“Ahem. Watch your words. You may be right, but I’m afraid someone might hear you.”

“You’re only saying that because of that gentleman, aren’t you? What does it matter? He’s too far away to hear us anyway.”

Contrary to the young woman’s carefree assumption, Mungyeong heard and saw everything happening around him without missing a thing.

That included their conversation.

“What do you think, Physician Song?”

“About what?”

“Oh, come on. Don’t pretend you don’t know. What else could I mean but the dark-path figures of Murim who committed those heinous crimes at Dark Heaven’s instigation?”

“What could a mere medical apprentice like me possibly say? I’m simply grateful the culprits have finally been captured. All I can do is devote myself to my duties.”

“But don’t you think it’s strange? The Sea Serpent Society’s ship sinking at Red Cliffs, the tragedy at Dongting Lake, even all the deaths involving the river bandits beyond Tianling Falls… They’re saying those men were responsible for everything.”

“Strange? In what way?”

“Well, it’s just… Hmm. You know Sister Hwang, right?”

“You mean Medical Apprentice Hwang?”

“Yes. She told me something. Um…”

The young medical apprentice trailed off and glanced around. Then she rose onto her toes and whispered.

It still sounded as loud as thunder to Mungyeong.

“She said the patient she’s looking after is a pretty famous wandering martial artist, and when he heard the story, he snorted. He said that no matter how many dark-path figures there were, they’d never be a match for the Yangtze One Saber.”

“The Yangtze One Saber?”

“That’s the name—or rather, the sobriquet—of the river bandit chief who suffered a disaster this time. Apparently, his martial arts are so powerful that there isn’t a martial artist anywhere who hasn’t heard of him.”

"…And?"

"According to what the wandering martial artist said, the authorities rounded up so many dark-path figures this time to cover something up."

Mungyeong gave a silent, derisive laugh. The middle-aged medical apprentice's face stiffened.

"Hyang, have you told anyone else about this?"

"No. I'd only just heard it when Physician Song called for me, so I came straight here."

"What about Medical Apprentice Hwang? Did anyone else hear it besides you?"

"Why are you suddenly acting like this, Physician Song?"

"Answer me."

The genial-looking medical apprentice's face hardened as he questioned her. The young woman replied in a tiny voice.

"No one else was there. It was just the two of us. And I was the first person Sister Hwang told."

"Phew. That's fortunate, at least."

"Did I do something wrong?"

"No. You and Medical Apprentice Hwang were merely careless because you're both still young. But from now on, it would be best not to discuss this matter. Do you understand?"

"Ah. Yes."

"Hyang."

The middle-aged medical apprentice gently patted the cowed young woman on the head and continued in a kindly voice.

"Those dark-path mongrels who committed such heinous crimes will be executed at noon tomorrow—some by beheading, others by being torn apart by chariots. Their severed limbs will roll through the streets of Wuhan, and the ground will run red with blood."

"What?"

"This is all thanks to the City Lord, who acted on the orders of His Majesty the Emperor, and to Great Hero Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, who personally exterminated the culprits. So don't be swayed by false rumors. All you need to do is praise them."

"Yes, yes."

"No, not like that. Repeat after me. May His Majesty the Emperor live ten thousand years! A thousand years to the City Lord! A thousand years to Great Hero Jin Taekyung!"

"L-long live His Imperial Majesty the Emperor…"

"Louder!"

Is he insane?

Mungyeong stared at the middle-aged medical apprentice in disbelief and clicked his tongue inwardly.

If even a medical apprentice who could be considered educated acted like this, then the reaction of ordinary people was obvious.

They'll praise the Son of Heaven[2282] without a shred of doubt. It's only been two days, so the report on this incident probably hasn't even reached the imperial palace yet.

A fabricated lie. A hidden truth.

The world never changed.

Mungyeong gave a small shake of his head and continued walking.

After leaving the clinic, which stood within the vast Hubei provincial government compound, he headed straight for a large estate among the many pavilions, one reserved for honored guests.

There, he found a master and Disciple proudly displaying the depth of their affection for each other.

"Say that again. What was that? 'Jeok Cheongang'? 'Take a shit'?"

"Old Master, please calm down…"

"I'll pin your limbs down and shit on your face."

"Whoa. Is that your thing?"

"You fucking piece of—"

"Dormammu,[2283] I've come to take a shit. Ah, sorry. It slipped out on instinct."

"I swear on the ancestors of our sect, I'll stuff shit into your mouth!"

"Waaah! Somebody save me!"

"Get over here this instant!"

Swish! Swish! Swish! Whoooosh!

"…"

As he watched the fierce chase unfold, a thought occurred to Mungyeong.

What an affectionate—and filthy—master-and-Disciple relationship.

Fortunately, Jeok Cheongang did not end up shitting in my mouth.

Of course, that didn't mean things ended peacefully or normally.

Bam!

"Ah, wait. That hit bone…"

Boom!

[2282] Son of Heaven is a traditional title for the Chinese Emperor.

[2283] Dormammu is a character from Doctor Strange. The line parodies the repeated phrase "Dormammu, I've come to bargain."

"Ugh!"

Goddamn it. Isn't using Flame Divine Palm going too far?

He had drastically reduced its power, presumably because he possessed at least a shred of human conscience. But still—how could he use Flame Divine Palm against his Disciple? No, against me, who was practically his Disciple?

My insides are getting nice and warm.

Who needed gukbap?[2284] One bowl of Flame Divine Palm, and I already felt full.

"Ugh…"

As I groaned and clutched my chest, Jeok Cheongang spoke in a sinister voice.

"Stop whining and get up."

"Is it… over?"

"It's nowhere near over. How dare you speak so casually to a master as high as the heavens…"

"Master?"

"Ahem. Not merely a master as high as the heavens, but this old man, who is even higher than the heavens. Do you think I raised you so I could be treated like this?"

"…My mother raised me, though. Why are you taking credit, Old Master?"

"You insolent brat!"

Just as Jeok Cheongang's eyes began blazing, a lifeline descended from heaven.

"That's enough."

Someone had entered without making a sound. At Mungyeong's single remark, Jeok Cheongang frowned.

"If you came in, you should have quietly watched. Why interfere?"

"It seemed excessive, so I stepped in. Is there a problem?"

Damn. He's got so much charisma. No wonder all his targets ended up dead when he was an assassin.

I gazed at Mungyeong with emotion welling in my eyes.

"Oh, what a saint…"

"Look at this brat. He's babbling nonsense again. I suppose he'll need to be beaten for quite a while before he comes to his senses."

Jeok Cheongang ominously rolled up his sleeves, but Mungyeong shook his head.

"Stop. This is excessive."

"You've been getting on my nerves for a while now. Why do you keep meddling in other people's business…?"

"No matter how I look at it, this is excessive. Shouldn't I get a turn too?"

"Ah. Fair point."

"…"

[2284] Gukbap is rice served in hot soup, a common Korean comfort food.

Goddamn it. So that's what he meant.

The moment Jeok Cheongang graciously yielded his place to the next batter, a brilliant silver streak lashed out like a whip.

Swish. Shhk!

A chill ran down my spine, and cool air slipped through the gap in my severed clothes.

I swallowed hard as my shirt split cleanly into two halves, falling open to either side.

Crazy.

It had missed by a hair's breadth.

I stood there with my heart pounding while Mungyeong gazed impassively at me.

"You didn't dodge."

"I couldn't sense any killing intent."

"You could still have dodged."

"What would've been the point? If I dodged, I'd only get hit twice instead of once. You weren't planning to kill me anyway, were you?"

"As expected, you're strange. Strange enough to put me in a bad mood."

Really? For someone who's in a bad mood, your expression is pretty ambiguous.

Jeok Cheongang, on the other hand, looked unmistakably pissed off.

"How dare you swing a sword at my Disciple?"

"Disciple?"

At Mungyeong's questioning repetition, Jeok Cheongang hastily corrected himself.

"How dare you swing a sword at that bastard who isn't even fit to be called my Disciple?"

"Is that really something you can say after beating him like a dog with martial arts?"

"Whether I beat him like a dog or drive him like an ox, I'm the only one allowed to do it! And use your fists! Not a sword!"

"…"

I knew he was trying to look out for me, but somehow, that only made me feel sad.

Mungyeong narrowed his eyes as he listened to Jeok Cheongang's utterly incoherent argument.

"I can feel my innate qi draining away just standing here. Enough. I didn't come for this pointless exchange."

Before Jeok Cheongang could say anything else, I hurriedly spoke up.

"Are you coming back from the clinic?"

"Yes. I went to check on the Dongting Fisherman and meet the boatman."

"How are they?"

"The boatman has regained consciousness. There are no unusual symptoms, and he's sharp enough to understand what he's told. The Dongting Fisherman, on the other hand… isn't doing well."

I nodded gravely.

The boatman had been knocked unconscious by a Pressure-Point Strike before he was properly exposed to Fear.

The Dongting Fisherman was the exact opposite. This was only my guess, but he must have encountered the mutated Water God Dragon at Donghu Stronghold and been severely exposed to Fear.

"He must be in pretty bad shape. Though I suppose it's only natural that he's not in his right mind…"

"His injuries are severe."

"What?"

"All four of his limbs were crushed, and his internal injuries are considerable. He's a Supreme Peak master, and the City Lord gave him an elixir, so he should recover quickly. But that imugi[2285] must have gotten him good."

"…"

"What's wrong?"

"…Nothing. It's nothing."

It seemed I had forgotten to tell him.

I had truly, genuinely forgotten.

I'd had plenty of chances to mention it over the past two days, but I had forgotten anyway.

I was pretty preoccupied, to be fair.

Of course, that was because I had been tracking one person.

Honglan.

The culprit behind this entire incident.

The woman who had corrupted the imugi[2286] that had guarded the Yangtze and Dongting Lake for more than five hundred years and caused countless deaths.

And the woman I had never managed to find.

Where the hell did she run off to?

I pulled out the silver hairpin without realizing it and stared down at it, lost in thought.

Bang!

Someone burst onto the grounds, throwing open the main gate as if he meant to tear it down.

[2285] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent often associated with dragons.

[2286] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent often associated with dragons.

Gung Gibang must have raced here using his movement technique at full speed. He struggled to catch his breath before speaking.

“Huff. Hah… I found Honglan’s trail.”

“…!”

Chapter 482

“We found a trace of Honglan.”

Gung Gibang’s announcement did not agitate only me. Immediately after the battle with the Water God Dragon ended, Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong—both of whom already knew what we had learned about Honglan’s identity—reacted as well.

“You found that goddamned bitch?”

“What happened?”

After Jeok Cheongang’s blunt question and Mungyeong’s shameless question, asked while he was still concealing his identity, I spoke grimly.

“A trace?”

The result was what mattered.

Gung Gibang had not said they had found Honglan. He had clearly said they had found a trace of Honglan, and the implication was obvious.

“You didn’t find her.”

Gung Gibang had finally caught his breath. He nodded.

“Not yet. But I’ve sent messenger pigeons to our disciples, Wudang, the Zhuge Clan, and the government troops, so soon—”

“No. You won’t find her.”

I answered firmly and continued.

“If she were that easy to catch, we would’ve picked up her trail long ago.”

The government troops were idiots with nothing but numbers on their side. The Beggars’ Sect, Wudang, and the Zhuge Clan were at least reliable, but the chances of them finding Honglan…

Slim, no matter how I looked at it.

Even setting aside my gut feeling that there was no way she would be caught this easily, if she had a Moving Formation hidden nearby, we would all be like dogs left staring at the roof after the chicken got away.

“What kind of trace did you find, and where? Tell me everything.”

“A military vessel was found at Red Cliffs.”

“Don’t tell me it was…”

“That’s right. The very vessel where Honglan was last seen. The authorities have already confirmed it.”

Two days ago, shortly after we left to find the Dongting Fisherman, the government troops had attempted to take Honglan to the Hubei provincial government.

She was the only survivor besides Ju Wongong, a member of the Huang tribe. On the surface, she was also one of the chief contributors to his rescue, alongside me.

From the authorities' perspective, taking her with them had been the obvious choice.

Though that was the last time anyone saw her.

After that, the military vessel Honglan had boarded vanished like a ghost.

So did the roughly one hundred government troops and sailors aboard it.

And now Gung Gibang had brought us news that the same vessel had been found.

"…And? What happened?"

In truth, I already knew the answer before I asked.

They're probably all dead.

I had already heard that the people who boarded the vessel with Honglan were ordinary men with no connection to Dark Heaven.

There was no way Honglan had tossed them a few coins for their trouble, waved goodbye, and gone peacefully on her way.

The grim expression on Gung Gibang's face only supported my guess.

Except—

"Ninety-four in total. Every one of them committed suicide by stabbing themselves in the throat."

"What?"

That, I had not expected.

I blinked silently, then somehow managed to force out my voice.

"All those people… committed suicide together?"

"Without a doubt. They stabbed themselves in the throat with the daggers they carried as standard equipment. When the bodies were examined, they were said to have died with smiles on their faces. Of course, Honglan was nowhere to be found."

"What the hell?"

I would not have been this shocked if Honglan had simply killed them herself.

But this was a kind of death far beyond anything I had imagined.

A mass suicide.

And they had been smiling?

For a moment, I could not speak. Then Mungyeong and Jeok Cheongang opened their mouths almost simultaneously.

"This is…"

"Yeah. It has to be the Soul-Seizing Technique. And an extremely powerful one."

The Soul-Seizing Technique.

As the name suggested, it was one of the monstrous martial arts and supreme techniques that bewitched and controlled an opponent's soul.

I knew what it was because it had often appeared in the wuxia[2287] novels I had read, but this was the first time I had encountered it since coming to Murim.

"Wait. That actually exists?"

Jeok Cheongang stared at me as if I had said something absurd.

"Is that something the man who took down a five-hundred-year-old imugi[2288] should be saying?"

"…Well, when you put it that way, I don't really have a response."

"For untold ages, the Demonic Cult has stood at the heart of the Thousand-Year Demonic Path. Dark Heaven is the successor to that very Demonic Cult. It would hardly be strange for people who use the Soul-Seizing Technique to be running wild."

"But you said before that the Soul-Seizing Technique was nothing special."

"That's only true against this old man. The reason that wretched witch Honglan didn't use it on you from the beginning is likely much the same."

"Because I'm a Supreme Peak master?"

"To break through the wall means that one's body and mind have reached a supreme realm. And how much more resistant would you be, with your Middle Dantian awakened?"

Jeok Cheongang paused, then suddenly frowned and added,

"No. Perhaps what that bitch wanted was for you to fight the imugi.[2289]"

"Either way, what matters is that the culprit is a master of the Soul-Seizing Technique and has vanished like a ghost."

Mungyeong quietly joined the conversation, but Gung Gibang shook his head.

"There's one more thing."

"…What?"

"The investigation found that there were ninety-six people aboard the military vessel in total. Even excluding Honglan, that leaves one person."

"Wait. Then…"

"There's one survivor. The officer who commanded the military vessel, attached to the Hubei provincial government."

"…!"

A survivor?

Everyone, myself included, stared wide-eyed at Gung Gibang. He swallowed hard before continuing.

"He's on his way here now."

A brief silence followed.

[2287] Wuxia is a genre of Chinese fiction and film about martial artists and their adventures.

[2288] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent-like creature associated with dragons.

[2289] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent-like creature associated with dragons.

Then Jeok Cheongang spoke, his expression stiff.

"By the way, is speaking informally to this old man a trend among young people these days?"

"…I-I wasn't speaking to you, Great Hero Jeok."

"You won't come to your senses until you've been beaten like a dog on slaughter day.[2290] Get down."

"His name is Song Ho. He is the son of a prominent merchant family in Hubei Province, and thanks to his father's efforts, he was summoned by the City Lord of Hubei Province. Two days ago, the City Lord dispatched him with orders to bring in the culprit."

The middle-aged man, whose looks must have broken plenty of women's hearts in his youth, continued anxiously.

"He was a womanizer and had been involved in several scandals, but he showed talent in both literary and martial pursuits from a young age. The City Lord kept him close not merely because of his father's influence, but because he was sharp and dependable when it came to getting things done."

I didn't know what he had been like before, but he certainly didn't seem that way now.

I half listened to the middle-aged man—the Hubei Branch Leader of the Lower District Sect—and studied the young officer sitting before us, bound with rope.

His skin was dry and rough. His eyes were unfocused, as though he had been possessed by a ghost, and clear saliva dripped from the corner of his open mouth.

Drip. Drip.

Jeok Cheongang watched the young officer drool vacantly and furrowed his brow.

"He's been completely ensnared by the Soul-Seizing Technique. He's already lost his mind."

I agreed with Jeok Cheongang completely.

There was no trace of reason left in the young man before us. Instead of a promising military officer, a doll with its soul pulled out was sitting there.

"How is his condi—how is he?"

At my hurried correction, Mungyeong slowly shook his head.

"It's hopeless. I cannot say what prolonged observation might reveal, but for now, there does not appear to be even the slightest chance of recovery."

"If there's no hope, how bad is he?"

[2290] "Slaughter day" refers to boknal, the Korean summer dog days, historically associated with eating dog meat.

"To lose one's soul is no different from dying. In this state, he will be unable to speak or act on his own."

His condition was far worse than I had expected.

Jin Wikyung, who had hurried over after hearing that the sole survivor had been escorted here, spoke up.

"Would another renowned physician have a different opinion?"

"No matter who examines him, they will reach the same conclusion. If their opinion differs from mine, they are probably a quack."

"Good heavens. Even if the Divine Physician examined him?"

"…Yes."

Hyung.[2291] That's the guy.

I swallowed the words rising in my throat. The Hubei Branch Leader of the Lower District Sect—who had briefly been treated as an agent of Dark Heaven after mistaking Honglan's identity—bowed repeatedly and withdrew.

Then, just as the room fell silent—

"Ah… uh… oh."

"…!"

A cold chill raced up my spine.

Everyone around me, myself included, stared at the young officer with our eyes wide open.

His eyes remained hazy and unfocused. In contrast, his slack mouth began to twitch, and a voice slowly seeped out.

"Uh… ah."

"…That's impossible."

Mungyeong muttered in disbelief.

He had cared for and treated countless patients. With medical skill worthy of the title Divine Physician and the martial prowess of a Supreme Peak master, Mungyeong's confident diagnoses were practically absolute laws.

Or at least they had been until a few seconds ago.

"What is this?"

Mungyeong rarely raised his voice, but now he did as he swiftly took the officer's pulse.

His expression grew as complex and subtle as it had been when he looked at the Water God Dragon.

"His condition is completely unchanged. Then why?"

And in the next moment, everyone present heard the voice that flowed from between the officer's lips.

[2291] Hyung is how a man addresses an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

“Nothing is absolute, and nothing remains unchanged forever. You’d think you would have learned that by now. Don’t you agree?”

“…!”

It was unmistakably a man’s voice—the officer’s own.

But Gung Gibang and I both recognized the echo of someone else within it. Our eyes met, and we shouted the same name at the same time.

“Honglan!”

It felt as though a bolt of lightning had pierced the crown of my head.

If Hyuk Mujin and Cheongpung had been here, they would have reacted the same way.

I looked at the young officer—or rather, at Honglan, confronting me from some distant place through the officer’s body—with a sunken gaze and spoke.

“Where are you, you fucking bitch?”

“Oh my. Our young master has a rougher mouth than I expected. Men who swear at women aren’t very popular, you know.”

“Fuck off. I’ve never been popular anyway.”

“I didn’t expect that answer. You really are a masterpiece.”

“Cut the bullshit and tell me where you are. I’ll leave you in tatters.”

“You’re cuter than I’d heard. And funny, too.”

Her familiar, clear laughter slipped out through the officer’s lips.

The corners of his mouth remained the same, yet her voice continued to flow from it. The sight was enough to raise goose bumps.

Even then, I did not miss one important phrase.

“…Than you’d heard?”

“You already know, don’t you? We have many eyes and ears. Blood Lord did most of the talking.”

“Dark Heaven. Yeah, I figured.”

Even a 99.9 percent possibility was still only a guess without that final 0.1 percent.

Honglan had revealed her identity without the slightest hesitation. She continued brightly.

“I was surprised. You’ve become much stronger than Blood Lord said you were. Then again, if that were still all you amounted to, the Western Heaven Demon Lord would have killed you before the imugi[2292] got the chance.”

Why was this happening?

My anger showed no sign of fading, yet my mind and voice were growing calmer instead.

Unlike before, I asked in a remarkably composed voice,

[2292] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent-like creature associated with dragons.

“Who are you?”

It was a genuine question.

Even as I asked, I did not expect her to answer willingly.

But Honglan shattered my expectations with a single word.

“The Southern Heaven Demon Empress.”

“The Southern… Heaven Demon Empress?”

These fucking bastards are really screwing around in every direction—east, west, south, and north.

Chapter 483

“Southern Heaven… Demon Empress?”

Honglan—or rather, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, inhabiting the body of a young military officer—spoke in a lighthearted tone.

“It’s embarrassing to hear someone else say that sobriquet aloud.”

“Embarrassing my ass. You bastards are raising hell in every direction—east, west, south, and north. So is the eastern one the East Virgin Forever-Alone, and the northern one North Korea’s Kim?”

“The sobriquets are different, but you came surprisingly close. You’re smarter than I expected.”

“…Damn it.”

Western Heaven Demon Lord and Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Even Mimi-chan[2293] could tell that those sobriquets had been created with the four directions in mind.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord was already a monster I had barely managed to defeat after several brushes with death. And there were at least three more like him?

But an even more important question remained.

I stared at the military officer’s vacant face.

“How did you do it?”

“Oh my. What could possibly have our young Great Hero so curious?”

“You know what I’m talking about.”

A strange light suddenly flashed through the officer’s slack eyes.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress gazed at me through someone else’s eyes, then casually tossed out a question.

“You saw it, didn’t you?”

“…!”

“There’s no way you could have found it in only two days. So I suppose a spiritual creature really is a spiritual creature. Then again, a five-hundred-year-old imugi[2294] would certainly qualify as a divine being.”

Having grasped everything in an instant, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress smoothly added,

“Then you must also know that I won’t answer you.”

It was all still vivid. The traces of the Gate I had glimpsed through fragments of memory. And the sight of the Water God Dragon being tainted by the demonic qi that had flowed from it.

[2293] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity.

[2294] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent associated with dragons.

That was something that could not—and should not—have happened.

At least not here in Murim. It was an incomprehensible phenomenon that should never have appeared in this world.

Yet the Southern Heaven Demon Empress and Dark Heaven had dragged the impossible into reality. It was enough to make me wish it were all a lie.

“What the hell are you people after?”

“After?”

The next moment, clear laughter flowed between the officer’s lips. It carried genuine amusement, not something feigned.

After laughing aloud for a while, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress continued.

“Child. I am merely a lowly servant who moves according to orders. No one can presume to fathom that person’s will.”

That person.

Everyone present knew whom those two words referred to.

Jeok Cheongang muttered in a voice that seemed to boil like lava.

“Lord of Heaven.”

Crack.

With the sound of bones shifting, the officer’s head turned toward Jeok Cheongang like a creaking wooden puppet.

“I’ve heard that a crazed old monster lives on Mount Jiuhua. Fire King Jeok Cheongang, you are correct. It is indeed that person. The greatest and noblest of all…”

“You mean a fucking bastard who wouldn’t be worth the satisfaction of burning alive. How dare you wag that wicked tongue before this old man?”

A brief silence followed Jeok Cheongang’s words, which carried a cold flame.

Then the officer’s tightly closed lips slowly parted, and a subdued voice flowed out.

“You’d best choose your words more carefully if you wish to cling to that stubborn life of yours a little longer.”

“My life?”

Jeok Cheongang snorted and turned to me.

“You tell her. What happened to everyone who came after this old man’s life?”

“They died. Every last one of them.”

“Then how would you feel about this old man adding a bitch instead of a bastard to his kill list?”

There was no question about it. I thrust up a thumb.

“You’re a true feminist of this era.”

“Femibista? What’s that?”

“It means you’re fair. You beat the shit out of everyone equally, regardless of sex or age.”

“Is that some word young people use these days? Whatever the case, I like the meaning.”

Jeok Cheongang nodded in satisfaction, then glared at the Southern Heaven Demon Empress inhabiting the officer’s body.

“You heard that? This femibista intends to punish you and that Lord of Heaven fellow, or whatever his name is. So wash your neck and wait.”

Uh. Should I stop him now, before the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist turns into the Feminist Fist?

Still, I felt much better. The confusion in my head seemed to have cleared completely.

Yeah, fuck it. We just need to beat the shit out of all of them.

Wasn’t that the Fire Gate Clan’s motto, anyway? Smash, break, and burn anyone we decided was an enemy.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress was never going to answer my questions. In that case, no matter what Dark Heaven tried, all I had to do was keep moving forward and smash through it.

I don’t have a choice anyway.

Once I had climbed onto the back of a raging tiger, there were only two paths left.

And rather than be thrown from its back, I would end this insane struggle even if I had to smash the tiger’s skull to do it.

No. I had to.

“Phew…”

I exhaled the breath I had been holding, then leaned close to the military officer. Looking through the soul-less eyes at some distant place, I spoke.

“When we meet again… you’re going to die.”

The officer’s lips twitched.

“Yes. I, too, look forward to that day. And when it comes, no one here will survive.”

His head slowly turned. His unfocused, milky eyes swept over everyone in the room one by one.

But no one avoided that chilling gaze. Mungyeong was no exception.

“You should put an end to this futile killing. A blade always turns back on its wielder in the end.”

His voice and tone were polite, mindful of the others around him. But hidden within them was a blade only a handful of people could detect.

It was the true face of the greatest assassin of all time—the supreme martial artist known as the Slaughter Saint, who had walked a path stained with nothing but blood.

“…What an unusual child. Unusual enough to make me curious about this Divine Physician.”

But the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, borrowing someone else's body, did not seem to have grasped Mungyeong's true identity.

She might have known his public identity as the Divine Physician's Disciple, but the connection between the Slaughter Saint who had vanished forty years ago and a young medical apprentice was far too tenuous.

And before the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's suspicions about Mungyeong could deepen, Jin Wikyung spoke in a heavy voice.

"I swear on the name of the Jin Family of Taiyuan that you will never touch so much as a hair on our youngest's head."

"The Jin Family of Taiyuan. Can that paltry family and its feeble martial arts truly protect that child?"

"Even a sewer rat will fight a tiger for the sake of its young. If you're curious, come and see for yourself. I'll have no choice but to show you."

Even in the face of a bizarre phenomenon far beyond the bounds of common sense, Jin Wikyung did not lose his composure.

No sooner had he finished, calm yet resolute, than Gung Gibang scratched his matted hair.

"Great Hero Jin, it would hurt my feelings if you left our Sect out."

"I forgot the Beggars' Sect. Will you join us?"

"My Master used to say that one dog-beating stick can only beat a neighborhood cur, but a hundred can beat even a tiger to death. So what do you think would happen if a hundred thousand Beggars' Sect disciples gathered?"

The true strength of the Beggars' Sect lay in its overwhelming numbers.

Their forces were so vast that no one could object to calling them the hundred-thousand-strong Beggars' Sect.

Gung Gibang, the Successor Beggar who stood only one step from the summit of the Beggars' Sect, bared his yellow teeth in a grin.

"You were such a lovely young lady. It's a shame to see you like this. But what can we do? Don't resent me too much if I smash that pretty face of yours with my club."

"Resent you?"

The corner of the officer's mouth slowly curled upward.

Through his mouth, now twisted into a grotesque smile that threatened to split his skin, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress addressed everyone.

"There's no need to be so impatient. It won't be long now…"

Her voice faded like a dying campfire.

By then, dark red blood was already flowing from between the officer's lips. Without hesitation, I seized his wrist and felt for his pulse.

Whoosh.

Internal energy surged from my dantian and poured into his body, but the death that had already begun could not be reversed.

Things that outlived their usefulness were discarded.

Perhaps that was why the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had kept the officer alive.

A puppet whose body she could borrow for a while.

Blood gushed from his mouth, then spilled in a stream.

And it wasn't only his mouth.

Dark red blood poured from his eyes, nose, and ears—from the seven apertures of the human body.

A death that could not be stopped by several jiazi[2295] of internal energy or even a Pressure-Point Strike loomed before the officer's eyes.

"It's too late."

At that exact moment, Mungyeong's voice rang in my ears.

Along with a flood of blood, one final sentence slipped from the officer's slowly parting lips.

"Everything shall be as that person wills."

Slump. Thud.

That was the end.

The officer's head drooped as the last of his vitality drained away, and his breathing stopped.

As silence descended with one man's death, the presence approaching the estate stopped outside the door.

"Um… may I come in?"

The voice was familiar.

A young man cautiously poked his head through the slowly opening door.

"Benefactor, Great Hero Zhuge Pong is looking for you."

"Not Zhuge Pong. Zhuge Feng."

"Yes. Great Hero Zhuge Pong."

"…I should just stop talking."

I sighed and rose to my feet.

I didn't ask where Crouching Dragon Guest Zhuge Feng was, where I needed to go, or why he was looking for me.

After all, I was the one who had told them about that place in the first place.

"So, did you find it?"

"Yes."

Cheongpung's eyes lit up.

[2295] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

“It’s exactly the place you described, Benefactor.”

That place was the very location from the Water God Dragon’s memories.

Yeah. The damn Gate.

Honglan—or rather, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—opened her eyes.

She lifted the silk curtain of the gently swaying four-horse carriage. Beyond the lattice window, dense undergrowth stretched into the distance, while the Escort Bureau’s men sweated in the hot, humid weather of the southern regions.

“Hmm.”

With her chin resting in her hand as she gazed out the window, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress looked like a painting all by herself.

Then a furious shout thundered over the heads of the Escort Bureau men stealing entranced glances at her.

“Stop gawking and focus on the delivery! Unless you want to get yourselves killed by the Miao people[2296] we’ll meet in a few days!”

Despite the rough language, the speaker was a woman of dazzling beauty.

Beneath the bamboo hat pulled low to block the sunlight, her long, straight nose was sharp as a blade, and her lightly tanned skin was pleasing to the eye.

A female escort? You don’t see that every day.

It did not take long for the female escort, who had spent quite some time berating the rough men, to notice the Southern Heaven Demon Empress’s gaze.

She eased the reins, drew alongside the carriage, and addressed her through the window.

“Is there a problem?”

“Not at all. Thanks to all your hard work, I’m traveling quite comfortably.”

“Then why are you looking at me like…?”

“Just because.”

“Pardon?”

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress smiled sweetly.

“You’re so young and pretty. I couldn’t help looking.”

“Ah, thank you.”

The female escort, the Young Bureau Head of a small-to-medium Escort Bureau, was flustered but did her best to hide it.

The fact that the woman complimenting her was beautiful enough to make even other women fall for her was one thing. More importantly, she was a passenger [2296] The Miao are an ethnic group of southwestern China and neighboring regions.

who had paid a considerable sum, so the Young Bureau Head's reaction was only natural.

But at the next words, she could no longer conceal her bewilderment.

"I covet it. Enough to want to take it and put it on my own face."

"…!"

"I'm joking. Just joking."

Her bright laughter rang out. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress continued in an amused voice as the female escort froze.

"So, how much farther is it to Yunnan?"

At that moment, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress could barely contain her delight.

Delight at the screams and deaths that would soon be heard in another place.

And delight at having met a new face.

Chapter 484

It wasn't difficult to find our destination. The boatmen had already made one round trip and learned the waterways, so they guided the vessel forward with practiced ease.

Whoosh…

It was hard to believe that a storm had raged only two days ago. The river was calm, and the breeze was cool.

Sitting at the bow beneath the pouring sunlight, I spotted something familiar in the passing scenery.

That's right. It was around here.

The Memory Fragment contained the memories left in the Water God Dragon's mind, and I had seen and felt everything from its perspective.

Naturally, that included the way to that place.

"Wait. Cheongpung, are we sure this is the way?"

At my sudden question, Cheongpung tilted his head.

"It is. Why do you ask?"

"It looks a little different from what I remember. Especially that cliff over there…"

"Oh, that? There were some circumstances."

"What circumstances?"

"Well, we followed the route you told us about, but the gap was so narrow that only a hand could fit through."

"Oh."

So that was why no one had set foot there for so many years. As countless years passed and sediment accumulated, the cliff had eventually blocked the passage.

That hadn't been a problem for the Water God Dragon. It could simply swim underneath instead of passing through the cliff.

Humans, however, were a different story.

"So?"

"We cut through it."

"…You cut through it?"

"Yes. The Wudang grandpa and I snipped it apart with our swords."

What the hell? He's talking about cutting through a cliff like it's a piece of paper.

But with Origami Man—no, Perfected Being Hyeongong, the Supreme Peak master Wudang was so proud of—and Cheongpung, it wasn't impossible.

Even I could have managed it without much trouble.

"Anyway, we carved straight through. It wasn't that hard. I heard the others who arrived with the second group cleaned up the rest."

"…Uh. Right."

Sometimes I forgot that I was surrounded by monsters.

And that I was one of them.

Jeok Cheongang, who had been listening to our conversation, poked Mungyeong in the ribs.

"Has the world gone mad? I don't remember things being like this when we were young. Those two are just monsters, right?"

"Don't lump me in with you. It's insulting."

"So how old were you when you became a Supreme Peak master?"

"…"

"They're the monsters."

"Yes. That must be it. Hah. Perhaps the heavenly patterns have grown clouded. Murim has changed. It certainly has."

As Jeok Cheongang lamented, the vessel continued between cliff walls cut so perfectly straight that the sight sent a chill down my spine.

Then a new landscape—and new people—gradually came into view.

Whoosh! Splash!

Peak masters swept down using the exquisite movement technique known as Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water. They stepped across the river's surface and blocked the vessel with imposing auras.

"Stop! Everyone aboard must state their names and sobriquets. Once the identity verification process is complete—"

Jeok Cheongang, already on edge after his recent aquatic lifestyle, stuck his head out with a fiendish expression.

"This old man is the Fire King."

"Gasp!"

"Stop us and you die."

"Y-yes, sir!"

"O-open the way! No one stop them!"

Whoosh!

Gung Gibang watched the figures vanish at twice the speed with which they had appeared and muttered, "Was Wudang's movement technique always this impressive? The Beggars' Sect will have to stay on its toes."

No. They had probably realized how completely fucked they were and fled for their lives.

Either way, everything proceeded smoothly after that. The vicious Fire Pokémon Jeok Cheongang needed no explanation, and my face was famous enough that anyone who failed to recognize me might as well have been working for Dark Heaven. Besides, Cheongpung and Gung Gibang were with me.

“Oh, did someone just recognize me?”

“Of course. You’re the only beggar who travels with me.”

“…”

“Wow! Someone recognized me just now, too!”

“Of course. You’re the only person who travels around with a horned water snake.”

“Okaaay…”

I ignored the dejected Gung Gibang and Cheongpung and focused on the scene ahead.

Archers had somehow climbed to the tops of the towering cliffs and stood ready to fire. I could also sense masters concealed all around us.

Wudang, the Zhuge Clan, and it looks like the Beggars’ Sect is here too.

The security was formidable.

But considering the weight and importance of the situation, that was only natural.

“Has the City Lord of Hubei Province decided to bury this matter completely?”

Jin Wikyung nodded gravely.

“For now. The common people would hardly welcome the news that a five-hundred-year-old imugi had gone mad and run amok.”

“That’s true.”

Public support was a double-edged sword.

Under normal circumstances, the simple folk would revere the Son of Heaven, but the moment a flood or earthquake struck, they would pull a Hyuk Mujin-level about-face and declare it an omen of the nation’s ruin.

And if a plague came along as part of a buy-two-get-one-free deal, the people of this era would grab the pickaxes they used to till their fields and charge out to overturn the country.

How much worse would it be if an imugi, worshiped by countless people as a divine creature, suddenly went mad and killed several thousand people?

The City Lord of Hubei Province would want to hide that truth as much as possible.

“He does agree, at least in part, that Dark Heaven is an extremely dangerous organization.”

“…He agrees in part? Even after all this?”

I took back what I had just said.

Concealing the Water God Dragon’s existence was one thing, but how many people had died because of this incident? And he only agreed in part?

He clearly still hadn’t come to his senses.

"It is a delusion born of arrogance. He believes Murim is merely Murim and that it poses no threat to their ability to govern the country. I tried my best to persuade him, but it was of little use."

Jeok Cheongang abruptly cut in with a disgruntled voice.

"Those idiot government officials haven't changed at all. They were exactly the same during the Great Faction War. When the Demonic Cult pushed down through Sichuan, they sat on their hands. Only after the civilian casualties mounted did they scramble to gather troops."

"What happened then?"

"What do you think happened? By then, the Demonic Cult had already been defeated and withdrawn, and some bastard calling himself a Great General came strutting over to take credit. He said it was all thanks to His Imperial Majesty's grace and whatnot. Since the Emperor was the master of the country, it didn't really matter who won, but congratulations on your victory. That sort of bullshit."

"You showed remarkable restraint. For you, Old Master, that was practically the patience of a Buddha."

Jeok Cheongang looked at me as if I were talking nonsense.

"Why would this old man have put up with that? I tried to beat him to death. If Hong Dao hadn't stopped me, it wouldn't have been the Great Faction War. It would have been the Great Government War, or something like that."

"…Ah. Right."

"In any case, don't expect much from the government officials. We should be satisfied that they at least turned the dark-path figures who had been sitting quietly into Dark Heaven's lackeys."

Jin Wikyung answered with a bitter smile.

"Yes. Fortunately, the people's anger and wariness toward Dark Heaven have been soaring ever since."

"They had nothing to do with this incident, but what can we do? They aren't exactly innocent, either. They're dark-path figures, so using this opportunity to uproot them wouldn't be a bad idea."

After negotiating with Murim, the government had crushed Hubei Province's dark-path figures as scapegoats to appease the people's anger. Both sides had gotten what they wanted, so it was a kind of give-and-take.

Of course, our reputations had skyrocketed once again in the process.

Whether the government would actually step in even if Dark Heaven ran wilder than it already had was another question.

As I thought about that, the vessel that had been charging forward finally came to a stop.

We docked at a temporary pier built against the cliff, and gazes poured toward us.

"That's Great Hero Jeok Cheongang."

“The Successor Beggar is beside him, too. I was wondering where the Huashan Divine Dragon had gone.”

“Wait. Isn’t that young man the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon?”

“Did you hear? There’s talk among the leaders that the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon was the one who took down the imugi…”

They thought they were whispering, but I could hear every word.

You idiots.

Annoyed by the muttering, I deliberately scowled. The area fell silent in an instant.

Then a shout broke the silence.

“Oh, you’re here!”

The middle-aged man running toward us was drenched from head to toe in mud and river water. Unfamiliar aquatic plants were tangled in his disheveled hair.

I muttered inwardly as I watched him approach.

That man is the Family Head of the Zhuge Clan?

It was something I was only now fully appreciating, but Crouching Dragon Guest Zhuge Feng was unquestionably an eccentric even by Murim standards.

“Family Head, I normally wouldn’t say anything, but there are outsiders present. Please show some decorum…”

“Ah, please move aside, Uncle.”

“Family Heaaad!”

He had clearly stuffed his dignity into a mailbox and left it there.

Zhuge Feng ruthlessly brushed aside the family elder trying to stop him, hurried over, and spoke with his face flushed.

“We found it. We really found it!”

“Yes, I know. Cheongpung told me—”

“At first, I wondered what kind of bullshit you were talking about, but it was sitting right there in the place you described!”

“…”

Wasn’t that a little too honest?

I had explained everything so earnestly, and he had dismissed it as bullshit?

Seeing my expression, Zhuge Feng continued with an appropriately solemn look.

“Our ancestor, Zhuge Wuhou, once said that one should tap even a stone bridge before crossing it. Don’t take it too personally.”

Was trotting out their ancestor whenever it suited them a Zhuge Clan motto, or was it hereditary?

I stared suspiciously at Zhuge Feng.

“…Did Zhuge Wuhou really say that? As far as I know, that’s a proverb from another country.”

“He must have said it at least once in his life. Is that important right now?”

Unbelievable.

Whether it was the Chinese over there or the Chinese over here, they were astonishingly good at copying other people’s work.

Before I could respond, Zhuge Feng spun around and started walking ahead of us.

“Follow me.”

Jeok Cheongang, who had been trembling with delight at finally being able to set foot on even a temporary pier, narrowed his eyes.

“‘Follow me’? Was that directed at this old man?”

“…I wasn’t speaking to you, Senior.”

“Then watch your mouth from now on. Straighten out that folded tongue before this old man splits you in half.”

“Yes, sir.”

“And why are you walking so slowly? This old man’s grandmother would be faster than you.”

“Hyah!”

What was with the sudden battle cry?

As alert and disciplined as the model trainee in position one,[2297] Zhuge Feng activated his movement technique and raced ahead. Not long afterward, I encountered a bizarre sight that hadn’t appeared even in the Memory Fragment.

“What is that…?”

“I invented that device when I was nine. Bringing it here over the last two days was quite an ordeal. What do you think?”

I nodded as I stared at the enormous stone wall standing in the river like a barrier.

“Wow. That’s incredible.”

“It’s impossible to investigate underwater for long, so we used stone cut from the cliff to seal off all four sides, then drained the water from inside. If ordinary laborers had done this, it would have taken several months at the very least.”

The mechanism Zhuge Feng had invented had played a major role, but without martial artists, no one would have even considered building something like this in two days.

“Would everyone clear out for a moment?”

The moment we descended beneath the stone wall, Zhuge Feng uttered those words, and the people who appeared to be formation experts from the Zhuge Clan withdrew like the receding tide.

Only then could I see it.

[2297] In Korean military training, recruits can be addressed by assigned numbers. The comparison evokes a trainee responding promptly to an instructor’s orders.

A towering cliff that must have stood in the same place for countless years—and an enormous fissure running directly across its center.

Swish.

The instant I instinctively reached out and touched the fissure—

An utterly ominous System notification pierced my ears.

Chapter 485

Thump. Thump.

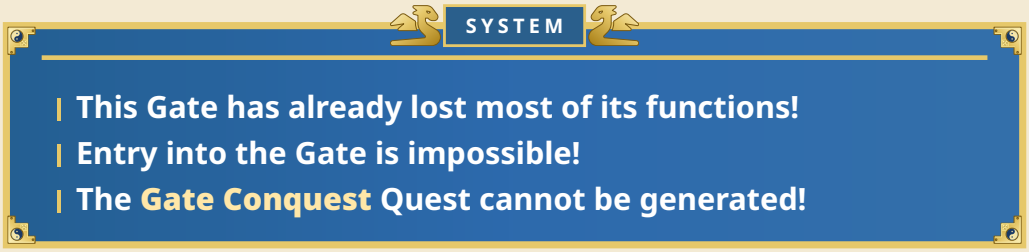
My heartbeat thundered inside me.

One step, then another. The closer I drew to it, the harder my heart pounded.

My mouth felt gritty, as though I had chewed a handful of sand. My eyes had gone wide without me realizing it, and they felt dry and stiff.

Then, the moment my hand finally touched the fissure in the cliff, I learned the true source of that ominous feeling.

Beep.



The notification drilling into my ears, the holographic window filling my vision, the gazes of everyone watching me…

Faced with all of it, I slowly uttered a single word.

"…Fuck."

Crunch.

Without realizing it, I had clenched my hand hard enough for my fingers to dig into the cliff.

The faintest trace of demonic qi seeped from the fissure—or rather, the Gate—and made my vision swim.

I'd hoped until the very end that it wasn't this.

That damn Gate. It really was a Gate.

How? Why?

Those unanswerable questions stayed with me for a long time afterward.

My thoughts were a mess. I had suspected as much ever since seeing it through the Memory Fragment, but now that I was face-to-face with a reality so difficult to believe, I found myself at a loss for words.

A Gate in the Murim.

This was an enormous rift—a sign that the laws governing this world were collapsing, and the first step toward disaster.

Dark Heaven.

Their true nature was far deeper and darker than I had ever imagined.

Standing apart from the others, I gazed out over the blackened waters of Dongting Lake. Then I picked up a loose stone and tossed it into the water.

Splash.

The bloodshed at Shaolin led to Sichuan, and eventually reached this place.

The past several months had been one continuous sea of corpses and blood.

While the Star-Array Grand Banquet was taking place in Henan, Shaolin—the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper[2298] of the orthodox Murim—had been attacked, and the flames of Dark Heaven had spread to Sichuan.

More importantly, inexplicable phenomena had occurred along the way.

The Blood Lord, the Western Heaven Demon Lord, and the Moving Formation.

I could still vividly recall the sight of the Blood Lord recovering even after being struck by Jeok Cheongang's Dance of the Fire God and Demon—a technique that staked his life itself.

No. It wasn't even accurate to call that recovery.

That was right. What the Blood Lord had shown was closer to regeneration than recovery.

New flesh had sprouted as if time itself were reversing. Bones had slid back into place. Everything charred pitch-black like ash had regenerated in an instant.

As I watched that unbelievable sight, one very familiar creature had come to mind.

A Troll. Yeah, he was just like a Troll.

Or maybe a potion…

Damn it. A Troll and a potion? It was my own idea, but it sounded insane.

What was even crazier was that it might actually have been true.

I picked up another stone and sent it flying even farther.

Splash.

And that wasn't the only strange phenomenon the Blood Lord had displayed. When the Sword Saint's arrival put him on the defensive, hadn't he cried out for the Lord of Heaven before vanishing without a trace?

At the time, everyone had concluded that it was one of the monstrous martial arts and supreme techniques born of demonic, heterodox arts. But now that I had confirmed the existence of the Gate, things looked different.

Teleport.

It might have differed slightly from the Teleport I had experienced through Magic Johnson, but if that wasn't Teleport, I'd use Hyuk Mujin's palm as a griddle.

[2298] Mount Tai and the Northern Dipper are traditional symbols of eminence; together, they describe Shaolin as a leading authority in the Murim.

Come to think of it, more than one thing hadn't added up about the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

During the Sichuan Blood Tragedy, the Western Heaven Demon Lord had sacrificed one arm to defeat the Poison King.

But when I confronted him in the underground prison beneath the Sichuan Tang Clan, he already had a new one.

No matter how many angles I considered or how many possibilities I went through, only two explanations could account for that.

Either the Western Heaven Demon Lord was a living model kit, or some unknown power had been at work.

Naturally, the former was impossible.

Though personally, I would have preferred it.

The Moving Formation was the same.

The Moving Formation. A wondrous formation capable of transporting hundreds of Dark Heaven's black-robed men at once.

Dark Heaven was called the successor to the Demonic Cult. If the Demonic Cult had possessed anything like that, they would have put it to use more than fifty years ago.

Then the Great Faction War would have ended in victory for the Demonic Cult, and instead of becoming the Third Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, I would have become the Third Young Master of the Black Dragon Gang—or some other dark-path sect.

Why hadn't I realized it?

Even I, the sole outsider in this world of Murim, had failed to predict the truth.

The faint suspicion that had occasionally crossed my mind had been buried beneath talk of monstrous martial arts and supreme techniques from the Thousand-Year Demonic Path, then erased by the power the Western Heaven Demon Lord had called supernatural powers.

But things were different now.

I had confirmed the existence of the Gate. I had realized that the common sense and laws of the Murim, which had gradually become familiar to me, were collapsing.

And I had realized that the strange abilities of Dark Heaven—which martial artists called monstrous martial arts and supernatural powers—could be explained with a single word.

Magic.

At the single word filling my mind, my vision brightened, and my forehead, which had been burning hot, slowly cooled.

At the same time, the title of another being who had yet to reveal himself slipped from between my lips.

"…Lord of Heaven."

The one who reigned at the summit of Dark Heaven.

A being so overwhelming that people like the Blood Lord, the Western Heaven Demon Lord, and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress called themselves his lowly servants.

What the hell are you?

Just thinking about the Lord of Heaven made all the blood in my body run cold.

If—just if—that bastard called the Lord of Heaven was the very being that had surfaced in my mind…

Splash!

"…!"

Water sprayed high into the air, sending ripples across the surface.

I snapped out of my thoughts as if I'd been doused in cold water. When I turned, a familiar face came into view. I hadn't even noticed him approach.

"What are you spacing out for?"

His voice was gruff, but the eyes peering out from between the deep wrinkles on his face were filled with concern.

I let out a quiet laugh at Jeok Cheongang's expression and opened my mouth.

"You startled me. What brings you here?"

He dropped heavily into the seat beside me.

"You'd been gone for so long that I came to see what you were doing."

"If you were coming, you could've come quietly. Why throw a rock out of nowhere?"

"Watching you fiddle with pebbles like a seven-year-old was getting on this old man's nerves. Do you have a problem with that?"

"What if I do?"

Whoosh!

Before the words had even left my mouth, I ducked. A vicious rush of air brushed my hair and tore through the space where my head had been.

Jeok Cheongang smacked his lips after his attack on the back of my head failed.

"You've got remarkably sharp instincts."

"Do you think this is the first time? I can dodge you with my eyes closed now."

"Close them."

"…I'd rather not."

"You insolent brat. Then why were you so distracted earlier? Spacing out like that in the Murim is a good way to get yourself killed."

"So you were planning to kill me?"

"Of course. If that's what you want, this old man can certainly oblige."

“Then you’ll have to find another Disciple. Oh, wait. Since I’m not actually your Disciple, I guess it doesn’t matter.”

“Ahem. Ahem-ahem!”

Jeok Cheongang forced out several fake coughs before abruptly asking,

“So what has an idiot with nothing but shit in his head so troubled?”

“I was wondering where to take a shit.”

Smack!

Damn it. I couldn’t dodge that one.

Jeok Cheongang had even used a grappling technique to make sure he landed the blow on the back of my head. He glared at me.

“Do you want to shit blood?”

“Why? You said my head was full of shit, and I said I was thinking about shit. What’s the problem?”

“Answer me properly before I switch your mouth and ass around.”

“Ah. Yes, sir.”

Rubbing the back of my throbbing head, I thought for a moment before speaking.

“The truth is, I’m not from this world. And I think an evil power from the world I originally came from is deeply connected to Dark Heaven. You know that imugi[2299] that went berserk this time? That was all their doing. The rift in the cliff is a Gate. If it ever fully breaks open, monsters will come pouring out.”

“…”

“When that happens, it’s all over. Completely over. And it’s probably not true, but there’s a bastard called Demon King Asmodeus. If he’s still alive and has his sights set on the Murim, then we’re all completely fucked—”

“I understand.”

I swallowed the rest of my words at Jeok Cheongang’s response.

It was a ridiculous story that no one would believe anyway. I had been spilling everything without restraint, but his reaction left me speechless.

“Excuse me?”

“I said I understand.”

“…”

“I understood every word. There’s no need to say any more.”

What was with that reaction?

I was beyond bewildered. At the same time, an indescribable emotion surged up from deep within my chest.

He believes me? He believes this ridiculous story? No… he believes me?

As Jeok Cheongang silently gazed at me, my chest swelled and my throat tightened.

[2299] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often described as a being that has not yet become a dragon.

A little over a year. Short by some measures, long by others.

We had shared more hardships and joys than anyone else, and the emotion in the old man's eyes was something that could only be called absolute trust.

…He trusted me that much.

Sometimes an inexplicable emotion would seize me and leave me unable to speak—unable even to figure out what I should say.

But at that moment, I realized it was time to say the word I had been turning over in my heart for so long.

"Old Master. No…"

After a long hesitation, I finally forced the words out.

As I opened my mouth, my heart trembling, Jeok Cheongang smiled kindly and nodded.

"I understood you perfectly. You sure take a long time to say that you want to die."

"M—yes?"

"What do you mean, 'yes,' you damn bastard."

Whap-whap-whap!

What the fuck?

My brain ground to a halt. I stared blankly, mouth hanging open and both hands clutching the back of my head, as his furious voice rang out.

"Do you take this old man for an idiot? What? You're not from this world? 'I Was a Mere Civilian in Another World, but Now I'm a Supreme Peak Master in the Murim.' Is that it?"

"That title's surprisingly trendy and pretty good—no, that's not the point. Just hear me out."

"I already did. Those were your last words."

"Whoa, whoa. Hold on!"

"'Hold on'? After all the times I've beaten you, you still haven't come to your senses, and now you're talking to me like an equal again, you insolent little…!"

Whap-whap-whap!

Dozens of palm shadows filled my vision and battered every inch of my body.

As searing heat burrowed into me, I thought,

Master, my ass. Fuck.

I was an idiot for getting moved, even for a moment.

"If you ever spout that kind of bullshit again, I'll tear you in half and kill you. Understood?"

At Jeok Cheongang's murderous warning, Jin Taekyung—who had been beaten mercilessly for fifteen minutes—groaned.

"Ugh, hold on. I think I'm actually going to die."

"Quiet. You're slower than this old man's grandmother!"

"…Old Master, since we're on the subject, you don't sneak out a smartphone and use it whenever you go take a leak, do you?"

Smack!

After delivering one final blow to Jin Taekyung, who had once again spouted something incomprehensible, Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue and walked away.

The murderous aura radiating from his entire body made everyone swallow hard and clear a path.

Step. Step.

He walked toward somewhere.

Now alone, Jeok Cheongang wore a complicated expression that was impossible to decipher.

…That brat. Spouting such incomprehensible nonsense.

Still, who knew?

Jeok Cheongang had never believed in rumors or superstitions—not even a little—in his entire life. But if Jin Taekyung was the one saying it, things were different.

That brat was more special to him than anyone else.

Come to think of it, he seemed about to say something beginning with "Ma…"

Could it be?

No. Of course not.

Jeok Cheongang sighed and looked up at the moon hanging over the cliff.

Beneath the brilliant moonlight, he saw someone in much the same position as himself standing nearby, gazing out over the water.

"Can we talk for a moment?"

At Jeok Cheongang's words, Mungyeong answered,

"No. Get lost."

Chapter 486

“Can we talk for a moment?”

“No. Get lost.”

“I see.”

Jeok Cheongang approached without the slightest hesitation. Mungyeong’s brow twitched.

“I said no.”

“I heard you. So?”

“You really are impossible to reason with. Did all those years go straight up your ass?”

“Young punk, is that any way to speak to an elder? This old man has at least six or seven years on you.”

“Just how old are you to say some—”

“Thigh meat, you wet-behind-the-ears brat.”[2300]

“What a goddamn—Forget it. I shouldn’t bother talking to you.”

Mungyeong, who had felt his temper flare for a moment, shook his head over and over.

He looked like a boy—so young as to seem almost childish—but he, too, had lived for more than a century.

Yet whenever he spoke with Jeok Cheongang, he felt like a child losing his composure.

He’s mastered the art of pissing people off. Master and Disciple really are two peas in a pod.

Jeok Cheongang and Jin Taekyung could probably talk someone to death with nothing but their three-inch tongues.

Compared to them, the old Disciple tending to patients in Sichuan right now was practically the Buddha reincarnated.

I miss him. I wonder if he’s doing well.

While Mungyeong thought of his kind Disciple, Jeok Cheongang sauntered over with his splay-footed gait and sat on a rock.

“What were you looking at?”

“I have no reason to tell you.”

“Not a bad choice. Then let’s sit here until dawn. Just the two of us old men, enjoying some quality time together.”

“You understand one thing and miss the other. I can simply leave.”

[2300] The Korean word sal can mean both “years of age” and “flesh,” allowing Jeok Cheongang to twist Mungyeong’s question about his age into “thigh meat.”

“You understand two things and miss the third. Do you think this old man will only do this today?”

“…!”

“Today, tomorrow, the day after tomorrow, and the day after that. Old age has already robbed me of sleep and left me with time to kill. This might not be so bad.”

Mungyeong, who had been about to turn away, stopped dead. His eyelids trembling, he stared at Jeok Cheongang and muttered with a sigh.

“You vicious old bastard.”

“Hm. Looks like you’re finally ready to talk.”

“…Tell me why you came.”

“This might take a while.”

“Make it as short as possible.”

“‘As short as possible,‘ huh?”

Jeok Cheongang gazed at the river, its waters dyed pitch-black, and tossed out a single sentence.

“Look after that brat from now on.”

“What?”

Mungyeong frowned for a moment before speaking.

“By ‘that brat,‘ you mean Jin Taekyung?”

“Yes. Who else would I mean besides that brat Jin Taekyung?”

“Why are you asking me?”

“Who knows? I’m not sure myself.”

Jeok Cheongang suddenly raised his head toward the sky.

A full moon hung brilliantly overhead. Light poured from that unreachable place, unusually bright.

“I suddenly found myself wondering how long I’d be able to stay with that brat.”

A hundred years was a very long time.

Mountains and rivers had changed. Dynasties had risen and fallen. And… a young boy had become a white-haired old man.

Mungyeong gazed at Jeok Cheongang and murmured quietly.

“You’ve grown old.”

“Yes. I have.”

It was not only the body that grew old and worn with the passage of time. Unseen feelings and the heart itself were slowly weathered away.

A person realized they had grown old when death suddenly came to mind, or when they wondered how much longer they could remain beside someone.

Just as Jeok Cheongang was doing now.

And Mungyeong was the one person who understood Jeok Cheongang's feelings better than anyone.

"Has the Heart Demon come calling?"

"The Heart Demon? That came a long time ago."

Jeok Cheongang let out a self-deprecating laugh.

Ever since the former Disciple he had raised like a son became the Killing Ghost and left him, a dark cloud had hung over his heart.

The grief and guilt he had felt then had shackled Jeok Cheongang's body and mind for decades.

Until a light called Jin Taekyung suddenly appeared and shone down upon him.

"It's a painful memory now. I remember it, but it no longer hurts."

"Then why?"

"Because I've grown anxious."

The Heart Demon had no fixed form. It was any obstacle that disturbed the heart and hindered enlightenment.

The Heart Demon gripping Jeok Cheongang now was anxiety.

"I wish I'd met that boy twenty years earlier. No, even ten years earlier would have been good… But I met him too late."

Jeok Cheongang raised a hand to cover the moon. He hated how its bright light—unaged, unlike him—shone upon his wrinkled face.

"I'm not what I used to be. Neither my body nor my heart. The only reason I've endured this long is because that boy was there."

Jin Taekyung was not the only one who had grown during the year they spent on Mount Jiuhua.

Through teaching Taekyung, Jeok Cheongang had also gained a small measure of enlightenment, and thanks to that, he had managed to halt the rapid advance of his infirmities of old age.

But—

"You already knew, didn't you? My innate qi was damaged."

Innate qi, also called true-origin qi, was the source of everything that made up the human body. It was life force itself.

Remembering what had happened in Henan, Jeok Cheongang smiled bitterly.

"I don't regret it. I would have done anything to save that boy."

He meant every word. Even if he could go back ten times or a hundred, he would make the same choice. The situation had been that desperate.

Desperate enough for him to draw upon the innate qi that was practically his life force to make up for his insufficient internal energy.

The Dance of the Fire God and Demon, which had once dragged the Blood Lord to the brink of death, carried the resolve of an old Master who had burned his own life force as fuel.

“I had fully prepared myself for it. Even if I survived, I knew I wouldn’t be the same as before.”

Mungyeong watched him in silence before replying in a low voice.

“You wouldn’t have been, if not for the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng that boy brought back.”

“Yes. It was all a stroke of heaven-sent fortune. Even the fact that he found you.”

But both men knew the truth.

Not even the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng, an elixir seldom seen in any age, combined with the treatment of the Divine Physician, whose medical skill was said to reach the heavens, could restore Jeok Cheongang’s innate qi.

All of it was merely a stopgap.

Even if one blocked a collapsed dam with a massive boulder, the water trapped behind the dam would continue to seep through a small gap—slowly, little by little, without pause.

“Is that why you came to me? To ask me to look after him?”

“Who knows? What do you think?”

Mungyeong clicked his tongue softly.

“You’ve grown more fretful with age. It wouldn’t be too late to worry about that a few years from now.”

Every person possessed a different amount of qi and a different vessel to contain it.

If an ordinary commoner or Third Rate martial artist was a small stream, Jeok Cheongang was an endless sea.

He would slowly lose strength as his innate qi continued to drain away, but Mungyeong already understood the condition of Jeok Cheongang’s body. As far as he could tell, these concerns were premature.

“This is my body. I know it well. At least I won’t die today.”

“Then stop thinking foolish thoughts and go back. You’d be better off spending this time grabbing that brat and teaching him one more move.”

“But no one knows what might happen tomorrow.”

“What?”

“Do you think I came because I’m afraid my innate qi will slowly disappear until I suddenly drop dead one day?”

Jeok Cheongang stared at Mungyeong’s furrowed brow and continued slowly.

“I can feel it. I’m growing weaker. I’ve already survived several brushes with death unlike anything I faced even during the Great Faction War. Whether an old man like me can endure all the battles still to come… only some damned bastard watching from the heavens knows.”

“…!”

“Hong Dao once told me that the heavenly patterns were becoming distorted, and a calamity greater than the Great Faction War was approaching.”

Dharma King Hong Dao’s prediction had become reality.

Only a year later, Shaolin—the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper[2301] of the Murim—had been covered in blood and corpses, and the wise high monk who loved alcohol and meat had met his death.

By then, the dark cloud called Dark Heaven had spread over Henan, Sichuan, and Hubei.

And Jeok Cheongang knew that before long, it would cover the entire world.

“Listen, Slaughter Saint.”

Deep regret filled Jeok Cheongang’s eyes as he looked at Mungyeong.

“Things we cannot understand are happening. Everything we knew is collapsing.”

People often compared the Murim to the Yangtze.

The waves behind on the Yangtze push the waves ahead. That was why the saying existed.

But the strange phenomena and events Dark Heaven was causing throughout the world were nothing like the Yangtze. They were an act of defying heaven itself, overturning heaven and earth.

Everything Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong had known, every law they had understood across more than a century of life, was shattering and collapsing.

If what Jin Taekyung said is true, then even more so. No. No, that can’t be. It mustn’t be.

Jeok Cheongang forcibly brushed the thought from his mind as it flashed through it.

It was nothing more than another ridiculous piece of nonsense tossed out like a joke, just as Jin Taekyung always did.

More precisely, that was what Jeok Cheongang wanted to believe.

His body and heart had already grown old and worn. He was not yet ready to accept such a shocking story.

“Anyway, I’m only asking to put my mind at ease. Anything can happen in this goddamn Murim. It would hardly be surprising if one old man growing weaker by the day were to die.”

Mungyeong stared at Jeok Cheongang with a strange look in his eyes.

[2301] “Mount Tai and Northern Dipper” is an honorific for a preeminent authority, likening that standing to a prominent mountain and the guiding stars.

The giant known as the Fire King seemed unusually small today, and his calm voice as he spoke of a death that could come at any moment lingered in Mungyeong's ears.

Asking. He's asking me.

It was hard to believe that word had come from the mouth of the Fire King himself.

Mungyeong silently watched Jeok Cheongang rise to his feet.

Damn. I've grown old too.

Though his body had grown young, his heart was old.

That must have been why one corner of his heart, untouched by even a drop of rain for so many years, was slowly growing damp.

"…Hah."

Just as Mungyeong let out a quiet sigh, Jeok Cheongang hauled his heavy backside off the rock and turned away with a wave.

"I'll be going. Enjoy the moon."

"What?"

What was he talking about?

Mungyeong's mind briefly stopped working. He barely managed to speak.

"You're leaving?"

"Of course. Shouldn't you be grateful that this nuisance is leaving?"

"I haven't answered you yet."

"What do you mean? I believe I've already heard your answer."

"Wait. What are you—"

"I heard your answer loud and clear, young friend."

"No, what kind of crazy old bastard—"

The composure that rarely broke came crashing down all at once.

Mungyeong stared at Jeok Cheongang's retreating back with an incredulous expression and shouted,

"What do you expect me to do?"

"Teach him a few things. The mindset he'll need, for example. And if any of your secret martial arts might be useful, slip him a manual."

"Secret martial arts? A manual?"

For a moment, Mungyeong doubted his own ears.

An individual's or sect's secret martial arts were the crystallized essence of everything they had learned. They could not be taught even for ten thousand pieces of gold and were more precious than life itself.

Yet Jeok Cheongang was telling him to teach those secret arts to someone else's Disciple.

Mungyeong asked with complete sincerity.

“…Have you gone senile and forgotten what secret martial arts are?”

“I know exactly what they are. Unless you plan on saving them to wipe your ass with, teach him a few.”

“You lunatic.”

“You don’t have anyone else to teach them to anyway. Let your old Disciple in Sichuan keep saving lives, and teach our boy how to kill properly.”

Was that something he could say with a straight face?

Mungyeong was too dumbfounded to speak. Meanwhile, having said everything he wanted to say, Jeok Cheongang was already speeding away into the distance.

Whoosh!

“What a… fucking mess.”

Chapter 487

After confirming the Gate's existence, my thoughts had been a mess, but Jeok Cheongang's help had cleared them right up.

"…"

Actually, screw that. It wasn't help. He had beaten me so thoroughly that every joint in my body ached.

When I ran into Hyuk Mujin later, he saw me groaning and gave me a thumbs-up.

"Wow, as expected of you, Captain! You can still get back up after taking that kind of beating!"

"Mujin."

"Yes?"

"Put that thumb away while I'm still asking nicely. Before I pound the top of your head and turn you into Thumb Princess.[2302]"

With my Strength, I could totally pull off a compression press.

He might not have known exactly what a Thumb Princess was, but the murderous atmosphere had clearly gotten through to him.

Hyuk Mujin hastily lowered his thumb and muttered, "He's always picking on me. If only he'd stayed laid up with his injuries…"

"Mujin, what did you say?"

"I was saying that the Captain has risen rapidly to become a Morning Star of the Murim!"

"…"

Now that was a heartfelt lie.

It would not be an exaggeration to say he had elevated quick thinking to the realm of art. Feeling a sudden pang of pity, I patted Hyuk Mujin on the shoulder.

"Yeah. You hang in there too. You've been shooting up lately."

"Me?"

"Yeah. I heard it in the marketplace on the way here."

Hyuk Mujin might be treated like a nobody here, but he was a martial artist who had earned the impressive sobriquet Swift Wind Sword after helping the Jin Family of Taiyuan pacify northern Gaoyuan.

And since he was always walking around with a blue-chip stock like me, his own stock had naturally begun to rise as well.

"Listening to the townspeople talk, you sounded like some battle-hardened veteran."

"Ahem. Is that so?"

[2302] "Thumb Princess" is the Korean title for Thumbelina, the fairy tale about a tiny girl.

"Yeah. At least a Supreme Peak master. If that isn't shooting up, what is?"

Hyuk Mujin had been grinning happily, but now he looked me up and down suspiciously.

"What's with that disrespectful look?"

"I thought you might say I'd shot up, then hit me and leave me laid up."

"…You crazy bastard."

It was a decent scenario, though. Still, was my image really that bad?

Come to think of it, I have beaten him quite a lot.

I suddenly felt sorry for him. How many times had he been hit to develop this much of a persecution complex?

I gazed at Hyuk Mujin with pity, let out a deep sigh, and said, "No. I told you, I heard it in the marketplace myself."

"Really? You swear on everything?"

"I stake both your balls on it."

"Oh. I guess it must be true, then. At last, the fame of the Jin Family's prodigy, the Swift Wind Sword Hyuk Mujin, has spread throughout the Murim—"

Hyuk Mujin, who had been grinning from ear to ear, suddenly stopped.

"Wait a minute. Something feels wrong."

"What?"

"Why are you staking my balls?"

I answered calmly.

"Because they're your balls, obviously."

"What? Why is that obvious?"

"Because you're Hyuk Mujin."

"What the hell does that even mean…"

His expression was a sight to behold.

If I lost every single one of the countless bets I had made involving Hyuk Mujin, saying that even thirty balls wouldn't be enough would hardly be an exaggeration. There was no need to spell that out.

"Ever thought about cutting one off and planting it? A tree might grow."

"Plant what?"

"What else?"

Hyuk Mujin followed my gaze and stared at me like I was a lunatic.

"I've never heard of a tree like that."

"That's why you'd be the first."

"I'll leave that honor to you, Captain."

"Enough. What were you doing that you only showed up now? You were nowhere to be seen earlier."

Immediately after the Water God Dragon fell, we had split into two groups. Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin had followed Zhuge Feng, so this was the first time I had seen them in exactly two days.

At my question, Hyuk Mujin shook the net he was holding.

“What’s that?”

“Fish. I’ve been capturing them.”

“Fish?”

“Yes. I’ve been catching them since yesterday, but it hasn’t been easy.”

Right. Of course. Catching fish must be so hard.

I looked back and forth between Hyuk Mujin and the net full of thrashing fish, then nodded faintly.

“I see. Our Mujin was busy fishing.”

“I’m not joking. These things are so violent and strong that they’ve nearly drained me dry—”

Smack!

“Gah!”

“Drained you dry? You abandoned your direct superior, the man you’re supposed to serve with undying loyalty, and came here to enjoy a little fishing? Just looking at you is draining me dry!”

Hyuk Mujin staggered backward, clutching his head, then shouted furiously, “That’s not what you think!”

“You dare raise your voice at me? You said you were catching fish, didn’t you?”

“It wasn’t fishing! It was capturing! Capturing!”

“Capturing? Cheongpung, capture this bastard!”

“Ah! Yes, Benefactor!”

Cheongpung, who had been lingering nearby, rushed over and seized Hyuk Mujin.

How could Hyuk Mujin possibly resist the grappling technique of Huashan’s Morning Star, a Supreme Peak master who had inherited the Sword Saint’s legacy?

I looked down at the helplessly subdued Hyuk Mujin and solemnly declared, “Even if the Murim perishes tomorrow, I shall plant a single testicle tree.”

“Wait. Wait!”

“I ask you: Is the left ball yours, or the right?”

“They’re both mine! What kind of bullshit is that?”

“You’re an honest fellow. As a reward, I’ll take both.”

“Let go! I said let go! You crazy bastards!”

Just then, as Hyuk Mujin’s screams rang through the air—

Hiss!

“If we bury them somewhere sunny, they’ll grow nice and strong… Whoa, that startled me.”

It happened in an instant.

Something long and pure white shot out of Cheongpung’s arms like a streak of light. Cheongpung immediately sprang to his feet, releasing Hyuk Mujin.

“Where are you going, Mimi?”

“Phew!”

Finally freed from Cheongpung’s hold, Hyuk Mujin pointed at the net he had dropped and shouted, “Capture! Not fishing—capture! See for yourself!”

As it turned out, Hyuk Mujin’s protests were pointless.

The moment Mimi sprang from Cheongpung’s arms and darted toward the net, my gaze had already locked onto her.

And as soon as I saw the scene unfolding before me, a single thought crossed my mind.

Just one problem after another.

Hiss! Chomp!

Flicking her tongue, Mimi slipped between the gaps in the net and tore into one of the fish’s gills.

Though I wasn’t sure that thing should even be called a fish.

Thud! Flap-flap!

Its eyes were bright blood-red. Its teeth were sharp as saw blades, and its body was larger than an adult man’s forearm.

And on its tail… Fuck. What the hell was that?

I stared in disbelief and muttered, “…A spike?”

Hyuk Mujin, who had gotten to his feet while panting, answered gruffly, “You may be hard of hearing when people talk, but your eyesight is excellent.”

“What kind of fish has a spike on its tail?”

“Maybe it’s a special weapon.”

“…Are you going to keep talking bullshit?”

“I told you, didn’t I? Fishing, my ass. It was capturing. Capturing! How could you catch something like that with a fishing rod?”

“Huh.”

Capture. Now that I heard it again, there really was no better word for catching something like that.

Grumbling to himself, Hyuk Mujin walked over and picked up the net he had dropped. Only then did I realize it wasn’t an ordinary net, but a heavy mesh woven from iron and steel.

“What the hell is that?”

“As you can see, their teeth are incredibly sharp. One bite would tear through an ordinary net—”

“I’m not talking about the net. What are those things inside it?”

“Oh.”

Clang!

Hyuk Mujin frowned at the creatures thrashing violently enough to nearly tear the metal mesh apart.

“For now, everyone calls them Blood Fish.”

“Blood Fish?”

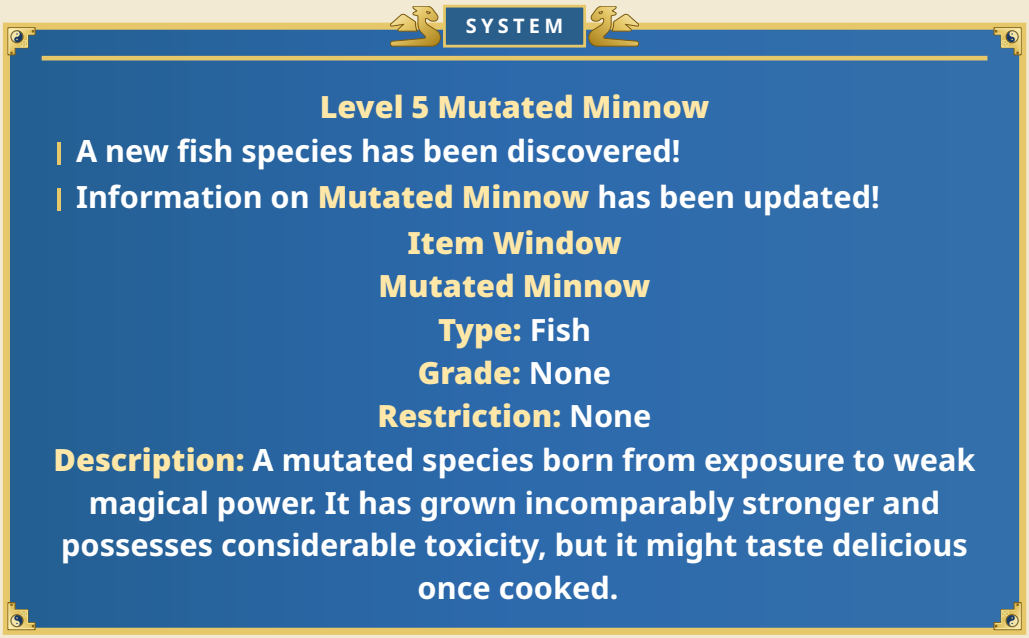
“Yes. Because their eyes are blood-red.”

Blood Fish. It was certainly a fitting name for their sinister appearance. But I wanted to know the exact name of these grotesque creatures.

Qi Sense.

Whoosh… Beep.

The wave of Qi Sense spread outward from me and reached them. A System notification appeared, and Level windows rose above their massive bodies.



“…”

This is a minnow?

I stared at the thing, which was larger than an ordinary adult man’s forearm.

What happened to the minnows I know?

They might as well tell me this isn’t Dongting Lake but the Amazon.

First, I was shocked that this monster of a fish was Level 5. Then I was shocked all over again by the System window’s bullshit claim that it was incredibly strong and poisonous but might taste good.

It might taste good once cooked? You just said it was poisonous, you crazy bastards. Still, there could only be one cause.

This transformation had undoubtedly been caused by the magical power leaking from the Gate.

The Water God Dragon had sacrificed itself to absorb most of the Gate's magical power, but it couldn't have done anything about the residue.

And from what I had personally confirmed just one or two shichen[2303] ago, the Gate was still leaking a faint trace of magical power despite having ceased to function.

What happens if things like these spread throughout the world? What if it's contagious?

I already knew the answer.

We'd be fucked. That's what.

The tributaries of Dongting Lake flowed into the Yangtze, and the Yangtze was both a vast natural ecosystem and a waterway traveled by countless people.

I wasn't part of some environmental organization, so the destruction of the ecosystem was a secondary concern. But if some infectious agent caused mutated creatures to flood onto land, then it would be the end of everything.

"…This is driving me insane."

"What's wrong?"

"Benefactor, are you all right?"

"No. Not even a little."

I answered firmly and turned toward Cheongpung.

"Cheongpung, how many of these things are there?"

"I wasn't assigned to this area, so I don't know. But Mimi likes them. They must taste good!"

Cheongpung gazed adoringly at Mimi, who had already swallowed a Blood Fish several times larger than her own body.

"Eat lots, Mimi!"

"…Right. Asking you makes me the idiot. Then, Mujin."

"Yes. We've captured around a hundred Blood Fish so far, but we haven't determined how many more there are."

I never knew the presence of a normal person could be this comforting.

I looked at Hyuk Mujin with deep emotion and asked, "Great Hero Zhuge Feng knows about this too?"

"Of course. As soon as the Blood Fish were discovered, Great Hero Zhuge Feng ordered the waterway at the entrance completely sealed off."

[2303] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

"What about the Blood Fish that already escaped?"

"Well, for now, it seems there were hardly any."

"What?"

According to the past I had glimpsed through the Memory Fragment, the Gate had opened at least a month ago.

Judging by the fact that it was still leaking faint magical power, a considerable number of fish should have mutated by now…

"Are you sure?"

"It's just a guess, but they were fighting one another."

"Fighting?"

"They've become so ferocious that they seem to have lost any concept of allies. They're probably still killing one another right now."

"…"

Should I be happy about this or not?

Their ferocity made them dangerous, but since they had started a war among themselves and were reducing their own numbers, it was certainly something to celebrate.

At least that's a relief.

I had just let out a sigh of relief when—

"There you are, Young Master Jin."

A clear, infuriatingly sweet voice came from behind me.

When I turned, Mungyeong was already standing there, looking at me.

"They're looking for you."

"I'm busy. The grown-ups are working, so wait."

"…I was told to bring you no matter what. They have something to say to you."

"Who?"

A murderous Sound Transmission bored into my ear.

Me.

"…Oh."

Then I had better go.

Chapter 488

The Water God Dragon had unquestionably been a spiritual being.

In the broadest sense, it could be called a spiritual creature. But it possessed power far beyond that of an ordinary spiritual creature, which was probably why it had been able to absorb all the magical power from the Gate.

You could tell just by looking at the weather.

As expected of an imugi[2304] that had lived for five hundred years, there was something different about it.

When the mutated Water God Dragon had gone on a rampage, thunderbolts and towering waves had nearly turned Dongting Lake upside down. Now, however, the lake was calm, as though nothing had ever happened.

But unlike the peaceful waters of Dongting Lake, a raging storm churned inside me.

…Is this what they call the calm before the storm?

I glanced at Mungyeong's back as he walked ahead of me.

He was a head shorter than me, with a slender frame. But beneath the hide of a harmless herbivore lurked a predator.

Why did he suddenly call me out here? What could he possibly want to say?

I suddenly felt wronged.

Could he still be pissed because I'd spoken casually to him during the battle?

He hadn't called me out here just so we could have a little physical conversation, had he?

My unease continued to grow as Mungyeong led me deeper into increasingly secluded territory.

That was when—

"Stop."

Whoosh!

There was only one voice, but seven figures surrounded us.

They were all Peak masters who had accumulated considerable internal energy, and each wore a sword engraved with a pine pattern at his waist.

Pine-Pattern Ancient Swords.

Sure enough, a middle-aged Daoist dressed in Wudang robes emerged from the deep darkness.

Judging by his age, the middle-aged Daoist was clearly their presiding chair. He opened his mouth toward us.

[2304] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent associated with dragons.

"This area is closed after the Hour of the Dog.[2305] Please turn back—No, wait. Could that be the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon?"

"What?"

The middle-aged Daoist spotted me over Mungyeong's shoulder and asked with wide eyes,

"Young Hero Jin Taekyung? No, Great Hero Jin Taekyung?"

"I'm no Great Hero, but my name is Jin Taekyung."

"Oh! My guess was correct after all. I thought your face looked familiar."

You may recognize me, but you're a complete stranger to me.

The middle-aged Daoist greeted me as warmly as if I were his son fresh out of the army. Then, as if something had suddenly occurred to him, he asked, "But what brings you here at this late hour? You must have already been assigned temporary lodgings."

"…Uh. Well."

I was being dragged away by the Slaughter Saint.

I swallowed the words rising to my throat and was about to offer some vague excuse when a flash of insight struck me.

Come to think of it, this was my last God-given chance to escape.

"Is this where the restricted area begins?"

"That's right. We take turns standing watch in case of an emergency. But who is this young-looking man with you?"

"Slaugh—"

"Hm?"

—Instant execution.

"—The breeze is blowing softly."

"Oh, ha ha. I see."

Slaughter Saint! Mister! That bastard is the Slaughter Saint!

I finally understood how the barber who shouted that the king had donkey ears must have felt.

But when I met the beast's dark, sunken gaze, I forced a smile and answered, "We just happened to get to know each other."

"If you know each other, then precisely what kind of—"

"We met in Sichuan and have been traveling together ever since. He isn't a martial artist. He's a medical apprentice."

"Ah, now I remember. I heard there was a young medical apprentice with the skills of a renowned physician. So this is him."

"Yes. He's the one."

[2305] The Hour of the Dog is a traditional time period corresponding to approximately 7–9 p.m.

"But why have you come all the way out here at such a late hour?"

"Uh, we have something important to discuss."

"You must be quite close."

I could let everything else slide, but not that.

I answered with a straight face.

"No. We're not close."

"Hm. In that case, I'm afraid this may be difficult. My apologies, Great Hero Jin, but regulations prohibit us from allowing anyone through without firm assurance—"

"Ah, I see. Thank you for your hard work. Mungyeong, let's go!"

—Instant execution.

"…"

—Back in position.

The icy Sound Transmission stabbed into me.

I had already turned halfway around, but I helplessly turned back.

—Say we're close.

"I was joking. We're actually very close."

The middle-aged Daoist looked back and forth between Mungyeong and me, then muttered, "For two people who are supposedly close, you were walking apart without saying a word…"

—Answer properly.

"We're so close that we can understand each other just by looking into each other's eyes."

"But your head was turned away. How could you see his eyes…?"

"We used to understand each other just by looking into each other's eyes. These days, I can tell what he's thinking just by looking at the back of his head."

"…"

—I'm asking this out of genuine curiosity. Does the Fire Gate Clan have a rule saying it should recruit only fucking idiots?

For fuck's sake. What do you want me to do?

As the middle-aged Daoist stared at me with lukewarm eyes, Mungyeong's Sound Transmission continued.

—Come closer.

"…?"

—Put your arm around my shoulder.

"…!"

What am I, some kind of avatar?

But what could I do? In the Murim, the strong were the law—and the gods.

I trudged over, draped an arm around Mungyeong's shoulders, and pulled a miserable face.

"Whew. We're really close."

—Smile.

"Ha ha ha! We're really close!"

—Louder.

"Wahahahahaha!"

—I can see you signaling with the corner of your eye. Do that one more time, and I'll make you see the world with your heart instead of your eyes.

He had found a remarkably elegant way to say he would gouge out my eyes.

I gave up my desperate attempts to signal with sidelong glances and muttered, "Anyway, we're close."

Throughout this entire exchange, the Wudang martial artists—including the middle-aged Daoist—stared at us as though they were watching the best horror movie of the summer.

I had gone from looking miserable to laughing like a lunatic, all while frantically shooting Mungyeong sidelong glances. If they couldn't tell something was wrong, they needed to put down their Pine-Pattern Ancient Swords and leave Wudang.

At last, the middle-aged Daoist seemed to make up his mind. His lips moved.

—Perhaps I'm worrying over nothing, but if something is happening to you without your realizing it, blink three times. If nothing is wrong, blink twice.

—I heard everything. Blink three times, and your body will be cut into three pieces.

Mister! You bastard! This bastard is the Slaughter Saint! This bastard has a wiretap in his ear!

But my shout never escaped, and I quietly blinked twice.

No matter how suspicious they became, they would never guess that the young medical apprentice before them was a Supreme Peak master who had Returned to Youth.

And objectively speaking, the Slaughter Saint was clearly an ally.

—Are you sure?

Even if he asked, my answer had already been decided.

Even among Supreme Peak masters, Jeok Cheongang and the Slaughter Saint had reached a different depth of enlightenment. They were biological wiretaps capable of eavesdropping on other people's Sound Transmissions.

—Yes. Why would I lie about something like this? We're just friends who became close while traveling together.

Though one of us seemed to have built up murderous intent instead of friendship.

Still, something had been built.

The middle-aged Daoist let out a quiet snort of laughter after hearing my Sound Transmission.

—Indeed. How could anything happen to the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon of all people? Great Hero Jin, please forgive me for being so suspicious. I suppose the recent events have made me more sensitive than usual.

No, you're insensitive. Please get just a little more sensitive.

But contrary to my hopes, the middle-aged Daoist spoke with a warm smile.

"In that case, very well. If it's Great Hero Jin and no one else, I can trust you. You may pass!"

"W-Wait a moment."

"Ha ha. I wondered why you had come all the way out here, but it seems you truly do have something important to discuss. Very well. Regulations prohibit this, but… I'll give you some privacy."

"What?"

"About half an hour. Will that be enough?"

Of course it won't, you idiot. Enough for what?

But before I could answer, Mungyeong bowed politely with a bright smile.

"That will be sufficient."

"…!"

Why did that brief answer sound like a death threat to me?

The middle-aged Daoist failed to notice my twitching eyelids. He stroked his beard and smiled approvingly.

"What a polite young man. You should examine me sometime as well."

"Of course, Daoist."

"Ha ha. Then I'll return in half an hour."

Whoosh!

The seven Peak masters—including the middle-aged Daoist—or rather, the seven witnesses, shot away.

I stared blankly at their backs as they vanished into the distance. Then I slowly turned around, feeling a curtain of qi close around us from every direction.

Sound and impact.

Everything was now sealed off from the outside world by the qi barrier surrounding us.

And within that space, a pair of eyes gleamed with an icy light even in the darkness.

"Master and Disciple are exactly alike when it comes to wearing people out."

"…!"

The voice alone sent a chill through my chest.

The young man who had seemed like an innocent medical apprentice had transformed into the greatest assassin of all time. He leaned against a large rock.

He gave off no ripple of qi, but I could still feel them—the countless blades concealed throughout his body.

The Slaughter Saint.

This was Mungyeong's hidden name and his true nature.

I didn't know what he had been like in the past. But I would stake Hyuk Mujin's balls on this: even after some forty years away from the Murim, Mungyeong's blades had not dulled in the slightest.

No. If anything, they had undoubtedly grown even sharper.

Ah. I miss Mom.

I knew Mungyeong wouldn't actually harm me.

But the head and the heart often thought differently.

Even if you knew the beast before you wasn't about to sink its teeth into your throat, that didn't mean you wanted to approach it.

Gulp.

I swallowed dryly and cautiously opened my mouth.

"Why did you suddenly…?"

Mungyeong stared at me with icy eyes.

"You sound as though you resent being called out here."

"Gasp. No, I don't."

"You certainly seem to."

"How could I? I'm simply bad at expressing my emotions. The truth is, I'm so happy I could die."

"Die?"

"…I'll carefully take those two words back. I should've watched my mouth. I really don't learn until there's a coffin in front of me."

"See a coffin?"

"…Please spare me."

"Spare you?"

Goddamn it.

I'd read online that repeating the last thing a woman said was the kind of conversational technique that made her heart flutter.

This was the kind of conversation that would make the Grim Reaper's heart flutter.

I could almost see Yama, who had just clocked out on time, excitedly rushing back with the Book of Life and Death in hand.

Seriously, what the hell is this? Why did he call me out here?

Had he really called me here again because I had spoken casually to him last time?

If I knew what this was about, I could at least put my mind at ease. But I couldn't think of any other reason, and the frustration was driving me insane.

Mungyeong regarded me with displeasure, then suddenly furrowed his brow.

"What is this?"

"What?"

"Have you perhaps not heard yet?"

"Heard what?"

"The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang. Your Master."

"…?"

"The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang."

So what am I supposed to do with that?

I had no idea what he meant, so I didn't even know how to respond.

After hesitating for a moment, I cautiously ventured a guess.

"Ganggangsullae?"[2306]

"Jeok Cheongang didn't tell you any—What?"

"Oh, isn't this a word-chain game?"

"…What kind of lunatic are you?"

"Or is there a character limit? But 'Fire King Jeok Cheongang' is five characters in Korean too, so it should be fine…"

The atmosphere turned ominous.

Mungyeong stared at me with eyes full of anger and regret, then looked up at the heavens and sighed.

"I can't believe I have to pass down my secret martial arts to a fucking blockhead like this."

"…"

For fuck's sake. Even so, calling someone a blockhead right to his face was too much. That was going too far…

Huh?

What did I just hear?

Secret martial arts?

[2306] Ganggangsullae is a traditional Korean circle dance and folk song. Taekyung treats the last syllable of Jeok Cheongang's name as the start of a word-chain answer.

Chapter 489

Secret martial arts.

The moment I heard those words, the four syllables fucking blockhead vanished cleanly from my mind.

I blinked for a moment, then stammered,

“Secret… martial arts? You’re saying you’ll teach me your secret martial arts?”

To a martial artist, secret martial arts were as important as life itself—no, more important than life.

Even in martial arts novels, people willing to throw themselves into danger like moths to a flame just to obtain a single martial arts manual were everywhere.

And after experiencing the Murim firsthand, I’d learned that reality was no different. If anything, it was worse.

But he’s offering to teach me his secret martial arts? An incredible master like the Slaughter Saint?

Even though I’d heard it straight from him, I couldn’t believe it. More importantly, there was one enormous question hanging over the whole thing.

“Why?”

A deep furrow formed between Mungyeong’s smooth brows at my doubtful question.

“What do you mean?”

“I mean, why are you suddenly doing this for me?”

“I suspected as much, but it seems the Fire King, that old man, truly didn’t give you any warning.”

“Then could it be…”

“That’s right. Your guess is correct. The Fire King…”

“Am I being transferred? Have I gone from the Fire Gate Clan to the Slaughter Saint Clan or something?”

“…”

Mungyeong stared at me as though he badly wanted to kill someone, then continued with a sigh.

“The Fire King came to me personally and asked me to teach you martial arts.”

“What?”

It was a relief that this wasn’t some sect-to-sect trade, but this was just as hard to believe.

I eyed Mungyeong suspiciously.

“What is that look?”

“No matter how I think about it, this sounds like a lie.”

“A lie?”

“First, our Old Master has a foul temper and far too much pride to ask anyone for anything.”

A warm glow passed over Mungyeong’s face, which had previously been surrounded by a chilly aura.

“Hm. You’ve assessed him rather accurately. Continue.”

“Second, the person he asked is just as foul-tempered and prideful as our Old Master, so he would never willingly teach anyone his secret martial arts.”

“…”

“So, for those two reasons, I wouldn’t believe this even with a knife to my throat.”

“I see. So that’s how it is.”

Mungyeong murmured softly and fixed me with an icy stare.

“If a knife were at your throat, you would believe me. I heard you clearly.”

At that moment, something glinted at the edge of Mungyeong’s sleeve. The instant I saw the short sword slowly emerging, I quietly changed my tune.

“I completely believe you now.”

“Suddenly?”

“Actually, I’ve firmly believed you from the very beginning.”

“You fucking lunatic. Is there something wrong with your personality?”

“Gah!”

“You truly are insane beyond all reason.”

Ah, he just wants to kill me.

It was written all over his face.

Mungyeong toyed with the short sword for a moment, conflict in his eyes, then abruptly spoke.

“Come to think of it, you weren’t entirely wrong.”

“What?”

“First, as you said, the Fire King does have a foul temper and excessive pride. But matters concerning his Disciple seem to be the one exception.”

“…!”

“Of course, even after hearing that, he would stubbornly insist that you aren’t his formal Disciple. Regardless, the Fire King cares about you. Very much.”

Hmm.

I didn’t know what to say. Something tickled deep in my chest, and my throat felt tight.

It just… did.

As I kept my lips firmly sealed, Mungyeong continued in a dry voice.

“Second, I’m hardly a man of gentle temperament myself. But given sufficient reason, I would be willing to teach my secret martial arts even to a lunatic like you.”

“Even though I’m a lunatic?”

“Because that lunatic will become a major obstacle to Dark Heaven’s actions from this point forward.”

His quiet voice drifted through the night air. Mungyeong gazed at the gently flowing waters of Dongting Lake as he continued.

“I have lived as a martial artist for more than half my life. No, as an assassin. It was not a life I chose, but one imposed on me from the beginning. That is why the path I walked was a bloody road strewn with blood and corpses.”

The Slaughter Saint. A sobriquet proclaiming him the greatest assassin in history was not something he had earned overnight. He had killed, killed, and killed again until he finally reached a position that everyone had no choice but to acknowledge and fear.

But everyone had their circumstances.

And there were far more secrets in this world than I knew. Mungyeong must have lived a life steeped in them.

With emotions I couldn’t decipher mingling in his eyes, Mungyeong stared into the darkness and continued quietly.

“If passing on my martial arts to you can be of even the slightest help in the great war already at our doorstep, then it doesn’t seem like such a bad idea. That is all.”

He spoke as though it were nothing, but it couldn’t have been an easy decision.

Receiving what belonged to someone else was easy. Giving away what was yours was hard.

If everyone who had fought in the Great Faction War had thought and acted as Mungyeong did now, half the martial artists in the world would have learned the martial arts of the Nine Sects and One Gang[2307] by now.

Seeing him in that light made Mungyeong seem like a different person.

“Is that… what they call serving a greater cause?”

“A greater cause?”

“You made this decision for other people. Sacrificing yourself for others—isn’t that what serving a greater cause means?”

Mungyeong shook his head.

“A greater cause is not something a man like me can speak of. An assassin who once killed others to survive, talking of a greater cause? The very thought makes me cringe.”

[2307] The Nine Sects and One Gang are a traditional grouping of major martial-arts factions: nine sects and the Beggars’ Gang.

“The Old Master once told me that the Slaughter Saint only kills people who deserve it. He said you were a fairly decent assassin.”

“To make a single sword, you must hammer it hundreds of times and put it through the tempering process. I was no different. Before I became the Slaughter Saint, there was a time when I was called the Killing Ghost. That is why I cannot discuss a great cause.”

“In that case…”

I looked Mungyeong straight in the eye.

“What about the greater cause you serve as the Divine Physician, rather than the Slaughter Saint?”

“…!”

His slender body suddenly went rigid.

The waters of Dongting Lake remained utterly still, but ripples stirred in Mungyeong’s eyes.

A moment later, his low, somber voice broke the brief silence.

“The Divine Physician… I never liked that sobriquet.”

“Why not?”

“Being called the Divine Physician does not erase my past. I know that if the truth came to light, those people would curse and fear me.”

“But you saved them. More people than anyone could count. They won’t forget what you did for them.”

A long time passed without an answer.

Mungyeong remained lost in thought, silently watching the water. Then he suddenly whipped his head around to face me.

“Gasp! You scared me. What’s wrong?”

“I was considering what to do with you for daring to speak so presumptuously to me.”

“…Wouldn’t most people call that comforting someone?”

“Comforting me? You?”

His icy gaze was refreshing enough to cool my internal organs.

Yeah, fuck. Blazing Flame Divine Dragon or whatever—to the Slaughter Saint, I’m still just some nobody.

Rather than talk back and get hit by the backlash, changing the subject was probably the secret to a long life.

“Wow, the moon is bright tonight.”

Mungyeong’s eyebrow twitched as I immediately pretended nothing had happened.

“I don’t know how the conversation wandered this far. Refrain from such pointless words and actions in the future.”

“The breeze is nice and cool, too.”

“Want me to cool off everything above your shoulders too?”

“…I’ll take what you just said to heart.”

Shhk.

The half-drawn short sword slid back into his sleeve.

As though nothing had happened, Mungyeong returned to his usual dry, rigid expression.

“So I’ll ask you. What do you intend to do?”

“About what?”

“I can’t tell whether you’re stupid or hard of hearing. I’m talking about learning martial arts from me.”

“…I’m not stupid. I just didn’t expect you to give me a choice.”

“Why would I force someone who doesn’t wish to learn to stay and teach him?”

He had a point, but hearing such a perfectly normal statement from such an abnormal person felt incredibly strange.

Of course, I didn’t say that aloud.

If I did, Mungyeong would personally drag my soul out of my body.

“So? What is your answer?”

At Mungyeong’s urging, I scratched the back of my head.

The Slaughter Saint’s secret martial arts…

Of course I wanted to learn them.

Everyone had martial arts that suited them, and an ill-suited martial art could do more harm than good. But these were the secret martial arts of the Slaughter Saint, a Supreme Peak master counted among the greatest in the world.

If I could understand even half—no, even a quarter—of the insights contained in his martial arts and make them my own, my realm might advance another step.

There was only one thing bothering me.

“It seems the Fire King is weighing on your mind.”

“…Have you learned mind-reading or something?”

“What need is there for mind-reading? Every thought in your head shows plainly on your face.”

Mungyeong looked at me as though I were hopeless and continued.

“A proper martial artist must know how to conceal his thoughts. The Fire King is unbelievable. To think he failed to teach you even something so basic.”

“Take that back.”

At my frown, Mungyeong’s gaze grew heavy.

“Was I wrong?”

“Yes. Even if your mouth is crooked, you should still speak straight.”

“You dare…”

“He didn’t fail to teach me. He couldn’t. The Old Master is even worse at hiding his expressions than I am, so how could he teach me something he doesn’t know?”

“…You exceed even my wildest expectations.”

Mungyeong sighed and shook his head.

“In any case, don’t concern yourself too much with the Fire King. He personally asked this of me, and I have no intention whatsoever of entering into a Master-Disciple relationship with someone like you.”

“Ah. Right.”

Come on. Even so, someone like you?

It stung a little, but Mungyeong’s firm declaration still put me much more at ease.

Then why do I feel like I’m betraying the Old Master?

Jeok Cheongang himself had asked Mungyeong to do this, and considering the brutal battles ahead, the training would only help me.

There was nothing wrong with it when I considered the circumstances, so why did it still leave such a bad taste in my mouth?

Thinking of Jeok Cheongang, who had disappeared without a word, I smacked my lips and finally nodded.

“All right.”

“Think carefully before you answer. Starting is your choice. Stopping will not be.”

“What? What does that mean?”

“From that point on, you will move solely according to my judgment. But if you complete this training, you will emerge a different martial artist than you were before.”

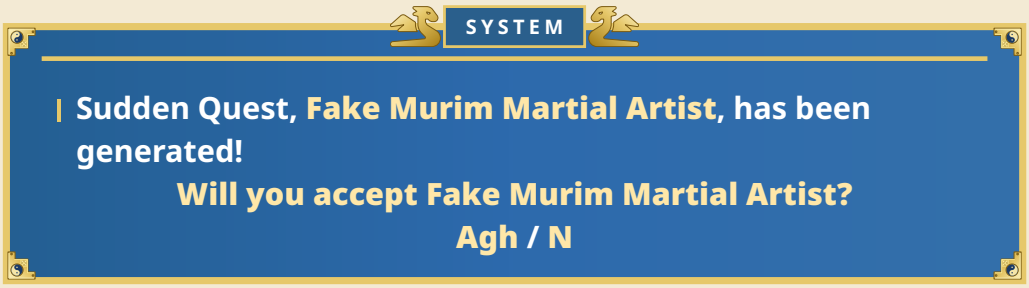
What was this?

I’d expected something along those lines, considering who I would be learning from, but a chill still crept down my spine.

I swallowed dryly. Then, alongside Mungyeong’s rigid voice, a familiar chime rang in my ears.

“You may have reached a considerable realm as a martial artist, but being a martial artist and being a martial artist of the Murim are not the same. You’re still only half-formed. I will make you a true Murim martial artist.”

Ding.



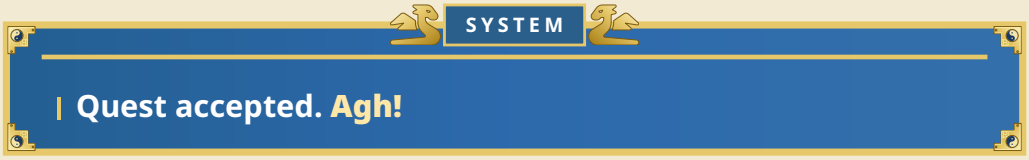
"…"

Why was there an Agh instead of a Y among the choices?

I stared incredulously at the Quest window, then muttered before I could stop myself.

"Agh?"

Ding.



"…Ah."

This was driving me crazy.

Chapter 490

“So, did you finish your conversation?”

The Wudang Daoists returned exactly half an hour later, just as they had said they would.

I still had plenty of questions, and I wanted to move somewhere else and keep talking. Mungyeong, however, had other ideas.

“We’re done. Go back.”

“…What? We’re done? You haven’t even told me what kind of training this is!”

“You’ll naturally find out tomorrow.”

“It’s already the hour of the Pig.[2308] It’ll be midnight soon. Can’t you just tell me and get it over with?”

“It’s late. Don’t forget. We begin tomorrow.”

“No, hold on. Excuse me.”

“Excuse you?”

Shhk.

I looked back and forth between Mungyeong and the short sword peeking out from his sleeve, then stiffly pointed beyond him into the darkness.

“I meant over there. That’s the way you should go.”

“…”

“Just keep going straight, then turn right.”

“It seems that wasn’t what you were trying to say.”

“I thought you might not know the way, so I figured I’d better make sure. Hehe.”

“I know. Shut up and get lost.”

“Yes, sir. Have a peaceful night.”

A little while later, after confirming that Mungyeong’s back had completely disappeared from sight, I muttered under my breath.

“Goddammit…”

It was one problem after another.

Just when I thought I had finally gotten used to Jeok Cheongang’s methods, now I had to start worrying about the Slaughter Saint’s mood too.

My eyes were already going dark just thinking about the hardships waiting ahead.

Actually, the Old Master is much better.

Leaving aside the intensity of his training, Jeok Cheongang at least told me what kind of training I would be doing.

His temper might have been as hot as fire, but he had still prepared something resembling a curriculum.

[2308] The hour of the Pig corresponds roughly to 9–11 p.m. in traditional East Asian timekeeping.

But what kind of training is so secret that he won't even tell me?

There was a simple reason I was so curious. The Quest I had accepted by accident didn't contain any real information either.

Quest window, open.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest
Fake Murim Martial Artist
Sensing the war clouds that will soon gather over the world, Mungyeong has decided after careful consideration to teach you personally.
However, all things require preparation.
Before passing down his secret martial arts, Mungyeong will test you in various ways.
When this first test ends is up to you.
Grade: None
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Earn Mungyeong's recognition (Incomplete)
Reward: ???
Failure: ???

I looked over the Quest window two or three more times, but it remained unchanged.

Compared to the training Quest at Mount Jiuhua, where the objective had been clearly stated, this was nothing but vague nonsense.

Earn Mungyeong's recognition.

At this point, I would rather run around with iron balls hanging from me. At least then I would have a clear objective and be able to check my progress.

But this was basically the crime of getting on someone's bad side.

Didn't it mean I had to keep getting put through the wringer until he decided he liked me?

This feels like it'll take a while.

I didn't know what Mungyeong's training methods would be like, but one thing was certain: earning his recognition wouldn't be easy.

Objectively speaking, it would be strange if it were.

It's probably going to be brutal, but I'll have to endure it.

The man I was dealing with wasn't some ordinary martial artist. He was the Slaughter Saint, a Supreme Peak master counted among the greatest in the world.

Being taught secret martial arts by someone of that caliber was a fortuitous encounter in itself.

And when I thought about it, I had already experienced two such fortuitous encounters.

The first was, without a doubt, the System.

And the second…

The Old Master.

There was no way I could leave Jeok Cheongang out of it.

If I hadn't met him—if I hadn't learned the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts, passed down to only one person in each generation—then even with the System, I probably wouldn't have attained my current strength or position.

As that train of thought continued, Jeok Cheongang's face suddenly flashed through my mind.

Still, I should go see him.

Of course, Jeok Cheongang and I had never formally entered into a Master-Disciple relationship.

But just because we didn't call each other Master and Disciple didn't mean ours was merely a relationship of convenience.

We were the kind of people who understood each other without speaking. Jeok Cheongang and I quietly turned the words Master and Disciple over in our hearts.

"…"

Or maybe not. I'm suddenly not so sure.

Jeok Cheongang might think differently, but that was how I saw it.

And it was obvious that Jeok Cheongang must be troubled after swallowing his pride and personally asking Mungyeong to teach someone who was practically his Disciple.

He's probably off somewhere moping by himself again.

Other people whispered that Jeok Cheongang was nothing more than a hot-tempered, impossibly eccentric old man. But the Jeok Cheongang I knew was tenderhearted.

He might scold and grumble, but beneath it all, his heart was practically soggy with affection for the people he cared about.

I glanced up at the bright moon and started walking.

I'll find him soon enough. There are plenty of people around.

That comfortable thought vanished without a trace less than half an hour later.

"You haven't seen him?"

"No, sir. I haven't seen him for a while."

"If you're lying to me…"

“Why would I lie to the Captain? If I didn’t want to get beaten to death, I’d make up things that never happened and tell you.”

“Cheongpung? You haven’t seen him either?”

“No, Benefactor. Why? Is something wrong?”

“It’s… Never mind. It’s nothing. Get back to what you were doing.”

“Oh! If nothing’s wrong, would you like to see Mimi? She ate ten Blood Fish, so her belly is incredibly round!”

“Yeah. Great.”

This place wasn’t even that large. Where on earth had he disappeared to?

I searched everywhere for the missing Jeok Cheongang, but no matter whom I stopped and asked, the answers were never helpful.

“Hey, you beggar passing by. Come here.”

“No.”

“You haven’t been beaten enough lately.”

“Damn it. I have a reputation to maintain too. No matter how much of a Supreme Peak master you are, if you treat me, the Successor Beggar, like some stray dog you’re calling over from the street, what will the Sect’s disciples think?”

“Two silver nyang.[2309]”

“Are you seriously treating me like a beggar…”

“Ten nyang.[2310]”

Fwoosh!

“Hm. One cannot ignore a friend’s summons. What is it?”

“Our Old Master—no, our Master. Do you know where he is?”

“Sir Jeok? No idea. I haven’t seen him once since he arrived here.”

“Can you ask the other Beggars’ Sect disciples?”

“Well, we’re all busy with our assigned tasks. Still, you never know. I’ll make a round and let you know if I hear anything.”

“Yeah, thanks.”

“What are friends for?”

“Then get to it.”

“…What about the silver?”

“I’ll pay you later. But if you find my Master’s location, I’ll give you double.”

“T-Twenty nyang![2311] Beggerrr!”

But even Gung Gibang, who had become a slave to capitalism and run off enthusiastically, ultimately failed to find Jeok Cheongang.

[2309] A nyang was a historical unit of currency; these amounts are in silver nyang, not modern won.
[2310] A nyang was a historical unit of currency; these amounts are in silver nyang, not modern won.
[2311] A nyang was a historical unit of currency; these amounts are in silver nyang, not modern won.

I tossed him five silver nyang,[2312] then continued making the rounds. The answers I received were always more or less the same.

"Sir Zhuge, have you perhaps seen my Master?"

"Oh, you came at the perfect time. I'm testing our clan's formation, and I think that with a little more refinement, I can suppress the energy leaking from this fissure __"

"That's great. Good luck."

"Great Hero Jin! I saw him!"

"Really? Where?"

"About two shichen[2313] ago, he was over by the water, beating someone senseless."

"The person getting beaten was me."

"…Ah."

"Great Hero Jin! Great Hero Jin!"

"Yes. You there, with your hand raised. Where did you see him?"

"If you mean Sir Jeok, I haven't seen him."

"No, then why are you—"

"Would you sign this martial robe for me? My son dreams of becoming a fine martial artist like Great Hero Jin. He says he'll have no regrets if he can get your autograph…"

"…What's your son's name?"

"Zhuge Sopyeong. Please write something telling him to practice his martial arts diligently and not be a picky eater. Especially when it comes to green onions."

"Wait. Then may I ask for your autograph too?"

"I got here first. Get in line!"

"What? Why are you suddenly lining up? Move to the back! Don't line up! Ah, this is driving me crazy."

About an hour later, after completing my grand tour, I returned to the temporary private tent that had been set up for me. By then, it was already past midnight.

After signing autographs with inspirational messages for Zhuge Sopyeong, Changwoo, Myoryeong, Jinsu, and the other budding talents, I was completely drained.

"…So where the hell is the Old Master?"

This wasn't even the Liaodong Plain. How could he simply vanish into thin air?

At this point, he had clearly made up his mind to stay hidden. He had probably predicted that I would come looking for him and deliberately disappeared.

I'll be seeing him soon enough anyway. For him to avoid me this much…

He must have been even more troubled than I had imagined.

[2312] A nyang was a historical unit of currency; these amounts are in silver nyang, not modern won.

[2313] A shichen is a traditional East Asian time unit of approximately two hours.

I let out a small sigh, picked up the water pitcher from the wooden table in the corner of the tent, and gulped down the water.

I had been walking around and talking all day, so my throat was parched. But why did the water taste like this?

Did they scoop it straight from the river? It's a little salty.

Even if Murim hadn't suffered from environmental pollution yet, I couldn't help feeling uneasy.

That was when it happened.

Beep.

You have been poisoned by Potent Paralysis Powder.
Potent Paralysis Powder is a type of anesthetic that clouds the mind and stiffens the body.
You feel your consciousness becoming hazy!
Your Scorching Yang Qi resists the poison!
If you do not take action quickly, the Status condition Full-Body Paralysis will activate!

…?

No, fuck. What the hell was this?

Forgetting that my body was slowly becoming paralyzed, I stared blankly at the System window. Then a brief memory flashed through my mind like lightning.

You'll naturally find out tomorrow.

It's already the hour of the Pig.[2314] It'll be midnight soon. Can't you just tell me and get it over with?

It's late. Don't forget. We begin tomorrow.

"…!"

Mungyeong, you son of a bitch!

My blood seemed to surge backward with rage.

At the same time, the blood carrying the paralysis powder raced through my body, and my vision began to fade.

I sucked in a startled breath, hurriedly raised my internal energy, and shouted a command in my mind.

Inventory Open, Summon!

At once, a ring appeared on my finger.

I normally kept the Myriad-Poison Ring in my Inventory to avoid attracting attention, but now it gleamed with a strange luster.

[2314] The hour of the Pig corresponds roughly to 9–11 p.m. in traditional East Asian timekeeping.

Hissss!

I could feel it. Deep inside my body, two energies with entirely different purposes collided.

But the Myriad-Poison Ring was a divine artifact of the Sichuan Tang Clan, one that had even absorbed Jeok Cheongang's Formless Ultimate Poison.

And once my Scorching Yang Qi—the natural counter to poison—joined in, the paralysis powder had no choice but to collapse helplessly.

Detoxification complete!
All traces of Potent Paralysis Powder have disappeared from your body!

"…Phew. You crazy old man."

I muttered the curse as I released the breath I had been holding.

He had set a trap like this the moment midnight passed. I never imagined that "we begin tomorrow" would mean this.

Damn it. He really is an assassin.

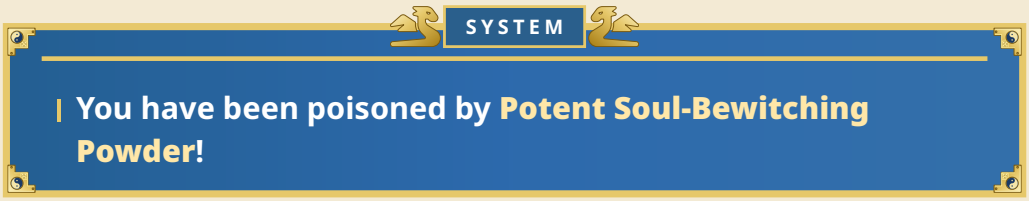
At first, I had thought it was an ambush by Dark Heaven.

Was this what he meant by turning me into a true Murim martial artist? I was already exhausted, and the sudden attack had sent my heart pounding and made my legs go weak. With a deep sigh, I collapsed onto the bed.

Phut-phut!

"…?"

Beep.



Slaughter Saint, you fucking bastard.

Chapter 491

“Hey, Captain. You haven’t slept—?”

Hyuk Mujin entered my temporary tent in the dim light before dawn, then fell silent as if he’d seen a ghost.

“Why?”

“Uh, well…”

“Say it.”

“…Hoo.”

Tired? Tired. Was that all I could call this?

I glared at the bronze basin of wash water. My hair was a mess, and my eyes were bloodshot. When I looked up, I saw that the entire tent was in shambles.

Hyuk Mujin belatedly noticed the same thing, and his pupils began quaking.

“What in the world happened here?”

“Yeah. Something happened.”

My voice sounded so unfamiliar it might have belonged to someone else. I rubbed my haggard face and muttered, “That fucking assassin…”

I’d said it quietly, but not quietly enough. Mujin jumped at the word assassin.

“Pardon? An assassin?”

“What?”

“You just said ‘assassin.‘ I heard you.”

“You heard wrong.”

“I heard it with my own ears.”

“I said you heard wrong.”

Of course, it was true.

Some vicious assassin bastard had installed a dozen or so hidden weapons inside the tent, and I had managed to trigger every single one of them. With a one-hundred-percent success rate, I had been reduced to a bloody rag.

The maddening part was that I couldn’t tell anyone.

“C-Captain…”

“I said you heard wrong!”

“That’s not it. You’re bleeding from your butt.”

“…!”

Fuck. No wonder my ass had felt warm.

As I cursed silently and pressed a hand to the wound, Mujin gave me a dubious look.

“I still think it was an assassin.”

"I got hurt training."

"Really?"

I nodded weakly.

This counted as training. I had no idea what kind of training involved staying awake all night doing nothing but detoxifying poison, but it counted.

"It really was training. I swear on both your balls."

"As I've told you repeatedly, please don't swear on my balls. And if an assassin is threatening you right now, blink twice."

"…Mujin. If you're going to ask me that, shouldn't you at least use Sound Transmission?"

"I can't use Sound Transmission yet."

"Then write it down."

"Oh. Right."

"Are you insane?"

Then again, this was Hyuk Mujin. What had I expected?

I let out a long sigh and looked him up and down. He'd dressed neatly in his martial robes and come to see me this early, so he clearly wanted something.

"Anyway, what's going on?"

"Ah, Sir Zhuge is looking for you. Everyone's gathered."

"Everyone? Why?"

"You know."

Mujin glanced around for no reason, then mouthed a few words before finally lowering his voice to a whisper meant only for me.

"The imugi[2315]. The dead one."

"Ah."

"Only a handful of us are going, and we're keeping it quiet. Perfected Being Hyeongong of Wudang is waiting too."

"Even Perfected Being Hyeongong? Ah, of course."

He was the only Supreme Peak master involved in this incident who had remained at Donghu Stronghold.

He was also the Wudang Sect Leader's Junior Brother and a respected elder of the Murim. He was more than qualified to attend as Wudang's representative.

However closely we guarded the Water God Dragon's existence, we couldn't keep it secret from Wudang.

Though for something this important, wouldn't the Sect Leader himself come? Why Hyeongong?

The question occurred to me, then vanished as I thought of someone else.

[2315] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often said to be capable of becoming a dragon.

“Hey, is anyone else going with us—”

I was about to finish the question, half hoping I was wrong, when a quiet voice came from outside the tent.

“Young Master Jin. Everyone is waiting.”

“…!”

“If you’re ready, please come out.”

The presence outside receded as soon as the words ended. Mujin tilted his head at the sight of me standing frozen.

“What’s wrong?”

“Why is he going?”

“Who? Oh, Mungyeong? He is the Divine Physician’s disciple, after all. He should be able to help with the imugi’s anatomy and such. But why?”

Why? Because I had no idea what that lunatic might do.

I swallowed the words rising in my throat and started toward the exit. Then I stopped and turned back to Mujin.

“Mujin.”

“Yes?”

“Go first. I’ll follow right behind you.”

“Pardon?”

I could almost hear a System notification ringing in my ears.

When I boarded the small vessel waiting for us, I found several familiar faces.

Perfected Being Hyeongong, dressed in a heavily patched Daoist robe with an old Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword at his waist, greeted me with a gentle smile.

“A young fellow Daoist has arrived. It is good to see you again.”

“Greetings, Perfected Being Hyeongong.”

I gave a fist-and-palm salute, now fairly convincing as a martial artist. Beside him, Zhuge Feng waved his folded fan and cut in.

“But your face…”

“Nothing happened.”

“You don’t look well for someone to whom nothing happened. Don’t you agree, Perfected Being?”

“I agree with Family Head Zhuge. You look as though an assassin tormented you all night.”

“An assassin? Perfected Being, you do make jokes. Ha ha.”

“Ho ho ho.”

“…”

Don’t laugh. Don’t even show me your teeth.

Without the Myriad-Poison Ring, I doubted I’d be standing right now.

I had been soaked in so much poison that I had seriously considered whether I should change my sobriquet from the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon to something like Poisoned Pickle.

Look at him, sitting there shamelessly.

I glared at Mungyeong, who had already claimed a seat on the swift ship.

The boy noticed my piercing gaze and slowly turned his head.

—Lower your eyes.

“…”

If he said lower them, I lowered them.

I quietly looked away, and another Sound Transmission followed.

—Judging by your condition, you must have fallen for every trap from the first day. How pathetic. If you hadn’t had the Myriad-Poison Ring and Scorching Yang Qi, you would have been dead by now.

—…How do you know whether I would have died or survived?

—Want me to tell you?

—I misspoke.

He wasn’t wrong. Every hidden weapon he’d set was coated with powerful poison.

I had once heard that medicine and poison shared the same source. I didn’t know who had said it, but they had been completely right. Somehow, every poison I suffered came with the adjective potent attached to it.

Only the Myriad-Poison Ring’s absurd effectiveness and my Scorching Yang Qi—a natural counter to poison—had kept me from suffering anything worse than a few puncture wounds.

Without those two things… Just thinking about it made my blood run cold.

Medical apprentice, my ass. What kind of Divine Physician is that? He’s a Poison Physician.

—I know you just insulted me.

“Ghk.”

I sucked in a startled breath before I could stop myself. Kindhearted Hyeongong looked at me with concern.

“What’s wrong, young friend?”

“Ah, nothing. It’s just a habit.”

“That’s a relief. For a moment, I thought an assassin really was threatening you. Didn’t you, Family Head Zhuge?”

“Ha ha ha! You’ll have me splitting my sides, Perfected Being!”

“Ho ho ho.”

“…”

I was tempted to tear Zhuge Feng’s navel right out.

While I glared at his stomach, the vessel slipped through the calm water. The departure was so smooth that I noticed it a beat too late.

“Wait. The Old Master—no, my Master isn’t here.”

Zhuge Feng looked puzzled by my sudden objection.

“Hm? Didn’t you hear?”

“Hear what?”

“Senior Jeok decided not to come. He also said not to look for him for the time being, until everything is finished.”

“…Is that so?”

“You didn’t know? That explains why he didn’t pass the message along through his Disciple.”

This was the first I’d heard of it.

Whatever his reason, it stung a little that he hadn’t said a word to me. At the same time, I thought I understood how he felt.

He must have a lot on his mind.

I’d never raised a Disciple, but if I found myself in his position someday, I thought I might feel the same way.

Perhaps it was like entrusting a beloved pet—one you’d cared for with love and devotion, almost like family—to someone else.

“…”

No, scratch that. That made me Jeok Cheongang’s pet dog.

His son. Right, let’s go with son.

While I was settling that with myself, Cheongpung came over with a bright smile and thrust something toward me.

“What’s this?”

“Candy, Benefactor.”

“…I can see that. Where do you keep finding it?”

There were only two possibilities.

Either Cheongpung was a System user with ten metric tons[2316] of candy in his Inventory, or there was a tree nearby that grew the stuff.

“Either way, thanks.”

[2316] Ten metric tons is 10,000 kg, or about 22,000 lb.

Normally I wouldn't have given it a second glance, but with so much on my mind, I could use the sugar. I bit into the candy and asked, "Finding candy at a time like this takes some skill. Did you buy it on your last visit to the Zhuge Clan?"

"No. I ate all of that already."

"Hm? Then where did this come from?"

"Slaugh—no, Mungyeong gave it to me. He told me to give this one specially to you, Benefactor. He's a really good person!"

"…Who?"

The answer came from somewhere else.

Beep.

SYSTEM

You have been poisoned by Potent Energy-Dispersing Poison!
Energy-Dispersing Poison temporarily prevents you from using internal energy.
Your internal energy is slowly dissipating! Immediate action is required!

"…"

Fuck. No wonder the candy had tasted unusually sweet.

I quietly took out the Myriad-Poison Ring.

They say people leave their names behind when they die, while beasts leave their hides.

The same was true of the spirit creature that had ruled Dongting Lake and the Yangtze for five hundred years.

The Water God Dragon's spirit had already left its body, but the body remained where it had last lain, retaining all the majesty and beauty it had possessed in life.

"…Hoo."

Even Perfected Being Hyeongong, an old Daoist of profound insight and enlightenment, was lost for words. All he could manage was a single exclamation.

The sight of the Water God Dragon's body was that overwhelming.

Even Gung Gibang, who had seen it before, stood with his mouth hanging open and kept exclaiming in awe.

"It's incredible even the second time around. Don't you think?"

I answered as politely as I could.

"It is. So is your breath. Could you get lost? I think it's stronger than the Energy-Dispersing Poison."

"Hm. Easily done. On one condition."

"What?"

"Of the ten silver nyang[2317] you promised me yesterday, I still haven't received five. I knew you were shameless, but I never thought you'd go so far as to prey on a beggar."

"I'll pay you. Just keep it short. I'm starting to see things."

I could hardly tell whether that was his mouth or a sewer.

Gung Gibang finally got the other five silver nyang[2318] out of me, then grumbled.

"Stop exaggerating. And if you mean hallucinations, I've had more than enough of those myself. I've been having strange dreams for the past few days."

"Dreams?"

"Yes. Dreams."

Gung Gibang gave a quiet laugh and pointed at Mungyeong.

"I dreamed Mungyeong was fighting that imugi. Sword Force was flying everywhere, and he kept vanishing and reappearing like a ghost… If someone had told me he was the Slaughter Saint, the greatest assassin of all time, I'd have believed them."

"…"

He is the Slaughter Saint.

I continued staring at the Water God Dragon's body, doing my best to ignore Gung Gibang's endless chatter.

From head to tail, its enormous body stretched for more than a hundred ja[2319]. Its scales, once stained black, now scattered dazzling silver light, while countless wounds were carved across its body.

I ran my hand over one of the gaping wounds and apologized silently.

I'm sorry.

Of course I knew the battle had been unavoidable. I had no reason to apologize. If anything, the Water God Dragon had been grateful to us for stopping it, even if this was what it had taken.

But I was apologizing because I couldn't bury its body as it was.

The corpse.

The raid was over. It was time to dispose of the corpse.

[2317] A silver nyang is a traditional unit of silver currency.

[2318] A silver nyang is a traditional unit of silver currency.

[2319] Ja is a Korean unit of length equal to about 30.3 cm (11.9 in). A hundred ja is about 30 m (99 ft).

Chapter 492

It went without saying that so many people had gathered here for reasons other than praying for the Water God Dragon's soul.

And one person in particular was showing rather obvious ulterior motives.

"Incredible. Simply incredible."

Zhuge Feng's eyes shone with rapture as he stroked the silver scales.

"This strength. This beauty. I can hardly believe it."

The Water God Dragon had died without ever becoming a true dragon, but it was still a divine imugi[2320] that had lived for five hundred years.

Its body had already proven itself in battle. It was both armor and a weapon in its own right.

"This is… a priceless treasure."

Zhuge Feng wasn't exaggerating in the slightest.

The scales were harder than steel, and even Sword Energy could not cut clean through them. The bones beneath were harder still.

Even in the modern age, with its advanced Magic-powered forging, material like this would sell for whatever price its owner named. In Murim, its value went without saying.

It may not be on the level of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, but… it's an incredible treasure.

The Water God Dragon's body stretched for more than a hundred zhang,[2321] and every inch of it was made up of treasures like those.

Armor made from those scales would not be pierced even by a crossbow. A weapon made from its bones would be harder and sharper than one made from meteorite iron.

Martial arts manuals, elixirs, and exceptional weapons—the three things every martial artist went crazy for.

It was only natural that greed showed in Zhuge Feng's eyes, and in several others'.

"If we made a Dog-Beating Staff[2322] out of that…"

Hyuk Mujin objected to Gung Gibang's muttering.

"Why make a Dog-Beating Staff[2323] out of the bones? You'd want a sword. A Bone Sword made from an imugi's[2324] bones… Just imagine it."

"Are you looking down on the Beggars' Sect?"

[2320] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore that may become a dragon.

[2321] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit equal to ten chi, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred zhang is about 303 m (994 ft).

[2322] The Dog-Beating Staff is the signature weapon associated with the Beggars' Sect.

[2323] The Dog-Beating Staff is the signature weapon associated with the Beggars' Sect.

[2324] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore that may become a dragon.

"No. Just you, Gung Gibang."

"Want me to beat you like a dog?"

"Come on, calm down. There's enough there to make a hundred Dog-Beating Staffs[2325] or swords with plenty left over. Why fight about it?"

"Fair point. Then I call one Dog-Beating Staff.[2326]"

"And I'll reserve a sword…"

Crack! Crack!

"Ugh!"

"Argh!"

Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin each took a smack to the back of the head. They turned to me and shouted.

"Why'd you hit me?"

"Please tell us why before you hit us!"

These bastards still didn't get it.

I frowned and shook a large fist at them threateningly.

"You two useless bastards couldn't do a damn thing when we were fighting, and now you're talking about Dog-Beating Staffs?[2327] Swords? Reservations?"

"Well, that's…"

"A martial artist can't help…"

"If it weren't for the Water God Dragon, Hubei Province would've been destroyed. It wouldn't have ended with a few fish going berserk."

There was no denying that countless people had died because of the Water God Dragon.

But it hadn't acted of its own free will. And if the Gate had opened completely, Hubei Province would have become a hellscape.

"Of course its body will be put to good use. But if you're even remotely human, show some gratitude. Got it?"

The two of them flinched at my shout and muttered in voices as tiny as ants.

"Like you do…"

"Honestly, Captain, you don't have much room to talk. Look what you did to the Dongting Fisherman."

Crack! Crack-crack!

Two more cries followed the blows. I rounded on Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin as they clutched their heads again.

"Is that the same thing? Is it? Huh?"

I had my side of that story too.

[2325] The Dog-Beating Staff is the signature weapon associated with the Beggars' Sect.

[2326] The Dog-Beating Staff is the signature weapon associated with the Beggars' Sect.

[2327] The Dog-Beating Staff is the signature weapon associated with the Beggars' Sect.

Of course I felt bad about wrecking the Dongting Fisherman, but I'd had no choice.

He'd been directly exposed to the corrupted Water God Dragon's Fear. He'd harmed people while out of his mind, and every piece of evidence at the time had pointed to him as the culprit.

His limbs might have been broken, but at least he was alive. Come to think of it, getting beaten to a pulp by me had freed him from the Fear.

A fist beat Fear.

A triumph of humanity…

No, not really. We'd each had our circumstances.

I'd even visited him because I felt bad. He was unconscious, though, so we hadn't been able to talk.

"Anyway, be grateful. Understand?"

I was still shaking my fist at the two of them when another voice spoke.

"Young Friend Jin is right."

There was wisdom in the voice alone. Perfected Being Hyeongong of Wudang stepped forward, his expression troubled.

"I had my doubts when I heard what happened, but seeing it with my own eyes, I understand now. It truly is a divine creature blessed by the heavens."

Jin Wikyung, who was also seeing the Water God Dragon for the first time, nodded solemnly.

"You're quite right, Perfected Being. It sacrificed itself to prevent even greater bloodshed. This imugi[2328] deserves to be called a Divine Dragon."

"A terrible loss. We owe it so much. Should we not all pray for its soul together?"

Perfected Being Hyeongong was exactly what one would expect from an old Daoist who had cultivated profound Daoist mastery at Wudang, the sacred ground of Daoism.

He was nothing like the human garbage beside me, who couldn't muster a shred of gratitude.

Overcome by a sudden surge of faith in the Primordial Heavenly Venerable,[2329] I quickly clasped my hands together.

"Amen."

Hyeongong, who had been reciting a Daoist prayer, flinched and turned to me.

"Amen?"

"My mistake. Amitabha.[2330]"

"…Repeat after me. Infinite Life Buddha.[2331]"

[2328] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore that may become a dragon.

[2329] The Primordial Heavenly Venerable is a deity in Daoism.

[2330] Amitabha is a Buddha whose name is used as a Buddhist invocation.

[2331] Infinite Life Buddha is a Buddhist invocation referring to the Buddha of Infinite Life.

"Ah, sorry. Infinite Life Buddha.[2332]"

"Excellent. The Primordial Heavenly Venerable[2333] will watch over you, Young Friend Jin."

"Ah. Yes."

Does Wudang have missionaries too?

Hyeongong smiled like a Civilization[2334] player going for a religious victory. After a short prayer, he looked up at the sky.

"You, divine imugi.[2335] I pray that you become an Azure Dragon there and soar across the heavens."

"Ah…"

"Just as one would expect of you, Perfected Being."

Zhuge Feng and Jin Wikyung, each with his own interests at stake, eagerly sang his praises. Hyeongong answered with a kindly smile.

"Ho ho. I merely did what was right. Now then…"

"Yes, Perfected Being?"

What profound words would the old Daoist say next?

Everyone, myself included, bowed their heads and listened reverently.

"Let's start cutting it up."

"…?"

"We still have to do what needs to be done, do we not?"

"…!"

I raised my head.

Greed for a weapon blazed in Hyeongong's eyes. His gaze practically shouted what his voice did not.

I call a Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword! One Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword for me!

He wasn't a Daoist. He was a lunatic.

Looking at the man I'd trusted for all of a moment, I was reminded of something.

Every last one of these Murim bastards is hopeless.

The raid was over. The fighting wasn't.

One battle remained, and sometimes it got even fiercer than the raid itself.

Distribution of the spoils. Final settlement.

Hunters had to make a living, after all.

[2332] Infinite Life Buddha is a Buddhist invocation referring to the Buddha of Infinite Life.

[2333] The Primordial Heavenly Venerable is a deity in Daoism.

[2334] Civilization is a strategy video game series in which a player can pursue a religious victory.

[2335] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore that may become a dragon.

Maybe things were different for top Hunters earning several billion to tens of billions of won[2336] a year. In a raid party of lower-tier Hunters, though, arguments over byproducts worth a few tens of thousands of won[2337] were commonplace. That was why contracts were essential.

And the Water God Dragon's corpse was a treasure of immense value all by itself.

We'd gone into this raid without drawing up a contract. In the modern world, that would have led to an enormous dispute.

But this was Murim. The people here belonged to the physical school: they preferred settling matters with their bodies to talking things out.

I knew just the word for people like that.

Suckers.

I glanced around. Nearly everyone was watching everyone else, waiting to see who would speak first.

Two people were exceptions.

The first was the Family Head of the Zhuge Clan, arguably the wealthiest family in Hubei.

"Ahem."

Zhuge Feng cleared his throat, then went on as though his proposal were perfectly reasonable.

"Our family will have to make a concession in this matter. The Zhuge Clan will take only ten percent. The rest can go to everyone else…"

"Hold it. Are you dealing from the bottom?[2338]"

"What!"

I cut him off with a quiet laugh.

"Ten percent? What did you do to earn ten percent? Take that much without working for it and you'll get a stomachache."

"You…"

"Am I wrong? I respect you, Sir Zhuge, but this isn't right."

Ten percent, when he didn't do a damn thing? How dare he try to sneak in and rob us blind?

Zhuge Feng flinched at my glare, then tried again.

"Barely did a thing? Without the information the Zhuge Clan provided, you would have been blind even with your eyes open. You never would have made it here."

"You have quite a long tongue."

"Ghk!"

[2336] Several billion to tens of billions of won is roughly ₩2 billion–₩99 billion, or about $1.4 million–$71 million and €1.3 million–€64 million.

[2337] A few tens of thousands of won is roughly ₩20,000–₩90,000, or about $14–$64 and €13–€58.

[2338] A famous line from the 2006 Korean gambling film Tazza: The High Rollers, used when catching a card cheat slipping cards from the bottom of the deck. Here it accuses the Zhuge Clan of rigging the split.

“The conclusion you reached from that information was that the Dongting Fisherman was the culprit. Wasn’t it? You’re telling me that the Dongting Fisherman, lying there injured, suddenly got up, did five somersaults, and then used Stepping on Empty Air to hop all the way here?”

“That… that was…”

Zhuge Feng fell silent. The only other person there who looked at ease gave him a gentle smile.

It was the smile of a man whose skill had brought the Jin Family of Taiyuan to its current standing.

“Sir Zhuge, I apologize for my younger brother’s rudeness.”

“C-Cough!”

“It’s my fault for teaching him so poorly.”

“His words were rather harsh.”

“They must have hurt your feelings. I really shouldn’t have let this happen.”

“It’s all right. At least you seem reasonable, Lesser Family Head, so I’m glad…”

“No. He deserves a proper scolding. Taekyung, you little rascal! Apologize at once!”

At Jin Wikyung’s booming shout, I immediately bowed my head.

“I’m sorry. I spoke too harshly.”

“Even if Sir Zhuge was trying to get something for nothing, there are lines you must not cross!”

“I apologize again.”

“No, wait. Hold on. Lesser Family Head Jin?”

Zhuge Feng seemed to sense something was wrong, but Jin Wikyung’s scolding went on.

“Taekyung, you played the greatest part in defeating the Water God Dragon! You practically saved Sir Zhuge’s life! But he is still the Family Head of a great clan and a respected elder of Murim!”

“Whew. I’ve committed a crime worthy of death.”

“Wait, Lesser Family Head.”

“You may have been raised without manners, but you’re still a youngster! How dare you treat Sir Zhuge, a man renowned throughout Murim, as though he were some shameless bastard? As soon as we return to our family, I’ll…!”

“Lesser Family Head Jiiin!”

Zhuge Feng cried out desperately and waved a hand, looking thoroughly fed up.

“All right. I understand. I understand everything. Just see that I’m taken care of.”

“Then you accept our apology?”

“I’m sorry, Sir Zhuge!”

“Yes, yes, I understand. Now both of you, stop.”

“Thank you. Even if it isn’t ten percent, we’ll make sure the Zhuge Clan gets a share it can be happy with.”

“A consolation cut is the universal rule.”

“…Whew.”

Game over. Yoshi, grand season.[2339]

Zhuge Feng wilted, worn out in body and spirit. Jin Wikyung and I exchanged satisfied smiles.

I could die and come back to life and still never match Zhuge Feng’s intellect. But you couldn’t learn this kind of negotiation at a desk.

This was wisdom born of experience.

I’d thrown a fit during a settlement to get one extra goblin poison dart. Jin Wikyung had spent years mastering the divine art of handling every shitty job the family could dump on him while no one knew whether his father was alive or dead.

If everyone else here was a sucker, we were cardsharps.

And judging by our contributions, I was obviously the star of the show.

Those who fight claim the spoils.

This was a battle we couldn’t retreat from—and shouldn’t.

Only by standing our ground against anyone who challenged us could we become true Hunters and true martial artists.

“Ten percent. Hand it over. Or hand over your neck.”

“We’ll hand it over.”

But there were exceptions to every rule.

…Fuck.

[2339] “Yoshi, grand season” is a Korean internet catchphrase used to celebrate a win.

Chapter 493

Opportunity isn't given to everyone equally.

By that measure, Perfected Being Hyeongong had been given more opportunities than most. At just ten years old, he had become a direct Disciple of the Wudang Sect Leader.

His path had been smooth from the start.

Born with martial talent among the best of his generation and an upright nature to match, Hyeongong had always received wholehearted support. Which meant he had never wanted for anything in his life.

And yet…

I want it.

Perfected Being Hyeongong's eyes trembled faintly. It was a material desire he had not felt in a very long time.

I've never felt this way before.

Gold, wealth, fame, glory—he had no need for any of it. He wore each Daoist robe he received until it fell apart and lived on simple, modest meals.

Elixirs and martial arts manuals were no different. Since reaching the Supreme Peak realm, he had devoted himself to cultivating his mind. Whenever his Senior Brother, the Sect Leader, offered him an elixir, Hyeongong passed it on to his promising grand-disciples. As for manuals, the Wudang techniques he had already mastered were more than enough.

But this. This was different.

"Hoo… Infinite Life Buddha.[2340] Infinite Life Buddha."

Hyeongong ran a rough hand down his beard and recited the invocation. Yet despite his efforts to master himself, his gaze kept returning to the imugi's[2341] corpse.

They say those bones are incredibly hard.

Through the split scales and gaping wound, he could see enormous bones giving off a faint glow. Perhaps because they had belonged to a five-hundred-year-old imugi, the bones had a luster unlike anything else. He had heard they were so hard that even ordinary Sword Energy could not cut through them.

If I made a sword from those bones, it would be incredible… No. What am I thinking? Get a grip, Hyeongong!

He squeezed his eyes shut. He had just watched the two Jin brothers leave Zhuge Feng in tatters, which made the temptation all the more troubling.

[2340] "Infinite Life Buddha" is an invocation of Amitabha, the Buddha associated with infinite life.

[2341] An imugi is a legendary serpent-like creature associated with dragons in Korean folklore.

At least Zhuge Feng had been there when the battle took place. Hyeongong had been hundreds of li[2342] away, at the Donghu Stronghold headquarters. He had no grounds to demand anything, nor the nerve to set aside his shame and ask.

Infinite Life Buddha, Infinite Life Buddha. A Daoist, led astray by a desire like this? Get a hold of yourself, Hyeongong.

While he was struggling in silence, someone spoke.

"Perfected Being. Are you busy?"

"Hm?"

Hyeongong's eyes flew open. A familiar young man was looking at him with a knowing gaze.

Jin Taekyung.

Together with the Sword Saint's Disciple, Cheongpung—the Huashan Divine Dragon—this young man was at the center of the storm sweeping through Murim. The gossips were already saying that beneath the Ten Kings stood the Two Dragons.

An extraordinary young man. Almost unbelievably so.

But Hyeongong had something more pressing on his mind than his opinion of Jin Taekyung.

Could it be?

The old Daoist looked at him, his heart quickening with hope.

"What is it, Young Friend Jin?"

Taekyung smiled gently. "If you're not busy, I was hoping we could talk."

"Talk? About what?"

"We have to deal with the corpse now, and there's more of it than we expected."

"Th-That's why?"

"You came all the way here in person. Of course you should have something to take home."

"Oh!"

Hyeongong's eyes immediately lit up. Jin Taekyung smiled and continued.

"Our Jin Family of Taiyuan has always held the Daoists of Wudang in the highest regard. As fellow martial artists of Murim, we'd be delighted to share a little of what we've gained."

"I-Is that true?"

"Of course. I swear on Hyuk Mujin's balls. My eldest brother is fully in favor of it too."

"Good heavens! Infinite Life Buddha!"

[2342] In this Chinese setting, one li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi).

Taekyung had gently scratched the itch Hyeongong had been too ashamed to mention. The old Daoist was beside himself with joy.

Hyeongong did not know who Hyuk Mujin was or why Jin Taekyung was swearing on the man's balls. All that mattered was that he was being given a share.

How can anyone be this kind?

Taekyung was nothing like the hypocrites with their fine words. He was a ray of light shining into a cold Murim crawling with shameless people.

Hyeongong could practically see a halo over Jin Taekyung's head.

"Thank you! May the Primordial Heavenly Venerable[2343] protect you and the Jin Family of Taiyuan, young friend! Infinite Life Buddha!"

"Amen."

Something about that was strange, but Hyeongong didn't care. He was still beaming when Taekyung continued in his gentle voice.

"There is one small problem, though."

"Hm? What problem?"

"The corpse is so large that I can't deal with it alone. And we can't exactly move it whole."

"Quite right. Quite right."

From head to tail, its vast body stretched over a hundred jang.[2344] It was questionable whether it could even be moved in one piece. And since doing so would require a great deal of manpower, keeping the matter secret would become even more impossible.

"So I'd like to ask you a small favor, Perfected Being."

Hyeongong faltered. Suspicion flickered in his eyes.

"Wait. Young Friend Jin. This favor of yours wouldn't happen to mean…"

"Yes. We need you to lend us a hand. At this rate, it'll take days."

So that's it! That's why he was being so generous!

Hyeongong glared at Jin Taekyung with an expression of betrayal.

"You want me to use Wudang's sword arts to take that imugi's corpse apart?"

"Think of it as work."

"Work? You expect me to think of it as work? I did not train in martial arts for this!"

Reaching the Supreme Peak realm meant devoting most of one's life—no, one's entire life—to martial arts.

Hyeongong was no exception. How many years had he spent with a sword as his companion, his beloved? He had even honed his martial arts through secluded

[2343] The Primordial Heavenly Venerable is a deity in Daoism.

[2344] A jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred jang is about 303 m (994 ft).

meditation, facing a wall in pitch darkness. To him, Taekyung's request was an insult.

The nerve of him.

His expression hardened.

"Infinite Life Buddha. Young friend, you have insulted not only me but the sword arts of the great Wudang Sect."

"Insulted you? I would never. I'm only asking you to lend a hand."

"But I cannot use my sword for something as trivial as—"

Just as Hyeongong's voice began to rise, Taekyung tossed out a remark.

"Now that I look at it, your sword's pretty worn."

"What?"

"Seems about time you replaced it. What do you think?"

"…!"

Hyeongong's pupils quivered. Before he knew it, he was looking down at the old Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword at his waist.

It certainly is worn… No! What am I thinking?

He had carried that sword since he was ten. It was a precious gift from his late master.

Hyeongong hurriedly shook his head to clear it, then opened his eyes wide.

"It is not worn!"

"It is. Look at the hilt. It's practically falling apart."

"It does seem a little… No! You're mistaken!"

"Fine, forget the hilt. The scabbard's covered in cracks too. Has it been through a drought?"

"Ah! When did those appear…?"

"This is worse than I thought. Could you draw the sword?"

"Why should I?"

Shing!

Only after shouting did Hyeongong realize he had drawn it. He stared in horror.

When did I do that?

The devil's whisper went on regardless.

"The blade doesn't look too good either."

"My late master gave me this sword!"

Taekyung answered calmly. "My parents gave me this body, but it's worn down with use. If I could've replaced it, I would have done it ages ago."

"Well, this old Daoist's joints have been aching lately too. I've been yearning for Bone Transformation[2345]… What are you trying to pull?"

[2345] Bone Transformation is a transformative stage of physical renewal in martial-arts fiction.

"I'm just telling you the cold reality. Oh, the edge is still sharp, at least."

Get a grip. Get a grip, Hyeongong.

He steadied his breathing and answered with pride. "Of course it is. The blade was forged with four nyang[2346] of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron mixed into it."

"Good heavens. Four nyang of that precious Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron?"

"Do you see now? This sword may look worn, but it is every bit a treasured sword."

"Ah. Is that right?"

"Of course! I already own a sword anyone would covet. Why would I need another —"

Clang!

"Oh, sorry. My hand slipped and I dropped my spear. Please, go on."

Hyeongong barely noticed Taekyung's sheepish smile. His eyes were fixed on the faintly glowing spear, his eyelids trembling.

"Y-Young Friend Jin. Is that, by any chance…"

"Nothing special. It's made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron too, but it's nothing compared to your sword."

It certainly didn't look that way.

Hyeongong swallowed and asked cautiously, "How many nyang?"

"Solid. The whole thing, from the blade to the shaft."

"This is fucking insane. Infinite Life Buddha."

"Sorry? What was that?"

"Ah, nothing. Nothing at all."

A devil. This was the devil's whisper.

Yet Hyeongong's eyes remained fixed on Jin Taekyung's spear, White Flame, as he recited the invocation as if possessed.

"Light as a feather, incredibly hard, and sharp besides. But…"

Then that soft, tempting voice reached his ears again.

"I think I'd like a weapon made from an imugi's bones."

"Infinite Life Buddha. I would not."

"Think about it carefully. Not just any weapon, but one containing all the qi of a sacred imugi that lived for no less than five hundred years."

It would be incredible. I want one so badly.

Hyeongong barely swallowed the words rising to his lips and shook his head frantically.

"Impossible! I could never abandon the sword my master gave me—"

[2346] A nyang is a traditional weight unit of approximately 37.5 g (1.32 oz); four nyang is about 150 g (5.29 oz).

“Who said anything about abandoning it? You can have both.”

“Fuck, I could do that! Ah, Primordial Heavenly Venerable!”

“Sorry?”

“Stop! That’s enough! Infinite Life Buddhaa!”

“If you help us, we’ll give you a share generous enough that Wudang won’t feel slighted. Do you think I’d settle this with a single sword?”

“I already have a sword made with Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron!”

“Yes. And an imugi’s bones.”

“How could I use another sword when I have the one my master gave me?”

“Yes. The more, the better.”

“I did not learn martial arts for this sort of thing!”

As Hyeongong clung to his last shred of pride and lamented, Jin Taekyung suddenly shouted toward somewhere behind the corpse.

“Hey, Cheongpung! How’s it going?”

A cheerful face popped out from behind the enormous corpse. Cheongpung had been promised a considerable share for fighting alongside them.

“Yes, Benefactor! I’m working on the waist!”

“Really? That part’s especially thick. Giving you trouble?”

“No! The Martial Extremity Grand Unity Sword cuts through it just fine!”

“Good. I’ll be there soon. Keep at it.”

“Yes, Benefactor!”

Taekyung gave the diligent worker a pleased smile, then turned back to Hyeongong.

“Ah, sorry, Perfected Being. I took my eyes off the work for a moment.”

“…”

“But what were we talking about? I’ve been forgetting things a lot lately.”

Hyeongong looked from Cheongpung, hard at work, to Taekyung and back again.

Half a shichen[2347] later…

Slash!

The Taiji Wisdom Sword, Wudang’s finest sword technique, was separating the imugi’s scales from its bones.

“Murim has gone completely mad.”

That was Mungyeong’s brief assessment as he watched the entire situation unfold.

[2347] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Chapter 494

Slash! Shhk-shhk-shhk!

Scales split apart, and huge chunks of flesh were cut into evenly sized pieces.

The enormous bones emerging between them were so clean it hardly seemed possible.

Thud! Slash!

His skill bordered on the supernatural.

As the onlookers stared in a daze, a quiet murmur spread through the crowd.

“Hyuk. I’m asking because I genuinely don’t know, but… Was the Jin Family of Taiyuan originally a family of fishermen?”

“Can I ask the Lesser Family Head that exact question?”

“Of course not, you lunatic. But you’d have to be born with a talent like that. Could he actually be a fisherman…?”

“Lesser Family Head! Do you know what Gung Gibang just said?”

“Hey, hey!”

“Was one of our ancestors a fisherman? How can the youngest one do that?”

“…Lesser Family Head?”

“If Zhuge Wuhou[2348] had seen this, he’d have fallen right out of his four-wheeled carriage. Wouldn’t you agree, Perfected Being Hyeongong?”

“Good heavens. Infinite Amen, Avalokiteshvara.[2349]”

“…Perfected Being?”

While everyone questioned the roots of the Jin Family of Taiyuan and worked toward religious unification, one person was thinking about something else entirely.

Huh. Look at this guy.

Mungyeong’s clear eyes followed Jin Taekyung as he cut and sliced like a man possessed.

What incredible power. And it’s fast and concise, too.

You could tell a person’s realm from the smallest movement. By that measure, what Jin Taekyung was doing was astonishing.

What an achievement. Hard to believe he’s barely past twenty.

Mungyeong already knew Jin Taekyung defied common sense. Everyone in this dusty martial world knew it. Even the young prodigies of the Nine Sects and One Gang, with all the support they received, struggled to break through to Peak at [2348] Zhuge Wuhou is an honorific title for Zhuge Liang, the strategist of China’s Three Kingdoms period, often depicted riding in a wheeled carriage.

[2349] Avalokiteshvara is a bodhisattva associated with compassion in Buddhism. “Infinite Amen” jumbles the Buddhist invocation “Infinite Life Buddha” together with the Christian “Amen.”

twenty. Jin Taekyung had reached Supreme Peak and now stood shoulder to shoulder with masters one or even two generations above him.

But that was not the only reason Mungyeong admired him.

He moves like a veteran of the martial world. That control over his strength, at his age… Not a motion wasted.

Thump! Slash!

Even the smallest movement was efficient. He might have been conscious of all the people watching, but he showed none of the flashy affectation someone his age might have indulged in.

He simply cut, sliced, and separated, like a traveler quietly following the quickest, easiest path.

He was the same when he fought the imugi.[2350]

An assassin took in and analyzed everything around him. His profession demanded that he kill his target and find a way out, whatever the circumstances.

And Mungyeong was the Slaughter Saint, called the greatest assassin of all time.

He had watched Jin Taekyung ever since Sichuan—not as the Divine Physician, but through the eyes of the Slaughter Saint.

The Heavenly Martial Physique… Could it really be true?

It had been forty years since Mungyeong left Murim. For all that time—long enough for the mountains and rivers to change four times—he had lived as a medical apprentice. He had examined and treated thousands, perhaps tens of thousands, of patients.

Yet even with all that experience, he could not easily explain Jin Taekyung's body or talent.

He's similar to Cheongpung, but there's a subtle difference.

Mungyeong glanced at Cheongpung, then looked away.

Cheongpung was the only person who could be compared to Jin Taekyung. In his understanding and application of martial arts, he might even surpass him.

Cheongpung, too, had a remarkable body unlike any Mungyeong had seen. But not quite like Jin Taekyung's.

Cheongpung was refined. Jin Taekyung was born this way.

The shape and size of his muscles, his skeleton, his acupoints—everything was perfect.

The Heavenly Martial Physique.

Mungyeong's gaze deepened as he watched Jin Taekyung.

What if that boy made my secret martial arts entirely his own…?

He pushed the thought aside almost as soon as it came.

Ridiculous.

[2350] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent-like creature often associated with dragons.

Martial arts were like an endless mountain range. Most martial artists still at its foot might think Mungyeong had reached the summit, but he could see another mountain ahead.

That was how vast and distant the world of martial arts was.

Even Mungyeong had not reached the end of the secret martial arts he practiced. Heavenly Martial Physique or not, Jin Taekyung could hardly achieve anything satisfactory with them in such a short time.

Especially now.

War was almost upon them. With countless battles ahead, Mungyeong needed to teach him what mattered most. Too much of anything could become poison.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, must have known that when he entrusted Jin Taekyung to him.

But… what on earth should I teach that bastard?

At a loss for the first time in a long while, Mungyeong watched the scene before him.

“Cheongpung! Ready?”

“Yes, Benefactor!”

“Lay into it with the Plum Blossom Sword Technique!”

“Agh!”

“Perfected Being! Where are you?”

“Oh. Here I am!”

“Why are you standing over there instead of working? Can’t you see the rest of us working?”

“I-I was just going to take a short break…”

“Perfected Being, you’re such an individualist! Where’s your teamwork?”

“I-I’m sorry.”

“Show me how sorry you are. Taiji Wisdom Sword, go!”

“I-Infinite Life Buddha![2351]”

Slash! Slash! Slash!

Under Jin Taekyung’s forceful direction, the Water God Dragon’s corpse was dismantled in no time.

The others cried out in admiration. Mungyeong only grew more troubled.

What am I supposed to teach that bastard?

At this point, he looked like the kind of person who would grow just fine on his own…

Then Mungyeong made up his mind.

[2351] Infinite Life Buddha refers to Amitabha, a Buddha whose name is invoked in Buddhist practice.

No. Now that he had taken this on, he would see it through to the end. He wanted to stay close and find out just how far that arrogant bastard Jin Taekyung could go.

First, I need to fix that absurdly complacent attitude of his.

Mungyeong slipped up beside Hyuk Mujin, who was staring with his mouth open.

“Martial Warrior Hyuk.”

“Holy shit. He cut through that in one go—oh, Mungyeong. What is it?”

“Young Master Jin must be exhausted. Would you take him some water?”

“Huh. You really do think of things the rest of us don’t. I’ll take it right over.”

“Please don’t tell him I gave it to you. I’d be happier if you got the praise.”

“You really are something…!”

Hyuk Mujin looked at Mungyeong with deeply moved eyes and accepted the leather waterskin.

Of course, along with cool water, it contained a deadly poison called Seven-Step Soul-Chasing Powder—an extreme poison that killed its victim before they could take seven steps.

“…What’s this?”

Immediately after the work was finished, Hyuk Mujin approached me with a leather waterskin. He answered my question with a proud expression.

“Water. I thought you might be tired, Captain.”

“There’s no way you thought of something this considerate.”

“I fetched it myself! Why don’t you trust me?”

Had I been too sensitive lately? He looked so wronged that I felt a little guilty for doubting him.

Besides, after working that long, I really was thirsty.

“Hm. Really?”

“Forget it. If you’re going to be like this, don’t drink it! I’ll drink it myself!”

“Hey, hey. Fine. Leave it here and go. I’ll drink it.”

“I said forget it!”

“That’s enough. You’re starting to piss me off.”

“…Yes.”

Once Mujin was gone, I carefully pulled the stopper from the waterskin and sniffed it.

Mm. Smell.

Smells normal, at least.

I still wasn’t letting my guard down. Very carefully, I tilted the waterskin.

A drop of water trickled out slowly and plopped onto my tongue.

Just in case, I'll start with one drop…

Beep.

> System - You have been poisoned by Potent Seven-Step Soul-Chasing Powder! - Potent Seven-Step Soul-Chasing Powder is an extreme poison capable of killing dozens of bulls with a single drop! - Severe Internal Injury and organ damage are likely. Very, very urgent treatment is required!

"…Hyuk Mujin, you son of a bitch."

Fuck. That wasn't the kind of one drop I'd had in mind.

Inventory open. Summon!

I hurriedly put on the Myriad-Poison Ring and raised my Scorching Yang Qi to drive out the poison.

The next System notification told me the poison had been purged. But that wasn't the end.

Beep.

> System - Quick action—but the extreme poison has left aftereffects! - Your Sinews and Meridians have suffered slight damage! - Some stats have decreased due to the damage to your Sinews and Meridians! - Strength decreased by 5! - Agility decreased by 5! - Status abnormality: Severe Stomachache! - Status abnormalities will return to normal once you have fully recovered, but the lost stat points cannot be restored!

"What the hell?"

No, fuck. Had I really lost stat points?

Not one or two, either. A whole ten points between Strength and Agility had vanished.

Ten points is one level-up!

Damn it. I knew exactly who was behind this.

I'd gone through hell to raise those stats, and now they were gone. Hot fury surged up from deep in my gut.

Grrrggg.

…Was that fury, or feces?

And of all the shitty status abnormalities to get, I had to get this one. My vision went white with pain, and I hurried off.

"Young Friend Jin, where are you going?"

"Benefactor, where are you going?"

“Move, move. We’re done dismantling it, so all that’s left is sorting. I need to take care of something first…”

“Benefactor, are you going to poop?”

Don’t say it so loudly, you lunatic. What if Mungyeong hears you?

Pale-faced, I stumbled on. Only when I got close to a place out of sight did I start to feel relieved.

Whew. Thank goodness.

Shitting myself while standing would be humiliating enough. If Mungyeong saw me, I’d be in for it.

Fortunately, he wasn’t among the others, so he must have gone somewhere else…

Wait. Somewhere else?

The question crossed my mind just as my foot touched the ground.

Then I heard a faint sound.

Step. Tap.

A chill ran down my spine. I launched myself into the air on instinct.

Shhk-shhk-shhk-shhk!

Four blades whistled through the air.

Four daggers came from the front, back, left, and right. They pierced the edges of my clothes and skimmed my skin. If I hadn’t dodged, they would have lodged in my chest, back, and limbs.

What the hell…!

I righted my body and landed on the ground, then glared furiously at the rock wall more than ten zhang[2352] away.

“Can we take it down a notch? Huh?”

The rock wall shimmered like a heat haze. A figure emerged and answered in a dry voice.

“I told you clearly. I decide how you train.”

“You put me in this state and then hide over there? You could at least face me—”

“I wasn’t hiding. I was watching.”

“What difference does that make? You got caught.”

“I showed myself just enough for you to notice. If you couldn’t manage even that, you might as well bite down on a blade and die.”

“You?”

Mungyeong. No—the Slaughter Saint.

The moment I met his deep, steady gaze, goose bumps rose on my skin and hot fury surged up again.

[2352] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length, approximately 3.3 m (10.8 ft).

Grrrrrrrk. Frrt.

“…”

“…”

It wasn’t fury. It was feces.

Chapter 495

When you're a baby, it would be stranger if you could control your bladder.

At seven? You're still in kindergarten. These things happen. In elementary school, it would be a little embarrassing, but it wasn't unheard of in the lower grades.

But I was twenty-seven.

The media of the twenty-first century were falling over themselves to call me a new hero, while the martial artists of Murim called me the Fire King's heir and a rising star destined to change the face of Murim.

And yet…

Fuck.

I'd shit myself. At twenty-seven. Not peed myself—shit myself. In front of Mungyeong, no less.

Ah, ahh. Anastasia![2353]

"…Take your time cleaning up and come back."

After a long silence, Mungyeong left me with those words.

He seemed less concerned for me than he was about getting shit on his short sword. That damn old man.

Every time I thought about what had just happened, I wanted to log out and never return to Murim again. To hell with Dark Heaven and everything else.

Should I just leave Murim altogether?

I was sitting by the water, seriously considering it, when someone approached with a smile.

"Captain. What are you doing here all by your—"

The moment I recognized him, I swore at him with all my heart.

"Hyuk Mujin, you son of a bitch."

"Why are you swearing at me all of a sudden?"

"Stay out of my sight for a while. Please."

"Even if you're the Captain, that's going too far. You wouldn't spit in a smiling man's face, would you?"

"Khack—ptui!"

"Gah!"

Mujin barely dodged the glob of phlegm. He looked me over as though I'd lost my mind.

"What happened to make you act like this?"

"Nothing happened. So shut up and get out of my sight."

"That doesn't quite add up."

[2353] In Korean, Anastasia (Anaseutasya) sounds like a, na ssasseo, "ah, I crapped myself."

“Want me to put your arms and legs where they don’t belong?”

Because of the water that bastard had brought me, I’d lost both stat points and my dignity.

I was barely keeping my fist to myself because I knew Mungyeong was the real culprit.

Mujin, who had no idea what had happened, looked baffled.

“Good grief. Anyone would think I’d made you shit your pants.”

“…!”

“What was that reaction?”

“…Nothing. Why are you here?”

He gave me a suspicious look, then pointed toward the people in the distance.

“We’ve mostly finished sorting everything, but something’s odd.”

“Odd? What?”

“There are fewer imugi[2354] bones and scales than we expected. I think you’d better come see for yourself.”

“Really?”

“Yes. Perfected Being Hyeongong[2355] is furious that there’s so little for an imugi that size. He’s combing the area like he’s hunting for lice. He says if someone stole any, he’ll find the culprit on the Primordial Heavenly Venerable’s[2356] honor.”

“…”

What was he, Detective Kindaichi?[2357]

He must have completely lost his mind after helping with the Taiji Wisdom Sword just to obtain some bones, only to think someone had snatched them away.

The more I listened, the more absurd it seemed, so I asked Hyuk Mujin,

“How could anyone steal it? And it’s not like only a little went missing. It must be well over a thousand geun.[2358] How could anyone hide that without us noticing?”

“Exactly. Hardly anyone even knows about this place—”

Mujin broke off and turned to me.

“But how did you know?”

“Hm?”

“How much was missing. You said it must be over a thousand geun.[2359]”

“Just a rough guess. They’ve been making a racket over there for a while.”

I answered as calmly as I could, but I felt a sudden stab of guilt.

[2354] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent, often associated with dragons.

[2355] Perfected Being is a Daoist honorific for a spiritually accomplished practitioner.

[2356] The Primordial Heavenly Venerable is a Daoist deity.

[2357] Kindaichi Hajime is the teenage detective of the Japanese manga The Kindaichi Case Files, famous for solving elaborate murder mysteries.

[2358] A Korean geun is about 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

[2359] A Korean geun is about 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

Because…

He’s sharp. I need to watch what I say.

The culprit Perfected Being Hyeongong had sworn to find was me.

Just thinking about the haul piled up in my Inventory made me feel full.

Come to think of it, I did take a lot.

It had been easier than lying in bed playing with my smartphone.

The Water God Dragon’s corpse was enormous, and I’d worked on more of it than anyone else, sweeping the choicest parts into my Inventory as I went.

The sharpest tailbone. The unusually hard scales around its neck. Even some flesh, just in case.

Pile up everything I’d smuggled away, and it would dwarf a decent-sized manor.

“…Why are you smiling so contentedly?”

“Me? What smile?”

“Just now. You looked incredibly shady.”

Apparently, my delight at pulling off the perfect crime was written all over my face. I straightened my expression.

“I wasn’t smiling.”

“…”

“Anyway, leave them to it. Go get ready.”

“Ready for what?”

“To head back. You want to live here forever?”

People we could trust would move the sorted remains of the Water God Dragon discreetly, a little at a time.

Most of them would go to the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

That’ll be a huge help in the battles ahead.

I got to my feet. Mujin was already running off in the distance, almost before I’d finished speaking. Watching his back, I called out inwardly.

Inventory open. Summon.

Shhk.

At the command, the Water God Dragon’s bones, scales, and flesh appeared in my hands. I couldn’t help smiling.

Water God Dragon's Bones
Type: Material
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Only a Master Artisan can forge them.
Description: The bones of the Water God Dragon, an imugi[2360] that lived for countless years. They are exceptionally strong and contain an unknown, mystical qi. A craftsman who has reached the proper realm may be able to draw out their true power.

Although there were slight differences, the System's description of the scales was similar.

They, too, were Supreme Peak materials of exceptional strength with mystical qi inside them. As for the flesh, eating it regularly over time could increase internal energy and stat points.

This is like winning the lottery.

But the real jackpot was something else.

If the bones and scales were Lotto tickets and the flesh an annuity lottery, this was the American Powerball. The prize was on another scale entirely.

My heart pounding, I took it out of the Inventory.

Water God Dragon's Origin Essence
Type: None
Grade: None
Restriction: None
Description: The Origin Essence of the Water God Dragon, an imugi[2361] that lived for countless years. Though damaged by magical power, it is a kind of inner core extracted according to the Water God Dragon's will. It holds an immense quantity of exceptionally pure qi and is unlike any ordinary elixir. However, if you cannot withstand the qi within it... Further details omitted.

[2360] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent, often associated with dragons.
[2361] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent, often associated with dragons.

That's incredible.

I carefully stroked the Water God Dragon's Origin Essence in my hand.

That last line was ominous, but this was the greatest thing I'd gained from the trip to Hubei.

Unlike any ordinary elixir… Just how powerful is it?

Having been contaminated by magical power, it couldn't contain as much qi as the Water God Dragon had possessed at its peak. Even so, the amount had to be enormous.

The Water God Dragon had lived for over five hundred years. By simple calculation, that meant it had accumulated at least ten jiazi[2362] of qi.

From that perspective, the reduction in the Origin Essence's power was practically a blessing in disguise.

Pour too much water into a small vessel, and it overflows.

As the final line of the item description suggested, even I would burst like a balloon if I tried to take in that much qi all at once.

The question is when and where to use it.

Several faces came to mind. One old face in particular kept returning.

Old Master.

Jeok Cheongang hadn't come to mind simply because he was old.

Strangely enough, it was because of Mungyeong's poison.

After Seven-Step Soul-Chasing Powder had cost me ten precious stat points, and a severe stomachache had made me shit myself, a thought had struck me.

If Seven-Step Soul-Chasing Powder did this much… What condition must Old Master be in after being poisoned by the Formless Ultimate Poison?

Seven-Step Soul-Chasing Powder was undoubtedly an extreme poison, but it wasn't enough to threaten the life of a Supreme Peak master.

The Formless Ultimate Poison that had struck Jeok Cheongang in Henan was far more toxic. Seven-Step Soul-Chasing Powder couldn't compare.

Even the Luoyang Strange Physician, one of the most renowned physicians in the world, had no answer and had advised us to seek the Divine Physician. And because the poison had already spread so far, we'd needed the Myriad-Poison Ring as well.

Fortunately, the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng let us finish treating him…

But had he really recovered without any significant aftereffects?

I stared at the Water God Dragon's Origin Essence, doubt and worry mingling in my mind.

Perhaps this was an item whose purpose had been decided from the very beginning.

[2362] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

"Little Brother!"

Inventory open. Store.

I hurriedly put the Water God Dragon's Origin Essence back into my inventory at Jin Wikyung's shout from behind me, then turned around with an awkward smile.

"Yes, I'm coming!"

Today had been a day of many satisfying gains.

Yet something weighed on my heart, and for some reason, my stomach felt as though it were twisting.

Grrrggg.

"…Sigh."

Oh. The status abnormality still hadn't worn off.

Humans were not the only creatures that settled near water. Animals did too.

Birds nested along the cliffs above the broad waters of Dongting Lake. Wild boars, foxes, wolves, and even tigers lived there as well.

If Dongting Lake below the cliffs was territory permitted to humans, then the cliffs above belonged to the animals.

It was a peaceful place untouched by human feet.

So the great tiger, king of that place, was displeased to find an uninvited guest had arrived.

- Grrrrrrr.

Irritation rumbled through its sharp teeth. Its nose flared ceaselessly, following the human scent that still lingered in the air.

Its keen sense of smell soon found the source.

- Grrr.

At the edge of a sheer cliff, the great tiger spotted the intruder and snorted.

It had wondered what sort of creature had the nerve to come here. The answer was smaller and shabbier than it had expected: an old human who hardly looked worth a single bite.

Ssshhk.

Its body, weighing several hundred geun,[2363] moved nimbly toward the old man. It was at that very moment.

"So there was a tiger."

- …!

The tiger stopped short in its silent approach.

The old man had risen on his short legs and was staring straight at it.

[2363] A Korean geun is about 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

“You’re old too, I see.”

• Grrr.

The tiger bared its teeth. The old man only gave a short laugh.

“Quiet now. Come here and keep this old man company.”

• Raaaargh!

“You striped mutt, you want to die? I said come here.”

The tiger flinched.

It couldn’t have said why, but every hair on its body stood on end. It approached the old man with uncertain steps.

When the wrinkled hand gently scratched its chin, it felt good despite itself.

• Prrrrr.

Watching the great tiger purr, the old man—Fire King Jeok Cheongang—murmured softly.

“Yes. I’ve already grown old.”

The sky above the cliff was clear. His heart was dark.

Chapter 496

"Hmm."

Hyuk Mujin carefully picked up his brush. The small booklet spread across the table was already packed with entries from the past several days.

X Month X Day. Weather was shitty, then cleared up.

I had a nightmare about a monster that looked like a dragon. It scared me so badly I wet myself in my sleep.

As soon as I woke up, I sneaked down to the stream to wash my undergarments and trousers. Gung Gibang was already there, washing shit out of his trousers.

What a filthy bastard. Even among beggars, you'd be hard-pressed to find a worse one.

I have no idea why our Captain insists on dragging around someone who shits his pants.

But why am I in the infirmary?

X Month X Day. Clear skies.

The nightmare was real.

According to Mungyeong, the monster was an imugi[2364]. Demonic qi had seeped into its very marrow and driven it to commit an atrocity that outraged heaven and humanity.

Fortunately, thanks to the Captain stepping in, I was barely affected by the demonic qi. I was told to keep a diary for the time being and use it to piece my memories back together.

Still, I couldn't believe all those ridiculous things I'd seen had actually happened.

While Mungyeong was explaining, a question occurred to me. I asked if what I'd seen in the dream—no, what I'd seen there, with him fighting—had been real too.

Mungyeong said no. Gung Gibang joined in asking him about it, but for some reason, I fell asleep right there. I must have been tired.

Then why is there a bruise on my forehead?

I don't know. I'm going back to sleep.

X Month X Day.

I went to deal with the corpse. The imugi's enormous size nearly made me piss myself once, and the Captain's butchering skills nearly did it a second time.

I asked him to make me a Bone Sword and got beaten until my skull rang.

I heard the imugi's corpse would be transported in secret after being divided into bones, scales, and flesh.

[2364] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often associated with dragons.

Oh, and for some reason, a considerable amount of the sorted remains disappeared.

Perfected Being Hyeongong was furious and declared that he would find the culprit, but that's ridiculous. We're not talking about something the size of a fist. Who could steal that much?

We left the little commotion behind and boarded the boat back. Once aboard, I noticed a terrible smell of shit coming from somewhere.

I couldn't stand it any longer and brought it up. Before I could finish speaking, the Captain pointed at Gung Gibang.

He denied it vehemently, but I saw him washing his shit-stained trousers a few days ago. How could I believe him?

Mungyeong sat beside me with an odd expression the whole time.

He probably wanted to curse Gung Gibang out over the smell but held back to spare his dignity.

What a good kid. Every time I see him, he seems so innocent and easy to like.

X Month X Day.

It's been two days since we dealt with the imugi's corpse.

I don't know why, but Sir Jeok hasn't been around at all, and the Captain looks gaunter by the day.

I joked that he looked like someone being tormented by poison and ambushes day and night. He glared at me as if he wanted to kill me.

He only takes it out on me because I'm an easy target.

Just as I was thinking that, Gung Gibang said the same thing and got beaten too. I felt better.

X Month X Day.

This is my first entry in three days. I haven't written because there was nothing worth writing about.

First Sir Jeok, and now the Captain has become hard to find. Mungyeong keeps wandering off somewhere too.

What else is a martial artist like me supposed to do with his free time? Gung Gibang and I found a decent place to train.

His breath smells like a sewer, but when he keeps his mouth shut and trains, he's not so bad.

Cheongpung somehow found us. Every bit of advice he gave was useless.

Whenever I asked him about martial arts, I got one of two answers.

"It's really easy."

"Why can't you do it?"

You bastard. If it were that easy, would I still be First Rate?

Maybe he got frustrated, because he demonstrated it for me. I still couldn't understand a thing.

Every time we train, that water snake called something like Mimi sits beside us swallowing Blood Fish. Maybe that's why it seems to have grown so much. Its horns too.

No wonder the Blood Fish seemed to have vanished. They must have all gone down that thing's throat.

X Month X Day.

I've become fairly friendly with a few martial artists from the Zhuge Clan and Wudang, and they've told me some things.

Under the direct supervision of Sir Zhuge Feng, the Crouching Dragon Guest, the Zhuge Clan is testing a formation to seal the gap completely.

Apparently, if they can't seal it, strange creatures like the Blood Fish will keep appearing. I have no idea what bizarre method those Dark Heaven bastards used to make such a thing.

Meanwhile, Wudang is still hunting the Killing Ghost.

Even with the authorities helping them comb through Hubei Province, they haven't found him. The bastard must have made an art of running away.

X Month X Day.

It has been seven days and nights since I came here. The Captain's complexion was calm when I saw him again after so long.

Before, he'd been covered in wounds from whatever training he was doing alone, and his face was either pale or tinged blue. He seems to be better now.

His temper has grown sharper instead, and he walks like a ghost.

He gives off so little sign of his presence that he caught Gung Gibang and me bad-mouthing him and beat us within an inch of our lives.

Seriously, how did he hear us from that far away?

Come to think of it, Mungyeong looked pleased while I was getting beaten… I must have imagined it.

"Hmm."

That was where the diary of what Hyuk Mujin had seen and experienced over roughly ten days ended.

He gazed down at the booklet, lost in thought. Just as he was about to put brush to paper for a new entry, excited shouts came from outside.

"It—it worked!"

"Family Head! We did it!"

"Not you—I did it! As expected, I'm a genius! Zhuge Wuhou![2365]"

Slip! Splotch!

[2365] Zhuge Wuhou is an honorific for Zhuge Liang, the historical Chinese statesman and strategist.

His concentration broke. His hand slipped, and the brush went astray.

Hyuk Mujin's face contorted. So much for writing with the bearing of a great literary master.

"Which bastard was that?"

A familiar voice slipped into his ear as he raged.

"The bastard you're talking about sounds like Sir Zhuge Feng. Shall I pass along your words?"

"Go ahead. Then Young Hero Gung dies, and I die right after him."

Hyuk Mujin answered gruffly and put down his brush as Gung Gibang entered the tent without permission.

"But what on earth is happening outside?"

"Looks like the Zhuge Clan managed to seal the gap completely."

"With a formation?"

"What else would they use? Rocks?"

"Oh, come on. Why couldn't they use rocks?"

"Because that wouldn't solve the problem. And if rocks were enough, they'd have sealed it ages ago. Think before you speak."

"Oh, really? Is thinking too much why you shit yourself?"

"A dog that pissed itself criticizing a dog that shit itself."

"Pissing is better than shitting. Besides, Young Hero Gung did it twice. Last time, when we went to dispose of the imugi's corpse…"

"This is driving me crazy. I told you, that wasn't me!"

Hyuk Mujin clicked his tongue as Gung Gibang thumped his chest.

"There's only so much you can deny."

"I'm telling you the truth!"

"If it wasn't Young Hero Gung, then who was it? Hmm? Surely you don't think Perfected Being Hyeongong did it?"

"Jin Taekyung! I swear that bastard reeked of shit—gah!"

Gung Gibang broke off with a start and looked around. Only a few days earlier, he had been beaten half to death after having a similar conversation.

"He's not here, is he?"

Hyuk Mujin swallowed dryly as well.

The Jin Taekyung he knew had a fiery personality. Whoever started the insults, he would happily beat both sides senseless.

"P-probably?"

"You're sure?"

"How would I know? Anyone who can sense the Captain coming is already a Supreme Peak master. Or a ghost."

The two of them looked around with every sense on high alert, then let out deep sighs of relief.

Suddenly, the absurdity of their situation struck them. They had become afraid after saying only a few words.

“How long do we have to live like this?”

“Until the Captain dies.”

“What if he undergoes Returned to Youth[2366] someday?”

“Then we bite our tongues and kill ourselves. What else can we do?”

“Damn it. That Jin Taekyung bastard is a real monster. How can anyone be like that?”

Hyuk Mujin nodded vigorously. He’d known Jin Taekyung since his days as a delinquent; of course he understood.

“That’s true. And there are two of them, not just one.”

“Cheongpung? Don’t even get me started. After seeing the Drunken Eight Immortals Fist[2367] only a few times, he started imitating it pretty closely. If my master found out, he’d try to kill me for leaking our sect’s secret art.”

“Ooh.”

“…I have a fairly good idea what you were just thinking, but keep your mouth shut forever. I’m really going to die.”

“Oooh.”

“You rotten bastard.”

Gung Gibang shook his head, then asked, “What’s your lord doing, anyway? I hardly see him.”

“How would I know? He might be training. Might not. Some days he stays in his tent the whole time.”

“Sir Jin’s always busy with one thing or another. But Sir Jeok’s been gone a long time too.”

Jeok Cheongang had vanished without a trace after their first day there.

Plenty of people wondered where he was. None worried about his safety.

Fire King. Those two words were proof enough of what he could do.

“Who could harm the Fire King?”

“True. Even Dark Heaven wouldn’t dare. If they tried anything, three or four of their pillars would have been ripped out, and the surrounding area would already have been reduced to ashes.”

“Come to think of it, I haven’t seen much of Mungyeong lately either.”

[2366] Returned to Youth refers to a martial-arts fantasy transformation in which an aged master regains a youthful body.

[2367] The Eight Immortals are legendary figures in Chinese Daoist tradition; the martial art’s name also invokes drunken boxing.

“Neither have I. Whenever I do see him, he’s with the Captain.”

“Really?”

“Yes. I figured it might be because the Captain got hurt while training…”

“Hmm.”

“What?”

“Nothing. I smell something.”

“Did you shit yourself again?”

“Hyuk Mujin, you lunatic. Not that. I mean there’s something going on between them.”

Gung Gibang frowned in thought.

“Wait. Could it be?”

“Could what?”

“You still don’t get it? Why have those two been together so often lately?”

Hyuk Mujin’s expression changed. Listening to Gung Gibang, he began to see what he meant.

“Then maybe…”

“Exactly what you’re thinking.”

“Good heavens. How can this be?”

“If you think about it, it is strange. The Captain punches us whenever he gets bored, but he hasn’t used so much as a single act of violence against Mungyeong.”

“He hardly even curses at him anymore. And something was suspicious when we went to deal with the imugi’s corpse.”

“When Jin Taekyung disappeared, Mungyeong was gone too.”

“Exactly! The Beggars’ Sect’s future Sect Leader never disappoints!”

“That settles it. Mungyeong…”

Gung Gibang’s face went rigid.

“He must be learning martial arts from that Jin bastard.”

“Ah, Mungyeong! How could you make such a terrible choice?”

Hyuk Mujin was genuinely heartbroken. Mungyeong was like a clean white sheet of paper. The thought of Jin Taekyung’s ink soaking into it made his chest ache.

“What did that child ever do to deserve this?”

“What a tragedy. How can I face the Divine Physician in Sichuan?”

“Not Mungyeong! We can’t let him go down the same path we did!”

“It’s too late. Jin Taekyung is a Fiend. Now that Mungyeong is in that evil bastard’s clutches, there’s nothing we can do.”

“Then by now, Mungyeong must be…”

“Haa…”

“Ah…”

The two of them sighed in dismay at the same time. Thinking of Mungyeong, who must by now be fighting for his life under Jin Taekyung's evil clutches, they felt their hearts grow heavy.

Please survive, Mungyeong.

Please, somebody save me.

Slice!

A gust of wind brushed my neck.

The pain was as cold as ice, then immediately flared hot. A bead of cold sweat ran down my forehead and dropped onto the ground with a soft tap.

Swish, tap!

I righted myself in midair and stared straight ahead.

"That was a little dangerous."

A voice answered—or rather, a Sound Transmission.

—It was meant to be.

"No, I'm serious. I almost died."

—Glad to hear it.

Where the hell is he?

I looked all around, but I couldn't see him. There was only that Sound Transmission, coming from nowhere I could pin down.

"Fucking hell."

—What kind of hell?

I took a deep breath and tightened my grip on White Flame's shaft.

Toward whoever was watching me from somewhere unseen, I muttered as though spitting the words out.

"This is so fucking shitty I can't keep doing this."

Whoosh!

Instead of an answer, a blinding sword strike came flying at me.

Chapter 497

Half an hour.

That was the longest I could hold out. With the cold edge of a sword against the back of my neck, I muttered under my breath.

“God, this sucks.”

Ssshhk.

A stinging pain ran across my neck, and blood slid down it. The point of the gesture was obvious. I sighed.

“I lost. Let’s stop.”

“Wrong. Again.”

That dry voice was one I hadn’t heard during the fight. I already knew what its owner wanted me to say.

“…I’m dead. Happy?”

The blade that had been slowly digging into my neck stopped. When I felt the cold metal withdraw, I pressed a hand to the cut to stop the bleeding, then turned around.

Mungyeong was sitting on a rock about thirty feet away.

“Do you know how many times you’ve died?”

“Twelve.”

Five times, my Sinews and Meridians had been severed in all four limbs. Three times, I had died from a Pressure-Point Strike to a lethal acupoint. Three more times, my heart had been pierced. And just now, my throat had been cut.

I hadn’t actually died, but I might as well have. I wiped the sticky blood from my neck with my sleeve and looked at Mungyeong.

“It’ll be different next time.”

“That’s the eleventh time I’ve heard that.”

“I mean it this time.”

“That makes twelve.”

“…”

What a memory.

As I stood there speechless, Mungyeong asked, “Do you know why you died?”

A fight always left a result, and a result gave you something to think about.

I silently replayed our fight in my head, then blurted out an answer.

“Because I fought like an assassin?”

“As expected, you know nothing… Hmm.”

Mungyeong had begun speaking almost at the same time as me, but now he trailed off.

“Am I wrong?”

“Go on.”

“I don’t know exactly when it started, but I found myself imitating you. Your movements and things like that.”

At first, after getting turned into a pickle soaked in poison, I’d begun paying attention to everything around me. Then I’d started copying Mungyeong’s movements bit by bit.

Dueling him two or three times a day, I’d gradually grown used to them. My eyes recognized them, and so did my body.

But…

“That was my mistake.”

“Why?”

“New shoes rub your heels raw. Even more so if they’re too small.”

“Be more specific.”

“I should’ve quit the clumsy imitation and fought my own way. Especially against the Slaughter Saint.”

“…”

Mungyeong stared at me for a while, then tossed out a single remark.

“You’re not a complete idiot.”

“Oh, was that a compliment?”

“It means you’ve only just reached the basics.”

“Exactly. Thank you for the compliment.”

Mungyeong frowned.

“Are your ears plugged?”

“Nope. They work fine.”

“…You have a gift for getting on people’s nerves.”

“Either way, reaching the basics means it was a compliment. Why are you so bad at being honest? Are you going through puberty?”

“I said I’m not!”

“Why are you shouting all of a sudden?”

“When did I— I said I’m not!”

“…Now that I think about it, maybe you are.”

Not going through puberty, my ass.

But if I talked back one more time, my head looked liable to fly off.

After that outburst, Mungyeong returned to his usual calm, dry tone as though nothing had happened.

“The basics are just that: the basics. There have been plenty of others like you.”

Others like me?

I ventured a question.

“Do you have other Disciples?”

“Of course. You met one in Sichuan.”

“Other than Old Man Dong. You know what I mean. Don’t change the subject.”

“…”

Silence was as good as an admission. The thought of the Slaughter Saint’s hidden Disciples made me curious.

“Who? Who are they? Do you still keep in touch? Do you all get together for a meal on Teacher’s Day[2368]?”

“I have no reason to tell you. And what the hell is Teacher’s Day?”

“You’re awfully difficult.”

“…You grow more insolent by the day. Do you have five lives or something?”

“Considering I’ve died and come back twelve times, I’d say I have about thirteen. So you’re really not going to tell me?”

Mungyeong stared at me, then spoke abruptly.

“I’ll tell you. On one condition.”

A condition from the Slaughter Saint. I answered with complete confidence.

“It’s about time to eat. I’ll be going now.”

“I distinctly remember you eating before you came.”

“I eat five meals a day.”

“Stay and hear the condition. You seemed quite curious.”

“Everyone has a life of their own and secrets they’d rather keep. Who am I to pry? Anyway, I’ll be off.”

“Stop right there if you want to keep your head.”

“…”

Fuck. I shouldn’t have asked.

My stomach knotted with panic as I turned back around. Fine. Since I was stuck here, I might as well hear the story.

“So you really have other Disciples?”

“Not Disciples. But I did teach several people.”

“That sounds like you’re saying they’re gone.”

“It’s been a very long time. They couldn’t possibly still be alive.”

“Were they, by any chance, in the same line of work as…?”

“They were assassins. They belonged to Salcheonmun[2369] with me.”

Even the name smelled of blood.

[2368] Teacher’s Day is a Korean holiday observed on May 15 to honor teachers.

[2369] Salcheonmun is the name of the now-vanished assassin sect; it literally means “Slaughter Heaven Sect.”

So he belonged to a sect, too.

It made sense when I thought about it. No matter how extraordinary Mungyeong was, he hadn't been born an assassin.

Still, a sect the Slaughter Saint belonged to should be fairly well known.

But no matter how thoroughly I searched my memory, the name Salcheonmun meant nothing to me.

As if he'd read my mind, Mungyeong spoke.

"No use trying to remember it. The sect vanished long ago."

There was only one way for a sect to vanish. Watching his expression, I carefully said one word.

"Annihilated?"

"Yes."

"How did that happen? No, before that—weren't you the Sect Leader?"

"They chose the wrong path and paid the price. That's all I'll say."

Mungyeong finished speaking and rose to his feet. A short sword in his hand already gleamed with a keen blue edge.

"Now it's time for you to pay."

"Excuse me?"

"Dodge one sword stroke. That's the condition."

Most people would probably think, How am I supposed to evade that? But from my perspective, it was worth trying.

I'd lasted half an hour against the Slaughter Saint while doing a lousy imitation of an assassin. Surely I could dodge one stroke.

"If I do, will you tell me more later?"

"Of course."

"Fine. I can do that."

Mungyeong added, "Close your eyes."

"Fuck. Are you kidding me?"

"Then you will die. Not the thirteenth time, but for the first and last time."

Before he'd finished speaking, Mungyeong's sleeve fluttered.

By now, I was used to his attacks. I instinctively turned my head, but what came flying toward me wasn't a hidden weapon. It was something else.

That's…

A powder so fine I could barely make it out even when I strained my eyes to their limit.

It rode the wind blowing toward me. The instant the powder touched the air—

Whoosh!

Darkness swallowed the world.

No. That wasn't right.

The darkness hadn't swallowed the world. It had swallowed me.

Beep.

You have been poisoned by Blindness Powder!
You temporarily lose your eyesight!
Rapid Detoxification is required! If Detoxification is delayed too long, permanent damage may occur!

Every hair on my body stood on end as the System alert sounded in my ears.

Blindness Powder? The poison itself didn't matter. I was still wearing the Myriad-Poison Ring.

The problem was that Mungyeong's sword was coming through the darkness far faster than the ring could detoxify the Blindness Powder.

Ssshhk.

I couldn't see a thing. But I could feel it clearly.

In a world moving so slowly it felt as though someone had pressed pause, a killing sword approached, erasing the wind in its path.

This is…

A move from the greatest assassin of all time.

I felt a killing intent unlike anything I'd ever encountered—so stealthy and chilling that I shuddered.

I stared blankly into the darkness.

And in that suffocating space where I could see nothing, I felt every sense I had awaken.

Slash!

Wudang, the Zhuge Clan, and the Beggars' Sect.

They had chosen only trustworthy elites to preserve secrecy, but no one could ignore either the standing or the number of those gathered.

Among the several hundred martial artists from prestigious great sects, the figure of a young medical apprentice was bound to stand out wherever he went.

"Oh, it's you. Just coming out?"

"I've just been to see Young Master Jin."

"You seem to visit him more often these days."

"Yes. His training has been so rough lately that he keeps getting hurt."

"Good heavens. Great Hero Jin really is remarkable. He's younger than my son, but he isn't content with his current realm. He just keeps working…"

"He must be an incredible master. I don't know much about Murim myself."

The Zhuge martial artist standing guard let out a short laugh at the young medical apprentice's innocent remark. Boredom had led him to bother a child who'd learned nothing but medicine, and now he felt a little guilty.

"He is incredible. No doubt about it. You'll understand someday, too."

"Hmm. Is that so?"

"If you're not involved in Murim, you might not know. Anyway, is his training over for today?"

As though he knew nothing, Mungyeong tilted his head and answered.

"No. He said no one should come near him for the next two shichen[2370]."

"Understood. This is Great Hero Jin we're talking about—we can't interrupt his training. I'll pass that along to the next guards."

"Yes. Then take care."

Mungyeong politely bowed at the waist and was about to leave when the martial artist suddenly spoke.

"My, his training must be rougher than I thought."

"Sorry?"

"The blood on your sleeve. Was Great Hero Jin badly hurt?"

The guard's follow-up question never reached Mungyeong. He looked down at the bloodstain on his sleeve and murmured, "The basics…?"

"Hmm?"

"Oh, it's nothing. Young Master Jin is fine, so don't worry."

"Ah. Good. All right."

Leaving the martial artist behind with an uneasy expression, Mungyeong walked away.

Several faces had grown familiar enough to speak to him and acknowledge him as they passed, but the young medical apprentice's mind held only one person.

Jin Taekyung. Jin Taekyung…

He'd thought it couldn't happen. Yet the boy really had dodged that final sword stroke.

The results of the past several days of testing, and of today, had exceeded Mungyeong's expectations. No, they had exceeded anything he'd imagined.

So this can happen.

Everything he'd told Jin Taekyung was true.

[2370] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

He had once had people who could properly be called Disciples, and every one of them had possessed the “basics.”

But there was one thing he hadn’t mentioned: how long that had taken.

The fastest of them took a little over a year, if I remember right.

Jin Taekyung had done it in only seven days and nights.

No one else came close.

Mungyeong didn’t know whether it was because of the boy’s Heavenly Martial Physique or because he was a Supreme Peak master. Whatever the reason, there was something special about Jin Taekyung himself.

“Even so… I never expected this much.”

He murmured too softly for anyone to hear and rolled up his sleeve.

The skin had been cut by something sharp, and beads of blood had formed along the wound. Looking at it, Mungyeong had a sudden thought.

Now I understand how the Fire King feels.

But Mungyeong did not realize that a faint smile had formed at the corner of his mouth.

Chapter 498

The moment I woke from my long sleep, one thought flashed through my mind.

Don’t tell me the poison still hasn’t worn off.

Everything was black.

My flicker of unease faded as soon as I spotted the moon shining faintly in the ink-dark sky. I muttered, my voice hoarse, “Shit. You could’ve woken me before you left.”

I’d thought the Blindness Powder was still working. It was just night.

A good deal of time must have passed while I was unconscious. I lay sprawled on my back, staring blankly at the sky, then slowly sat up.

What the hell happened?

I had moved almost entirely unconsciously, and since I’d passed out while poisoned by the Blindness Powder, I hadn’t seen what happened at the time. I felt my dirt-covered body all over.

Nothing else seems to be hurt. I must have stopped it somehow.

I could guess the result, but I couldn’t picture how I’d done it. How had I moved? No matter how hard I tried to recall the sensation, the memory stayed hazy.

There was one thing I did know.

Beep.

The objective of the Follow-up Quest will be determined by Mungyeong's future plans!
Agh!

"Agh," my ass. As someone who had nearly crossed the Jordan River[2371] instead of Dongting Lake, I was furious.

A Follow-up Quest.

I'd expected something like this, but that didn't make it any less worrying. Stage 1 had me dodge the Slaughter Saint's sword stroke with my eyes closed. What kind of fucked-up stunt did they have planned for Stage 2?

At least the rewards were generous.

I guess putting my body through hell paid off.

I hadn't leveled up, but I'd gained a considerable amount of EXP and recovered the points I'd lost after being poisoned by Seven-Step Soul-Chasing Powder.

And…

Which asshole came up with those titles?

Deadly Poison Sommelier and Wow, You Survived That. The names pissed me off, but both Achievements were worth having.

[2371] "Crossing the Jordan River" is used here to mean dying, in contrast to crossing Dongting Lake.

The Poison Resistance from the first one was obviously welcome. The second might seem a little vague right now, but it was a huge gift.

A clue to enlightenment.

I'd been feeling as though I'd hit a wall lately. Nothing could have been better news. Of course, if I said that out loud after racing through the realms on the Fire Gate Clan's Supreme Peak martial arts and quarterly helpings of elixirs, Murim would probably declare me a public enemy.

Still, a wall's a wall.

Ask a martial artist stuck at Second Rate or Third Rate what they need, and nine out of ten will say martial arts manuals and elixirs. Ask a master who's reached Peak or higher, and the answer changes.

Enlightenment.

Ten years, twenty years—even longer could pass without it coming. No matter how extraordinary the martial arts you learned or how many elixirs you took, there was a limit to how far they could carry you.

If stuffing yourself with elixirs could make you a Supreme Peak master and return you to youth, who would train until they bled and sweated? People devoted their lives to training because they couldn't get past that wall any other way.

Gung Gibang had once told me that quite a few martial artists even took opium, hoping to expand the realm of their minds and attain enlightenment.

When I asked why they'd do something so stupid, his answer was simple.

"They know they'll get addicted to opium if they keep it up."

"Then why do it?"

"Because they're martial artists."

A short answer, but it explained everything.

Martial artists were creatures like that. They were the sort of people who would do anything if it meant becoming stronger. They were more intoxicated by martial arts than by opium, and they had become addicted to power.

And I wasn't so different.

I want to be stronger. Stronger still.

I had more now than I could ever have imagined in the past, and I still wanted more strength. There was one crucial difference between me and other martial artists, though. I didn't want it so I could gain something. I wanted it so I could protect what I had.

If I'd been satisfied with where I was, I never would've accepted Mungyeong's training.

That made the clue to enlightenment an enormous gain.

There was just one tiny problem.

Doctor, I don't remember a thing.

I didn't even know what I'd done. Fuck.

Seriously, how had I pulled it off? I thought I'd dodged the sword by a hair, but I couldn't remember what happened after that.

Maybe I'll figure it out if I keep training.

I tried to recapture the sensation, but for now I was groping through fog. I sighed, got to my feet, and began brushing the dirt off my clothes.

That was when it happened.

Ssshhk—boom!

Far away, a streak of blue fire shot into the dark sky and burst in a brilliant flash.

A signal firework?

I hurried out of the training area to see what was going on and found the martial artists standing guard.

"What happened?"

"Oh, Great Hero Jin. You're finally out."

The Beggars' Sect disciple shrugged. His patched clothes and the two knots hanging from his waist marked him as a member of the Hubei branch.

"Blue means visitors. We knew they were coming, but they're later than expected."

"Visitors?"

What is this place, a tourist attraction?

Since the place was being treated as highly classified, I couldn't immediately think of anyone who might come here. At most, there were the three sects gathered here and the authorities. And if they were sending reinforcements, the guards wouldn't call them visitors.

"Where from? The Zhuge Clan? Wudang? Oh, did Wudang's Sect Leader finally arrive?"

"Sorry?"

The Beggars' Sect disciple and the other martial artists stared at me as if they had never seen such a strange person before.

"Uh… you haven't heard?"

"Heard what?"

"Who's coming."

"What are you talking about…? Is it someone I know?"

The disciple nodded.

"Yes. They're from the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"…Huh?"

From where?

Splash! Splish, splash!

Disciplined footsteps crossed the moonlit river and left fresh tracks in the sand.

Around fifty martial artists moved as one, forming lines on either side. A man walked slowly between them, spotted me, and stopped.

“It’s been a long time.”

His eyes were as sharp as ever, and he had more scars than I remembered. I gave a short laugh at the familiar face I hadn’t seen in a year.

“Your face looks even fiercer. Maybe we should call you Ghost Face instead of Ghost Sword.”

“There were plenty of bastards who needed dealing with. As our family’s reach has grown, all sorts have come crawling out of the woodwork.”

“Just tell me who. I’ll deal with them.”

“There’s no need. They’ve already left for a place beyond anyone’s reach. And…”

His narrowed eyes held a smile, and his voice carried both fondness and joy.

“There’s no need for the Divine Dragon to bother with mere cows and pigs.”

Ghost Sword Wipeng—Jin Wikyung’s right-hand man and the person once charged with knocking some sense into me—gave me a deep martial salute.

“Wipeng, Commander of the Jin Dragon Squad of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan, greets the Third Young Master.”

“Greetings, Third Young Master!”

The shout rang out through the stillness of the deep night. Powerful energy radiated from the bodies of the martial artists standing in lines like iron towers on either side. They were just like the two characters embroidered across every one of their chests: Jin Dragon.

Wow. When did the Jin Family of Taiyuan get this big?

It felt like yesterday that we’d sat with our heads together, muttering that we were fucked because we had nowhere near enough First Rate masters for the war against the Mount Heng Sword Sect. Yet the weakest member of the Jin Dragon Squad standing before me was at least First Rate.

Just looking at them gets me fired up.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan had been slowly declining: the Family Head had been absent for years, we were desperately short on people, and the Third Young Master liked pleasure houses more than his own home. And that was only part of it.

Seeing how far the family had risen made my chest swell with pride.

Is this why people build families?

I was gazing at Wipeng and the Jin Dragon Squad when a voice behind him spoiled the moment.

“Hey, damn it! You startled me. Why are you all shouting in the middle of the night? What if an old man with a weak heart like mine drops dead from the shock?”

That seemed unlikely.

I studied the man’s muscles—hard to believe they belonged to an old man—and finally dredged up the memory.

“Always do Taebo?”[2372]

Jang Taebo, former Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild, scowled.

“Listen to the mouth on this brat. Am I your friend?”

I’d built up quite a reputation over the past year, but Jang Taebo, a master craftsman who never held back, didn’t seem to care. If anything, that made me even happier to see him. Besides, White Flame, the spear he’d put his heart into forging, had saved my life more than once.

“Seriously, Elder. What brings you here?”

The answer came from someone other than Jang Taebo.

“I asked him to come.”

The people who had hurried over after hearing that the Jin Family of Taiyuan had arrived murmured among themselves and parted to either side. Jin Wikyung came through the crowd, and a shout even louder than before rang out.

“Wipeng, Commander of the Jin Dragon Squad of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan, pays his respects to his lord.”

“Loyalty!”

“That’s enough.”

Under different circumstances, Jin Wikyung would have grabbed Wipeng’s hand and danced a waltz with him, but countless eyes were watching us. Wearing a solemn, dignified expression, he waved a hand and continued in his deep voice.

“Commander of the Jin Dragon Squad. And Old Master Jang. You’ve both had a difficult journey.”

“Not at all, my lord.”

“Don’t concern yourself with this old man, Lesser Family Head.”

Wipeng was obviously a trusted retainer, but even Jang Taebo, who called me this brat and that bastard, was unfailingly respectful toward Jin Wikyung. I’d heard he had retired ages ago. Had he started taking work from the Jin Family of Taiyuan while I was away?

Leaving my question unanswered, Jin Wikyung spoke again.

“The journey must have been tiring. Let’s all move somewhere else first.”

[2372] A Korean catchphrase urging people to “always do Tae Bo,” used here as a pun on Jang Taebo’s name.

I could tell I was included in that “all.” I could also tell the man running toward us, panting hard, wasn’t.

“Hyuk Mujin, Vice Commander of the Jin Dragon Squad! I’ve just finished my guard duty and returned!”

“…”

Some guard duty.

If you’re going to lie, wipe the sleep from your eyes first, you bastard.

Chapter 499

Spring was in full swing, but the night wind blowing along Dongting Lake's winding waterways was chilly.

Jang Taebo entered Jin Wikyung's heavy-cloth tent, claimed the spot in front of the brazier, and sat down to warm himself.

"Whew. Now I feel alive."

Jin Wikyung smiled and handed him a cup of tea.

"You've had a long journey."

"Good thing I happened to be in Henan. If I'd been in Shanxi, I wouldn't have come even at your request, Lesser Family Head. Working an old man who's just waiting to die this hard…"

I looked at Jang Taebo's threatening muscles and thought,

He looks plenty capable of hard work…

Just look at him. He wasn't merely fit; he was built. While overwork shaved years off other people's lives, the worst it could do to Jang Taebo was cost him some muscle.

Wipeng seemed to be thinking along the same lines. He glanced from his own forearm to Jang Taebo's, then spoke.

"I heard everything that happened in Sichuan and Hubei. I came myself to see if all was well and settle the matter in Henan while I was at it. It seems my timing was good."

Jin Wikyung laughed heartily and patted Wipeng on the shoulder.

"Wipeng. You truly are my Zhang Liang!"[2373]

"I'm a martial artist."

"Oh. Then Han Xin."

"Han Xin was purged in the end."

"Xiao He, then."

"Xiao He was a civil official too."

"…"

Jin Wikyung looked at Wipeng as though he wanted to purge him on the spot, then cleared his throat.

"Ahem. It seems you've had a great deal bottled up."

In an ordinary relationship between lord and retainer, Wipeng would have denied it. But he was one of the few people who could openly give Jin Wikyung a hard time.

"Yes, my lord. Did you not know?"

[2373] Zhang Liang, Han Xin, and Xiao He were three founding ministers of the Han dynasty. Han Xin was a military commander; Zhang Liang and Xiao He were civil officials.

“I knew, but I didn’t expect you to come all this way to tell me.”

“I didn’t come of my own accord. You summoned me. Do you realize you’ve been away for nearly three months? Not long ago, even Sect Leader Lee came to ask whether something had happened to you.”

“Cough, cough!”

The way Jin Wikyung kept clearing his throat suggested he had plenty to feel guilty about.

Wait. Sect Leader Lee? Wipeng couldn’t mean…

“Are you talking about Young Lady Lee—Lee Seowol?”

Wipeng shook his head.

“Not Young Lady. She is the bona fide Sect Leader of an established sect, Third Young Master.”

“Oh. Right.”

The Mount Heng Sword Sect had once sought to become the dominant power in Shanxi Province, only to collapse after a series of disasters.

However, Lee Seowol, the only surviving blood relative of the Blood Wolf Sword, had survived with my help and sworn loyalty to the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Vassal or not, a Sect Leader was still a Sect Leader.

When did I last see her…? Has it been over a year already?

It was around the time Jeok Cheongang and I left the Jin Family of Taiyuan for Mount Jiuhua. A year had passed in Murim alone. Counting my time in the modern world, it had been even longer.

I could still remember our parting clearly.

“Excuse me, Sect Leader Lee.”

“Young Lady.”

“Pardon?”

“Please call me Young Lady.”

“Ah, yes. Young Lady Lee, then.”

“Go ahead, Young Master Jin.”

“May peace prevail throughout your household.”

“…”

“And may your sect prosper too. Whatever you do, I hope it all goes well.”

Hmm. I thought we’d parted on a fairly warm note.

The Lee Seowol I remembered had the resolve you’d expect of a martial family’s daughter. She hadn’t backed down even when Pung Yang came at her with the Red Wind Band. The ruined Mount Heng Sword Sect must have recovered quite a bit by now.

“So, is Young Lady Lee doing well these days?”

Wipeng considered the question.

“In some respects, yes. In others, perhaps not.”

“Why? Is something going wrong?”

“If you’re asking about the sect, the Mount Heng Sword Sect has already completed its reconstruction. Under Sect Leader Lee’s command, it is growing rapidly, and the number of its disciples is increasing every day.”

“Oh.”

“Great Hero Cheol Mubaek, the Tiger of Mount Heng and a friend of her late father, has also ended his seclusion and is taking an active role in the affairs of the Mount Heng Sword Sect.”

“Ohh.”

Then everything was going well, wasn’t it?

Wipeng narrowed his eyes at my puzzled look.

“Third Young Master, forgive me for asking, but have you truly not contacted her once since then?”

“Contacted her? About what?”

“…Hah. Never mind. Pretend you didn’t hear that.”

The mood had turned strange. Jang Taebo clicked his tongue beside me, and a thought flashed through my mind.

No way. Come on, it can’t be. But what if…? No. That’s not it.

Jin Wikyung rescued me from my sudden confusion with a single remark.

“I’m glad to hear Sect Leader Lee is doing well. What about my second brother? I haven’t seen him in months.”

Wipeng gave me a look usually reserved for a pill bug, then sighed.

“He’s much the same. He lives on the fasting pills stored in the training hall and hasn’t set foot outside.”

“Mukyung, that fool. What is he trying to do…?”

Jin Wikyung had reason to worry.

Before I left for Mount Jiuhua, Jin Mukyung had lost a duel to Cheongpung. From that day on, he’d shut himself in the training hall and refused to come out.

A year had passed. The Star-Array Grand Banquet had been held, and Dark Heaven’s shadow now hung over Murim. He was still in there.

He did say he wouldn’t come out until he’d accomplished something great.

There was a time when all of Murim called Jin Mukyung a once-in-a-millennium genius.

Even the direct disciples of the Nine Sects and One Gang, with their generous supply of exceptional martial arts and elixirs, couldn’t compare to him. Despite being born into a fallen martial family on the fringes, Jin Mukyung had risen to the forefront of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes on the strength of his martial arts alone.

And then he met Cheongpung.

For Jin Mukyung, Cheongpung's existence must have been an enormous shock and an equally enormous stimulus. The fact that he was still training in seclusion more than a year later was proof of it.

He'll accomplish something. I'm sure of it.

The Jin Mukyung I knew was a genius, no question.

He hadn't had the Sword Saint to teach him, or exceptional elixirs and martial arts handed to him. He'd come this far on his own. I couldn't imagine what he might be like when he finally emerged.

The question is when.

He wasn't going to emerge when he was nearly sixty, was he?

If he survived on nothing but fasting pills until then, I'd genuinely respect him and treat him as my hyung.[2374] Frankly, a full year of eating those tasteless things was impressive enough.

Even Wudang Daoists brought jerky instead of fasting pills when they practiced wall-facing meditation. What did that tell you?

One bite of a fasting pill, and even the worst vegetarians—the kind who flip over the grill at a barbecue restaurant—would go looking for pork belly.

While I was thinking about that, the conversation had moved on to Jang Taebo.

"By the way, Lesser Family Head, will you tell this old man why you summoned him?"

In response to Jang Taebo's grumbling question, Jin Wikyung abruptly tossed out a single phrase.

"Ironcraft Hall. What do you think?"

"I've never heard of such a place in the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"You wouldn't have. It was established only a few days ago."

Jang Taebo frowned.

"It's a strangely familiar name. It reminds me of the Ironcraft Guild, where this old man once worked."

"I named it with you in mind, Old Master Jang. Master of Ironcraft Hall. Has a nice ring to it, doesn't it?"

"Lesser Family Head."

Jang Taebo sighed.

"I left the Ironcraft Guild long ago."

"Then perhaps it's time you came back."

"I'm old and tired. I haven't the strength to lift a hammer."

[2374] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man he is close to.

Jin Wikyung stared meaningfully at Jang Taebo's threatening muscles, then moved his lips.

"Youngest."

By now, I knew exactly why he'd summoned Jang Taebo. I tapped White Flame, strapped across my back, and let it fall.

Clang!

"Oh no! I dropped a divine weapon made by a blacksmith too old and tired to lift a hammer!"

"…"

"My spear, made from Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron! They say it's incredibly difficult to work. I wonder who made it…"

Jang Taebo glared at me as though he wanted to tear me apart.

"Enough."

"Why? I wasn't talking about you, Elder."

"I made it, didn't I?"

"What are you talking about? How could someone who can't lift a hammer make this?"

"…That damned brat."

Jang Taebo sighed as though the ground itself had collapsed, then looked at Jin Wikyung.

"Was this why you gave me all sorts of help?"

"Of course not. It was a simple kindness to the artisan who made a divine weapon for my beloved youngest brother."

"Then I'll answer your proposal."

"I'm listening."

"No. That is the only answer this old man can give. It wouldn't change with a blade at my throat."

I shot my hand up.

"What about the spear?"

"Shut up before I take it back and snap it."

"Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. Special feature: fucking hard."

"…Why did I ever make a spear for a bastard like you? What riches and glory did I think I'd get out of it?"

"Just become the Master of Ironcraft Hall. I hear you've had plenty of help from our family."

"I'll repay you with money. Do you think I'm going to put myself through that kind of hell again at my age?"

"Seriously? You really won't do it?"

"Then what are you going to do? I said I wouldn't."

"Then just tell me your conditions. I'll meet as many of them as I can."

"Conditions?"

A smug smile appeared on Jang Taebo's face.

"Remember this time last year? I'll set the same conditions."

"The conditions from back then? You can't mean…"

"The Herb of Eternal Youth, gongcheong seokyu,[2375] a dragon's claw, or a dragon pearl. Bring me any one of those."

A Sudden Quest, No Way You Can Do It Anyway, has been created!

Quest Objective: Obtain at least one of the items Jang Taebo named.

Clang! Crash!

I sprang to my feet and shouted.

"Come on! Where am I supposed to find any of that? You're asking for a dragon, not even an imugi!"[2376]

"Imugi[2377] or dragon, bring me one first. Then I'll bury my bones in the Jin Family of Taiyuan. If you can't, keep quiet."

Quest details have been changed.

Quest Objective: Obtain an imugi's[2378] claw.

I checked the changed System window and nodded.

"Oh, that works. Here."

"My mind hasn't changed, so don't waste your effort—what are you suddenly giving me?"

"An imugi's[2379] claw."

"Huh?"

[2375] Gongcheong seokyu is a rare elixir in martial-arts fiction. Seokyu also sounds like the Korean word for petroleum.

"An imugi's[2380] claw. You told me to bring you one."

"...What?"

Jang Taebo's pupils shook as though an earthquake had struck.

He was a Master Artisan ranked among the three greatest in the world, and he had once served as the Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild, the finest blacksmith organization under Heaven.

"An... an imugi's[2381] claw? Is it real?"

"Look at the length. It's obviously not one of mine."

"No, I mean, where in the world did you..."

"I caught it."

"What?"

"There are bones and scales too."

"That's impossible!"

"Go see for yourself after sunrise. Great Hero Wipeng's only heard about it in a letter, so you two can go together."

The Sudden Quest, No Way You Can Do It Anyway, has been successfully completed!

As a Quest Reward, the Jin Family of Taiyuan has acquired Jang Taebo!

Achievement unlocked: Wow, You Found It!

Along with the cheerful System notification, Jin Wikyung warmly put an arm around Jang Taebo's shoulder.

"I look forward to working with you from now on, Master of Ironcraft Hall."

"...!"

Jang Taebo's eyes were utterly vacant. The Jin Family of Taiyuan had acquired its very own Dobby[2382]—no, slave.

Chapter 500

It was still dark when Jang Taebo followed us out, looking as though he'd been led to his execution. The moment he saw the Water God Dragon's remains, his expression changed.

"Ohhh… Ohhhhh…!"

Talk about a change of attitude.

Trembling like a kindergartener who needed to pee, Jang Taebo threw himself between the mountains of bones and scales.

"Oh, the strength! The color!"

His eyes had gone hazy, and his voice shook. He ran his hands over the scales and stroked the bones, unable to contain his excitement.

"I'd be happy to be buried here and die! No, I want to die here!"

"Get the Old Master out of there! The pile's about to collapse!"

"Y-yes, sir!"

The Jin Dragon Squad martial artists had been staring blankly at the remains of a gigantic creature unlike anything they had ever seen. Now they rushed forward and dragged Jang Taebo out.

Only then did the old Master Artisan come to his senses. He looked at me with moist eyes.

"So everything you told me was true."

"It sounds insane, but every word of it was true."

"I thought I'd had my fill of working meteorite iron fallen from the sky and Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron…"

Jang Taebo wiped at his eyes. He sniffed, tried to compose himself, then seized my shoulder.

"Thank you. Now I can die without regrets."

I gave him a warm look.

"Don't say that. Stay healthy and live a long life. Have something nourishing simmered for yourself, too."

"You little…"

"You still have plenty of Stamina and life left to grind into the forge. Where are you trying to run off to—the afterlife?"

"You little…!"

Same words. Different feeling.

A high-quality slave this hard to acquire deserved to be put to work. Toss him a reward now and then, crack the whip when needed.

Of course, I wasn't the one holding the whip.

“Well, would you look at that. Even the second time, it’s astonishing. And there’s so much of it.”

“Speak of the whip holder.”

“Hm? What was that, my youngest?”

“Nothing, eldest brother.”

Jin Wikyung tilted his head, then laughed and patted Jang Taebo on the back.

“What do you think, Hall Master Jang? Quite a sight, isn’t it?”

“Hall Master… Jang?”

“Of course. You’re the Master of our family’s Ironcraft Hall now. That makes you Hall Master Jang. Come, let’s hear your opinion.”

The reality Jang Taebo had briefly forgotten began to sink in. His face darkened.

“There’s no question it’s extraordinary. Even at the Ironcraft Guild, with the finest artisans and materials under Heaven gathered in one place, I never saw anything like this.”

“So, can you work with it?”

“I can’t promise anything until I try. But…”

Jang Taebo studied the mountain of remains before continuing.

“The bones are far stronger than meteorite iron, though not quite as strong as Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. They should be workable.”

“And the hide and scales?”

“I made enough armor in my younger days to get sick of it. None of it was made from an imugi[2383], of course… but I’ll try.”

“Oh!”

“With this much material, there will be enough to arm every martial artist in the Jin Family of Taiyuan—or rather, in our family—and still have some left over. I should be able to show results soon, so I trust you’ll forgive the first few failures.”

“Of course.”

Among artisans, Jang Taebo held a place equal to—or perhaps higher than—the Three Saints did among martial artists.

Jin Wikyung’s face lit up at the high-quality slave’s calm, well-founded confidence.

“I’ve heard that only the finest Master Artisan of his generation can lead the Ironcraft Guild. I’m counting on you, Hall Master Jang. Whatever you need, just say the word.”

“Then assign me some artisans I can rely on, Lesser Family Head.”

“Artisans?”

“I know our family has artisans of its own. If I train them, they may not become the beams that hold up the family, but they could make sturdy pillars. However…”

[2383] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often depicted as a dragon that has yet to attain its full form.

“That would take time. Am I right?”

“Yes. I have eyes and ears, and I’ve heard what’s been happening across the world. The artisans I still keep in touch with tell me orders for weapons and armor have risen sharply.”

The war had already begun.

From the small and mid-sized sects scattered throughout Murim to the Nine Sects and One Gang,[2384] everyone wanted weapons and armor to prepare for the war that had drawn so close. The fires of the forges would not go out until the war ended.

In the current state of Murim, it was not only the flames of war that had begun to blaze fiercely.

“Time is short, Lesser Family Head.”

Jin Wikyung looked up at the sky in silence. Then he spoke.

“Hall Master Jang, how long have you been at this?”

“I started when I was shorter than your sword, Lesser Family Head. I’ve devoted my life to it.”

“Then after all those years in the trade, you must have made many friends.”

“Of course. Every one of them is a renowned artisan in their field.”

“Send messenger pigeons to everyone who comes to mind. I don’t care if it costs a fortune.”

“Everyone has something they value more than money. To an artisan like me, the body of an imugi[2385] is worth more than any fortune.”

Jang Taebo stepped back and gave Jin Wikyung a respectful martial salute.

“Jang Taebo, Master of Ironcraft Hall of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan, obeys the Lesser Family Head’s command.”

By then, the darkness had retreated and the sun was rising on a new day. The light spreading from the east looked like the glow of a forge, and the quick footsteps of the Jin Dragon Squad martial artists carrying away the Water God Dragon’s remains beat like hammers.

While fifty Jin Dragon Squad martial artists transported the Water God Dragon’s remains under Wipeng and Jang Taebo’s meticulous direction, Jin Wikyung and I returned to where we were supposed to be. There we found Zhuge Feng beside himself with excitement.

“I did it! I’m telling you, I did it!”

[2384] The Nine Sects and One Gang are a grouping of major orthodox martial-arts organizations in Murim.

[2385] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often depicted as a dragon that has yet to attain its full form.

He bounced around like a child, without a trace of the dignity expected of a clan's Family Head.

But once I saw what he'd done, I couldn't help nodding.

He blocked the magical power completely.

Unlike before, not even a trace of magical power escaped the enormous rift—or rather, the Gate.

The dogs, pigs, fish, and other animals apparently left there for testing showed an interest in it a few times, then went back to what they'd been doing.

"You really did it, Sir Zhuge," Jin Wikyung said.

A broad smile spread across Zhuge Feng's exhausted face.

"Of course I did. Even my ancestor Zhuge Wuhou[2386] couldn't have managed this. Come to think of it, he knew a thing or two about mechanisms and formations himself, but Wei still kicked his ass in the end…"

"F-Family Head!"

"What? It's true! If he really cared about the people and was such a great strategist, he should've thrown a resignation letter in that incompetent emperor's face instead of a campaign memorial, then taken the throne for himself…"

"Family Head, have you lost your mind?"

"No, Uncle. Am I wrong?"

The Zhuge Clan was a mess.

Having smeared shit all over his ancestor's reputation, the current Family Head shook off his relatives and continued proudly.

"Well? What do you think of the Demon-Sealing Formation now that you've seen it?"

"The Demon-Sealing Formation?"

Zhuge Feng nodded, pleased with himself.

"I named it. A formation that seals a demon's power. Fitting, isn't it?"

The Demon-Sealing Formation. Considering where that power came from, I couldn't think of a better name.

Not that the name mattered if the formation worked.

As I carefully examined the Demon-Sealing Formation, Jin Wikyung whispered to me.

"What do you think?"

"Of what?"

"…?"

"I'm just looking at it. How would I know?"

[2386] Zhuge Wuhou is an honorific for Zhuge Liang, chancellor of Shu Han during China's Three Kingdoms period. He fought Wei and wrote a memorial to his emperor before a military campaign.

Murim formations were much like modern magic circles. I'd encountered Magic plenty of times as a Hunter and still knew next to nothing about it. There was no way I could judge a formation at a glance.

I could at least sense the qi flowing through it.

Looks like it's drawing in qi from the natural world to block the magical power... The principle is similar to a magic circle.

Compared with modern magic circles, though, the formations I'd seen and heard about in Murim were much more limited in variety and power. Murim's emphasis on martial arts themselves probably had a lot to do with that.

They did this faster and better than I expected.

The natural qi flowing through the formation was enough to block the magical power leaking from the Gate completely. For now, it was the best solution we had.

After looking it over carefully, I turned to Zhuge Feng.

"How long will the Demon-Sealing Formation last?"

"Do you think the Yangtze will ever run dry?"

"Ah."

"It will keep drawing in the qi around it and continue operating. Assuming my theory is correct."

"And if it isn't?"

"My theory? You might as well call Zhuge Wuhou a halfwit."

Clang!

"You bastard, Zhuge Feng!"

"Great-Uncle, no! Put your sword down!"

"Someone shut the Family Head's mouth!"

The atmosphere had suddenly turned murderous.

Before blood could be spilled among the relatives, I hurried to speak to Zhuge Feng, who was using a grappling technique against the family members rushing him.

"Can you keep installing these?"

"Huh?"

"What?"

"What do you mean?"

For the benefit of the Zhuge Clan members who had stopped in their tracks, I said it again, slowly and clearly.

"Keep installing them. Dozens of times. Hundreds, if necessary."

"…!"

"…!"

The air around us instantly turned cold.

Zhuge Feng, who had been held by the collar by an old man, straightened his clothes. When he looked at me again, his eyes were steady and his voice had gone quiet.

"Now I'm curious what the Divine Dragon has in mind."

I clicked my tongue bitterly.

"It's obvious, isn't it? You already know, Sir Zhuge."

"I do. If it happened once, it could happen ten times. A hundred."

"Then we're thinking the same thing."

"I wasn't as certain as you. I was only considering every possibility."

Something unreadable flashed in Zhuge Feng's eyes.

"Why are you so certain that things like this will continue happening? What grounds do you have for speaking with such confidence?"

Plenty. I just couldn't tell him.

The Zhuge Clan might have celebrated when Zhuge Feng was born, but when I was born, all of humanity celebrated. The Demon King Asmodeus had fallen, and the long Great Cataclysm had ended.

There was no explaining the difference.

An entire lifetime—my lifetime—had passed since then. Yet Gates still existed in the modern world, and new ones kept appearing.

Once a dam starts to crack, no matter how sturdy it is, there's no telling how far the damage will spread.

That was Murim now.

I can't exactly tell them all of this.

In the end, there was only one answer I could give.

"I saw it and felt it in the memories the Water God Dragon passed on to me. Dark Heaven intended this from the start. They planned it and carried it out. And they'll keep doing it."

"You're a better liar than I expected."

"You're more suspicious than I expected."

"I can't believe you. No—that's not quite true. I don't want to."

"Zhuge Wuhou must have felt the same way. And yet he still served that stupid emperor until the very end. Even if it fucking sucks, you have to accept it."

"Even if it fucking sucks, you have to accept it…"

Zhuge Feng gave a short laugh and turned to Jin Wikyung.

"What do you think, Lesser Family Head?"

"I agree with my younger brother," Jin Wikyung said calmly.

"I do wonder what the others will think."

"Then why don't we ask them?"

“What does that mean…?”

Zhuge Feng studied Jin Wikyung. Then he murmured, “Henan.”

“Yes.”

Jin Wikyung looked into the distance.

“The New Murim Alliance.”

Chapter 501

“When is it?”

On the way back after parting with Zhuge Feng, I asked the question out of the blue. Jin Wikyung answered quietly.

“In a month. Mount Song, Henan Province.”

“Mount Song…”

The very place where Shaolin Temple—the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper[2387] of the Murim—stood.

Only three months ago, the Star-Array Grand Banquet, a grand gathering of the Murim under Heaven, had begun there. Dark Heaven had unleashed a storm of blood on that same ground. Now the New Murim Alliance would be born there.

Given the symbolism of Mount Song and Shaolin Temple, it was a fitting place for the Murim Alliance to begin again after more than fifty years.

But if there was only a month left…

“It had already been decided when you came to Sichuan, hadn’t it?”

Contrary to my expectations, Jin Wikyung gave a small shake of his head.

“It hadn’t?”

“Why do you think Wipeng happened to be in Henan at just the right time?”

“Then Great Hero Wipeng came because…”

“The Jin Dragon Squad is our family’s finest fighting force. As the Lesser Family Head, I would never summon half its members merely to serve as porters, even if they were carrying the Son of Heaven’s jade seal.[2388]”

“So the date was moved up.”

“Dark Heaven moved more aggressively, and faster, than we expected. The Sichuan Blood Tragedy was decisive.”

To catch an enemy who was ahead of you, you had to run.

The storm of blood that had swept through Shaolin Temple had spread to Sichuan and now reached Hubei. The leaders in Henan had to make a choice.

“Bringing the Murim under Heaven together is no easy task. But it seems they have finally made up their minds.”

Muttering quietly, Jin Wikyung pulled a sealed dispatch from inside his robes and held it out to me.

“What’s this?”

“A letter Wipeng brought from Henan.”

“From Henan? Did the Murim Alliance send it?”

[2387] Mount Tai and the Northern Dipper are symbols of eminence; together, they describe someone or something held in the highest regard in a field.

[2388] The emperor’s jade seal symbolized imperial authority.

"You guessed."

"I thought so. I saw you give one to Sir Zhuge earlier."

Even at a glance, it looked nothing like an ordinary letter.

But what made it special were the three characters written across its face in a bold, soaring hand:

Murim Alliance.

"Read it yourself, youngest."

"I'm already reading it, so stop talking. I can't concentrate."

"…Oh. Right."

Leaving Jin Wikyung looking dejected, I unfolded the letter and skimmed it.

It began, To the Murim under Heaven, and was short and forceful. That made it easy to sum up in three lines.

1. Hey, let me tell you about Dark Heaven. These guys are seriously fucking crazy, so listen up.
2. You remember the Great Faction War PTSD? Let's stop this by any means necessary.
3. Any dumbasses who don't know where Mount Song is? Be there by the stated date. Anyone who doesn't show up is Dark Heaven.

"…"

Put that way, it sounded pretty pathetic.

Of course, that was not what the letter actually said.

Some unknown calligrapher's bold strokes flowed like clouds. Every sentence was solemn, charged with feeling, and deeply moving.

Personally, I almost wanted to show it to that bastard, the Lord of Heaven.

If he saw this, even the Lord of Heaven might join the Murim Alliance.

Everyone could have enjoyed a happy ending if the Lord of Heaven joined the Murim Alliance. It was simply unfortunate that the possibility of that happening was less than the amount of earwax in Hyuk Mujin's ear.

"In any case, the Murim Alliance will be born soon."

"In a month, the Murim under Heaven will gather beneath the Murim Alliance's banner."

After a moment's thought, Jin Wikyung added, "Not the Murim under Heaven. I should say the orthodox Murim of the Central Plains."

I knew what he meant.

Right… It's a stretch to call the orthodox faction the whole Murim under Heaven.

The orthodox faction, led by the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families, was unquestionably the dominant force in the Murim today.

But it had not been the only side to survive the Great Faction War and emerge victorious.

"The unorthodox faction."

Jin Wikyung nodded at my mutter.

"Yes. We cannot leave them out."

The fishbowl called the world held more than one color of fish.

The unorthodox faction was weak compared to the orthodox faction, but it had carved out territories of its own. It also included the dark-path figures who ruled the streets at night.

At first, I wondered why they had left those people alive while shouting about eliminating every demonic and heterodox element.

There was a reason for everything.

The unorthodox forces still around today had survived because they sided with the orthodox faction during the Great Faction War.

The trouble was, they had not done it out of goodwill.

"Do you know why the unorthodox forces now active in the Central Plains sided with the orthodox Murim?"

"You haven't forgotten who I've spent the past year with, have you?"

"Great Hero Jeok told you."

"I picked up quite a bit."

As the old saying went, green went with green, and crayfish took the crab's side.

When the Demonic Cult crossed Qinghai and surged toward the Central Plains during the Great Faction War, the unorthodox faction quickly joined them while shouting, "Long live the Cult Leader!"

The Demonic Cult's momentum was overwhelming, but the unorthodox faction also wanted people they saw as their own kind to rule the Murim under Heaven.

For unorthodox martial artists already living in the Central Plains, though, things were different.

If they don't side with the orthodox faction, they'll be hunted down before they can even leave the Central Plains. Those bastards wouldn't dare refuse to join this side.

Jeok Cheongang had once said that with a snort. For the unorthodox martial artists of the Central Plains, it had been the plain truth.

"I heard they were practically eating dumplings through their tears."

"I did not live through that era either, but what I found confirms it."

"What you found?"

"After you left for Sichuan, I stayed in Henan and searched the old archives. There were countless records, including ones about the unorthodox faction."

The Murim Alliance had disbanded when peace returned, but the memories of those who had lived through the Great Faction War—and records of what had happened—remained.

That made sense. In the long history of the Murim, fifty years was only half a century.

"What did the records say?"

"What do you think?"

"I can guess. I've heard a few stories."

"I do not know exactly what Great Hero Jeok told you, but most of it was probably true."

"…If that's true, it's pretty damn ridiculous."

From the start of the Great Faction War well into its middle and later stages, the unorthodox martial artists who joined the orthodox faction betrayed them again and again.

Considering what Jeok Cheongang had said about the Murim Alliance's leadership even discussing root-and-branch eradication to remove every unorthodox member from within the orthodox faction, the situation must have been serious.

"But I heard they fought hard later on."

"Unlike at the beginning, neither side's victory was certain. The Hidden Shadow Pavilion, led by Sir Song, the Thousand-Faced Fox, also kept them under close watch. And according to the records, the unorthodox martial artists sensed the leadership's mood changing and began cutting off their own tails."

Not everyone in the orthodox faction was righteous, and not everyone in the unorthodox faction was a monster.

But unlike the orthodox faction, the unorthodox faction possessed the decisiveness and cruelty to cut off its own tail without hesitation.

The instant someone was suspected of being a spy for the Demonic Cult, they slit his throat first and asked questions later.

"In the end, the body survived without its tail. By cooperating with the orthodox faction, it shared in the victory."

The surviving unorthodox forces carried on in the shade of the great tree that was the orthodox faction. Naturally, they could no longer wield the influence they once had.

Their reputation had been bad enough to begin with, and there had been countless instances of them siding with the Demonic Cult.

Most people agreed that if the Murim Alliance's leaders had not acknowledged at least some of their contributions and rights, hardline heroes calling for the extermination of demonic and heterodox elements would have dragged them out and torn them limb from limb.

The contempt directed at the unorthodox faction after the war had endured like an ancient tradition.

That alone was not a serious problem. What came next was.

"We need them to fight alongside us."

"Yes. If they do not join the Murim Alliance, they will side with Dark Heaven."

"I don't like the thought of bringing them into the fold."

"They are not people I would want to trust with my back on a battlefield. There is the precedent, and they must have spent decades resenting how honors and rewards were divided after the war."

"What if we tell them to stay neutral?"

"Suppose the Murim Alliance looks certain to lose. What would you do if you were an unorthodox martial artist, youngest?"

"…Hmm."

Put that bluntly, I had no answer. I smacked my lips before speaking.

"I hate to say it, but I'd side with Dark Heaven."

"Why?"

"If the Murim Alliance wins, they break even. But as you said, the scales are already tilted, and Dark Heaven is on the verge of becoming the master of the Central Plains Murim."

"Exactly."

"And what kind of people are Dark Heaven? They wouldn't leave the unorthodox faction alone. They wouldn't praise them for staying neutral—they'd be furious they hadn't helped when it mattered and kill every last one of them."

"Precisely. That is why the unorthodox faction is a chicken rib."

A chicken rib. That was a good way to put it.

It offered little benefit, but it was too wasteful to throw away. Fighting alongside them felt unpleasant, but if we discarded them, Dark Heaven would pick them up and throw them back at us.

No matter how soft a chicken bone was, it was still a bone. Getting hit by one would hurt quite a bit.

Which meant…

"Henan has already sent them a letter too, hasn't it?"

Jin Wikyung gave a small nod.

"Without a doubt. If we must choose between the two, we need to draw the unorthodox Murim to our side."

For a chicken rib, the unorthodox faction had plenty of meat on it.

Even the dark-path knife-men who wandered the back alleys after sunset belonged to the unorthodox faction. Weren't we at a point where we would be grateful for a single Third Rate knife-man?

More importantly, it was better to keep them close and hold their leash than let them side with Dark Heaven. That would be far too great a loss…

Wait. Dark-path figures?

Something came back to me, and I frowned.

"What is it?"

"No, I just remembered something I heard recently. Regarding the Water God Dragon incident, didn't we accuse the dark-path figures of Hubei Province of being the culprits and wipe them all out?"

"We did."

"…Then the unorthodox faction might be upset. In the end, we accepted the government's proposal and wiped out their own people."

It was a bad look. They might even reject the Murim Alliance's offer of membership over it.

Jin Wikyung, however, looked perfectly calm.

"Two things are wrong with that."

"What?"

"First, the unorthodox Murim has been fractured since the war ended. Those people were rivals, not family. We used this opportunity to uproot the unusually numerous dark-path figures in Hubei. Other unorthodox forces will move into the space they left. For them, it is a new opportunity."

"…!"

"We have given them enough to feed on. They will be satisfied. And when they hear what happened in Hubei, they will understand that it was also a warning."

We had thrown them food and fastened a leash of fear around their necks.

That was how the Murim Alliance tamed the hunting dog known as the unorthodox Murim.

"And second. The government did not make the proposal and receive our acceptance."

Jin Wikyung's voice went dry.

"We did. No—I made the proposal first."

"Oh."

"The government merely accepted it. That distinction matters a great deal."

"…The government agreed that easily?"

"The Provincial Administration Commissioner of Hubei holds a post that can sway an entire province. But people know only that the new commissioner formerly served as an Assistant Provincial Administrator in Shanxi Province. They do not know he is a secret loyal retainer of Prince Shangshan."

A memory of when we had first arrived in Hubei suddenly flashed through my mind.

The hostile looks from the people. And Jin Wikyung questioning the official who had surrounded the ferry landing with government soldiers.

"By the way, do you know a man surnamed Yi whose given name is Hongcheon?"

“H-he was recently appointed Provincial Administration Commissioner. May I ask what your relationship with him is…?”

“I have met him a few times and shared a drink or two. I helped him when he needed it.”

Jin Wikyung looked straight at me. His gaze was gentle, but a cold blade lay behind it.

For an instant, I saw the strategist and politician in him. Then that look melted away.

“Do not worry. Everything will work out.”

Tap, tap.

I could feel the strength in the hand patting my shoulder. I gazed silently at Jin Wikyung, then suddenly spoke.

“What was the Family Head… No, what was Father like?”

The faint smile on Jin Wikyung’s lips vanished.

“No, the mood was so nice. Why bring up that bastard?”

“As you know, I hurt my head back then. I don’t remember him very well.”

“You don’t need to remember him! Just erase him from your mind! I’m your father!”

“…”

I knew he had grievances, but apparently there were more than I had realized.

Jin Wikyung’s fist trembled, as if he were remembering the paperwork hell of those days.

“But why do you ask?”

“No reason. I was just thinking how lucky it is that you took charge of the family after Father disappeared.”

“…Youngest. Please don’t cross the line.”

I shrugged and turned away.

Jin Wikyung asked where I thought I was going when hyung[2389] was talking to me, and whether my affection for him had cooled. Without turning around, I answered,

“You said it’s in a month. I’m going to get ready to leave.”

It was time to leave Hubei behind.

With the people who were by my side, and whom I wanted beside me in the days to come.

“I think I’ve given you enough time by now… Don’t you?”

The mutter that slipped between my lips vanished without a trace beneath the noise around us.

[2389] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

I scratched my chin and looked up at the dizzyingly high cliff.

Chapter 502

“Here you are.”

At the sudden voice behind him, the old man sitting cross-legged with his eyes closed twitched his brow.

“I don’t recall inviting anyone.”

“Not my problem. Still, it’s narrower than I expected. Absurdly so.”

“It has to be narrow. I didn’t set aside any room for uninvited guests.”

“Was it around seven days and nights ago? I’m sure I said something similar to someone…”

For some reason, the old man’s small back shuddered at those words.

Before his uninvited guest could wonder why, a sharp voice cut through the cave.

“Leave. You’re disturbing my meditation.”

“Continue your meditation. I’ll personally stand guard for you.”

The old man—Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King—opened his eyes.

The darkness gave way to damp cave walls mottled with moss. A testy voice escaped between his tightly pressed lips.

“You expect this old man to let the Slaughter Saint stand guard over him? What a ridiculous joke.”

“I thought you could trust me with an old man’s life, if not your precious Disciple’s. Was I mistaken?”

“…!”

Jeok Cheongang’s eyelids trembled. Then—

Shuuk.

Still sitting cross-legged, his small figure rose into the air, turned slowly, and landed facing the cave entrance.

Jeok Cheongang silently stared at the man blocking the narrow cave entrance before asking, “How did you know I was here?”

Mungyeong answered dryly. “When I came up, a great tiger walked over and rubbed its head against me. It had clearly done that before.”

“I left no tracks.”

“Finding people used to be my work.”

“So you can pretend to be a medical apprentice all you like, but you’re still an assassin?”

“There are things you can’t forget, however hard you try. That’s all. There are eyes everywhere, and nothing but river around us. You didn’t have many places to go.”

A fine sword kept its edge no matter how many years passed.

More than forty years had passed, and the blade called the Slaughter Saint was as sharp as ever. No—his instincts as an assassin might have dulled, but his realm as a martial artist had risen higher.

"…Perhaps I should have found somewhere harder to reach."

"It would have taken me a little longer."

Assassins were masters of both killing and pursuit.

Reading the confidence in Mungyeong's calm expression, Jeok Cheongang muttered, "Damn it. What an irritating assassin."

"I can hear you."

"I meant you to."

"Cursing me out of nowhere. What a foul-tempered host."

"Are you any better, barging in on someone's secluded meditation without warning?"

"The Fire King, in secluded meditation."

Mungyeong's flat voice echoed through the cave.

He looked around. The place was so cramped and damp that calling it a cave seemed generous. Apart from the old man sitting cross-legged, it held nothing at all.

Which made the signs on that one man impossible to miss.

Jeok Cheongang. He's…

Cracked lips. Knobby bones standing out beneath his skin. Mungyeong's gaze darkened as he took in Jeok Cheongang's condition.

From his gaunt appearance, he clearly hadn't eaten a thing in seven days and nights—not even taken a drop of water. Even for a Supreme Peak master, that would take a toll.

"You're doing something foolish."

Jeok Cheongang understood what Mungyeong meant. A fierce light shone from his sunken eyes.

"I'll give you your own words back. Not your problem."

"What about the fasting pills?"

"I'm not eating them. They taste like shit."

"…Did you take after him in that, too?"

"What?"

"Nothing."

He'd said something pointless. Almost as pointless as Jeok Cheongang's flimsy claim that he refused the fasting pills because they tasted bad.

Mungyeong shook his head. "As a medical apprentice, I'm telling you this is a poor choice."

"And as this old man, I'm telling you to mind your own business."

“You’re even more stubborn than I expected.”

“And you’re more meddlesome than I expected. Since when did you care so much about other people’s business?”

“That…”

Mungyeong fell silent. He wanted to argue, but nothing came to mind. That was as good as admitting Jeok Cheongang had a point.

Maybe he isn’t entirely wrong.

He hadn’t been like this when he left Sichuan. Somewhere along the way, though, he had begun to change, little by little.

To fool the people watching him, he had played an innocent young medical apprentice who smiled and talked freely. But when he was alone with Jeok Cheongang or Jin Taekyung, he had no reason to keep up an act that didn’t suit him.

So why did he feel so talkative today?

No. Perhaps it wasn’t only today.

Why?

He remembered accepting Jeok Cheongang’s absurd proposal seven days and nights ago. He remembered, too, the indescribable bitterness on the old man’s face as he spoke.

Mungyeong opened his mouth.

“Why don’t you ask?”

“Ask what?”

“About Jin Taekyung.”

“…!”

Now it was Jeok Cheongang’s turn to fall silent.

He had tried so hard to avoid that name. He had hoped Mungyeong would let it pass unspoken. Hearing it was enough to stir the feelings he had forced down.

“That boy… Is he doing well?”

“He’s keeping up, more or less. Not bad.”

Jeok Cheongang couldn’t hold back a hollow laugh.

“Why are you laughing?”

“Because I know that’s nonsense. ‘More or less’? That’s the funniest thing I’ve heard in a while.”

“…”

“Never mind me. Tell me what you really think.”

Mungyeong studied him. “His progress is astonishingly fast. Enough to surprise even me.”

“I said to tell me what you really think.”

“That is what I think.”

“Half of it. You left out the part where you want him for yourself.”

“…”

“Yes. It was always like that.”

A faint smile touched Jeok Cheongang’s lips.

From the day he first met Jin Taekyung, every day had brought a new surprise. With a Heaven-given physique and extraordinary martial talent, Taekyung was someone any Supreme Peak master who had established martial arts of his own would want as a Disciple.

Jeok Cheongang was no exception.

“When I first got to know Taekyung, a thought struck me. If I passed the Fire Gate Clan’s martial arts on to this boy, perhaps he might see the very limits of martial arts.”

The Fire Gate Clan needed someone to carry on a lineage hundreds of years old, and Jin Taekyung fit that need better than anyone else.

That was how it had started.

“At first, I was simply amazed. Then I felt regret. I didn’t have much time left.”

Alone, he had defeated a thousand Demonic Cult martial artists and brought countless fiends to their knees. By the strength of his own martial arts, he had turned the tide of battle and led the charge toward victory in the Great Faction War.

Yet the Supreme Peak master revered throughout Murim as the Fire King had another, truer enemy.

“It was long ago that the Heart Demon[2390] came for me.”

The wound left by his first Disciple ran deep. It ate away at the body and mind of the Master left alone. Little by little, slowly, without ever stopping.

“It was strange. Everything else kept moving forward, while I alone was walking backward.”

The years flew like an arrow. By the time it struck its target, more than thirty had passed.

Jeok Cheongang had let them flow downriver without gaining the slightest enlightenment. Then, one day, he came face-to-face with something he could scarcely believe.

“It was a clear blue day. I was enjoying the cool breeze, and then I came to my senses among a crowd of people. Half a day had passed, and I knew nothing of it. Heh.”

He had laughed like that on the day the infirmities of old age first came upon him.

He had laughed neither from happiness nor from resignation. He simply had not known what else to do.

[2390] Simma, literally “heart demon,” refers to inner turmoil that impedes a martial artist’s cultivation.

It was only when that first lost half-day became two full days that Jeok Cheongang knew what he had to do.

“I left Mount Jiuhua to kill one person.”

And returned with one person.

“He was my first Disciple. I had to deal with him myself before it was too late.”

After meeting Jin Taekyung, though, Jeok Cheongang had realized that wasn’t the only thing he had left too late.

“Slaughter Saint. May I ask you for another favor?”

His gaze and tone had changed. Both were gentler than Mungyeong had ever known them.

“If I am not here, become that boy’s dependable shelter. Become his new Master.”

A deep furrow formed on Mungyeong’s smooth forehead. He stared at Jeok Cheongang through narrowed eyes.

“Do you mean that?”

“More than anything I have ever said.”

“Why?”

“Just as I said. I have no time left.”

“What is this…”

A new Master, out of nowhere? No time left?

Mungyeong knew Jeok Cheongang’s condition, but he couldn’t make sense of this. His innate qi, the source of everything, had been disrupted. He would gradually lose his strength, but that should have taken years.

This was too soon.

“I ask this of you.”

“…!”

Jeok Cheongang bowed his head. The Fire King himself.

Mungyeong was bewildered by a sight no one else in Murim had ever witnessed.

“Why? Seven days and nights ago, you were clearly…”

Mungyeong’s voice cut off abruptly. He swallowed the rest of his words and silently stared at the ripples stirring in Jeok Cheongang’s eyes.

A thought struck him in the suffocating silence.

So that’s it. That’s what happened.

If he was right, it explained everything: Jeok Cheongang’s excessive worry, his disappearance from Jin Taekyung and the others, and his strange reactions throughout their conversation.

“It wasn’t seven days and nights ago, was it?”

“No. It was definitely seven days and nights ago.”

Jeok Cheongang smiled bitterly.

“But to me, those seven days and nights were only five days.”

Time flowed equally for everyone. Not everyone experienced it equally.

The first uninvited guest, arriving a step ahead of Mungyeong, had been the infirmities of old age. They had stolen two days from Jeok Cheongang and fled.

“…When did it start?”

“Sichuan.”

“Sichuan? But when I took your pulse, you were clearly…”

“The symptoms appeared immediately after I left Sichuan. After that, I did my best to avoid you.”

Why had he hidden it? Why?

The question died on Mungyeong’s tongue. He already knew.

How small a person felt when they first realized they had grown old. How frightening it was to realize their mind had begun to come and go with the infirmities of old age.

Seeing Mungyeong fall silent, Jeok Cheongang gave a rueful smile.

“Even if I’d come to tell you, nothing would have changed. I know my own body. You may be the Divine Physician, with medical skill that reaches Heaven, but even you can’t stop innate qi once it starts leaking away.”

“…”

“At first, my memory grew hazy. Then one day, moments were missing from my day. I knew what it meant because I’d been through it before.”

Those moments became the time it took to drink a cup of tea. That became fifteen minutes. Now it was two days.

Jeok Cheongang had searched desperately for a way to stop it, to no avail.

“Acquired qi from elixirs can’t restore a balance that’s already been broken. That left me one choice.”

“…Enlightenment.”

“Yes. Enlightenment.”

“So that’s why you began this secluded meditation.”

“I wanted to live as the Fire King Jeok Cheongang. Not as an old man with infirmities who cannot even remember his own name, but as the current Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan and someone’s Master.”

His desolate voice echoed through the cave. Drops gathered on the damp ceiling and fell, like an old man’s tears.

Chapter 503

A curse laid upon him by time.

The infirmities of old age.

Mungyeong silently rolled the words over his tongue. They left a dry, bitter taste, though he never spoke them aloud. Jeok Cheongang's voice was just as bitter.

"I intend to leave. I'll rest my body and mind at Mount Jiuhua."

"…!"

"If anyone understands why, it's you. Please don't try to stop me."

Just as Jeok Cheongang said, Mungyeong knew exactly why he wanted to leave.

He's afraid of becoming a burden.

The infirmities of old age would come for Jeok Cheongang again and again. If his mind went hazy at a crucial moment, everyone beside him would be in danger.

His enemies feared the Fire King Jeok Cheongang, not an old man who couldn't remember his own name or where he lived.

More precisely, he's afraid his Disciple will be in danger.

Everyone had something precious they could not afford to lose.

To a beggar begging in the marketplace, a half-crushed dumpling was his life. To an emperor who commanded all the civil and military officials, the jade seal symbolizing his authority and power was more precious than a thousand or ten thousand subjects.

Jin Taekyung was that precious to Jeok Cheongang.

Someone he would trade his life for. Someone he could not lose, no matter what.

"You're awfully fond of your Disciple."

"My Disciple. Yes, my Disciple."

"If you're going to spout the same nonsense you did last time, spare me."

Jeok Cheongang gave a bitter smile at Mungyeong's hard tone.

"No, you're right. He's this old man's one and only Disciple."

"So you think you're a burden to him? You're so afraid of that you'd leave him of your own accord?"

"It's the only choice. I'm doing it for the boy."

"There are other choices. The imugi's[2391] inner core you obtained, for one."

"You know as well as I do that acquired qi from elixirs can't cure this. Besides…"

Jeok Cheongang looked down at his wrinkled hands and muttered,

"This old man has grown too old. Even if the imugi's[2392] inner core could help, I can't use it on an old man like me on the slim chance that it might work."

[2391] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent often associated with dragons.

[2392] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent often associated with dragons.

"…!"

"Patch the bottom of an old boat, and water will still leak through somewhere else in the hull. But the boy—my Disciple—is different."

Light entered his downcast eyes. Joy and hope. Mungyeong could see everything Jeok Cheongang felt for his Disciple in them.

"I have no choice. Please grant this old man's request, so I can leave with peace of mind."

"…You have no choice. Is that what you're saying?"

"Will you look after the boy for me again?"

Mungyeong stared at him for a moment, then said, "Take a boat east from Zhejiang and you'll come to a small island country."

"An island country?"

"You must have heard the name. The Wa Kingdom.[2393]"

"…?"

"You haven't?"

Jeok Cheongang blinked at the sudden question.

"Of course I have. Wa pirates have been coming here to raid us for ages."

"Have you ever seen one?"

"No, but I hear they're strange-looking fellows. They carry swords as long as their own bodies, shave half their foreheads back, and walk around wearing rags like undergarments."

"Whoever told you got it right."

"But why bring this up all of a—"

"A long time ago," Mungyeong cut in, "I fought the finest ninja in the Wa Kingdom."

Jeok Cheongang had heard of ninjas. They were much like the assassins of the Central Plains: not especially skilled in martial arts, but excellent at concealment techniques and at using hidden weapons such as throwing blades.

"There's no need to ask how it turned out. So are you boasting that you killed the finest ninja in the Wa Kingdom?"

"I didn't kill him. My objective was to capture him alive."

A captured target had two choices: speak after a little pain, or speak after terrible pain.

No matter which one he chose, death waited at the end. In the end, the difference was only how painfully he died.

"He chose the latter."

[2393] Wa (倭) was a historical name used in China and Korea for Japan.

As befitted the Wa Kingdom's finest ninja, he held out for quite some time. Unfortunately for him, Salcheonmun—the sect Mungyeong belonged to then—was unquestionably the finest assassin sect in the Central Plains.

They used every torture method they knew. Amid pain worse than death, the ninja was forced to spit out every piece of information he possessed. Not just information, but every memory buried in his mind.

"That was when I heard about a custom in the Wa Kingdom."

"A custom?"

"Did you know some people there abandon their elderly parents in the mountains?"

"…I can't say I'm surprised, but those bastards ought to make heaven and earth furious."

"I was told it was to have fewer mouths to feed. They leave their parents there without caring whether they starve or get torn apart by wild animals. They're too old to work anymore."

Abandoning the parents who had raised them simply because they had grown old—if it was true, those people were vicious beyond belief.

Commoners sometimes broke even the bonds between parent and child during terrible disasters. But for it to be a custom was another matter entirely.

Mungyeong continued flatly. "The ninja I captured said he'd abandoned his mother the same way. What do you think she said to her son as he left her deep in the mountains?"

"You fucking bastard."

"…"

"You motherless bastard."

Seeing Mungyeong's face harden until it was stiffer than Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, Jeok Cheongang continued with a laugh in his voice.

"That boy Taekyung would answer like that. But she was different. A mother doesn't stop caring for her child so easily, even when he abandons her. So what did she say?"

"She told him to go slowly. It might get dark and he could fall, so he shouldn't hurry. He should watch his step on the mountain path."

Jeok Cheongang could understand what that mother had felt. His decision to leave was rooted in something similar.

He wasn't being abandoned like the mother in Mungyeong's story, but he, too, wanted to go before he became a burden to someone precious.

And if the Slaughter Saint is telling this old man such a story…

Relief and bitterness mingled in his eyes as he looked at Mungyeong.

"May I take that to mean you'll grant my request?"

Mungyeong always called himself a medical apprentice. Jeok Cheongang thought he had brought up a past he hated remembering to compare him to the ninja's mother—and, in doing so, tacitly accept his proposal.

Then Mungyeong shook his head.

"What does that mean?"

"I thought shaking one's head meant the same thing everywhere, in every age. Is it different in the Fire Gate Clan?"

"Then why tell me that story…?"

"I forgot to tell you the ending. The ninja's mother lived out her natural lifespan and was buried in a sunny spot. Her last words brought her unfilial son to his senses, and he went back and brought her home."

"…!"

At that moment, Jeok Cheongang's body abruptly froze.

At last he understood what Mungyeong had been telling him. How foolish the thought that had consumed him was.

Even as she was being abandoned, the ninja's mother worried about her son. And I was going to leave that boy of my own accord.

Jeok Cheongang hadn't wanted to burden Jin Taekyung, his one and only Disciple. That was all.

But this wasn't a selfless act for his Disciple's sake. It was the stubborn delusion of a proud old man thinking only of himself.

When had it been? He remembered a conversation he had shared with Jin Taekyung one ordinary day at Mount Jiuhua, when they had lain side by side on a broad rock.

You're holding up better than I expected. Is your body made of iron?

I'm Iron Man.

For spouting nonsense, I'm adding two hundred geun[2394] of iron balls.

…Ah.

Ha! I'm joking. Strange. I've grown so used to your nonsense that it doesn't even annoy me anymore.

It's fine. Put the iron balls on me later.

Must you make me say it twice? I said I was joking.

I'm serious.

Hmm?

There'll be plenty of people stronger than me once we leave. I don't want to be treated like a burden later on for no reason. They say the iron balls weigh less if you put them on early, so just add them.

Look at you. Add two hundred geun, and you think you'll never be a burden?

[2394] Wa (倭) was a historical name used in China and Korea for Japan.

No, but I should at least try as hard as I can. That way, if I collapse someday, you'll pick me up, won't you, Old Master?

Now you're proudly calling yourself a burden. Fine. If this old man does that, what will you do for me?

If you ever collapse, Old Master, I'll carry you on my back.

Hah. You think this old man will collapse?

If you get tired, I could at least support you, couldn't I? So tell me when it gets hard.

…I hear you're an arrogant, impertinent brat. Five hundred geun of iron balls added.

Are you insane, human?

It had been an ordinary conversation on an unremarkable day.

Yet Jeok Cheongang had often thought back to it. How he'd barked at the boy, turned away, and let out a quiet laugh. How he'd added more iron balls, then hidden nearby to watch, worried the boy might hurt himself.

Even now, at this very moment, Jin Taekyung's voice from that day echoed in Jeok Cheongang's ears like a distant refrain.

If you ever collapse, Old Master, I'll carry you on my back.

He had always pictured himself in front, Taekyung behind him. All the more reason he could never collapse.

If you get tired, I could at least support you, couldn't I?

He hadn't wanted Taekyung to see him stagger, either. Like every father, he wanted to be invincible, at least to him.

It had been the same on the day he charged forward ready to die.

Dance of the Fire God and Demon… That's a pretty cool name.

Y-you bastard, how did you—

You should've crushed his head. Made sure of it.

Cough!

Old Master!

But Jeok Cheongang wasn't invincible.

Only after waking from his long sleep did he learn what his Disciple had endured with his fallen, pitiful Master on his back. How many times Taekyung had risked his precious life and fought through desperate odds.

So Jeok Cheongang had resolved never to collapse again. Never to become a burden that put his Disciple in danger.

But he had been wrong.

We were walking side by side. Following the same path, from the beginning until now. Always together.

One thought filled his mind.

Then dark, damp memories surged from the depths of his past and clouded his vision.

Fwoosh!

Countless memories and emotions stretched back to a beggar boy struggling to pick up a single dumpling.

Rage and despair. Sorrow and guilt. They crashed over Jeok Cheongang like waves and gripped his entire body.

But why did he feel no pain?

The tightness in his chest that always came when he recalled the past was gone. So was the headache that felt as if it would split his skull.

What is this?

For the first time in a very long while, he felt at peace. A cool breeze brushed against him from somewhere, carrying voices with it.

Oh, that feels good.

Ahem. This is the finest auspicious site on Mount Jiuhua, personally selected by this old man.

"This rock is practically a Jangsu stone bed.[2395] Five stars."

Ahem!

Warmth. Brilliant light seeped in.

The darkness that had crouched deep in Jeok Cheongang's heart for decades was slowly scattering.

The Heart Demon.

That was the name of the darkness he carried within himself, the chain that had bound him. And all it took to drive it away was a cool breeze on a clear day at Mount Jiuhua, and someone's voice.

Fwoosh!

Old Master.

Light swallowed the darkness. Swallowed the Heart Demon. Though his eyes were closed, everything around him shone so brightly it dazzled him.

A faint smile touched Jeok Cheongang's wrinkled lips.

Yes.

His snow-white hair stirred in a breeze that had blown from somewhere. It was neither an illusion nor a mistake.

Fwoooosh!

At last, the giant had broken his chains and risen to his feet. Wind poured from the Fire King Jeok Cheongang and swept out in every direction.

[2395] Jangsu is a Korean stone-bed brand; Taekyung compares the rock to one of its beds and gives it a five-star rating.

Chapter 504

Enlightenment comes when you least expect it.

When you have forgotten everything around you in a state of selflessness. When death is right before your eyes. Or when you finally cast off the chains that have bound your body and mind for decades.

That was how enlightenment came.

Fwooooooosh!

A wind of qi surged from one man and swept in every direction.

The cave interior was dark, deprived of even a ray of light, but it was now brightly illuminated by a halo of light.

Mungyeong watched the strange sight in silence. Then the boy spoke softly.

“Have you finally escaped your Heart Demon[2396]?”

He hadn’t set out to bring this about. He had only wanted Jeok Cheongang to know that he wasn’t alone. That he didn’t have to isolate himself and carry every worry and burden on his own.

The result had gone beyond anything Mungyeong expected.

The Supreme Peak master known as the Fire King had broken the chains that had bound him for so many years and was stepping into a new realm.

“Seems I wasn’t meddling for nothing after all.”

Complex emotions mingled in Mungyeong’s eyes as he murmured to himself.

He didn’t know why he had sought out Jeok Cheongang or helped a man he barely knew.

No—even if he did know, he would have pretended otherwise. That was the kind of person he was. It was how he had lived his entire life.

But…

It doesn’t feel so bad.

Mungyeong didn’t realize that a faint smile had crossed his lips.

Nor did he know that the same thing had happened once before, a few days ago.

The smile had come and gone too quickly for him to notice. He slowly turned and stepped out of the cramped cave into the world beyond.

Whoosh.

As if on cue, a breeze from outside blew past, stirring his hair and tickling his nose.

Mungyeong gazed silently at the thick grass and flowers around the cave, then at the wild animals that had gathered there. At last, he spoke.

[2396] A Heart Demon is an inner obsession or psychological obstacle that can hinder a martial artist’s progress.

“Someone will have to stand guard. If those animals wander into the cave without knowing any better, all the enlightenment he worked so hard to attain will go to waste.”

Squeak?

A fawn grazing beside its sleeping mother pricked up its ears.

Under the animals’ wary, curious gazes, Mungyeong looked up at the blue sky.

“It’s a beautiful day. I can’t stay cooped up in a cave in weather like this.”

Step.

Muttering as if to himself, Mungyeong began to walk, neither quickly nor slowly.

The wind blew once more, as though seeing him off while he left the cave behind and disappeared.

Whoosh.

A clear sky without a single cloud. A cool breeze. Wild animals lying together among the grass and flowers, enjoying the sunlight.

And…

Someone lingering outside, unable to bring himself to go in.

Master and Disciple alike.

No matter how he looked at it, those two were alike.

Two butterflies fluttered down and landed on Mungyeong’s shoulder as he smiled without a sound.

It was truly a beautiful day.

The fawn had only recently been born, and it was curious about everything.

It bounded after butterflies and stuck its black nose into the thick grass and flowers to sniff them.

As always, it soon lost interest and wandered off in search of something else to do.

Squeak?

This time was different.

The cave’s pitch-black entrance drew it in, while its mother slept, worn out from caring for it.

Most importantly, the strange two-legged animal it had never seen before had disappeared into the distance.

Squeak.

What’s in there? I want to go inside.

Squeak!

All right. Let’s go!

But the fawn's firm resolve lasted only as long as it took to nibble a few mouthfuls of grass.

Step.

Someone approached, and a shadow fell over its round head.

The fawn startled and backed away. A large figure appeared in its black eyes.

"Not right now. We'll go in later."

The stranger stroked the frightened fawn's head, then stared at the pitch-black cave.

The stranger's gaze was so profoundly somber that the fawn, which had instinctively been about to wake its mother, swallowed its cry.

Squeeeeak.

"That's right. Good. Now go back to your mother."

The figure watched the fawn tilt its head and approach its sleeping mother, then straightened from his bent posture.

His steps toward the cave were steady. The wind blurred his voice.

"Now… I should go, too."

The path to the cave was long.

A year and several months had passed since the old man and the young man first met. After taking the long way around, they could finally meet again.

Not one in front and the other behind, but side by side, shoulder to shoulder.

"When the hell is Jin Taekyung coming?"

At Gung Gibang's irritated complaint, Hyuk Mujin clicked his tongue.

"Tsk, tsk. With a temper that impatient, how are you ever going to beg? Try waiting patiently for once."

"Listen to the way that Hyuk bastard talks. Beggars aren't allowed to be impatient?"

"You need patience if you want someone to give you even one iron coin."

"Was it the Hyuk Family Textile Shop? Want me to send a hundred thousand Beggars' Sect disciples over to take a shit there, one by one?"

"…Let's leave family out of this."

"Then watch your mouth. My boys might not have money, but you think they don't have shit?"

Hyuk Mujin looked at him in disgust.

"You're driving me crazy. I just ate, so why the hell are you talking about shit? We have to board the ship soon, too."

"So before the Hyuk Family Textile Shop gets covered in shit—"

“Ah, I said stop! Hearing about food after talking about eating shit is making my stomach turn!”

“…?”

“…?”

As the two men tilted their heads, sensing something was wrong, Jin Wikyung addressed someone nearby.

“Tell me, are you certain he’ll be here soon?”

Mungyeong, the young medical apprentice known as the Divine Physician’s Disciple, bowed politely.

“Yes. Young Master Jin said so himself.”

“We need to leave before sunset…”

Jin Wikyung murmured as he gazed at the sky slowly turning red.

The ceremony declaring the new Murim Alliance in Henan was only about a month away. They had to set out now and keep up a good pace if they were to arrive on time, allowing for anything that might happen along the way.

No. I should be grateful Great Hero Jeok is coming with us at all.

Rumors had been swirling about Jeok Cheongang, who had shut himself away for seven days and nights.

Some said, hopefully, that he had finally found a clue to enlightenment. Others made the impious suggestion that something might be wrong with his health. Still others insisted he simply had no particular reason to show himself.

Jin Wikyung didn’t know which of the three was true, but he had certainly worried in private.

I was afraid he might refuse to join the Murim Alliance… It seems my youngest managed to persuade him.

Most martial artists of the orthodox faction had forgotten it, but the Fire King Jeok Cheongang had never belonged to the orthodox, unorthodox, or Demonic factions. He stood between the orthodox and unorthodox factions.

That independence was the foundation of the Fire Gate Clan, which had preserved its lineage through one-person succession for hundreds of years. Each Sect Leader had defended its position outside every faction with overwhelming martial might.

Especially since it was Great Hero Jeok.

Even a child with a runny nose knew that the Fire King Jeok Cheongang had helped the orthodox faction and led it to victory in the Great Faction War.

But few people knew that this Supreme Peak master from two generations ago had been deeply disappointed by the orthodox faction both during and after the war.

“Come to think of it, I’m reminded of something my grandfather once said about Senior Jeok.”

Zhuge Feng had come out to see them off. At his words, Jin Wikyung's ear twitched.

"About Great Hero Jeok?"

"Yes."

"I've heard the previous Family Head was wise and had remarkable insight. May I ask what he said?"

"Well, I heard it in the Family Head's hall when I was thirteen."

"I see. And what did he say…?"

"I remember it clearly. My grandfather was talking about the Great Faction War. Ah, have you heard how the members of our family played a major role in the great battle in Sichuan?"

Crack.

Zhuge Feng, who had been leisurely fanning himself, suddenly stopped.

He glanced back and forth between Jin Wikyung's tightly clenched fist and his flushed face, then slowly lowered the fan.

Jin Wikyung's martial arts were in no way inferior, but even his appearance alone made him little different from a human weapon.

Besides, with the priceless Water God Dragon's corpse in his hands, was he not the one holding all the cards?

Zhuge Feng discreetly gauged the mood, cleared his throat, and continued.

"Ahem. In any case, I asked him first. I asked when he thought the tide had first begun to turn in favor of the orthodox faction."

Jin Wikyung's voice was low and level.

"Was it because the Zhuge Clan played such an important role in the great battle in Sichuan?"

"No! That wasn't it! It really wasn't!"

"That's a relief. Please continue."

Zhuge Feng began speaking while glancing sideways at the clenched fist.

"It was the first and last time I ever saw my grandfather think so long over a question. Can you guess what he finally said, Lesser Family Head?"

"You said it was connected to Great Hero Jeok… Perhaps it was the great battle in Shaanxi. I've heard the other Seniors distinguished themselves there, but Great Hero Jeok's achievements were truly astounding."

The battle in Shaanxi that Jin Wikyung had mentioned was one of the particularly brilliant victories among the countless battles of the blood-soaked Great Faction War.

Jin Wikyung had given his answer some thought, but Zhuge Feng let out a quiet laugh and shook his head.

"Wrong."

“Then what was it?”

“Anhui.”

“Anhui… You mean that?”

“That’s right. No one expected the Demonic Cult’s elite Black Wind Corps—a thousand men marching across Anhui—to be wiped out by one man. Not even my grandfather.”

Jin Wikyung nodded.

On the day Mount Jiuhua was engulfed in flames, an unknown old man living in obscurity became known as the Fire King, while the Demonic Cult lost an elite strike force that had accumulated countless achievements since the beginning of the Great Faction War.

“That makes sense. It was when Great Hero Jeok first emerged into the world.”

“But if not for my wise and perceptive grandfather’s judgment, not only would the Black Wind Corps not have been annihilated, Senior Jeok would never have gained the title of Fire King.”

“What do you mean…?”

Zhuge Feng looked around, then lowered his voice as much as possible.

“At the time, every road through Anhui was open to the Black Wind Corps. They had no reason to pass through Mount Jiuhua.”

“Wait. Then do you mean…?”

“My grandfather never forgot anything he had seen once. This was no different. He remembered a record about a one-person sect in our family’s archives, one describing events from more than a hundred years ago.”

“…!”

“Heh heh. It was a bold gamble, but it worked. A stratagem to put even Zhuge Wuhou[2397] to shame, wouldn’t you say?”

As Zhuge Feng casually put his own clan’s ancestor to shame, a deep voice reached his ear.

“So that’s what happened.”

“…Huh?”

Zhuge Feng turned in bewilderment and saw him.

“Zhuge Clan, assemble.”

A middle-aged man was approaching from far beyond the distance his voice should have carried.

And walking beside him, shoulder to shoulder, was a young man.

[2397] Zhuge Wuhou is an honorific title for Zhuge Liang, a renowned strategist of China’s Three Kingdoms period.

Chapter 505

Returned to Youth was the realm every martial artist in Murim dreamed of reaching.

When immense internal energy combined with enlightenment, the body was remade, restoring the youth it had once possessed.

But if Returned to Youth were easy, countless martial artists wouldn't have died dreaming of it. It was impossible without Heaven's help. And walking beside me now was a man who, after long years of painstaking effort, had finally received that stroke of heavenly luck.

"Zhuge Clan, assemble."

Blazing red hair streamed in the wind. A solid frame of taut muscle stood nearly seven feet tall, and his voice had the weight of an iron club.

…I really can't get used to this.

Could a person change that much? The longer I looked, the stranger I felt.

The Fire King Jeok Cheongang I knew had been a short, impossibly old man who stood barely five feet tall. He had looked like he could hardly grow any older—not like a fit middle-aged man who appeared to be in his mid-to-late forties.

Jeok Cheongang noticed me staring. He stopped walking and muttered under his breath.

"Why? Why are you looking at me again?"

"I mean, come on. How did this happen? How old were you when you looked like this?"

"I was probably not yet sixty. My hair was never red, though. Not once."

"How did you get so much shorter as you aged? I know people shrink, but… did someone cut off your legs when you were around eighty?"

"No one cut off mine. I could cut off the legs of a certain bastard who's been running his mouth since earlier, though."

Jeok Cheongang glared at me, then smacked his lips.

"Anyway, stop looking at me like that. Even this old man isn't used to it yet."

"If you're not used to it yourself—wait. It feels weird calling you Old Master now."

"Then what will you call me?"

"Mister?"

"…"

"Hey, Mr. Jeok?"

"…Do you want to fucking die?"

What a relief. That murderous tone was definitely Jeok Cheongang's.

As I felt oddly reassured, familiar faces drew near and looked between us in confusion.

"Huh?"

"Captain, who's that beside you?"

A perfectly normal reaction. Mungyeong and the few others who knew what had happened reacted differently.

"M-my youngest."

"B-Benefactor. Is that…?"

Jin Wikyung and Cheongpung caught on quickly. Jin Wikyung always kept his composure and read the situation, while Cheongpung was the strongest Supreme Peak master here after Mungyeong. It wasn't surprising that they'd guessed.

Then there was Zhuge Feng. He fixed me with a grave look.

"Red hair and a red beard. According to the reports I received, no martial artist with such distinctive features has come through here. More importantly, he's walking right beside you, which suggests you're quite close. But you don't have any friends, do you?"

"…That pisses me off, but you're not wrong. So?"

"Thus, my brilliant mind leads me to suspect that the martial artist beside you might be Senior Jeok, Returned to Youth… Ha ha. What do you think? Fairly plausible nonsense, isn't it?"

"That's right."

"No, it isn't. It's nonsense."

"What do you mean, no? I'm telling you it's true."

"Please tell me it's nonsense. I beg you."

"It's true."

That answer didn't come from me. Jeok Cheongang stepped forward with that short, weighty declaration, and the air around us stirred.

"Gasp!"

"R-Returned to Youth?"

"Then that man really is…!"

There was a truckload of Wudang and Zhuge Clan martial artists stationed around the makeshift wharf to guard and investigate the area. Ship-Fire Boy[2398] Mu Song and the river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold were there too, ready to take us out.

As everyone stared wide-eyed, Zhuge Feng's gaze wavered.

Why is the Fire King here…?

It was written all over his face. Amid the uproar, he looked silently at Jeok Cheongang, then respectfully cupped his hands.

"Senior, it is good to see you. I was terribly worried something might have happened to you…"

[2398] Mu Song's sobriquet refers literally to a boy who lights fires aboard a ship.

“I’d wondered why those Demonic Cult bastards came to Mount Jiuhua when they had so many other roads to take. Now I know.”

Zhuge Feng gave an awkward laugh at the razor edge in Jeok Cheongang’s voice.

“I’m afraid I don’t know what you mean.”

“Pretend you don’t know one more time, and you won’t like what happens.”

“…May I ask how much you heard?”

“From ‘if not for my wise and perceptive grandfather’s judgment.‘”

“Ah. You heard all of it.”

“I did.”

“If I said everything I told them was a misunderstanding…”

“I’d burn the Zhuge Clan to the ground.”

“Ah…”

“No wonder those goddamn Demonic Cult bastards came this way with all those other roads available.”

Jeok Cheongang clenched his fist, his eyes cold. Even when he’d looked like he might drop dead any day, that look had made everyone back down. Now that he’d Returned to Youth, the force of his aura was enough to make knees buckle.

“I woke from a nap to find Mount Jiuhua on fire. What do you think of that?”

“I don’t think it was good.”

“And?”

Zhuge Feng swallowed hard.

“I imagine you were displeased.”

“It was fucking awful. If this old man hadn’t hurried over, even my home would’ve burned to ash.”

“Your home survived, then. Thank goodness.”

“Everything but my home burned. My heart, too.”

“Ah…”

“Now, I’ll give you two choices.”

Jeok Cheongang raised a finger.

“First, I round up every bastard named Zhuge, line them up five abreast, and slap them all across the face.”

That would be quite a sight.

Before I’d finished the thought, Zhuge Feng answered without taking a breath.

“I accept the second proposal.”

“Do you even know what it is?”

“Whatever it is, I choose the second.”

I would’ve picked number two myself.

To a martial artist, pride was nearly as important as life itself. If word spread that the entire Zhuge Clan had been slapped in a line by the Fire King Jeok Cheongang, the clan would have to take down its sign from that very day onward. Even a member of the Five Great Families like the Zhuge Clan would be no exception.

Zhuge Feng had chosen wisely. Still, he couldn't quite hide his unease.

"What is the second proposal?"

Jeok Cheongang stroked his short red beard. He slowly looked over everyone present, me included, then spoke.

"Do better from now on."

"Senior, forgive me, but what exactly—"

"The war has already begun. Do as well as the Zhuge Clan did in the Great Faction War—no, better. Like your grandfather."

"…!"

"Well, your grandfather didn't conspire with the Demonic Cult and tell them to burn Mount Jiuhua. And it's absurd to stay angry at a man who's dead and buried. I can't exactly go to his grave and turn it over again."

Jeok Cheongang looked at me.

"Besides, if those Demonic Cult bastards hadn't set Mount Jiuhua on fire that day, another bond would never have formed… Why are you making that face?"

I hurriedly composed my expression before answering.

"This is my normal face."

"…I have an idea what you're thinking, but I'll let it pass."

If I admitted I'd expected him to visit the former Family Head's grave and piss on it, Jeok Cheongang would try to kill me. Judging by everyone else's faces, I wasn't the only one who'd thought it.

Still, he's giving it this much thought. I'm a little touched.

As Jeok Cheongang had said, if he had remained a reclusive master in Mount Jiuhua, we would never have ended up working together. We would have lived in our separate worlds, never knowing the other existed.

But the pendulum of fate had led me to the Murim and connected me with Jeok Cheongang.

And whether this was fate as well or not, we had to move toward our next destination once more.

Henan.

The moment that word filled my mind, Mungyeong spoke up. He'd been standing apart all this time, his expression unreadable.

"The sun is about to set."

The western mountains were already red. Jeok Cheongang, whose hair was redder still, grinned at me.

"Come. Let's go."

"Yes."

Right. Let's go.

To Henan. To the New Murim Alliance.

"So they've all left?"

The first to speak was an old Daoist with a refined face. His skin was as taut as a young man's, without a single age spot, and the long hem of his robe was dazzling white.

The Daoist who had brought him the news was old too, but his many-times-patched clothes spoke to his unassuming nature.

Clack.

Perfected Being[2399] Hyeongong set down his teacup.

"Yes, Sect Leader Senior Brother."

The two boys who had studied under the same master since childhood were now respected Perfected Beings[2400] and pillars of Wudang.

Hyeongong, who had cared for little besides martial arts, had reached Supreme Peak and made a name for himself. His Senior Brother, seven years his elder, had succeeded their master as Sect Leader of Wudang. He was the refined-looking old Daoist, Perfected Being[2401] Hyeoncheon.

"I'd hoped to meet them at least once before they left."

Hyeongong answered his Senior Brother's regretful murmur.

"It couldn't be helped. You didn't send me in your place because you didn't want to meet them."

"No, but I still regret missing them. There are the Two Dragons[2402] the Jin Family of Taiyuan and Huashan are so proud of, and I hear Senior Jeok has gained enlightenment as well. I should have seen him."

"Ha ha. Don't be too disappointed. We'll see him again soon."

"Yes, I suppose we will. If what this letter says is true."

Hyeoncheon gazed down at the letter on the table. Across its envelope, written in a bold, soaring hand, were three characters:

Murim Alliance.

Only three characters, yet their weight was unmistakable.

[2399] Perfected Being is a Daoist honorific for a spiritually accomplished practitioner.

[2400] Perfected Being is a Daoist honorific for a spiritually accomplished practitioner.

[2401] Perfected Being is a Daoist honorific for a spiritually accomplished practitioner.

[2402] The Two Dragons are a pair ranked beneath the Ten Kings in Murim gossip.

The Murim Alliance represented orthodox Murim itself. It was also proof that a war rivaling the Great Faction War was approaching.

Is it truly… beginning like this?

Hyeoncheon's expression grew heavy. He could almost hear the screams of the countless Senior and Junior Brothers who had fallen bleeding in the Great Faction War. The horrors of his youth were about to repeat themselves.

This unworthy Disciple finally understands your heart, Master.

Hyeoncheon was thinking of the master who had died after failing to overcome the injuries he had suffered during the Great Faction War when—

"S-Sect Leader!"

An urgent shout came from outside the pavilion.

Hyeoncheon sensed something strange and flicked his sleeve. A soft stream of internal force shot out and flung open the pavilion door.

Hyeongong recognized the face beyond it and frowned.

"You…"

The man who had shouted was a second-generation Wudang Disciple, one of the pursuit party sent after the Killing Ghost. As Hyeongong watched him struggle for breath, his eyes widened.

"Could it be?"

"Yes. We caught him."

"Good! At last, the Killing Ghost who committed those heinous atrocities—"

Hyeongong broke off. His Senior Brother's expression was grim.

And Hyeongong's suspicion was exactly right.

Hyeoncheon silently stared at the second-generation Disciple, who seemed not to know what to do, then spoke in a low voice.

"We ought to be glad you caught the Killing Ghost, yet you look troubled. What happened?"

"Th-that is…"

"Has someone else been killed or injured?"

"No. It isn't that…"

Unable to go on, the Disciple lowered his head.

"We're bringing the Killing Ghost's body here now. I think it would be best if you saw it and judged for yourself, Sect Leader."

"What is this supposed to—"

Hyeoncheon did not have to wait long for an answer.

Half an hour later, Wudang Disciples brought the body before him. He saw what the Killing Ghost truly was and remained silent for a long time before speaking.

"It seems… I have one more reason to go to Henan."

Reflected in the old Daoist's clear eyes was something neither beast nor human.

Chapter 506

Fwoosh.

A northwest wind blew in from the distance, filling the sail. The burly, rough-faced river bandits rowed hard in rhythm, while the bow split the water into white foam that formed and vanished on either side.

Peaceful, as if nothing had happened.

Maybe it was because of all the tragedies we'd seen lately, but the Yangtze, stretching endlessly before us like a sea, looked beautiful today.

As if he'd read my mind, Jeok Cheongang spoke from beside me.

"Same shitty scenery as ever."

"…"

"If I had to pick two things that ought to disappear from this world right now, they'd be Dark Heaven and the Yangtze."

So much for reading my mind.

What could I say? In more ways than one, it was nice that he hadn't changed. I watched his red hair whip in the wind and sighed.

"Don't sigh so loudly. The ground—"

"The ground won't sink just because I sigh."

"No. You'll die by this old man's hand before you set foot on land."

"Wow. You keep exceeding my expectations."

"You seem to have forgotten how to use your eyes while we were apart. One says 'dis,' and the other says 'respect.' What am I to do with them?"

"They say 're' and 'spect,' actually."

"Want me to beat some 'feet-spect' into you?"

"N. O."

Whoosh—whack!

"Ugh!"

Lightning flashed before my eyes. At my cry, and the sight of me clutching the back of my head, Jeok Cheongang flinched.

"I-I barely hit you. What a fuss."

"Does this look like I'm making a fuss? My skull's ringing."

"Your skull is… ringing?"

"I'm tough, but I'm still human. Of course it is."

"…Did it hurt that much? I didn't mean to hit you so hard. Let me see."

He was fidgeting like a puppy that needed to poop. I let out a quiet laugh.

"Why—why are you laughing?"

"No reason."

"…?"

"Ah, I'm all better. Anyway, how long will it take us to reach Henan at this rate?"

At my casual change of subject, Jeok Cheongang's face turned bright red.

"H-how dare you toy with this old man!"

Whack!

"Ah, that really hurt!"

"Just take it!"

It hurt. It really did.

So why did I keep laughing even as he hit me?

Maybe I missed this.

Yes. That was probably it.

Sometimes you miss the little things that never seemed important at the time. For me, it was my father's scratchy beard, which had stung so much when I was young. And it was Jeok Cheongang's palm, gradually growing slower and weaker.

But things were all right now. My father had died long ago, and I could only see him in photographs. Jeok Cheongang, though, had regained his strength.

Whack!

Feeling the speed and power he'd recovered along with his youth made me laugh again.

This is nice, too.

Whack! Whack! Whaaack!

"…Uh, wait a second."

"How dare you make a fool of this old man!"

"Ugh!"

On second thought, it wasn't that nice.

There was a limit to how much something ought to hurt. This was crossing it.

My lunatic grin had vanished without a trace. I was twisting desperately to dodge Jeok Cheongang's thick palms when a voice cut in.

"Um… should I come back later?"

Jeok Cheongang stopped dead. I seized the chance to slip away and hide behind the speaker.

My precious meat shield—no, Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song—cried out in alarm.

"H-hey, Junior!"

"Junior. That sounds especially nice today, Senior."

"What are you doing?"

"Inheriting your position as Stronghold Lord."

"If you're going to get beaten, get beaten alone!"

"A Senior's supposed to help his Junior at times like this. Don't you want to be that kind of Senior?"

"Why the hell should I—gasp, Great Hero Jeok!"

Unfortunately, Mu Song and I didn't get beaten together.

With the moment broken, Jeok Cheongang lowered his clenched fist instead of bringing it down. He smacked his lips and looked Mu Song up and down.

"Never mind. What is it?"

Mu Song, who had squeezed his eyes shut in expectation of a merciless beating, hurriedly pried me off him.

"I came because I heard you'd called for me. One of my subordinates said you were looking for me…"

"This old man called for you? When?"

"I-I was told you'd asked when we would arrive in Henan."

I'd been quietly watching the exchange. Now I raised my hand.

"Uh, I think that was me."

One of the river bandits must have overheard me mutter it while I was changing the subject and passed it on to Mu Song.

"…It was you, Junior?"

"Yes. I was just thinking aloud."

"I see. I see."

Judging by Mu Song's grim voice, the river bandit who had passed along the wrong information probably would not escape a taste of the Yangtze today.

I turned toward Mu Song, who was glaring somewhere with a dangerous look in his eyes.

"I did want to know, though. When do you think we'll arrive?"

Although Mu Song was startlingly young compared with the other old martial-world veterans, he was still an experienced river bandit who had spent his entire life on the Yangtze.

He took a moment to work it out, then said, "We should be able to cut the travel time considerably. If weather like today's continues, we'll reach Xixia within ten days at the latest."

"Xixia?"

I'd traveled plenty, but not enough to know every place name in the world. In Murim, I'd been too busy to learn them. I'd tried looking them up online in the modern world, but the names and locations didn't always match.

Just look at Dongting Lake.

Here in Murim, Dongting Lake lay in Hubei Province. On a modern Chinese map, it was in Hunan Province.

Discrepancies like that were decisive proof that the two worlds, however similar, were not the same.

"Is Xixia in Henan?"

Jeok Cheongang nodded.

"It's on the southwestern edge of Henan. If this old man remembers correctly, a tributary of the Yangtze ends around there. From then on, we'll have to travel by land. Is that correct?"

"Exactly right, Great Hero Jeok."

"I passed near Xixia during the Great Faction War. Good. Very good."

Was he pleased that Returned to Youth had cured his infirmities of old age and sharpened his memory? Or that we'd be off the Yangtze in ten days at most?

Maybe both.

Smiling with satisfaction, Jeok Cheongang turned to Mu Song.

"Come to think of it, you've had a hard time too. From Sichuan to Hubei, and now all the way to Henan."

Mu Song shook his head, his expression bitter.

"How could I call this hardship? Thanks to it, I can finally lay Uncle Hwang and all the brothers who died before their time to rest. It's what I ought to do, whether anyone asks me or not."

After the Water God Dragon fell, Mu Song and the other river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold had gathered the dead men's bones and scattered them across the Yangtze.

They had lived on the Yangtze and died on the Yangtze. It was an end befitting river bandits of the Yangtze River Channel League.

"They must be grateful to you from the Nine Springs.[2403]"

"Was your name Mu Saeng? For a Disciple of the Seafaring King, you have decent manners. Yangtze One Saber raised you well."

"He was like family to me. And it's Mu Song, not Mu Saeng, Great Hero Jeok."

"Right, Mu Saeng."

"…"

Had his infirmities of old age not been completely cured after all?

For a moment, I wondered. Then I saw Jeok Cheongang glare and realized he was just being stubborn. Whatever Mu Song's name really was, that look said he'd better change it if Jeok Cheongang called him Mu Saeng.

Mu Song swallowed under the aura of a man steeped in the Three Bonds and Five Relationships.[2404]

[2403] The Nine Springs is a traditional expression for the realm of the dead.

[2404] The Three Bonds and Five Relationships are a traditional Confucian framework of social and familial duties.

"What? Why?"

"N-no reason."

"Good, Mu Saeng."

Could anyone else hear dentures clacking?

I took pity on the man who'd lost his name and offered him a hand. Though, really, I was more interested in asking him something.

"By the way, Senior, are you planning to return to Sichuan?"

"Hm?"

"You know why we're heading to Henan, don't you?"

Mu Song understood what I meant. His gaze grew somber.

"You're wondering whether I'll join the Murim Alliance."

"To be honest, yes."

"Dark Heaven's scheme killed someone I looked up to like a parent, along with countless brothers. What would you do in my place?"

"Whatever it took to avenge them."

"So would I. I want to rush there and lend the Murim Alliance a hand right now. But…"

Mu Song bit his lip, then spoke on a sigh.

"I'm only one Stronghold Lord within the Yangtze River Channel League. I have no say in its decisions. Only one person can decide matters of importance for the League: my Master and its Alliance Leader, the Seafaring King."

That was common enough in Murim, where strength commanded respect. A Sect Leader's or Family Head's authority was greater even than that of a conglomerate owner with an iron grip on the family business.

The problem was—

"Typical of a rootless band of river thieves. Then again, it's ridiculous to expect anything from men who weighed the costs and benefits even during the Great Faction War."

Yes. Exactly what Jeok Cheongang had said.

The Yangtze River Channel League had never belonged to the orthodox faction. River bandits scattered across the land like grass roots had gathered beneath its banner because the Seafaring King was strong enough to lead them and promised to protect their individual interests.

I've heard the Green Forest Alliance is much the same.

Both groups had begun as thieves banding together to take what belonged to others. They had survived and grown because they sided with orthodox Murim in the Great Faction War, backed the winners, and were rewarded with recognition of their activities.

They were treated much better than the other unorthodox factions that had survived the war. But grass roots didn't become tree roots just because of that.

Jeok Cheongang gazed at the waves of the Yangtze with displeasure and muttered,

"Before this old man dies, I hope this goddamn Yangtze dries up and withers away. Then that bastard Seafaring King's face will be a complete mess. Tsk, tsk."

"…"

"Think carefully yourself, Mu Saeng. Your Master may make the wrong choice."

"…I don't believe he will."

Despite hearing his Master insulted to his face, Mu Song merely gave a bitter smile. His reaction left me with the vague impression that his relationship with the Seafaring King wasn't especially warm.

But what happens if the Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance side with Dark Heaven now?

The answer came quickly.

A real headache, that's what.

If Dark Heaven was a blade approaching from the front, those two factions were daggers stabbing in from behind.

If they decided to harbor ulterior motives, even the mighty orthodox Murim would inevitably suffer a blow.

"The Sword Saint will have quite a headache. I wonder what those two will choose…"

Jeok Cheongang seemed to have reached the same thought. He was muttering to himself when someone spoke.

"Not two. Four."

I turned. Mungyeong stood there, his expression composed.

Chapter 507

I knew Mungyeong was approaching. Seven days and nights of grueling—no, blood-shitting—training had sharpened my usual Qi Sense considerably.

The realm stage shown by the System hadn't risen yet, but I could vaguely sense that I'd have to break through the wall in front of me before it would.

But what does he mean, not two, but four?

The question didn't trouble me for long.

The Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance were powerful enough that even orthodox Murim couldn't afford to dismiss them. And I could think of only one place with factions that belonged in the same set.

Vaguely recalling something Jeok Cheongang had once told me, I murmured, "The Outer Murim."

The Murim beyond the Central Plains. The Murim outside the Murim.

Some people called the barbarians beyond the Great Wall built by an ancient emperor the Outer Lands, but Jeok Cheongang had always dismissed such talk with a snort.

Does the Great Wall surround the whole world? The world beneath the heavens is exactly that—the world beneath the heavens. The lands beneath the sky are boundlessly vast, and each has its own Murim.

Maybe it was just his nature, but Jeok Cheongang's outlook was nothing like the stale Zhonghua[2405] chauvinism you'd expect from an old man of his era.

The records left by earlier Sect Leaders had probably helped. Unlike Jeok Cheongang, who'd been a Lü Bu[2406] stuck at the foot of a mountain whenever he wasn't fighting in the Great Faction War, his predecessors had gone out and indulged their social-butterfly tendencies to the fullest.

Though their records read less like documents written for future generations and more like diaries written for their own satisfaction.

What a shock those had been.

I recalled a few I'd read in Fire Gate Cavern.

Year xx, Month x, Day x. Cheonbong, Third Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan.

I had grown sick of the Central Plains. War raged on all sides, and Murim was a complete mess. So I went to India to broaden my horizons.

After a long journey, I arrived at a river called the Gan… something.

It is not as large as the Yangtze, but it is wide… Anyway, to the younger Disciples of the Fire Gate Clan: if you ever go to India, wash yourselves in that Gan-whatever river first. Do not ask questions. Do not argue.

[2405] Zhonghua is a historical term for Chinese civilization. Here it refers to the belief that it stands at the center of the world.

[2406] Lü Bu was a warrior of China's Three Kingdoms era renowned for his fighting prowess.

I was looking around when a mob of bald monks rushed over, shouted things I could not understand, and thrust swords at me. So I beat them senseless.

A Central Plains interpreter who happened to be passing by was horrified. He said they were from India's Small Thunderclap Temple.

From the name, I had assumed they would be like the monks of Shaolin Temple. But these bald monks were violent beyond belief.

When more monks came with an even larger mob, I crippled every last one and burned down their strange-looking temples.

It was a fine sight.

Year xx, Month x, Day x. Songhak, Fifth Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan.

I have always held my Grandmaster, the Third Sect Leader, in the deepest respect. Following in his footsteps, I traveled the world and explored the Outer Murim.

I fought the Mad Wind Society of the great desert beyond the scorching sands, then visited the Potala Palace in Tibet and pulled out its pillars.

As a result, every man and beast in Tibet flew into a rage and chased after me.

But who am I? Songhak, the Ghost Flame Fist and Fifth Sect Leader of the great Fire Gate Clan.

Without suffering so much as a scratch, I… avoided them and returned safely to the Central Plains.

To whoever inherits the Fire Gate Clan's true legacy in the distant future, remember this well.

If you face one hundred First Rate masters, fight them. If you face a thousand, unleash the Dance of the Fire God and Demon. If there are more than that, live to fight another day.

Of course, if you are stronger than I am, just fight them.

Ah, and if you go to that Gan-whatever river in India, jump in and wash yourself immediately. Wash yourself twice.

Year xx, Month x, Day x. Gu Jincheon, Ninth Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan.

I went to Nanman.[2407] I destroyed the Five Poisons Sect.

I went to Persia. I met people who wore things called turbans instead of hero headbands.

They were called Muslims, and they said they believed in a messenger and a prophet.

I said I wanted to meet the prophet, but they told me he was already dead. I could not understand this, so I asked several times. They drew their swords.

I had no choice but to send them to the prophet's side.

[2407] Nanman is a historical Chinese term for peoples and lands to the south of the Central Plains; it does not name a single country.

Next was the Ice Palace in the North Sea. There was ice and water everywhere, so I turned back.

To the future Disciple reading this: you go.

Ah, and I learned the name of that Gan-whatever river. The Ganges River. If you go to India, make sure you wash yourself there first. Be sure to wash.

Year xx, Month x, Day x. Han Xin, Twelfth Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan.

This unworthy Disciple followed the records of his ancestors to India and went straight into the Ganges River.

As I washed my hair, I saw a corpse floating down from upstream.

I moved to another spot to wash my body and saw a turd float past.

When I went upstream, I found several hundred people throwing corpses into the river and taking shits.

For fuck's sake, how could you pull this kind of bullshit on me?

"…"

They were unbelievable stories, even now.

I only had to skim through the records to see that whenever something displeased them, they smashed their way through anything and everything, whether in the Central Plains or the Outer Murim.

And telling their successors to bathe in the Ganges was like a sergeant about to be discharged writing "more field training" on a barracks survey out of pure spite.

The old you get fucked too mentality.

There were not many more records about the Outer Murim after his shit-water bath in the Ganges left the Twelfth Sect Leader royally pissed off. But once trade routes connecting the Central Plains to the outside world opened, information about the Murim beyond the Central Plains began to flow in.

The two factions Jeok Cheongang was now naming were the closest to the Central Plains, both geographically and in their dealings with it.

"The North Sea Ice Palace and the Nanman Beast Palace."

Their names certainly made their respective locations and characters clear.

At Jeok Cheongang's words, Mungyeong nodded with an infuriatingly bright smile.

"Yes, that's right. My Master told me about them. He visited them long ago, and he said that, from what he saw, neither was inferior to the renowned great sects of the Central Plains."

"…"

"…"

I'd bet everything Hyuk Mujin owned that he'd gone there to kill people.

The instant Jeok Cheongang and I exchanged similar looks, Mungyeong's eyes slowly narrowed.

"Why are you looking at me like that?"

"…Huh? Oh, nothing."

"Ahem. Nothing at all. Just what I'd expect of the Divine Physician, rushing wherever there are patients."

I had to play along, of course. Jeok Cheongang had received considerable help from him too, so he was in the same position.

As if he had never done anything suspicious, Mungyeong returned to his medical-apprentice persona and continued.

"My Master said the Demonic Cult tried to recruit those two factions first during the Great Faction War. Is that true, Great Hero Jeok?"

"Hmm? Ah."

Jeok Cheongang answered with a reluctant look.

"It is true. To the Demonic Cult, the wicked and unorthodox factions of the Central Plains were branches grown from the same root, so they naturally brought them into the fold. If the North Sea Ice Palace had accepted the Demonic Cult's offer and moved south while the Nanman Beast Palace moved north, the Great Faction War would have taken a very difficult turn."

But neither faction had taken the Demonic Cult's hand.

The North Sea Ice Palace had declared itself cut off from the outside world, as it always had. The Nanman Beast Palace, geographically closer to the Central Plains, had weighed its options and sided with orthodox Murim.

"The Beast Palace bastards only meant to make a show of fighting at first, but later they were a great help. Each of the ferocious beasts they brought could do the work of several First Rate masters. And the Heavenly Eagles they'd trained with their secret methods caught the messenger eagles the Demonic Cult sent all over the land."

The Nanman Beast Palace was practically the public enemy of modern-day animal lovers.

For ages, its people had captured and trained all sorts of creatures from Nanman's jungles. They'd also developed and practiced martial arts modeled on the movements of ferocious beasts.

"Oh, wait. Didn't you say you were close to someone over there?"

Jeok Cheongang frowned at my sudden question.

"Who?"

"The Palace Lord. The Palace Lord."

"The Palace Lord? Ah, you mean the Beast Miao King?"

"Yes, him."

The Beast Miao King was both the lowest-ranking and the most unusual of the Ten Kings.

He was the leader of the Miao people, who were native to Nanman, as well as the master of the Nanman Beast Palace, the region's dominant power.

His achievements in the Great Faction War and his outstanding martial arts had earned him a place among the Ten Kings. But from the outside, the title looked almost like an honorary medal awarded to a foreigner. Perhaps that was why even people within Central Plains Murim were reluctant to mention him.

Why raise up some southern barbarian when we could just add another member of orthodox Murim?

That was supposedly where the claim that the Beast Miao King was overhyped had begun.

"I've met him a few times, that's all," Jeok Cheongang said.

"But I heard the Beast Miao King even came to pay his respects to you in person."

"He did. In broad daylight, some dark-skinned fellow with his upper body bare showed up at my residence. I nearly hit him with a Flame Divine Palm."

Mu Song had been standing awkwardly nearby for a while, looking anxious. Now his eyes widened.

"Is that really true?"

"Would this old man start making up lies at my age?"

"N-no, that's not what I meant. I'm just surprised. My Master has mentioned the Beast Miao King too, but I heard he was short-tempered and arrogant, and that the Martial God was the only person he showed any courtesy to…"

"The Seafaring King? Has that young whelp gone senile already? The Beast Miao King didn't show him courtesy because he's a damn fool. Tsk, tsk."

Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue with an expression of utter disdain and continued.

"The Beast Miao King may look like that, but he knows when to show respect. If he were nothing but a brute with strength to spare, do you think the Miao people would have gathered under one banner?"

I had to nod at that.

Small and midsized sects with only a few dozen members disappeared for lack of Disciples all the time, only for others to spring up in their place. The Beast Miao King, meanwhile, was a chief who ruled at least several thousand Miao people.

"So?"

Jeok Cheongang stroked his glossy red beard.

"What do you mean, 'so'? There was nothing special about it. He came to visit and spoke in a soft, ingratiating tone while bringing up a connection with the previous generation."

"A connection between our predecessors?"

"Good grief, you ignorant little fool. You of all people should know!"

“Whoa. What’s wrong?”

Our Old Master had suddenly floored the accelerator and rocketed off.

After giving me a thorough scolding, Jeok Cheongang continued in an irritated voice.

“More than two hundred years ago, the Fifth Sect Leader of our sect destroyed Nanman’s Five Poisons Sect.”

“What does that have to… Ah, wait.”

“Back then, Nanman was like a cauldron standing on three legs. The Five Poisons Sect was the strongest, followed by the Nanman Beast Palace, then Poison Valley.”

“So when the Five Poisons Sect was destroyed, the Nanman Beast Palace rose to the top?”

“That’s right. It absorbed Poison Valley as well and took control of Nanman.”

“Wow, that’s insane. So that’s how it happened.”

“That’s why the Beast Miao King held goodwill toward our sect. It was also one reason he joined the Great Faction War. But did you just dare speak to me informally?”

“…I’ll correct myself. It just slipped out.”

I couldn’t help marveling at how the thuggish behavior of a Sect Leader from generations ago had paid off like this.

More importantly, the Beast Miao King was well disposed toward the Fire Gate Clan, and that was part of why he’d sided with orthodox Murim in the Great Faction War…

“Then there’s a good chance the Nanman Beast Palace will join this Murim Alliance.”

“I can’t say for sure. Even this old man cannot make an easy judgment about that. But if the Beast Miao King I remember is still the same, he will help orthodox Murim.”

“What about the North Sea Ice Palace?”

“If the envoy sent from Henan hasn’t frozen to death on the way, they’ll probably read the letter, at least. I wouldn’t get your hopes up.”

Jeok Cheongang’s seasoned gaze turned toward Mu Song.

“But our more urgent concern is right here. What will the Seafaring King do?”

Mu Song flinched. Then Mungyeong spoke quietly.

“There’s something I’ve been wanting to ask you for a while, Great Hero Mu Song.”

“Uh, yes?”

Mungyeong watched Mu Song’s trembling eyes in silence, then clicked his tongue.

“You know who I am, don’t you?”

“…!”

Chapter 508

“You know who I am, don’t you?”

“…!”

“…!”

The air around us froze. I could hardly believe my ears, and Mu Song’s pupils trembled.

He stared at Mungyeong like he was about to wet himself, then squeezed out a hoarse reply.

“I-I don’t know anything.”

“Is that so?”

Mungyeong regarded him coolly.

“Then why are you speaking formally to me, Great Hero Mu Song?”

“…!”

“You’re a fearless bastard, lying to my face.”

“Gasp!”

He’d walked right into that one. But how had Mu Song figured out who Mungyeong was?

No wonder he kept flinching like a dog that needed to shit.

From the way he’d been acting, Mu Song had known for some time. But given the level of martial arts I’d seen from him, that should have been nearly impossible.

Mungyeong had reached the realm of Returning to Simplicity and achieved Returned to Youth. To see through him, you’d need to be a master in a similar realm. At the very least, you’d have to be past the early stages of Supreme Peak to sense even the slightest thing amiss.

And Mu Song noticed?

No way. I’d sooner believe Hyuk Mujin had knocked Cheongpung down with one punch and sent three teeth flying.

While I was puzzling over it, Jeok Cheongang spoke in a bored tone.

“That’s enough. The fool kept his mouth shut, so he must have meant to pretend he didn’t know and let it pass. An old man threatening a child isn’t a pretty sight.”

“Old man? Threatening?”

Mungyeong snorted.

“Until yesterday, you were moping around like you could die any day. You get a little younger, and suddenly you’ve found your tongue. Stay out of this.”

“…What did you say?”

A deep furrow appeared on the forehead Returned to Youth had left smooth and wrinkle-free.

I hurried between them.

“Wait. Both of you, calm down. Calm down.”

“You, get out of the way.”

“Move.”

“Yes, sir.”

I slipped away without a moment’s hesitation. Mu Song, wedged between the two monsters like lettuce in a sandwich, shot me a pleading look.

Save me, or something like that.

But why should I get my guts burst in a fight between two whales?

I need to save myself first. Besides, they’re not about to have a life-and-death duel.

I was right. After glaring at each other in silence, Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong lowered their auras at the same instant, as if they’d agreed to it.

“Hmph. I’ll let it go since you helped me.”

“What an ungrateful old man.”

They traded remarks like a pair of prim old men in a nursing home, then turned toward Mu Song. He had gone stiff as a statue.

“Come to think of it, you’re a remarkable fellow. How on earth did you know?”

I wanted to know that most of all. I watched Mu Song’s mouth, waiting for his answer, but it came from Mungyeong instead.

“It was them. The boatmen who came along when we went after the imugi.[2408] Or should I say the river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold? Am I right?”

Mu Song swallowed.

“Y-yes, sir. They said the young medical apprentice named Mungyeong was actually a Supreme Peak master with formidable martial arts, and that his standing seemed high enough to treat even the Zhuge Family Head however he pleased…”

That happened without me knowing?

Well, it made sense. Mungyeong couldn’t have found me by running all over the vast Dongting Lake using Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water.

So that’s how his identity got exposed.

Mungyeong had kept his true identity hidden for decades. Even after the Sichuan Blood Tragedy, apart from his Disciple, the Divine Physician, you could count the people who knew on one hand—including Jeok Cheongang and me.

Mu Song didn’t seem to have guessed he was the Slaughter Saint. Still, Mungyeong couldn’t be pleased that more people knew his secret.

Jeok Cheongang, of course, didn’t care. He looked ready to break out the popcorn.

“You stupid old man. You should’ve disguised yourself. Ha ha ha.”

[2408] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent often associated with dragons.

“There was no time. Every moment counted while I was going to save your Disciple.”

“…Ahem. I do appreciate that.”

Jeok Cheongang stopped laughing dead. Mungyeong clicked his tongue softly and fixed his gaze on Mu Song.

“I clearly warned you through Sound Transmission, but it seems you have more loyal subordinates than I expected.”

“Gasp!”

Mu Song’s eyes widened at Mungyeong’s cold voice. The next moment, he shouted loudly enough to turn every head nearby—if a screen of internal energy hadn’t enclosed us.

“N-no, you can’t!”

“What can’t I do?”

“My subordinates have done nothing wrong! Take my head instead!”

“…Why would I kill you?”

Mu Song, Jeok Cheongang, and I all stared at him wide-eyed.

“What? Y-you won’t?”

“You’re not going to kill him?”

“That old man’s gone mad—wait. Can infirmities of old age spread to other people?”

Jeok Cheongang considered that for a moment, then cried out triumphantly.

“I’ve got it! Instead of killing him, you’re going to cripple his dantian or cut off a limb!”

“…!”

Mungyeong looked at us, his eyes trembling, and muttered with regret, “You’re making me want to kill someone.”

Mu Song spoke, fear and resolve mingling on his face.

“My subordinates are innocent. Please, let me be enough—”

“Shut your damn mouth before I tear it apart.”

“Yes, sir.”

Mungyeong stared down at him in disbelief and sighed.

“Six, including you. Correct?”

“Y-yes, Senior. We’ve been together for many years, and they know how to keep their mouths shut.”

“I have never had a junior like you, and I am no longer a martial artist. But if you fail to keep them quiet, I can make all six of you disappear without leaving a trace.”

“…!”

“If you want to live out your days in peace, keep your mouth shut forever. Don’t tell the Seafaring King. Don’t tell anyone. Understood?”

Mu Song pressed his lips together and gave a small nod. Mungyeong jerked his chin behind him.

“Go. Tell your subordinates to stay away from the stern until we reach Henan.”

“What?”

“Do you have another question?”

“N-no, sir. If you need anything, please call for me.”

Mu Song bowed and hurried away.

That left the three of us: Jeok Cheongang, Mungyeong, and me.

Jeok Cheongang smacked his lips in disappointment and poked me in the side.

“It would be more fun if that fool told everyone. Don’t you think?”

“In—cough.”

I hurriedly buried the rest of I agree in a cough.

Mungyeong was glaring our way, plainly not amused. He looked ready to grab the nearest easy target and beat him senseless for finding it funny.

“I didn’t say anything.”

“Neither did I. Feeling guilty about something?”

“No, I just thought I’d tell you that in advance.”

“And I was thinking of giving you a beating in advance.”

“I really didn’t mean anything.”

“I heard ‘in.‘ What came after it?”

Panicking would only make this worse. I answered calmly.

“I meant, ‘Admittedly, I have a conscience. How could I do such a thing?‘”

“That didn’t sound like it.”

“No, it isn’t.”

“It is. Why are you playing Gung Ye?[2409]”

Mungyeong didn’t know who Gung Ye was, but he could tell it wasn’t a compliment. I did my best to ignore his chilling gaze and changed the subject.

“Why did you tell them to stay away from the stern?”

“Don’t change the subject.”

“…”

That shut me up.

Mungyeong clicked his tongue at my awkward silence.

“You’ve done well raising this one as your Disciple.”

[2409] Gung Ye was a Korean ruler traditionally portrayed as claiming to read people’s minds.

Jeok Cheongang had been watching with his arms folded, as though none of this concerned him. He let out a quiet laugh.

“It’s because he’s like this that I raised him.”

“This ill-mannered brat?”

“Is that what you think? I thought we were close enough to dispense with formalities. Perhaps we see things differently. Or perhaps someone’s trying hard to ignore that thought.”

Mungyeong looked silently from Jeok Cheongang to me and back.

“…You’re quite the smooth talker. Returned to Youth, and it’s your mouth that’s gained the most vigor.”

I had no idea what they were talking about.

As I stood there trying to follow the conversation, Jeok Cheongang pushed himself away from the swift ship’s wooden railing.

“I’m going into the cabin. I’m sick of looking at this goddamn river.”

“Wow, what a wonderful idea. Are you sure your surname isn’t Zhuge instead of Jeok?”

That was the best thing I’d heard all day. But when I took a step after him, Jeok Cheongang put out a hand to stop me.

Tap.

“Huh?”

“What do you mean, ‘huh’? Why are you following me?”

“You said you were going to the cabin.”

“So?”

“I was just about to go there myself.”

“Two men in that cramped cabin?”

“It’s a five-person cabin. Where’s your conscience—”

“I’m going to circulate my qi and sort through the enlightenment I’ve gained recently. You don’t need to come.”

“Oh, you’re going to circulate your qi. Then I’ll stand guard—”

“No need. Stay here.”

“What?”

Jeok Cheongang snapped.

“I said stay here!”

“Whoa, you startled me. Why are you shouting?”

“Quiet. Follow me and you’ll be sorry!”

“…?”

I stared after him, bewildered. Then I felt someone’s gaze prickling at me and turned.

Mungyeong's stare was drier than the sand by the Sphinx's forepaws.

Fuck. I should've followed him.

What did I care if Jeok Cheongang gave me hell or rang a bell? I'd rather jump into the vast Yangtze than be left alone with a man who might cut off my head—

"The river looks unusually clear today. Don't you want to go in?"

"What?"

What the hell? Could he read minds? Was he really Gung Ye?[2410]

A suspicion flashed through my head, and I found myself looking around for a palace guard with a mace.

That was when—

Whoom!

A mace swung at me.

No. It was a single, swift, stealthy wave of palm force.

I hastily crossed both arms to block it when the sound of splitting air pierced my ears, but the palm force fired by a once-in-an-age master known as the Slaughter Saint was not something I could block so easily.

Boom!

Fuck, that really does feel like a mace.

Pain throbbed in my chest as I flew off the swift ship. Just before I hit the river, I twisted my body, sent the internal energy in my lower dantian into my legs, and stepped onto the water.

Splash!

The calm surface splashed violently, as though I'd stepped into a puddle.

Standing on the water with Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water, I glared at Mungyeong in disbelief.

"What are you doing all of a sudden?"

"The calm river's been disturbed."

"What are you—huh?"

"Your movements are so rough, you might stir up a storm."

Before I could say another word, Mungyeong clicked his tongue and went on.

"Then… it's time to begin."

Ding!

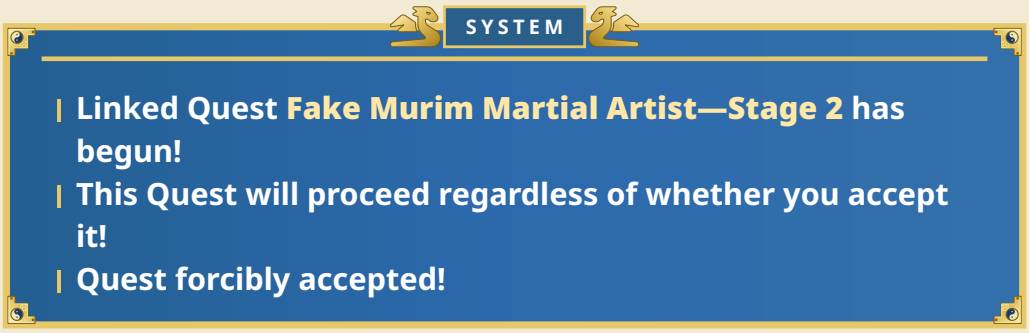
SYSTEM

Linked Quest Fake Murim Martial Artist—Stage 2 has begun!

[2410] Gung Ye was a Korean ruler traditionally portrayed as claiming to read people's minds.

Chapter 509

Ding.



"…?"

What the fuck?

My thoughts must have shown on my face. Mungyeong's eyebrows twitched as he looked at me.

"I clearly told you there would be another training session. Don't tell me you forgot?"

"Excuse me?"

Forgot? Is he messing with me right now?

Dumbfounded, I looked back at Mungyeong.

"How could I forget after shitting blood so many times? Even thinking about it makes my asshole twitch."

"…I understand. Stop there. That's disgusting."

"Ha. Seriously."

The head might forget, but the asshole—no, the body—remembered.

Even now, whenever I closed my eyes, memories of shitting blood day and night came flooding back.

To exaggerate a little, if all the bloody liquid I'd passed over the past seven days and nights were collected in a tub, every mosquito in Hubei Province could gather for a feast.

It was horrible.

Some memories wouldn't go away no matter how hard I tried to forget them. The Linked Quest the System had announced on the day of my last duel with Mungyeong was no different.

It hadn't been long ago, and it was far too important to forget. I'd have to be out of my mind.

"Anyway, I haven't forgotten. I remember every single thing you said back then."

"Is that so?"

Mungyeong studied me.

"Then your reaction makes even less sense. I even warned you in advance. Why do you look as though someone just hit you in the back of the head?"

"…Uh."

Because that's exactly how it feels.

I knew another training session was coming, but I'd been certain it wouldn't happen right now.

There was only so much he could teach me aboard this swift ship, which was even narrower than an ordinary vessel.

At most, a cultivation technique?

But a cultivation technique, the foundation of martial arts and internal energy, was not something that could be swapped out as easily as a machine part.

Especially not in my case.

The Fire Gate Divine Technique was the very root of the Fire Gate Clan. It transformed the nature of our internal energy into fire qi and amplified its power, so the cultivation technique played a far greater role in our martial arts than it did in those of other sects.

Mungyeong of all people had to know that, but I asked just in case.

"Um, you're not planning to teach me a cultivation technique, are you?"

Whoosh! Slash!

I turned my head at the sound of the wind. A throwing blade shot past like a streak of light, missing my neck by a hair before slicing through the river behind me.

"…I heard your answer loud and clear."

"Don't waste my time with that kind of nonsense."

"Of course. I was just asking on the off chance."

Then what is it? Another poison-tasting session?

Foreboding and curiosity struck at once, but I put both aside for the moment. Not for any particular reason—Mungyeong had simply grown much farther away while we talked.

Whoosh!

The favorable wind and the waterway men's sailing experience certainly helped, but the swift ship was several notches faster than an ordinary vessel.

We'd barely exchanged a few words, yet he was already that far away. I almost wondered whether the bastards from the Yangtze River Channel League had installed a motor.

Damn, it's fast.

Even a model student who routinely came first in the entire school was bound to have one weak subject. Mine was movement techniques.

As befitted a Supreme Peak master, I could keep up using Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water, but I wasn't used to it, and it consumed a considerable amount of internal energy. Unlike on Dongting Lake last time, there was nothing here for me to step on, either.

"I'll climb aboard first and listen. I can't stay out here like this."

Mungyeong nodded readily.

"Do that."

"You're not going to throw a hidden weapon at me as a surprise, are you?"

"I said I understand. Stop talking nonsense and come up."

"Yes, sir."

I concentrated the internal energy I'd drawn up in my toes.

The greatest advantage of the Fire Gate Divine Technique was the explosive force it could produce. One leap would be more than enough to get me back onto the swift ship.

One, two.

Now.

Bang!

The internal energy released from my toes slammed into the water. The river surged upward like a massive wall from the shockwave, and a fierce wind swept across my entire body.

In a moment so brief it could not even be called an instant, I covered over a hundred feet and landed on the stern of the swift ship—

Thwack!

What the fuck?

I went flying back even faster than I'd approached. I hurriedly sent internal energy into the soles of my feet and flipped myself around.

I'd been plunging headfirst toward the river, but I regained my balance just in time to stand on its surface.

What is this, déjà vu?

I looked at Mungyeong, who stood tall on the stern, with a thoroughly displeased expression.

"What was that just now?"

"What was what?"

"That thing in your hand. You hit me with it."

"Oh, this."

Mungyeong waved the large object he was holding.

"This is an oar. It's mainly used to row a boat."

"I wasn't asking because I didn't know that."

"I thought you were."

"Didn't you promise not to do anything strange?"

"To be precise, I said I wouldn't throw a hidden weapon. This isn't a hidden weapon."

"Oh, I see. You used a lethal weapon instead of a hidden weapon."

"Something like that."

Is he insane? Seriously.

Mungyeong stared at me with a profound gaze. No—with a profound gaze at the water rippling around me.

"The Yangtze River is still calm, yet chaos breaks out wherever your feet touch."

"If you keep pulling stunts like this, I'll be the one making a scene. Seriously."

"Do you know why it happens to you in particular?"

"I don't, but why are you doing this?"

Mungyeong ignored my question.

"It isn't because your movements are clumsy and rough."

"You're making my personality rough."

"Every movement a master of a certain realm makes has its own reason and purpose. In your case, the cause is your internal energy itself. It's too violent. This is one of the longstanding problems with the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts."

"Ah, now I'm pissed. I'll climb aboard again, so put down that oar first and—"

I stopped mid-sentence.

This wasn't just Mungyeong being spiteful or playing a prank.

"Wait. What did you just say?"

"So your ears do work. I said the reason your movements are rough on the water is a longstanding problem with the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts."

A longstanding problem…

I couldn't brush that off.

After a moment's thought, I asked, "What does that have to do with Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water? I'm just clumsy because I'm not used to it. Aren't you judging too quickly?"

"You fool. It isn't that simple."

"You mean…"

"The stability and precision of your internal energy."

"Stability and precision…"

"Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water is one measure of those qualities. The more stable and precise your internal energy, the more freely you can perform it. It's an advanced movement technique, but a Peak master with deep enough attainment can use it without much difficulty."

Mungyeong continued without pause, then suddenly leaped down from the stern.

He was far enough away that an ordinary person wouldn't have been able to make out his face. But my senses were keen enough to see and hear him clearly.

Softly, he landed on the water, as light as air. Not a ripple rose around him. It was as though nothing had happened.

Mungyeong turned his dry gaze on me.

“And you?”

“…!”

I instinctively lowered my head and looked at the water beneath my feet. But I already knew what I would see.

The path I’d taken chasing the swift ship was covered in white foam, as though another boat had passed through it.

Splash.

I took a cautious step. Dozens of ripples spread out from it, overlapping one another.

Even compared with Mungyeong, the difference was too great.

“You seem to know the answer yourself.”

I might have felt less embarrassed if he’d sounded scornful. Instead, his flat voice seemed to say, Yes, that’s about your level. My face burned.

“Do you understand what I meant now?”

“…I think I understand it to some extent.”

As Mungyeong had said, Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water was an important measure of the stability and precision of one’s internal energy.

Depending on how well you distributed and controlled your power, the water beneath your feet could churn as though caught in a storm or remain as calm as a deserted lakeshore.

“Then tell me what you should gain from this. In your own words.”

“Hmm. I’ll be able to use my internal energy more efficiently.”

“I don’t like that answer.”

“I’ll gain stability and precision, and I’ll be able to produce the same amount of force while using less internal energy.”

“A little better. Still not enough.”

Each second seemed to stretch into a minute as I thought it over. Then the answer came to me.

“Amplification.”

“Explain further.”

“What I’ve said so far would let me apply the right amount of force where and when I need it. If I can control my internal energy that precisely… I can amplify it more than I do now, too.”

“So?”

“This isn’t just about stability and precision. The martial arts I’ve learned will become more powerful. Am I right?”

Mungyeong stared at me in silence before tossing out a single remark.

"…You're not a complete idiot."

That's it. I got it right.

But the strange thrill I felt wasn't from winning a little praise from Mungyeong.

If I can complete this training successfully, I can become stronger than I am now.

I'd hit a kind of stagnation. Maybe I'd grown too quickly. After advancing by leaps and bounds, my martial arts had stopped progressing, and I could feel a high wall blocking my path.

But with this training, I could improve my technique even without gaining some new enlightenment.

So I still had plenty of room to grow without enlightenment.

When had I started thinking about it all wrong? I hadn't tried to fill the space I already had. I'd just kept wanting something newer and greater.

What a stupid thing to do.

It was like owning a one-terabyte external hard drive, filling only five hundred gigabytes of it with porn, then whining that I was out of space.

Mungyeong had shown me that I still had another five hundred gigabytes for porn—no, that I still had room to fill. No need to buy another external hard drive when the first one wasn't full.

Ah, Great Lord Mun.

A halo seemed to shine behind Mungyeong's shoulder.

At the sight of my eyes brimming with those feelings, Mungyeong opened his mouth.

"Keep your eyes straight ahead before I gouge them out."

"…Ah, yes."

"Anyway, you seem to have finally grasped the general idea."

"Yes. I think I get it."

"Then you must know what training you need to do now."

Of course I did. I gave the answer I'd been expecting.

"Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water. Am I right?"

"Yes. Better to experience it yourself than hear and think about it a hundred times. The Yangtze is the perfect place, so start now."

So that was why he'd knocked me into the water without warning. He must have planned this from the beginning.

But I wasn't annoyed or resentful. You couldn't gain anything without paying a price.

It's a little daunting with nothing but river around me, but I'll get used to it if I keep practicing.

I answered without hesitation.

"Understood."

"You're more obedient than I expected. Keep that attitude."

"Yes."

If it meant becoming stronger than I was now, what wouldn't I do?

I bowed to Mungyeong. Then I realized I'd forgotten the most important question.

"Um, by the way."

"Hmm?"

"How long do I have to do this?"

"What a foolish question."

Mungyeong spread both hands as though the answer were obvious.

Ten stars... no, ten shichen?[2411]

"W-wait. Even for me, ten shichen[2412] is impossible. I have to keep up with the swift ship using Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water. You know how much internal energy that'll take—"

"What are you talking about? Ten days."

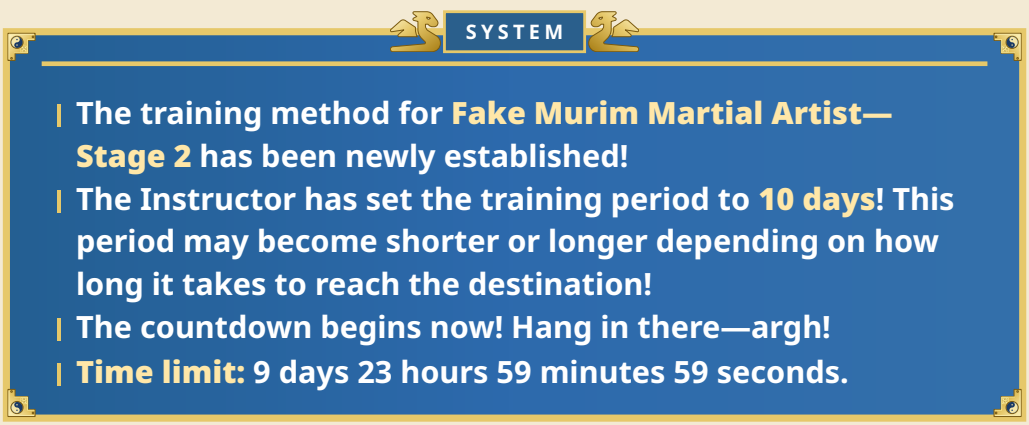
"Excuse me?"

"Not ten shichen.[2413] Ten days. Follow me the entire way until we reach Henan."

"...Excuse me?"

As I froze in place, a familiar notification rang in my ears.

Ding.



"..."

Fuck. I have no words.

[2411] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; ten shichen is about twenty hours.
[2412] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; ten shichen is about twenty hours.

Chapter 510

Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song had been a sailor from birth.

His parents, whose faces he could no longer remember, had been a pair of river bandits famous in the area for being inseparable. Both sides of his family were full of river bandits and fishermen, too.

River banditry ran deep in his blood.

Maybe that was why Mu Song much preferred being aboard a boat to being on land.

Dense forests and open fields made his hands and feet tingle and left him short of breath, as though he had swallowed deadly poison. But the sight of a wide-open river or sea brought him back to life.

And that wasn't all. While other stronghold lords who had made fortunes as river bandits bought grand estates and indulged in wine, women, and gambling at pleasure houses, Mu Song decorated his boat, lay on a bed woven from nets, and watched the Yangtze.

Whenever he did, he had the same thought.

I wish the whole world were made of water. Then I could spend my entire life on a boat.

But now, Mu Song was staring blankly at the Yangtze and muttering to himself.

"Ah, fuck. This boat is fucking slow. I want to get off already…"

"…!"

"…!"

The mood turned icy.

The nearby Water Dragon Stronghold river bandits doubted their ears. They rolled their eyes toward one another, exchanged glances, and soon reached an obvious conclusion.

We must have heard wrong!

That's it. All our ears must have gone bad at once.

The Stronghold Lord would never say that.

Everyone in the Yangtze River Channel League knew what kind of man Mu Song was, from the most senior Water Dragon Stronghold river bandit to the youngest recruit.

The very embodiment of a passionate sailor! A man who loved the Yangtze even more than his Master, the Seafaring King!

There was no way a man like that would curse the swift ship he treasured as much as his own life for being slow and say he wanted to go ashore—

"I should quit this whole damn business. Fuck this."

"…!"

"…!"

An invisible shock swept across the deck. Mu Song's sudden talk of retirement left everyone silent, faced with the prospect of Water Dragon Stronghold itself disbanding.

The silence might have gone on forever if a liquor barrel hadn't slipped from a dazed river bandit's shoulder.

Thud! Crack!

Full of liquor, it was heavy enough to shatter when it struck the deck. Alcohol splashed everywhere.

Only then did Mu Song snap out of his thoughts. He glared.

"What the hell are you doing?"

Mu Song already had a fearsome face. The river bandit who had dropped the barrel went pale and bent sharply at the waist.

"I-I'm sorry!"

"You bastard. You don't know the value of liquor? I ought to hang you upside down and… What was it? The Yangtze, the Yangtze… Right. I might just sentence you to the Yangtze's dip-and-taste punishment."

"I deserve to die. Please, anything but that…"

"Watch yourself. I'm in a shitty enough mood without you making it worse."

"Yes, sir!"

"Enough. Clean this up and put everything back the way it was. Bring another barrel of liquor, too."

"Pardon? But…"

"Are you insane? How dare you talk back? Get moving!"

"A-at once, sir!"

As the subordinate hurried away, shouting frantic acknowledgments, Mu Song let out a deep sigh.

Nothing is going right.

It wasn't just a complaint. Nothing was going right.

Even good fortune would not have been enough to make up for it, yet one bad thing after another kept happening.

He had reluctantly left his home base in Sichuan for Hubei. Not long ago, he had also had to part with Hwang Chung, the Yangtze One Saber, who had been like family to him.

Thinking he had to repay the gratitude and grudges he owed Hwang Chung, Mu Song had agreed to take Jin Taekyung's group as far as Henan. And sure enough, the worst had happened.

I was going to keep pretending I didn't know.

An unidentified old master who had clearly achieved Returned to Youth.

That beast wearing the guise of a young medical apprentice had realized that his identity had been exposed.

That monstrous old man. Who the hell is he?

From what Mu Song had observed, very few people in the traveling party knew the truth. The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, and Jin Taekyung, at most?

Cheongpung was impossible to predict, but even he quieted down in front of Mungyeong. Chances were he knew, too.

Damn it. If I'd known this would happen, I should've taken the other ship.

Water Dragon Stronghold had two swift ships heading toward Henan. Jeok Cheongang had insisted on splitting the passengers between them because there were so many, and Mu Song hadn't dared defy the Fire King.

Thinking of the Deputy Stronghold Lord traveling comfortably aboard the other swift ship, more than a hundred jang[2414] ahead, was enough to make his stomach hurt.

Compared to this, that ship's a flower garden. A goddamn flower garden.

At least the people aboard the other ship could be reasoned with.

Gung Gibang's smell was a problem you could solve by holding your breath for a moment, and the strange snake Cheongpung called Mimi was surprisingly entertaining to watch when it performed tricks.

But this ship?

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. Fire King Jeok Cheongang. And another old monster hiding his identity.

It was a gathering of monsters.

At least Jin Taekyung, his junior in name only, still spoke politely to him. And after seeing Mu Song so often, Jeok Cheongang treated him more or less like a person.

The last one was the problem.

Those eyes…

Mu Song shuddered involuntarily at the memory of Mungyeong's cold gaze.

One of the senior river bandits, who had been watching his Stronghold Lord's strange behavior for some time, came over and asked cautiously, "Stronghold Lord, are you all right?"

"Do I look all right?"

"Not at all, sir."

"Then why ask? You know what's going on."

"I worry about you, and that's the thanks I get? Anyway, what did that old monster threaten you with to make you look so—mmph!"

[2414] A jang is ten ja, or approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 feet). A hundred jang is approximately 303 meters (994 feet).

Mu Song's hand shot out at the speed of light and clamped over his subordinate's mouth. His eyes darted around the deck.

Only after checking twice, then a third time, that no one had heard did his anger surge.

"Have you lost your mind? Do you have a death wish?"

"Mmph, phew!"

The senior river bandit finally pulled free and stammered, "I-I'm sorry, sir. It just slipped out."

"I've told you again and again. Neither you nor the others are to say a word about him. Understood?"

"Yes, sir."

The senior river bandit was one of the few who had seen Mungyeong's true identity for himself.

Mu Song sighed deeply at the man's anxious, darting eyes before speaking.

"More importantly, did you make sure everyone understood the orders I gave earlier?"

The senior river bandit nodded.

"Yes, sir. Just as you said, I made it clear they're not to go anywhere near the stern."

"Anyone get suspicious?"

There were dozens of river bandits aboard. With that many people, there was bound to be an idiot or two who couldn't take a hint.

"One did. Chunsam. Even after I said it was your order, he asked me about it three times. Nearly gave me a heart attack."

Mu Song ground his teeth.

"I knew it'd be that bastard. Where's Chunsam now?"

"We dunked him in the Yangtze and hauled him back out. He's been tossed down below. He won't be saying anything like that again."

"Whew. Good work. Keep the others in line even when I'm away. One slip, and every last one of us could end up drowned at the bottom of the Yangtze along with the swift ship."

Mu Song's expression darkened.

As if the monster known as the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, weren't enough, now an unidentified old monster who had achieved Returned to Youth was aboard as well. Mu Song almost missed the days when he hadn't known.

Seeing his mighty Stronghold Lord look so vulnerable, the senior river bandit asked anxiously, "At this rate, are we ever going to make it back to Sichuan? We've already been away from the Water Dragon Stronghold for nearly two months. I'm worried it might stay vacant forever."

“Don’t say such unlucky things. They say you can survive even in a tiger’s den if you keep your head.”

“That’s a tiger. Against a Returned to Youth Supreme Peak master, I don’t think keeping your head a hundred times over would help…”

Come to think of it, he was right.

Mu Song had no answer. He shut his mouth.

That was when a voice came from behind him.

“I brought the liquor barrel. Where should I put it?”

There was only one person who would be talking about a liquor barrel right now.

Irritation flared. Without even turning around, Mu Song snapped, “I’ve been letting it slide, but that useless bastard has been getting on my nerves since—”

“Did you just call me a useless bastard?”

“…Huh?”

A moment passed that felt like an eternity.

The senior river bandit was staring over Mu Song’s shoulder, mouth hanging open. Mu Song knew at once that he was thoroughly fucked.

Something else he’d forgotten flashed through his mind.

Ah. I left a spare liquor barrel at the stern.

No wonder his subordinate had started to say something when Mu Song told him to bring another one, then stopped.

Mu Song felt faint. He hadn’t been afraid even when he was caught in the whirlpool at Tianling Falls, but now he was sweating enough to bathe his neck in it.

“Great Hero Mu Song.”

Mu Song squeezed his eyes shut. Then he slowly turned around, forcing a smile.

The one person he never wanted to meet, even in his dreams, was standing there.

“O-oh, Mungyeong. W-what brings you here?”

“Nothing in particular.”

Mungyeong smiled like any other boy his age.

“I was watching the Yangtze from the stern when your subordinate came by. He said Great Hero Mu Song had ordered him to bring a liquor barrel…”

“I-I did?”

“Didn’t you?”

“Well, I… I don’t remember giving an order like that…”

A river bandit appeared behind Mungyeong with a barrel on his shoulder and called out briskly, “Stronghold Lord! I brought the liquor barrel you ordered!”

Mu Song fought down the urge to tear the man’s mouth apart.

“I… I do remember giving that order. Yes. I did. It was a clear mistake.”

“A mistake. I see.”

Mu Song felt Mungyeong’s gaze travel from one part of his body to another.

It had to be his imagination that made him feel as though Mungyeong was looking at his lethal acupoints.

Fortunately, perhaps his desperate wish had reached the heavens. Mungyeong soon withdrew his gaze and spoke.

“Great Hero Jeok was beside himself with rage. He said that if it happened again, you’d better be prepared.”

Of course, Jeok Cheongang hadn’t flown into a rage or said anything of the sort.

But Mu Song wasn’t stupid enough to miss what Mungyeong meant.

“Y-yes, I understand. Tell Great Hero Jeok I’ll bear it in mind. But…”

“Go ahead.”

“What if someone absolutely has to go to the stern? For ship’s business, say. Or to bring meals.”

Mungyeong thought for a moment before answering. “Great Hero Jeok told me to pass along instructions for that, too. If it’s ship’s business, you’re to come alone and take care of it. And you’re to deliver the meals yourself.”

“…You mean I have to do all that alone?”

“Would you rather not?”

Mu Song’s face went rigid.

“It’s been my lifelong wish. I couldn’t be happier.”

“I see. Then I’ll be going. See you at dinner.”

Mungyeong headed back toward the stern, leaving Mu Song behind. Then he stopped and turned around.

“Oh, and one more thing.”

“What else? Is there still something you need to tell me?”

“Two portions will be enough for each meal until we reach Henan.”

“Huh?”

“Young Master Jin is going to have no appetite for the time being, so keep that in mind.”

They had at least ten days left before they reached Henan. No matter how poor someone’s appetite was, going ten whole days without eating was absurd.

Curiosity got the better of Mu Song. He mustered his courage and asked, “Um… did something happen to Junior Jin?”

“Oh.”

A dimple appeared beside Mungyeong’s mouth.

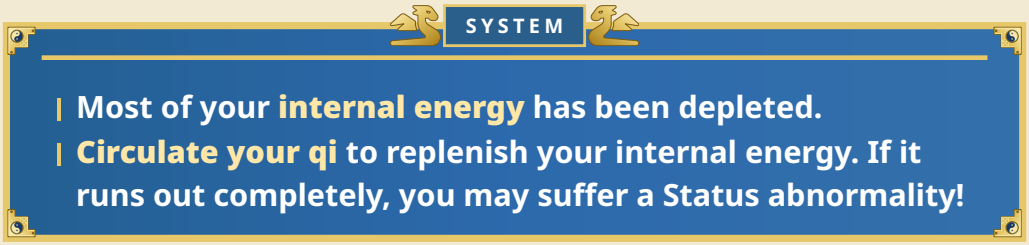
His smile was so natural that even Mu Song, who thought of him as a monster, mistook him for an innocent boy for an instant.

“He must be busy right now. Very busy.”

Sometimes I feel like I've become a human smartphone.

A System window had appeared before my eyes, much like the warning you get when your battery falls below fifteen percent.

Beep.



But why was I more puzzled than alarmed?

If I ran out of internal energy right now, I'd sink in the middle of this vast stretch of the Yangtze. Yet the danger bothered me less than the questions.

And one reason for that was surely the presence of something approaching from far away.

Ssssh.

A large body drew closer with remarkable stealth. The fin poking above the water looked oddly familiar.

No, fuck.

Why the hell was there a shark in the Yangtze?

Chapter 511

Deep in the night, with darkness on every side, two ships raced along the Yangtze under full sail.

Whoosh!

Any sailor with good night vision would have been startled once by the vessels' extraordinary speed, then twice by the flag visible beyond their faint torchlight.

The Yangtze River Channel League.

Those five characters, written in blue dye, were a sure pass for traveling safely and freely across the vast Yangtze.

But the flag was both a pass and a symbol of raiders.

"What the…"

"Th-the Yangtze River Channel League! They're river bandits!"

"Eek!"

The passengers aboard a pleasure boat, who had been holding a feast on the water, fell into a panic. The fishermen hauling in their nets some distance away reacted differently.

"What the hell are they screaming for? They ought to get back to guzzling their booze."

"Pay them no mind. It's not like this is the first time. But is that the swift ship the Yangtze River Channel League's so proud of?"

"I've seen one before. It's damn fast, so that must be it."

"If I had a ship like that, I wouldn't want for anything."

"How many more fish are you planning to catch?"

"What are you talking about? If I had a swift ship, why would I keep fishing to make my fortune? I'd become a river bandit on the spot."

There was only a hair's breadth between a fisherman and a river bandit. When making a living got hard, a man could take the net and harpoon he'd used to catch fish just days before and turn to raiding.

Perhaps that was why the fishermen showed no particular fear of the river bandits.

"Oh, they're coming this way."

"Let them. They won't rob us."

"Damn it. We're so poor even river bandits won't rob us."

The fishermen chatted as they watched with keen interest.

Fishermen were as tough as any sailors on the river. Even a green river bandit who knew nothing of the world left them alone. He might come looking for a few coins and end up skewered on a harpoon.

The Yangtze River Channel League saw it much the same way. Robbing fishermen for a few coins wasn't worth the trouble.

So the fishermen watched as though it were someone else's house on fire.

But a little while later, when the swift ships picked up speed and disappeared, they tilted their heads.

"Huh? They're just leaving?"

"So they are. Think there's a young master from some powerful family aboard that pleasure boat? Someone they'd regret crossing?"

"They didn't even stop to check who was aboard."

"Forget it. What does it matter? Let's finish hauling in the nets and get home before it gets any later."

"Yeah, all right."

Once the two swift ships had vanished without incident, lively music rose from the pleasure boat again. The fishermen smacked their lips, then turned back to their work.

Half a shichen[2415] later, a strange cry rang out from somewhere.

"Kkyat-meu!"

At first, the fishermen thought little of it.

"Good grief. They ought to show some restraint. They're making an awful racket."

"Someone over there knows how to party."

"I'm already half dead from exhaustion, and now I've got to listen to 'Kkyat-meu'? I ought to punch a hole in the bottom of their boat."

The graying fisherman who had muttered irritably pulled on his net again.

That was when another cry rang out.

"I'm going! I'm going! I'm going! Zoom, here I go!"

"Yeah, yeah. I'm coming right now, you bastards."

The fisherman snatched up his harpoon, eyes rolling back in fury.

"Fuck this. I'll hurry over, punch a hole in their hull, and come right back, so nobody try to stop me."

"Wait. Just wait a moment."

The other fishermen had finally noticed something odd. They pricked up their ears.

"That… doesn't sound like it's coming from the pleasure boat."

"You're right. Then what is it?"

"The sound came from over…"

As if on cue, they all raised their heads and looked around for its source.

[2415] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

The music stopped abruptly aboard the pleasure boat as well. Apparently wondering what was going on, men and women dressed in dazzling silk stood at the bow and stared out at the pitch-black Yangtze.

“Did we hear wrong?”

“I definitely heard something strange.”

“Huh. It’s not like a ghost’s bewitched us.”

Just as everyone began to doubt their ears—

Whoooosh!

Water roared as it was violently split apart, and a person appeared.

No, strictly speaking, he wasn’t alone.

“…Oh, my.”

“W-what the hell is that?”

Everyone stared wide-eyed at the uninvited guest.

It was astonishing enough to see a young man crossing the Yangtze in the middle of the night, bare from the waist up. But when they recognized the enormous creature swimming ahead of him, bound by some strange rope, they could hardly believe their eyes.

“A s-sa-eo! It’s a sa-eo! A man’s riding a sa-eo!”[2416]

The shout shattered the silence that had settled over the river.

And everyone realized that the bizarre noise they had heard was part of the reality unfolding before their eyes.

Whoosh, whoosh, whoosh!

A sa-eo. A monstrous fish with a huge, hideous body and a vicious nature, said to devour even humans.

And now one was swimming with a man riding behind it.

What was more—

“T-there’s more than one!”

“One fin, two… five! There are five sa-eo!”

It was a shocking sight. Sa-eo mostly lived in the open sea; seeing even one in the Yangtze was rare. Seeing five together was almost unthinkable.

But if that had been all, the fishermen wouldn’t have stood there speechless.

The reason they had been rendered speechless was simple.

“Tell me… am I dreaming?”

“I think I’m having the same dream.”

“It looks to me like that young man has put some sort of bridle on the sa-eo and is, well… driving it.”

“I don’t know what that is. It’s frightening…”

[2416] Sa-eo (□□) is a Sino-Korean word for “shark,” distinct from the ordinary Korean word sang-eo.

Just as the fishermen said, each of the five sa-eo wore something like a bridle. A faintly glowing rope was wound around their snouts, its ends held tight in the young man's hand.

"Turn left!"

The young man shouted and pulled his wrist.

Whoooosh!

The sa-eo all moved left at once.

"Turn right!"

He twisted his wrist the other way.

Whoosh!

The sa-eo changed course with it.

With their great stamina and speed, the five sa-eo cut through the water ahead while the young man followed, keeping himself atop the river on his two feet.

They were every bit as fast as the swift ships that had passed earlier—faster, if anything.

"What in the world am I looking at?"

As someone muttered in a daze, the young man closed the distance in the blink of an eye and waved to the fishermen.

"Welcome, fishermen."

"…!"

"Sorry to ask when we've only just met, but could you give me directions? Did two ships pass through here earlier? Maybe half a shichen to one shichen ago?"

The fisherman who had been planning to attack the pleasure boat lowered his harpoon and answered awkwardly.

"W-we saw 'em. You mean the swift ships?"

"That's right. Yangtze River Channel League. There's a kid standing at the stern who looks like he has one hell of a nasty temper."

"I-I don't know about the kid. But the swift ships went that way. About half a shichen ago."

"Half a shichen? I've almost caught up. Whew, fuck. I damn near shit blood getting here."

"…?"

The fisherman paused at language as colorful as anything he'd heard from a sailor. Just then, the young man loosened the strange rope in his hand.

The fishermen belatedly realized that one of the sa-eo had been released and panicked.

"Urgh!"

"Th-the sa-eo's loose!"

"Back! Back! Row!"

But what they feared didn’t happen.

The sa-eo merely blinked at the young man as meekly as a crucian carp. The young man looked unconcerned.

“Sa-eo? Oh, you mean a shark.”

“W-what do you think you’re doing?”

“I know what you’re worried about, but my boy doesn’t bite.”

“Your boy?”

“I’ll show you. Here, fin.”

The fishermen’s eyes bulged.

No sooner had the young man held out his hand than the sa-eo, its eyes darting about, offered him its fin.

“See? He listens. I told you he’s a good boy.”

Not good. More like he’d been made good.

The fishermen swallowed the words before they could reach their lips.

The sa-eo’s ragged fin and trembling body were just their imagination. They had to be.

Whether he noticed the fishermen staring at his muscles or not, the young man went on calmly.

“He’s got anger-management issues, but he’s been controlling them fine since I beat the shit out of him. You’ll be all right. You won’t get another chance like this, so take one off my hands.”

“P-pardon?”

“As thanks for the directions. I need to let them go soon anyway. Got anything to eat? I’ve had raw fish three meals a day, and my stomach feels like an aquarium.”

The fisherman had no idea what was happening, but instinct told him what would be best for his safety. Trembling like a leaf, he handed over the food tucked inside his clothes.

“H-h-here.”

“Ah, yes. Th-thank you.”

The young man took the lightly seasoned rice ball and flashed a playful grin.

“Then catch lots of fish.”

Whoosh, whoosh, whoosh!

That was the last they saw of him.

The fishermen stared blankly as the sight of one man and four fish vanished into the distant darkness in an instant. Then they looked at the only trace he had left behind.

Shudder!

The sa-eo had foolishly picked a fight with the wrong person, been thoroughly beaten, and now feared human beings themselves. The shark—or rather, the white sturgeon—trembled violently.

And the fisherman who had become its new owner realized that his fate had just changed dramatically.

"…I guess I don't need a swift ship anymore."

That was the moment a new Morning Star was born among the river bandits.

I guarantee no one in either the modern world or Murim has ever experienced water skiing as eco-friendly as mine.

Whoosh!

"Shark number four. Your posture's slipping."

Flinch!

"Yeah, you. The one who just flinched. What, are you an individualist?"

Swish!

"Just keep going like that. You're not going alone. Match fins with your friends and go together."

Of course, I'd used a little violence.

A few punches hadn't been enough to satisfy them, apparently, because they kept coming at me. So I worked over their fins and pulled out a few teeth.

If an environmental group had seen me, they'd have called me a destroyer of nature whose crimes outraged heaven and humanity, and a fish abuser doomed to suffer even after death.

I hadn't cared from the start.

It's not like I'm Shanks.[2417]

A bighearted guy who gives up an arm because a shark looks hungry only exists in old comic books.

I caught one, taught it a lesson, then called over more of its kind and founded the Shark Water-Ski Team. I called it the Catch-'Em Fish Farm.

Still, I wouldn't have made it this far without them.

I looked fondly at the team members who had carried out their mission so well.

Over half a day of alternating between rest and travel, I'd replenished some of the internal energy that had bottomed out and closed much of the distance to the swift ships. Their reward for all that hard work was freedom.

"All right, everyone. Off you go."

[2417] Shanks is a character in the Japanese manga One Piece who loses an arm saving a boy from a sea creature.

I was untying the ropes around their snouts—or rather, the Water God Dragon's sinew I'd stashed away last time—when a voice reached my ear.

"…Would you look at this lunatic."

I turned my head.

Beyond the deep darkness, someone was walking toward me across the surface of the water.

Chapter 512

“…Would you look at this lunatic.”

The voice was thick with disbelief, and the red hair stood out even in the deep darkness.

I widened my eyes at the last person I expected to see.

“Oh? What brings you here?”

“That…”

Jeok Cheongang hesitated, his voice trailing off.

“I got seasick, so I got off the ship for a bit.”

“Ah, seasick. The Old Master got seasick.”

This wasn’t just any Supreme Peak master. This was the Fire King himself.

Spider-Man retiring because he was afraid of heights would have been more believable than Jeok Cheongang suffering from seasickness.

“What’s with that smile?”

I forced down the corners of my mouth and answered.

“I just have one of those faces that looks like it’s smiling.”

“Want me to make it look ready to die?”

“No, thank you.”

“If you have a complaint, say it to my face. Don’t grin at me like a creep.”

“I never said I had a complaint. But what are you hiding behind your back?”

“H-hiding? What would this old man be hiding?”

“The thing you’re holding in your clasped hands. Whatever could it be that you’re so embarrassed you have to hide it? Are you some kind of Murim high-school girl boss?”

“I said I’m not hiding anything!”

Jeok Cheongang shouted at my sharp observation and awkwardly brought his hands out from behind his back.

He was fiddling with something wrapped in a large leaf, and the conflict in his movements was obvious.

Looks like food. And damn, does it smell good.

The meaty aroma carried on the wind was incredible. My stomach had spent more than half a day digesting nothing but raw fish and grilled fish, so of course it began to churn.

Grrrrowl.

“Is it pork?”

“Beef.”

“You didn’t catch it fishing, did you?”

“Of course not. It was loaded onto the ship beforehand. Those river bandits rubbed it with spices and grilled it. It’s quite good.”

“That sounds delicious.”

“Two people could be eating it while five dropped dead, and neither would notice.”

“That sounds like deadly poison.”

“Then give me some. Let me taste it.”

“Hah. You’re not even funny. Did you think I brought it for you?”

“Ah, so you packed it for yourself?”

“Of course.”

“So you got seasick and abandoned the swift ship. It sailed off and left you in the middle of a river you hate, but you still made sure to bring food…”

I looked at Jeok Cheongang and slowly nodded.

“That makes perfect sense.”

“…!”

“Give it here.”

Jeok Cheongang answered gruffly.

“Here. Stuff your face.”

“Why, thank you.”

“I brought it for myself, but I’ve lost my appetite. That’s why I’m giving it to you.”

“I know. I know everything. Why do you keep explaining something the whole world already knows?”

“…Damn it.”

I let his grumbling go in one ear and out the other as I devoured the meat.

By the time my short but fiercely fought meal was coming to an end, the four sharks that had been circling nearby while watching me warily had disappeared from sight. So had the swift ship that had been faintly visible in the distance.

“Ah, I missed it.”

“The sa-eo[2418]?”

“No. I was going to let them go soon anyway.”

“Then the swift ship?”

I sucked the seasoning off my fingers.

“Yes.”

“You don’t seem particularly disappointed for someone who missed it.”

“I’ve got no reason to be.”

[2418] Sa-eo is a Sino-Korean word for shark; the ordinary Korean word is sang-eo.

"What a strange fellow. Didn't you use the sa-eo[2419] to chase the swift ship all the way here so you could catch up?"

He was right. I couldn't deny it.

But…

"I was starting to regret it."

"Regret?"

"Yes. Regret."

"Why?"

"Because doing it this way… there's no point."

I'd caught the sharks and come this far under the excuse that I needed to replenish my internal energy. But the closer I got to the swift ship, the harder it became to ignore the unease I felt.

Maybe that was because I'd gone against the way I'd lived until now.

I'd let myself grow lax without realizing it.

I already had power I could never have imagined in the past. Enormous wealth, fame, and the attention of the world followed my name like tags.

Maybe I'd gotten carried away by the rewards that came with it all.

I wouldn't have done this before.

To obtain something, you had to pay a price equal to its value.

If I had still been the F-rank Hunter who had secured a home for my family in an expensive Safety Sector far beyond our means and thrown myself into raids without rest to pay my mother's hospital bills, I would never have used some cheap trick involving sharks.

Neither would the version who'd endured a year of brutal training on Mount Jiuhua without ever fleeing back to reality.

"I should've stayed back there and held on to a reef."

Jeok Cheongang frowned at my half-joking complaint.

"Then you'd have fallen even farther behind the swift ship."

"So what if I did? I'd have learned something for every bit of distance I lost."

"You might never catch up before we reach Henan."

"That's fine. Catching up isn't the goal."

Jeok Cheongang's stiff expression slowly relaxed.

"You realized the most important thing in half a day."

I lowered my head toward him. At that moment, I couldn't bring myself to meet his eyes.

"It took me a whole half day. I'm sorry."

[2419] Sa-eo is a Sino-Korean word for shark; the ordinary Korean word is sang-eo.

“At first, I waited because I was worried about you. After that, I meant to give you a thorough scolding.”

From Jeok Cheongang’s perspective, it must have been utterly absurd. He had even outsourced my training, only for me to put together a Shark Water-Ski Team and use a cheap trick.

But his voice was gentle now.

“I did mean to scold you… but this will do. Try to catch up on your own strength from here.”

Jeok Cheongang stepped forward. The ripples spreading from his toes were far gentler than mine.

He noticed me watching and tossed out a remark.

“Our sect’s martial arts have an especially violent flow. It took me years to calm that storm on my own.”

“Years…”

“You already know this isn’t something you can learn overnight.”

“I know. I also know that it isn’t overnight. There are still ten days left.”

I shrugged and added,

“And I have two excellent advisors beside me to show me the way. That should make it a lot easier for me than it was for you, Old Master.”

The Fire King and the Slaughter Saint. Both were far stronger than I was, and both had traveled the path I was on long before me.

Those were much better circumstances than Jeok Cheongang had faced when he’d had to figure it all out for himself.

Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh.

“Look at this sly bastard. Proudly announcing you’ll take another shortcut.”

“I’m hurt that you’d call it a shortcut. Most people call this a fortuitous encounter.”

“Hah. You certainly have a way with words.”

“But you’re not denying it.”

“Because, now that I think about it, you’re right. But that isn’t the only difference between us.”

“…?”

“Martial talent. With that outrageously excellent body and talent of yours, you should be able to sprout at least one bud before reaching Henan.”

A towering tree and a gorgeous flower both began with a single small bud.

It had taken Jeok Cheongang years to bloom. For me, it would be different.

He watched me in silence for a while, then spoke abruptly.

“I can’t see the ship anymore. I’d better hurry after those damned bastards.”

"Take care. If you run into a sa-eo[2420], catch it and try riding it."

"So you don't intend to come with me."

What a mischievous old man. He'd already guessed, but he was testing me anyway. I let out a quiet laugh.

"I'll follow in a little while."

"A little while? It'll take you half a day."

"It still doesn't sit right with me. So yes, that's the plan."

"Tsk, tsk. You certainly know how to make life difficult for yourself."

He said that, but he couldn't hide the smile tugging at his mouth.

Jeok Cheongang looked at me for a moment, then turned and shot off into the darkness.

Even after he dwindled to a speck and vanished, I stayed where I was for a long time.

At last, the sun rose, and the sunlight began to heat the river.

Splash.

I stepped forward through the rough current.

The goal was the swift ship—no, Henan.

The entire Murim world seethed like water in a cauldron.

What had begun as a simple rumor spread in every direction on the lips of gossipmongers. Then one day, dozens—hundreds—of messenger pigeons rose from Mount Song in Henan, each carrying a letter that would turn the rumor into fact.

To all of Murim.

The letters began with that brief sentence and were delivered across the land. Those who learned their contents realized the truth.

An era of upheaval had arrived, and no one could avoid it.

The New Murim Alliance.

An old veteran of the martial world, his body covered in scars, remembered the Great Faction War, when corpses had piled into mountains and blood had run in rivers. Young martial artists born in peaceful times, who had never lived through those horrors, were swept up in all manner of emotions.

"The time has come."

"At last…!"

Troubled times gave birth to heroes.

[2420] Sa-eo is a Sino-Korean word for shark; the ordinary Korean word is sang-eo.

Some could not hide their excitement at the thought that their chance to make a name for themselves had arrived.

“H-how can this be?”

“So it’s finally come to this.”

Others trembled at the thought of the death soon to come.

But the orthodox Murim of the present era was the victor proven by history.

Hadn’t even the mighty Demonic Cult failed to take the Central Plains and been driven back decades ago?

A bloody storm had swept through Shaolin and Sichuan, but to most martial artists, that was a reason to be angry and fight—not to retreat in fear.

“Anyone with the spirit to fight, any martial artist who bears a weapon—stand beneath the Murim Alliance’s banner!”

The call rang out across the land.

And some answered it.

“Shaolin of Mount Song requests to join the alliance.”

“Huashan will join the Murim Alliance as well.”

The Nine Sects and One Gang. The Five Great Families.

The fifteen pillars that supported Murim began to move.

Shaolin Temple and Huashan were the first to raise the Murim Alliance’s banner. The other renowned sects and great factions soon rushed to request membership too.

In crowded markets, pleasure houses, and inns, gossips talked of little else day after day.

“Have you heard? They say the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families have all joined the alliance.”

“It’s only been a day since the news broke. Already?”

“You’re behind. Of course they have. The question is what the other sects will do.”

“I heard the Shandong Yue Family plans to join too.”

“That’s a surprise. Aren’t they in an awkward position between Murim and the authorities?”

“Any news from the Hahou Sword Family?”

“I understand the former Family Head died in the Great Faction War. The current Family Head will probably join the war to avenge his father, if nothing else. Everyone knows Dark Heaven is the Demonic Cult’s successor by now.”

“The Murim Alliance is the symbol of orthodox Murim. The problem is those who practice demonic and heterodox arts—and the Outer Lands.”

Even as the gossips talked, people throughout Murim were making their own moves.

And as the fervor spread like wildfire, ten days passed.

Chapter 513

Xixia in Henan Province, situated along a tributary of the Yangtze, was packed with people again today.

Boats of every size crowded the ferry landing. Merchants stood beside piles of goods, haggling with fire in their eyes.

“Come on, cheap, cheap! Musk that’s good for your virility! Just one silver nyang!”

“I don’t need that crap.”

“You there, lovely Young Lady! Wouldn’t you like a hand mirror?”

“I’m not buying that crap.”

“…What a pair of fucking assholes.”

Every kind of noise rang through the marketplace.

But in the end, the atmosphere of a place depended on the kind of people gathered there. The merchant who stopped a passing young martial artist out of habit had picked the wrong man.

“Sir, you look like a martial hero on your way to Mount Song. Could I interest you in a well-honed wea—ah!”

The merchant broke off with a gasp. The handsome face that had first caught his eye no longer registered.

The moment he saw the three characters embroidered in black thread across the young martial artist’s dark blue silk uniform, along with the dragon pattern, the merchant let out a cry that sounded almost like a moan.

“B-Black Dragon Demon Gate!”

“…!”

Though the cry had not been particularly loud, the four-character name Black Dragon Demon Gate was enough to plunge the bustling thoroughfare into a pit of silence.

“B-Black Dragon Demon Gate?”

“It’s them. The unorthodox bastards making a name for themselves in Gansu.”

“I heard they arrived in Henan late yesterday… Could they be here to join the alliance?”

Silence spread in an instant. Merchants stopped calling out, commoners stopped wandering, and even the armed martial artists traveling in groups halted to look toward the cry.

Under all those eyes, the young man from the Black Dragon Demon Gate smiled at the merchant.

“You have a good eye for a merchant, recognizing our sect’s insignia.”

“Th-that’s…”

“You don’t seem to have much to do with Murim. Are you from Gansu? Or did you pick up a little knowledge from the Third Rate swordsmen who come here as customers?”

He glanced over the merchant’s shoulder at the weapons neatly arranged on the stall and clicked his tongue.

“Nothing but cheap junk. I wouldn’t take any of it for free. Show me your best.”

“Pardon?”

“Ah, I forgot you’re a merchant. Not your best, then. Your most expensive.”

“Y-yes, sir.”

With trembling hands, the merchant pulled out an iron chest he had tucked deep inside the stall and opened it. The young martial artist whistled at the lone sword inside, lying there without even a proper scabbard.

“Hm. This doesn’t belong in a place like this.”

The onlookers, especially the martial artists, found themselves nodding. The sword looked quite old, but its blade gleamed in five brilliant colors, and its edge had lost none of its sharpness.

It could easily be called a famed sword.

The merchant sensed greed in the eyes of several martial artists and drew his shoulders in.

“M-my late father left it to me.”

“Was your late father a martial artist?”

“Th-that’s impossible. Somehow, he came to own the sword, but he only told me to keep it secret from others and preserve it as a family heirloom for generations…”

“No wonder. There must have been plenty of people who wanted a sword like this.”

Too much greed led to bloodshed. Most martial artists would rather take a famed sword by force than pay several hundred silver nyang for it. Threatening someone with a cheap iron sword was far easier than coming up with the silver.

“Your late father must have been quite wise.”

“Y-yes. He was.”

“But it seems you didn’t inherit his wisdom, bringing it out like this.”

“Th-that’s…!”

The merchant could not finish. The young martial artist let out a quiet laugh. He knew exactly what the merchant had swallowed back.

The man facing him belonged to the Black Dragon Demon Gate, an unorthodox faction. With a knife at his throat, the merchant had no time to think things through. Fear that he might lose his head if he tried to pass off another weapon had paralyzed him.

This was a first for the merchant. For the young martial artist, it was familiar.

“I understand. Most people who meet me think and act just as you did.”

The young martial artist looked the merchant up and down. The merchant sat with his mouth shut, like someone who had swallowed his tongue.

“So I’ll save you.”

Suspicion flickered across the merchant’s eyes.

“Wh-what do you mean?”

“I’ll pay for the sword and take it.”

“Ah!”

The merchant’s face lit up. His heart had already been burning with anxiety. He had brought out the sword because staying alive came first, but now more than a few people had seen it. Once this young man left, wandering martial artists and petty thieves would surely catch the scent and come after him.

If the young man bought it, though, that problem was solved. He would still have to leave the area soon—there would be people after the silver he received—but he could keep his life and take enough money with him to live comfortably elsewhere.

The merchant finished calculating and bowed at once.

“G-Great Hero, if you would do that, I couldn’t ask for anything more!”

“You’re not completely clueless.”

With a quiet laugh, the young martial artist tossed a money pouch from his robes onto the stall.

Clink.

It landed with a weighty rattle. The merchant opened it and blinked.

“G-Great Hero. This…”

The young man had taken the sword from the chest and was examining it from every angle. He glanced over.

“What is it?”

“I’m afraid you may have the amount wrong.”

“The amount?”

The merchant swallowed hard at the young man’s puzzled look. The sword was a family heirloom, and by its value alone, he ought to receive at least several hundred silver nyang. The sum in the pouch was absurdly small.

“Twenty silver nyang is a little…”

“I disagree.”

“Pardon?”

“That’s plenty. I deducted the price of your life.”

The young man’s voice turned cold. So did the air around him.

The commoners watching with mingled curiosity and fear shuddered. The neighboring merchants who had shared the man's hardships deliberately looked away.

But not everyone there stayed silent.

"The Black Dragon Demon Gate must have quite a reputation if even some wet-behind-the-ears brat is throwing his weight around like this."

A rough voice rang out, and the crowd parted. A middle-aged man walked through the gap, baring yellow teeth in a grin at the young martial artist.

"I won't waste words. Put down that sword and get the hell out of here."

The young man blinked.

"Were you speaking to me?"

"Ha! Look at this brat. Who else would I be talking to?"

"Don't misunderstand. I heard you perfectly well…"

He looked the middle-aged man up and down before continuing.

"I just never imagined someone like you would dare say it to my face."

"…Someone like me? Say something like that?"

The middle-aged man stared at him for a moment, then burst into laughter.

"Someone like me! Ha! Hahaha! You're funnier than you look."

"How strange. No one in Gansu ever told me I had a talent for comedy."

"Boy, what's your name?"

"I have no reason to tell you, and no intention of doing so. Be on your way."

"You don't look so good. Scared?"

"Not really… I just find talking to someone like you unpleasant."

"Heh."

The middle-aged man laughed, but his eyes gleamed ominously. His scarred, heavily muscled arm was about to move when the young martial artist spoke.

"That's enough, Blood Cudgel."

"…!"

The middle-aged man jerked at the sound of his sobriquet. The martial artists watching were startled too.

Enough was known about Blood Cudgel Do Sangho that his appearance and the red cudgel at his waist made him fairly easy to recognize. What surprised them was the young man's attitude.

Here was a brat in the Black Dragon Demon Gate's uniform, speaking to an accomplished Peak master as though he stood far above him.

Blood Cudgel sensed something was wrong as well.

"You… knew who I was?"

"I'd heard of you. Heard there was a man who'd lick a beggar's ass for silver."

"…!"

His polite speech had vanished, replaced by open insult. Blood Cudgel's eyes widened with rage as the young man went on.

"Now that we've met, it seems what I heard was true. How about an offer?"

"An… offer?"

"I'll give you silver. Lick the top of my foot, and I'll let you live."

"H-how dare you!"

Blood Cudgel trembled. He was a Peak master whose martial prowess no one could dismiss. He wanted to rush forward and smash the brat's head open.

But the name Black Dragon Demon Gate held him back. The young man was so young, yet so calm. Blood Cudgel had a gut feeling that a life-and-death duel with him would not end well.

"…Damn it."

He lowered the weapon he had half-raised. The young martial artist smiled.

"You must really like silver. Ready to lick the top of my foot?"

"You bastard! Shut your mouth!"

His shout, laden with profound internal energy, struck in every direction. Third Rate martial artists whose skills were still meager groaned and stumbled backward. Terrified commoners screamed.

Through the chaos, Blood Cudgel glared at the young man with bloodshot eyes.

"I don't know how important you are, but one day you'll regret what happened here."

The young martial artist clicked his tongue softly.

"You're angry. But I think you'd better stop there."

"I, Blood Cudgel Do Sangho, may forget a favor, but I never forget a grudge! I'll retreat today, but the next time we meet will be the day of your funeral—"

Thud!

Blood sprayed in every direction.

The young martial artist looked at Blood Cudgel's corpse, its head crushed, and sighed.

"I was trying to avoid bloodshed if I could. You could have held back a little longer."

When had he appeared?

An eight-foot-tall man who had crushed Blood Cudgel's head with a swing of his massive two-section staff answered in a halting voice.

"Dare… insult Young Sect Leader. This subordinate… will not tolerate it."

"Well, Blood Cudgel should be all right. You could hardly call him orthodox."

The young martial artist clicked his tongue. Only then did the people grasp what had happened and scatter in every direction, screaming.

"S-someone's been killed!"

"Aaaah!"

"What the hell…!"

Even the martial artists had frozen at the sudden violence. Just then, the young man spotted something beyond the fleeing crowd.

"See? I knew there'd be trouble."

A group of monks in yellow kasayas[2421] was approaching.

"Shaolin Temple…"

[2421] A kasaya is a robe worn by Buddhist monks.

Chapter 514

Shaolin Temple, the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim.[2422]

Whenever turmoil descended on the Central Plains, Shaolin had been at the forefront of the fighting. It had been so a thousand years ago, a hundred years ago, and during the Great Faction War several decades earlier.

They had shed more blood than any other sect in the Murim for it, but no one at Shaolin Temple regretted a drop.

It was what they ought to have done. They had fought for a brighter future, for a greater cause.

The monks making their way along a well-paved road held that same conviction in their hearts.

Whoosh!

Their yellow kasayas[2423] whipped in the wind.

Not a breath of wind stirred on that clear spring day, but the monks' swift movement techniques raised a wind of their own.

"Xixia is in sight."

There were twenty Shaolin monks. At the words of the martial monk leading them, a middle-aged monk nodded.

"Good. We won't be late."

"Yes. The appointed time is around shenshi.[2424] We still have nearly one shichen.[2425]"

Xixia covered a broad area, but these martial monks had reached a considerable realm. Even at an ordinary walking pace, one shichen[2426] was more than enough time to reach its ferry landing.

Having made the calculation, the middle-aged monk shook the Zen staff in his hand.

Clatter.

The martial monks understood the signal and stopped short.

Halting a movement technique at such speed in an instant spoke to the depth of their martial-arts mastery.

The middle-aged monk regarded them with satisfaction, then slowly turned.

Behind them stood someone with a conical hat pulled low over their face.

[2422] Mount Tai and the Northern Dipper are prominent landmarks used together as an honorific for a preeminent authority.

[2423] A kasaya is an outer robe worn by a Buddhist monk.

[2424] Shenshi is a traditional time period corresponding to approximately 3–5 p.m.

[2425] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[2426] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

"We're about to enter the main road. The commoners may be alarmed. May we slow down from here?"

The middle-aged monk spoke with utmost respect. Beneath the hat, tightly pressed lips parted.

"Please do."

The voice was so hoarse that there was no guessing the speaker's age. Grief and pity flickered across every face, including the middle-aged monk's.

"Thank you for granting permission, Martial… Uncle."[2427]

That form of address still felt unfamiliar. The middle-aged monk turned, and the others resumed walking toward Xixia.

Then—

"Aaaaaah!"

"M-murder! Someone's been killed!"

Faint screams and shouts carried from far away.

Before the middle-aged monk, with his profound internal energy, could alert the other disciples, the person in the conical hat spoke.

"It seems we should hurry."

"…!"

Whoosh!

Twenty figures came hurtling through the wind.

At the sight of their fluttering yellow kasayas[2428] and the grim faces drawing rapidly closer, the young martial artist of the Black Dragon Demon Gate frowned.

"Shaolin…"

They were the last people he wanted to meet, especially now, when his simple-minded subordinate had killed someone in the middle of a main road.

"You idiot."

Thwack!

The eight-foot-tall giant[2429] groaned as the blow struck his shin.

"Young Sect Leader. This subordinate hurts."

"That's why I hit you. I told you to be careful. Why must you act without thinking?"

"He deserved to die."

[2427] "Martial Uncle" addresses someone of the generation above one's teacher within a martial lineage; it does not imply a family relationship.

[2428] A kasaya is an outer robe worn by a Buddhist monk.

[2429] The source describes the giant as eight cheok tall. One Korean cheok is approximately 30.3 cm (11.9 in), making eight cheok about 2.42 m (7 ft 11 in).

“Whew. There’s no getting through to you. Fine. The water’s already spilled. What can we do?”

“We should find a way to put it back.”

At the curt voice, the giant blinked his calf-like eyes.

“Young Sect Leader. Not this subordinate.”

“You don’t have to tell me. I already know.”

The young martial artist turned with a faint smile. Facing the stern middle-aged monk five steps away, he offered a fist-palm salute.[2430]

“An honor to meet Shaolin’s esteemed monks. I didn’t expect to meet Master Jung Ho quite so soon.”

The middle-aged monk, Jung Ho, twitched his thick eyebrows.

“You know me? I don’t believe we’ve met.”

“We haven’t, but I’ve heard plenty about you.”

“This humble monk has no reputation worth speaking of. Nor am I worthy of being called Master.”

“Just as my father said. You really are modest.”

“Your father?”

“He once told me about an exceptionally fiery-tempered monk at Shaolin—ah, a monk of deep Buddhist faith who follows his principles to the letter.”

The young martial artist glanced at the Zen staff in Jung Ho’s hand.

“He also said you wield a Zen staff like a demon. One hung all over with prayer beads.”

“…Amitabha.[2431] You have a sharp eye.”

“I’m glad you’re the man I thought you were. This would have been rather embarrassing otherwise.”

Jung Ho regarded the young martial artist with a grave gaze, then spoke abruptly.

“That is fortunate. As I listen to you, a few things occur to me as well.”

“I’m listening.”

“Your clothing belongs to the Black Dragon Demon Gate of Gansu. Your aura and bearing are far from ordinary. You must be its Young Sect Leader, whom I’ve heard of only by reputation. Am I right?”

The young martial artist smiled and bowed his head.

“Allow me to introduce myself properly. I am Sama Pyo, Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate.”

“I’ve heard much of the Black Dragon Saber. They say you’re a Morning Star in no way inferior to the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.”

A murmur passed through the monks behind Jung Ho.

[2430] A fist-palm salute is a traditional martial greeting made by covering one fist with the opposite palm.

[2431] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, spoken here as a Buddhist invocation.

The sobriquet Black Dragon Saber was that widely known. And as the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, a force counted among the three strongest unorthodox factions, Sama Pyo possessed an impressive background as well.

But none of them saw the sneer that brushed across Sama Pyo's lips as he lowered his head.

When Sama Pyo looked up, he was smiling broadly.

"You praise me too highly. For Master Jung Ho to think so well of an unknown nobody like me—I hardly know what to say."

"I will say it again: I am not worthy of being called Master. Nor do I mean to overestimate you. I speak only of what has been proven. However…"

Jung Ho looked at the corpse lying facedown in a pool of blood.

"I do not yet know the facts surrounding this unfortunate man's death."

Sama Pyo rubbed his stubbled chin.

"Well, that's a long story."

"There is no need to worry. There is a faster way."

Clatter.

At Jung Ho's signal, a lean martial monk stepped forward and examined the body.

Before joining Shaolin, he had traveled as a wandering martial artist and accumulated a wealth of experience. It did not take him long to identify the corpse.

"It's Blood Cudgel."

"Blood Cudgel Do Sangho? Are you certain?"

"Yes. His head was crushed, but I am certain."

"Blood Cudgel. Blood Cudgel…"

Jung Ho ran his fingers over the prayer beads tied to his Zen staff, then turned to Sama Pyo.

"Did you know?"

"Know what?"

"That Blood Cudgel killed five innocent merchants in Shaanxi two days ago and has been on the run since?"

"Did he?"

"He must have thought himself safe because he did it in a remote mountain area. Bold enough to come all the way to Henan, at any rate."

"…Good heavens. What a monstrous man."

Sama Pyo made a show of frowning.

Blood Cudgel's crime wasn't what troubled him. What troubled him was the intelligence network that had uncovered and relayed the deed of an experienced wandering martial artist in just two days.

Is this the Murim Alliance's reach, or Shaolin's strength?

Blood Cudgel Do Sangho was a fairly well-known wandering martial artist, but that was because his methods were cruel and he went around boasting about himself.

The Murim was full of masters far above his level. To know this much about a man like Blood Cudgel suggested an intelligence network woven as tightly as a spiderweb.

Not welcome news… Then again, after everything that's happened, I suppose it makes sense.

Sama Pyo gave nothing away.

"How fortunate."

"What is?"

"The water I spilled turns out to have been rotten. You might say I dealt with it before anyone could drink it."

Jung Ho's gaze darkened.

"You were not unaware of that fact."

"The outcome was good. Doesn't that settle it?"

"How you reach an outcome matters just as much. Whatever you say, killing a man on a busy main road was unwise."

"It was a dangerous situation. He had to be killed before he killed me. Ah, of course, that was not my intention either."

Sama Pyo pointed to the eight-foot-tall giant[2432] beside him.

"This fellow did it."

The giant blinked his bulging eyes.

"Young Sect Leader. A person?"

"We must make the facts clear. Wipe the blood off that vicious two-section staff before you make excuses."

"That. True. Blood Cudgel killed. Me."

"Please be generous with him, Master. He's skilled in martial arts, but his head is a little…"

Sama Pyo put a finger to his temple and twirled it. Jung Ho watched him in silence before speaking.

"You—or rather, the Black Dragon Demon Gate—will have to explain this properly."

"Of course. This happened because I failed to control my subordinate. I'll cooperate in any way I can."

[2432] The source describes the giant as eight cheok tall. One Korean cheok is approximately 30.3 cm (11.9 in), making eight cheok about 2.42 m (7 ft 11 in).

“As you know, tensions have been high of late. The commoners in particular are afraid.”

The Murim was a powder keg about to explode.

Even an illiterate old villager who had never finished the Thousand Character Classic[2433] knew the Murim Alliance was no social club for martial artists. During the Great Faction War, the fighting had engulfed more than the martial artists of the Central Plains.

“If someone is openly killed on a main road in broad daylight at a time like this, people will inevitably look on us unfavorably.”

“I’ll bear that in mind.”

“Blood Cudgel may have been a criminal on the run, but those above us may still hold you accountable for his death.”

“I’ll gladly explain myself.”

“You must apologize to the commoners nearby as well.”

“Don’t worry. I’ll even compensate them if they wish.”

Jung Ho’s eyebrow twitched.

Though he was a martial monk, he had spent many years at Shaolin following the Buddhist path.

He was displeased that this had happened, and he was not particularly impressed by the attitude of the Black Dragon Demon Gate’s Young Sect Leader, whose reputation he had already heard.

But what could he do? Sama Pyo was nodding along obediently, at least on the surface. Jung Ho could only turn away.

“Then… that will be all.”

“We have met by fate. Why don’t we move somewhere else for a while?”

“Amitabha.[2434] I’m afraid I must decline. There is a guest I must receive.”

Jung Ho looked anything but regretful. He was about to turn when—

“The sword.”

“Hm?”

“You don’t appear to use a sword.”

The voice was hoarse, like metal scraping against metal. Someone wearing a conical hat pulled low over their face continued.

“That sword doesn’t seem to belong with you. Return it to its owner.”

“Ah, this?”

Sama Pyo smiled faintly as he looked at the sword in his hand.

[2433] The Thousand Character Classic is a classical text traditionally used to teach Chinese characters and literacy.

[2434] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, spoken here as a Buddhist invocation.

“Not to my eyes.”
“If you don’t mind my asking, who are you, Monk?”
“That has nothing to do with this.”
The smile at the corner of Sama Pyo’s mouth faded.
Then someone shouted from far away.
“The Jin Family of Taiyuan! It’s the Jin Family of Taiyuan!”

Chapter 515

The chaos in the marketplace clearly hadn't reached the ferry landing yet.

If it had, no one would be shouting like that.

"The Jin Family of Taiyuan! The Jin Family of Taiyuan is here!"

"Waaaah!"

The main road was some distance from the landing, but everyone still gathered there could hear the cheers carrying from afar.

Black Dragon Saber Sama Pyo was among them.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan…

His gaze darkened.

In less than two years, the Jin Family of Taiyuan had grown into a formidable power. Though perhaps "newly risen" wasn't quite right for a family with three hundred years of history and standing behind it.

And one man had brought that fading great family back to prominence.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.

The young man had once seemed like a sprout with no hope of growing. Now he had put down deep roots in the soil of the Murim and was growing into a mighty tree.

Every branch connected to him was thick and flourishing.

Fire King Jeok Cheongang. Huashan Divine Dragon Cheongpung. Cheongpung's master, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak, and Huashan, one of the strongest powers among the Nine Sects and One Gang.[2435] Then there were the prestigious sects Taekyung had forged close ties with during his travels through the martial world.

And among them was Shaolin Temple, the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim.

"I wondered what sort of guest would bring Shaolin's Discipline Hall Master all the way here to greet him. Now I know."

"Amitabha.[2436] This humble monk is not a man with time to spare."

Jung Ho fixed Sama Pyo with a stony look.

"Nor am I so easygoing that I'll stand by while someone starts a pointless quarrel."

"Ah."

Sama Pyo took his hand off the hilt of his saber. He hadn't noticed it settling there.

"My apologies." He smiled. "Force of habit."

"I hope that is true."

[2435] The Nine Sects and One Gang is a grouping of major orthodox martial-arts sects and the Beggars' Gang.

[2436] Amitabha is the Buddha of Infinite Light. His name is also spoken as a Buddhist invocation.

“I know how to conduct myself. Surely you don’t think I’d show disrespect to Shaolin.”

“Amitabha. It would be best to refrain from actions that could invite misunderstanding, Benefactor Sama Pyo.”

“I will. But…”

The smile at the corner of Sama Pyo’s mouth grew more pronounced. He looked from Jung Ho to the unidentified monk whose conical hat hid his face.

“For a devout Master like you to speak so firmly, he must be someone you care for a great deal.”

Jung Ho’s title alone made it clear that he held no minor position in Shaolin. His master had been one of the three disciples of Hong Dao, the late Abbot of Shaolin and Dharma King.

By both office and seniority, Jung Ho was a leading figure within the temple. Sama Pyo suspected his open hostility had less to do with temperament than with the identity of the monk beside him.

“I’ve heard you haven’t taken a Disciple yet, Master.”

“…You have sharp ears.”

“And a keen eye, as you know.”

Jung Ho frowned.

“Amitabha. Enough wordplay. Let us leave this for another time. We must greet a guest who has arrived earlier than expected.”

“Ah, I see. Have you taken on a new Disciple?”

“Benefactor.”

Woom.

The Zen staff in Jung Ho’s hand gave a low, resonant hum.

Then the person who had been watching in silence spoke.

“…!”

“…!”

A voice as rough as metal scraping against metal came from beneath the low brim of the conical hat. The air seemed to grow heavy around it.

Jung Ho and the other Shaolin monks trembled at the immense internal energy in that voice. Beside Sama Pyo, the eight-foot-tall giant opened his bulging eyes wide.

But it wasn’t only the monk’s aura that startled Sama Pyo.

Martial Nephew? Did he call Jung Ho his Martial Nephew?

As Sama Pyo stood momentarily frozen, the monk in the conical hat spoke quietly.

“Return the sword to its owner. Here in Henan, we will tolerate no disturbances.”

“…!”

“If fate brings us together, we shall meet again.”

That was all. Having let the words fall as lightly as if he were giving them to the wind, the monk turned and disappeared. The Shaolin monks followed him.

Sama Pyo watched them go without a word.

The giant turned toward Sama Pyo and spoke in his halting voice.

“Young Sect Leader. That monk. Who is he? I cannot beat him.”

“…”

“No hair. But skill. Very strong.”

He recalled the faint righteous gleam he had glimpsed in the monk’s eyes beneath the conical hat at the final moment, then muttered.

“The Discipline Hall Master’s young Martial Uncle.”

The glimpse had been brief, but enough to judge his age. The face beneath the hat had been astonishingly young. And yet…

“Young Sect Leader?”

“Yes, I heard you, you idiot.”

Sama Pyo returned from his thoughts and clicked his tongue softly. He tossed the sword back to the merchant cowering and trembling in a corner, then looked up at the sky and stretched.

“Come on. I could use a drink.”

“Pleasure house! Pleasure house!”

“Yes, yes.”

The sky was blue, and heroes who had roamed the Murim were gathering in Henan.

Far off, the crowd at the ferry landing kept calling the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s name.

“I apologize for troubling you, Martial Uncle.”

On the way to the ferry landing, Jung Ho quickened his steps to draw alongside the monk in the conical hat. The monk shook his head.

“It wasn’t your fault, Martial Nephew Jung Ho.”

“No. I should have settled the matter myself. I never imagined that young Benefactor would behave that way…”

Jung Ho’s displeasure showed plainly on his face. Sama Pyo’s conduct still rankled.

At a time like this, on a main road under countless eyes, the young man had not only beaten Blood Cudgel to death but had also tried to provoke one of Shaolin’s senior figures.

“I’d heard the Black Dragon Demon Gate held considerable power in Gansu, but its Young Sect Leader is more insolent than I expected.”

“Is that so?”

The voice beneath the hat was rough, but the monk’s manner was perfectly calm. He kept walking as he spoke.

“My experience is limited, and there is still much I don’t know. But I’ve heard that those who follow demonic, heterodox arts are not especially powerful.”

“That is true of most. Not every unorthodox sect is the same.”

“The Black Dragon Demon Gate is an exception, then.”

“Yes. Among the unorthodox sects of the Central Plains, it could easily be counted among the top three. It may even be their greatest rallying point.”

“What do you mean by ‘rallying point,‘ Martial Nephew?”

“What it represents, Martial Uncle.”

“What it represents…”

“The Black Dragon Demon Gate has the longest history of any unorthodox faction in the Murim. It was once one of the Twelve Branches of the Demonic Cult.”

“Did they betray the Demonic Cult?”

“Amitabha. I think ‘compromise’ would be more accurate.”

The Black Dragon Demon Gate’s compromise had succeeded. Victory in the long, brutal war had ultimately gone to the orthodox faction, but the Black Dragon Demon Gate had drawn together the unorthodox martial artists scattered like grass roots across the Central Plains, recovered from its losses, and grown stronger.

“But for its Young Sect Leader to behave with such arrogance… Shaolin suffered enormous losses in that bloody conflict. To look down on us now is—”

Jung Ho broke off.

As though he could read his thoughts, the monk beside him spoke softly.

“…Martial Uncle.”

“Everyone in Shaolin was deeply wounded. Some lost the Senior Brothers and Junior Brothers who had shared their hardships. Others lost Disciples. I’m no different.”

Step. Step.

Step by step, their pace quickened. The rough voice continued from beneath the hat.

“I was… more grief-stricken than I thought I could bear. But just because that person has gone somewhere he can never return from doesn’t mean his will has vanished too.”

Jung Ho and the other Shaolin monks bit their lips.

How could they forget that day? How could they fail to understand his grief?

They all remembered. They all knew.

“I will carry on his will—my Master’s will. That one thought carried me through my time in Repentance Cave.”

The skin glimpsed beneath the conical hat was as rough as the monk’s voice, covered with countless scars.

For the unnamed monk, the past three months had been like hell.

Every day, he had repeated treatment and training while writhing in terrible pain. Those who heard the screams echoing from Repentance Cave could not keep themselves from shedding tears.

Three months of anguish and suffering.

But he had endured. Bearing the grief of his master’s death and his anger at the killers, he had kept going.

And at the end, enlightenment had come to him like a single ray of light.

“Martial Nephew Jung Ho.”

“Yes, Martial Uncle?”

“My Master would sometimes say this. Everything begins with one person. If one is not enough, then two. If even that is difficult, then three should step forward. That is how we raise up what has fallen and move onward.”

His master, who had gone where he could not return, had loved wine and meat.

He would lie on a rock and sleep all day, waking only when the world had grown dim. Then he would shake the shoulder of the Disciple who had come to wake him and fallen asleep beside him, and point high into the night sky.

Look. You’re up there too.

The Disciple, rousing himself with disheveled hair, would rub his eyes and ask in return.

Why do you call that star your Disciple?

Because I followed that star when I first went to bring you back.

But… it’s so small and faint.

That’s why it’s a good star.

What?

The star that shines brightest and clearest will soon disappear. Yours will stay there and light the sky for a very long time.

The Disciple still remembered what his Master had told him that day.

Even after a long time had passed, the heavenly patterns had become distorted, and a new star had risen somewhere in the north.

Even on the day his Master departed on a distant road and the grounds of Shaolin were stained with blood.

He remembered. Part of him still lingered in that place, on that day.

Master. Where is my star now? Have you become a star somewhere in the sky? Are you watching over me?

He stopped on a hill overlooking the ferry landing and raised his eyes to the clear blue sky.

There were no stars to be seen. Even after nightfall, he would not know which was his. He would not find his master's star, either.

However hard he looked, all he could see were two ships moored at the landing and people filing down from them. However closely he listened, all he could hear were the cheers of the crowd gathered thick as clouds.

Master. Where are you?

He gently closed his eyes. But there were no stars in the darkness behind his eyelids, and no matter how intently he listened, his master's voice did not come.

Today was no different.

He was about to open his eyes and face that truth once more when—

Splash!

"A person! Someone was running across the river and fell in!"

"Gasp! That's… our youngest!"

Screams. Someone's startled cry. Then a voice he knew, desperate and unmistakable.

"Fuck, don't just stand there screaming! A rope! Throw me a rope!"

Light flickered before his eyes, where a moment ago there had been nothing but darkness.

It was the Morning Star that had risen in the north. A trace of his master.

Have you come?

A smile formed on the stiff lips of the monk in the conical hat, Unnamed.

Chapter 516

The closer you get to your destination, the harder the last stretch feels. That's human nature. After ten days and nights of pushing my body to its limits, I had nothing left to squeeze out.

Dad, I'm coming.

Was this really how a father and son were going to reunite after so long? That was the moment the strength drained from my flailing limbs.

Grab!

My fading vision snapped back into focus.

Someone had caught my wrist. Through my ears, muffled by all the water that had gotten in, I heard a voice.

"Trying to go before this old man? What a rotten little punk."

When had he gotten here? Jeok Cheongang had closed the distance from the ferry landing in an instant. He looked down at me with a grin.

The moment I saw his face, all the tension left my body.

"…Hah."

As I exhaled the breath I had been holding, Jeok Cheongang's grin deepened.

"You're still breathing, at least."

"That's amazing. Am I still alive?"

"Listen to this fool. Yes, you're alive."

"Then stop looking at me and pull me up. I think I'm actually about to die."

"Such an exaggeration. You're a hundred years too early for that."

Whoosh. Drip.

He hauled me up by the wrist. River water poured off my swollen body, taking the weeds clinging to it along.

"Do you see them?"

"Who? God?"

"The people waiting for you."

Exhausted, I blinked. The crowd gathered like clouds at the distant ferry landing was rapidly drawing closer, and I could make out several familiar faces among them.

Cheongpung, waving both arms frantically. Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin, their eyes opened wide. Jin Wikyung, who was practically bawling his eyes out.

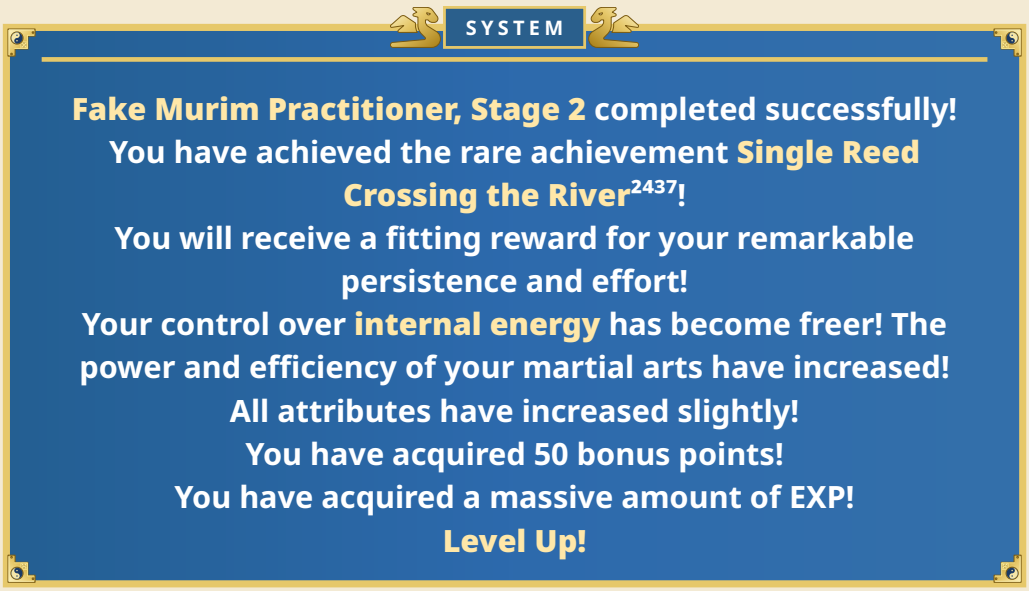
And… Mungyeong was quietly watching us.

—Welcome to Henan.

With that brief Sound Transmission, Jeok Cheongang landed, holding me in his arms.

At the same time, a clear ringing sounded in my ears.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



System notifications rang out one after another, and holographic windows filled the air.

The Level Up message came with a welcome lightness in my body. Then a wave of sleepiness washed over me.

“...Old Master.”

“Hm?”

“Don’t wake me.”

Those were my last words before my eyelids grew heavy and the sleep demon took me.

Where am I?

That was my first thought when I opened my eyes.

I blinked slowly and looked around. Pitch-black darkness surrounded me. As my eyes adjusted, I finally made out where I was.

A swamp.

Yes, this was a swamp.

White bones of uncertain origin—human or beast—were scattered everywhere, and a horrific stench filled the air, strong enough to make me gag.

Worse, my body was moving on its own.

Splosh.

[2437] Single Reed Crossing the River alludes to the legend of Bodhidharma crossing a river on a single reed.

My bare foot, without even a shoe on it, stepped into the sticky mud. I struggled with all my might to stop, but my body had already escaped my control.

One step. Then another.

I was slowly sinking deeper into the swamp when—

Whoooosh.

A wind blew from somewhere, making the skeletal trees that filled the swamp shudder.

Beyond the darkness, an unidentified red light rose.

…What's that?

It wasn't a flame. It looked more like someone's eyes.

The chilling gaze held not a trace of warmth. It stared at me as if to say, Come closer if you can.

If this were an ordinary protagonist from a movie or novel, he would struggle and crawl toward it…

You come here, asshole.

Fuck the cliché.

I'd already sized up the situation. After everything I'd been through lately, I was apparently having a nightmare. I didn't need to play along.

An ordinary person would have felt the urge to piss himself the moment he saw those red eyes, but I was the kind of person who felt the urge to use Flame Divine Palm.

There was just one tiny problem…

Splosh. Splosh.

Ah, fuck.

My body kept moving forward whether I wanted it to or not.

Slowly, steadily, as though trying to swim with my lower half sunk deep in the swamp.

But I knew I'd never reach those eyes. I would sink out of sight before I met whatever they belonged to.

Fine. Let's get this over with.

I'd almost resigned myself to it when—

Crack!

Gasp!

Something tightened around my neck.

My eyes flew wide. A huge body covered in smooth scales filled my vision, and a low hiss sounded in my ears.

A snake?

No, it was too big to call a snake. A python was more like it.

Its thick body coiled around my neck, then bound both my arms.

Hngh.

Damn it. Had dreams gotten a graphics patch? Why was this so vivid?

The rotten mud had reached my neck. The stench in my nostrils made me gag.

Unable to move, I sank farther into the swamp—and met that red gaze.

…!

A chill shot up my spine.

A vivid fear, sharp enough to jolt my mind fully awake, swept over me. This couldn't be an ordinary nightmare. It couldn't be.

At the same time, a horrifying sense of incongruity enveloped me.

This feeling… Why do I know it?

When had I felt it? Where? I searched through memories I didn't want to revisit, and my whole body began to tremble.

Flash!

A blinding light burst forth from somewhere.

The red gaze and the ominous, clammy presence around it broke apart. So did the darkness that had swallowed everything. The chill vanished.

Warmth wrapped around my body. I reached toward the light now right in front of me.

Grab!

…Huh?

Thoughts raced through my head.

Why could I grab the light? Why did it feel so good? I had definitely woken up from the dream, so why could I still feel it?

Rub, rub.

What the hell was this?

After thinking for a moment, I opened my eyes, which I had closed slightly.

The bright light was someone's smooth, shiny head.

A Buddhist precept seal marked his forehead.

"Krillin?"[2438]

The monk, whom I had never seen before—not Krillin—opened his mouth with an awkward expression.

"You have finally awakened, Benefactor Jin."

"Excuse me, but who…?"

"This humble monk is Jung Ho."

Who was Jung Ho?

After a moment's thought, I asked haltingly, my voice thick with sleep.

[2438] Krillin is a bald martial artist from Dragon Ball.

"Were you perhaps Park Jung Ho from Class 6, Grade 3 at Garam Middle School…?"

"Pardon?"

"When did you become a monk?"

"A good forty years, at least… No, wait. Could you please listen to me, Benefactor?"

"Oh, right, you bastard. Didn't you say you were going to become a priest? When did you switch? Apostate. Apostate. Did the Full Gospel Church[2439] Crusaders beat you up? Look how much your face has aged. Which temple hired you?"

My old classmate answered with a half-resigned expression.

"…I am the Discipline Hall Master at Shaolin."

"Shaolin?"

"Yes. Shaolin Temple."

"Wait. If you're at Shaolin Temple…"

Oh. Fuck. What?

Only then did my mind fully clear. I hurriedly shook my head to dispel the sleep and cautiously opened my mouth.

"Ah, I'm sorry. I wasn't fully awake."

"I understand."

Jung Ho, the middle-aged monk, looked as though he understood nothing of the sort. He continued.

"Could you take your hand off my head now? You've been touching it this whole time…"

"Whoops. Sorry."

"It's all right."

His expression said otherwise. He plainly wanted to give me a piece of his mind, but he seemed to be holding back because of the help I'd given him.

Why was Shaolin's Discipline Hall Master beside me when I woke up, anyway?

Only then did it strike me as strange. I looked around to get my bearings.

The room was big enough to sleep ten people. Sunlight came through a half-open window and gleamed off Jung Ho's forehead. As for the familiar faces…

They were sprawled all around me.

So it was a dream, but half of it was real.

No wonder it had felt so vivid.

I let out a deep sigh, then first kicked the lump curled up asleep at my feet.

Thump!

"Ah! Meat dumplings for lunch today!"

"…"

What kind of wake-up cry was that?

[2439] Full Gospel Church refers to a Korean Pentecostal Protestant church.

Cheongpung sprang awake from the sudden impact and opened his sleepy eyes.

“Ah, Benefactor. Did you sleep well?”

“I slept. I wouldn’t call it well.”

“Why not? Then sleep some more.”

“…Are you kidding me? Stop talking nonsense and get this thing off me.”

“Oh! Mimi! Come here!”

Cheongpung finally noticed the pet snake coiled around my neck. At his call, its thick body slid down across my chest.

Wait. Thick?

I stared open-mouthed at the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake, which looked practically like a python now.

“Cheongpung. Was it always that big?”

“No. It has grown a lot lately. It’s right in the middle of its growth period.”

“How old is it?”

“Grandpa Tang says it isn’t even a hundred years old yet.”

“…Oh. I see.”

“It might get bigger than me. Ah, I need to hurry up and grow more too.”

“You’re already grown. Waiting won’t make you any taller.”

“No, I’m not. Mimi keeps getting bigger as she gets older. I’ll keep growing too.”

“…?”

Then shouldn’t Jeok Cheongang and Mungyeong be at least three zhang tall by now?[2440]

I gave Cheongpung a troubled look and gave up trying to convince him. Instead, I smacked the mouth beside me that was giving off a horrific stench.

Smack!

“Urgh!”

“I told you to brush your teeth before bed. You damn beggar, your mouth is a swamp. A goddamn swamp.”

“Guh. Guhhh.”

Gung Gibang woke up and glared at me, his eyes watering.

“Why do you always pick on me?”

“I don’t pick on only you. I’m going to deal with this guy the same way.”

People had to be treated equally.

A moment later, Hyuk Mujin, who had been sleeping soundly with one of my legs clutched in his arms, met the same fate.

Whack!

“Argh! Why do you always pick on me?”

[2440] Three zhang, here a traditional Korean measure of length, are approximately 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

"Did you two rehearse that? Or are you brothers separated when you were little?"

"Don't just hit me. Gung Gibang too—oh, he's awake."

"…Hah. You hateful bastards."

I kicked Hyuk Mujin hard enough to send him tumbling beneath the bed while he muttered under his breath.

Because of these idiots, I'd even had a dream when I hardly ever dreamed at all—and an incredibly unsettling nightmare at that.

That gaze.

The red light still sent a chill through me. I was trying to recall that strange feeling from the dream when Jung Ho, who had slipped out during the commotion, came back through the door.

"Benefactor Jin. Could you spare me a moment?"

"Ah, yes."

I sat up straight. After rubbing his head like a bowling ball, I'd have had to make time for him even if I didn't have any.

"Please, speak, Monk."

"My Martial Uncle[2441] wishes to see you, Benefactor."

"Your Martial Uncle? Is he the person waiting outside?"

"Yes. He says he would like to speak with you again after so long…"

So that was it. I'd wondered why I could sense two presences.

Jung Ho's Martial Uncle had to be a senior monk of Shaolin. But someone who wanted to speak with me again?

Who is it? The way he put it, we've definitely met before.

Besides the Dharma King, was there anyone at Shaolin with whom I had formed that kind of connection?

I nodded readily enough.

"Of course."

No sooner had I spoken than someone came through the door. I frowned.

"Excuse me, but who…?"

He had a slender build, and every inch of exposed skin was covered in scars. A rough voice came from the lips of the fierce-looking monk I had never seen before.

"I'm glad. Though the heavens have grown dim, the Morning Star that rose in the north seems to shine even brighter."

"…!"

"How have you been, Benefactor?"

Only then did I recognize the monk before me. His appearance and the air about him had changed so much that it had taken me a moment to find his name.

[2441] Martial Uncle is a title for someone of one's teacher's generation within a martial or monastic lineage, not necessarily a relative.

“Unnamed.”

Chapter 517

“Have you been well, Benefactor?”

I almost didn’t recognize him. Unnamed had changed that much since I’d met him a year ago. His face, his manner of speaking, the air about him—everything felt unfamiliar.

And the reason he’d changed was probably…

It must be because of what happened that day, three months ago.

What was I supposed to say? I had a bitter taste in my mouth. I waited until Jung Ho and Hyuk Mujin had taken the others out of the room before I spoke.

“I haven’t been doing all that well myself. More has happened than I expected.”

Unnamed smiled faintly.

“So it seems. In fact, I only learned what had happened to you two days ago.”

No martial artist could have missed the events of the past three months. If Unnamed, who held an important position at Shaolin, had heard about them only two days ago, I could think of just one reason.

“You were in closed-door training.”

“Amitabha.[2442] I was staying in Repentance Cave.”

“Repentance Cave? Does that mean…”

“What you’re thinking is correct. I asked to go there myself, so please don’t worry.”

The first character meant shame; the second, remorse. Repentance Cave was a place where sinners were confined.

What was he ashamed of? What did he feel he had to repent for? Perhaps it was his regret at failing to prevent his Master’s death. Unnamed had spent three months there, calling himself a sinner for failing to protect even the Green Jade Buddha Staff, the divine artifact of Shaolin his Master had entrusted to him before he died.

“In the darkness, where I couldn’t see an inch in front of me, I kept thinking.”

Unnamed ran a callused finger over his cheek. Much of his scar-covered face had turned a dark bluish-black.

It was the mark left by the Yin-Cold Qi of the enemy he had risked his life to stop three months ago. A burden he would never be free of.

“If only I’d been a little stronger, I might have protected my Master. I might have carried out his final request.”

But regret always came too late. A venerable monk respected by all had died unexpectedly. Someone had lost a close friend. And someone else, consumed by guilt at failing to carry out his Master’s final wishes, had gone into Repentance Cave.

[2442] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, used here as a Buddhist invocation.

Anyone would have felt the same.

I was no different. I didn't even want to imagine how I would have felt if I'd failed to save Jeok Cheongang and had to let him go. Maybe I would have gone back to being F-rank Hunter Jin Taekyung, trapped in that same cycle of regret and despair.

But pain changes people, for better or worse. In Unnamed's case, it had changed him for the better. His heart might have been broken, but at least his martial arts had grown stronger.

"This is just my opinion, but I doubt you spent all your time in Repentance Cave thinking."

"Amitabha.[2443] I owe it all to the grace of the Buddha and Shaolin."

Unnamed pressed his palms together toward the sunlit window, then looked at me with calm eyes. There was a pure power in his gaze. A year ago, his body had been packed with solid muscle. Now he was as lean as an old tree. But the quiet aura flowing from him was on another level from before.

He's broken through.

He had entered the supreme realm every martial artist dreamed of reaching. There was no doubt about it.

Seeing the awe in my eyes, Unnamed gave a small nod.

"Enlightenment alone wasn't enough to heal a body in critical condition and reach a higher realm. I needed many other things. The Great Restoration Pill was one of them."

"Ah."

Shaolin's Great Restoration Pill was among the finest elixirs in the world.

Right. With the Great Restoration Pill, it might have been possible.

The pill's effects were one thing, but Unnamed was the Disciple whom Dharma King Hong Dao, a man capable of reading heavenly patterns, had personally brought in and raised with all his heart. He was a genius born with tremendous martial talent—not quite on Cheongpung's level, perhaps, but still extraordinary. There was no doubt that he was worthy of the Great Restoration Pill.

He had reached the Supreme Peak realm while still in his thirties. That proved both his Master's eye for talent and his own ability.

"Congratulations. I've heard the Great Restoration Pill is precious even by Shaolin's standards."

"That's why I refused it so firmly. But my Senior Brother, the Abbot, gave it to me and told me not to ask questions. Apparently, my Master had said something to him about it several years ago. Perhaps… he knew this would happen."

[2443] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, used here as a Buddhist invocation.

A faint smile touched Unnamed's lips. He gazed into the distance for a moment, as though remembering his Master, then went on.

"Oh, my Senior Brother Abbot would also like to meet Benefactor Jin."

"Your Senior Brother Abbot?"

I hadn't heard who had succeeded Dharma King Hong Dao. Gung Gibang had said it would be one of the Dharma King's direct Disciples, but one spectacular disaster after another had kept me too busy to think about it.

"I don't believe you've met him. He's my eldest Senior Brother in our lineage, and he became Abbot less than a month ago. It's only natural that you wouldn't know him."

"Ah, I see."

"He said he was sorry things had been so chaotic last time that he let you leave without even saying goodbye."

"He doesn't need to apologize. I was barely thinking straight myself."

The Shaolin Bloodshed during the Star-Array Grand Banquet had been unprecedented, but I'd had to leave Henan for Sichuan within a day or two. Jeok Cheongang was in critical condition, and finding the Divine Physician couldn't wait.

"Amitabha.[2444] I was truly glad when I finally heard that Benefactor Jeok had made a full recovery. My Master must be watching over me from somewhere. I'm sure he was relieved to see his friend well again."

"Ah, speaking of which, you must have met the Old— No, my Master already."

"We spoke until you woke up. I nearly failed to recognize him at first."

"Well, he has, uh… changed a little."

"Yes. About as much as I have."

"…Uh."

What was I supposed to say to that?

While I hesitated over his sudden self-deprecating joke, Unnamed politely pressed his palms together.

"Amitabha.[2445] That was a joke."

"Oh. Ah. Right."

"You didn't find it amusing. I'll refrain from making another."

Please do rose to the tip of my tongue.

A joke like that was funny coming from someone who hadn't suffered quite so much. Coming from Unnamed, it made the whole room turn solemn. But I didn't have the courage to nod.

"…No, it was funny."

[2444] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, used here as a Buddhist invocation.

[2445] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, used here as a Buddhist invocation.

"Amitabha.[2446] Then I'll continue."

"…"

"That was the joke."

Should I just crack his head open with a wooden fish?[2447]

I stared at him, dumbfounded, then let out a quiet laugh. If he could make clumsy jokes like these, he'd come through it better than I'd feared.

I might not be able to comfort him, but I could at least listen to a few temple jokes that pushed the limits.

Anyway…

"Where are we? This doesn't look like Shaolin Temple."

Judging by the sun outside, I'd slept for about a full day, but I still had no idea where we were. I looked around again, and Unnamed explained.

"An inn near Mount Song. It's been rented in the name of the Murim Alliance, so please stay and rest as long as you need."

"The Murim Alliance."

The name had always felt distant. Hearing Unnamed say it here in Henan made it suddenly real. I got out of bed and went to the window.

The first thing I saw was a peak of Mount Song rising in the distance as though it might pierce the sky. Buildings crowded the foot of the mountain, and all sorts of people filled the streets.

One martial artist had a narrow-bladed sword at his waist. Another carried a massive saber on his back without a scabbard. Others bore spears and twin axes…

"…"

All sorts of people, sure. But something was off.

They're scary.

Unnamed gave a low laugh as I watched the martial artists everywhere I looked.

"Amitabha.[2448] They've come from all across the land after hearing the news."

"Even at a glance, there seem to be more of them than there were at the Star-Array Grand Banquet."

"The Star-Array Grand Banquet was a festival for young prodigies. The founding of the Murim Alliance concerns everyone. People from both the orthodox and unorthodox factions are here, and quite a few little-known eccentrics have come out of seclusion as well."

That made sense. The stakes were entirely different, so of course more people had come. If the Star-Array Grand Banquet was the Han River fireworks festival, the [2447] A wooden fish is a carved wooden percussion instrument struck to keep rhythm during Buddhist chanting.

founding of the Murim Alliance was Jindotgae One.[2449] Unlike at the banquet, there were hardly any commoners in sight.

They can feel it too. They know what's happening here.

As I thought that to myself, a group of Murim practitioners crossing the main road suddenly caught my eye. Their aura was unusual enough that they could not be mistaken for ordinary martial artists. They clearly belonged to one of the great prestigious factions.

Their clothes are strange, too. Who are they?

I didn't need to ask Unnamed. Wrapped in furs despite the warm spring day and wearing leather armor unlike the other martial artists, they drew whispers wherever they went.

"Could they be…?"

"That's right. The Murong Family."

"My word. It's well over a thousand li[2450] from Liaoning to Henan. They got here quickly."

"They're said to have the blood of horse-riding nomads for a reason. What luck. I never thought I'd see members of the Murong Family in my lifetime."

It was my first time seeing the Murong Family, too. Shanxi Province, where the Jin Family of Taiyuan was located, was also considered a frontier region, but Liaoning lay far to the northeast beyond Hebei. It was not somewhere one could visit as casually as the neighborhood next door.

It was so far away that I'd heard members of the Murong Family rarely came to the Central Plains.

So that's the Murong Family.

They were among the stronger of the Five Great Families, and I'd heard of their reputation until I was sick of it. Unlike other factions, they even maintained a cavalry unit, or so I'd been told. Maybe that was why every one of them had muscles like a horse.

The orthodox Murim, led by the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families. It sounds like the unorthodox Murim has joined in, too. And on top of that, all the martial artists who belong nowhere at all…

People often called the United States a melting pot of races. Right now, Henan looked exactly like that to me. Granted, the people here were of the same or similar races, but every kind of martial artist I'd seldom get to see had gathered in one place.

Three days.

[2449] Jindotgae One is South Korea's highest military alert level, used when an enemy attack is considered imminent.

[2450] A Chinese li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); a thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi).

Three days from now, countless martial artists would gather beneath a single banner. United under the name of the Murim Alliance, they would raise their weapons and stand against Dark Heaven.

I was looking out at them and thinking just that when—

Boom!

A tremendous roar sounded from somewhere.

Chapter 518

A middle-aged man, thoroughly drunk, suddenly raised one hand.

“Innkeeper, bring me a bottle of strong liquor!”

“Roast duck, too!”

“Would you look at these petty-minded fools. We’re on the verge of a momentous event—the founding of the Murim Alliance—and you want strong liquor and roast duck? We’ve come to Henan, so we should at least drink Dukang wine[2451]!”

“Oh, we’d love that, but aren’t you pushing yourself too far?”

“It’s fine. We’re splitting the bill anyway.”

“…You’ve lost your mind. Make it strong liquor.”

The inn on the main road near Mount Song was packed. Most of the people inside were Murim practitioners, of course.

From wandering martial artists who still looked like greenhorns to old veterans who had roamed the martial world for ten years—or even several decades.

The people gathered there differed in purpose, age, and gender.

Wherever people gathered, conflict was bound to follow. Especially when the people in question were drunk Murim practitioners.

“Wait. You’re…!”

“Oh-ho. Aren’t you the Senior Disciple of the Xiao He Gate? Still missing that finger?”

“You bastard! You came looking for a place to die!”

The world might be vast, but enemies had a way of meeting even on a single-plank bridge.

When people bound by tangled webs of gratitude and grudges happened to meet, blades were sure to come out.

Clang! Slash!

Sharp weapons swung, and blood sprayed through the air. The fierce exchange sent the surrounding Murim practitioners into an uproar.

“Waaah!”

“It’s a fight!”

“One silver nyang[2452] on the Senior Disciple of the Xiao He Gate!”

“Then I’ll bet two nyang[2453] on the Long Serpent Saber!”

They said nothing was more entertaining than watching someone else’s house burn or watching someone else fight.

[2451] Dukang is a traditional Chinese liquor named for Du Kang, a legendary figure associated with winemaking. It is particularly associated with Henan.

[2452] A nyang is a traditional unit used for silver currency; it is not Korean won.

[2453] A nyang is a traditional unit used for silver currency; it is not Korean won.

The very few people with no connection to Murim backed away with horrified expressions. But the Murim practitioners, who were crazy about fighting regardless of whether it involved the orthodox, unorthodox, or Demonic Path, shouted and applauded without hesitation.

Amid the chaos, almost no one noticed the middle-aged man who had just come through the inn's old door.

Clang! Bang!

Waaah!

The fight was raging in the middle of the inn, but he did not spare it a glance. He flicked a silver nyang[2454] toward the innkeeper.

"Two bottles of strong liquor and one roast duck. Bring them to a seat with a good view outside. Oh, and roast the duck until it's crisp."

"Great Hero…"

"Hm?"

The innkeeper bowed to him.

"I'm sorry, but there aren't any suitable seats available right now."

"There aren't?"

"No, Great Hero. As you can see, so many heroes of Murim have come to visit…"

The middle-aged man looked around, then glanced up. Several faces were peering down from above the stairs.

"There seem to be seats up there."

"Ah, I'm terribly sorry, but there are other guests on that floor—"

"That one looks good."

"W-wait a moment, Great Hero! Great Hero!"

The middle-aged man ignored the innkeeper's desperate cries.

He strode up the stairs, ignoring the sharp gazes that poured down on him, and muttered,

"Much better. Quiet, too."

The inn's second floor was reserved for people of higher status.

It was only about twenty steps above the first floor, but unlike the noisy chaos below, a serious atmosphere hung over the second floor. Nor were the people seated at its tables anything like Third Rate martial artists.

"G-Great Hero! You can't go up there!"

At the innkeeper's cry from behind him, the low conversations stopped.

A graying middle-aged man seated at the table closest to the stairs frowned and spoke.

"What's all this noise?"

[2454] A nyang is a traditional unit used for silver currency; it is not Korean won.

"I-I'm sorry, Great Hero. This gentleman seems to have mistaken where he was going—"

"Send him downstairs. And quiet the first floor while you're at it."

"Yes, sir."

But the middle-aged man was already headed elsewhere.

"That seat by the window looks good."

"Gasp, Great Hero!"

The one who stepped forward in place of the horrified innkeeper was the graying middle-aged man from before.

"Stop."

The middle-aged man slowly turned.

"Was that directed at me?"

"Who else would I be speaking to?"

"You?"

"You look a great deal younger than I am, so don't cause unnecessary trouble. Go back downstairs."

The graying man added with an air of dignity, "Since you don't seem to know much about the martial world, I'll tell you who I am. I'm of the Fang Family. In the martial world, I'm known as Moon Beauty Saber."

"Oh."

"Now that you know, stop making a scene and go downstairs quietly."

The middle-aged man blinked a few times.

"What you just said—was it really true?"

Moon Beauty Saber gave a short laugh.

Who was he? He was a top-tier wandering martial artist who had long since reached the level of injuring others with Sword Energy.

He was on an entirely different level from wandering martial artists like Blood Cudgel, who strutted around despite being merely at the early Peak realm.

"Heh heh. Why would I lie? Then again, I suppose it's understandable that you don't believe me. You probably never expected to meet me in a place like this."

"No, not that. I meant, do I really look that way?"

"…?"

What was this man talking about?

Moon Beauty Saber stared at him blankly, then frowned.

"What do you mean? I don't understand you at all."

"You said I looked young. That was certainly true, wasn't it?"

"…!"

"Hm. That's rather nice to hear. Good. I understand."

Before Moon Beauty Saber could reply, the middle-aged man laughed heartily and pointed toward the window.

“Don’t mind me. Keep drinking. I happen to know someone.”

“Why, you bastard…”

“Great Hero!”

Moon Beauty Saber and the innkeeper spoke at once. Then the old man drinking alone by the window suddenly cut in.

“I was feeling lonely drinking by myself, so this is perfect. Come, sit.”

“…!”

“…!”

The innkeeper and Moon Beauty Saber both fell silent.

The innkeeper could hardly object when the guest himself had invited the man over. Moon Beauty Saber hesitated for a different reason. Something about the old man’s manner had been bothering him since earlier.

He looks like a wealthy old man, but there’s something unusual about him… How does he know that ignorant fool?

Moon Beauty Saber wanted to teach the middle-aged man a lesson right then and there, but he couldn’t shake his unease.

Whether he knew what Moon Beauty Saber was thinking or not, the middle-aged man dropped into the seat across from the old man and immediately tilted back a bottle.

“Ah, that’s good. Is this Yeoahong[2455]?”

The old man nodded.

“The innkeeper said it had been aged at least twenty years.”

“Good wine. But strong liquor is still the best there is. The innkeeper will bring some soon. You should try it.”

“I’ll pass. I don’t usually drink much.”

“What a shame. Why are you here alone, then?”

“It’s nothing. I simply thought I would try burying myself among other people after such a long time.”

The old man suddenly turned his head and gazed out the window.

For a while, he watched the people passing through the street and listened to the bustle outside. Then he said, “Now that I’m here, being alone like this isn’t so bad.”

“You don’t seem to have come alone.”

“I have children and grandchildren, of course. Just as you have a Disciple.”

“I do have one fellow, though I’m not sure whether he’s my Disciple or my enemy. How did you know?”

[2455]Yeoahong is a traditional Chinese rice wine. Its name means “Daughter’s Red.”

“How could I not? I even saw him myself.”

Clack.

The middle-aged man set down the bottle. Liquor had spilled from the corner of his mouth, dampening his beard. Perhaps because of the soft light, the beard looked unusually red.

“Damn it. I knew it. But that brat kept insisting to the very end that he’d never met you.”

“You certainly raised your Disciple well, Fire King.”

The middle-aged man wiped his beard with his sleeve, then stared at the old man.

“My Disciple caused you trouble last time. So I came to see you myself, Azure Sky Sword King.”

The old man—no, the Grand Family Head of the Namgung Family and one of the Ten Kings, the Azure Sky Sword King—smiled faintly.

“I’m glad to hear it.”

“I knew you, of all people, would recognize this old man.”

“I almost didn’t. Returned to Youth… You were worth waiting for.”

“It’s late, but may I keep the promise I made back then?”

“I’ve waited a very long time to hear you say that.”

Joy filled the Azure Sky Sword King’s eyes.

More than twenty years ago, in exchange for entrusting one person’s life to Jeok Cheongang, he had been promised a duel.

At last, his long wait was over.

“What a shame. The strong liquor will be here soon.”

“Let whoever’s left standing drink it.”

“And your sword? Will you be all right without one?”

“My sword?”

The Azure Sky Sword King picked up the two chopsticks laid neatly on the table.

“These will do.”

Jeok Cheongang gave a short laugh and looked out the window.

“The sky is blue, and you have a sword in your hand.”

“The sun is up as well. Perfect timing.”

Whoooosh.

Wind swept through the room. Invisible waves of qi surged from the two men and spread in every direction.

And before anyone in the inn could notice, the two supreme masters struck at each other.

KABOOM!

Bang! Bang! KABOOM!

“Good Lord.”

What in tarnation is that?

I gaped at the scene in the distance beyond the window.

And it wasn’t just the successive booms or the black smoke rising into the sky.

Unnamed, who realized it a moment after I did, spoke with a hardened expression.

“Did you feel it too, Benefactor?”

I gave a small nod.

Even at this distance, I could feel waves of qi reaching us. This is a clash between at least Supreme Peak masters.

“If something like this has happened, then it must be…”

“Amitabha[2456]. Yes. It appears Dark Heaven is attacking.”

“Those Dark Heaven sons of bitches!”

“Though we took every precaution, this has happened again. Given that, this humble monk will have no choice but to break the precept against killing and go all out against them.”

“I’ll join you. Breaking the no-killing precept against Dark Heaven is a hobby of mine.”

And it seemed I wasn’t the only one with that hobby.

Ding. Diiing!

“Dark Heaven! Dark Heaven is attacking!”

“Kill them and uphold justice!”

“Beat those wicked fiends to death!”

Alarm bells rang out, and the Murim practitioners on the main road rushed toward the disturbance like a pack of dogs.

The sight made my blood boil.

Ah, so this is the Murim Crusade.

Our side is fucking strong. And there are a hell of a lot of us.

Until now, I had suffered every kind of hell against Dark Heaven because of our numerical disadvantage—or simply because of the gap in strength.

I could almost cry.

I can’t sit this one out.

“Follow me! Follow me!”

I leaped out the window and stood tall. The people who spotted me widened their eyes.

[2456] Amitabha is the Buddha of Infinite Light. Saying his name is a Buddhist invocation.

“The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon!”

“It’s the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon of the Jin Family of Taiyuan!”

“Oooooh!”

Believe it or not, I was a pretty big name in Murim.

Living proof that even a cramped backwater like Shanxi Province could produce a dragon! A young icon of the orthodox faction!

“Waaah!”

“Let’s go! Let’s sweep Dark Heaven away!”

“The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon is with us!”

Whoosh, whoosh, whoosh, whoosh!

The Murim practitioners charged forward with renewed courage, shouting as they ran.

Unnamed and I were at the very front, of course.

“Fuck! Wreck ‘em all!”

I poured my internal energy into the shout, and the roar around me swelled.

With this many Murim practitioners at my side, I was sure we could beat the hell out of anyone.

“It’s a holy war!”

“Great Hero Jin says it’s a holy war!”

“Kill those demons!”

“Amitabhaaa[2457]!”

You Dark Heaven bastards! Stay right there! I’m bringing the Murim Crusade to you, and I’m going to bash your heads in. Your heads…

“Ah.”

My brain suddenly stopped working.

A single person was walking out from inside a building burning horribly.

“What the hell are you all doing?”

“…”

The fiend was on our side.

[2457] Amitabha is the Buddha of Infinite Light. Saying his name is a Buddhist invocation.

Chapter 519

KABOOM!

A large inn burned fiercely. Blackened wooden pillars collapsed, sending ash billowing into the air. The face of the fiend who emerged through it all was so familiar it came as a shock.

“What the hell are you all doing?”

“…”

That’s what I wanted to ask.

Silence fell. Unnamed stared at me, his gaze shaking as though an earthquake had struck. Sound Transmission slipped through his barely moving lips and reached my ears.

Why—why is Benefactor Jeok coming out of there?

How should I know?

Wasn’t he Dark Heaven?

That’s what I want to ask.

Amitabha[2458]. Could you be Dark Heaven?

What kind of crazy question is that?

If we’re Dark Heaven, does that make you a member of the Vatican?

I wasn’t the only one dumbfounded by Unnamed’s words. Jeok Cheongang, who was exceptionally skilled at eavesdropping on Sound Transmission, already had a face twisted like an evil spirit.

“What? This old man is Dark Heaven?”

“N-no, that’s not what I meant. There’s been a small misunderstanding…”

My attempt to clear up that misunderstanding went nowhere. More precisely, our proud Murim Crusade—already burning with fighting spirit ahead of the Murim Alliance’s founding—wouldn’t let it.

“Dark Heaven!”

“The fiend just declared himself Dark Heaven!”

Keyword entered.

“Wait. He seems to know the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.”

“Of course he knows him! How many times has the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon fought Dark Heaven?”

“I see. He’s a Dark Heaven fiend!”

Miraculous logic.

“You fiend! You look like a demon straight out of hell!”

“And that hair, all bright red! He looks like he’ll dye the world in blood!”

[2458] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, spoken here as a Buddhist invocation.

Attacking his appearance.

"Kill him first!"

"Capture him and you'll become a hero!"

Medieval Crusader-style conclusion.

All of this happened in the blink of an eye. Faced with the collective madness of some thousand Murim Crusaders, Unnamed and I snapped out of our daze and waved our hands frantically.

"No! That's not it!"

"Amitabha[2459]! Everyone, stop! That man is my master, Master Hong Dao's…"

At Unnamed's shout, the martial artists nearest us widened their eyes.

"Oh!"

"Is that true?"

Finally. They're listening.

Unnamed glanced at me as if he thought the same thing, then nodded.

"It is."

"Good heavens. Not just any fiend, but the villain who harmed Master Hong Dao!"

"What?"

"What an unforgivable fiend! Tear him limb from limb!"

"…"

Fuck. I can't do this.

Would these martial artists suffer qi deviation if they listened to someone finish a sentence? They refused to understand a damn word.

The grand finale of this collective madness came courtesy of a stranger emerging from the wreckage of the collapsed building.

"Stop, you wicked fiend! How dare you commit such a heinous crime in Henan!"

Jeok Cheongang, who had been staring at this insanity with his mouth open, muttered with a pained expression.

"Not one of these people is in his right mind. Listen to this old man first…"

"Enough talk! This Moon Beauty Saber will not forgive you!"

"…Then you can take a beating first."

Fair enough. For Jeok Cheongang, he'd held back a long time.

Whoosh. Fwoom!

Bye-bye, Moon Beauty Saber. Enjoy the Disco Pang Pang.[2460]

Moon Beauty Saber rushed forward like a streak of light, then shot backward like a cannonball and slammed deep into the wreckage.

[2459] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, spoken here as a Buddhist invocation.

[2460] Disco Pang Pang is a Korean amusement ride that spins and jolts its riders.

None of the martial artists gathered there had seen the punch. None of them could have. The sheer force of it froze the air around them.

"M-Moon Beauty Saber, down in a single blow…!"

"Aaah! The fiend's martial arts have reached the heavens!"

Forget his martial arts. His anger looks like it's reached the heavens.

Everyone seemed to understand that provoking Jeok Cheongang right now would be a bad idea. They wanted to defeat a fiend and make a name for themselves, sure. They just didn't want to be the ones getting defeated.

Finally, some quiet.

With everyone silent, I had one chance to clear up the misunderstanding. I cleared my throat and opened my mouth.

Or rather, I was about to.

"There's been a serious misunderstanding. The man over there isn't a fiend, he's __"

"Halt! Make way!"

"Oh, for fuck's sake!"

I'm going to lose my mind. Who is it this time?

But the man who appeared as the crowd parted like the Red Sea was not someone I could simply call a bastard.

"The Thunderbolt Saber King has arrived!"

"Great Hero Peng has come to punish the fiend himself!"

Thud. Thud.

An enormous old man strode forward as the crowd's courage surged anew. He had broad shoulders, fierce eyes, and a massive saber slung over one shoulder.

At the sight of the Thunderbolt Saber King, Jeok Cheongang sighed.

"Finally, someone I can talk to."

Agreed.

The Thunderbolt Saber King and Jeok Cheongang bickered constantly, but they were quite close. Longtime rivals who were, for all practical purposes, friends. He would recognize Jeok without any trouble.

Sure enough, the Thunderbolt Saber King looked him up and down, then opened his eyes wide.

"What are you doing here?"

"It's a long story. Send these people away first."

"Answer my question first."

"Hm?"

"I asked what a bastard fiend who deserves to be torn limb from limb is doing here."

"…"

"…"

Jeok Cheongang's eyelids began to twitch.

Clip-clop. Clip-clop.

Hooves sounded through the silence. The enormous old man gazing out of the carriage window suddenly spoke.

"The truth is, I recognized you the moment I saw you. How could I not?"

With everyone watching, the Thunderbolt Saber King continued in a solemn voice.

"Red hair, red beard. Anyone would know you were the Fire King. The others couldn't have dreamed you'd Returned to Youth, but I knew."

"I see."

I nodded, then asked, "So why did you start swinging your saber?"

"That was…"

"Oh, and while you're at it, explain why you ordered an all-out attack after one exchange left you shaking in your boots."

"Shaking in my boots? Ha ha ha."

A heavy silence settled over the carriage. Faced with everyone's distrustful stares, the Thunderbolt Saber King stiffened.

"I wanted to give them some real combat experience."

"Ah. Combat experience."

"Think of it as preparation for the coming fight against Dark Heaven. Facing the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, would be valuable experience for all of them."

I asked seriously,

"By 'experience,' do you mean experience of the afterlife?"

"…"

That shut him up. If he had a conscience, it had to: twenty people had been carried to the medical clinic. Most were Third Rate martial artists caught in the aftermath of blows exchanged between two of the Ten Kings—the Fire King and the Thunderbolt Saber King.

We're lucky it stopped there.

If the poet Yun Dong-ju[2461] suffered at even the wind stirring a leaf, they suffered like hell in the howling blade wind.

"Still… I heard they're all safe."

"They are. They'll be safe for at least the next fifteen days, since they'll spend them lying in the medical clinic."

[2461] Yun Dong-ju was a Korean poet of the Japanese colonial period, known for poetry marked by intense sensitivity and introspection.

Their taste of the afterlife had left its mark.

Martial artists might live on the edge of a blade, but PTSD was no joke. I'd visited the victims. Their faces were pale, and they couldn't even speak.

The worst of all was the wandering martial artist called Moon Beauty Saber. He was trembling so violently that I almost mistook Henan for Antarctica's King Sejong Station.[2462]

"None of this would have happened if you hadn't ordered that all-out attack, Great Hero Peng."

The Thunderbolt Saber King's round eyes widened at my continued criticism.

"And what about you?"

"Me?"

"Yes, you! Weren't you the one who rounded up every martial artist nearby and brought them here?"

"I admit that part. But given the circumstances, it was unavoidable. Isn't that right?"

At my question, Unnamed, my accomplice in the corner, ran his fingers over his prayer beads.

"Benefactor Jin is correct. Even if Shakyamuni[2463] had been in my position, he would have rushed forward crying out for the destruction of demons."

"Could you uproot a bodhi tree[2464] and crush a fiend's skull with it?"

"Amitabha[2465]. I could."

"…"

The Thunderbolt Saber King had a temper to match Jeok Cheongang's, but he couldn't openly pick on Unnamed. The only Disciple left behind by his dear friend, the Dharma King Hong Dao, was a sore spot for him.

"Urgh."

He glared at me.

"And you've been at it this whole time!"

"What? Why?"

"Are you and I friends?"

"No."

"Then do you think the Hebei Peng Family is a joke?"

"How did you get from one to the other? You're changing the subject because you've run out of things to say."

[2462] King Sejong Station is a South Korean research station in Antarctica.

[2463] Shakyamuni is the historical Buddha.

[2464] The bodhi tree is the tree under which the Buddha is said to have attained enlightenment.

[2465] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, spoken here as a Buddhist invocation.

"You little brat. The blood on your head hasn't even dried, and you keep talking back…"

"Oof. Clack, clack. Dentures."

I didn't know exactly what dentures had to do with anything, but the feeling behind it clearly got through.

"How dare you!"

The Thunderbolt Saber King's face flushed red. He was about to leap to his feet when the two men who had been silent all along spoke almost at once.

"Calm yourself, Sir Peng."

"Quiet. All of you, shut your mouths."

The voices and moods could hardly have been more different. Perhaps the only thing connecting the two men was the two characters in their title: Ten Kings.

"I was rash," the Azure Sky Sword King said plainly. "It had been so long since I last felt my blood stir. I let it get the better of me."

Jeok Cheongang spoke next.

"This old man did nothing wrong. You were the rash ones."

"…"

That's our Old Master.

An evergreen if ever there was one. The Thunderbolt Saber King stared at Jeok as if wondering whether he was human.

"Jeok, don't you feel even a little guilty?"

"Why should I? Martial artists can have a little scrap when they meet. There were people fighting in the inn before I even went in."

"What would have happened if Great Hero Namgung hadn't stepped in when he did?"

The Thunderbolt Saber King was right about that much. The dove of peace who'd brought the situation under control was the Azure Sky Sword King.

After a brief exchange with Jeok Cheongang, he'd suffered a minor Internal Injury. He appeared only after settling his internal energy, and one of the Namgung Family members among the crowd recognized him.

Whoa, whoa, whoaaa! Grand Family Head!

He'd screamed like he'd seen a ghost.

The other martial artists, who'd lost their heads at the words Dark Heaven, finally came to their senses. One lunatic did ask whether the Namgung Family was part of Dark Heaven too, but fortunately, our proud Murim Crusaders regained their reason.

If Jeok Cheongang hadn't Returned to Youth, a few of them probably would have recognized him in the first place.

"That was almost a catastrophe!"

"I could have explained everything. And it happened because your eyes are as bad as a dog's, you Peng bastard."

"The inn collapsed! People got hurt!"

"Ahem."

Perhaps he felt a bit guilty himself. Jeok Cheongang cleared his throat, then opened his mouth with a shameless expression.

"Given the location, I held back. At worst, they got bumped by a little falling debris. Put some spit on it and they'll be fine. I'll compensate the innkeeper properly. Even I could see the place burned quite badly."

"…Is that really coming from the man who killed a thousand members of the Demonic Cult for burning Mount Jiuhua? The more I hear, the more my chest swells."

"Of course they had to die. Those bastards never intended to pay compensation."

"…"

What is this?

It was utter nonsense, yet somehow it had a logic of its own.

Momentarily at a loss for words, the Thunderbolt Saber King muttered,

"Returned to Youth only changed the skin you're wearing. The contents are still the same. Your personality is still completely fucked."

"You ought to do something about the skin on your face, Peng. All you've done is get old without Returning to Youth."

"What did you say?"

"Ho. They say a man who failed to Return to Youth gets angry when reminded of it. You're a perfect example."

"How dare you, Jeok!"

"Hm? What did you say? I can't hear you. The words of an insignificant nobody who couldn't even Return to Youth are hard to make out."

Would you look at him dishing out area-of-effect damage.

I couldn't speak for anyone else, but I saw the Azure Sky Sword King's shoulders twitch in his seat by the window. He quietly avoided my gaze, looked outside, and spoke.

"You two should stop now."

At first I thought he was only trying to change the subject. Then I followed his gaze.

"Yeah. You definitely should."

Ahead of us stood a long stretch of city wall and a vast crowd. Above the iron gates, a huge sign bore three characters in bold, soaring strokes.

Murim Alliance.

Chapter 520

The young man gazed blankly out the window.

It was a beautiful spring day. The sunlight was just right, and the breeze through the half-open window was pleasantly cool. Flowers had come into full bloom, filling the air with their sweet fragrance.

It was a Wuling Peach Blossom Spring[2466] in the mortal world.

Everything would have been perfect if a voice had not suddenly spoken behind him.

The young man was not startled. He had sensed someone approaching long before they spoke.

Nor was it only this visitor he could sense.

In front of him, behind him, to either side. Above and below.

He perceived everything happening around him and took it all in. He did not do it out of necessity or by conscious effort. It came as naturally as breathing.

What a shame. I can’t even enjoy the spring scenery properly anymore.

The young man turned. An old man with the imposing bearing of someone much younger stood smiling at him.

“I stopped by out of an old man’s needless concern, only to find you slacking off.”

His voice carried the weight of his years. His tone was gentle, like a grandfather speaking to a young grandson, but experience had taught the young man what lay beneath it.

The old man before him kept a blade hidden—one whose edge was cold and sharp.

“What are you thinking about so intently?”

“Just that I’m fortunate not to be your enemy.”

The old man chuckled softly.

“Anyone overhearing you might think I was a frightening man.”

The young man knew better than to be taken in by that good-natured laugh. No one could say how many schemes and far-reaching plans lay behind that smiling face.

During the upheaval of the Great Faction War, the chief of the Murim Alliance’s Hidden Shadow Pavilion had read the state of the world as though it lay in the palm of his hand and eliminated countless fiends. No man who had done that could be ordinary.

“I doubt anyone else would agree with you, Thousand-Faced Fox.”

Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho.

[2466] The Wuling Peach Blossom Spring is a classical image of an idyllic utopia.

The Hidden Shadow Pavilion's old fox, said to have a thousand faces, shrugged.

"Some people do fear this old man, of course. But I hardly think the man before me is one of them."

"Me?"

"Does it not?"

The young man thought about it for a while. Then his eyes widened.

"Oh. You're right."

"Aren't I?"

"Now that I think about it, I'm not particularly afraid of you."

Had two ordinary Murim practitioners, each willing to stake his life on his pride, exchanged those words, they would have drawn blades by now.

But neither of these men was ordinary. The identity of the man facing Song Ho had much to do with why he took no offense at all.

"Stay alert to everything around you, but fear no one. An Alliance Leader must always do both."

The young man—Sword Saint Mae Jonghak—looked uncomfortable.

"I'd rather you didn't call me Alliance Leader."

"You'll have to accept it sooner or later."

"I simply haven't gotten used to it."

"But you'll soon be Alliance Leader."

"I'm not yet."

"They say it's better to take the whipping early."

"I've always wondered why I have to be the one whipped."

Thousand-Faced Fox's answer was brief.

"Because the Martial God isn't here."

The title Martial God had once meant perfection. No, it still did.

Everyone who had met him even once had praised him in unison, and even after the passage of many long years, that vast and brilliant Fame still illuminated the world.

But…

"We couldn't find him."

The Martial God had disappeared. No one knew whether he was alive or dead, or why he had vanished.

Back when the Murim Alliance still existed, Thousand-Faced Fox had cast the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's entire intelligence network across the world. Not one trace of the Martial God had turned up.

Like a moment of sunlight in the middle of a storm. Like a meteor streaking across the night sky.

He had disappeared that way, leaving behind a title that had become the very heavens and still hung over the world.

“With him gone, Great Hero Mae Jonghak, you are the only one who can serve as Alliance Leader.”

“Hah. There must be plenty of suitable candidates besides me.”

“If you mean the other members of the Three Saints and the Ten Kings, I’ll pretend I didn’t hear that.”

“Why?”

“For one thing, no one knows where the Bow Saint is.”

“Isn’t the Hidden Shadow Pavilion still looking for him?”

“Do you think Dark Heaven will wait? Shall I send a messenger pigeon? ‘We’re looking for the Bow Saint. Please hold off for a while’?”

“Oh. When you put it that way.”

“…”

Thousand-Faced Fox held back the urge to bring his fist down on Mae Jonghak’s head and continued.

“And as you know, his personality is somewhat…”

“I liked his fiery spirit.”

“Others won’t be so fond of it if he runs the Murim Alliance into the ground.”

“Hmm. I suppose not.”

“As for the Slaughter Saint… I’d only wear out my mouth explaining.”

“He might be more suitable than you think. His martial arts aside, he had an overwhelming presence. He seemed capable of commanding people.”

“People would follow him, certainly. Anyone who refused would already be dead.”

“Aren’t you treating him too much like the Killing Ghost?”

“His title is Slaughter Saint. What do you expect from me?”

“You have a point.”

Should I actually hit him?

Thousand-Faced Fox looked at Mae Jonghak with exactly that thought in his eyes, then sighed.

“The other members of the Ten Kings are unsuitable for much the same reasons. Some have passed away. The rest cannot take the position for one reason or another.”

Strength in martial arts alone did not make an Alliance Leader. The position demanded someone decisive enough to make important choices, and possessed of the character and breadth of mind to bring others together.

In that sense, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was the only possible replacement for the Martial God.

“Great Hero, the leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families have given you their approval. You are upright and fair. You show no special favor even to Huashan, your own sect, and you listen to others. You are more than qualified.”

With the rise of the New Murim Alliance, the Hidden Shadow Pavilion had been officially restored, and Thousand-Faced Fox had regained his former standing. But one man’s support could not make an Alliance Leader.

Only someone recognized by all—someone with the qualities of a leader as well as exceptional martial arts—could take that seat.

Not that there were no objections at all.

Thousand-Faced Fox pushed the thought aside and frowned.

“And yet someone like you is leisurely enjoying the spring weather.”

Mae Jonghak glanced wistfully toward the window.

“It was a nice day. I only looked outside for a moment.”

“Do you know how many matters are waiting for you—”

“Oh, right. Take them with you. I put them all together.”

Thousand-Faced Fox stopped in the middle of his scolding.

“What do you mean?”

“The bamboo slips the Hidden Shadow Pavilion brought in earlier. Seventy-eight matters, to be exact. I’ve dealt with all of them.”

“…?”

All of them? In so little time?

Thousand-Faced Fox stared at the mountain of bamboo slips in the corner of the office. Then his eyes narrowed.

“Did you read the letter from Qinghai?”

“You mean the Kunlun Sect? Of course. It said they were pressed for time because they had to suppress bands of bandits and mounted bandits. It would be good if they arrived on time, but it should not matter much if they are a little late.”

“And the news from Sichuan?”

“Everyone is working together to speed the Tang Clan’s reconstruction. Ah, tell the Inner Hall to prepare an especially potent elixir. I heard the Family Head’s condition is poor. We should send substantial aid, but for now, we can at least do that much.”

“Then the letter from the Nanman Beast Palace…?”

“Was there one? I saw nothing about the Nanman Beast Palace among today’s matters.”

There was a simple reason for that. None of the matters submitted today had mentioned the Nanman Beast Palace.

Only then did a faint smile reach Thousand-Faced Fox's lips. Until now, he had only half believed Mae Jonghak.

"Hm? Why are you smiling?"

"It's nothing. I'm simply pleased to see you attending to your duties so—"

"Do not smile so slyly. Someone else might be horrified if they saw you."

"…"

"Anyway, the breeze is lovely. What a fine day."

Having spoiled Thousand-Faced Fox's mood, Mae Jonghak went back to gazing out the window. Then he spoke again.

"Would you like to take a walk outside with me? We may not have another day like this after today."

"I'd rather not."

Thousand-Faced Fox's answer was curt.

"I will send up another matter shortly, so do not do anything pointless, Alliance Leader. Get to work."

"An honored guest is arriving. The least I can do is go out and greet them."

"Greet them?"

Thousand-Faced Fox paused, then limped toward the window on his prosthetic leg.

"Look over there."

"…!"

Something was slowly approaching beyond the city wall.

It was still a considerable distance away and blurred by it, but once he focused his internal energy, he could easily make out a carriage.

What he could not explain was the familiar face on the driver's bench of that four-horse carriage.

Why is Shadow Killer there?

Shadow Killer was among the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's finest agents. At the Star-Array Grand Banquet, he had tracked Mae Jonghak while the Sword Saint was hiding his identity. During the Great Faction War, he had taken the heads of countless fiends.

"A familiar face, isn't it?" Mae Jonghak said.

"Yes. I sent Shadow Killer when I heard there was trouble on the main road, but…"

I sent him to capture them, and now he's escorting them here.

Thousand-Faced Fox swallowed the rest of his words as Mae Jonghak's voice reached his ears.

"An urgent report came while you were away," Mae Jonghak said.

"An urgent report?"

"Yes. Some welcome faces are on their way."

Mae Jonghak patted Thousand-Faced Fox's shoulder twice, then leaned out the window and muttered, "Come, let's go."

"Welcome."

The carriage entered the Murim Alliance's Inner City and came to a stop. The voice that greeted us as soon as we got down was fairly familiar.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

I'd once known him as Always-Victorious Sword Jongni Chu. He spotted me and gave a short laugh.

"How have you been, my friend?"

"…"

He's really sticking with that act.

I dipped my head in greeting. Mae Jonghak smacked his lips as if disappointed, then turned to Jeok Cheongang.

"I'm glad to see you looking well."

Jeok Cheongang, who had been yawning extravagantly while looking around, furrowed his brow.

"Were you speaking to this old man?"

"It has been a long time. I'm glad to see you again."

"You must have mistaken me for someone else. This old man has no particular connection to a brat whose blood hasn't even dried on his head…"

Jeok Cheongang trailed off. He looked Mae Jonghak up and down, and his eyes widened.

"Could it be you?"

"It is. It's me."

Mae Jonghak beamed.

"Since we've met again, would you consider becoming Alliance Leader?"

"…?"

"…?"

Is this the Murim version of picking a group-project captain?

Chapter 521

"Since it's good to see you again, let me ask you something. Would you consider becoming Alliance Leader?"

"…?"

"…?"

If the captain of a group project announced he was quitting, of course the other members would panic.

Mae Jonghak's question was so far beyond anything I'd expected that the Thunderbolt Saber King's mouth fell open. The Azure Sky Sword King and Unnamed stared at him in disbelief.

What does being glad to see him have to do with that…?

And this guy is the Alliance Leader?

They didn't say it aloud, but their faces did.

The last person there, Jeok Cheongang, looked astonishingly calm when he spoke.

"An ordinary person would be unable to continue speaking at a moment like this. But this old man is different. I have met an awful lot of crazy bastards lately."

The moment our eyes met, I turned around.

By an incredible coincidence, there was nobody behind me. Nobody except a sparrow pecking at something on the ground.

Oh, I see. That must be why he's looking this way.

"I didn't know you liked birds. Sparrows are cute, though."

"I'm looking at you."

"Me? Why me all of a sudden?"

"Do you really have to ask?"

"Usually people ask because they don't know. Why ask if they already do?"

"The way you're flapping that mouth makes me want to bury you."

That would be a problem.

I thought it over for a moment, then asked, not quite believing it myself, "This is just on the off chance—an extremely remote, one-in-a-million chance—but was I among the lunatics you mentioned?"

"Without question. Absolutely. Beyond the slightest doubt, your name is at the very top of the list."

"…"

I'd come dead last a few times in school, but this was my first time coming first.

I'm so glad I finally managed it—yeah, right. What the hell?

Jeok Cheongang, of all people, calling me a lunatic. And I ranked above Cheongpung.

The psychological damage made my vision swim. I stared at Jeok Cheongang and opened my mouth.

"There's this guy I know, Tess hyung.[2467] He once said, 'Know thyself.'"

"Was that directed at this old man?"

"Do you really have to ask?"

"You little son of a—"

His half-raised fist stopped. Sensing the stares gathering around us, Jeok Cheongang groaned and turned back to Mae Jonghak.

"In any case, I'll give you a straight answer. No."

"Ho. Why?"

"Too much trouble."

What an answer. You'd think he might at least be tempted, but he'd turned down the Alliance Leader's seat because he couldn't be bothered.

"Ah. Can't argue with that."

"…"

That was even better.

Please don't agree with him. Can't you see people slowly gathering around us?

We're screwed.

A dreadful thought crept up on me: if this conversation spread, the group project—the Murim Alliance—might fall apart.

Unfortunately, the two masterpieces facing each other were both shamelessly manly men who did not care about such things.

"A title like that doesn't suit me, and I don't like dealing with people."

"Ah. Neither do I."

"Then quit."

"I can't do that."

"Why?"

Mae Jonghak scratched his chin and tossed out a simple answer.

"Because someone has to do it."

"…!"

A man who had taken up a sword simply because he loved martial arts, then earned the name Sword Saint.

A true martial artist who, at the end of a brutal war, had turned his back on wealth and glory, chosen the life of a recluse, and returned to the mountains.

[2467] Tess hyung is a familiar Korean way of addressing Socrates, popularized by the song "Tess Hyung." Hyung is a man's familiar address for an older man.

But before he was a martial artist, Mae Jonghak was a Great Hero. He hadn't accepted the title of Alliance Leader out of some shallow desire for fame. He'd accepted it because he was both.

Someone has to do it.

The words were brief, but they carried weight. Jeok Cheongang gazed at Mae Jonghak, then let out a quiet laugh.

"Many years have passed, yet you haven't changed. It feels as though we met at Mount Jiuhua only yesterday."

Mae Jonghak's eyes widened.

"Yesterday? What are you talking about? That happened at least several decades ago."

"…"

"…"

Give me back my touching moment, you bastard.

I wasn't the only one who felt cheated. Under a shower of cold looks, Mae Jonghak tilted his head.

"Am I remembering it wrong?"

All trace of laughter vanished from Jeok Cheongang's face.

"…You really haven't changed. I can feel my insides rotting."

"Are you still unwell? I heard you had recovered fully from the poisoning."

"Shut that mouth of yours. If you keep talking, I don't know what this old man might do."

"Come to think of it, Great Hero Jeok, you were the first person ever to say that to me. This is why I like you."

"…Are you and that brat Cheongpung really just Master and Disciple? You're not related by blood?"

That question deserved a place among Murim's Seven Great Mysteries.

Everyone, myself included, was waiting for Mae Jonghak's answer with pounding hearts when an elderly voice sounded behind us.

"As far as I know, the Alliance Leader and the Huashan Divine Dragon are not related by blood."

I recognized the old man limping toward us on a prosthetic leg.

Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho.

The former Chief of the Murim Alliance's Hidden Shadow Pavilion, now restored to the same post in the New Murim Alliance, bowed slightly.

"Please come upstairs. Refreshments are ready."

The Murim Alliance was crowded.

People with the character Alliance embroidered in silver thread on their chests moved about everywhere. They weren't all armed martial artists, either. Quite a few wore neat scholars' robes.

Those people…

Song Ho hadn't won his post as Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion in a game of Go-Stop.[2468] Walking beside me, he seemed to read the question in my glance at once.

"They serve directly under the Alliance Leader's Office."

"They don't look like they're from the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families."

"Good eye. Because they serve directly under the Alliance Leader's Office, we didn't select anyone who belongs to another sect or whose identity hasn't been thoroughly verified. We have to protect confidential information. This way."

The Murim Alliance grounds were as vast as a plain and as complicated as a maze. Pavilions and other buildings stood packed together wherever I looked, and shouts rang out from a distant training ground.

When I first got off the carriage, I'd thought we were already in the Inner City. But the farther we went, the tighter security became and the fewer people I saw.

No. It'd be more accurate to say I couldn't see them.

They could hold their breath and use the most advanced concealment techniques they liked. I could still sense them—on the walls, above the ceiling, hidden in the dark. I felt their gazes and their qi as they watched this place.

"I've been wondering for a while. Are those people from the Hidden Shadow Pavilion?"

Song Ho's eyes widened slightly at the sudden question.

"When did you notice them?"

"When we passed the fifth door."

"Can you still sense them?"

"Yes."

"Remarkable. Truly remarkable. Those four were trained as assassins even within the Hidden Shadow Pavilion. To detect every one of them…"

I scratched my chin as he marveled.

"Do you really not know, or are you testing me?"

"Hm? What do you mean?"

"If it's a test, it's not much fun. There are five, not four."

Ssss.

[2468] Go-Stop is a Korean card game played with hwatu, or flower cards.

A torch hanging on the wall stirred, then went still. It was the only sign that the Hidden Shadow Pavilion agents concealed nearby had been shaken. Their leader's gaze grew intent.

"I suspected as much. So it wasn't a coincidence."

"Actually, I guessed."

"…"

"Kidding. Your people are all skilled. I nearly walked right past without noticing them."

Something flashed in Song Ho's eyes. Unlike when he'd been testing me, his admiration and curiosity now seemed genuine.

"Extraordinary. From the information I'd gathered, I thought I had a fairly accurate idea of your martial ability… Have you gained some new insight lately?"

Insight.

I thought of my ten days of training while drifting down the Yangtze and nodded.

The greatest thing I'd gained from the training Mungyeong prescribed was finer control over qi itself, the source of martial arts. Before, it had been like handling a thick rope. Now it was more like handling a spool of thread.

That had improved my understanding of how to use my internal energy, and my Qi Sense had sharpened along with it.

"Maybe a little."

"Your rate of growth is frightening. Almost unbelievable."

The Thunderbolt Saber King, who'd been glancing at me for some time, muttered, "It is… In all my years, I've never seen a monster like you. You'll make a fine rival for my eldest grandson."

"And your eldest grandson's name is…?"

"Peng Dojin."

"Pengdori?[2469] Sure, he's a good starter Pokémon. Cute, too."

"What the hell are you talking about? Peng Dojin! Peng Dojin! The one who gave you a close fight at the Star-Array Grand Banquet!"

Jeok Cheongang, who'd been swaggering along like a back-alley thug, kindly supplied the details.

"The one you beat like a dog for fifteen minutes until he surrendered. Was he thirty?"

"Oh, right. I remember now. By the end, he was using his saber as a cane."

"Y-you…!"

"It's all right. When you're young, you get beaten here and there. You lose sometimes."

Jeok Cheongang lit up like a child who'd received a Christmas present.

[2469] Pengdori is the Korean name for Piplup, a penguin Pokémon that players can choose as a starter.

“Peng, it’ll be the same when he’s older, so don’t get your hopes up. Try as he might, he’ll only end up like his grandfather—unable to Return to Youth, growing old and dying.”

“You son of a—!”

“Ahem.”

No matter how I looked at it, the Azure Sky Sword King was the greatest victim here. He hadn’t said a word, yet the blows kept landing on him too. The skin beneath the old swordsman’s eyes twitched.

Mae Jonghak’s next remark finished him off.

“Don’t be so impatient, everyone. Keep at it and it’ll happen naturally.”

“…!”

“…!”

Was that supposed to be words or a fart?

If Returning to Youth happened naturally, half the martial artists in the world would’ve done it already.

The Thunderbolt Saber King and the Azure Sky Sword King fell silent, unable even to get angry at a remark Mae Jonghak had made without a trace of malice. Just then, the largest, tallest pavilion I’d seen in the Murim Alliance came into view.

“Please come inside.”

At first, I thought it must be where the Alliance Leader lived. I knew I was wrong before we even opened the door.

Tadadadak!

“A letter from Jiangsu!”

“What’s the Grade?”

“Earth Grade.”

“Organize the related matters and relay them. Have So Pyeong, Hwangso, and Jang Il-pal submit their reports within half an hour.”

Shff, shff, shff!

People hurried around the pavilion. Bamboo slips and documents traveled through a bewildering network of cylinders running throughout the building.

Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho watched the entire chaotic scene carefully before opening his mouth.

“Hubei. Wudang. Heaven Grade.”

Someone in scholars’ robes heard the three brief words and pulled a ring.

A moment later—

Whoosh! Thunk!

A bamboo slip dropped through the cylinder beside us and unfurled.

“This is why we summoned you here. It is an urgent report that arrived from the Wudang Sect of Hubei five days ago.”

I didn’t hear a word he said.
I was staring at what was on the bamboo slip—not the writing, but the drawing.
The Water God Dragon… wasn’t the whole story.
Something unidentifiable had been drawn in black ink.
It was a monster unfamiliar to some, yet strangely familiar to others.

Chapter 522

Fuck. One problem after another.

I felt like I'd been walloped in the back of the head.

Nothing in this world was absolute, but I had still thought the events in Hubei had been wrapped up properly…

The Water God Dragon wasn't the only thing affected by magical power.

Had another Gate opened somewhere? Or had magical power the Water God Dragon failed to absorb leaked out and affected something else?

Looking at the drawing left my mouth feeling gritty, as if I'd been chewing sand.

I wasn't the only one who understood how serious this was.

"What in the world is that?"

"One thing seems certain. Whatever it is, it cannot be called human."

The Thunderbolt Saber King and the Azure Sky Sword King muttered to themselves. Mae Jonghak spoke up.

"According to Wudang, that bizarre creature is the Killing Ghost that has been terrorizing Hubei of late."

"The Killing Ghost?"

Jeok Cheongang frowned and looked at me. I understood the question in his eyes and nodded.

"It's probably the one you're thinking of."

"Damn it. Darkest beneath the lamp, indeed."

He was right. This was exactly what that saying meant.

But in this case, we couldn't have noticed. The lamp had been so bright we could barely open our eyes.

With hundreds of people dying across Hubei Province, it would have been strange to pay much attention to a Killing Ghost Wudang was already pursuing. Especially when the culprit we'd finally uncovered was an imugi[2470] driven mad by magical power.

We didn't have time to worry about anything else.

It hadn't occurred to me that another monster might appear. I'd assumed the Killing Ghost was just another lunatic of the kind you found all over Murim.

But what kind of monster is this bastard?

Drawings from this era looked about like the ones in history textbooks. The drawing on the bamboo slip was no different.

Whoever had made it had clearly tried to be accurate, but it fell short in all sorts of ways, including any sense of depth.

[2470] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often associated with dragons.

There was only one thing I could tell from it: as the Azure Sky Sword King had said, this thing wasn't human.

A horn jutted from the middle of its forehead. Its arms and legs were absurdly long and thick. Its eyes, the only part drawn in color, were red. This was beyond anything you could explain with the words demonic, heterodox arts.

Definitely a monster. But had magical power mutated it, like the Water God Dragon?

Tap. Tap.

I drummed my fingers anxiously against the wall.

"Are there any other drawings?"

Thousand-Faced Fox, who'd been watching me closely, nodded.

"Unfortunately, no. That was the best Wudang could do."

"That's a shame. But I doubt this is all you have."

"You're quick. A second letter arrived from Wudang two days ago."

At a glance from Thousand-Faced Fox, the middle-aged scholar pulled the ring again.

Whoosh! Thunk!

An oval wooden case slid down the round tube. Inside was a letter densely covered in writing.

"Read it yourself. You were at the center of what happened in Hubei. You may spot something the Hidden Shadow Pavilion and I missed."

"I was planning to do that anyway."

"This old man will read it too," Jeok Cheongang said.

We put our heads together and read the letter. Once didn't seem enough, so we read it a second time, then a third. Only after fifteen minutes did we look up.

"What do you think?" Thousand-Faced Fox asked.

Jeok Cheongang frowned. "Hard to say."

"I see."

"…Why aren't you asking me anything else?"

Because I wasn't expecting much from you in the first place.

Not that I had much to add myself. From what the letter said, Thousand-Faced Fox and the Hidden Shadow Pavilion had already pieced together some of the circumstances behind the monster's appearance.

"As you've read, this monster was once a fisherman who lived at the mouth of the Yangtze," Thousand-Faced Fox said.

I pointed to the first line of the letter. "Jang Sam. In his fifties, with a family."

Wudang hadn't assumed a monster like this had simply dropped out of the sky. They'd examined its corpse closely, found several distinguishing features, and investigated. That had led them to a fisherman from a village less than a hundred li[2471] from Mount Wudang.

“They say he went out alone to fish more than a month ago and vanished without a trace. When he failed to return after several days, his children petitioned the local authorities.”

The authorities probably couldn’t have found him. Fishermen did die now and then, and Hubei Province had been gripped by fear and chaos after one disaster after another.

When even high-ranking people were dropping dead here and there like minions in some canyon, who was going to worry about one fisherman?

Even if they had actively searched for him, they probably couldn’t have found him.

Even Wudang’s masters had taken quite some time to catch Jang Sam. The local authorities would have had no better luck.

How had an aging fisherman, once as ordinary as they came, become a hideous monster known as the Killing Ghost?

“Any idea what caused it?” Thousand-Faced Fox asked.

“The Blood Fish seem the likeliest cause.”

“I’ve already received the report on them. I sent several Hidden Shadow Pavilion agents to Hubei with orders to capture a live one.”

“Good call. Jang Sam, who became a mon—who became a monster, was originally a fisherman, and Dongting Lake is connected to the tributaries of the Yangtze…”

Mae Jonghak, who’d been listening quietly, murmured, “He might have eaten a Blood Fish that came down one of those tributaries.”

“Or been eaten by one.”

“…!”

“…!”

“Either way, that seems likeliest for now. It would explain his appearance and how he grew strong enough to evade Wudang for days.”

Thousand-Faced Fox’s expression hardened. “What about the possibility that the same thing happened somewhere else, as it did with the imugi[2472] you defeated? What you call a ‘rift.‘”

“…”

“Tell me. I wanted to hear it from you.”

They called it a rift here. I called it a Gate.

Of course I’d considered the possibility. I just didn’t want to think about it, let alone say it aloud.

I wasn’t superstitious, but there was that saying about speaking things into existence. Honestly, I wanted to rule out even the slightest chance.

[2471] This uses the Chinese li, about 500 m (0.311 mi). A hundred li is about 50 km (31 mi).

[2472] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often associated with dragons.

Still, I could not avoid answering. I opened my mouth with an uncomfortable expression.

"I can't be certain, but I think it's unlikely."

"Why?"

"If the same thing had happened, it wouldn't have ended with just this."

No second Gate had opened. That was my conclusion.

We should have been relieved. Yet the few of us who knew what a Gate meant—including me—looked grim. They'd understood what I was really saying.

Put simply:

It hasn't happened yet. But if another Gate blows, we're truly fucked.

"A powder keg," Thousand-Faced Fox murmured. "A powder keg, indeed."

A powder keg was safe as long as no fire touched it. But that also meant it became more dangerous than anything else the moment someone set it alight.

You'd wonder what kind of lunatic would do that, except the lunatics of Dark Heaven had already set Hubei Province's powder keg alight once.

Murim as it stood was like a vast powder keg on the verge of exploding.

And the second and third Gates would be the enormous sparks that set it off.

There is one small mercy.

I didn't know who the bastard called the Lord of Heaven really was, or how the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had opened a Gate. But I could make one guess.

Opening a Gate isn't easy for them either.

A Gate wasn't an inn door. If Dark Heaven could fling them open whenever they pleased, Murim would already be a complete disaster.

Orcs would have founded sects, while Lycanthropes and ogres would be walking arm in arm down the main roads of Henan.

Before the Murim Alliance could even be formed, everyone would be shouting, Uh, fuck, what are those things? Then we would have fallen apart completely.

But Dark Heaven hadn't done that.

Why? Because it was hard.

Which meant we had to hurry. We had to stop them before another powder keg blew.

And there was a second mercy: this vast group, united under the Murim Alliance's banner, had the strength to do it.

"…Calamity has come to Murim," Mae Jonghak murmured with a sigh. "On a far greater scale than I imagined."

Thousand-Faced Fox turned to him, his face set. "There's something I must look into at once. Alliance Leader, forgive me, but would you and the others move elsewhere?"

"Of course."

"Understood. I'll report to you later. Until next time, everyone."

That was the last he said to us.

Before we had even left the pavilion, urgent shouts rang out from every direction. The people who had been worn down by exhaustion opened their eyes wide as though they had never been tired and began moving according to their orders.

The Hidden Shadow Pavilion, which had kept itself alive even after the Murim Alliance's dissolution, was moving again.

They weren't the only ones about to get busy.

"I should go as well," Mae Jonghak said. "There will soon be a mountain of work waiting for me."

The Azure Sky Sword King nodded. "The same goes for me. May I tell my good-for-nothing son what I heard here today?"

"You seem to have forgotten who brought you here."

If the information were too secret to share with anyone, the Alliance Leader and the Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion wouldn't have brought us all here themselves.

The Azure Sky Sword King understood and clasped his hands in salute.

"Thank you."

"Everyone will know in a few days. Until then, take care that nothing gets out."

"Of course. I'll keep that in mind."

The Thunderbolt Saber King seemed to grasp the gravity of the situation too. His face was stiff as he spoke.

"Hey, Sword Saint. I have something to ask as well."

"The Hebei Peng Family may be told too. There's no reason—"

"No, not that. What in the world were you all talking about in there?"

"…"

"…"

Is the Hebei Peng Family's Grand Family Head really this low on Intelligence? My pecs are swelling with pride…

Everyone, including me, gave him a cold stare. The Thunderbolt Saber King mumbled a defense.

"You could at least talk about something a man can understand. I know a great pleasure has come to Murim, but…"

"Peng."

"Yeah?"

"Then shut your mouth for a while. This old man thinks that would help."

"What did you say?!"

Jeok Cheongang heaved a sigh at the Thunderbolt Saber King, then looked at Mae Jonghak.

“I’ll handle this stupid old man. Go on. You must be busy.”
“Thank you. By the way, Great Hero Jeok.”
“Speak.”
Mae Jonghak took Jeok Cheongang’s hand and held it tight.
“Are you sure you won’t be Alliance Leader?”
“…”
“…”
Be honest. You and Cheongpung are blood relatives, aren’t you?

Chapter 523

Ssssss.

Hot. Scorching Yang Qi surged from my dantian, spreading through my limbs and bones and racing along my acupoints. Everything felt still and vividly clear.

I circulated my internal energy through the Eight Extraordinary Meridians.

Once, twice, three times…

Circulating qi was like rolling a snowball down a high hill. With every pass, the snowball grew. But it could also pick up dirt, stones, and twigs along the way.

Those impurities were turbid qi. They muddied the purity of my internal energy, and each pass burned away more of them, refining it.

More. More. More.

I kept circulating my energy, repeating the words to myself as if entranced.

Three jiazi[2473] of internal energy took the shape of a fire dragon and swam unhindered through my body. In the image I held in my mind, the dragon grew larger, its heat burning hotter.

Then I knew.

Now.

Fwoosh.

At my command, Scorching Yang Qi surged in every direction. The heat was overwhelming, as though a small sun had burst inside me.

My closed eyes grew hot. Flames seemed to pour from my nose instead of breath.

No—it wasn't just a feeling. That had to be what was happening.

Water overflowed when there was too much of it. Now the internal energy filling my body was flowing out.

Heat poured from my eyes, nose, mouth, and the other openings known as the seven apertures, scorching the air around me. The same thing was happening through the countless pores all over my body.

Ssssss.

I could feel an immense flow of qi gathering above my crown. At the same time, I began to draw on the blank canvas of my mind.

I was my own master. Every acupoint in my body was mine, as was every strand of qi that had flowed out of it. None could defy my will.

I couldn't see the Scorching Yang Qi above my head, but I could feel it taking the shape I wanted.

One, two, three.

Three petals, red as though they were burning.

[2473] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Three jiazi amount to 180 years.

Three Flowers Gather at the Crown.

This was what enlightenment had brought to my Supreme Peak realm.

It was a realm any martial artist in the world would dream of reaching. For me, though, it was only the first hill.

Hoo.

The short breath I let out carried the last traces of turbid qi I'd filtered away. Once I had expelled even that final handful, leaving my internal energy and mind clear, I stepped toward the next hill.

Five Qi Returning to Origin.

I'd attempted it several times since opening my Middle Dantian, but I'd never succeeded. Another wall stood in my way.

I'll get past it. Right now.

A sharp tingle ran through my chest as I made up my mind.

I couldn't lose this edge of tension. Punching blindly at a wall would only hurt my fist. If I wanted to put even a hairline crack in it, I had to stay alert and read the flow precisely.

Let my guard down for even a moment, and my internal energy could reverse its flow.

Following a road someone else had laid was easy. I was carving out a new one of my own. I had to move boulders, cut through undergrowth—and I could always slip while climbing a cliff.

A reversal would cause an Internal Injury. If I kept forcing my way forward while injured, I'd be asking for qi deviation.

According to Jeok Cheongang, plenty of martial artists had died or been left half-crippled that way. I had no intention of ending up in a wheelchair while Dark Heaven was taking a gigantic dump all over Murim.

Slowly. Carefully.

Fortunately, training with Mungyeong had helped a great deal.

The Scorching Yang Qi I'd built through the Fire Gate Divine Technique—the cultivation technique at the heart of the Fire Gate Clan—had power and explosiveness to rival the techniques of other prestigious sects. Its movements, however, were correspondingly rough.

This training had helped me make up for some of that weakness.

I can do this. As long as I keep my head clear, I can do it.

It was warm. The Three Flowers Gather at the Crown trembled above my head.

Don't worry. Internal energy is faster than hands.

First ring.

I had just begun to move my internal energy with care when someone spoke.

"Rein it in. Trying now is a waste of effort anyway."

"…!"

Crack!

The sudden voice shattered my concentration. The internal energy taking shape as Five Qi Returning to Origin scattered.

At the same time, my internal energy reversed its flow. Gastric juices surged up from deep inside my body, and I vomited.

"Ooooooogh!"

Splash.

Vomit flecked with blood spilled across the floor.

Fuck. So this is where the Niagara Falls I saw in pictures were hiding.

I poured out what had come up and stood panting. Then I saw the side dishes I'd eaten that morning waving at me from the floor.

"Uweeegh! Bleeegh!"

Ah. Couldn't hold that back.

Only after emptying my stomach several more times did my mind finally clear. I glared at the owner of the leather shoes who had already moved a considerable distance away.

"What are you doing?"

Mungyeong inspected the shoes on his feet before answering.

"I only bought these three days ago. I'd rather they didn't get dirty."

"Not that. Why did you talk to me while I was circulating my qi?"

"I didn't even shake you, so what's the problem? You've reached that realm, yet your composure is shattered by a few words. That is your deficiency."

"You startled me!"

"You startled me too. What the hell have you been eating yesterday and today to produce so much…?"

Mungyeong frowned at the vomit spread across the floor.

"The longer I look, the filthier it gets. Though from the shape, it does bear a passing resemblance to Five Qi Returning to Origin."

"Hey, Mr. Mun!"

"Mr. what?"

I held Mungyeong's cold stare.

One second. Two seconds. Three.

Hmm. That should do it.

"Slip of the tongue. I must have suffered a serious Internal Injury."

"Looking at you makes my qi-sea acupoint throb."

I avoided his flat stare and hurriedly changed the subject.

"What brings you here all of a sudden? No, wait. How did you get in?"

“What do you think the door is for?”

“But Mujin’s guarding the door…”

My voice trailed off.

Slide. Thump!

A figure collapsed with a faint flop through the half-open doorway.

The back of the head was so familiar that my eyes widened before I could stop them.

“Mujin! Hyuk Mujin!”

“Leave him,” Mungyeong said in a grim voice. “He won’t wake up even if you shake him.”

He wouldn’t wake up even if I shook him?

That blood-crazed Killing Ghost had finally done it.

I roared furiously.

“You cold-blooded murderer! You’re just like that bastard the Slaughter Saint!”

“He was asleep blocking the door. I tried to wake him, but he wouldn’t budge… What did you just say?”

“Huh?”

“I asked what you said.”

“What?”

What the fuck?

Right on cue, Hyuk Mujin’s corpse—no, his body—stirred. A vigorous snore followed.

Grrrrrr.

“…”

“…”

Our gazes met in silence. I gave Mungyeong a charming smile.

“There seems to have been a very slight, insignificant misunderstanding.”

“It didn’t sound like a misunderstanding. Or an insignificant one.”

“Can’t we just agree that good is good?”

“Dead is dead?”

“Oh… How did you get that from what I said?”

“Why couldn’t I? Do you have a problem with it?”

I did have a problem with it, and his cochlea also seemed to have a serious problem, but I lacked the courage to point that out.

“I was wrong.”

“And an apology settles everything?”

“I believe a sincere conversation can untangle any knot.”

"Good. Go have one with Dark Heaven's Lord of Heaven, then. Now wipe that irritating smile off your face before I tear your mouth apart."

"Our ancestors said you can't spit in a smiling face."

"Ptui."

Splat.

Hmm. Our ancestors were wrong.

At times like this, I had to regain my composure. I calmly wiped the spit from my cheek.

"That came out incredibly fast. I thought it was a hidden weapon."

"If I put internal energy behind it, I can burst someone's eyeballs."

"Impressive. Are you Zerg,[2474] by any chance?"

"I'm the Grim Reaper."

"…Once again, I'm very sorry."

Mungyeong looked at me as if calculating how many pieces he'd have to cut me into for people to say he'd killed me properly. Then he clicked his tongue.

"Enough. Every time I talk to you, it drains me."

"…"

He's one to talk. I'm losing life force by the second.

I'd bet Hyuk Mujin's left atrium that conversation had shaved at least three days off my life.

I told that bastard Hyuk Mujin to stand guard. He couldn't even resist falling asleep again.

Mungyeong was something else, but Hyuk Mujin was no less impressive.

"So what brings you here…?"

"That sounded like 'What shitty thing have you come here to do this time?'"

"Oh."

"Oh?"

"Oh… no. I was just curious."

"Your pronunciation seems to have grown rather strange since I last saw you. Must be my imagination."

"Of course. Just your imagination."

Mungyeong sighed quietly and tossed me the bundle in his hand.

Thump.

I caught it reflexively and stared at it with wide eyes.

"What's this?"

"A pill."

"A pill?"

[2474] The Zerg are an insect-like alien species in the StarCraft games.

Is it Santa Claus in spring? What's with the sudden present?

I opened the bundle, still unsure what to make of it, and found a small, sturdy-looking wooden case inside. A strange fragrance reached deep into my nose.

This is…

They said you could tell how potent some elixirs were before you even saw them. Now I understood what they meant. I knew the pill inside was powerful before I opened the case.

Click.

When I opened the case, a reddish pill came into view. Even at first glance, it was clearly no ordinary pill.

I stared at it for a moment, then looked up at Mungyeong.

"What are you looking at?"

"Why are you giving me something like this all of a sudden?"

"It holds a considerable amount of fire qi. It'll help you."

"What?"

"Is there a hidden weapon stuck in your ear? Don't make me say it twice."

"No, I wasn't asking what it does…"

Mungyeong's face crumpled. For someone who spent most of his time looking bleak, it was a remarkable display of emotion.

"I found it on the way here."

"…?"

"Let me correct that. I saw it while passing by and bought it. Satisfied?"

What do you mean, satisfied, old man?

I touched the red pill in its case.

Item check.

Ding.

Y / N

Yeah. No. That's enough.

I closed the small System window and gave Mungyeong a lukewarm look.

"'Saw it while passing by and bought it.' Right."

"…What's that look for?"

"Nothing. Thank you. I'll take it."

What I felt toward Mungyeong was half gratitude, half fear.

I appreciate the good pill, but what the hell is the next training session going to be…?

Being treated this well all of a sudden felt like being fed a good meal before an execution.

As if he understood what my trembling gaze meant, Mungyeong opened his mouth.

He poked his head through the gap in the open door. The moment our eyes met, he spoke with a solemn expression.

“Your qi circulation is complete.”

“Yeah. Your life is about to be over, too.”

“Hyuk Mujin, Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan. As the Captain ordered, I was guarding the door so that not even a single ant could get inside.”

“…Are you seriously insane?”

Look at this bastard, acting proud after letting in everything but the ants.

It was ridiculous, but I decided to give him high marks for the sheer nerve it took to lie so brazenly after snoring his head off.

“Close the door and get lost.”

“Yes, sir.”

Perhaps he felt guilty, because he didn’t offer even a word of protest before scampering away.

Just as he was about to shut the door, something occurred to me.

“Wait. What about the others?”

“Who do you mean by ‘the others’…?”

“All of them.”

Hyuk Mujin thought for a moment.

“First, the Lesser Family Head is meeting with the Sect Leaders and Family Heads of the other factions.”

“The Sect Leaders and Family Heads?”

“Yes. It seems he’s been meeting with them more often for the past two days.”

Two days ago. That was when a few of us, including Jeok Cheongang and me, had gone to the Murim Alliance.

It was about time the subject came up.

At the very least, the heads of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families should have received some warning.

With all sorts of information and problems related to Dark Heaven coming to light, it was only natural for them to put their heads together and devise a countermeasure.

“Oh, and we handed the Three Fiend over to the Murim Alliance. I heard they were going to bring in some master to interrogate him…”

“Really?”

The third of the Qilian Three Fiends, who had stained Sichuan with blood under the Western Heaven Demon Lord's command, was remarkably hard to kill.

Plenty had happened while he was bound and brought all the way to Henan, yet unlike his two brothers, his head was still attached to his neck. That alone proved how lucky the bastard was.

It was just a different part that had fallen off instead.

If he kept saying he didn't know anything even while they were cutting off his balls, I doubt an interrogation will get much more out of him.

Even for a Supreme Peak master—hell, for anyone—one's balls were precious.

Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin had once held a hundred-minute debate over which mattered most: a man's life, his dantian, or his balls.

Anyway, I handed the Three Fiend over as ordered. The Murim Alliance can handle the rest.

Well, what happened after that was none of my concern. I could only hope the Murim Alliance managed to obtain more information about Dark Heaven through further interrogation.

"Forget my eldest brother. What about the others? I haven't seen them anywhere."

"Gung Gibang moved to a different lodging."

"He moved? When?"

"About one or two shichen[2475] ago. You were busy circulating your qi, so I took the message for you."

"…You weren't asleep then?"

"What are you talking about? I told you I stood guard like an iron wall."

"Ugh. Every time this bastard opens his mouth—"

I raised my fist, and Hyuk Mujin hurried on.

"The Beggars' Sect! He said he would be staying at the Henan branch of the Beggars' Sect, so we should come find him anytime something happens."

I stopped just short of hitting him.

"The Beggars' Sect? Why would he go there?"

"What?"

Hyuk Mujin looked at me as though I'd said something absurd.

"May I ask which faction you belong to, Captain?"

"What kind of stupid question is that? The Jin Family of Taiyuan or the Fire Gate Clan, obviously."

"And Gung Gibang?"

"…Oh, shit. Right. He's the Beggars' Sect's Successor Beggar."

[2475] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; one or two shichen is about two to four hours.

I had forgotten because he clung to me like a burr. Come to think of it, he had a master and a sect of his own. It would be unreasonable for him to stay with us even in Henan.

“Wait. Did Cheongpung leave too?”

“Of course.”

“…Really?”

It’ll be quiet for a while, then.

And yet I felt both relieved and disappointed. I’d keep seeing them both, of course, but without those two making a racket all the time, I could already feel the empty space they’d left behind.

“They could’ve at least said goodbye before leaving.”

At my mutter, Hyuk Mujin looked me up and down as though I were some strange creature.

“Why would they say goodbye?”

“Why are you so heartless? We’ve spent all this time together, and they just leave without saying goodbye?”

“Do they need to say goodbye when they’re only going out for a bit?”

“…?”

“They went to the marketplace to buy sweetmeats and dumplings.”

“…!”

Shit. Give me back my sentimentality.

I was momentarily speechless. Hyuk Mujin cast me a meaningful look.

“Captain.”

“Shut up.”

“I haven’t said anything yet.”

“That’s why I’m telling you to shut up.”

“I’ll stay by your side no matter what happens, Captain.”

“…Please get away from me.”

“Come on. You like it, so why are you acting like this?”

I was annoyed, but worse than that, I was embarrassed as hell.

I sighed. Hyuk Mujin, still needling me, suddenly seemed to remember something.

“By the way, you haven’t asked about Mungyeong.”

“I already saw him.”

“You did? He’s seemed pretty busy lately, too. He’s been gathering strange medicinal ingredients, boiling them, pounding them… He looked completely swamped. When did you see him?”

“While you were asleep, you bastard!”

Wham! Wham! Wham!

"Urgh! Oof! Gah!"

"Go! Get out right now!"

After taking a thorough beating, Hyuk Mujin looked at me with tears welling in his eyes.

"Do you hate me that much?"

I immediately shook my head.

"No. I want to kill you."

"That's too harsh. Really."

"I told you to stand guard for a moment, and you went to sleep! You slept long enough to dream the entire Dream of the Nine Clouds.[2476] You bastard."

"Why do you only hate me, Captain?! I hate you too!"

"…"

Tap-tap-tap. Slam!

I was speechless as Hyuk Mujin ran off, scattering tears behind him.

What the hell.

The guy was well past his mid-twenties, and that was what he came out with? My fists were growing grander by the second.

I was letting out a heartfelt sigh when the door opened again and Hyuk Mujin poked his head through the gap.

"Um…"

"Welcome back. Our Mujin has come to pick out his burial plot."

"No. That's not it. I came because I was worried you might misunderstand."

"What?"

"I didn't shut the door that hard on purpose. The wind was strong."

"…"

"Well, I'll be going now. Good work, sir. Loyalty."[2477]

Should I really kill him?

He was acting exactly like an elementary school kid who'd just been scolded by his mother. I glared at the door as it closed again, this time as gently as a door could close, then shook my head.

I turned back to the empty space I'd been looking at before Hyuk Mujin woke up.

Mungyeong's Specially Crafted Custom Pill for Jin Taekyung
Type: Elixir
Grade: Peak
Restriction: None (effect increases if taken by Jin Taekyung)
Description: A pill focused on stability and recovery rather than increasing internal energy. If taken when internal energy is unstable, it steadies the user's qi and greatly increases their recovery.
Special Note: Made with Jin Taekyung in mind. He will receive an even greater effect if he takes it.

"…Hmm."

I stroked the reddish pill—otherwise known as the Mungyeong Special Jin Custom Pill—then put it back in its wooden case.

Inventory open. Store.

A System notification appeared, telling me the item had been stored.

But my mind was already on the conversation I'd had with Mungyeong before he left.

"Training ends here."

"Pardon?"

"Why? Are you disappointed?"

A lot of emotions seemed to pass through me in that moment. After hesitating, I answered,

"…To be honest, I can't say I'm glad to hear it."

"Why?"

"I want to get stronger. Much stronger than I am now."

"Greedy bastard. Aren't you strong enough already?"

"Isn't that how people are? No matter how much we have, we always want more."

Mungyeong stared at me for a long time after I questioned him in return, then let out a quiet laugh.

It was the first time I'd seen him smile since we met.

"You're finally starting to sound like a Murim practitioner."

"I am a Murim practitioner."

"Then let me ask you again. Do you want to become an assassin, or a Murim practitioner?"

"I want to be strong. So strong no one would dare touch me. Strong enough that everyone around me would be safe just because I'm there."

"The Invincible… That's an ambitious dream."

The Invincible. The word sounded distant and grandiose.

Even the Martial God had enemies. The Heavenly Demon, master of the Demonic Cult, and the hundred thousand soldiers of the Demonic Path under his command had been the Martial God's adversaries.

"You really do dream big."

"Even if reality is a cesspit, your dreams should be big and lofty."

"Funny. That's obviously ridiculous bluster, but coming from you, it sounds almost plausible."

"Pardon?"

"Nothing. And if that's your reason, then you must not learn my martial arts."

"Why?"

"Too much of anything becomes poison. You don't need two wells right now."

"…I should dig only one well?"

"Did you just speak informally to me?"

"No, that's not what I meant."

"I made this decision after a great deal of thought. Keep that in mind."

"Is it because I lack talent?"

I'd asked as Mungyeong was about to leave.

His answer was short.

"The opposite."

"Pardon?"

"If you were weak and untalented, I'd have taught you more. You'd need to learn whatever you could to survive."

Those words suddenly brought back my days as an F-rank Hunter.

No matter how carefully you chose your position and approached a fight, danger could be lurking anywhere.

Without a tank's protection or cover from a mage or archer, you were ultimately on your own.

If I dropped my spear by mistake, I cut a goblin's throat with the dagger I carried. If the dagger broke, I picked up a rock and smashed in its head.

I did whatever it took to survive.

I hadn't picked a spear because I had any special talent for it. I'd figured that keeping some distance between myself and the monsters might improve my chances of staying alive.

"Judging by your expression, something's occurred to you."

"…I think I understand some of what you mean."

"The martial arts I learned are different in nature from the Fire Gate Clan's. I was raised as an assassin from the start, and I spent more than half my life as one. We began in different places. Even if I taught you my martial arts, you'd likely be unable to make them your own simply by following the formulas."

"Is that why you're ending my training? I thought we'd barely started."

"Started? You already know everything."

"Pardon?"

"What matters isn't martial arts. It's martial principles. Those principles are everything I have. They're the foundation on which the name Slaughter Saint was built."

I could still remember the look in his eyes. I couldn't begin to tell what lay behind it.

And I could still remember his voice.

"There were three hundred of us at first. We all learned the same martial arts and underwent the same training. Ten years later, only twenty of those three hundred raised as assassins remained. Ten years after that, only one remained."

I didn't need to ask who the last person was.

Mungyeong looked back into the distant past with that inscrutable gaze, then turned away. He left me with one final instruction.

"I taught you the martial principles you needed most. Combining martial arts of different kinds is nearly impossible, but principles have no such divide. Work those principles into the martial arts you've learned. That's your final task."

Thump. Thump.

I came out of my thoughts. A familiar presence outside was knocking on the door.

"Hyuk Mujin?"

"Captain. It's time. You should come out."

It's time?

The question vanished almost as soon as it arose.

I suddenly realized what day it was.

The Murim Alliance.

Today, all of Murim would stand beneath a single banner.

Chapter 525

The Alliance Leader's Hall was silent. Only one person remained where countless people had come and gone just one shichen—approximately two hours—earlier.

"How quickly the years pass."

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak murmured the words under his breath. His youthful face was turned toward empty space, but his gaze was searching a distant past. Few people alive still shared those old memories.

They're all gone now.

Of those who shared Mae Jonghak's memories, very few had lived out their natural spans. Most had fallen in nameless wastelands and fields, never to rise again.

The monster known as the Great Faction War had claimed countless lives and turned the survivors into heroes.

But in the end… here we are again.

Enough time had passed for the mountains and rivers to change four times over.

Peace had come to the world. The pain and sorrow of war had faded, and orthodox Murim had sung of the glory of victory.

Then a dark cloud called Dark Heaven appeared in a sky that had seemed destined to remain blue forever.

Peace is over.

The runny-nosed child who had not understood the horrors of war had become middle-aged, while the young man who had drawn his weapon and burned with righteous indignation had grown old.

Those who had not even been born back then had come to Henan seeking glory rather than justice.

Their lives, personalities, and goals were all different.

And Sword Saint Mae Jonghak knew it well. He—and no one else—would have to lead them all into battle once again. He would have to defeat Dark Heaven, which sought to plunge the world into misery.

That was when a low voice slipped between Mae Jonghak's firmly closed lips.

"Every now and then, I wonder whether I can truly do it."

He was not talking to himself. Mae Jonghak knew it, and so did the person who had been quietly standing guard by the door.

Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho, a sturdy old man, stepped forward as he answered.

"You can."

Clack.

The tip of his prosthetic leg struck the floor, the sound echoing unusually loudly. Beneath his hanging white hair, his shrewd eyes shone with force.

“No—you must.”

“I know.”

Mae Jonghak let out a quiet sigh.

“But I’ve known nothing but the sword my entire life. That’s how I came by the empty title of Sword Saint.”

“It’s precisely because you are the Sword Saint that everyone will trust and follow you.”

“Being a martial artist is different from being a leader. I never even became the Sect Leader of a single faction.”

“It’s not that you couldn’t. You chose not to.”

The Thousand-Faced Fox was right.

When the Great Faction War ended and Huashan’s former Sect Leader passed away, every disciple of Huashan had been certain that Sword Saint Mae Jonghak would become their new Sect Leader.

“But you refused. In the end, the Sect Leader’s Command Token went to your Disciple, Heavenly Sword True Person.”

“It was only natural. He was more suited to becoming Huashan’s Sect Leader than I was. And…”

Mae Jonghak ran his fingers over the treasured sword at his waist before continuing.

“I simply liked the sword.”

The Thousand-Faced Fox gazed quietly at Mae Jonghak, then suddenly spoke.

“I don’t know if I ever told you this.”

“Told me what?”

“That person once struggled with the same concern.”

“If you mean that person… surely you’re talking about the Martial God?”

The Thousand-Faced Fox gave a small nod.

“To the people of the world, that person seemed perfect in every way.”

“I know. The Martial God excelled at everything. No—he was overwhelming.”

“But he was a person too. And in the end, he succeeded. For some reason, these old eyes see the two of you overlapping.”

“…!”

Mae Jonghak went still. For a while, he said nothing, gazing at the old martial artist who stood straight before him. Then he spoke.

“Great Hero Song.”

“Yes?”

“It truly is… a fine day.”

“The sky is clear.”

"May I ask the time?"

"It is the wu hour.[2478] Everyone is waiting for one person."

"I'm late."

"You're not late. This is only the beginning."

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak turned his head. Powerful sunlight poured through the wide-open window.

Yes. It truly is a fine day.

He repeated the words to himself. After taking in the blue sky, he slowly turned around.

At that moment, the Thousand-Faced Fox realized that the young man before him was no longer merely a martial artist.

"Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion."

The quiet voice pierced Song Ho's ears.

The Hidden Shadow Pavilion answered directly to the Alliance Leader's Hall, and only one person had the authority to command its chief.

Song Ho took a deep breath and clasped his hands.

"Song Ho, Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion. I await the Alliance Leader's command."

Mae Jonghak's next words marked the beginning of the New Murim Alliance—and its new Alliance Leader's first order.

"Let's go raise the flag."

The old martial artist's eyelids trembled. Then he answered with a cry as strong as any young man's.

"As you command!"

I looked up at the sky. The sun had climbed high into the blue and was pouring down fierce sunlight.

Not even a cool breeze stirred. One thought flashed through my mind.

It's hot.

The heat was intense, but I wasn't uncomfortably warm.

That wasn't just because I'd become Unaffected by Cold and Heat after reaching the Supreme Peak realm.

It wasn't the sunlight I could feel now. It was the heat rising from the crowd—the aura pouring off countless people.

Sssss.

[2478] The wu hour is a traditional two-hour period running approximately from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.

Below the high platform, so many martial artists stood gathered that I couldn't begin to count them. Their combined aura seemed to have stopped even the wind.

Qi rose from them like a heat haze, burning hotter and fiercer than the sunlight overhead.

Then, through that heat, the person everyone had been waiting for finally appeared.

Thud. Thud.

His firm footsteps reached every ear. The sound alone was enough to make bodies tense and minds snap to attention.

The wandering martial artist who had caused a drunken disturbance only yesterday swallowed hard. So did the orthodox and unorthodox martial artists who had gotten into a brawl with each other.

All because of one man's presence.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

The One God, Three Saints, and Ten Kings.

If the Nine Sects and One Gang[2479] and the Five Great Families were the fifteen pillars supporting the world, then the people bearing those titles were the heroes who had made that world anew.

Ten kings stood upon the earth. Above them stretched the unreachable sky of the Martial God, adorned with three stars.

And…

The brightest star of them all.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak. The Number One Sword Under Heaven.

Shhk-shhk-shhk!

Thousands of martial artists parted at once.

No cheers or exclamations could be heard.

Some were stunned by Sword Saint Mae Jonghak's youthful appearance, while others shuddered at the overwhelming aura they could feel against their skin. But not one dared voice a question or say anything aloud.

No. They couldn't doubt him.

This was a path meant for one person alone.

Mae Jonghak passed through the ranks and ascended the high platform. Standing there like a giant, he swept his calm gaze over the crowd.

"You've all been waiting a long time."

The platform was reserved for a select few.

[2479] The Nine Sects and One Gang is a traditional grouping of major martial arts sects and the Beggars' Gang.

Sect Leaders of prestigious great sects, Family Heads of great families, and heroes and masters who had earned great fame regardless of their origins. They were the people who belonged here.

Jeok Cheongang, the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and I are among them.

But if those on the platform were the pillars of the new Murim Alliance, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was its foundation and its head.

Without anyone taking the lead, we all rose from our seats and clasped our hands toward him.

Dozens of us spoke at once, our voices so perfectly matched they sounded like one.

"We greet the Alliance Leader."

Everyone paid their respects with solemn faces—even Jeok Cheongang and Cheongpung, seated on either side of me.

Mae Jonghak gave us a faint smile, nodded, and turned away.

The next moment, every martial artist below—thousands of them, perhaps even ten thousand—heard his voice clearly.

It shook heaven and earth.

"Peace is over."

"…!"

The air surrounding us burst apart.

A towering tree trembled, and the heroes gathered below the platform froze like statues.

Mae Jonghak continued, his words carrying an extraordinary force of internal energy. Nothing remained of the eccentric man I'd known until now.

"War has already begun. Another hundred thousand followers of the Demonic Path are approaching the Central Plains."

Some in the crowd had never lived through the Great Faction War, but none were ignorant of its horrors.

Fear and anger filled the eyes of the older martial artists. The younger ones trembled at a feeling they could not name.

"Dharma King Hong Dao."

At Mae Jonghak's next words, the monks of Shaolin softly murmured Buddhist invocations.

"Poison King Tang Taesang. And the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun of Emei."

Tang Sadok, the Myriad-Poison Asura, had made the long journey despite his ailing body. His green eyes gleamed, while the nuns of Emei Sect wept.

"The bloodshed that began in Shanxi Province spread to Henan, then reached Sichuan and Hubei."

Countless lives had been lost in little more than a year.

Old martial artists praised by all and young greenhorns alike had fallen before their lives could fully bloom.

Eight Spring Gorge.

I could still see it whenever I closed my eyes.

How many people had died in that narrow gorge in Shanxi Province?

Who had fallen in Henan, Sichuan, and Hubei?

I didn't know their names or the dreams they'd held while they were alive.

But I knew why they had taken up their swords.

To protect something precious.

Boom!

An unprecedented aura burst from Mae Jonghak's entire body.

Purple qi rooted in the Zaha Divine Technique rolled over his shoulders like waves.

"Take up your weapons and fight back."

His manner of speaking and his aura weren't the only things that had changed.

Right now, before he was the Sword Saint or the Number One Sword Under Heaven, Mae Jonghak was the Alliance Leader guiding us all.

"For the sake of the families who share our blood. For the sake of the Senior Brothers and fellow disciples, and the sects with which we have shared joy and hardship. And…"

A mighty shout erupted from his lips.

"To protect the Murim in which we live, take up your weapons!"

The giant roared. A shiver ran up my spine.

The martial artists filling the grounds let out the breaths they'd been holding and raised a thunderous cheer.

"Waaaaaah!"

"For the destruction of the Demonic Path!"

Shhk, chakachachang!

The world flooded with light. Countless weapons flashed in the sunlight pouring down overhead.

"Waaaaaah!"

"For justice and chivalry!"

Shhk, chakachachang!

The world flooded with light. Countless weapons flashed in the sunlight pouring down overhead.

Mae Jonghak gazed at the dazzling, magnificent sight, then grasped the enormous flag lying at his feet.

Murim Alliance.

Those three characters had been written across it in bold, flowing strokes. Once he raised the flag, a new era would begin.

But what he did next caught everyone by surprise.

“Great Hero Jeok. Would you help me?”

“…!”

I could feel the crowd’s agitation against my skin. Jeok Cheongang, who had been silently staring at Mae Jonghak, suddenly spoke.

“Is the flag heavy?”

“It seems to be, for now.”

“That flag feels heavy even to this old man. And the more hands, the better.”

I knew what I had to do.

At Jeok Cheongang’s signal, Cheongpung and I stepped forward and took hold of the flag together.

Then we pulled it upright with all our strength.

The Murim Alliance had been born.

Chapter 526

“Waaaaaaah!”

Boom! Boom! Boom!

A thunderous roar swallowed everything.

Thousands of martial artists shouted with internal energy behind their voices. Their fierce fighting spirit roused tranquil Mount Song, and their cries echoed without end.

A flag flew high above them. Each had a different name, a different nature, a different life. They were men and women from every walk of life, but now they stood beneath the same banner.

Murim Alliance.

Those three words were all that had been written across the pure white cloth.

The flag was neither as splendid as an emperor’s nor as enormous as the Demonic Cult’s standard had been when its army invaded the Central Plains.

But it was enough.

Everything was contained within those three words: Murim Alliance.

Now the martial artists of the Central Plains would become one beneath that flag. In the new era they had opened for themselves, they would fight a new enemy.

And…

“A new hero will be born.”

The quiet mutter came from somewhere.

From atop a towering tree now thick with leaves, Mungyeong watched the scene below. His gaze came to rest on one person.

Jin Taekyung.

Mungyeong could see the fire in the young man’s eyes as he stood like an iron tower, holding the flag.

With two giants—the Sword Saint and the Fire King—and another rising star, Huashan Divine Dragon Cheongpung, beside him, Taekyung received the cheers raining down from every direction.

He already looked every bit a hero.

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon!”

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung!”

The martial artists chanted the name of the young hero holding the Murim Alliance’s flag.

As Mungyeong watched, another quiet murmur escaped him.

A new era. A new enemy. And new heroes.

At last, the curtain had risen on a stage long closed.

Some would fall on nameless fields and never rise again. Others would carve their names into a page of Murim's long history.

Life and death. Humiliation and glory.

Right here, on Mount Song, the prelude to a massive war for the world was beginning.

The world trembled. No—it was undergoing a tremendous upheaval.

Until something happened, it was only rumor, no more real than fiction. But once it became reality, its impact was enormous.

The Mount Song Resolution.

On a warm spring day, news spread far and wide that the Nine Sects and One Gang, the Five Great Families, and countless other Murim factions had finally gathered beneath a single flag.

It meant that a fierce war to decide who would rule the world had begun.

"Sect Leader, they say the Murim Alliance has been founded in Henan!"

"Send a messenger pigeon immediately. Our sect will gladly stand beneath the Murim Alliance's flag."

"Yes, Sect Leader!"

"Send word to the other Sect Leaders in Fujian as well. We need to meet."

The world was vast, with more sects and families than anyone could count.

Those who had been unable to make the journey to Henan for one reason or another declared their intention to join the Murim Alliance. Martial artists without a sect chose their own paths.

"Great Hero Jang, come to Henan with me. Shouldn't we join the Murim Alliance?"

"I'm sorry, but I intend to go to Sichuan. You'll have to travel to Henan without me, Great Hero Gwak."

"Huh. Qingcheng and Emei may still stand, but if Dark Heaven heads to Sichuan first, as the Demonic Cult once did, the region could become a demon-slaying battleground."

"That is precisely why I must go to Sichuan. Shouldn't I lend whatever aid I can?"

Some carried the words righteous chivalry in their hearts.

"Brother, it sounds as though we're headed the same way. Let's travel together."

"You're a true hero. May I ask your name?"

"My name? Never mind that. I'm just a wandering martial artist who makes his living by the sword, so spare me that embarrassing 'hero' business. I don't know how strong these Dark Heaven bastards are, but if I kill enough of them, I'll make a name for myself and earn a decent sum."

Others took up their weapons, driven by competitive spirit and dreams of making a name for themselves.

Among those who belonged to no particular sect and set out for their own reasons were unfamiliar faces—people who had not appeared in Murim for years, or had never appeared at all.

“What brings you out here, Master?”

“The weather was pleasant, so I came out for some air. But you look troubled. What happened?”

“Well, I was wandering through the mountains looking for snow ginseng to give you, Master, when I met a herb gatherer. He told me that…”

Rumors that the Murim Alliance would be restored in Henan had spread well before the Mount Song Resolution.

News of Murim’s affairs reached even the reclusive masters who had withdrawn from the world into remote mountains and deep valleys.

“Hmm. Dark Heaven and the Murim Alliance…”

“They say everything below the mountain is in an uproar. The Murim Alliance has declared war on Dark Heaven, and the common people are trembling with fear.”

“Hah. After a long peace, calamity has come.”

“Master, what should we do?”

“Countless people will die, as they did during the Great Faction War. Prepare at once, before it’s too late. We’re going to Henan.”

An old master who had spent his remaining years in a nameless valley set out for the Central Plains with his Disciple.

“Old Master, did you catch much today?”

“Bah. The fish aren’t biting worth a damn.”

“Haha. You’ve been saying that for forty years. I caught a few carp. Take some home to eat.”

“Of course I will. I saved your father’s life ten years ago, didn’t I? Give me a big, plump one.”

“All right. Since this is the last time, take them all.”

“Hmm? The last time? What kind of nonsense is that?”

“Haven’t you heard? They say a great calamity has come to Murim.”

“A calamity? Tell me more.”

“They say something called the Murim Alliance has been formed in Henan, and that it’s going to fight Dark Heaven, which is said to be the successor to that Demonic Cult. No one knows what might happen, so I was going to take my family and leave for a while… Old Master? What are you doing?”

“Can’t you see? I’m getting ready to leave.”

“Where are you going? Wait, you’re leaving your fishing rod?”

“I don’t think I’ll need it anymore. You keep it.”

“Old Master! Old Master!”

“We’ll meet again someday. Stay safe.”

The white-haired old man who had spent his days beside a secluded lake departed with a spear on his back instead of a fishing rod.

Some of the old martial artists who had once dominated an era—or some of the reclusive masters from remote valleys who had devoted their entire lives to the single character martial—stepped back into the secular world and flowed into the wider world.

“Is this the Murim Alliance?”

“It is. But if you’ve come to join, we can’t let you in right away. You’ll need to go to that pavilion and provide your sobriquet, your name, and something to prove your identity…”

“Then I’ve come to the right place. Go tell them Hong Jeok is here.”

“Hong Jeok, Red Turbans,[2480] whatever you call yourself, you still have to go through verification… Wait. What did you just say?”

“Hong Jeok. Hong Jeok of Guangxi.”

“Th-the Fist King…!”

Names swept away by the waves of time, sobriquets that had vanished from sight.

And yet, despite everything, titles clearly etched into the memories of ordinary people began appearing everywhere.

Even when the sun set and darkness fell, their presence shone like torches.

And rumors of the newly risen stars continued to pass from mouth to mouth.

“I’ll guarantee the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes will play a major role in this war.”

At the middle-aged man’s words, the narrow-eyed man snorted. The speaker had a chin shaped like a spatula.

“What a joke. Call them the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes or the finest young prodigies in the martial world, but weren’t they picked from the disciples and heirs of prestigious sects and families?”

“And? What’s your point?”

“They’re hothouse flowers. How much good will people raised in comfort be on a battlefield?”

Spatula Chin narrowed his eyes.

“Listen to this fellow. Are you with Dark Heaven?”

“What!”

Bird Eyes bristled and shouted.

[2480] The Red Turbans were red-turbaned rebel groups in Chinese history. The guard invokes their name because it sounds similar to Hong Jeok’s.

“They say even a crooked mouth ought to speak straight. Don’t say something that could get me killed! Why would I be with Dark Heaven?”

“Then why are you putting down the pillars of our orthodox faction?”

“Putting them down? I’m just stating the facts! It’s not as though I can shave down your chin!”

“What does my chin have to do with this? Why are you insulting my looks?”

Fire blazed in Spatula Chin’s eyes.

“Say one more word about my chin and you’ll regret it. Got that?”

“Spatula Chin! That chin takes my breath away! Chin-chin, ka-thunk-thunk-chin!”

“You fucking bastard!”

Crash! Crack!

The table overturned, sending side dishes and liquor bottles tumbling to the floor.

A sword fight seemed ready to break out at any moment. Watching Bird Eyes and Spatula Chin square off, a man with a goatee spoke with measured dignity.

“You’re both wrong.”

Bird Eyes and Spatula Chin turned toward him together.

“What the hell are you talking about?”

“I’ll rip out every hair of that beard.”

“…”

The goateed man shook his head and continued.

“I don’t doubt the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes will distinguish themselves. But compared with the strength Dark Heaven has shown so far, they’re still only young prodigies.”

Bird Eyes brightened.

“So I’m right?”

“To a degree.”

“I knew it. You’ve got uncommon insight. Your beard looks especially fine today.”

“…”

Spatula Chin ground his teeth and glared at Bird Eyes.

“Your eyes are smaller than your asshole, and now you’re deaf too? Did you already forget he said both of us were wrong?”

“…Fair point. But why? I don’t see what’s wrong with what I said.”

The goateed man stroked his beard as he answered.

“There are genuine talents everywhere. You’re right that the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes grew up in the best possible conditions. But that doesn’t change the fact that they’re the finest young prodigies in the martial world.”

“Hm. And?”

“Nor are they all disciples of prestigious sects. Jin Mukyung, the Heaven Shaking Sword and Second Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, is a prime example.”

“Ah, I forgot about the Heaven Shaking Sword.”

Spatula Chin, who had been waiting for an opening, cut in with a mocking grin.

“The Heaven Shaking Sword is impressive, but Murong Yeonghwi, a blood relative of the Murong Family, is overwhelming too. Still, what could a nobody like you possibly know?”

“What did you say, you bastard? If you fell in the water, that chin would float…”

The two began growling at each other again. The goateed man sighed deeply.

“Stop fighting and listen. The young prodigies to watch aren’t the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes. The Two Dragons stand above them.”

Bird Eyes and Spatula Chin froze.

Even they had to admit he was right. The Ten Dragons and Phoenixes could not compare with those two Divine Dragons: Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung and Huashan Divine Dragon Cheongpung.

“Certainly…”

“That’s true.”

They nodded despite themselves. Then a question occurred to them.

“What are those two doing right now?”

“Who knows? But one thing is certain.”

The goateed man continued, his expression solemn.

“They must be doing something extraordinary.”

Cheongpung spoke with a stiff expression.

“Ahh, I want dumplings!”

“…”

Don’t say it so loudly, you idiot.

Chapter 527

Seven days and nights had passed since the day people called the Mount Song Resolution.

Amid the shouts of countless Murim heroes, the Murim Alliance's flag had been raised once more. News that the Alliance had officially been restored for the first time in decades swept beyond Henan and shook the entire Murim world.

Things have been moving at a frantic pace.

At first, I'd thought there was no reason for me to be particularly busy. I learned how naïve that was less than half a day after the Murim Alliance was formed.

"Captain. I hear there's a visitor downstairs."

"What do you mean, you hear there's a visitor?"

"Apparently Cheongpung ran into him on his way back from buying dumplings. He says the man's waiting downstairs."

"I suddenly want dumplings. And I'm not meeting him."

"I caught a glimpse of him. He looked like someone important."

"What, am I some lowborn bastard? Send our important guest home with all due courtesy."

"How could I do that? I hear he made an appointment."

"What the hell are you talking about? I haven't made any appointments since I got here. And how many people do I even know?"

"That's true. You don't have any friends, Captain."

"Really? Because it looks like you're about to lose your head."

"Hmm. Maybe he spoke with the Lesser Family Head?"

"This bastard doesn't even flinch anymore."

"Spend three years as Hyuk Mujin, and you wind up with about three lives."

"Enough nonsense. Send him back. Ah, but who exactly is this important person?"

"Oh, wait a moment. I'll go ask."

"Go on."

Hyuk Mujin went downstairs at a leisurely pace, then came racing back.

"K-K-Kongtong Sect! The Kongtong Sect Leader!"

"Bring him in at once! Bring him innnn!"

Wait, why is hyung[2481] here?

Starting with the Sect Leader of the Kongtong Sect, one of the Nine Sects and One Gang, a steady stream of renowned figures of Murim came to visit.

[2481] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older male acquaintance.

The Family Head of the Namgung Family, whom I already knew, came in person. People from sects and families I'd formed connections with while traveling across the Murim world arrived one after another.

Of course, far more of them came to make a new connection.

"Captain."

"…Who is it this time?"

"The Shandong Yue Family. The Family Head came in person."

"…Receive him with due courtesy."

"A representative from the Murim world of Guizhou was sent as well…"

"…Bring him in as well."

"Oh, and Captain."

"…Bring him in."

I hadn't realized I was this famous. No, to be precise, I hadn't realized I was this famous.

After three days of meeting one visitor after another, I was exhausted.

Fuck, I can't keep doing this.

It would be one thing if these were blind dates with pretty women.

But dealing with more than ten middle-aged and old men every day left me feeling like my soul had been sucked out. By then, the smell of tea alone made me nauseous, and the conversations across those teacups were mostly the same.

"Oh! So you're the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon I've heard so much about!"

The Jin Taekyung Conversation Guide.

Had they all read a book with that title before coming? Every one of them opened with the same line.

But even an obedient child eventually gets contrary. At first, I'd forced a smile and exchanged meaningless pleasantries. As time went on, I got more honest.

"I've heard many rumors about you."

"I've heard plenty of stories about myself too."

"A young hero has appeared in Murim. It's truly wonderful. Ho ho ho."

"I'm the happiest person of all. Ha ha ha."

"Incidentally, I have a daughter of marriageable age…"

"I have two older brothers of marriageable age."

"Good heavens, man! How dare you spring your daughter on him out of nowhere? Have you lost your mind? Young Hero Jin, don't pay that fellow any mind."

"It's all right. I wasn't listening anyway."

"Then listen to me instead."

"Wow. So that's where this is going."

"As a matter of fact, I have a daughter too. I'm sure you'll like her."

"I'll stake Hyuk Mujin's balls that I won't."

"What are you talking about? Balls—no, what man in the world would turn down a beauty?"

"A beauty? Is your daughter very pretty?"

"Do you even have to ask? Her beauty is already famous throughout Fujian!"

"Oh. Ohhh."

"Everyone knows her! Stop anyone passing by and ask. She's already pretty, but in five years, she'll surely be the First Beauty of Fujian!"

"Ohhh, the First Beauty of Fujian… Wait. Why five years?"

"She's twelve."

"Get out."

I could hardly remember how those seven days and nights had passed.

Some of my visitors already knew me, while others came out of simple curiosity. Most, though, wanted to forge some kind of connection with me or the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

And not all of them were martial artists.

"Captain. Someone from a place called Central Plains Commerce is asking to see you."

"Bring them in—no, wait. Why is a trading company looking for me? My eldest brother, maybe, but me?"

"I'm not sure why. But I have an eye for people, and they don't seem bad. It might be worth meeting them."

"Hey."

"Y-Yes?"

"You bastard. Central Plains Commerce slipped you money, didn't they?"

"Gasp! H-How did you know?"

"Give back every last bit and send them away. While I'm still asking nicely."

Now there were even people slipping bribes to Hyuk Mujin.

Most of the visitors so far had arranged their appointments through Jin Wikyung, so I'd met them reluctantly. They knew full well he was the only way to get an appointment with me. Anyone who came directly fell into one of two categories.

Either Jin Wikyung would turn them away for some disqualifying reason, or their standing was so high they could show up whenever they pleased.

The first was far more common. Those people usually tried some shallow trick, then left without so much as seeing my face.

Why were they going to such lengths? I had a pretty good idea why all this attention had suddenly fallen on me.

The flag, obviously.

On the day the Murim Alliance was officially proclaimed, I'd raised its flag together with Mae Jonghak, the new Alliance Leader, Jeok Cheongang, and Cheongpung.

It had moved me, but I hadn't thought much more of it. To everyone else who'd witnessed it, apparently, it had been an enormous culture shock.

I suppose it makes sense. Two young punks got the spotlight instead of all those elders.

The platform had been packed with people from prestigious sects and families, including the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families.

Murim had reached such an extreme level of population aging that the platform could have passed for a senior center. Even the men in their forties who'd managed to get up there were little more than pu'er tea[2482] runners. Yet Cheongpung and I, barely past twenty, had the audacity to take part in that glorious, historic moment.

The sight had clearly startled everyone. Some nodded, acknowledging the ability and qualifications of those two young punks. Others seemed to find it deeply irritating.

The Zhongnan Sect, for example.

I couldn't be sure, but their guts were probably twisted with resentment by now. After all, the Jin Family of Taiyuan and I had begun rising rapidly, and our history with them was anything but friendly.

The bad blood had started with the Three Hands of Zhongnan, the three idiots of the Zhongnan Sect. It had worsened when the Roaring Fury Swordsman came to the Jin Family of Taiyuan's New Year's Day banquet and caused a scene, only to be beaten by Jeok Cheongang like a dog on the hottest day of summer.

And that wasn't all. The feud had reached its peak when the Taeeul Merciless Sword, regarded alongside the Sect Leader Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord as the Zhongnan Sect's greatest master, was defeated by me.

After that much humiliation, seeing me in the spotlight must have made them grind their teeth. For all I knew, they were somewhere right now biting, tearing, and chewing on me, the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and Jeok Cheongang.

Given the personalities of the Zhongnan Sect's people I had seen so far, I could almost believe it if they joined hands with Dark Heaven.

Hey, Zhongnan Sect.

Dark Heaven! Come on in.

The Murim Alliance has been formed. Why the long faces?

Jin Taekyung is pissing us off. That fucking brat.

Ho ho ho. Want a hit of a Temporary Strength Pill?

Sure. Roll me one.

[2482] Pu'er is a fermented tea from Yunnan, China.

I could picture it. I really could.

Still, Zhongnan was a venerable orthodox sect and one of the Nine Sects and One Gang. Surely they weren't crazy enough to join hands with Dark Heaven. But they'd find some way to get in our way at every turn.

Hang on. This isn't fair. Why is everyone swarming me?

At the thought, I looked toward the rice weevil—or rather, the dumpling grub—fidgeting in a corner with Mimi-chan.[2483]

"Why, Benefactor?"

"Good heavens, the bug talks."

"Pardon?"

"Nothing. But Cheongpung, why do you look so free? Doesn't anyone come to see you?"

"I don't meet people when I'm full. And I don't meet them if they don't bring me something tasty."

I thought about that for a moment, then asked, "Aren't you always full?"

"Yes. So I don't meet anyone."

"…Right."

Must be nice not having a care in the world.

If I had to pick the person in all Murim who gave the fewest fucks and did exactly as he pleased, Cheongpung would be a strong contender.

Even on the day of the Mount Song Resolution, he'd bounced around in delight because it was his first time raising the Murim Alliance's flag.

Is he a genius or a lunatic?

Probably both. Hmm.

As I was thinking that, Cheongpung yawned and spoke.

"And I'm not free. I'm training right now."

"What fresh bullshit is this?"

"I'm serious. Look."

Cheongpung took Mimi, the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake, off his shoulder and began squirming in his seat.

"…Sorry to interrupt, but are you evolving into a bug?"

"No. It's martial arts."

"Martial arts?"

"Yes. I made it after watching Mimi move."

Then why did it look nothing like martial arts?

I asked with complete sincerity.

[2483] The Japanese suffix -chan is an affectionate form of address.

“Please tell me this martial art isn’t called Squirming. Or Toughening Up. Something like that.”

“No. It’s a footwork technique.”

“…Then you should stand up and do it, you idiot.”

“Oh, right. I forgot.”

Did I really have to tell him that?

While I was at a loss for words, Cheongpung sprang to his feet and took a step.

Or rather, the moment I felt him take a step, his figure disappeared.

Whoosh!

With a faint sound, Cheongpung reached the far end of the spacious room and flashed me a toothy grin.

“Ta-da. What do you think?”

“…!”

What did I just see?

Goose bumps shot up my back.

His movement was ghostlike—no, snakelike. It was unmistakably a footwork technique, and yet it wasn’t.

Cheongpung hadn’t walked. He’d slid, so fast that even I could barely follow him with my eyes.

“I mixed Mimi’s movements with a few different martial arts. Moving like this makes me feel like I’m Mimi too, and I like it!”

“…You mixed them?”

“Yes! It’s called Mimi Step! Would you like to learn it, Benefactor?”

He really is insane. In more ways than one.

I stared at Cheongpung with my mouth hanging open, then shook my head.

“No. I don’t want to.”

“Aww…”

Just as Cheongpung’s shoulders drooped, Hyuk Mujin’s voice came from outside the door.

“Captain. There’s a visitor here.”

A visitor? Was there anyone else left who could come see me?

Chapter 528

Creak.

It didn’t take long to recognize the uninvited guest.

The moment I saw the familiar face come through the door, I spoke without hesitation.

“Hey, Hyuk Mujin. Who told you to let a beggar in?”

“Have you been—listen to this damn bastard.”

Gung Gibang, who had been grinning brightly despite his grimy face, scowled.

“I go out of my way to make time for you, and that’s how you greet me?”

“I called a beggar a beggar. What’s the problem?”

“Do you ever think about how it feels to be the beggar hearing it?”

“No. Not for a single second.”

“…You’re worse than a scorpion. One day, a hundred thousand Beggars’ Sect disciples will surround you and beat the hell out of you.”

I shrugged.

“Not likely. I’m a pretty valuable asset to the Murim Alliance.”

“I swear on my begging bowl, when the time comes, you’ll be the first one I beat senseless.”

“That’s fine too. It’ll mean the war is over.”

“You mean that?”

“Yeah. Promise.”

Gung Gibang glared at me in silence. Then his gaze softened, and a faint smile appeared on his lips.

“Damn it. The war’s barely begun, and already I want it to be over.”

“What, so you can beat me up?”

Gung Gibang gave a quiet laugh and shook his head.

“I may be destined to beg for the rest of my life, but I’m not stupid enough to think that way. No matter what, war must never happen.”

“You could distinguish yourself in battle and become a hero.”

“What would a beggar like me do with being a hero?”

“Oh.”

A wise answer to a stupid question.

I’d asked because I wanted to know what he really thought. I gave him a sincere round of applause.

Clap, clap, clap.

“What are you doing?”

“Nothing. Just thinking how our Gibang’s all grown up, having thoughts like that.”

"…What exactly do you think of me? And you're younger than I am. How can you be so shameless?"

"If getting older made everyone mature, the world would be a much nicer place. Time passes without anyone having to work at it."

In that sense, Gung Gibang's thinking really was remarkably sound for someone his age in Murim.

This wasn't the twenty-first-century modern world. This was Murim, where the primal law of the strong devouring the weak held sway.

It would be naive to think every martial artist now filling Henan had joined the Murim Alliance out of chivalry alone.

Especially the younger ones.

They were at an age when their blood ran hot.

Then again, middle-aged martial artists nearing forty weren't much different. To them, the Great Faction War was little more than a trace of a past that had ended before they were born.

Plenty of people in the generations that had never known war were driven less by chivalry than by dreams of winning glory and becoming heroes.

That went for wandering martial artists who acted as if there were no tomorrow, and for disciples of the great sects and families too.

I get it. It's the times we live in, and it's how Murim works…

But however generously I tried to look at them, they still looked like fucking idiots to me.

Thank heavens more people had joined the Murim Alliance out of chivalry than for reasons like theirs.

Come to think of it, the people around me are pretty normal by comparison. Hmm.

Just then, Cheongpung slid forward like a snake and appeared right in front of Gung Gibang.

Ssss—

"Agh! What the fuck?"

"Hehe. This is the new footwork technique I made, Mimi Step. It really looks like Mimi, doesn't it?"

"Like Mimi, my ass. It looks like a dog! Like a damn beggar!"

At Gung Gibang's shriek, Hyuk Mujin spoke with the happiest expression in the world.

"Young Hero Cheongpung, could you do that one more time later?"

"Wow! Of course I can!"

"No, you can't! Absolutely not! Don't do it!"

"…"

Normal, my ass.

Put them together and it was hard to find a bigger bunch of fucking idiots.

Ah, my head hurts.

I rubbed my throbbing temple and asked the question I'd put off.

"Anyway, what are you here for?"

Gung Gibang shot Cheongpung a wary glance before answering.

"There are a few people who want to meet you and Cheongpung. I thought I'd stop by and ask, just in case."

"Of course there are plenty of people who want to meet me."

"…You're obnoxious, but I can't argue with that."

"So who are they?"

Gung Gibang sighed.

"The Ten Dragons and Phoenixes."

"The Ten Dragons and Phoenixes?"

"The ones you know. Not all of them—about half."

Well, obviously it was the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes I knew. Were there others?

The moment I heard the name, I'd made up my mind.

"No. What would I meet them for?"

"To get acquainted. It can't hurt for young prodigies to be on good terms."

"Can't see how it would help, either. And young prodigies, my ass. Don't put me in the same league as you lot."

Gung Gibang stared at me in disbelief.

"…How can you say something that offensive with a straight face?"

"Because everyone knows it's true."

"Well, yes, but… Damn it. Fine. What about Cheongpung?"

Realizing he wasn't going to get anywhere with me, Gung Gibang quickly changed targets.

Sssssss—

Cheongpung had been closely observing Mimi, the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake, who had somehow turned into a giant snake while drawing everyone's attention. Without even turning around, he answered.

"Hmm. I don't want to go."

"Even though they've laid out a lavish feast for you?"

"I ate dumplings earlier, so I'm full. I don't think I'd go even if I were hungry."

"You could take the food with you. Eat it when you get hungry."

"I don't know. I haven't had much of an appetite lately."

"Wh-what?"

Gung Gibang stared at him as if he'd been stabbed.

Hyuk Mujin and I were just as shocked.

What the hell? Is he really insane?

Captain, did I hear that wrong?

No. You heard him right. He said he has no appetite.

That bastard isn't Cheongpung. He's definitely a Dark Heaven spy.

That's… convincing!

Hyuk Mujin and I carried on a silent conversation with our eyes.

That was how shocking Cheongpung's announcement was.

Cheongpung, of all people, has no appetite?

It was news as astonishing as the founding of the New Murim Alliance. Yet Cheongpung didn't so much as flinch beneath the astonished stares of everyone around him.

"Anyway, I'm fine. You go ahead, Benefactor."

"Huh? Uh, no. I'm not going either."

"Really? Hehe. Then I'll get back to what I was doing. I think Mimi Step needs a few improvements."

I had no idea why he was acting like this, but one thing seemed certain.

As time passed and the circumstances around him changed, some kind of change had begun in Cheongpung as well.

That guy…

I stared at Cheongpung in silence, then turned toward Gung Gibang.

"Anyway, you'd better get going."

"Mm. I suppose so. We talked so long I'm late for our meeting."

Still sneaking stunned glances at Cheongpung, Gung Gibang turned away and muttered, "They'll be disappointed. Young Lady Ju seemed especially excited."

"Disappointed? I've already met some of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes at the Star-Array Grand Banquet. I'm bound to run into the others again sooner or later —"

I broke off. The last thing Gung Gibang had said had taken over my thoughts.

"Wait. Who?"

"Huh? Who do you mean?"

"You said someone was especially excited."

"Oh. Young Lady Ju?"

So I hadn't misheard.

"By Young Lady Ju, do you mean…?"

"Of course I mean the Young Lady Ju you know. Young Lady Ju Hwaran of the Yongbong Escort Bureau—the Young Bureau Head, the Dagger Hidden Flower."

"…!"

A memory came back to me.

In Murim, it had been only two or three months ago, yet somehow it felt impossibly distant.

Ironically, it was also one of the clearest memories left behind by all that time.

“The moon is so bright tonight.”

Yes. The moon had been unusually bright that night.

Or perhaps the moon hadn’t been the brightest thing there. Perhaps it had been someone’s face.

I hadn’t been looking at the moon then.

“Great Hero Jin.”

“Yes, Young Lady Ju.”

“Do you think I can do it?”

I could almost hear her voice again, damp and desolate, drifting through the flower-filled garden.

What had I told her?

I thought for a moment before muttering blankly,

“…It’s all right even if you can’t.”

“What? What’s all right?”

I came back to myself.

The soft moonlight, the scent of flowers, the voice—all of it vanished. Even the face that had hovered before my eyes faded away.

I looked up to find Gung Gibang right in front of me, wearing a puzzled expression.

A small sigh escaped me.

“Gibang.”

“Mm?”

“Why are you so ugly?”

“…?”

“I’m sorry, but I mean it. Actually, I don’t think I’m all that sorry. Things were going so well.”

Gung Gibang’s ugly face contorted.

“You little bastard, you’ve been doing this since—”

“Enough.”

I shook my head, cutting him off.

“Let’s go.”

“What?”

“Stop asking and let’s go meet the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes or whoever they are. Hearing about that feast made me hungry.”

“Uh, uh-huh?”

Gung Gibang forgot to be angry. He blinked at me, then nodded hurriedly.

"Uh, sure. They'll all be glad to see you."

I didn't much care who would be glad.

It was just… well, how should I put it?

I just felt like seeing her after all this time.

Yes. That was all. Besides, I owed her thanks for something concerning Jeok Cheongang. I had every reason to go.

It's only right. Anyone decent would go.

Muttering that to myself, I started walking. Gung Gibang's shout that he was coming with me rang noisily from behind.

The three-story inn was large and lavish. Between its size and its prices, anyone without money to spare would have trouble setting foot inside—and, in practice, they didn't.

The three men and one woman seated by a window on its top floor were hardly ordinary people themselves.

"Young Lady Ju, may I pour you a drink?"

"Now, now. The young lady doesn't care much for alcohol. Isn't that right, Young Lady Ju?"

The handsome men in gleaming silk martial uniforms and hero headbands[2484] had no idea what the woman before them was thinking.

When is he coming?

She no longer heard a word they were saying.

At some point, she had stopped leaning back in her chair and begun tilting toward the window instead. Her eyes kept darting between the half-open window and the stairs.

Gung Gibang made such a bold promise. Should I go out and see for myself?

And just as all those worries and thoughts began chasing one another in endless circles—

Jingle.

The bell rang as the inn door opened, and Ju Hwaran sprang to her feet.

[2484] A hero headband (yeongunggeon) is a cloth headwrap worn by martial artists in Korean martial-arts fiction.

Chapter 529

Jingle.

“Welcome!”

The inn attendant’s hearty cry followed the ring of the bell above the door.

Ju Hwaran sprang to her feet, hope rising in her chest. But disappointment quickly filled her eyes.

“Ah…”

It wasn’t him. From up here, she couldn’t see the newcomer’s face properly, but she could tell that much.

No—if it had been him, she might have known him by his shadow alone.

It wasn’t him. It wasn’t that person.

Hwaran sighed softly and looked down at the first floor once more, reluctant to look away. Staring wouldn’t change anything, yet she couldn’t quite give up.

The men seated with her cleared their throats at the sight.

“Ahem.”

“Ahem.”

They had been watching Hwaran’s every move from the start. They weren’t foolish enough to miss what her reaction meant.

Three men sat across the table from her. Two of them exchanged a glance—but their eyes weren’t the only things communicating. Their lips barely moved as they spoke through Sound Transmission.

—Fellow Daoist Hwangbo. Who do you think Young Lady Ju is waiting for?

The question came from Baek Woo, the Kunlun Cloud Dragon. Handsome, clear-skinned, and dressed in spotless white, he was widely acknowledged as the Kunlun Sect’s finest young prodigy and was one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.

At his Sound Transmission, the beautiful young man with a sharp nose slightly furrowed his brow.

—No idea.

—I can think of only one person. If I’m right, it’s the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Tae—

—Drop it.

Hwangbo Ak, the beautiful young man who had coldly cut him off, was the Lesser Family Head of the Hwangbo Family and another member of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.

He was in a foul mood.

To think I, Hwangbo Ak, would be treated as less than some other bastard.

It was unthinkable. For someone as full of himself as Hwangbo Ak, it was especially hard to accept.

The Hwangbo Family might not be one of the Five Great Families, but its name carried considerable weight throughout Murim. No one could deny that it was an old martial family that had ruled Shandong for generations.

And Hwangbo Ak was its Lesser Family Head.

He had the martial talent to earn a place among the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, too, and the looks to stand out anywhere. A fine family, immense wealth and prestige, a handsome face—it was only natural that women flocked to him.

The trouble was that, for the first time in nearly thirty years of life, everything he had enjoyed seemed worthless.

The Dagger Hidden Flower, Ju Hwaran.

The moment he saw her, he had realized that all the beautiful women he'd met before were fireflies before the sun.

She wore no makeup, unlike the others, yet her face held a beauty he couldn't describe. Even her plain-colored martial uniform looked more elegant than an ornate court dress.

He had fallen for her at first sight.

Why couldn't I have met a woman like her sooner?

Hwangbo Ak gazed at Hwaran as though entranced. Every small movement she made, every glimmer in her eyes—bright as the morning star—set his heart fluttering and stirred a desire buried deep within him.

But then…

"Phew."

Hwaran sighed again, and his brow tightened.

He knew what lay behind that sigh. He knew who it was for.

The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

He repeated the epithet and name silently. Beneath the table, his hand clenched of its own accord.

What's so special about that bastard?

He had already heard about Hwaran's connection to Jin Taekyung.

The details of what had happened between the Yongbong Escort Bureau and the Zhongnan Sect two months ago had never become widely known. But word had swept through Murim that the Taeeul Merciless Sword, one of Zhongnan's three greatest masters, had knelt before a young prodigy barely past twenty.

Impossible.

It was something that could not and should not have happened. Hwangbo Ak had dismissed it as a ridiculous rumor and clicked his tongue.

More troubling, though, was his suspicion that the incident had left Hwaran with feelings for Jin Taekyung.

—Are you certain?

Baek Woo perked up at the sudden Sound Transmission.

—Hm?

—I asked whether what you said earlier was certain. The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung. Is the person Young Lady Ju is waiting for really that bastard?

—Do you think she's waiting for the Successor Beggar?

—…

Even Hwangbo Ak had to admit she wasn't.

Whatever peculiar tastes Hwaran might have, she couldn't possibly like Gung Gibang. The man gave off the sour reek of stale dog food just by sitting nearby.

—So it really is that bastard? Are you saying this Young Master is less than a worm that crawled out of some backwater corner of Shanxi Province?

—Not a worm. A Divine Dragon. And Shanxi Province is no longer a backwater corner. It is the hidden residence[2485] from which the dragon named Jin Taekyung rose, as well as the center of the trade routes running through northern Gaoyuan.

Having lightly corrected him, Baek Woo continued.

—Fellow Daoist Hwangbo, this isn't the Jin Family of Taiyuan you used to know. Now that I think about it, I could tell the moment I met the Heaven Shaking Sword.

—The Heaven Shaking Sword? Heaven Shaking Sword Jin Mukyung?

—Is there another Heaven Shaking Sword we both know?

Hwangbo Ak's eyebrows twitched.

If Ju Hwaran, who kept sighing across the table, and that young escort who looked like he had crawled in from who knew where had not been watching him, he would have scowled long ago.

—Don't bring up that name. Do you think I'm asking because I don't know who that bastard is?

—Ah, that's right. You and the Heaven Shaking Sword were at Heaven's Gate Temple together—

—Enough. Stop!

—You startled me. All right. Why are you shouting?

Hwangbo Ak's clenched fist had turned red.

Jin Mukyung. That was a name he would remember until the day he died.

Hwangbo Ak had thought he possessed everything. Jin Mukyung had shown him a wall he could never climb—and humiliated him in the process.

Damn it.

Now the younger brother was standing in his way, too.

Seeing the anger on Hwangbo Ak's face, Baek Woo moved his lips cautiously.

[2485] Qian di originally referred to a prince's residence before he ascended the throne. Here it casts Shanxi as the place from which Jin Taekyung rose.

—Fellow Daoist Hwangbo. May I offer you some advice?

—What now?

—You remember what you said to me. If the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon comes, don't ever mention it out loud. No—don't even move your lips.

—Hmph. Worried we might come to blows?

—No, that's not it. I'm worried I might get dragged into it too.

—…What?

Baek Woo regarded him with a look full of concern and pity.

—If you want to die, die alone.

—…!

—You were in closed-door training at your family's estate during the Star-Array Grand Banquet, so you probably don't know. But even now, whenever I think about that man, I feel—ugh. Anyway, keep that in mind. Understood?

What in the world was he talking about? Die alone?

Hwangbo Ak remained silent for a moment, staring at Baek Woo in disbelief. Then he sent another Sound Transmission.

—Are you… serious?

—Infinite Life Buddha.[2486] I swear before the Primordial Heavenly Venerable[2487] that I'm completely serious.

—Have you no pride as a martial artist?

—I lost that at the Star-Array Grand Banquet. Do you know what it's like to have the top of your head stepped on after using the Cloud-Dragon Eight Forms?

—Even so!

—Even so, no. That man is a monster.

—W-What happened to the Kunlun Cloud Dragon, that proud, lofty crane? Where's the Baek Woo I knew?

Baek Woo gazed into the past with a nostalgic look in his eyes.

—Come to think of it, the Successor Beggar said something similar to me back then. Then, in the very next test, he was beaten like a dog by Jin Taekyung. You heard what happened, didn't you? Gung Gibang fell behind in movement technique, his eyes rolled back, and he tried to grab Jin Taekyung by the hair. He nearly got his head knocked off.

—…!

—Infinite Life Buddha.[2488] Let's be honest. Do you think everything the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon has done is just a rumor?

—Of course!

[2486] A Buddhist invocation wishing for immeasurable life.
[2487] A Daoist deity invoked here as a witness to Baek Woo's oath.
[2488] A Buddhist invocation wishing for immeasurable life.

Baek Woo let out a quiet sigh at the firm reply.

—Why?

—How could any man do those things? His master, the Fire King, must have handled everything and given his Disciple the credit!

—True. By any ordinary measure, it's absurd. Reaching Supreme Peak when he's barely past twenty? How could that be possible?

At last, a sensible answer. Hwangbo Ak nodded with conviction.

—Exactly. The Fire King Jeok Cheongang must have stepped in and handed his Disciple the credit.

—I'm saying this again because I'm worried about you: don't tell the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon that his master handed him the credit. I don't want to be paired with you as a battle partner and have my face beaten in.

—…What are you playing at?

—Infinite Life Buddha.[2489] It's simple. Don't try to reason it out with common sense. Don't even try to understand it. Just accept it.

For a moment, Baek Woo's almost enlightened tone left Hwangbo Ak speechless. Then he tried another angle.

—W-Wait. You have feelings for Young Lady Ju too, don't you?

—Young Lady Ju? Of course I like her. What man wouldn't?

—That very Young Lady Ju has feelings for Jin Taekyung. And you still intend to protect your rival?

—My life matters more to me than Young Lady Ju. So does my hair.

—What?

Baek Woo checked that no one was looking, then casually dipped his head.

A strangely bare patch showed between the neatly arranged strands at his crown.

—Infinite Life Buddha.[2490] See?

—What on earth happened to your—

Hwangbo Ak could not finish his Sound Transmission. Baek Woo gave him a sorrowful smile.

—My hair stopped growing after my head was stepped on during the Star-Array Grand Banquet…

—…!

—Give up. Giving up makes life easier. But if you absolutely can't give up, please do it when I'm not around. I'd like to live, too.

What kind of insane nonsense was this?

Hwangbo Ak swallowed hard.

[2489] A Buddhist invocation wishing for immeasurable life.

[2490] A Buddhist invocation wishing for immeasurable life.

He was still furious, but a chill ran down his spine. Baek Woo was an old friend and a proud martial artist. If even he was talking like this…

Is this for real?

Hwangbo Ak had never believed all the rumors about the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

But if—if there wasn't a shred of falsehood in them…

A monster beyond common sense.

Yes. An undeniable monster.

And at the same time, an unbearable humiliation wrapped itself around Hwangbo Ak's entire body.

What a damnable mess.

His fist tightened. A groan escaped through his parted teeth, and Hwaran, sensing that something was wrong, spoke.

"Young Hero Hwangbo. Is something wrong?"

"Ah, no. Nothing."

At his strained reply, the young escort who had done nothing but occupy a seat at their table gave a quiet laugh.

"You look very much like something's wrong."

"…I said it's nothing."

"If you say so. The food here is good, by the way."

Hwangbo Ak narrowed his eyes.

He had allowed the man to join them only because he was Hwaran's escort. From his behavior to the way he spoke, everything about him grated on Hwangbo Ak.

A mutter slipped through his twisted lips.

"This is the trouble with people who have no pedigree…"

Ju Hwaran was not a fool. A cold chill passed over her beautiful face, which had been filled with troubled thoughts only a moment earlier.

"Young Hero Hwangbo."

"Ah, I wouldn't want Young Lady Ju to misunderstand. I wasn't talking about that fellow."

Hwangbo Ak put on a false smile and pointed to a table some distance away.

"I was talking about those bastards who practice demonic, heterodox arts over there."

And at the moment his voice, neither loud nor soft, rang through the inn—

Scrape.

Someone rose from their seat.

Chapter 530

Henan truly deserved to be called the Central Plains.

Civilization had begun along the Yellow River, and for thousands of years, Henan had stood at the center of the world. It had been home to the capitals of nine dynasties that rose and fell like wildfire over the ages.

So even now, with the Murim Alliance officially restored and the threat of war hanging in the air, Henan Province had not lost its vitality.

If anything, the opposite was true.

“Is it just me, or are there more people around? The atmosphere seems pretty good, too.”

Hyuk Mujin was right. The broad main street was packed, and there was little sign of serious worry on anyone’s face.

Now and then, someone cast an uneasy glance at a passing martial artist carrying weapons, but that was all.

I pulled my bamboo hat lower. “Yeah, it does.”

“Strange. Until recently, things were pretty grim. Is this the calm before the storm?”

“…You lunatic. Why don’t you pray for something to happen while you’re at it?”

“Considering the situation, I’m not exactly wrong.”

He had a point. But Hyuk Mujin was overlooking something. I considered smacking him upside the head, then shook my head.

“I think those people have realized something.”

“What?”

“That Henan is the safest place in the world.”

“…Ah.”

To ordinary people, martial artists were like wild beasts no one could control.

But most of the martial artists now in Henan had come together under the banners of chivalry, the greater good, and the Murim Alliance. And there weren’t just dozens or hundreds of them. There were thousands.

News of a war among martial artists must have frightened the commoners at first, but people were quickly settling down.

If this were the modern world, they wouldn’t be so relaxed.

Imagine a war breaking out between the United States and Russia.

The moment the war began, the citizens of Moscow or Washington, DC, would either be running for their lives or staring up at the sky, trying to guess when an intercontinental ballistic missile or a nuclear weapon might come flying toward them.

Not that Henan is guaranteed to be safe.

Could Dark Heaven sweep through half the world and reach Henan?

It wasn't impossible. The Murim Alliance had formed, and countless martial artists had gathered beneath one flag, but no one could know how the war would end.

The bigger problem was that Dark Heaven had other ways of getting here.

The Moving Formation. Or should I call it a warp magic circle?

It was a disturbing truth, hard to believe and not yet known to everyone.

A truth like that could make people more vigilant. It could also cause tremendous shock and chaos. That was probably why it hadn't been made public yet.

When that happens, people won't be smiling like this anymore.

I smacked my lips bitterly and looked around.

Children watched passing martial artists with fascination. Merchants were delighted by the unexpected boom. Martial artists moved along the main street, their faces showing a mix of tension and excitement.

None of them, at least, knew everything about Dark Heaven. Those privy to its deeper secrets were already in a meeting with their new Alliance Leader, one that might go on indefinitely.

"Captain?"

"What are you thinking about so hard? You're making people stare."

"…Nothing. Let's go."

I must have spaced out. I started walking again.

Standing still in the middle of a crowded main street was bound to draw attention. Sure enough, a few sharp-eyed people were already looking our way.

They're not ordinary martial artists. They're masters.

That didn't make them Dark Heaven's agents. They wore martial uniforms and carried their weapons openly, and I could sense pure qi from every one of them.

"Captain."

Hyuk Mujin's voice came quietly from behind me. I kept walking as though nothing was wrong.

"It's fine. Just keep going."

"You knew?"

"Of course."

"I'm still worried."

I understood why. Since the Mount Song Resolution, I'd become something of a celebrity.

The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi and the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon were already epithets firmly imprinted throughout the Murim. But by raising the Murim Alliance's flag before thousands of martial heroes, I had left an even more definite impression.

I wasn't on the level of the heads of the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families, but more people knew my name and face than those of most Elder-level masters from major factions.

"What's there to worry about? Pretend you haven't noticed them and keep walking."

"No, I'm worried something really bad is going to happen."

Gung Gibang clicked his tongue.

"What a tiny little heart you have. What serious thing is going to happen just because they recognize his face? It'll only be annoying. This is exactly why he's wearing that bamboo hat."

He glanced at me. "What's gotten into him?"

"Leave him alone. It's kind of touching that he noticed them first and started worrying."

"…I suppose."

I smiled to myself.

I didn't usually show it, but I had a soft spot for Hyuk Mujin. Since coming to Murim, I'd spent more time with him than anyone else, and we'd been through all kinds of trouble together. Of course I cared about—

"This is driving me crazy. What are you two talking about?"

"Huh?"

"What?"

Hyuk Mujin looked at Gung Gibang and me, his face pale.

"I've been about to shit myself this whole time, and you two keep saying the weirdest things. Seriously."

"…!"

"…!"

Touching, my ass.

When he said something bad was going to happen, he'd meant that.

As Gung Gibang and I stared at him, speechless, Hyuk Mujin broke into a cold sweat and hurried ahead.

"Where are we meeting? Hurry! It's coming out!"

Look at that determination. I'd never seen him look so desperate, even in a fight.

Gung Gibang pointed at a building on reflex.

"O-over there."

"That one? The three-story inn?"

"Uh? Yeah."

"Then I'm going ahead. Pooooop!"

Was that last cry sheer determination to hold it in? Or a booster powered by the last of his sphincter's strength?

Hyuk Mujin staggered as he wove through the crowd at incredible speed. Gung Gibang muttered, “Drunken Eight-Immortals Step[2491]…?”

“…Please don’t talk bullshit. He just needs to shit.”

God. Buddha. Why am I surrounded by nothing but idiots?

Lamenting my fate, I looked toward the three-story inn Hyuk Mujin was heading for.

It wasn’t far away. Yet the part of my chest that had settled down during the journey suddenly began to churn.

“…A month? No, has it been two?”

Gung Gibang narrowed his eyes at my unguarded mutter.

“Oh-ho.”

“What, you bastard?”

“Is it what I think it is?”

“You can think?”

“I’m right, aren’t I?”

“Want to get hit?”

“Come to think of it, the atmosphere back then was a little strange.”

“Want me to pick out your grave?”

“That clever dodge tells me I’m right.”

“Want me to hit you so fast you can’t dodge, clever or not?”

“Pfft. That bastard Hyuk should’ve seen this.”

“…No, it’s not— Ah, forget it.”

Normally, Gung Gibang would have changed the subject by now, if only to avoid getting hit. Today was different.

His laughter sounded like air leaking out as he kept glancing at me. My fist clenched, but strangely enough, I didn’t feel like hitting him.

“Pfft, pfft, pfft.”

“…”

Bam!

Watching him laugh brought the urge right back.

He couldn’t even scream. I grabbed him by the back of the neck and hauled him up as he clutched his solar plexus.

“So. That’s the place, right? The three-story inn.”

“Urgh. Y-yes.”

“I’m going for the food. Because I’m hungry.”

“I-I know.”

[2491] The Eight Immortals are figures in Chinese Daoist folklore. The name evokes drunken-style martial arts, whose movements can appear unsteady.

"I heard that Kunlun Cloud Dragon guy or whatever is there, too. I'm going to see him because it's been a while. And while I'm there, I'll build a little rapport with that Hwangbo fellow or whatever his name is."

"…I'll remember that."

"See that you do. Unless you want the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes to become the Nine Dragons and Phoenixes."

That seemed to drive the lesson home. Once I let him go, Gung Gibang rubbed the spot I'd hit.

"Vicious bastard."

"What was that?"

"N-nothing."

As if that would fool me. Gung Gibang hastily changed the subject.

"Anyway, I'm looking forward to it. When they hear you've come, they'll welcome you with open arms."

"I don't care whether they do or not."

I wasn't particularly interested in the Kunlun Cloud Dragon or that Lesser Family Head of the Hwangbo Family.

There was, though, one person I hoped would be genuinely glad to see me.

But Gung Gibang misunderstood my answer and hurriedly continued,

"No! Hwangbo Ak is a bit of a pain, but once he hears you came all this way, he'll come running out barefoot and—"

He never finished.

Boom!

A thunderous crash swallowed his voice and every sound on the bustling street.

A silence too brief to call an instant fell, then broke.

"Aaah!"

"Eeeeeek!"

"Gowolru! Gowolru is…!"

People screamed and scattered in every direction like a swarm of locusts.

I stood where I was and stared.

Gowolru.

I could see it clearly. A section of the three-story inn where we were supposed to meet had been blown wide open.

Someone came hurtling out through a shower of debris and a cloud of dust.

Whoosh! Crash!

A street stall not far away shattered, and a deep gouge opened in the ground.

A man managed to right himself and get to his feet.

Thud, thud, thud.

Who's that?

His martial uniform was torn to shreds, and his leather shoes had come off. His handsome face was filled with fury and dismay.

"How dare you… You bastard! I'll tear you apart…!"

Just then, Gung Gibang gaped at the man, who was speaking through clenched teeth.

"H-Hwangbo Ak!"

"…?"

"What are you doing out here?"

What? That's Hwangbo Ak?

Hwangbo Ak faltered at the sound of his name. I looked him up and down.

"He did come running out barefoot."

Was this a surprise for me? Some impromptu welcome from the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes?

Judging by the way Hwangbo Ak's face twisted, probably not.

"What did you just say?"

"Oh. Sorry. I didn't mean it that way."

"You damned bastard…"

"You look busy. Let's talk later. Ah, here it comes."

"What?"

His confusion lasted only a moment. Hwangbo Ak seemed to have forgotten something, but urgency and horror rose across his face.

Whoooosh—boom!

Something enormous shot through the air and slammed into Hwangbo Ak.

I could tell how fast it was moving, and how much force it carried, just from the sound. He would have been hard-pressed to deal with it while fully alert. Distracted as he was, the result was inevitable.

"Guhk!"

Hwangbo Ak went flying, spraying blood. A massive shadow moved to pursue him.

What should I do? I didn't have to think long.

Never a quiet day around here.

I stepped forward with a soft sigh.

An enormous man blocked out the sun, casting a vast shadow over me. He looked down at me with eyes as big as bowls.

"You. Move."

I answered calmly.

"Me. Don't want to."

Chapter 531

"You. Move."

"No. I don't want to."

"…Huh?"

He clearly hadn't expected that answer.

The giant's eyes, each as large as a child's fist, rolled around as he stammered.

"Y-You don't want to?"

"Yeah. I don't want to. I'm not moving."

"That's s-strange. Everyone moved until now."

What kind of character was this?

Did he forget to put any points into intelligence, too?

He was so huge I wondered if he had a Troll among his ancestors, but he talked and acted like a kindergartner.

I scratched my chin as I watched him fidget.

There's always a new kind of weirdo.

I thought I'd grown used to strange people after meeting so many in Murim, but I'd never met anyone quite like him. Still, settling this commotion came before satisfying my curiosity.

"Come on. Back away slowly."

"Back away?"

"Yeah."

I wasn't trying to play the hero. It wasn't as though I had some great sense of duty, either.

But we were in the middle of a main street in Henan. If the fight continued, civilians could get caught in it.

"I don't know what happened, but let's stop here. All right?"

I kept my voice gentle and glanced at Gung Gibang.

Quick to catch on, Gung Gibang understood what I meant and began evacuating the civilians who had been unable to escape and were still sitting on the ground.

The giant watched them go, his large eyes darting from side to side.

"That guy. Insulted me."

A finger as thick as a stick pointed toward Hwangbo Ak, who was bent over and coughing weakly.

"He insulted you?"

"Rootless practitioner of demonic, heterodox arts. Pig as stupid as they come. What are you going to do if you glare at me?"

"Ah."

“My lord said to think three times before fighting. So I thought three times and fought. He drew his sword first, too.”

That gave me a fair idea of what had happened. His words were short and disjointed, but they were enough.

Hwangbo Ak was the Lesser Family Head of the Hwangbo Family, which held sway over Shandong. It wasn’t hard to imagine a Murim golden spoon[2492] talented enough to join the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes picking a fight with a martial artist he considered demonic and heterodox. Gung Gibang had called Hwangbo Ak a pain in the ass before, too.

So this guy’s from the unorthodox faction.

No wonder the aura coming off him had felt unusual.

Aside from some Third Rate dark-path figures, I had never met a proper martial artist who practiced demonic, heterodox arts. I had to forcibly suppress the curiosity that suddenly rose inside me.

A thought had just crossed my mind.

“Did you lay a hand on anyone else?”

“Someone else?”

“Yeah. There must have been… other people with him.”

My heart gave a small thump. Ju Hwaran’s three-syllable name hovered on the tip of my tongue, but I couldn’t bring myself to say it.

The giant tilted his head and blinked.

“There were. Two men. One was strong, and one was weak. And…”

“And?”

“A pretty woman. A very pretty woman.”

“Damn. You’ve got a good eye.”

“Huh?”

“Nothing. Did you fight them, too?”

“No. I only hit that guy. The pretty woman. She was as kind as she was beautiful.”

She was safe.

I breathed a silent sigh of relief and patted the giant on the shoulder.

“Yeah, yeah. Good job. What a good little boy.”

“Good job? I’m good?”

“Of course you are. So let’s make up now. Got it?”

“Hmm. Hmmmm.”

I’d almost won him over.

[2492] “Golden spoon” translates geumsujeo, a Korean expression for someone born into wealth or privilege.

When I heard he was from the unorthodox faction, I'd wondered if I should just knock him down. Apparently, coaxing him like a kindergartner in the Sunshine Class would do.

Just as his eyes began rolling with the effort of thinking it over, an angry shout rang out behind me.

"What do you think you're doing?"

I turned. Hwangbo Ak had straightened up and was glaring at us, his eyes blazing.

"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon! Are my ears deceiving me? You're taking the side of a demonic, heterodox practitioner!"

We'd never met, but apparently he knew me. Neither of us had time for introductions anyway, so that was convenient.

I calmly gestured toward Hwangbo Ak.

"You're up. Come over here and make up with him."

"M-Make up?"

"From what I've heard, he had his reasons. Let's not cause any more trouble. Be a man, shake hands, and call it done. No hard feelings."

Hwangbo Ak's eyes went wide, like someone who'd picked Yasuo[2493] and immediately been hit with an insult about his family.

"How can you do this?"

"I can do it just fine. Come over while I'm asking nicely."

"A fellow orthodox martial artist has been harmed by a practitioner of demonic, heterodox arts. How can you take the side of that vile unorthodox whelp?"

"What does it matter whether he's unorthodox or orthodox? We're all one family in the Murim Alliance. Haven't you heard the song? We are all friends. That's right, that's right."

"What song are you talking about? And one family? Have you forgotten what those demonic, heterodox bastards did during the Great Faction War?"

"Forgot? I wasn't even there. Were you in the Great Faction War? You look younger than I thought."

"Enough nonsense. Move! This Young Master will make that bastard kneel and apologize!"

Whoosh.

A warm breeze suddenly blew over my head. It was the breath of the giant, who stood a head—no, two heads—taller than me.

"Kneel? You. Me?"

Hwangbo Ak flinched for a moment, then gritted his teeth.

"Fine. You pushed me back earlier with a despicable surprise attack, but I'll make you regret provoking this Young Master even after death!"

[2493] Yasuo is a playable character in the video game League of Legends.

"This won't do. You. I kill."

The giant's eyes went cold.

Fwoosh—whoosh!

A piercing sound tore into my ears.

Hwangbo Ak shot forward like a ray of light, his body twisting fiercely. His leg whipped out, sheathed in visible internal energy.

A kicking technique?

For generations, the Hwangbo Family had produced masters of punches and kicks. This had to be one of the secret martial arts that had made them the rulers of Shandong.

But…

"You! I kill!"

He'd picked the wrong opponent.

The giant's martial prowess was certainly no less than Hwangbo Ak's. He might even have been a move or two ahead.

A massive two-section staff, well suited to his frame, had appeared in his hands.

Whoosh!

Fast and powerful.

The staff swept forward as if crushing the space in its path. I could feel the giant's tremendous strength and speed behind it.

I watched until the last possible moment, then quietly extended both arms.

Boom!

A deafening crash sent a wave of qi surging outward. Materials, dust, and dirt scattered across the street were driven beyond a three-zhang[2494] radius. People gasped.

In the middle of it all, two pairs of eyes trembled.

How?

The question was plain in the giant's eyes and Hwangbo Ak's. They stared in shock at the staff and leg caught in my hands.

One movement had stopped both attacks—and the fight.

"Th-This…"

"Strong! You, strong!"

I met their wavering gazes and spoke slowly.

"Now, let's make up."

Ah. I'd forgotten to add something.

"Unless you want me to beat you to death."

[2494] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three zhang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

"…!"

"…!"

Kind words could get you far. Kind words and a fist could get you farther.

The giant stared at me blankly for a moment before stammering, "I-I will make up. I'm good."

"Yeah, you're good. Now, who wants to be a bad little boy?"

My gaze turned to Hwangbo Ak. He pressed his lips together.

"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, are you really planning to—"

"Oh! More information just came in! Every bad little boy I've met so far got beaten nearly to death by me and turned good!"

"…Come to think of it, I suppose I was at fault too."

"Good. Then we're settled."

Only then did I release the two-section staff and the ankle I'd been gripping.

The giant kept stealing bewildered glances at me. Hwangbo Ak trembled with humiliation, but he didn't dare resume the fight. He only glared at me with anger and fear in his eyes, his lips moving soundlessly.

"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon. Can you still call yourself orthodox after this?"

"Wow. That's exactly what I was about to ask you."

"I see. You must be acting this way because you don't know who this Young Master is…"

"Hwangbo Ak. Twenty-nine years old. Lesser Family Head of the Hwangbo Family. Sobriquet: Shandong Fist Dragon."

"…!"

"Oh, and you recently had a wet dream."

"I did not!"

"Then forget I said it."

Hwangbo Ak's clenched fist trembled.

"You know who I am, and you still humiliate me like this?"

"A fucking idiot has no gender, age, or orthodox or unorthodox faction. That's my view, and you're proving it right."

If I'd left him to fight, the giant would have beaten the soul out of him. I'd stepped in before things got worse, and now I had to listen to this nonsense.

So why am I not angry?

After a moment, I realized why.

He was an even bigger idiot than I'd expected. And he was too insignificant to get worked up over.

An insect.

That was all Hwangbo Ak was to me. An ant that would die if I flicked it with a finger. A mosquito that a careless wave of my hand would leave half-dead.

I'd spent so long among giants that I'd become one myself. I felt like Gulliver arriving in Lilliput.

Hwangbo Ak was no exception. Even his status as the Hwangbo Family's Lesser Family Head and one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes meant little to me.

Just a Lilliputian who's a little bigger than the others.

That was how Gulliver—how I—saw him. Maybe some of it showed in my eyes.

Hwangbo Ak's face darkened with rage.

"Y-You…"

"Want some advice?"

"What?"

"Know where you stand before you pick a fight."

"You bastard!"

He shouted, but I didn't blink. He needed to carve my next words into his bones.

"The Roaring Fury Swordsman. The Taeeul Merciless Sword. You've heard those names plenty, haven't you? Though maybe not so much lately. They're both busy recovering."

"…!"

"If you don't want the Shandong Fist Dragon added to that list, don't try anything funny. That's your first and last warning."

Whoosh.

I focused my aura on him alone. Hwangbo Ak sucked in a breath.

He must have heard what had happened to the Zhongnan Sect Leader's two Senior Brothers. And now he'd been reminded that Murim ran on two things: a just cause and the law of strength.

Tap.

I patted his trembling shoulder and smiled.

"You look like you're having a hard time. I'll explain things to the others, so go home."

"B-But…"

"Go."

All Hwangbo Ak could do was grit his teeth and leave.

When his back, looking unusually small, had receded into the distance, a voice reached my ears.

"Sir Jin!"

I hadn't heard it in a long time, which made it all the more welcome.

Chapter 532

The young man thought long and hard.

Where did it all go wrong?

Was it when he'd forced down the dumplings someone had bought? Or when he'd ignored the dull ache in his stomach and dozed off while standing guard?

He couldn't say where or how things had gone wrong. But one thing was certain.

Boom!

The thunderous roar that had suddenly erupted the moment he entered the privy had ended everything for him.

"Ahhh, so warm…"

His Captain had once told him that giving up made things easier.

He had been right. The pleasure was heavenly, and warmth like a mother's embrace spread through the young man's lower body.

So why were tears running down his cheeks?

Why else? Fuck.

He'd shit himself. He'd actually shit himself.

In the privy of a large inn on a crowded main street.

It was an expensive inn that only people with money to spare could afford to enter. The partitions between the privies offered a little comfort, but they didn't change the fact that he could never leave like this.

If anyone finds out what happened, I'm finished.

His spine prickled and his insides twisted at the thought.

Strip a martial artist of his pride and martial arts, and all that remained was skin.

He'd sooner fight a cruel fiend in a life-and-death duel than be discovered like this and have the story spread.

What do I do?

The greatest dilemma of his life.

His pants and underwear had to go. The leather shoes he'd recently splurged on were already beyond saving.

What if he took everything off, pulled his shirt over his face, and ran across the main street as fast as he could?

I'd die.

In Murim, it was practically legal to beat a man to death for sprinting down the main street with everything dangling.

Every passing martial artist would rush out and start swinging their weapons. He might even receive an attack worse than anything a Dark Heaven fiend could unleash.

Then I'll have to ask someone for help. An inn attendant, maybe.

That was better. If he called an attendant over and slipped him a few silver nyang,[2495] the man would bring him a cloth to wipe himself down and some clothes.

If the attendant knew who he was, it might cost extra, but that was still cheaper than a funeral.

What about the others…? No. I can't let Captain or Gung Gibang see me like this!

Hyuk Mujin made a solemn vow.

Unfortunately, his traveling companions were more persistent than venomous snakes. If they got hold of a weakness like this, they'd tease him for ten years at least. Maybe twenty or thirty.

No, they would probably keep going until the very moment Hyuk Mujin was on his deathbed.

"Mujin…"

"Oh, you Hyuk bastard!"

"Heh heh. You arrived right on time, Captain. And Great Hero Gung."

"Sob. Of course I had to arrive on time! You were late that day and shit your pants, but I'm not going to be late!"

"Rest easy, Hyuk. You can stink up the place behind the folding screen all you want now."

"…Please stop."

A miserable end, even to imagine.

For a moment, he considered asking an attendant to fetch Cheongpung from their lodgings. But that would be digging his own grave.

"Wow! This is the first time I've seen someone who shit his pants! At first, I thought you were a snake! You're a Thousand-Year Dung-Horned Snake that looks just like Mimi!"

"Wait. Cheongpung! Wait!"

"Stay here. I'll go get the others! Excuse me! Daoist from Wudang! Someone I know shit his pants over here…"

"You fucking bastard!"

He'd be a hundred times better off walking around with a sign around his neck that read I Shit My Pants.

Hyuk Mujin was trembling from the chills brought on by the horrifying images filling his mind when it happened.

Rattle.

The door opened, and he sensed someone's presence.

[2495] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; silver nyang refers to silver-denominated money. It has no fixed modern won exchange rate.

Hyuk Mujin's eyes flew open, and he cleared his throat.

"Ahem. Ahem."

When no one answered, he coughed louder.

"Ahem! Ahem! Is anyone there? Cough, cough!"

"Hm?"

At last, a response. Hyuk Mujin swallowed and forced his voice into a dignified tone.

"Are you an inn attendant?"

Someone outside answered. The young man's voice was soft, but he spoke with the easy familiarity of someone addressing an inferior.

"You seem to be looking for an attendant, but unfortunately, I don't have time to worry about that. You heard it yourself, so you know there's quite a commotion going on."

How could Hyuk Mujin not have heard? That damned crash was the reason he was in this mess. The building hadn't collapsed, but everyone seemed busy dealing with the damage.

At least someone's still coming to the privy in the middle of all this.

Just as the thought crossed his mind, the man said, "Well, I'll leave you to it."

His presence began to recede.

Hyuk Mujin's heart dropped.

"W-Wait! Just a moment!"

"Hm?"

"Sorry, but could you help me? I really need help."

"Well, I'm busy myself."

"A small problem has come up."

"If it's small, you can take care of it yourself."

"Wait! Hyung![2496] Father! Benefactor!"

After a short silence, the voice returned.

"Did you shit yourself?"

Did you shit yourself? Did you shit yourself? Did you shit yourself?

The question echoed in Hyuk Mujin's ears. He answered through tears.

"Sniff. I did."

"The big one or the small one?"

"…"

"Good grief. Both?"

"Urgh. Sob…"

[2496] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or, familiarly, an older man.

The man outside muttered, “I suppose taking care of the big one takes care of the small one, too.”

“Please. Please help me.”

“If I see an attendant on my way, I’ll tell him.”

“C-Couldn’t you bring me something now? It might be dry by the time an attendant gets here!”

“…That’s disgusting. I have someone to meet, so I’ll be going.”

“W-Wait!”

Desperate, Hyuk Mujin squeezed his eyes shut.

“I-I’m Hyuk Mujin! You seem to be a martial artist too, Brother. Help me this once and keep quiet about it, and I’ll never forget the favor!”

“Hyuk Mujin? The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon’s little toe?”

“…That’s me. But I’m his right arm, not his little toe.”

Hyuk Mujin’s vision went dark. He’d guessed the man was a martial artist, but he hadn’t expected him to recognize the name so quickly.

At least he’d stopped the man from leaving.

“Coincidence or fate? I’m not sure. Interesting.”

“…?”

Flap.

Just as Hyuk Mujin was wondering what he meant, a silk outer robe fluttered down over his head, accompanied by a low chuckle whose meaning he could not understand.

Hyuk Mujin caught the robe and stammered his thanks.

“T-Thank you.”

“Clean yourself up and come out. I’ll give you a chance to repay the favor.”

“Um. Do you happen to know our Captain…?”

“We’ve never met. But I doubt the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon will treat me poorly.”

The soft voice continued.

“Not when I’m the benefactor who helped his little toe—or rather, his right arm.”

“…!”

Hyuk Mujin didn’t know who the man was, but he knew he’d gotten himself into something serious.

It was too late for regrets. His face stiff, he asked, “Is that why you gave me the robe?”

“Why? Have you changed your mind? Then I’ll throw the robe back—”

“If we’re doing this, could you get me some clothes to wear too? Wiping myself down won’t be enough.”

"…"

Gowolru.

That was the name of the luxurious three-story inn.

An inn that large must have dealt with trouble often. The moment we stepped inside, the owner came toward us as if he'd been waiting, with a dozen or so hired martial artists in tow.

His face was grim.

"I don't know who you are, but even young heroes of the martial world must pay for the damage they cause—"

I cut him off.

"First, you have my sympathies. How much will the repairs cost?"

"What?"

"The repairs."

"…About two hundred silver nyang.[2497]"

"Then let's make it three hundred,[2498] including compensation for everything else."

"What?"

At most, part of the third-floor railing and wall had collapsed.

The owner had gone out on a limb and asked for two hundred nyang,[2499] only for me to counter with three hundred. From his perspective, he probably had no idea what kind of person I was.

But I had no qualms about offering an enormous sum.

The reason was simple.

It wasn't my money.

"Put it on the Hwangbo Family's tab. If that Lesser Family Head bastard gives you trouble when you go to collect, tell him Jin Taekyung sent you."

"How am I supposed to say— Wait. Jin Taekyung?"

The owner and the hired blades, who had been studying me suspiciously, opened their eyes wide.

"J-Jin Taekyung? The Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?"

"The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon! It's the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon!"

"I have descended."

[2497] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; silver nyang refers to silver-denominated money. It has no fixed modern won exchange rate.

[2499] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; silver nyang refers to silver-denominated money. It has no fixed modern won exchange rate.

Running an inn this size on a main street in Henan took ability. Gowolru's owner was certainly quick on the uptake.

"Great Hero Jin Taekyung, it's the honor of a lifetime to have you here!"

"Call it an honor for your whole family. Anyway, my throat's been feeling a little dry…"

"I'll bring out a feast that breaks the table legs! What are you all standing around for?"

Nothing calmed a man down like financial therapy.

The owner's eyes had brightened as if he'd forgotten all about his anger. He hurried off with the hired blades, and a soft laugh came from beside me.

The sound alone made my ears itch. I turned toward it.

"What?"

Dagger Hidden Flower Ju Hwaran looked at me with eyes like forget-me-nots.

"Nothing. I was just thinking about last time."

"Last time? Ah."

"You haven't forgotten, have you?"

"Of course not."

The dispute between the Yongbong Escort Bureau and the Zhongnan Sect.

I'd stumbled into it on my way to Sichuan to seek treatment for Jeok Cheongang. After putting a stop to the Taeeul Merciless Sword's attempt to settle things by force, I'd even taken part in the negotiations.

I uprooted two or three of Zhongnan Sect's foundation pillars back then.

Hwaran was clearly remembering it too. Her eyes shone softly as she looked at me.

"It hasn't been that long, but it feels like ages."

"It does. Strange, isn't it?"

The strange part was how hard I was finding it to look the person I was talking to in the eye.

"Why do you keep looking away?"

"I'm cross-eyed. I'm looking straight at you."

"Pfft."

"W-Why are you laughing?"

Had I said something wrong?

Hwaran smiled at my confusion.

"You really haven't changed, Great Hero Jin. Not a bit."

"You haven't changed either, Young Lady Ju…"

Something else nearly slipped out, but I managed to hold it back.

The several pairs of narrowed eyes watching us from beside me helped.

I pretended to cough and sent a Sound Transmission.

—Gib, what are you staring at? Want a hole punched through your solar plexus?

—Ahem. Ahem.

One down.

Three more to go.

I fixed my gaze on the one who looked least useful.

—Hey.

Hak Woo, the Kunlun Cloud Dragon, was the Kunlun Sect's finest young prodigy. I'd stepped on the top of his head and sent him tumbling down during the Star-Array Grand Banquet preliminaries.

For some reason, he'd since developed a round bald patch. He flinched when I looked at him and sent a Sound Transmission back.

—W-What is it, Fellow Daoist Jin?

—Nothing much. I thought you might have something to do.

—Hm?

—Be honest. You're busy right now, aren't you?

—Infinite Life Buddha.[2500] I'm not busy.

—I don't think so. I think you've just remembered something urgent and need to leave right away.

—I have already received permission from my sect regarding today's appointment. There's no urgent matter that I need to attend to——Hey, Hak.

—Infinite Life Buddha?[2501]

—Go. Unless you want me to pluck out every last hair on your head.

—…!

To a balding man, every hair was as precious as his life. Hak Woo finally got the message. Looking ready to cry, he turned to Hwaran.

"Um. Young Lady Ju."

"Yes? What is it?"

"This humble Daoist has remembered an urgent matter and must leave. I'm terribly sorry, Young Lady Ju."

"It's all right. Please, go ahead."

"But it's still rude of me to—"

"I can't walk you out very far. Take care."

"Wait. Could you at least let me finish…"

"I'll see you next time!"

Now that I thought about it, Hwaran seemed a little impatient.

[2500] "Infinite Life Buddha" is an invocation referring to Amitabha, the Buddha of Infinite Life.

[2501] "Infinite Life Buddha" is an invocation referring to Amitabha, the Buddha of Infinite Life.

Kunlun Cloud Dragon Hak Woo looked back and forth between Ju Hwaran and me with eyes on the verge of tears before disappearing, and my gaze naturally shifted to the two people I had yet to deal with.

"I'll tell you now: I'm not leaving. I'm the Young Bureau Head's personal escort."

Song Ilseom, an escort sitting crookedly with a single sword tucked against his chest, spoke flatly.

"I didn't ask you to. Wasn't planning to, either."

"Hm. I'll take your word for it."

Song Ilseom was publicly known as Hwaran's escort, but he had another identity known to only a handful of people.

He was the last descendant of the Guangdong Chen Family, an iron-blooded martial family wiped out by the Demonic Cult during the Great Faction War. He was also an undefeated wandering martial artist once known as the Soul-Chasing Guest.

This guy hasn't changed, either.

I'd been famous when we first met, but it was nothing compared to now. Song Ilseom was still as calm and prickly as he'd been back then.

Maybe that was why I liked him even more.

But the last one…

"Hungry. Food. Taking too long."

"…"

What was with that shameless attitude?

Why had this giant, whose identity I didn't know, followed us here? I hadn't stopped him because I wanted to find out who he was.

Qi Sense could tell me little more than his Level and name. If I wanted to know his sect and who he was connected to, I'd have to talk to him.

"You must be pretty hungry."

"Yes. I, very hungry."

The giant continued with a serious expression.

"Today, only ate six meals. Feel like dying."

"…"

Six meals? Seriously?

I didn't know which sect he belonged to, but I'd bet Hyuk Mujin's wrist that feeding this guy had already cost them a few foundation pillars.

Wait. Hyuk Mujin?

Come to think of it, he'd gone off to take a shit. Why wasn't he back yet?

I'd just noticed his absence and was looking around when I heard him.

"C-Captain!"

For some reason, he sounded terribly anxious.

But I wasn’t looking at Hyuk Mujin, who had finally reappeared. I was looking at the unfamiliar man behind him.

He was smiling at me. Our eyes met, and I muttered, “Now who might that be…?”

Chapter 533

The third floor, where the commotion had broken out earlier, had long since emptied.

Not many people had the nerve to sit drinking as if nothing had happened after a fight between martial artists had brought down the railings and even parts of the walls.

Besides, martial artists wealthy and important enough to frequent Gowolru were more likely to drink at a winehouse than an ordinary inn.

So it wasn't hard to guess what the uninvited guest, still smiling amid the wreckage, was.

A martial artist.

That much was obvious.

The man looked thirty at most. He had an open, handsome face, and a dark saber scabbard hung at his waist.

And then there was…

His aura.

I let out a silent whistle. The power and aura I sensed from him surpassed those of every member of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes I'd met so far.

Even Jin Mukyung before he entered seclusion.

Could it be?

A name I knew but had yet to put a face to flashed through my mind.

Murong Yeonghwi, the One-Ride Heavenly Dragon. Eldest son of the Murong Family, and foremost among the ten dragons and phoenixes hailed as Murim's greatest young prodigies.

Should I use Qi Sense to check his name?

While I was considering it, Hyuk Mujin approached looking like he desperately needed to shit.

"Um, he's an acquaintance of mine. He said he really wanted to meet you, Captain…"

I kept my eyes on the man.

"Mujin."

"Yes?"

"I'm genuinely curious. You didn't expect me to believe that, did you?"

"Ghk."

"Tell me the truth. Now."

"…I shit my pants, and he helped me."

"I figured it was something like that. We'll talk later. Step aside."

As Hyuk Mujin backed away with an expression like he wanted to kill himself, the smile at the corners of the man's mouth deepened.

"Well, now. You're quicker on the uptake than I expected."

"Not really. It'd be stranger if a textile-shop owner's son had a friend like you."

"Hm. I didn't know that. Though, to be honest, I didn't have particularly high expectations."

"You're taking your time introducing yourself. Who are you?"

"A traveler passing through."

"And you're talking pretty casually for someone we've just met."

"If it bothers you, speak casually yourself. Make yourself comfortable."

He was an odd one. He felt different from the others I'd met. I folded my arms loosely.

"Sure. Let's do that."

He laughed aloud.

"I'd only heard rumors about the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon. You're more entertaining than they led me to believe."

"It's not exactly a fun situation from where I'm standing. Anyway, are you still planning to introduce yourself as a passing traveler?"

"You don't know me, then. A few people here seem to."

His gaze shifted to Ju Hwaran, Gung Gibang, and Song Ilseom.

The faint smile Hwaran had worn only moments ago was gone. Her expression hardened.

"It's been a while, Young Sect Leader."

Young Sect Leader?

The question slipped out before I could stop it.

"Young Lady Ju. You know him?"

"We met once. In Gansu."

"Gansu…"

Along with Qinghai and Sichuan, it was one of the regions hit hardest during the Great Faction War. It was also home to the Kongtong Sect, one of the Nine Sects and One Gang.

I studied the man.

"You don't look like a Kongtong Daoist to me. Tell me now if I've got that wrong."

"No, you've got it right. Quite the opposite, in fact."

He shrugged.

"If Kongtong found out it had been associated with a demonic, heterodox practitioner like me, it would be displeased. Of course, I feel the same way."

"A demonic, heterodox practitioner?"

"Ever heard of the Black Dragon Demon Gate?"

Black Dragon Demon Gate. It didn't take long to place the name.

"I have."

I'd heard of the unorthodox sect that held sway over Gansu. Kongtong might be among the weakest of the Nine Sects and One Gang, but I'd still been surprised to learn that an unorthodox sect shunned by the public could wield that much power there.

Now I get why this guy isn't one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.

In that respect, he was much like Song Ilseom.

People could talk all they wanted about all Murim standing together as fellow martial artists. In the end, they still had their own little club.

People—orthodox martial artists, that is—didn't want wandering martial artists who sold their swords for money or demonic, heterodox practitioners they saw as criminals-in-waiting among the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.

"So what brings the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate here?"

The man's brow furrowed.

"That's all?"

"What else do you want?"

"Well…"

"Oh, if you've got more to say, give me your sobriquet. I might forget it, but I ought to hear it first."

"…Black Dragon Saber. Sama Pyo."

"I didn't ask for your name. But all right, now I know."

"…"

"Cool name, though. Any relation to Sima Yi?[2502]"

"What?"

"What do you mean, what? Sima Yi. The one from Romance of the Three Kingdoms."

Sama Pyo looked taken aback.

"We share a surname. That's all."

"Really? What a shame. If you were sworn enemies of the Zhuge Clan, I was going to introduce you to someone I know."

"…That doesn't mean I'm on good terms with the Zhuge Clan."

"Yeah, fair enough. So why are you here?"

Sama Pyo studied me with a strange gaze before speaking.

"I came for my subordinate."

[2502] "Sama" and "Sima" are Korean and Mandarin readings of the same surname, □□. In Romance of the Three Kingdoms, Sima Yi is a rival of Zhuge Liang.

"Your subordinate?"

"Yes. That bear of a man sitting over there."

No one at the table had to ask who he meant. Every gaze, mine included, turned toward the giant.

Despite standing eight cheok[2503] tall, he was hunched in on himself, watching Sama Pyo nervously.

"Taishan.[2504] Get up."

He's with the Black Dragon Demon Gate, too?

Whoever had named him had certainly picked the right name.

At Sama Pyo's call, the mountain of a man answered in his halting voice.

"Lord. I am not Taishan. You have wrong person."

"…"

He really needs to put some points into Intelligence.

Sama Pyo clicked his tongue.

"You troublemaker. Every time I leave you alone, you cause a scene. Enough. Get up."

"Cannot. Food not here yet."

"What a bear of a man. You've eaten that much and you're still not full?"

"Today. Only six meals. Barely ate."

"What? Six meals?"

Sama Pyo's face went rigid.

"Only six? Have you suffered an Internal Injury?"

"…"

"…"

Fuck. I don't even know what to say.

While the rest of us sat speechless, Sama Pyo gave it some thought and nodded.

"All right. We'll eat before we go."

"Food! Good! Taishan eat all food here!"

I spoke from the heart.

"Could you please take that guy—Taishan or the whole beautiful landscape, whatever his name is—and get the hell out?"

Where do these lunatics get off trying to join our table?

Sama Pyo frowned.

"That's stingy."

"Yes! Stingy! But Lord, what is stingy?"

[2503] A cheok is a Korean unit of length, about 30.3 cm (11.9 in). Eight cheok is about 2.42 m (7 ft 11 in).

[2504] Taishan (□□) means "great mountain," fitting the man's enormous build. Taekyung's later "Taishan or the whole beautiful landscape" rhymes the Korean reading Taesan with geumsu gangsan, "land of embroidered rivers and mountains," a poetic name for Korea.

"Taishan, it's short for 'hey, you fucking bastards.'"

Having kindly explained it to a child from the Sunshine Class,[2505] I pointed at the stairs.

"So please leave now, you fucking bastards."

"…!"

A heavy tension settled over the room.

Hwaran exhaled and reached for the flexible sword at her waist. Song Ilseom straightened from his relaxed posture.

Their sudden wariness had one target.

Sama Pyo.

But he didn't move. His eyes widened slightly, and he merely stared at me with an unreadable look.

Then his tightly closed lips parted, and a gentle voice flowed out.

"How refreshing. I've never had an experience like this in Gansu—or in my entire life."

"The first time is the hardest. It gets easier from the second time onward. I'll give you plenty more of it from now on, so don't worry."

"Plenty more in the future, too?"

"I get the feeling we'll be seeing each other often. Could be wrong."

"You're certainly different. Very different. Don't you agree?"

The question wasn't for me.

Taishan, whose huge eyes had been darting around, nodded.

"Lord. Yes. That man. Different."

"Yes, I believe he is."

A smile I couldn't read appeared on Sama Pyo's face, then vanished.

The next moment, Sama Pyo reached up and grabbed Taishan by the nape of his neck, far above his own head, then hauled him upright.

"Hard to linger where we aren't welcome. Come on, you fool."

"Taishan disappointed. But Taishan follows Lord. Obeys well."

"Then we'll be going. See you again, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon. And you too, Young Lady Ju."

With that, they went downstairs. A little later, I heard the inn's door close, and Hwaran's stiff expression eased.

"Whew."

She let out a quiet sigh. Song Ilseom leaned back in his chair.

[2505] Sunshine Class is the sort of name given to a kindergarten class; the comparison casts Taishan as a young child.

"He's stronger than before. No—more dangerous might be the better way to put it."

That only deepened the question I'd been turning over.

From their reactions, they'd clearly met before. More than that, something had happened between them.

What was it?

Perhaps someone noticed my expression, because a foot tapped mine beneath the table.

Tap. Tap.

I didn't need to look. It was Gung Gibang. He moved his chapped lips.

—Don't say anything. And don't ask.

—Why?

—Just don't, you fucking bastard.

What the hell is his problem? What's this about?

But that was how people worked. Even if I wasn't going to ask Hwaran herself, I wanted to hear it from someone who knew.

—What happened?

—Not telling.

—Why?

—You're better off not knowing.

At that moment, Ju Hwaran, who was sitting right beside Gung Gibang and directly across from me, handed me a plate with a smile.

"Try this, Great Hero Jin."

"Ah, yes."

I ought to have smiled back. For some reason, I couldn't.

I stuffed the food she'd given me into my mouth and kept sending Sound Transmissions.

—Tell me.

—No.

—I said tell me.

—And I said no.

This fucking guy.

He could at least have pretended he knew nothing. Instead, he'd let on that there was a story, then dug in his heels. I was getting pissed off.

I was about to send another Sound Transmission when Hwaran spoke.

"Oh, Great Hero Jin. There's something I forgot to tell you."

"Tell me while I'm still asking nicely, okay?"

I nearly made a huge mistake.

I looked up, my mouth full of food, and Hwaran continued.
“That man. The Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate.”
“Sama Pyo?”
“Mm. Yes.”
“Uh… Did something happen?”
“You could say it did. Or you could say it didn’t.”
Hwaran looked straight at me and said one sentence.
No. It was a bomb.
“He used to be my fiancé.”
“Pffft!”
“Aaaaaah!”
“Uaaaaah!”

Chapter 534

Jingle. Clack.

The inn's door closed on the final ring of its bell. With it went the stares that had stabbed at the back of Sama Pyo's head all the way down the stairs.

But Sama Pyo already knew this wasn't the end. It was another beginning.

"Those two who just came out of Gowolru…"

"That's them, right?"

"I'm certain. That's the Black Dragon Saber, Sama Pyo—the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate. And the huge fellow beside him is the monster who crushed Blood Cudgel's skull seven days and nights ago."

"I heard he got into a fight with the Hwangbo Family's Lesser Family Head earlier. Making trouble like that at a time like this… Tsk, tsk."

"Leave them be. What else would you expect from demonic, heterodox practitioners? We need even their help to drive out Dark Heaven."

"I don't like it one bit. How do we know they won't stab us in the back?"

"That's what I'm saying… Shh. The big fellow is looking this way."

Countless eyes watched them, and whispers followed. However quietly the onlookers spoke, they were close enough for Sama Pyo to hear every word if he cared to listen.

He kept walking, his expression unchanged.

Nothing unusual about it.

He knew the situation all too well. Even in Gansu, where the Black Dragon Demon Gate held immense influence, people had treated him the same way. The label demonic, heterodox practitioner had followed him since birth, a shackle he could never take off.

"Whoof."

A rough snort came from beside him. Sama Pyo glanced at Taishan, whose enormous eyes were darting around, and moved his lips.

—Stop.

Taishan's hand froze on its way to the two-section staff strapped across his back. Sama Pyo put more force into his Sound Transmission.

—Taishan. You little rascal.

—…Understood, Lord. Taishan will hold back.

—That's right. Good boy.

—Taishan listens well. Taishan likes Lord. Hehehe.

Taishan broke into a broad grin as though nothing had happened, and Sama Pyo let out a quiet laugh.

—Yes. I like you very much, too.

—Taishan got praised a lot today.

—Oh? Who was kind enough to praise you?

—Mm. Blazing Flame Divine Dragon praised me.

Sama Pyo slowed.

—Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung?

—Yes. Jin Taekyung. Said Taishan was a good boy.

—You seem to like him.

—Like him. Very strong. Good. Taishan praised him.

Sama Pyo gazed at Taishan's profile as the giant strode along excitedly.

Taishan had been born with outstanding martial talent and divine strength, but an accident long ago had injured his head and left him much like a child. Perhaps because he remembered the accident, he was wary of strangers and slow to trust anyone but Sama Pyo.

It's rare for him to speak so highly of someone else.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.

Sama Pyo pictured the young man's carefree, sly manner—and the unfathomably powerful aura concealed beneath his calm face and voice.

There's a reason they call him a Divine Dragon.

The world was vast, and masters were plentiful. People admired the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes as Murim's finest young prodigies, but Sama Pyo had never acknowledged them.

Empty reputations bestowed inside walls they built themselves.

Anyone outside those walls was rejected. He had met plenty of orthodox martial artists who behaved shamelessly while hiding behind tiresome words like righteousness and the orthodox path.

But…

He was different. No question about it.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.

Although their meeting had been brief, Sama Pyo had realized one thing for certain.

His astonishing martial power, which far surpassed that of any young prodigy, was one reason. But what made him feel even more extraordinary was his attitude—the way he differed from everyone else.

Their conversation from moments ago came back to him.

"I don't know whether you've heard of the Black Dragon Demon Gate."

"So what brings someone as important as the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate here?"

"Is that all?"

"What else do you need?"

"…!"

The question had caught Sama Pyo so completely off guard that he'd had no answer. No one had ever asked him that in all his years as the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate.

What else do I need? What else…

His lips moved soundlessly around the thought. Then he turned to Taishan.

—Let me ask you one thing.

—…?

—If you had to fight Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung, what would you do?

In an instant, the smile vanished from Taishan's face. His expression hardened, and his Sound Transmission followed without the slightest hesitation.

—Taishan owes Lord a great debt. If Lord commands it, Taishan fights anyone.

—Didn't you say you liked Jin Taekyung?

—Like Jin Taekyung. But not as much as Lord. Taishan would give his life to obey Lord.

—I see.

Sama Pyo gave a small laugh and shook his head.

—That's enough. You're a good fellow.

—Taishan good. And good Taishan hungry.

The enormous child looked at him with a mournful face. Sama Pyo laughed aloud.

"Come on. We'll go somewhere. Tonight, I'll feed you until you're fit to burst."

"Hehehe. Lord promised. Taishan believes Lord."

"Yes, yes."

"But, Lord."

"Hm?"

"That woman earlier. Pretty. Very pretty. Who?"

Sama Pyo stopped dead. Taishan noticed and tilted his head.

"Lord?"

"No. Was she really that pretty?"

"Yes. Pretty and good."

"They say you can see ten fathoms into the water, but not one fathom into a person's heart. How could you know what was hidden inside her after seeing only her face for a moment?"

Taishan shook his head fiercely.

"No! Pretty women are good!"

"Don't shout. People are staring."

"Admit it! Taishan is right! Pretty means good!"

"Whew. You damned fool. I'm going on ahead."

"Lord! Lord!"

Sama Pyo walked away, leaving Taishan's desperate cries behind him. His face was as dry and expressionless as sand.

Ju Hwaran… I never expected to meet her here.

Whether it was coincidence or fate, Sama Pyo couldn't say.

But one thing was certain. The woman who had been his fiancée, if only for a short time—Dagger Hidden Flower Ju Hwaran—would consider everything connected to him an ill-fated relationship.

An ill-fated relationship… It wouldn't be wrong.

His gaze turned cold.

The rest of the meal went smoothly. The innkeeper treated us lavishly, everyone else kept staring, and outside the inn we exchanged farewells.

No. To be precise, it would be more accurate to say that Ju Hwaran said farewell to us.

"I should get going. I have some Escort Bureau matters to take care of."

Jab.

Gung Gibang poked me discreetly in the side. I'd been standing there in a daze, but my mouth opened on reflex.

"Oh, right. Goodbye."

"Yes. You too, Great Hero Jin."

Jab.

Damn it. Apparently that wasn't the right answer.

"Um, Young Lady Ju."

"Yes?"

"Would you like me to walk you back to your lodgings?"

"Thank you, but I'll be fine. I hear you barely have enough time to train as it is."

"Oh. Who told you? I have been a little busy lately."

Jab. Jab jab.

Thanks, you bastard.

Gung-vigation was warning me I'd veered off course again. I tightened my grip on the wheel.

"Still, some strange men might approach you. It might be better if I walked you back…"

"Ahaha. I'll be fine. I'm a martial artist, too."

"Oh, right. I didn't mean to underestimate you. It's just…"

"No, my martial arts really do fall short of yours, Great Hero Jin. Besides, Captain Song is here."

Song Ilseom spoke bluntly. "If any of them approach, I'll cut them down in one stroke. Stop worrying about nothing."

"You heard him, right?"

"…Yes. I heard him."

Jab jab. Jabjabjabjab!

You're going to put a hole in my side, you bastard.

But I couldn't think of anything else to say. Thoughts tangled in my already muddled head, then slipped away. By the time I found any words, the moment had passed.

"I'll be going, then. See you again."

Hwaran smiled and turned away. Her fine, silken hair swayed, carrying a faint fragrance through the air.

I stood watching the two of them walk away.

That was when—

"This guy really is a fucking idiot."

"Wow. You're something else, Captain."

"…"

I didn't need to turn to know who'd spoken. I looked at Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin with a mournful gaze.

"Where did I go wrong, and when?"

They answered at the same time, as if they'd been waiting.

"Since you spat food in Young Lady Ju's face."

"Wasn't Captain himself the problem from the start?"

Different answers, but they had two things in common: both pissed me off, and both were hard to argue with.

"Damn it."

I kicked at the ground. Honestly, I felt a little aggrieved. How was I supposed to have stayed calm in that situation?

A fiancé, out of nowhere.

Just thinking about it made my head spin. Forget a grenade—that was a ballistic missile. My only comfort was the word former in front of fiancé.

"I told you not to ask," Gung Gibang said.

"If I'd known it would be like this, I wouldn't have asked," I replied with a sigh. "Besides, Young Lady Ju brought it up first."

"Because you made it so obvious you wanted to know."

"Gung Gibang is right. You could have figured there was a reason and left it alone. Why did you have to—"

"The bastard who shit his pants can shut up."

"…Yes, sir."

"I didn't shit my pants," Gung Gibang said, "so I can keep talking."

"Not for long. You'll be shitting blood in a minute."

"…Calm down. Put your fist down first."

The truth was, I didn't have the strength to hit him. At the customer's request, I lowered my fist and stared into space.

"I want to turn back time."

"You can't."

"You can't, Captain."

"Still, I didn't let it show much afterward, did I? I was pretty calm."

Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin gave me warm smiles.

"Of course. Couldn't tell at all. Apart from the six times you knocked over your water glass."

"And the seven times you dropped your chopsticks."

"The best part was when the server asked us to add anything else we wanted to the order slip[2506] and you glared at him."

"Seriously, how did you connect an order slip to Sama Pyo? It took me ages to work that out."

"You were practically insane."

"Dark Heaven, at minimum."

"…"

I get it, so stop it, you fucking bastards.

I wanted to beat the hell out of them, but I didn't have the energy. Trudging along was about all I could manage. I couldn't even be bothered to hide my face beneath my crooked bamboo hat, let alone care when people recognized me.

"Th-that man, could he be…?"

"Gasp! It is! It's Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung!"

"But why is he walking like that?"

"How would I know?"

"Looks like a woman dumped him."

"Ha ha. Good one."

"…"

Don't laugh. It's not a joke.

I was taking damage from every direction just by breathing. I sighed and adjusted my bamboo hat, my thoughts still hopelessly tangled.

An ex-boyfriend. No, an ex-fiancé.

[2506] The Korean for "order slip," jumunpyo, shares its final syllable, pyo, with Sama Pyo's name.

I knew roughly what had happened. Hwaran had told me about her past plainly and without hiding anything.

“It was a political marriage. I hadn’t even seen his face before that.”

Nothing unusual about that. The Yongbong Escort Bureau had been declining day by day, and the Black Dragon Demon Gate had reached out to Hwaran with an offer she couldn’t refuse.

“I made the decision myself. For my father, after he collapsed.”

Her calm voice and expression were still on my mind when someone called to me.

“My youngest.”

I blinked. We were in front of our lodgings. I hadn’t even noticed us arriving.

Jin Wikyung stood before me, a large man, though not quite as enormous as Taishan.

“Great Hero Mae—no, the Alliance Leader is looking for you.”

Chapter 535

"Great Hero Mae—no, the Alliance Leader is looking for you."

Jin Wikyung's sudden announcement stopped me short.

"Me?"

"Yes. And Cheongpung as well."

Cheongpung too?

I was about to ask why when a familiar face popped out of a pavilion window.

"Grandpa! Are we going to see Grandpa now?"

Cheongpung sounded thrilled. Jin Wikyung smiled faintly and shook his head.

"Not your grandfather. The Alliance Leader is looking for you."

"Yes. Grandpa!"

"The same man, but it's different. In any case, Young Hero Cheongpung, get ready and come down as soon as you can."

"Just a moment! I need to pack some dumplings!"

"All right. Take a variety. And some sweets."

He's had some practice, all right. Didn't even blink.

Jin Wikyung had dealt with Cheongpung enough times by now that it came naturally to him.

Cheongpung vanished amid a clatter, and Jin Wikyung turned to me.

"You aren't asking why."

"…I'd say it's more accurate to say I haven't had a chance to ask."

"That's true."

"I might as well hear it from him when I get there. Besides, I already have a feeling."

"What sort of feeling?"

"That he didn't call us over just to see his grandson."

He wanted to see Cheongpung and me.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak—no, the Alliance Leader of the Murim Alliance.

The man was the same, but the title made all the difference. That was probably what Jin Wikyung had meant when he corrected Cheongpung.

The Alliance Leader.

It was a weighty title. The man bearing it carried the countless martial artists crisscrossing the Nine Provinces[2507]—and all of Murim—on his shoulders. And he wanted to see me…

No matter how I look at it, that's ominous.

Had something else happened already?

[2507] The Nine Provinces, or Jiuzhou, is a traditional name for the lands of China.

I was wondering just that when—

Whoosh!

Cheongpung appeared with the sound of rushing wind. A bulging silk bundle hung from one hand, and gleaming silver armor covered his upper body.

Wait. Armor?

Hiss.

“I’m back. What the fuck?”

“It’s Mimi. She’s grown so much I can’t carry her in my arms anymore.”

“…Then how about leaving her here?”

Cheongpung tilted his head.

“Why?”

“Do you seriously not know?”

“Yes!”

“Oh… Not a moment’s hesitation. You’re driving me insane.”

She was a snake. A snake with horns, no less.

She’d grown so bulky that Mimi hardly seemed like the right name anymore.

Bottom line: I didn’t know how many snake lovers there were in the Murim Alliance, but she wasn’t exactly a pet they’d welcome.

“…What the hell have you been feeding her?”

“Hehe. She’s gotten huge, hasn’t she? Guess, Benefactor.”

I answered without hesitation.

“Steroids.”

“Mostly dumplings and sweets. Oh, she definitely seems to have gotten a lot bigger after eating the Blood Fish.”

I was about to ask why he’d fed a snake dumplings and sweets when I caught myself.

“Blood Fish?”

“Yes.”

Blood Fish were fish from Dongting Lake contaminated by magical power.

In other words, she’d eaten something thoroughly tainted…

“No. Mimi stays here.”

“She’s fine.”

“Other people might not be. She could bite someone.”

“No, Mimi wouldn’t bite even if I told her to. Want to see?”

Looking desperate to prove it, Cheongpung reached toward Mimi.

“Mimi, bite!”

Swish. Clack!

It happened in an instant.

Mimi lunged with her jaws wide open, quick as lightning. Cheongpung's hand vanished even faster.

Her teeth snapped together on empty air. She flicked her tongue as if disappointed.

Hiss.

"See? She didn't bite."

"…"

"…"

Is he insane?

She just missed.

Everyone, myself included, was speechless. Cheongpung's face fell.

"Sal—no, Mungyeong said she was fine…"

"Mungyeong did?"

"Yes. I see him a lot these days. He checked on Mimi, too."

Come to think of it, I hadn't seen much of either Cheongpung or Mungyeong lately. I'd been busy, but from what Cheongpung said, that wasn't the only reason.

That guy never took an interest in anyone else. What's gotten into him?

Cheongpung saw my eyes narrow and caught his breath.

"Gasp."

"Why?"

"It's nothing."

That only made him more suspicious.

But I let it go with a shrug. Jin Wikyung was visibly growing anxious.

"My youngest, that…"

"Oh, sorry. Are we in a hurry?"

"Honestly, it wouldn't be good to arrive late. Others will be waiting too."

Others?

This was turning out to be a bigger gathering than I'd expected.

I hid my unease and jerked my chin toward Cheongpung.

"Let's go, Cheongpung."

"Yes, Benefactor!"

Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin nodded, their faces grim.

"Right. Let's go."

"I'll escort you, Captain. And you as well, Lesser Family Head."

"You two shut up and stay here to clean up the grime and shit."

"…"

"…"

The Murim Alliance was like a small city.

At its center stood the Alliance Leader's Hall. We went inside and stopped before a massive door.

"You've arrived."

The guard had a rigid gaze and expression, along with a carefully contained aura.

He was unmistakably a Peak master who had reached the level of injuring others with Sword Energy. Yet here, this nameless man was only a doorkeeper.

He appeared to know Jin Wikyung. After greeting him quietly, he opened the door.

Rattle. Rattle. Rattle.

The scraping sounds came one after another. Only after five doors had opened in succession did I see what lay beyond.

Good thing I left those idiots behind.

Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin ought to thank me. If they'd followed, they'd be standing here stinking of grime and shit, too scared to open their mouths and sweating buckets.

That was how impressive the people seated around the enormous table were—their faces and auras alike.

"Wow."

A soft exclamation came from beside me. Jin Wikyung poked the wide-eyed Cheongpung in the side and sent a Sound Transmission.

—This is as far as I go.

I understood. I nodded and stepped over the threshold.

Step.

My footsteps echoed through the silence.

Gazes fell on Cheongpung and me—some sharp, some impassive, others full of wonder and curiosity.

"Oh? So these are the youngsters we've heard so much about…"

"They're remarkable, even the second time I've seen them."

"Hm. Not bad."

"What do you mean, not bad? What they've done is extraordinary. A blessing for all of Murim."

The owners of those aged voices sat on either side of us.

Although they had reached supreme realms of martial arts and slowed the aging process, every last hair on their heads was as white as snow. It was enough to give me an idea of how much time they had lived through.

The leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang. And the Family Heads of the Five Great Families.

Fifteen pillars supporting Murim.

They had never all gathered in one place, not even for the Star-Array Grand Banquet—a Murim event on a grand scale. Nor had they managed it at the Mount Song Resolution, when the Murim Alliance was proclaimed. Some had been too far away to arrive in time.

But now, at last…

They're all here.

If the Star-Array Grand Banquet was a feast for stars just beginning to rise, this was a banquet for giants who had carved their names and left their marks on Murim's long history.

Even among them, a few presences stood out.

They no longer headed their families, yet wielded even greater influence. Martial artists throughout the land spoke of them with reverence:

One God, Three Saints, Ten Kings.

Long ago, a hundred-thousand-strong demonic army had surged toward the Central Plains with the blood-red western sky at its back, and heroes had risen to oppose it.

They were swords and spears that cut through the enemy, shields that defended the Central Plains. In time, they became a vast, shining legend.

When the sky that was the Martial God disappeared, the three stars that had lit it vanished one by one. The ten kings stepped down from their thrones and slowly died or grew old. But some had returned to this place.

The Azure Sky Sword King. The Thunderbolt Saber King. And…

There were faces I knew and faces I didn't. One man stood out above them all. When he saw me, his eyebrows rose.

—How long has it been since I called for you? Only showing up now? You must be desperate to die.

Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

The Sound Transmission was gruff, but there was warmth in it. I couldn't help smiling.

—Look at you. You can smile at a time like this?

What am I supposed to do if it comes out?

—Honestly. You were stiff as a board a moment ago. The Nine Sects and One Gang, the Five Great Families—none of them are anything special. They're all much the same. Our sect is the best.

Who else could say that so freely?

After that proud, arrogant declaration, another Sound Transmission reached me. He hesitated for a moment before continuing.

—So straighten your shoulders and open your eyes wide. You… are this old man's pride.

Pride.

I hadn’t expected that word.

Although he hadn’t said it aloud, I had never imagined Jeok Cheongang would say something like that to me.

I couldn’t hold back. My lips moved.

—Old Master.

Jeok Cheongang had been avoiding my gaze. He flinched.

—Ahem.

—Old Master.

—Wh-Why are you calling me?

—I think it’s time for your medicine.

—You little fucking bastard…

—And thank you.

—…!

Jeok Cheongang’s red eyebrows trembled.

I looked away and straightened my back. The muscles that had tightened throughout my body relaxed, and my head cleared.

I’m someone’s pride.

I still didn’t know why this gathering had been called. But I knew one thing: the confidence I had briefly lost, then found again, was what had brought me here.

Step.

Cheongpung and I stopped together.

The corridor that had seemed so long and distant had ended. There was nowhere left to go.

The voices of the giants, who had been quietly speaking among themselves while watching us, abruptly fell silent as though they had been waiting for this exact moment.

Silence.

A silence waiting for one person, prepared for one person.

At the place of honor among those twenty-odd giants, a man rose. Instead of white hair, he had black, and his eyes were clear.

Rattle.

Three stars had once adorned the sky above the vast world. Of them, the brightest —and now the only one remaining—was Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

He opened his mouth.

No.

Alliance Leader Mae Jonghak.

That was the man standing here. And I wasn’t the only one who understood.

Cheongpung spoke so softly that only I could hear.

“Grandpa…”

A warm smile touched Mae Jonghak’s lips as he looked at us. At the same time, a powerful voice flowed from his mouth.

“The masters of the Two Dragons Pavilion have arrived.”

Chapter 536

Two Dragons Pavilion.

I'd never heard the name before. Yet I knew what Mae Jonghak meant.

The masters of the Two Dragons Pavilion.

Cheongpung and me.

Then Mae Jonghak spoke, his voice calm and commanding.

"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. Come closer."

His manner was different. So was the air around him.

There was no trace of the man who called me his friend and liked to tease me.

The person before me was neither Always-Victorious Sword Jongni Chu nor Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

Step.

I took a deep breath, stepped forward, and respectfully cupped my hands toward the Alliance Leader.

"Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan greets you, Alliance Leader."

A light came into Mae Jonghak's eyes as he looked at me.

"For generations, the Jin Family of Taiyuan has stood as a symbol of righteous spirit. It fed the hungry, cared for the sick, and whenever the Central Plains was in danger, its members fought without regard for their own lives."

Three hundred years. A full three hundred years.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan had roots deep and strong enough to earn its place among the great families. It might have swayed, but it had never been uprooted. Its steps might have faltered, but it had never strayed from the righteous path.

"Two years ago, in winter, you personally cut down Blade of Flowers Jin Baekyang, your own blood relative and the family's Head Elder. Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, why was that?"

The leader of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho, who had been standing silently at attention, opened his mouth with a stiff expression.

"Because he was a traitor. He had long been acting on Dark Heaven's orders. He betrayed not only the Jin Family of Taiyuan, but all of Murim."

"Are you certain?"

"I stake my life on it."

He didn't need to stake his life. Everyone here knew the truth. Anyone who paid the slightest attention to news from Murim knew it.

So why spend precious time on something everyone already knew?

I had a good idea.

To remind them. And to make them accept it.

Mae Jonghak's words weren't meant for me alone. His real audience was the twenty-odd giants seated throughout this vast conference hall.

"One year ago, the Star-Array Grand Banquet was held here in Henan, and Dark Heaven's attack stained Shaolin's grounds with blood. What did you do?"

I answered without hesitation.

"I fought."

"Why?"

"That's…"

I closed my mouth.

Why?

The question caught me off guard. Not because I didn't know the answer, but because I'd never once thought about it.

Well. Why did I?

I'd long considered myself selfish and materialistic. That didn't make me a cold-blooded bastard. When people were dying right in front of me, who had time to weigh what was in it for me?

On the day Shaolin was stained with blood, there hadn't been a question mark in my head. Only exclamation marks. I'd run in and fought.

The answer came easily.

"I've never thought about it."

"Why not?"

"Because it was what anyone would do."

"What anyone would do…"

Mae Jonghak repeated my answer softly, then turned his smiling eyes toward his Disciple and sworn grandson.

"Pung. What about you?"

"Me?"

"Were you afraid of dying?"

Cheongpung stared at him with wide, clear eyes before answering hesitantly.

"I was. I'd never thought about death before."

"But you went to Shaolin. Why?"

"…Regret."

"Hmm?"

"I think I would've regretted it for the rest of my life if I'd run away."

His quiet mumble grew clear.

"I felt like I'd lose something greater than my life."

That was right. He'd said the same thing when we fought the Blood Lord.

Cut and torn, bleeding heavily and writhing in pain, Cheongpung had refused to retreat. He'd known he was no match for the Blood Lord, but he kept charging at him.

"What the hell? Why are you acting like you're so desperate to die first?"

And when the Blood Lord had asked him that with confusion and anger, Cheongpung had answered with a clear smile.

"If I retreat… I think I'll regret it for the rest of my life."

That regret. I knew what he meant.

Maybe I'd been more afraid of living alone with that regret than I was of dying.

"Regret. Regret…"

Mae Jonghak muttered quietly, then turned his gaze toward me.

"And you?"

"Me, sir?"

My answer hadn't changed since I first started working as a Hunter.

I gave a short, quiet laugh and answered.

"Death is always scary. I'm afraid of dying."

Was that too honest?

"Ahem. Hm."

A few of the people watching in silence cleared their throats uncomfortably. But Mae Jonghak's smile only deepened.

"Facing the fear of death and helping another in need. That is chivalry."

"…!"

The throat-clearing stopped. The room went still.

A man who had been sitting crookedly in his chair spoke up.

"What anyone would do. Thinking it and doing it are worlds apart, though. And you two did it without hesitation."

There was warmth in his voice. Fire King Jeok Cheongang's eyes were unmistakably smiling as he looked at me.

"That is humanity."

"…!"

Humanity and chivalry. Chivalry and humanity.

Alike in one sense, different in another. Two short words, heavy enough to press down on everyone in the room.

People say a true martial artist does not fear death.

But the world has another name for someone who feels that fear, refuses to yield to it, and acts with humanity and chivalry.

"A knight-errant…"

Someone's murmur rang strangely loud in the silence.

That was when a graying middle-aged man with a faint smile opened his mouth.

"A knight-errant. Now there's a word I like."

His hands were strangely large and thick for a man of his modest build. Only then did I recognize him.

Fist King Yan Hwapyeong.

The last descendant of the Jinzhou Yan Family, which had been utterly ruined long ago by power struggles between orthodox factions.

He had turned his back on the world and lived atop an unnamed mountain. But when news reached him that a hundred thousand demonic soldiers had invaded the Central Plains, he joined the Murim Alliance without hesitation.

"Do you know why the Fist King is such an incredible man?"

"How would I know?"

"I once asked him if he had no pride. The orthodox bastards had ruined his family before he was even born. How many of the men gathered here, I asked him, knew anything about humanity or chivalry?"

"You really have no tact, do you?"

"Shut up and listen. His answer was the best part."

"What did he say?"

"He said it didn't matter."

"What?"

"Just that. None of it mattered. He'd simply come to help. And the moment the Great Faction War ended, he vanished like a phantom. That man was the real thing. Ha ha ha."

That same Fist King Yan Hwapyeong was smiling at us now. It was a warm smile.

"Doing what ought to be done. Overcoming fear and moving forward. That is a knight-errant. Yes, indeed."

He wasn't the only one nodding in approval. Gentle gazes fell on Cheongpung and me from around the room. In the eyes of several familiar faces, I could see unmistakable gratitude.

Myriad-Poison Asura Tang Sadok.

He was pale, as though he hadn't fully recovered, but his back was straight and the green light in his eyes was clear.

Our eyes met. The corner of his wrinkled mouth lifted slightly, and he spoke.

"As Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan, I would like to say a few words."

The unexpected announcement drew every eye to him. Mae Jonghak gave a small nod, and Tang Sadok continued in his hissing voice.

"Being a pavilion master of the Murim Alliance is a position of tremendous weight and responsibility. I believe it requires not only outstanding martial arts, but also the experience to match. It would be unreasonable to entrust it to young people who are not even thirty, let alone forty."

A stir ran through the room. Several expressions shifted. Joy crossed some faces, displeasure others.

But…

The rule about hearing someone out before you judge doesn't just apply to Korean.

Tang Sadok's next words confirmed my suspicion.

"However, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung and Huashan Divine Dragon Cheongpung are exceptions. They fought Dark Heaven in Shanxi, Henan, Sichuan, and Hubei. They showed us what humanity and chivalry mean. This old man and my family owe them a debt we cannot hope to repay."

Voices of agreement rose around the room.

They belonged to the heads of sects and families who had crossed paths with me personally throughout the Murim, or through Jeok Cheongang or the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Others nodded as though it were only natural, despite having no connection to me at all.

Encouraged by this response, Myriad-Poison Asura Tang Sadok continued in a clear voice.

"If these two take on important positions within the Murim Alliance, who would dare question their qualifications—or object to the Alliance Leader's command?"

He put particular force behind those last words. Several people frowned, among them the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect.

Tang Sadok swept his green-lit gaze across the room, then cupped his hands.

"As you can see, there will be no objections. Alliance Leader, you need only give the order."

He'd ended the argument before anyone could raise it.

And anyone who did object would be taking on the Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan, one of Murim's most famously uncompromising clans. The Sichuan Blood Tragedy had dealt them a devastating blow, but they were still one of the Five Great Families, with strength no one could afford to dismiss.

"Hmm…"

Someone let out a low groan.

Then a voice broke the brief silence.

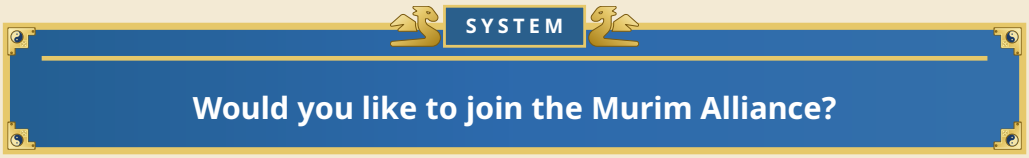
"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. Huashan Divine Dragon Cheongpung."

Mae Jonghak looked at us warmly.

"I have yet to ask the two of you. Do you wish to join the Two Dragons Pavilion?"

At that moment—

Ding.



The notification appeared before my eyes.

Neither Cheongpung nor I took long to decide. Our eyes met, and we answered as one.

“We do.”

“Then I hereby formally decree this. From this moment onward, the two of you shall belong to the Two Dragons Pavilion, directly under the Alliance Leader’s Office and answerable only to the Alliance Leader’s commands. Each of you shall become a pavilion master, with the authority to select the personnel you require…”

I couldn’t make out what came next. No—I couldn’t hear it properly.

Ding. Ding. Ding, ding!

The bells rang without pause, filling my ears.

Chapter 537

“The tea smells wonderful.”

The first to speak was a graying middle-aged man. He looked at least ten years younger than his actual age, which was past sixty. Yet as he faced the man across the teacups, his expression was tight with tension and displeasure.

“Great Hero Mae. No, Alliance Leader.”

Only someone with a mind at ease could enjoy the fragrance of tea. Unable to contain his impatience any longer, the man spoke again. Sword Saint Mae Jonghak smiled at him.

“I’m listening. What is it?”

“You already know, don’t you? The Thousand-Faced Fox…”

“He’s the Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion.”

“Yes. And the Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion must have reported it to you already.”

“Reported what?”

“If you truly haven’t heard, then I’ll tell you myself.”

If Mae Jonghak meant to play ignorant, he would have to show his hand first. The middle-aged man bit his lip and spoke. He was Hwangbo Gun, Family Head of the Hwangbo Family.

“It concerns my son.”

Mae Jonghak’s eyes widened.

“You have a son?”

“Alliance Leader!”

Hwangbo Gun raised his voice before he could stop himself. Realizing his mistake, he lowered his head.

They might once have fought on the same battlefield, but the man before him was now the Alliance Leader of the Murim Alliance. In the past, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak had let almost anything pass with a good-natured smile. An offense against the Alliance Leader, though, could leave the Hwangbo Family in a difficult position.

“I-I apologize. With my son involved, I spoke out of turn.”

Mae Jonghak lifted his teacup with a bright, guileless smile that belied his age.

“Don’t worry about it. These things happen. How many times have we fought together?”

“I’m grateful to hear you say so.”

Hwangbo Gun’s expression brightened a little. Their days on the battlefield were long past, and their positions now stood as far apart as heaven and earth, but Mae Jonghak clearly remembered their bond. Perhaps this would go well after all.

“I’ll get straight to the point. The reason I requested this private audience…”

He quickly recounted what had happened a few shichen[2508] earlier. His account was embellished just enough to differ subtly from the truth, though Hwangbo Gun saw it differently.

How dare they do this!

His only son had come along when he was nearly forty. Hwangbo Gun had looked the other way no matter how much trouble the boy caused, and paid no mind to the endless scandals involving women. Now he had been told that his precious son had suffered every kind of humiliation before a crowd of onlookers.

That, Hwangbo Gun could not overlook.

“How can this be allowed? However far the principles of the martial world have fallen, how dare some spawn of demonic, heterodox arts attack the Lesser Family Head of the Hwangbo Family? And furthermore…”

His voice, thick with anger, suddenly dropped.

“An orthodox martial artist who witnessed such injustice and still protected that spawn of the demonic, heterodox arts could no longer be called orthodox, could he? Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. I’m speaking of that man.”

“Hmm. So that happened.”

Clink.

Mae Jonghak set down his half-empty teacup and tilted his head.

“But what do you want, exactly?”

“Pardon?”

“I’ve heard your account. I understand what happened. Now tell me what you want.”

Hwangbo Gun stared at Mae Jonghak without speaking, then uttered a single word.

“Punishment. I want appropriate punishment.”

“For example?”

“I had my retainers look into it. The man who attacked my son belongs to the Black Dragon Demon Gate in Gansu.”

“The Black Dragon Demon Gate. I see. Very well.”

Mae Jonghak nodded at once. Hwangbo Gun’s expression brightened. Convinced the Alliance Leader had taken his side, he went on with renewed force.

“And I believe Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung should be disciplined as well.”

“Disciplined…”

“You’ve heard what happened. He sided with those demonic, heterodox martial artists even after seeing the attack with his own eyes.”

[2508] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

"I suppose so."

"And such a man is a pavilion master of the Murim Alliance. I'm not the only one who finds that deeply regrettable."

Regrettable was the mildest word Hwangbo Gun could bring himself to use. This was what infuriated him most.

That young punk is a pavilion master?

A pavilion master was no ordinary post. It placed its holder among the Murim Alliance's twenty highest-ranking members and carried the authority to command multiple groups and squads.

He's directly under the Alliance Leader's Office, so he can't have subordinate units of his own. But he's still a pavilion master. How does that make any sense?

Even his son, considered one of Murim's foremost young prodigies, might or might not receive a Squad Leader's post. Jin Taekyung had already been raised far above that. And the Jin Family of Taiyuan's growing influence had lately reached as far as Shandong, where the Hwangbo Family was based. Hwangbo Gun had to put a stop to this, whatever it took.

"The Huashan Divine Dragon's appointment as pavilion master is a blessing for Murim. I welcome it wholeheartedly. But Jin Taekyung…"

He deliberately trailed off and glanced at Mae Jonghak. The conversation had gone well so far; surely the Alliance Leader understood what he meant.

Mae Jonghak's answer exceeded even his hopes.

"Now that I think about it, you have a point. I'll consider not only disciplining him, but taking personnel action as well."

"Th-Thank you, Alliance Leader!"

Discipline and personnel action? Hwangbo Gun had never expected it to go this well. As he bowed again and again, Mae Jonghak watched him with a smile, then murmured,

"The teacup is empty."

"Pardon? Oh."

"Time passes quickly these days."

Hwangbo Gun froze for a moment. Then he understood and stood. Family Head or not, he could hardly take up more of the Alliance Leader's time. The time allotted for their private audience—the time it took to drink a cup of tea—had already passed.

"I seem to have stayed too long. Ha ha."

"Hmm? You're leaving?"

Even that polite attempt to keep him there warmed Hwangbo Gun's heart. He had gained more than he'd hoped for, and he appreciated Mae Jonghak's consideration for his dignity. The bond they had forged during the Great Faction War felt stronger than ever.

“I can’t take up any more of your valuable time. I’ll take my leave, Alliance Leader.”

“Then I suppose it can’t be helped.”

“Yes. I’ll be going.”

“Take care. I’ll see you again.”

Pat, pat.

Someone else might have offended Hwangbo Gun by patting the Family Head of the Hwangbo Family on the shoulder. But this was the Number One Sword Under Heaven, the Alliance Leader of the Murim Alliance. Hwangbo Gun left with a broad smile.

Moments later—

Clack.

The door opened, and a man entered the office. His prosthetic leg made a dull sound as he walked.

“For the Family Head of the Hwangbo Family to request a private audience over something like this… He must have been desperate.”

“That fellow seems to have neglected his martial arts training. His personality has changed a little, too.”

“Pardon?”

“It’s nothing. Sit down.”

Mae Jonghak looked at the hand he had used to pat Hwangbo Gun’s shoulder, then offered his visitor a seat.

The Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho, cast a brief glance at the teacup Hwangbo Gun had not even half emptied before speaking.

“Some people are unhappy with the recent appointments.”

“Hmm. Is that so?”

“They met in secret before the Hwangbo Family Head requested his audience.”

“That can happen.”

“Rather than oppose you directly, they seem to have urged him on.”

“Come to think of it, Hwangbo Gun always did tend to put himself forward. He even stood at the vanguard during the battle in Guizhou.”

“…Hoo.”

Mae Jonghak’s eyes widened at Song Ho’s sigh.

“Hmm? What is it?”

“That’s not what I’m talking about.”

“In the end, aren’t we talking about people? Ha ha.”

Song Ho started to answer, then paused.

Mae Jonghak wasn't wrong. It came down to who did what, and how. Now and then, he would toss off a remark like that, and Song Ho would sense a depth of insight in it.

"In any case, you made the Hwangbo Family Head a promise you can't keep."

"A promise?"

"Didn't you say you would discipline the Black Dragon Demon Gate and the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, and take appropriate personnel action?"

"Ah, yes. I did. I'm thinking about that now."

"Alliance Leader, you can't—"

"Wait. Give me a moment."

Mae Jonghak scratched his chin. A moment later, he spoke again.

"All right. I'm done. Then let's pretend the whole thing never happened."

"Pardon?"

"I've considered it, and I don't think personnel action is necessary. There should be some discipline, but I can decide on that later."

"…!"

Song Ho stared at him, his eyes trembling, then let out a disbelieving laugh.

"Of course. You only said you would consider it, Alliance Leader."

"Even so, he was once a comrade I fought alongside. Shouldn't I keep my promise?"

"The Hwangbo Family Head is going to clutch the back of his neck."

"Oh. Don't you think he'll understand?"

"Ha ha. I wonder."

"I was sincere. If he doesn't understand, there's nothing I can do."

Song Ho struggled to hold back his laughter. Mae Jonghak was far better suited to the role of Alliance Leader than he had expected. He was so easygoing by nature that he could let almost anything pass with That can happen. However hard others pressed him, the pressure never seemed to touch him.

His inner resolve is upright and firm.

He was more than Song Ho had hoped for. Song Ho addressed him with genuine feeling.

"Alliance Leader."

"What is it?"

"I just felt like calling you."

"Hmm. That can happen."

"Ha ha ha!"

Mae Jonghak tilted his head at Song Ho's laughter.

“Oh, right. How are matters with the Nanman Beast Palace and the North Sea Ice Palace?”

Song Ho’s smile faded.

“Neither has replied yet. We sent the letters to both earlier than planned, but they’re a long way off…”

“I see.”

“Yes. But as you know, things are going well with the Green Forest Alliance and the Yangtze River Channel League. Both Alliance Leaders have said they’ll come to Henan in person.”

Neither organization belonged to the orthodox faction, but their leaders were unquestionably giants of the martial world. They commanded forces to rival the great sects and had outstanding masters among their ranks.

“They’ll be a great help if they join us.”

Mae Jonghak gave a small nod, then spoke again.

“Oh. About the discipline.”

“The discipline? Ah, yes.”

“I’ll dictate it. Write a letter and deliver it to the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon—no, to Pavilion Master Jin.”

“As you command.”

Song Ho cupped his hands respectfully. Jin Taekyung’s role from here on would be crucial. Even if the punishment was severe, he had to remain a pavilion master.

I couldn’t believe my eyes or ears.

“Discipline? For me?”

The martial artist from the Alliance Leader’s Office nodded.

“Yes.”

“Why all of a sudden? And this punishment is too harsh.”

“I’ve delivered the message. I’ll be going.”

Whoosh!

What kind of situation is this supposed to be?

I stared blankly after him as he vanished like the wind. Hyuk Mujin came over and asked cautiously,

“Discipline? What did they say?”

I let out a long sigh.

“I have to go hungry.”

“Pardon?”

“I have to skip dinner.”

“…?”
“Ugh, I was going to have roast duck tonight.”
I grumbled under my breath and kicked Hyuk Mujin in the butt.
“Enough. Let’s go.”
“What kind of punishment is that? And where are we going?”
“To recruit some teammates.”
“Whaaat?”

Chapter 538

I looked at Hyuk Mujin, whose eyes had gone wide.

“What are you so surprised about? Once you become a pavilion master, of course you need to recruit people.”

“No, that’s true, but…”

“But what?”

Hyuk Mujin stared at me in disbelief.

“I’m more concerned about the punishment. What’s with that bizarre order? It’s like a children’s prank.”

“I hear our Alliance Leader personally issued that bizarre, prank-like order.”

“Hmm. On second thought, the punishment must have some profound meaning. Food, clothing, and shelter are the most important things in life. To order you to skip dinner, of all things, must carry some deeper significance…”

“…”

Don’t force meaning onto it, you idiot.

They say that once you’re famous, people will applaud even when you take a shit. That fit this situation perfectly.

I gave Hyuk Mujin a long look. He’d changed his tune the instant I mentioned Mae Jonghak.

“You think it’s bullshit too.”

“…Yes.”

“Then shut up and follow me. And stop worrying about the punishment.”

I shook my head, opened the door, and stepped outside. Hyuk Mujin hurried after me, muttering as he went.

“Wouldn’t it be stranger not to worry? You were appointed pavilion master less than two shichen[2509] ago, and you’re already being punished. Did you take a dump in the Alliance Leader’s room?”

Coming from the guy who’d singled me out as the only person who could have taken a dump in a crowded inn. I clicked my tongue.

“Filthy idea. Creative, though. You’re close, but wrong.”

“Close but wrong? Did you pee in there?”

…This bastard.

I held back the urge to punch him and answered.

“Apparently, some people feel shitty about me becoming a pavilion master.”

“Oh.”

[2509] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; two shichen are approximately four hours.

"Well, that's how the world works."

Pavilion Master of the Two Dragons Pavilion.

That was my official title.

At first, I'd been pleasantly surprised by how cool it sounded. Then I'd learned that a pavilion master of the Murim Alliance held a far more important position than I'd imagined.

I had no idea it was this big a deal.

The title carried that much weight.

A regiment fell directly under a pavilion master, along with the various squads that made up the regiment. Given the Murim Alliance's current size, the position could mean commanding anywhere from several hundred to more than a thousand martial artists.

Not a position someone my age could even dream of.

Until now, the Murim's organizational structure hadn't been my concern.

If I had to put something on my résumé, I'd served as captain of a reconnaissance unit when war broke out between the Jin Family of Taiyuan and the Mount Heng Sword Sect. That was about it.

Afterward…

I wandered all over the damn place.

Maybe I was born under a wandering star. Ever since I'd finished my year of training on Mount Jiuhua and come down from the mountain, I'd done little but travel. Sometimes I couldn't tell whether I was a martial artist or a traveling peddler.

But my long freelance career had ended today.

The problem was that several company executives weren't happy about my promotion to full-time employee.

"Who do you think they are?" Mujin asked.

"Who else?"

"Hmm. A few names do come to mind…"

"Then you've got your answer. It's one of them."

The Hwangbo Family was probably the biggest reason for this punishment, but I didn't need to spell out every detail for Hyuk Mujin.

I expected something like this, anyway.

Even the kindest, friendliest person in the world couldn't avoid jealous looks. Someone as round as a balloon would still get knocked this way and that. So what chance did a sharp-edged, sixteen-sided polygon like me have?

No. This is better.

A balloon lost its air when people came at it with words or weapons. Better to be a sixteen-sided polygon that didn't take so much as a scratch.

That was how Jin Taekyung had lived, and that was how he would keep living.

“If they keep poking at me, I’ll just smash them.”

“What?”

“Nothing. Let’s go.”

I lightly smacked the back of Hyuk Mujin’s head as he stared at me in confusion, then kept walking.

The news of the Murim Alliance’s new young pavilion master must have already spread, because the gazes of the martial artists walking along the main road were burning with interest.

“See him over there? That’s Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung…”

“Shh. Don’t call him by name so casually. Haven’t you heard? He’s a pavilion master of the great Murim Alliance now.”

“Oh, come on. Does that matter? Don’t pick a fight over nothing. He’s barely twenty—young enough to be my son. He’s just a kid.”

The middle-aged martial artist’s companion clicked his tongue.

“A kid? Has all that martial arts training hardened your brain?”

“What did you say?”

“Just look at yourself, Brother. You’ve joined the Murim Alliance too, haven’t you? Then Great Hero Jin is practically your superior. And you may be old enough to have a son, but you don’t look like you have one.”

“Well, that’s true, but… Why bring that up?”

“Because I don’t want to get dragged down with you. The Enforcement Hall’s martial artists are patrolling Henan with their eyes wide open. I’d rather not be hauled away for insulting a superior just because I was standing next to you.”

The middle-aged martial artist scowled.

“Are you picking a fight with me?”

“I’m not—oh, forget it. No wonder you’re still unmarried at your age. Watch that loose mouth of yours.”

“Fine. I will, you fucker.”

“What was that? You goddamn son of a bitch…”

Are these people insane? How do they even manage to fight like that?

What are they, some kind of battle species?

Maybe the planet Murim was on was actually Planet Vegeta.[2510]

Armed with that perfectly reasonable suspicion, I scanned the crowd for yellow hair. More whispers drifted my way.

“What do you think? Should I make an impression on him now?”

“Are you thinking of applying to the Two Dragons Pavilion?”

[2510] Planet Vegeta is the homeworld of the battle-loving Saiyans in Dragon Ball. The reference to yellow hair recalls their golden-haired Super Saiyan form.

“Hmm. I’m considering it. Blazing Flame Divine Dragon is much younger than me, but they say his martial arts already rival those of the great sects’ Sect Leaders.”

“Could he really be that strong? And even if the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon’s martial arts are as impressive as the rumors say, you should stay away.”

“Why?”

“Think carefully about everything the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon has done until now. Even if he has the worst luck in the world, how does he manage to choose nothing but deadly situations every time he moves? Accomplishing great deeds is all well and good, but if someone at our level joined the Two Dragons Pavilion, whew.”

“Still, shouldn’t we try to accomplish something?”

“If you want to put up your tombstone first, go ahead. Besides, the Two Dragons Pavilion has two pavilion masters. You might be better off with the Huashan Divine Dragon. Isn’t he the youngest Disciple the Alliance Leader raised like his own grandson? The Alliance is bound to look after him.”

“You might die even faster there.”

“Hm? Why?”

“I heard the snake the Huashan Divine Dragon keeps with him bites people.”

“…Oh dear.”

Word traveled fast.

If this were modern times, the Murim Alliance would have an online petition board by now.

> The Huashan Divine Dragon’s snake bit me in the crotch. I demand punishment. Please lend me your support.
>
> └ Thousand-Faced Fox*: Agreed.
>
> └ Gung Gi*: Agreed.
>
> └ Jeok Cheon*: □□[2511], that, snake, bastard, I knew, it would do something like this one day,,!
>
> └ Cheong*: That’s not true. Mimi doesn’t bite people.
>
> └ Tang Sa*: Ah, Mimi…

Once the comments piled up and ten thousand people signed in favor of punishment, Mimi’s fate would be sealed. Hmm.

That was when I was spreading my imagination’s wings.

“Was it about half an hour ago? I heard a commoner passing down the main road saw the snake, panicked, and fell while backing away. He was hurt a little.”

“Oh dear. What happened then?”

[2511] □□ (kk) is Korean internet shorthand for laughter, similar to “lol.”

“I heard that some young medical apprentice who was with the Huashan Divine Dragon took him to a medical clinic. Since it happened because he startled himself, it isn’t that serious—ugh.”

The martial artist cut himself off with a gasp.

I’d come up within a step of him. His eyes shook as he stared at me.

“G-Great Hero Jin?”

“Ah, don’t be startled. It’s nothing serious. I just wanted to ask you something.”

“W-What is it?”

“Where’s that clinic?”

“The clinic? Ah, go straight down that way…”

Still stiff with surprise, he raised a hand to point it out.

I gave him a small nod of thanks and turned in the direction he indicated. Hyuk Mujin looked puzzled.

“Why are we going to a clinic all of a sudden?”

“I told you. I’m looking for a teammate.”

“What? Cheongpung?”

“…How would that work?”

This wasn’t going to be some Cheongpung team without Cheongpung. Cheongpung was a pavilion master in his own right now. I couldn’t put him under my command.

“Think before you speak. Think.”

“Then who else at the clinic could you possibly recruit besides Cheong—”

Hyuk Mujin stopped. His eyes widened.

“No way. You can’t mean…”

“Who knows?”

I left him with that and quietly spoke in my mind.

Open the Quest Window.

Ding.

A cheerful chime sounded, and a translucent holographic window appeared in midair.

It was the first Quest I’d received upon joining the Murim Alliance as Pavilion Master of the Two Dragons Pavilion.

SYSTEM

Quest
Become My Companion!
At last, you have become a member of the Murim Alliance and been appointed Pavilion Master of the Two Dragons Pavilion.
However, one person cannot be an organization. The Murim Alliance has therefore entrusted you with the authority to appoint personnel.
Find new members as quickly as possible, form your organization, and give it a name. Only then will you become a pavilion master in the truest sense!
Grade: Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission:
Secure at least five companions (Incomplete)
Give the organization an appropriate name (Incomplete)
Reward: ???
Failure: Acquire the Title “Loner”

“…”

Look at that Title. Fuck.

If I failed this Quest, I’d be an outsider officially recognized by the System.

I had to succeed. And with all the trouble ahead, I needed to choose my members carefully.

Leave out anyone who’d follow me without being asked. I need someone I can persuade to come over first—and someone who’ll be a big help.

That was what came to mind the instant I checked the Quest. And I didn’t have to think for long.

The first person I should recruit had practically been decided from the start.

His personality’s pretty damn nasty, but…

He could help in all kinds of ways.

Whatever. Might as well try.

I took a deep breath and headed for the clinic.

“Tony Tony Cho[2512]—no, Mungyeong. Become my companion!”

That lunatic’s acting up again.

[2512] “Tony Tony Cho” begins the name Tony Tony Chopper, the reindeer doctor in One Piece. Taekyung cuts himself off before saying Mungyeong’s name.

Mungyeong wasn’t even surprised anymore. Jin Taekyung was always like this.

Jin Taekyung had called Mungyeong out of the blue, saying that the two of them had something to discuss privately, only to start spouting nonsense.

“No.”

“What? Why not?”

Asking why was ridiculous. There were more reasons than Mungyeong could count. But right now, he had a better answer.

“I’ve already agreed to join another group.”

“…What?”

“You got here a step too late. Isn’t that right?”

“Uh, sorry, Benefactor.”

A figure appeared with the sudden voice. Jin Taekyung’s eyes widened as he looked at Cheongpung.

Chapter 539

The Slaughter Saint.

He had entered the world as an assassin, despised by all, and risen at last to become a star that lit the heavens.

He had torn down the fence that admitted only a chosen few, becoming living proof of the four words Might Makes Right.

Yet most people knew neither his age nor his face—not even his name. Assassins worked in the deepest secrecy. They did not reveal themselves.

Decades passed, and the veil over the Slaughter Saint never lifted.

The Slaughter Saint had vanished without a trace immediately after the war ended. He did not show himself even once for a long time, and the words that spilled from the mouths of ordinary people traveled a thousand li, ten thousand li,[2513] without needing feet.

The Slaughter Saint is dead!

That was half true and half false.

On the day the Martial God defeated the Heavenly Demon and a hundred thousand demon soldiers fell, an old man in a bamboo hat buried something on an unnamed hill before walking away.

It was not only his beloved weapon, stained with blood. He buried the name Slaughter Saint with it.

The Slaughter Saint died, and Mungyeong emerged into the world. In time, the world began calling him by another name.

The Divine Physician.

The Yangtze has many tributaries, but all their waters join the same river.

Mungyeong was a river like that, bearing two names: the greatest assassin in history and the greatest physician under heaven.

To put it simply…

My number-one recruitment target.

That more than qualified him for a place aboard my Going Murim ship.[2514]

Sure, spending time with him meant the occasional attempt on my life. But I'd rather shit blood a few times than die because we ran into a monster like the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

Black cat, white cat. As long as it caught mice, what did the color matter?

[2513] This uses the Chinese li, approximately 500 m (0.311 mi). A thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,110 mi).

[2514] "Going Murim" plays on the Going Merry, the ship in the manga and anime series One Piece.

It was a shame my first recruitment target wasn't a cute little deer with horns, but a former assassin who wanted to kill me roughly three times a day. I didn't have much choice.

Who cares about his personality? He has the strongest damage output and healer abilities, too.

Right. That was enough.

In this harsh Murim, where I couldn't even get my hands on a cheap potion, I needed Mungyeong. Even if he never saved me, he might save someone traveling with us when their life was in danger.

The problem was that, in my confidence, I'd overlooked one person.

"Hehe."

"…?"

"Hello, Benefactor."

"…!"

Hello, my ass. What was going on?

No way.

I stared at Cheongpung, my eyes trembling, and finally managed to speak.

"…Why are you coming out of there?"

"Oh, well. I was passing by earlier."

"No, I know why you came here. I mean—"

This was driving me insane. Seriously.

Mungyeong watched me stammer without a trace of expression and answered for him.

"I told you. You were a step too late."

Cheongpung smiled brightly.

"Hehe. That's how it happened, Benefactor."

It was the one blow that turned my suspicion into certainty. I looked back and forth between them in silence for a moment before managing to part my lips.

"Is this for real?"

Mungyeong nodded.

"It probably isn't a legend."

"Then it really happened?"

"Yes. It really happened."

"Why?"

"I have no reason to tell you."

"Fair enough. But I think I could give up gracefully if I heard it from you."

Mungyeong clicked his tongue.

"You're making an ugly business of it."

"What if I still want to hear it, even if I have to be filthy?"

"Then I'll have to find a cleaner way to settle it."

Shing.

Something silver glinted at the end of his long sleeve. I rubbed my eyes at the sight of the short sword that had popped out like a jack-in-the-box.

"Maybe I'm tired and my eyes are going bad. Why is that coming out now?"

"Because using this would be clean."

"Maybe, but wouldn't it make a mess around here?"

"That doesn't matter. I know a number of methods."

"…"

He must have picked up a few tricks in all his years as an assassin. I had no desire whatsoever to see any of them firsthand.

"Whew. I'll be going."

"Go. Forever."

"See you later, Benefactor!"

I turned away after those two very different farewells.

This is driving me crazy.

Cheongpung had beaten me to it. I hadn't seen that coming at all.

The Cheongpung I knew should have had a meat dumpling in one hand and a vegetable dumpling in the other, trying to decide which to eat first.

Did he put points into Intelligence instead of me…?

Nothing for it. I'd have to move fast and recruit other people first.

Hyuk Mujin was loitering by the clinic entrance. He hurried over when he spotted me.

"Did it go well—… From your face, I'm guessing not."

Hyuk Mujin blinked after hurriedly correcting himself upon seeing my face.

"I don't see Mungyeong. Does that mean…?"

"Can't you tell?"

"Huh. He turned down the Captain's offer? He's better at judging a situation than he looks— I mean, I'm joking. Please, I'm begging you. Put your fist down."

"Make one more joke and it will become your last will."

Hyuk Mujin backed away to secure a safe distance before speaking in a solemn voice.

"There is one way."

"A way?"

"Yes."

He sounded so sure of himself that I couldn't help listening. I was grasping at a rotten rope, but I asked anyway.

"What is it?"

"How about I try talking some sense into him? That fellow Mungyeong would do anything I say."

"…"

Hangs on your words, my ass. He'd kill you in the blink of an eye.

If Mungyeong wished, he could turn Hyuk Mujin into a corpse with a single inhale and reduce him to powder with a single exhale.

"Mujin…"

"Don't worry. We've built up a fair amount of affection over the years. If Gung and I go and persuade him, he won't refuse us coldly."

"That's not it, you bastard…"

This bastard was actually trying to commit group suicide now.

I looked at Hyuk Mujin with pity.

"You really hate brothels, huh?"

"What?"

"Never mind. Anyway, don't try to marry him—no, persuade him. Absolutely not."

"Why?"

"Just don't, you bastard."

Hyuk Mujin did not know Mungyeong's true identity, so there was no way their conversation could go anywhere.

I sighed at his aggrieved expression.

"Can you write?"

"Write? I'd make Wang Xizhi[2515] weep."

"Answer properly before I beat you until you cry."

"…I write well enough. Believe it or not, people called me a prodigy when I was little."

"Then write out a few big notices and put one up."

"A notice?"

"Yeah. If it's come to this, we might as well look for some real talent."

The world was vast, and masters were plentiful.

Henan, right now, was a prince's residence[2516] teeming with dragons and tigers.

What's so special about holding a public audition?

If you thought about it, even the imperial examinations were the most traditional audition program in existence. With my fame and eye for talent, it was worth trying.

I pictured applicants flooding in.

[2515] Wang Xizhi was a fourth-century Chinese calligrapher celebrated for his skill.

[2516] A prince's residence was his home before he took the throne. Here it suggests a gathering place for people who may become great figures.

Let’s do it. Fuck it.

Shik, sssshk!

The movements were fast and fluid, unlike anything the onlookers had seen before. Whenever his hands moved as if dancing, the tip of the large needle flashed, and thread stitched the wound closed.

In mere moments, a swordsman who had been slowly dying from a deep slash across his abdomen had a chance to live.

“How can someone so young possess medical skills of this level…!”

“I’ve never even heard of a medical apprentice like him.”

“Good heavens. That’s nearly divine!”

The gathered physicians, from heavily bearded middle-aged men to white-haired elders, stared in astonishment. A voice snapped them back to their senses.

“Finished.”

Tap.

The treatment was over in a flash. More astonishing than its speed was the fact that it had been done perfectly.

Mouths agape, the physicians turned to the speaker as he rose from his seat.

“H-How can this be?”

“Hey!”

He looked too young to call a young man, yet something about him made boy seem wrong as well.

Mungyeong gathered his belongings and stood.

“Are there any patients left?”

The physicians exchanged glances, then shook their heads all at once.

“N-No, but…”

“Th-That’s right. It’s all thanks to you.”

This was hardly the first time the young medical apprentice had astonished them.

About one shichen[2517] earlier, he had arrived with a patient whose injuries were minor. He’d taken one look at the people lying there and remarked:

“This won’t take long.”

Then he’d begun treating them one by one, so quickly and so thoroughly that the physicians who’d come over to scold him and throw him out couldn’t tear themselves away.

Can medicine like this truly exist?

Who is he?

[2517] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

They had waited until now to ask about his identity. But when they finally did, the young medical apprentice's answer was utterly calm.

"Then that settles it. I'll be going now."

"W-Wait! I have a mountain of questions for you!"

"What is your master's name? Could it be…?"

Questions came at him from every side. Mungyeong inclined his head slightly.

"If I have time, I'll stop by once more before I leave and check on the patients."

"You may have been free to enter, but you're not free to leave!"

"Grab him!"

"Forgive me! We can't let you go like this!"

Whoosh! Crash!

The physicians threw themselves at him, but their hands closed on empty air. They didn't so much as brush his collar before tumbling across the floor.

As they stared about in confusion, Mungyeong's voice rang out.

"I left a prescription for each patient where I was sitting. Read them and carry out the treatments as written."

"W-What? Prescriptions?"

"Where? Where are they?"

To physicians, a renowned doctor's prescriptions were like a peerless master's martial arts manual.

Their eyes all but rolling back, the physicians launched into a fierce struggle over the dozens of prescriptions. Mungyeong slipped outside and walked on, then spoke without warning.

"Come out."

Swish.

With a faint rustle, a figure emerged from behind a large pillar.

"Oh! How did you know?"

"Just because."

"You really are amazing. I thought I'd fool you this time. Hehe."

Mungyeong studied Cheongpung's cheerful face.

"What martial art was that?"

"A footwork technique."

"I know that."

"Oh. I named it Mimi Step."

"Mimi Step?"

"Yes. After our Mimi. Isn't it great?"

Cheongpung's eyes shone. Mungyeong's reply was cold.

"…What an utterly ridiculous name."

"Oh. Ah…"

Cheongpung wilted. Mungyeong watched him, his gaze deepening.

What is with this boy?

The name Mimi Step might be ridiculous, but there was nothing ridiculous about the principles behind those movements.

He created a martial art from the way a snake moves.

Most martial artists spent their entire lives trying to understand a single martial art well enough to make it their own. The boy before him had done that as though it were nothing.

Then, having made it his own, he had recreated it entirely.

This boy… has the makings of a Grandmaster.

Jin Taekyung wasn't the only genius. In some ways, this boy's genius far surpassed his.

Sword Saint, you've raised a monster.

Mungyeong muttered inwardly, then spoke to Cheongpung, who was still looking dejected.

"So why did you offer me your hand?"

"Hmm. Because Benefactor is so amazing."

"Jin Taekyung?"

"Yes. I used to hope Benefactor would catch up with me soon, but… now I feel like he's getting farther away, little by little."

"I see."

Mungyeong understood at once. A genius who had never had anyone to measure himself against was burning with competitive spirit for the first time.

"Are you hoping to learn martial arts from me?"

"No. You don't have to teach me."

"What?"

"I'll watch and learn from you. That's enough. Hehe."

"…!"

Mungyeong paused, then gave a quiet laugh.

What an absurd boy. He meant to learn just by watching—and the martial arts he intended to watch were Mungyeong's.

Yet Mungyeong didn't mind.

"Oh! You smiled."

"…I did not."

"You did. You smiled."

"You impudent little brat."

"Oh. Now you're angry."

"…Brat."

"Would you like some dumplings?"

Mungyeong hesitated, wondering whether to draw his short sword. Instead, he took the dumpling Cheongpung offered and bit into it.

The taste was not bad.

Chapter 540

They say words have no feet, yet travel a thousand li.[2518]

And these days, Henan Province was boiling like a cauldron over a charcoal fire.

Under countless watchful eyes, news that two exceptionally young Divine Dragons had been appointed pavilion masters by special order of the Alliance Leader swept across Henan before two days had passed.

“Have you heard the news?”

“I’ve already heard it, so don’t tell me. Even that yellow dog in the back alley probably knows.”

Whenever two or more people gathered, they talked about the appointments.

Opinions were divided, but many martial artists viewed Jin Taekyung and Cheongpung’s appointments favorably.

“Pavilion masters, huh? Of course. Those two are more than qualified.”

“Still, considering their ages, haven’t they been given too much responsibility?”

“That’s what makes it so impressive. Who else could achieve that kind of might and merit at barely twenty?”

“Now that you mention it, you’re right.”

“Damn it. I can’t stand listening to this.”

“…And who might you be, Brother?”

“Come on. Some people are born into good families, find good masters, learn peerless martial arts, and now they get to be pavilion masters of the Murim Alliance too?”

“By your logic, every young prodigy from the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families would be a Supreme Peak master. And why are you taking it out on us?”

“I got pissed off listening to you, so I butted in.”

But where there was light, there was shadow.

Jin Taekyung and Cheongpung inspired envy as well as admiration. That was true not only of wandering martial artists who had lived rough lives, but also of disciples from prestigious sects and families.

“Damn it. How does this make any sense?”

“There’s nothing we can do. The Alliance Leader himself issued the order. Our Sect Leader told us in no uncertain terms not to say a word about it.”

“And what about you?”

“What good would saying anything do? I’m only a third-generation Disciple. One of [2518] In this Chinese setting, one li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi); a thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi).

my fellow disciples ran his mouth a few shichen[2519] ago and paid for it. Our Senior Martial Uncle was furious. He ordered everyone between him and me to assemble, and…"

"I can imagine."

"Some lunatic even summoned our Master. That really set the mood. We got chewed out until our souls hurt. We even had to hear what we were doing with ourselves when the much younger Blazing Flame Divine Dragon and Huashan Divine Dragon were doing so well."

"What kind of nonsense is that? Why blame us because those two are monsters?"

"Exactly. It's not as if they managed it themselves."

"Wait. Don't tell me…"

"Are you crazy? I didn't say it. But before anyone could stop him, the lunatic who'd summoned our Master came out with it: 'Their masters are the Fire King and the Sword Saint.'"

"Good heavens. Did I hear that right? Look at my arm. I've got goose bumps."

"You think you're bad? Imagine how I and the other Senior Brothers felt after hearing it directly. Even now, I've got goose bumps all the way down to my balls."

"Just so we're clear, you don't need to show me."

"…I wouldn't show you even if you begged. Anyway, things are tense because of those two. Though probably not as tense as they are in the Hwangbo Family."

By then, everyone had heard the rumor that the Shandong Fist Dragon—the Lesser Family Head of the Hwangbo Family and one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes—had suffered a spectacular disgrace.

He had since been appointed Commander of the Murim Alliance's Outer Hall. Between that post and Jin Taekyung's position as a pavilion master directly under the Alliance Leader's Office lay a gulf as wide as heaven and earth.

"I heard the Hwangbo Family Head met privately with the Alliance Leader and demanded punishment…"

"He went around telling everyone himself, so it's probably true. As for the result, you already know."

Hwangbo Gun, the Family Head of the Hwangbo Family, had proudly bragged about his private meeting with the Alliance Leader. Before even half a day had passed, the disciplinary decision arrived, and he had to swallow his humiliation.

> I. Jin Taekyung, Pavilion Master of the Two Dragons Pavilion, privately took one side despite witnessing the dispute before him. He is therefore ordered to fast for a limited period.

[2519] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours. Half a shichen is about one hour.

> II. Taishan of the Black Dragon Demon Gate committed two offenses.
>
> His first offense was causing a dispute on a main road and harming commoners. His second was disregarding the Alliance's rules and wielding a weapon first, thereby failing to follow proper procedure.
>
> However, eyewitness accounts and testimony establish some justification for his actions. He is ordered to pay each person who suffered losses as a result of his actions ten times the amount of their damages.
>
> III. The offense committed by the Shandong Fist Dragon, Hwangbo Ak, is similar to Taishan's.
>
> However, because he was substantially responsible for causing the dispute and made remarks liable to cause trouble, he is ordered to remain under disciplinary confinement for a fixed period.

For Hwangbo Gun, it was enough to drive him mad.

The next day, a rumor spread that Jin Taekyung had polished off ten bowls of gukbap[2520] in one sitting and patted his stomach. That only made matters worse.

The orthodox purists who supported Hwangbo Gun voiced their discontent too. But the shadow cast by the giant known as the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was deep, and they could hardly defy the Alliance Leader's authority over something like this. They had no choice but to swallow their anger.

Amid all that admiration and envy, Jin Taekyung made another extraordinary move just a day after his appointment as Pavilion Master of the Two Dragons Pavilion.

It began with a single notice pasted conspicuously on a wall beside a busy main road.

"Have you seen it?"

"If you mean the news about the Two Dragons Pavilion, I've heard enough to make my ears bleed. Wait. Seen what?"

"About half a shichen ago, some fellow named Hyuk—Hyuk something—put up huge notices all along the main roads."

"Why would I care what Hyuk-whatsisname did?"

"Because that Hyuk-whatsisname is Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung's right-hand man. I read the notice, and apparently the Two Dragons Pavilion is recruiting people."

"What? Is that true?"

[2520] Gukbap is rice served in a bowl of hot soup, a common Korean meal.

“Without a doubt. But the notice is… strange. There are other people here, too, and… No, the whole thing is strange.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“It’s, well… Never mind. Go see and hear it for yourself.”

“…Hear it?”

These days, any news about the Two Dragons Pavilion was a hot topic in Henan.

And now the youngest pavilion master—whose genius and accomplishments were rare even in Murim’s long history—had done something else?

“Ah, I can’t miss this!”

Martial artists with affiliations, martial artists still looking for a place to belong, and even curious commoners came rushing over.

And when they gathered in one place, they finally saw it.

⋆I Was a Nameless Foot Soldier, but in the Two Dragons Pavilion, I’m a Murim Hero?!⋆

The words were written in enormous letters beside a bizarre emblem.

The people gathered before it like clouds all widened their eyes and cried out in astonishment.

“Th-That!”

“Good heavens!”

How could a phrase be so simple, so easy to grasp, and so bold? The lines beneath it caught the eye just as readily.

Recruitment Requirements

First: Someone with the passion to do whatever they set their mind to.

Second: An upright character.

Third: At least the level of injuring others with Sword Energy.

Recruiting around the clock # No one below Peak need apply # Gender and sect affiliation don’t matter # Age doesn’t matter # Life begins at eighty # Hey, you can do it too.

Every line was outrageous!

Simply reading those magnificent words was enough to set blood surging and hearts pounding. Shouts erupted from the crowd.

“Yeah! I can do it too!”

“You too? Me too!”

“Aaaah! The Two Dragons Pavilion is calling me!”

“Damn it! The level of injuring others with Sword Energy!”

Hundreds of people who had read the notice were cheering or groaning when—

Ting-a-ling.

A clear, lively melody rang out from somewhere.

The crowd parted as though by prior agreement. A group appeared and passed through them, walking as if on clouds.

“What’s that…?”

“Isn’t that the band from Honghakru?”

“Why would a band show up here?”

It was one of the ten most famous bands in Henan, and its sudden arrival left everyone bewildered.

Then a breathtakingly beautiful woman appeared before the crowd and smiled.

“Hongmae? It’s Hongmae!”

“Waaaaah!”

Hongmae was Honghakru’s most beautiful singer, a singing courtesan famous for her enchanting voice. She bowed her head with graceful poise, then gave a meaningful glance. The musicians took their cue and began to play.

Ting-a-ling. Chaarang!

The melody was bright and lively.

And the moment the first line flowed from her lips, the martial artists there understood as if under a spell.

“Join the Murim Alliance’s Two Dragons Pavilion, and my era of success begins~”

“…!”

If they wanted to succeed, they had to join the Two Dragons Pavilion.

I’d always been this way. No particular reason—I’d just never liked songs or children all that much.

But today was an exception.

“Heh heh. Those little rascals.”

I smiled contentedly as I listened to the sounds coming through the gap in the window.

Outside, children who looked to be around elementary school age were running around energetically and singing.

“Join the Murim Alliance’s Two Dragons Pavilion, and my era of success begins~!”

“Join the Murim Alliance’s Two Dragons Pavilion, and now more sects are looking for me~!”

“Join the Murim Alliance’s Two Dragons Pavilion, and my life has changed~!”

“A new era, a new hero!”

“The Murim Alliance’s Two Dragons Pavilion!”

The ending was perfect, too.

I gave myself a little round of applause, then noticed Hyuk Mujin staring at me in disbelief.

"What is it, you bastard?"

"…I'm just stunned. I've never seen or heard of anything like this."

"What do you think? Innovative, isn't it?"

Hyuk Mujin nodded reluctantly.

"It definitely works. I just went around checking, and it's chaos out there. You'd think Dark Heaven had invaded."

"I knew it would work. Heh heh."

"That song in particular… It's everywhere. People are saying you've released poison into Murim, Captain."

"What's that supposed to mean? What poison?"

"They say it's more addictive than opium."

"Oh. Ohoho."

Ah, how satisfying.

What a rewarding outcome. A certain cyber university in Seoul might sue me for plagiarism, but this was Murim. (Audio reference)

I'm sorry, and thank you. I'll put the song to good use.

And so the greatest hit of the era was born, destined to mercilessly assault the eardrums of these primitive Murim bumpkins.

I still got a thrill remembering the bandleader's and singer's faces when I'd given them the melody I'd hastily come up with.

They looked like primitive humans discovering fire.

Was this how Prometheus had felt in Greek mythology?

The difference was that, instead of donating my organs to an eagle sent by Zeus, I had to deal with the flood of applicants.

"How is the application process? Are you done?"

Hyuk Mujin looked at me as though I'd lost my mind.

"Are you serious?"

"More than I expected, huh?"

"It's insane. Completely insane. There are so many, I'm starting to wonder if Dark Heaven sent in applications too."

Hmm. It seemed to be even more effective than I'd imagined.

I'd added the requirement of being a Peak master in case something like this happened, but the world was vast, and apparently it had plenty of masters.

"Then let's do this. First…"

I'd just finished thinking it over and begun to speak when—

Crash!

The door broke apart, and someone appeared.

“Join the Murim Alliance’s Two Dragons Pavilion. My era of success begins.”

The most ominous song in the world. A chilling expression.

I froze when I met those glowing red eyes. Fire King Jeok Cheongang spat out his next words.

“This old man nearly suffered qi deviation because of that damn song.”

“…Welcome.”

Chapter 541

Henan was a land with a long and storied history.

It was home to sprawling thousand-year-old capitals such as Kaifeng and Luoyang, cities that had served as the seats of numerous dynasties. It also offered breathtaking natural scenery and all sorts of famous landmarks, including four great mountains.

Visitors came year-round. Naturally, there were plenty of inns, pleasure houses, and other places for entertainment and lodging.

But the old innkeeper, whose family had run the same inn for three generations, could confidently say this street had never been so crowded.

What in the world…?

He stared around in bewilderment at a veritable sea of people.

“Hey, wait a minute! Don’t try to cut in line!”

“Who keeps shoving me?”

“You little pup. You’ve been giving me insolent looks for a while now. Do I have to show you a coffin before you come to your senses?”

“What did you say? I was willing to let it go, but this lowly wandering martial artist is—”

“Heh heh. Everyone’s certainly full of energy. It’s a pleasant sight.”

“Pleasant? It’s been so noisy that I can hardly stand it.”

A wandering martial artist who looked like a wild wolf and a man who appeared to be the scion of a prestigious family glared at each other.

The sight made a half-gray-haired middle-aged man burst into hearty laughter, while a beautiful woman whose age was impossible to guess clicked her tongue.

Countless others stood farther away, watching and whispering among themselves.

What on earth is going on here?

In the middle of the chaos, just as the innkeeper felt his soul halfway leaving his body, a voice reached his ears.

“There’s no need to worry so much.”

“Pardon?”

“Not over there. This way.”

The innkeeper turned again in surprise. An old man sat at a table, leisurely sipping from a wine cup while everyone else waited in line.

“They have their own reasons for being here. There won’t be any serious trouble.”

He was small, with an unruly white beard and a face flushed red with drink.

For a moment, the innkeeper wondered if he might be a martial artist. But he looked for all the world like an ordinary old drunk. The innkeeper gave him a discreet glance, then lowered his voice.

“W-What in the world is going on?”

“They’re all people who want to begin their era of success. You must have heard that song, too. ‘Join the Murim Alliance’s Two Dragons Pavilion, and—‘”

The old man began humming a lively tune.

The innkeeper’s shoulders instinctively began to sway. Then his eyes widened.

“Ah. Are you talking about that… Two Dragons Pavilion?”

“You got it. The young Pavilion Master of that Two Dragons Pavilion is staying right here.”

“Good heavens.”

The innkeeper let out a short gasp.

He had known that the person staying in the detached building was a young knight-errant famous throughout the martial world. But he had never imagined that he was the Pavilion Master of the Two Dragons Pavilion everyone was talking about.

“So that’s why so many martial artists have come here. But even so, I never imagined there would be this many…”

“Heh heh. Isn’t it a fine opportunity? It’s rare to find a place that doesn’t care about your background, gender, or age.”

“That’s true. I heard even an eighty-year-old can apply.”

The old man answered quietly.

“As it happens, that’s exactly what I intend to do.”

“Hahaha! You certainly know how to make a joke.”

“Does that sound like a joke?”

“Pardon?”

“I asked whether that sounded like a joke.”

The innkeeper’s laughter stopped. He stared at the old man, his eyes trembling.

“Th-Then, old man—I mean, sir—you’re applying too?”

“Isn’t that obvious?”

The old man wiped his wine-soaked beard with his sleeve. As his robe shifted, a worn scabbard showed beneath it.

“I’m a martial artist too. Like them. Unlike you.”

“Gasp.”

“There’s no need to be so frightened. This old man doesn’t lay a hand on commoners.”

He paused to consider something, then added softly, “Most of the time.”

“…!”

Not a trace of drunkenness remained in his gentle voice, and for an instant, his eyes held the ferocity of a wild beast.

The innkeeper felt a chill and took an involuntary step back. Just then, someone began coming down the stairs.

Step. Step.

The old man's eyes flashed.

"Is it about to begin?"

He was not the only one who thought so. The dozens of Peak masters waiting in line and the spectators who seemed to outnumber them ten to one all fell silent.

Someone appeared on the stairs.

"How many people have come—whoa! You startled me."

The young man, Hyuk Mujin, jumped in surprise. A flicker of disappointment crossed the faces of those watching.

But the Peak masters, who had sensed his aura long before he appeared, merely muttered calmly.

"He's not the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon."

"He sent a messenger down in his place. Is he already throwing his weight around?"

"He's impressive for a messenger. With that kind of aura at his age, he's better than most second-generation Disciples from prestigious sects."

"I agree. And if it's the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, I suppose he can send someone in his place."

Hyuk Mujin looked sourly at the enormous crowd murmuring around him and cleared his throat.

"Ahem. The Captain—I mean, the Pavilion Master—has ordered me to begin the interviews. I'll call you by name, one at a time. Please follow me when your turn comes."

Reaching the Peak realm meant being recognized as a master anywhere in Murim. The Peak masters all took pride in their abilities, and they were plainly unhappy to be told to wait again. But none complained.

A thirsty man had to dig his own well. Having come here, they had to put up with it.

"I understand perfectly well, so stop spouting nonsense and call the names already."

Hyuk Mujin's eyes widened at the rough-looking middle-aged wandering martial artist.

"Oh. It's true."

"What is?"

"Ah, it's nothing. The Pavilion Master told me to reject anyone who uses informal speech and acts rudely the first time they meet someone, no exceptions. I didn't expect to find someone so quickly."

"…What?"

"Let's see. You're Great Hero No Guisan, the Black Blood Saber, correct? You may go home now."

The Black Blood Saber blinked at him in silence, then roared.

"What kind of bullshit rule is that?"

Hyuk Mujin pulled a bamboo slip bearing the man's personal details from the purse at his waist and nodded.

"It's right here. That kind of rule."

"I waited an entire shichen[2521]!"

"Oh dear. That's unfortunate."

"You insolent little bastard! You think you can act this arrogantly because your master's behind you? Do you really think you'll be safe after this?"

"I think I'll probably be fine."

"You little—!"

"If you keep this up, our Pavilion Master will come down himself and say, 'You bastard!'"

What kind of person was this?

The Black Blood Saber and everyone watching stood with their mouths open.

The Black Blood Saber was a formidable fighter, renowned even among the rough-and-tumble wandering martial artists. People said that if not for his foul temper, he could become the Sect Leader of a school that very day and build it into a mid-level sect.

Yet Hyuk Mujin did not so much as blink before the aura he released.

"You're rejected. Off you go."

For Hyuk Mujin, who had followed Jin Taekyung around and suffered every kind of hell, his composure was only natural. It left even the foul-tempered Black Blood Saber speechless.

That was when—

"Ha! Hahaha!"

Rumble!

A booming laugh erupted from somewhere. The air burst outward, and the ground trembled in tiny shudders.

The Peak masters went rigid as they sensed the source of the overwhelming aura pressing down on them.

What incredible internal energy…!

One level above me. No—two levels.

What in the world…?

[2521] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Every horrified gaze turned toward the old man who had been leisurely sipping his wine moments earlier. He was slowly rising from his seat.

“Don’t make such a commotion. Don’t you feel sorry for the innkeeper?”

He smiled gently at the innkeeper, who lay facedown and trembling. Someone in the crowd cried out, almost screaming.

“O-Old Man Ilyang!”

Old Man Ilyang. Those three words were enough.

He was a master who stood between the orthodox and unorthodox paths and had once dominated an era. His was the sobriquet of a monster who had burned countless opponents to death with his mighty Scorching Yang Qi.

The sudden appearance of a Supreme Peak master froze the entire gathering.

Is that truly Old Man Ilyang?

Th-That old monster… What is he doing here?

No one present could compare to him. It was doubtful they could bring him down even if they all attacked together.

Only one wall separated Peak from Supreme Peak. The distance across it was vast.

Step. Step.

Old Man Ilyang walked leisurely through the silence, then looked at Hyuk Mujin and smiled.

“Go and tell him this old man wishes to meet him.”

“…!”

Another ripple of shock passed through the crowd.

Old Man Ilyang, of all people, wanted to join the Two Dragons Pavilion under a Pavilion Master barely more than a boy. That alone was astonishing. Yet he had made his request so courteously.

“U-Understood. Please wait a moment.”

Hyuk Mujin turned away, flustered. He did not see the ominous heat in Old Man Ilyang’s eyes.

The Fire Gate Clan. The Fire Gate Clan, huh? Heh heh. At long last, an opportunity has come even to this old man.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung? Whether the rumors about him were true did not matter.

He was still a brat barely past twenty. At Old Man Ilyang’s age, he had no intention whatsoever of respectfully serving such a fledgling as his superior. But…

The Fire Gate Clan’s divine technique, passed down to only one person each generation. I will make it mine, whatever it takes.

He had spent his life pursuing strength, yet had never reached the pinnacle of Scorching Yang Qi.

With the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts, he could. He could even claim the title of greatest under heaven.

According to reliable rumors, Fire King Jeok Cheongang won't be joining the Two Dragons Pavilion. That leaves only his young Disciple and the other riffraff.

The moment the Two Dragons Pavilion received a mission and left Henan would be his chance.

Dark Heaven? The Murim Alliance? What did he care what became of Murim's fate?

The corner of his mouth, covered in age spots, twitched.

"Heh heh. Hahaha."

Before Old Man Ilyang's eyes, the five characters for greatest under heaven were already shimmering.

Eighty-five years old.

Name: Won Cheol.

Sobriquet: Old Man Ilyang.

His martial arts realm was Supreme Peak.

It was a practically perfect profile, without a single thing to criticize.

But the special judge he had suddenly found himself facing had a different opinion.

"He's got the eyes of a bastard who'd stab you in the back the first chance he got."

"Pardon?"

There was no need to ask what he meant. Jeok Cheongang had already closed the distance and was smashing his fist into Old Man Ilyang's mouth.

Whoosh!

Extreme Yang energy surged from the blow, enough to turn anything in its path to ash.

Old Man Ilyang sucked in a sharp breath and hurriedly crossed his arms to block it, but the difference in strength was obvious.

That's bad.

Even Scorching Yang Qi had its levels. If Old Man Ilyang's qi was an ordinary flame, Fire King Jeok Cheongang's was lava.

That difference became clear in an instant.

Crunch. Wham!

Bones shattered, and Old Man Ilyang's eyes lost focus.

I watched with genuine regret and shouted, "No! The ace—!"

But once Jeok Cheongang's fist began spitting fire, it did not stop.

Wham! Wham! Wham-wham-wham!

Arms, legs, stomach, back, face.

As if to show off his regained youth, he drove qi-packed punches into every part of Old Man Ilyang's body. With each blow, tangible Scorching Yang Qi enveloped the area.

Wow. I'm seeing the pit of fire right here.

Was this audition genre hip-hop?

One Sun[2522]—no, Old Man Ilyang, who had not even received a necklace, lost consciousness without managing a single proper counterattack.

Thud.

Old Man Ilyang collapsed like crumbling ash. Jeok Cheongang stood looking down at him, then muttered, "Now I remember this bastard. He's the son of a bitch who said he was after our sect's martial arts."

"…I'm glad you had a reason, at least. I thought you'd gone mad, Old Master."

"Better late than never. I can't stand the sight of him, so get him out of here."

Not long after Old Man Ilyang's corpse—or rather, his body—was carried away, a commotion broke out outside.

I glanced through the window. Terrified applicants were fleeing, even using their movement techniques to get away.

"…Oh, for fuck's sake."

Do they have any idea what it took to arrange this? The audition was completely fucked. Seriously.

Jeok Cheongang caught my resentful look and answered bluntly.

"What do you want me to do?"

"You could've gone a little easier on him. Wanting to get his hands on some martial arts isn't a capital crime. He hadn't actually done anything yet. You could've just rejected him quietly."

"Tsk, tsk. What an innocent fool. People like that always cause trouble eventually. You have to stamp out a spark before it becomes a fire."

"…Don't people usually say you should uproot weeds?"

"You can leave weeds alone. A spark can burn down a mountain."

I mean, what was he, the chairman of a forest conservation society?

I was muttering inwardly in disbelief when Jeok Cheongang continued.

"And…"

"What now?"

He jerked his chin toward the window.

"When someone leaves, someone else comes."

[2522] One Sun is a Korean rapper associated with hip-hop audition shows, where contestants who pass an initial round receive a necklace.

“Huh?”

Chapter 542

You could tell a lot about a person from the way they walked.

That was especially true of martial artists. Their footsteps revealed more than most people would think.

Someone who relied on brute strength in their martial arts tended to walk heavily and roughly. Someone who practiced a more graceful art—or worked as an assassin—might move so lightly you could barely hear them.

Whoever was coming up the stairs now wasn't just announcing his presence. His footsteps were practically screaming it.

Thud. Thud. Thud.

Listen to that.

The noise was heavy enough to make an ordinary person's heart sink. With every step, the solidly built staircase creaked and a faint tremor ran through the floor.

Jeok Cheongang had already taken the gourd from his side and begun sipping from it. He spoke with a grave expression.

"Dark Heaven. Now they're turning people into monsters. What sort of trick did they use?"

"Huh?"

For a moment, I had no idea what he meant. Then I understood and waved a hand.

"Sorry to interrupt, but the guy coming up isn't from Dark Heaven."

"Hmm. He's no one to worry about, regardless. Knock him down as soon as he opens the door and comes in. Hand him over to the Murim Alliance, and we may get something useful out of him."

"…He's not from Dark Heaven. And you already smashed the door, Old Master. What door are you talking about?"

"What?"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes went wide as he spoke, spraying spit.

"You mean that fellow coming up is a pure human?"

"Amazingly, he's all-natural."

"Well, you do see some things if you live long enough. The qi I sense from him isn't particularly pure, though."

Hyuk Mujin had returned after taking the injured man downstairs. Wiping his palm, still slick with Old Man Ilyang's blood, on his trouser leg, he answered.

"Ah, as expected of Great Hero Jeok. You recognized demonic, heterodox arts at once."

"Demonic, heterodox arts?"

"Yes. The Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate and his subordinate."

The thundering footsteps had drowned out the other sound, but there had been two people coming up from the start.

At last, they appeared through the doorway Jeok Cheongang had blown wide open.

“This junior of Murim, Sama Pyo, pays his respects to Great Hero Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King.”

Tall and handsome. The moment I saw him, my mouth felt as gritty as if I’d bitten into sand.

Two words had flashed through my mind.

Former fiancé.

Whether he knew what I was thinking or not, Sama Pyo clasped his hands in greeting to Jeok Cheongang, then nudged the hulking figure standing blankly beside him.

“What are you doing? Pay your respects.”

Tiger Giant Child Taishan, whose name and epithet fit him perfectly, bent at the waist.

“Nice to meet. Taishan saw Fire King.”

“…”

That was a new one.

I stole a glance at Jeok Cheongang. He looked ready to introduce Taishan to Yama[2523] instead of the Fire King.

Sama Pyo seemed to notice and quickly explained.

“As you may have guessed, his vocabulary is limited. That’s the best he can do.”

“…In that case, I suppose it can’t be helped.”

Jeok Cheongang muttered, looking less than pleased.

“I’ve seen some strange fellows in my time. Fine. This old man has seen you too.”

“Heh heh.”

Taishan smiled innocently and gave him two thumbs up.

“Fire King. Strong. Taishan likes strong people. Nice to meet.”

“Y-Yes. This old man is pleased to meet you too.”

“But Taishan. Hungry.”

“W-What?”

“Want to eat that. If Fire King says yes, Taishan grateful.”

His hungry eyes had already moved past our shoulders.

Jeok Cheongang spotted the refreshments on the table and nodded before he quite knew what he was doing.

“G-Go ahead.”

“Wow! Refreshments! Taishan thanks you for the food!”

[2523] Yama is the ruler of the underworld in Buddhist tradition.

Thud! Crack!

The innkeeper was going to weep tears of blood.

The enormous man charged forward, smashing what remained of the door on his way in. As though he'd been waiting for permission, Taishan swept up everything on the table. Jeok Cheongang watched him in a daze.

"Have I lived too long?"

Even Jeok Cheongang couldn't help being taken aback.

Then again, he was used to people cowering the moment they heard the words Fire King. Aside from Cheongpung, this might be the first formidable opponent he'd encountered.

Anyway.

I scratched the back of my head and looked Sama Pyo up and down.

"So. What brings you here?"

"I have important business. If it's all right with you, I'd rather discuss it inside."

"It's not all right with me."

Sama Pyo shrugged.

"I asked out of courtesy, but you really aren't ordinary. Do you also harbor ill feelings toward the demonic, heterodox path?"

"It's not that, exactly…"

Damn it. Put that way, I didn't have much of an answer.

I had only met him once, but my first impression of him had not been particularly bad. Nor was I some hardcore zealot who shouted about eradicating the heterodox path and glorifying the orthodox faction whenever I got the chance.

Jeok Cheongang didn't seem to feel much differently.

"What are you two doing standing there? Falling for each other?"

With Jeok Cheongang saying that, I had no good reason to keep Sama Pyo out. I jerked my chin toward him.

"Damn it. Come in, then."

"Thank you. And thank you, Great Hero Jeok."

Sama Pyo entered with a polite bow. Jeok Cheongang nodded.

"The young brat has some manners. Or did he inherit his father's sly streak?"

Sama Pyo paused, then smiled.

"Probably the latter. So you remember my father."

"I'd forgotten him until I saw your face. You're the spitting image of the Black Night King in his younger days."

Black Night King Sima Gong.

Sama Pyo's father, and the man who had built the Black Dragon Demon Gate into what it was today.

His epithet made him sound like one of the Ten Kings, but according to Gung Gibang, he had nothing to do with them.

Just like the Green Forest Battle King, the Green Forest Alliance Leader, and the Escort King of the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

They were Supreme Peak masters whose martial prowess was beyond most people's reach. That still wasn't enough to make them part of the legend of the Ten Kings.

Black Night King Sima Gong, one of the greatest masters in the unorthodox martial world and the Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, had apparently received the title in much the same way.

"Still…"

Jeok Cheongang studied Sama Pyo, then frowned.

"I didn't know the Black Night King had a son so young."

"I have seven older brothers and nine older sisters. I'm the youngest."

"Hah. The Virility Saber King would weep if he heard that. So you're the Young Sect Leader."

Sama Pyo's eyes widened slightly.

"I am, but how did you—"

"Isn't it obvious?"

Jeok Cheongang snorted.

"Given the Black Night King's personality, that is exactly what he would do. If your talent was sufficient, he wouldn't care even if it meant burying all his other children alive as sacrifices."

"…"

"He hasn't changed much, then. You could never tell what that man was thinking. Sly as a fox and cunning as a viper."

Look at him, casually throwing a parent insult right to his face. My heart almost swelled with awe.

The insult implied he recognized Sama Pyo's talent, but it was still an insult. Before the dutiful son could take offense and start something, I cut in.

"So what brings you here?"

"…Hmm. Well."

Sama Pyo's expression was hard to read. He reached inside his robe and took something out.

Paper—a fairly expensive commodity in Murim. The words at the top caught my eye at once.

I stared at the sheet he'd laid on the table and rubbed my chin.

"This looks familiar."

Sama Pyo gave a quiet laugh.

"It would."

"I don't know who came up with it, but they're a genius."

"It's rather bold, too."

Tap.

Sama Pyo's long finger came down on one part of the sheet: the recruitment requirements Hyuk Mujin had scrawled in his terrible handwriting. Of all the lines beneath them, he pointed to one in particular.

> # Gender and sect affiliation don't matter

His soft voice continued.

"I especially like this part."

"So?"

"I'd like to apply. To the Two Dragons Pavilion."

I'd suspected as much, but hearing him say it still left me with mixed feelings.

I thought for a moment, then clicked my tongue.

"Why?"

"The moment I heard the song, I had a feeling. This is exactly the place I've been looking for."

"Yeah. Bullshit."

That wasn't even funny.

The song promised a new era of success, more sects seeking you out, and a changed life. None of that applied to Sama Pyo.

The Black Dragon Demon Gate was one of the three most powerful sects in the unorthodox martial world. Even if Sama Pyo hadn't been its Young Sect Leader, being born the Black Night King's son all but guaranteed him wealth and status.

And he wants to join the Two Dragons Pavilion?

Even if the orthodox faction's diehards held up picket signs and protested, Sama Pyo was more than capable of securing a position within the Murim Alliance.

I folded my arms and stared at him.

"If this is a joke, it's not funny."

"Fortunately, I'm serious."

"Cut the bullshit. What's the real reason?"

"The notice didn't say I had to give one."

"Then get lost. I won't see you out."

Sama Pyo shrugged as though he had no choice.

“I thought that if I joined the Two Dragons Pavilion, I might be able to shed the label of belonging to the demonic, heterodox path.”

“You don’t seem all that eager to shed it.”

“Is that really how I seem?”

“I don’t trust you.”

“Fair enough. Then I’ll speak frankly.”

“Go on. Unless you want the shit beaten out of you.”

Sama Pyo gave a quiet laugh. Then his expression hardened.

A low voice slipped from between his perfectly smooth lips and pierced my ears.

“I intend to use you for my own benefit. Depending on the circumstances, you will become a useful card to me in one way or another.”

A heavy silence fell.

Even Taishan, who had been chewing noisily without pause, stopped moving. Hyuk Mujin stared back and forth between Sama Pyo and me with eyes as wide as lanterns.

Then someone broke the silence.

“What an interesting fellow.”

Jeok Cheongang was watching Sama Pyo with an expression I couldn’t read. Was he amused or angry? He turned to me.

“What do you think?”

I considered it for a moment.

“He makes quite an impression. I doubt this is his first interview.”

“Will you take him?”

“Hard to say.”

Black Dragon Saber Sama Pyo. I couldn’t tell how much of what he’d said was a joke and how much he meant.

But one thing was certain.

He’s interesting.

Tap. Tap.

The only sound echoing through the silence was the tapping of fingers against the table.

I gathered my thoughts in that brief silence and looked Sama Pyo straight in the eye.

“Let’s make one thing clear first.”

“By all means.”

“If you try anything—”

“Summary execution,” Sama Pyo said before I could finish. “I’ll remember.”

“Huh. Straight to the point.”

“It’s only natural. Are we done, then?”

“You haven’t been accepted yet. I’m only keeping you under consideration for now. For today, go.”

“Very well.”

What in the world was this man after?

I watched Sama Pyo and Taishan prepare to leave, my curiosity only growing. Then I remembered one important thing.

“And one more thing.”

“…?”

“You’re paying for that guy’s food.”

“…!”

Chapter 543

Thud. Thud.

Footsteps shook the ground, and people on the street moved aside to clear a path.

Black Dragon Saber Sama Pyo knew the wary looks were not because of Taishan walking beside him.

The rumors about us have spread, then.

It would have been stranger if they hadn't.

A grimy yellow knot protruded from the belt of a beggar dozing against an alley wall. Faint calluses marked the palm of a stallkeeper swatting at flies.

The Beggars' Sect. The Lower District Sect.

And those were only the ones he could spot at a glance.

Countless eyes watched him wherever he went in Henan. Before half a day had passed, word of what he had done today would reach any number of people.

Not that I intended to hide it.

Trying to conceal his movements would only invite greater suspicion. Sama Pyo had no intention of ruining things through half-baked caution.

—My lord.

Taishan's cautious Sound Transmission reached his ear. Without showing any reaction, Sama Pyo pointed to a small noodle shop off to one side.

"I'm in the mood for thin noodles today. Shall we stop for a bowl?"

"Hm?"

"You must be full. Say so if you don't want any."

"No! Taishan likes noodles!"

"You should have said so. Excuse me. Ten bowls of thin noodles… No, make that twenty."

The middle-aged woman running the shop looked as though she doubted her ears.

"…How many bowls did you say?"

Sama Pyo had chosen the noodle shop for a simple reason. Perhaps because of its poor location, it had no other customers. They could sit with their backs to the street and exchange Sound Transmissions out of everyone else's sight.

It also helped that the owner appeared to be an ordinary commoner with no connection to Murim.

"Twenty bowls. As you can see, I have a hungry ghost with me."

"Y-Yes!"

It must have been an unexpected windfall for her. As her eyes lit up and she hurried to work, Sama Pyo barely moved his lips.

—You had something to say.

The small chair creaked under Taishan's weight. Balanced precariously on it, he answered.

—My lord. Taishan worried.

—About what?

—Did not obey Sect Leader's orders. Taishan worried about my lord.

A bitter smile touched Sama Pyo's lips.

—I wondered if that might be the reason. So it was because of that person after all.

—Disobeying bad. Sect Leader gets angry. My lord in danger.

—Yes. He is more than capable of that.

Sama Pyo looked down at the chopsticks neatly arranged on the table.

They brought to mind his father, Black Night King Sima Gong. A man with no paternal affection whatsoever.

He probably thinks of his children as chopsticks.

Replace one when it falls on the ground. Put it away when it no longer pleases him.

His seven older brothers and nine older sisters had been discarded that way. Sama Pyo was the last—and best-made—chopstick the Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate had chosen.

And even I might be replaced someday.

His father was well past eighty, but his appetite and libido were as vigorous as ever. Three wives and four concubines had not been enough for him; he had taken more than ten concubines in all. Sama Pyo had no shortage of blood relatives, older or younger.

—Don't worry.

—Hm?

Sama Pyo took a sip of the lukewarm water the owner had brought him.

—He is heartless. That is precisely why he cannot easily cast me aside.

Black Night King Sima Gong was indeed a heartless man. He could set aside parental affection and assess reality with a cold eye.

By the same logic, there was no other successor who could replace Sama Pyo, whose martial talent surpassed even Sima Gong's in his younger days and whose calculating mind ran deep.

Besides…

—There will be no punishment. I've taken a different route, but it still leads where my father wants to go.

—My lord. Taishan does not understand. Taishan is stupid.

Sama Pyo smiled at Taishan, who could only tilt his head in confusion.

—You don't need to understand. Just stay by my side. All right?

—Taishan listens to my lord. Taishan is good.

Taishan nodded vigorously. Just then, the owner began setting bowls piled high with thin noodles on the table.

“Careful, they’re hot. Take your time—”

“Wow! Taishan! Thank you for the food!”

“Oh my goodness!”

The owner stared in shock as Taishan lifted a bowl of steaming noodles and gulped them down.

Sama Pyo let out a quiet laugh at the sight. Then his face went rigid.

“Hmm.”

Taishan looked up from his noodles.

“My lord. What is it?”

“…”

“My lord?”

Still staring at something, Sama Pyo murmured, “No. Nothing. I must have seen wrong.”

But he knew he had not mistaken the person who had passed by. He knew what that person’s presence meant, too.

“…Perhaps I should have just obeyed the order.”

“Hm? My lord. What did you say?”

Sama Pyo answered with a sigh. Taishan already had the last bowl in his hands.

“You shameless glutton. Finish stuffing your face.”

“Wow! Taishan will give his life for my lord!”

“Here you go.”

A voice clearer and lovelier than a Young Chang piano.[2524] A hand held out two bamboo slips to me.

What’s going on?

Less than half an hour had passed since the two uninvited guests from the Black Dragon Demon Gate had left and Jeok Cheongang had gone to the latrine. Now another unexpected visitor had appeared, and this one left me at a loss.

I blinked at her, then finally managed to speak.

“W-What are these?”

“Applications.”

Ju Hwaran looked as though she wondered why I had to ask. “One for me and one for Captain Song.”

Behind her, Song Ilseom muttered, “I never agreed to this.”

[2524] Young Chang is a Korean piano manufacturer.

“I hired you, didn’t I? If you’re my escort, of course you have to come with me.”

“This wasn’t in the contract. It’s a breach of contract. If I join the Murim Alliance, I’ll need hazard pay…”

“I’ll pay you double.”

“Then that’s a different story.”

Maybe it was all the money she had wrung out of the Zhongnan Sect. Ju Hwaran was showing off the sort of easy spending only someone young and rich could manage.

Watching her, though, I felt as stifled as if I’d stepped into a greenhouse in midsummer.

“So. You’re serious?”

“Yes. I am.”

Ju Hwaran nodded without hesitation and met my eyes.

“I want to join the Two Dragons Pavilion.”

“…!”

I had suspected as much, but hearing Ju Hwaran say it herself left my mouth dry. I thought for a moment before speaking.

“I won’t accept you just because we know each other.”

“If I’d planned to rely on our connection from the start, I would’ve come without an application, wouldn’t I?”

She smiled. I sighed inwardly.

“It’ll be dangerous. Very dangerous.”

“I know. The Two Dragons Pavilion is directly under the Alliance Leader’s Office, and unlike the other pavilions, it cannot even command its own squads or battalions. It will probably function more like a special operations detachment.”

Exactly right.

Mae Jonghak wanted to deploy Cheongpung and me, two considerable assets even within the Murim Alliance, as a small detached force. It was also why most of the leadership had agreed to the arrangement.

“Young Lady Ju, if you know that, why—”

“Great Hero Jin.”

Ju Hwaran cut me off.

“Did you say that to the other applicants?”

“What?”

“That it’s dangerous. Did you ask why they were applying when they knew that?”

Her quiet voice went on.

“It’s strange. You put up a notice because you needed people, and now you’re trying to talk me out of it.”

“That’s…”

She gave a quiet laugh when I hesitated.

“You don’t have an answer, do you?”

She had me there. I scratched the back of my head and reluctantly nodded.

“Honestly? No, I don’t.”

“I came here as a martial artist. I’d like you to judge me as one.”

“As you are…”

“I might fall far short by your standards, but I’m a swordswoman who has reached the Peak realm.”

“Since we’re being honest, you do fall pretty far short. Song Ilseom might be another story.”

Poke.

Hyuk Mujin, who had been watching with bated breath, gave me a discreet jab in the ribs.

He needn’t have worried. Ju Hwaran’s gaze did not waver.

“Even compared with the other applicants?”

“I can’t say for certain, but probably.”

“What about experience?”

“Experience?”

“I started accompanying my father on escort runs when I was twelve. In experience and knowledge of the land, I don’t think I fall short of any seasoned veteran of the martial world.”

She had a point. Ju Hwaran had been heir to the Yongbong Escort Bureau, once among the most renowned escort bureaus in the world. For the past several years, she had even run it herself after her father collapsed from qi deviation.

I can’t dismiss the experience she gained from that.

Escort bureaus traveled far and wide. To complete their assignments on time, they used whatever means they could, learning the roads and gathering information wherever they went.

And during the Great Faction War, Ju Hwaran’s grandfather, the Escort King, had completed his legendary Ten-Thousand-Li Journey[2525] while evading the Demonic Cult’s countless watchers.

“Great Hero Jin.”

Her powerful voice pierced my ears.

“I have no intention of becoming a burden. But please think about this objectively. Set aside everything that’s happened between us until now. Are Captain Song and I truly of no use to the Two Dragons Pavilion?”

“…!”

[2525] This uses the Chinese li, approximately 500 m (0.311 mi). Ten thousand li is approximately 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

"I'm fully prepared for what this entails. Even if you reject me, I'll accept it."

I closed my eyes.

Ju Hwaran was right. This was something I had to consider coldly.

The person waiting for my answer was not the woman I had walked beside one night in a garden where the flowers were just beginning to bloom.

Dagger Hidden Flower Ju Hwaran.

She was a martial artist skilled enough to be counted among the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, and the Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

She also had abilities we would need on the missions ahead, given that the Two Dragons Pavilion would operate as a detached force.

Then why?

Why did I hate admitting it? Why did I want to stop her, even if I had to be unreasonable?

"Um, Captain."

I opened my eyes. Hyuk Mujin watched me nervously before going on.

"I think you've forgotten something."

"What?"

"All the other applicants ran away. Every last one. They probably won't come back tomorrow or the day after, either."

"I know, you punk. Old Man Ilyang got carried out of here half-paralyzed. So?"

"No, I mean… that's all I wanted to say."

Hyuk Mujin flinched and turned his head away.

But I understood him perfectly.

"Whew."

I sighed and looked straight at Ju Hwaran.

"Before I answer, there's one thing you should know, Young Lady Ju."

How was I supposed to bring it up? As I hesitated, she smiled.

"It doesn't matter."

"What?"

"I saw them on my way here. With someone that big beside him, how could I miss them? And from what people were whispering, I could more or less tell where they'd come from."

Ju Hwaran continued calmly.

"Why would that be a problem?"

"…!"

"I think I've given you enough time to consider it. May I have your answer?"

I studied her. The tangle in my head seemed to have cleared.

Or perhaps it hadn't, not entirely.

But right now, at least, I knew what I had to say.

“Yes. All right.”

A bright smile spread across Ju Hwaran’s face.

Ju Hwaran had left.

Beyond the window, I watched her walk away, slender yet dignified, with Song Ilseom following like a shadow.

“Young Lady Ju is impressive,” Hyuk Mujin said behind me.

I nodded quietly.

She was like that back then, too.

I remembered the day I first met her: the way she had refused to retreat even when surrounded by hundreds of enemies, and the look in her eyes.

Maybe she’s more of a martial artist than I ever realized.

“I feel sorry for her, too,” Hyuk Mujin said.

“Yeah. She has a lot on her shoulders. Her father still has trouble getting around, and…”

“That’s not what I meant.”

“Hm?”

I turned to find him looking at me with pity.

“If all she wanted was to earn merit, she had plenty of other options. Why come all the way here?”

Why, huh?

I thought it over, then sucked in a breath.

“Wait. Don’t tell me…”

“Yes. Exactly.”

“Because she thought she could earn even more merit?”

“…That’s enough. This is too damn filthy to work with.”

I was debating whether to smack him when a voice came to his rescue.

“Ahh, what a relief.”

Jeok Cheongang emerged from the latrine after half an hour.

Apparently celebrating a smooth delivery, he was grinning from ear to ear as he reached for the liquor bottle first. Then he saw Hyuk Mujin’s expression and paused.

“Why do you look like you’ve been chewing shit?”

“Great Hero Jeok. The thing is…”

Hyuk Mujin launched into an explanation as though he had been waiting for someone to ask. Jeok Cheongang listened in silence, then widened his eyes.

“The Escort King’s granddaughter came here?”

“Yes.”

“Huh. Two people with unusual auras passed by while this old man was straining. She must have been one of them.”

Jeok Cheongang stroked his dark-red beard.

“I heard what happened while I was at death’s door. Now that things have come this far, it seems you share quite a lasting connection.”

“Then why do you think she came to Captain when she had other choices?”

The corner of Jeok Cheongang’s mouth twitched.

“Must this old man really say it aloud?”

“Right? I knew you’d understand, Great Hero Jeok.”

Hyuk Mujin’s face lit up like an LED bulb. Jeok Cheongang smiled knowingly and went on.

“Because she can earn a tremendous amount of merit.”

“…”

Oh. The bulb went out.

Hyuk Mujin’s face darkened like night had fallen. His voice dropped with it.

“Are you serious?”

Jeok Cheongang nodded confidently.

“She may have received considerable compensation from the Zhongnan Sect, but she’ll need fame and skill in Murim if she intends to protect and lead the Escort Bureau. The way I see it, the Escort King’s granddaughter understands how the world works.”

“Great Hero Jeok.”

“What?”

“Forgive me for asking, but have you ever had a sweetheart?”

Jeok Cheongang gave it some thought.

“Of course.”

“When?”

“I was about ten. More than a hundred years ago, I suppose.”

“…”

“What’s wrong?”

“N-Nothing. It seems I was practicing wall-facing meditation.”

“…?”

Hyuk Mujin muttered like a monk who had attained enlightenment. Jeok Cheongang looked away from him and turned to me.

“Anyway, what do you intend to do?”

“Hmm.”

“Your face says you’ve already made up your mind. That’s why I’m asking.”

I shrugged.

“You’re psychic. I haven’t even told you yet.”

“From what I’ve heard, it’s not a bad choice. You’re a monster beyond reason, but reaching the Peak realm at her age is an impressive feat. And if she’s been involved in the Escort Bureau since childhood, she’ll have no shortage of experience.”

“I was thinking the same thing. The escort named Song Ilseom would be a major asset on skill alone.”

Jeok Cheongang had been at death’s door when the two of them were here, so he had never met them himself. But he had heard everything that happened after he woke, and had no trouble following the discussion.

“The last of the Guangdong Chen Family’s bloodline. From what I sensed in the latrine, he’s reached a considerable realm.”

“…That’s a little gross, but I agree.”

Jeok Cheongang was a Supreme Peak master who had reached the Returned to Youth[2526] realm. If he considered Song Ilseom’s skill considerable, then no one could dispute the man’s martial prowess.

Another genius the world never knew about.

Song Ilseom had lost his family young and been left alone in the world. He had wandered battlefields as a sword boy[2527] for wandering martial artists until, at last, he drew a sword of his own.

He wasn’t a flower raised in a greenhouse. He was a weed that had weathered the worst the world could throw at him.

His other name, Soul-Chasing Guest, was the stuff of legend even among wandering martial artists.

He’s no Cheongpung or Mungyeong, but he’d be a valuable addition.

It was a shame, but I had no complaints. The lineup around me had been unusually spectacular until now.

Things were bound to change.

A Supreme Peak master could reverse a losing battle in an instant. With the flames of war spreading in every direction, deploying them where they were needed was only natural.

Mae Jonghak must have separated Cheongpung and me for the same reason.

There were fires burning in several places. We could not keep sending the same fire truck to one location.

[2526] Returned to Youth is a martial-fiction concept in which attaining an advanced realm restores a person’s youthful appearance.

[2527] A sword boy was a young attendant hired by wandering martial artists to carry swords and perform errands, including dangerous ones.

If we wanted to win the war against Dark Heaven and prevent even more people from dying, this was the natural course.

And I needed to put together a team to fight those fires with me.

It was time to decide with a cool head.

I guess there's no helping it.

No matter how I looked at it, this was the best choice. Or if not the best, at least the next best.

I sorted out my thoughts and called a name quietly.

"Hyuk Mujin."

Hyuk Mujin could seem slow, but he was quick to read the room.

At the very least, he knew something was different whenever I called him by his full name.

"Yes, Captain."

"Let me ask you straight."

The choice wasn't mine alone. Each of us had to make our own, and together those choices would become one decision.

But before I could go on, Hyuk Mujin answered.

"I'll go with you."

"What?"

"I said I'll follow you, Captain. That's what you were going to ask, isn't it?"

"…Yeah."

"Then you didn't need to ask. The thread follows the needle. Of course, traitors like Gung don't count. That's the trouble with outsiders from other sects. They've always got some complication or other."

He gave me a playful smile. I stared at him for a moment, then smiled back.

"You won't regret it?"

"Regret?"

"Yeah. Regret."

"Captain. You know what?"

His expression turned serious.

"Ever since I met you, my life has been one long regret."

"You son of a bitch."

"But I figured a few more regrets wouldn't hurt."

He shrugged and spoke more slowly, gazing into the empty air as though searching through the past.

"A few years ago, people called me the son of the Hyuk Family Textile Shop. Then one day they started calling me the Swift Wind Sword. Some even call me the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon's right-hand man. I like that."

"Mujin, you…"

"Hehe. Touched?"

"No, that's not it. You're not my right-hand man. You're my little toe."

"Wow, Captain. After everything I've been through, I'm still just a little toe?"

His indignant face drew a quiet laugh out of me. Maybe it was time for a promotion.

"Fine. Little finger."

"…On your left hand?"

"Right."

"Right hand…"

He considered it, then cautiously made a counteroffer.

"I'll take the right hand. How about the thumb?"

"Try again in your next life."

"I knew you'd say that. Index finger, then?"

"Not a chance."

"Damn it. I'll have to devote my entire life to becoming your right-hand man. Does that make any sense?"

"Yeah, it'll take your whole life. So stay by my side until then. And don't die."

"…!"

Did I have to say that?

I hadn't been out of the bath long, but my skin felt strangely itchy. I scratched at my chin for no reason and held out my hand.

"C-Captain."

His eyes glistening, Hyuk Mujin firmly clasped it.

"Hyuk Mujin, your Captain's right little finger. I will devote my loyalty to—"

"What are you doing?"

"Huh?"

"Who asked for your hand? Bring me what you received earlier."

"…Oh."

Hyuk Mujin clicked his tongue, looking as if he should have known better, and pulled the two bamboo slips I'd handed him earlier from his robe.

Two names were written in tiny letters on the cords binding them.

Dagger Hidden Flower Ju Hwaran.

Soul-Chasing Guest Song Ilseom.

But these were not the only bamboo slips I needed to receive.

I kept my hand out. Hyuk Mujin seemed to guess what I meant, and his expression soured.

"Captain. Are you serious?"

"Yeah."

"Whew. I don't know if this is the right decision."

With a sigh, he added two more bamboo slips to my hand.

I looked down at the names and epithets on their cords.

Black Dragon Saber Sama Pyo.

Tiger Giant Child Taishan.

I don't know if this is the right decision.

Hyuk Mujin's words lingered. The reason was simple: I wasn't sure this was the best choice, either.

Then Jeok Cheongang spoke, and his words gave me the last bit of certainty I needed.

"What are you hesitating for? Just move forward."

My tangled thoughts cleared.

After taking a small, deep breath, I whispered toward some place deep within my heart.

Ju Hwaran, Song Ilseom, Sama Pyo, Taishan…

And last, Hyuk Mujin.

I sent all five names through my mind at once, then entered the command.

Approve Two Dragons Pavilion membership.

A voice answered the words no one else could hear.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Membership approval procedure initiated.

Confirmed: Dagger Hidden Flower Ju Hwaran, Soul-Chasing Guest Song Ilseom, Black Dragon Saber Sama Pyo, Tiger Giant Child Taishan, Swift Wind Sword Hyuk Mujin.

Will you accept the five people above as members of the Two Dragons Pavilion?

I already knew my answer.

I gave a small nod of acceptance. With a cheerful chime, the translucent holographic window floating in the air changed as though a page had been turned.

Ding.

SYSTEM

One condition of Quest Become My Companion! has been completed.
Secure at least five companions (Complete)
You have selected the minimum number of members!
One final procedure remains before you become an official Pavilion Master. Choose a new name for the Pavilion assigned to you!

A name, huh?

I hadn't given any thought to what I'd call the newly formed organization.

But no matter how much I thought about it, nothing could possibly be better than the name that had just flashed through my mind.

Fire Dragon Pavilion.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

Clear bell tones burst out like celebratory fireworks, and resounding System alerts rang in my ears.

Chapter 545

Fire Dragon Pavilion.

The moment I murmured those three words—

Ding. Ding. Ding.

Clear bell tones burst like celebratory fireworks, and a new holographic window flooded my vision.

SYSTEM

- Fire Dragon Pavilion has been registered as the new name!
- All Quest conditions have been fulfilled!
- Quest Become My Companion! has been successfully completed!
- Fire Dragon Pavilion has been officially established!
- You have acquired the unique Title Fire Dragon Pavilion Master!
- You have achieved the rare achievement Murim Alliance Civil Servant with a Sword Rice Bowl[2528]!
- You have acquired a large amount of Fame and EXP!

A completed Quest, an achievement, and even the unique Title Fire Dragon Pavilion Master.

Notifications poured in all at once. But the System had more rewards in store.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

- Even now, your name is echoing throughout Murim.
- Your total Fame has surpassed 10,000!
- You have achieved the outstanding achievement If You Don't Know Him, You Must Be Dark Heaven!
- As an achievement reward, some Title effects have been strengthened, and Charm and Intimidation have increased significantly!
- You have acquired a large amount of Fame and EXP!
- Level Up!

Oh, shit.

[2528] Kalbaptong plays on making a living by the sword and baptong, a "rice bowl" or livelihood. The achievement pairs that image with a civil servant's post.

Was today Christmas or something?

I'd stopped paying much attention to Fame, but the huge amount I'd just gained had pushed my total past 10,000 and earned me an unexpected extra reward.

Some Title effects and stats had been strengthened. And on top of that…

I leveled up.

Even crappy online games made leveling harder the further you progressed, but lately it had become next to impossible. It was almost as if the System had forcibly nerfed me.

With so many battles ahead, every bonus point from a level-up was worth more than any fortune.

Come to think of it, I must have quite a few bonus points saved up. Titles, too.

Was the last time I checked my Status Window right after I defeated the Water God Dragon?

When I first came to Murim, I'd been so anxious that I opened it dozens of times a day. Gradually, I'd checked it less and less. These days, I hardly looked at it at all.

That was because, once my stats had reached a certain level, I had realized that they were little more than luck. What truly determined the outcome of a decisive moment was martial arts.

Still, I should sort everything out soon.

It felt like only yesterday that I had been called the disgrace of my family at Level 10. Now I was a monster who had sailed past Level 100, as well as a nationally famous Supreme Peak master whom no one in Murim failed to recognize.

I was smiling to myself at the thought of how far I'd come when Jeok Cheongang spoke in a disgruntled voice.

"You're grinning from ear to ear. Does becoming a Pavilion Master make you that happy?"

"Oh, that's not the only reason."

"Then what? Are you glad to be rid of this old man?"

"Huh?"

Only then did I understand why he looked so displeased. I stopped short.

"Are you sulking because of that?"

"Sulking? Me? The Fire King Jeok Cheongang?"

His eyes bulged, and he gave a mighty snort.

"Hah! What nonsense!"

"…Easy with the snorting. Your boogers are flying. And with a reaction like that, even a passing mutt could tell."

"You ill-mannered brat! What do you think you know?"

Well, that settles it.

I took a step back from Jeok Cheongang's flying spit and tried to calm him down.

"It can't be helped. It's not my fault you joined the Five Kings Hall."

The Five Kings Hall was an organization newly established by the new Murim Alliance, which had carried over the old Murim Alliance's structure.

It had only five members, but you could call it the strongest fighting force in the Murim Alliance—perhaps in all of Murim.

Just look at the lineup. It was practically Murim's Avengers.

Thunderbolt Saber King Peng Cheolhu. Azure Sky Sword King Namgung Cheon. Seafaring King Pa Ryun. Fist King Yan Hwapyeong. And…

The man standing right in front of me: Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

With members like that, they hadn't called it the Five Kings Hall for nothing. Five of the Ten Kings, men who had held their places through the long passage of years, had gathered there.

Living legends. Every one of them.

And Jeok Cheongang sat at their head.

By Murim's standards of seniority and age, he was old enough to have drunk skull water with Bodhidharma.[2529] As for the martial arts that had brought him to Returned to Youth, no one could dispute his mastery.

He was considered the best of the Ten Kings even during the Great Faction War.

When we encountered the Blood Lord during the Shaolin Bloodshed, that bastard had tried to recruit Jeok Cheongang from the outset rather than fight him. He'd even said that if the Great Faction War had lasted a little longer, Jeok Cheongang would have become one of the Four Saints instead of the Three Saints.

But…

"Five Kings Hall, my ass. They've stuck me with an office that wasn't even written in my stars."[2530]

The man himself wouldn't stop grumbling.

He held the highest seat in a hall of living legends, and he couldn't have been less pleased.

Hyuk Mujin, who had been watching him closely, raised a tentative hand.

"Um…"

"What?"

"If Great Hero Jeok leaves the Five Kings Hall, could I take his place?"

"…"

"…"

"With a recommendation, maybe…"

[2529] Bodhidharma is a figure associated with the origins of Chan Buddhism. The tale of drinking water from a skull is traditionally associated with the Korean monk Wonhyo; pairing it with Bodhidharma exaggerates Jeok Cheongang's age.

[2530] Saju is Korean fortune-telling based on the four pillars of a person's birth date and time. An office absent from one's saju is a fate one never expected.

That guy's a special kind of crazy.

Jeok Cheongang and I fell silent. Then Jeok Cheongang fixed Hyuk Mujin with a long look.

"Go. Unless you want to die."

"Yes, sir. I'm sorry."

"If you flap that twitchy mouth of yours one more time, this old man will have something to apologize to your parents for."

After delivering the threat in a chilling voice, he turned his glare on me.

"And you."

I quickly waved my hands.

"I don't need to join the Five Kings Hall."

"That's not what I meant."

"Then what?"

"What do you plan to do from here on?"

He was asking about more than my next move. Pride and worry mingled in his eyes as he looked at me.

"You've done well to come this far. I'll give you that. But from here on…"

"Old Master."

I cut him off before he could continue and shrugged.

"I'm not as much of a child as you think."

"…!"

"And I already know what you're going to say."

I wasn't lying. I could guess well enough what Jeok Cheongang wanted to tell me.

The real war was about to begin. Not a battle—a war. Countless lives would be sacrificed to decide who would rule the world.

The fights I had faced until now had never been easy, but it was obvious that even greater dangers would come crashing down upon us from here on out.

But…

"You said it yourself a moment ago. You asked me what I was hesitating for. You told me to simply move forward."

That was right. I'd keep moving forward, as I always had. In my own way.

"I'll hesitate a little, then charge ahead without hesitation."

Jeok Cheongang watched me smile. Then he gave a quiet laugh.

"If you're going to move forward, move forward. What's this about hesitating a little?"

"I can't help it. Somehow, I've ended up with a lot to protect."

I had blood relatives who were as precious to me as my own life. I had companions and subordinates to whom I could entrust my life. And I had a Master with whom I had formed a bond deep enough for me to throw my life away.

I could not—and should not—ever lose something precious again as I had in the past.

"I'll protect everything I have as I go."

"Hah. Greedy bastard."

Jeok Cheongang let out a short, hollow laugh before continuing.

"But that's the right answer."

"Huh?"

"Always be careful. Think. Whatever crisis comes for you, even if you face an opponent you can't possibly defeat, hold on to that feeling and come back alive."

"Old Master…"

"And remember."

His voice was different from usual. It was calm and warm, and it slipped into my ears.

"You're someone another person wants to protect, too."

At noon, dazzling sunlight pierced the earth.

Step. Step.

Several dozen people walked in the same direction. Women and men, middle-aged people and elders—they moved without hesitation until they reached their destination.

Creeeak. Boom!

A massive door swung wide open as they approached.

Above it, three characters written in a sweeping hand looked down on the people entering beneath them.

Alliance Leader's Hall.

At the heart of the Murim Alliance, it was where the great affairs of Murim were decided. The varied people entering it now were the pillars, great and small, that supported the martial world.

Two among them stood out.

Smack. Smack-smack.

One young man kept stuffing food into his mouth as he walked. Another watched him in silence.

They looked about the same age, but their builds and the air about them could hardly have been more different.

They did share two undeniable traits: both were prodigies seldom seen in Murim's long history, and both had won tremendous fame.

Perhaps that was why people kept watching them, from the moment they entered until well after they took their seats.

So those are the young men…

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung and Huashan Divine Dragon Cheongpung. I've never seen them this close. Is this really what they're like?

Incredible! What perfect muscles and bones. He's reached the Supreme Peak realm so young. How could anyone dismiss him as a boy barely past twenty?

There was wonder and admiration at finally seeing the young heroes they'd known only by rumor.

Pavilion Master or not, what an undisciplined attitude.

Tsk. His martial arts may be strong, but he still has some growing up to do.

Entrusting such important posts to boys like that? You'll regret it, Alliance Leader.

There was envy, jealousy, and disdain, too. Their thoughts were as varied as the people themselves.

The two young men remained unfazed. More precisely, they paid none of it any attention.

Smack, smack. Agu, agu-agu.

Jin Taekyung watched Cheongpung cram dumplings and meat into his mouth and muttered, "What the fuck, is he a martial artist or Agumon[2531]…?"

"Whah?"

"Nothing. Keep stuffing your face, Young Hero Cheongpung."

"Wahn one?"[2532]

"Afraid? What would I be afraid of? You're the one who scares me. And no, I don't want one, so swallow before you speak. Dumpling filling is flying all the way over here."

With a voice of utter resignation, Jin Taekyung reached toward the flying bits of filling.

Whoosh. Tick!

His fingers moved too fast for most Peak masters to follow. As he knocked aside the finely chopped meat and vegetables, gasps and exclamations rose around the hall.

"Gasp!"

"My word."

[2531] Agumon is a dinosaur-like character from Digimon. Its name echoes Cheongpung's "agu-agu" eating sounds.

[2532] Cheongpung's full mouth slurs hana deuryeo? ("want one?"), which Taekyung hears as duryeowo? ("afraid?").

The world was vast and masters were many, but not all of the several dozen people gathered here were Supreme Peak masters.

Even so, a simple movement could reveal something of a martial artist's ability.

Jin Taekyung was a Supreme Peak master who had opened his Middle Dantian. It would not be an exaggeration to say that his movements belonged to an entirely different realm.

The Fire King's successor… He lives up to his reputation. The rumors weren't exaggerated.

Damn it. What kind of monster is he?

If the Huashan Divine Dragon has reached the same realm… Hah. Astonishing.

As everyone watched the two young men with their own thoughts, a deep voice rang through the conference hall.

"The Alliance Leader is entering."

Chapter 546

"The Alliance Leader is entering."

At the sound of that deep voice, five doors opened one after another. A figure approached slowly from beyond them, and everyone rose as one, as though they had rehearsed it.

"Chomp, chomp. Smack, smack."

"…"

Everyone except this bastard.

The more I look at him, the crazier he seems.

I wasn't exactly a model of etiquette myself, but even I could read a room. I leaned toward Cheongpung, who was determined to store every last morsel of food safely in his mouth, and whispered, "What the hell are you doing? Got a problem with society? Don't like the Murim Alliance?"

Cheongpung swallowed and stood up before answering.

"But there's still food left, Benefactor."

"Then stop eating."

"But the dumplings will get cold."

"…"

You bastard, Cheongpung. You Guan Yu[2533] bastard. You know when dumplings are getting cold, but you haven't noticed everyone's stares turning cold…

Well, he's always been like this.

Cheongpung wouldn't be Cheongpung if he cared what anyone thought. I sighed, poked him in the side, and muttered, "If you're done eating, pay attention. Our esteemed Azure Dragon Pavilion Master."

At the words Azure Dragon Pavilion Master, Cheongpung pouted and nodded. His reply came out in a tiny, thoroughly disgruntled voice.

"Yes, Benefactor."

The name Two Dragons Pavilion remained unchanged, but it had been divided internally into my Fire Dragon Pavilion and Cheongpung's Azure Dragon Pavilion. On our way to the conference, Cheongpung had told me he'd wanted a different name. Mungyeong had fiercely opposed it.

"I don't like that name."

"Why? I think Azure Dragon Pavilion sounds pretty cool. Still, it's a little unfair. You're the Pavilion Master. Shouldn't you at least get to choose the name?"

"I thought so too, but Grandpa Mun hated my idea. He threatened to quit if I used a name like that."

[2533] In Romance of the Three Kingdoms, the general Guan Yu defeats an enemy commander before his wine has time to cool. Taekyung likens Cheongpung's concern for his cooling dumplings to that episode.

"It was that bad? What name did you want?"

"Dumpling Pavilion."

"…"

"Or Sweetmeat Pavilion."

"…Oh. Right."

"Hoo. I hate Grandpa Mun. What's so great about Azure Dragon Pavilion, anyway?"

It was ridiculous even now. You should be grateful, you lunatic.

Why not just call it Gim Bugak?[2534] The words reached my throat, but I swallowed them. Not because the matter was already settled.

The highest authority in orthodox Murim had finally entered the conference hall.

Step.

Footsteps crossed the silence. Murim Alliance Leader Mae Jonghak reached the seat of honor and smiled at everyone.

"You're all here."

Unlike the previous meeting, this one included the heads of the key organizations under the Alliance Leader's Office. The Murim Alliance's internal reorganization was finally complete.

That's quite a crowd when we're all together.

I swept my gaze around the room. Some faces were unfamiliar—masters whose names and sobriquets I'd heard but whom I'd never met. Among the familiar faces were more than a few I was glad to see.

"You're awfully late. My backside was about to cramp up."

Even if you turned the whole world upside down and shook every soul out of it, you could count on one hand the people who could talk to Mae Jonghak like that.

Jeok Cheongang was the foremost among them. Standing with his weight on one leg beside the seat of honor, he spoke in his usual surly tone. Across from him, Jin Wikyung glanced around uneasily before speaking up.

"Great Hero Jeok."

"What?"

"Well, you know…"

"Good grief. Now that you've got a title, are you taking the Alliance Leader's side?"

Jin Wikyung paused for a moment and gave an awkward smile. In the space of just a year and several months, he had taken the helm of the Jin Family of Taiyuan as Acting Family Head and brought astonishing growth to a family that had been slowly declining. Before anyone knew it, he had become one of their number.

"It's not that—"

[2534] Gim bugak is a fried Korean seaweed snack. Its final syllable, gak, sounds like the word rendered "Pavilion" in the names above.

"I know. I know. Now both brothers are making a fuss."

Mae Jonghak smiled at the grumbling Jeok Cheongang.

"Don't be like that, Great Hero Jeok. Or should I call you the Five Kings Hall Master now?"

"…Hmph. I get your point, so stop. There are too many people watching."

"And here I am, wasting busy people's time with idle chatter."

It was hard to imagine anyone busier than Mae Jonghak, but he wasn't wrong. Every person gathered here was a vital cog in the vast Murim Alliance.

The Two Halls, Three Divisions, Five Pavilions, Five Gardens, and Ten Squads.[2535]

The only organization standing shoulder to shoulder with the Alliance Leader's Hall, led by Murim Alliance Leader Mae Jonghak, was the Five Kings Hall, now headed by Jeok Cheongang. Beneath them were the Three Divisions and Five Pavilions belonging to the Inner Hall, followed by the Five Gardens and Ten Squads, which were occupied by people from the Five Great Families and the Nine Sects and One Gang.

And there are more besides.

Remarkably, this wasn't everyone. Add the unit heads and commanders of the Outer Hall, and even this spacious conference hall wouldn't hold them all. They'd have to use the training ground.

It showed how enormous the Murim Alliance was. It also meant Cheongpung and I had been recognized as part of its central leadership.

Even if it's basically an honorary position with no real authority.

A difference between title and standing, perhaps. My title was Pavilion Master, but in the actual pecking order, I was near the bottom of this gathering. Of course, no one else my age held a position like it.

Ah. There was one other person besides Cheongpung.

One-Ride Heavenly Dragon Murong Yeonghwi, a genius who had been called Murim's greatest young prodigy only two years ago. He was the Lesser Family Head of the Murong Family and had recently been appointed a Squad Leader of the Murim Alliance's Outer Hall. I had heard that instead of following his father, the Family Head, to Henan, he had remained in Liaoning to oversee the family's defenses.

I thought I might finally get to see him in person.

Then again, there was no stupider act than leaving one's base undefended just to attend a meeting in Henan. Everyone else here must have completed their defensive preparations in the same way.

Swish.

Mae Jonghak slowly raised a hand.

[2535] The Korean names this group the "Ten Squads," but the parenthetical characters give "Nine Squads."

"Come, everyone. Sit down. We don't have time to stand on ceremony."

But no one sat. More precisely, no one could.

As Mae Jonghak raised his hand, something drifted up from beyond the doors, which still stood open.

"How can he use Seizing an Object Through Empty Space so effortlessly…?"

Someone muttered under their breath.

The object was covered by a cloth, so its identity could not be made out. But it was obviously enormous and seemed to possess considerable weight. Exclamations of admiration rose at Mae Jonghak's internal energy as he moved it without effort.

Several faces, though, had already gone rigid. Mine probably had too.

His internal energy isn't the issue. That thing…

Of my five senses, smell was the first to react. The odor was so faint that even a martial artist with sharpened senses might not have identified it right away. But I knew that stench the moment it reached me.

"Benefactor. Is that smell…?"

Cheongpung's eyes widened. I gave him a small nod.

"That's right. Corpse stench."

"…!"

The reek of a rotting body. I'd smelled it countless times in both the modern world and Murim, and this time I was more certain than anyone. A suspicion about the corpse's identity flashed through my mind.

If I'm right, that's…

The next moment, the cloth stained dark red with blood was pulled away, and everyone in the conference hall groaned almost simultaneously.

"Gasp."

"W-What in the world…?"

"Alliance Leader, what is that thing?"

Voices filled with shock burst out from every corner. Those who already knew about it and those who did not were all forced to feel the same shock at that moment. What the cloth had concealed was that horrifying.

A monster.

There was no other word for it. At a glance, it had a human shape, but unnaturally long, thick joints jutted grotesquely from all over its body. Its wide-open, lifeless eyes were each as large as a child's fist.

And that wasn't the end of it.

"Th-There's a horn."

"That's not all. Its arms…"

A black horn rose from the center of its forehead, and four arms protruded from its upper body. The arms varied in length and thickness, perhaps because they'd been severed during the fight. But no one could dispute that they were human arms.

"Hmm."

"How could this happen?"

As the murmurs of dismay continued, someone spoke up.

"Infinite Life Buddha.[2536] It is hard to believe. I felt the same way at first."

The speaker was an old Daoist with deep-set eyes and a snow-white beard that reached his chest: the Sect Leader of Wudang. The people who turned toward him looked puzzled.

"At first…?"

"Do you mean…?"

The Sect Leader of Wudang nodded.

"That's right. Some of you may already have heard, but that man—no, that thing—was once a fisherman named Jang Sam."

The old Daoist was relating what I had heard earlier at the Hidden Shadow Pavilion. A fisherman with an ordinary name, no different from anyone else, had disappeared. One month later, he had reappeared as a monster and a Killing Ghost that had thrown Hubei Province into an uproar.

"When it was first found, its martial arts were only Third Rate. But its strength and movements were said to be inhuman. Each time it reappeared, it looked more grotesque and had grown stronger. As though…"

After a brief hesitation, the Sect Leader of Wudang continued with a sigh.

"As though it harmed people, absorbed their vital essence, and made it its own."

"…!"

The shock swept through the hall. Suffocating silence followed, until Jeok Cheongang frowned and spoke.

"Are you saying that goddamn monster learned the Essence-Siphoning Great Technique or something?"

The Sect Leader of Wudang shook his head.

"Infinite Life Buddha.[2537] I can't be certain of that either. But if that thing is what Dark Heaven intended to create, and it truly can use the Essence-Siphoning Great Technique…"

His voice trailed off. His face was rigid, and so were most of the faces around him.

Understandably.

[2536] "Infinite Life Buddha" is a religious invocation referring to Amitabha Buddha, who is associated with boundless life.

[2537] "Infinite Life Buddha" is a religious invocation referring to Amitabha Buddha, who is associated with boundless life.

The Essence-Siphoning Great Technique was a vicious demonic martial art said to have been lost even within the Demonic Cult. To orthodox martial artists, it was the work of a fiend.

If Dark Heaven had revived it and taught it to the monsters they'd created…

A catastrophe. Plain and simple.

Fortunately—or perhaps unfortunately—the Sect Leader of Wudang's guess was wrong. At least, as far as I knew.

Most monsters grow fast.

Didn't they say an Orc reaches adulthood in a month?

Most monsters grew stronger in one of two ways: they were born with tremendous power, or they absorbed magical power from other monsters.

Eating humans might give them a small amount of strength, but most of the people this thing killed were commoners and Third Rate or Second Rate wandering martial artists.

Humans and monsters were born with fundamentally different kinds of energy. If that sort of exchange between the two were possible, modern monsters would already be sold as aphrodisiacs or health tonics.

I can't be one hundred percent certain since it's a mutant.

Still, experience told me that explanation was more likely. No—I hoped it was. If monsters that could directly absorb human energy started pouring into the world, we'd never be able to handle them.

While I was lost in thought, Mae Jonghak's quiet voice carried through the hall.

"Pavilion Master Jin. What do you think?"

I turned my head toward the voice calling for Pavilion Master Jin—and froze when I felt everyone's gazes on me.

Wait. Pavilion Master Jin means…

Fuck. Me.

I still wasn't used to it, so I had forgotten.

"Are you asking me?"

"Yes. I'd like your opinion."

"Well, this is… Hm."

"It's all right. Say whatever comes to mind."

"I'm not sure how to put it."

"In your own way. Simply and clearly."

Simply and clearly. I thought for a moment, then spoke carefully.

"I think things are a little—no, maybe considerably…"

"Considerably?"

I stared into dozens of pairs of burning eyes before answering.

"I think we're fucked."

“…!”
“…!”

Chapter 547

A chilling silence settled over the great conference hall.

I'd expected that reaction before I opened my mouth. I'd even known which of the dozens gathered here would be the first to take a shot at me.

"Do you call that something to say?"

He never disappoints.

I clicked my tongue inwardly as the half-gray-haired man spoke up, just as if he'd been waiting for his chance.

I already knew his name and position. He'd glared at me so much during our last gathering that I'd wondered what his problem was. It turned out we had an indirect connection.

They say blood never lies.

Father and son did look alike. The sharply raised eyes, the arrogant gaze that looked down on everyone, even the way they spoke.

"It seems you didn't hear me."

The man was Hwangbo Gun, Family Head of the Hwangbo Family and father of the Shandong Fist Dragon, Hwangbo Ak. I blinked slowly at his question.

"Of course I heard you. How could I not?"

"Then why didn't you answer?"

"Because your question is ridiculous. I said it with my own mouth, so of course it was speech. Did I make some kind of animal noise?"

Beside me, Cheongpung pricked up his ears.

"Benefactor, can you make animal noises too?"

"Keep your mouth shut, Cheongpung. Unless you want to puke up those dumplings."

"Thank you…"

Hwangbo Gun's face twisted as he watched us.

"Do you not understand what kind of gathering this is?"

"Is there anyone here who didn't know?"

"And yet you speak so crudely in front of these esteemed Seniors!"

"That's why I was trying not to say anything. Besides, we should hear what the Seniors think. What do you say?"

At my sudden question, Mae Jonghak nodded.

"Fire Dragon Pavilion Master Jin is right. I have no problem with it. His words may be rough, but we need to face reality."

"A-Alliance Leader!"

I cut off Hwangbo Gun's panicked cry.

"Yes, we've heard the Murim Alliance Leader's esteemed opinion. While we're at it, what does our Five Kings Hall Master think?"

Jeok Cheongang looked at Hwangbo Gun as though he were a bug.

"Why the hell are you asking? We're fucked. Ignore that bastard's nonsense and keep going."

"Thank you for the fiery answer."

I turned to Hwangbo Gun and shrugged.

"That's what those esteemed Seniors have to say."

"…!"

There were plenty of people here who could be called Seniors, but none of them could compare to Jeok Cheongang and Mae Jonghak.

If the heads of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families were squad-leading corporals with pull or sergeants nearing discharge, Murim Alliance Leader Mae Jonghak was the battalion commander, and Jeok Cheongang was the command sergeant major.

If you don't have the seniority, keep your mouth shut.

And it wasn't just seniority. Strip off the insignia and take Jeok Cheongang on as an equal, and one punch from the Fire King would lay you out.

That was why even the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect and one of the foremost among those who disliked Cheongpung and me, kept his mouth firmly shut.

Which left Hwangbo Gun all alone.

You should've looked before stretching out your legs. Why step forward on your own?

I'd heard Hwangbo Gun wielded considerable influence during the Great Faction War. Maybe he'd always lacked political sense. Or maybe a matter involving his only son—the sole heir in three generations—had turned him into a runaway locomotive.

I hummed a mournful tune.

"I'm a firefly. I have no friends."[2538]

"You insolent young punk!"

I couldn't stop there. I hit him with the combo I'd prepared.

"Waaah. I'm a baby Pavilion Master."

"You braaaat!"

Crash!

Hwangbo Gun sprang to his feet, veins standing out on his clenched fists. He glared at me, furious and empty-handed, without so much as breaking even.

Then a voice spoke.

[2538] A line from the Korean song Gaettongbeolle ("Firefly"), about loneliness.

“‘Punk,‘ you say… Forgive me, Family Head Hwangbo, but may I ask you one question?”

The voice was gentle, with a firmness beneath it. Jin Wikyung’s eyes had gone cold as he looked at Hwangbo Gun.

“What position do you hold within the Murim Alliance, Family Head Hwangbo?”

“…!”

“Regardless of how young the Fire Dragon Pavilion Master may be, he is the successor to Great Hero Jeok, the Fire King, and a Pavilion Master of the Murim Alliance. Even if we consider seniority within the martial world, he is certainly not beneath you, Family Head Hwangbo.”

That hit the sore spot. Hwangbo Gun’s face stiffened.

He was Family Head of the Hwangbo Family, the hegemon of Shandong, but within the Alliance he was only an Outer Hall Squad Leader charged with defending one region.

In the Murim Alliance’s official hierarchy, that put him below me, an Inner Hall Pavilion Master.

“That…”

Unable to continue, Hwangbo Gun bit his lip and looked around for help.

The response was lukewarm.

“Amitabha.[2539] Perhaps it would be best to restrain yourself now, Benefactor Hwangbo.”

“Heavens. Such a disturbance in the sacred Alliance Leader’s Hall.”

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon—no, Fire Dragon Pavilion Master. I’m not taking your side. Both of you have said enough. Sit down.”

I answered without a hint of shame.

“I’ve been sitting down the whole time.”

“Then there’s only one person left.”

It was obvious whom he meant.

Hwangbo Gun was torn between his rational judgment, which told him he needed to stop, and the last shred of pride possessed by the hegemon of Shandong and Family Head of a great family.

One remark settled his indecision.

“Got a hidden weapon stuck in your ear?”

It came from the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang. The air in the hall heated with those few words.

Hwangbo Gun stood frozen, reflected in Jeok Cheongang’s red-glowing eyes.

“Sit down. Right now.”

[2539] An invocation of Amitabha Buddha, commonly spoken by Buddhist monks.

"…!"

Whoooosh!

Jeok Cheongang's aura surged through the air and crashed over them. Hwangbo Gun's eyes flew wide.

So did everyone else's.

"Hmm."

Fist King Yan Hwapyeong, who had watched in silence, let out a low groan.

"J-Jeok! You bastard…!"

The Thunderbolt Saber King Peng Cheolhu's gaze wavered.

Jeok Cheongang's aura was that powerful, that overwhelming—like another sun. Those still in the Peak realm could feel his strength, as could those who had already reached Supreme Peak.

Returned to Youth.[2540]

The mountain range called martial arts was vast and treacherous. Sometimes one had to cross a steep ravine or scale a sheer cliff.

Jeok Cheongang was a great martial artist standing proudly atop the peak at the very end.

He had become something beyond his title of Fire King. So had one other person in this room.

"Great Hero Jeok."

At Sword Saint Mae Jonghak's quiet call, the hot wind sweeping through the hall vanished.

Jeok Cheongang drew in his aura at once and answered gruffly.

"Did something happen?"

"Hmm."

"All right, I know. That bastard was making too much noise, so I gave him a little scare."

No joke—if he scared Hwangbo Gun a second time, the man might wet himself. He was already back in his seat, white as a sheet.

"Finally, some quiet," Jeok Cheongang muttered.

Mae Jonghak gave him a gently reproachful look, then turned to me.

"Fire Dragon Pavilion Master."

"Yes."

"You have stood against Dark Heaven in Shanxi and Henan, and in Sichuan and Hubei."

Gotten dragged into it would have been more accurate, but I nodded.

[2540] A martial-arts concept in which extraordinary attainment restores a person's youthful appearance.

This was the great conference hall of the Murim Alliance. Dealing with Hwangbo Gun and discussing matters of such importance were two entirely different things.

"That's right."

"I expect few people know Dark Heaven as well as you. I would like to hear your opinion."

"I was merely present at those incidents. Hidden Shadow Pavilion probably knows the concrete details and what is happening throughout the world better than I do. I already told you everything I knew."

"I want to hear what you saw and experienced yourself. What the man who went through it all truly thinks."

There we go.

What I'd said before was only a lead-in. Demurring once or twice was the polite thing to do, and if Mae Jonghak, speaking with the authority of the Murim Alliance Leader, pressed me for my opinion, it would carry that much more weight.

All right.

I took a small breath.

Until now, I'd been sitting in the back seat. From here on, I was in the passenger seat.

I couldn't tell a driver setting out on an unfamiliar road at dawn, through thick fog and without navigation, everything I knew. But I could point out the speed bumps and warn him what lay ahead.

Including the ominous thought I haven't been able to shake lately.

I sorted through my thoughts and raised my head. Everyone in the hall was looking at me.

Dozens of pairs of eyes.

They were people who could save—or kill—hundreds, even thousands, of lives in a war that had already begun.

How much heed they would pay to a kid barely past twenty, I couldn't say.

It doesn't matter. If we can win this war. If I can reduce the danger and sacrifice even a little.

I had to do what I could. Right now.

Perhaps that was why my voice carried a weight it usually didn't when I began to speak.

"Dark Heaven…"

[2541] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

Two shichen later,[2541] everyone had left the great conference hall except three people.

The chairs that had held dozens of people stood empty, but the silence that had settled over the room remained. Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho suspected those who had left the Alliance Leader's Hall were just as quiet.

They had every reason to be.

Jin Taekyung's words had been that shocking.

Everyone knew Dark Heaven existed and understood that it was dangerous. No one, though, had warned of the coming crisis as forcefully as that young man.

Not even me.

The Hidden Shadow Pavilion gathered intelligence from across the realm and issued countless predictions. Hundreds of messenger pigeons arrived each day with information tied to their slender ankles, then flew off again before long.

As its chief, Song Ho knew how dangerous Dark Heaven was.

But…

The thinking of the Fire Dragon Pavilion's young master, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon whose actions had caused one upheaval after another, went far beyond anything Song Ho had expected.

Where others spoke of danger, Jin Taekyung foretold disaster. When someone cited the Great Faction War as grounds for believing the Murim Alliance would win, he answered sharply.

"Are we fighting the Demonic Cult? Our opponent is Dark Heaven. Dark Heaven."

"What Dark Heaven has shown us isn't simply demonic martial arts. So what do I call it? Ah, this is driving me crazy. Fine. Let's call it demonic martial arts for now."

"I don't know why Dark Heaven has gone quiet, but we need to use this opening to strike back immediately. If we keep going like this, we're finished. Everyone dies."

"Who said I was going too far? You, Family Head. Have you ever fought someone who came back to life even after all four limbs were crushed? Or fought an imugi?[2542] When you saw that monster half an hour ago, did you think about nothing but what to eat for dinner?"

"We aren't fighting ordinary people. Dark Heaven is one enormous monster, and before long, we may have to fight monsters like that one."

"I went a little too far. But this needs saying: we have to take every measure we can, right now. Especially if you've got a divine artifact at home that you guard like an ancestral shrine."

Song Ho suddenly furrowed his brow.

The place where his prosthetic leg attached had begun to throb when Jin Taekyung started speaking. Now it burned.

[2542] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent associated with dragons.

It wasn't like this even a year ago.

The pain had returned at some point and begun tormenting him in his old age, as though warning him this was no time to sit still.

And today, that young man was here too.

It was as though he knew. As though he had experienced something in advance and was predicting some truth that I and the Hidden Shadow Pavilion—no, that everyone else—knew nothing about.

Foresee? No. Song Ho corrected himself.

It was more like a prophecy.

The question was whether it truly was one.

Could he trust the young man who, more than anyone else in the realm, had come into contact with Dark Heaven? How much of what he'd said was truth, and how much was exaggeration?

"Believe him."

"Hm?"

Song Ho looked up sharply. Jeok Cheongang, still in the hall, continued.

"I said, believe him."

"Great Hero Jeok."

"I know what you're going to say. But…"

His tone softened.

"The kid I know has never once been wrong."

"…!"

Song Ho faltered at the absolute trust in those words.

Then Mae Jonghak, the last of the three remaining in the hall, spoke.

"There are certainties in this world that information alone cannot lead us to."

"Alliance Leader. Do you mean…?"

"That's right."

Mae Jonghak rose slowly from his seat.

"Summon him. It's time to give the Fire Dragon Pavilion its first mission."

Chapter 548

"Well done."

Jin Wikyung said it the moment we left the great conference hall. I answered with a quiet laugh.

"Why are you laughing?"

"I don't know. Maybe because your expression doesn't match what you're saying?"

"Ah."

Only then did his stiff expression ease. But the smile at the corners of his mouth was so faint it looked ready to disappear.

"To be honest, I don't know what to make of what you said. Today, you were just so…"

"It's all right. That reaction is only natural."

I understood why Jin Wikyung trailed off. I could imagine how he felt.

If I were in his position, I'd react the same way.

In this world, the word death did not carry quite the weight one might expect.

Murders were rare in the modern world, and people learned about them through television and other media. Here, people witnessed death often.

Things were somewhat better in cities with good public order. Outside them, commoners lived under the threat of bandits or mounted bandits, depending on where they were.

Martial artists were another matter entirely.

A life spent walking on the point of a blade.

There was a reason people called it a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords.

They were always prepared to die. They stoked their fighting spirit and trained their martial arts. Jin Wikyung, standing before me, was a martial artist too.

The problem was the environment he and all the others had grown up in.

In Murim, people killed people, and people died by human hands. There were fierce beasts and spiritual creatures, but at least people knew what those were. They were not monsters no one had ever heard of or seen.

And today, I had told them those monsters would cover the world.

I had predicted a fight in which humans and monsters would kill one another.

I don't know how much of what I said sank in. But they must have felt the danger.

As I spoke, some looked at me with disbelief. Others were confused but fell into deep thought.

They did not all have to believe me right away. Getting them to listen was enough to accomplish what I had set out to do.

It only got through at all because they're martial artists and I had hard evidence.

If my audience had been a bunch of old Confucian scholars, they would have shouted "Confucius Akbar!"[2543] and staged a protest against supernatural powers. The people in the great conference hall were not quite that close-minded.

At least, not with the corpse of a four-armed monster lying in front of them.

There were the Water God Dragon's remains, too.

Its body had been separated into parts and was still being transported in strict secrecy. But I had quietly slipped some of its byproducts into my Inventory just in case. Those were enough to serve as important physical evidence.

"Come to think of it, Youngest. Where did you get that? I was sure every last piece had been collected."

"What?"

"You know. The imugi[2544] you defeated in Hubei…"

"Ahem. Ahem. Cough-cough-cough!"

I forced out a fit of coughing. Cheongpung, who had been listening beside us, rummaged through his robes.

"Benefactor. Would you like a sweetmeat? Sweetmeats are the best medicine for a cough."

"…No. They're the worst."

"Okay."

Since when were sweetmeats miracle medicine?

Denied a test subject, mad scientist Cheongpung looked dejected and put a sweetmeat in his own mouth. Jin Wikyung watched him and let out a quiet laugh.

"I understand. I won't ask again."

"Good. Thanks."

I scratched my chin awkwardly. Jin Wikyung watched me for a long moment, then spoke.

"Sometimes I wonder whether you—our youngest—are the same child I knew."

"…!"

"I won't ask you outright. Nor will I harbor any further doubts. But there is one wish I have never told you about."

His voice remained gentle.

"When all this is over, and the time is right, I'd like to hear the stories you haven't been able to tell me."

The stories I haven't been able to tell.

I repeated the words to myself.

When will that time come?

[2543] "Confucius Akbar" combines Confucius's name with the phrase Allahu akbar, meaning "God is greatest."

[2544] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent associated with dragons.

But if all this really did end, as Jin Wikyung said, and I was ready… maybe I would tell him myself. The secret I had never been able to share with anyone.

Maybe that day would come.

"…I understand."

I gave him a bitter smile and nodded. At that exact moment, a voice called out.

"There you are, Fire Dragon Pavilion Master."

Tap.

A dull sound rang out with the elderly voice. I turned my head and saw Song Ho, the Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion of the Murim Alliance—the Thousand-Faced Fox.

"The meeting ended half an hour ago, yet you're still here. Coincidence?"

I shook my head. Talking to Jin Wikyung was not the only reason I had stayed at the Murim Alliance.

"It must have been inevitable."

"Inevitability, is it? Yes, I suppose so."

Something flickered in those old, unreadable eyes. After a brief silence, the Thousand-Faced Fox spoke again.

"Come with me, Fire Dragon Pavilion Master. You know what this is about, don't you?"

I did. I knew who wanted to see me, and why.

His next words turned my guess into certainty.

"The Alliance Leader is looking for you."

Thud.

The door closed behind me with an unusually loud sound. Two people were already waiting in an office inside the Alliance Leader's Hall.

"You're here?"

After Jeok Cheongang's flat question, Murim Alliance Leader Mae Jonghak gestured toward a seat.

"Sit down. The rest of you, wait outside for a moment."

He was not speaking to me or the Thousand-Faced Fox, who had followed me straight into the office. He meant the others who had yet to show themselves.

Swish.

No sooner had Mae Jonghak spoken than several presences vanished like ghosts.

Even the secret guards said to remain at his side at all times had withdrawn. I sat in an empty chair.

"They're incredibly skilled. I could barely sense them."

“Most people who enter this room don’t notice them at all. It’s impressive that you did.”

“Even if they don’t know, wouldn’t they at least guess? It would be strange for someone as important as the Murim Alliance Leader to have no guards at all.”

“Ah. You have a point.”

Mae Jonghak scratched his chin like a young man my age, then looked at me. My face was reflected in his clear, deep eyes.

“First, I was impressed by what you said in the great conference hall.”

“I’m glad to hear it. I don’t know what the others thought.”

“They may not believe all of it, but they won’t dismiss it. I promise you.”

Even lightly spoken words carried different weight depending on who said them. And when the speaker was the Alliance Leader of the Murim Alliance, it was only natural for those words to carry tremendous authority.

That gives my argument more weight.

Things were going well. My expression must have relaxed, because Mae Jonghak smiled.

“You were worried.”

“I’d be lying if I said I wasn’t.”

“Since we’re on the subject, how certain are you of your claim?”

“Five out of ten. Fifty-fifty.”

The Thousand-Faced Fox’s face went rigid.

“Did you just say… five out of ten?”

“Yes. Is that lower than you expected?”

“Damn it, the opposite! You’re saying there’s a fifty-percent chance the world will be covered in monsters!”

There was a curse in his outburst, but no one cared about that now. Far from taking offense, I felt relieved.

Their reactions told me that, at the very least, the people gathered here had already accepted my claim as fact.

“What gives you that fifty percent?”

Mae Jonghak was still calm. I answered without hesitation.

“Everything I’ve seen and felt fighting Dark Heaven.”

Jeok Cheongang, who had been sipping strong liquor instead of tea, spoke up.

“You could be wrong.”

“I hope I am. They can curse me for the rest of my life if I am.”

I meant it. I would much rather be completely wrong. Maybe Dark Heaven would turn out to be nothing special, and no mutated monsters would ever appear.

If all it took to get a happy ending was for everyone to curse me, I’d take that deal.

But…

“It sounds insane, but it’s all true.”

“Damn it. This is driving me crazy.”

“Is it that hard to believe?”

“I don’t want to believe it. If it were anyone but you saying it, I wouldn’t.”

“…!”

Where did that sudden burst of emotion come from? What am I supposed to do with this?

Thud.

But emotional or not, to hell with all that. Jeok Cheongang slammed his liquor bottle down and glared at me.

“Tell me it’s a lie instead. If you confess right now, I’ll let you off with three strikes from the Flame Divine Palm.”

“I swear on my balls, right here and now, that I’m not making this up. Also, three strikes from the Flame Divine Palm would kill me.”

“Whew.”

Jeok Cheongang let out a deep sigh and turned to Mae Jonghak and the Thousand-Faced Fox.

“This old man doesn’t want to believe it either, but it seems the punk is telling the truth. He’s sincere when he puts his balls on the line, at least.”

“…”

That was a strange standard for deciding whether something was true. Still, I seemed to have gotten my sincerity across.

As what I feared settled over the office, silence fell. Mae Jonghak broke it.

“I have one more question.”

“You can ask two.”

“No. One is enough.”

Swish.

Mae Jonghak crooked a finger. A large scroll flew out from among the bamboo slips piled behind him and unfurled across our table.

Rustle.

I looked at what was written on it—no, drawn—and muttered, “This is…”

“You are looking at exactly what you think you are. A complete map of the realm.”

It showed the geography and terrain across the realm, with place names marked as well. But it was larger than any map I had seen in Murim, and there was another difference.

“It even shows where the sects are.”

“It was made for the Murim Alliance. Now, tell me…”

Mae Jonghak's calm voice reached my ears.

"Where do you think Dark Heaven will strike next?"

"I can't be certain."

"Who in this world can be certain of the future? A simple guess will do."

A simple guess…

I remained silent, lost in thought. Then, suddenly, I raised my hand and pointed to one part of the map.

Tap.

"Here."

The reactions were immediate.

Jeok Cheongang muttered a quiet curse. A sharp light flashed in the Thousand-Faced Fox's eyes, while Mae Jonghak leaned his upper body toward me.

"Why there?"

"If what happened in Hubei happens again, Dark Heaven would have a hard time finding a better place."

"You mean that 'rift.'"

"Yes."

"You're certain the rift will open again—or rather, you suspect it will?"

"I think there's every chance it will. What happened wasn't a natural disaster. Dark Heaven planned it and made it happen."

There can only be a first if there's a second.

I alone had been able to glimpse the Water God Dragon's memories, however briefly. I had no physical evidence I could offer with confidence, and I could not be certain. But there was a good chance Dark Heaven had its sights on that place.

I continued calmly.

"I don't know what Dark Heaven is going to do right now. This may not be its next target. But at least one person must have already set out for that place."

"The Southern Heaven Demon Empress."

At the sound of the title, the countless bodies I had seen in Hubei flashed before my eyes. My fist clenched.

"That's right. If it's the Southern Heaven Demon Empress… she must have that place in mind."

"Is that another simple guess?"

"A guess. One close to certainty."

I could not be sure of anything. But a thought that had been haunting me for some time seemed more and more likely.

Mae Jonghak nodded quietly and looked to Song Ho.

"What do you think, Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion?"

“I’ll add my voice to the Fire Dragon Pavilion Master’s.”

Song Ho answered at once, then continued.

“It has been more than seven days and nights since we sent a missive. With no reply yet, there’s a good chance something has already gone wrong.”

“I expected as much, but… that’s fast.”

“Yes. We could send the Outer Hall forces we selected in advance, but we risk arriving too late.”

A missive? Forces selected in advance?

The Thousand-Faced Fox read the question on my face.

“The Hidden Shadow Pavilion has eyes and ears throughout the realm. You weren’t the only one to make this guess.”

“…You had already been considering that place.”

“To be precise, we began considering it immediately after receiving a report on the circumstances surrounding what happened in Hubei Province. However, that strange phenomenon called a rift was something neither I nor anyone else in this Pavilion anticipated.”

I remembered something I had briefly forgotten. The elderly martial artist before me had been the head of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion forty years ago, and he still was.

And there was only one person in this room who could give orders to both of us.

“Fire Dragon Pavilion Master Jin Taekyung.”

Mae Jonghak’s voice rang through the office, heavier than usual.

Mae Jonghak, the great martial artist known as the Number One Sword Under Heaven and the man standing at the pinnacle of Murim today, stared at me with clear blue eyes.

“I’m giving you your first order.”

Whoosh!

A fierce wind rose with every step I took.

Ignoring the eyes of everyone around me, I even used my movement technique to hurry back to my residence. When I arrived, I flung open the door with all my strength.

Bang!

A familiar face came into view.

Hyuk Mujin had been lounging in the annex. He sprang to his feet, looked back and forth between me and the shattered door, and muttered,

“Welcome back… Wow. The owner is going to cry tears of blood. That door was replaced less than half an hour ago.”

I had no time to sympathize with the owner. Instead of greeting Mujin, I gave him an order.

“Summon everyone.”

“What?”

Hyuk Mujin stared at me, dumbfounded.

“What are you talking about all of a sudden? Wait, summon what?”

“The Fire Dragon Pavilion.”

“What?”

“Wait. Hold on! Captain, why all of a sudden? Where are we going?”

I answered the wide-eyed Hyuk Mujin in a low voice.

“Nanman.”[2545]

[2545] Nanman is a historical Chinese term for peoples and regions south of China; it can carry a derogatory sense.

Chapter 549

I wasn't a general leading an army of thousands.

Even counting me, the Fire Dragon Pavilion had only six members. Half an hour was enough to get everyone in one place.

"Everyone, listen up."

I offered no greeting or honorifics. Sensing something unusual in my abrupt command, all five turned their attention to me. Even Hyuk Mujin, who had gone to summon them, still had no idea what was going on.

I looked from one questioning face to the next, then began.

"To get straight to the point… I've been given a mission."

There was nothing to leave out and nothing to add. I told them exactly what I knew, and the briefing took less than fifteen minutes.

Afterward, everyone fell silent, lost in thought. Then one of them spoke.

"So," said a familiar, composed voice.

Sama Pyo, Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, looked at me.

"We're heading to Nanman.[2546]"

I nodded, with one small correction.

"To the Nanman Beast Palace, to be precise."

The Nanman Beast Palace was a mysterious sect said to tame countless animals, including spiritual creatures and venomous beasts, and practice martial arts modeled on their movements.

I couldn't tell whether they were an animal welfare society or a bunch of animal abusers. One thing, though, was certain.

Honglan. No—the Southern Heaven Demon Empress would be salivating over that place.

If a second rift opened, Dark Heaven would be hard-pressed to find a better location than the Nanman Beast Palace. It was an animal kingdom, teeming with more spiritual creatures and venomous beasts than anywhere else under heaven.

Song Ilseom had been listening with his willow-leaf saber held against his chest. He muttered, "We're in for a rough trip."

He had good reason to think so.

Nanman, where the Beast Palace stood, was also called Yunnan in the Central Plains. It lay directly south of Sichuan and bordered Guizhou and Guangxi. Put like that, it sounded merely far away. But…

The problem is, Nanman's terrain and climate are unbelievably fucked.

[2546] Nanman is a historical Chinese term for lands and peoples south of the Central Plains, literally "southern barbarians." Here it refers to Yunnan.

I'd heard it was sweltering hot, with jungles that went on forever. There wasn't a decent road to be found. Instead, it had full-grown predators and venomous insects that treated humans like food delivery.

And that's just what I've heard…

I couldn't imagine what it was like in person. I was beginning to understand why Nanman was considered part of the Outer Lands, despite having a perfectly respectable place on maps of the realm.

Though from a modern perspective, it really is a foreign country.

In the modern world, was Yunnan Vietnam or Myanmar? It had to be somewhere around there, but my memory was hazy because I'd spent world geography class sleeping my ass off.

While I was trying to dredge it up, Hyuk Mujin shot his hand into the air.

"Captain, I have a question."

"Go ahead."

"Are we really going?"

"Would we be going fake?"

"It's just… it sounds too dangerous."

"So what? It's always been dangerous."

"…When you put it like that, I've got nothing to say."

"Then shut up and pack."

"When are we leaving?"

"Oh. Did I forget to mention that?"

That was important. The others must have been so focused on where we were going and why that it hadn't occurred to them either.

I looked at each of them in turn and dropped the answer.

"Today. Right now."

"…!"

"…!"

A ripple went through the group, especially Hyuk Mujin and Taishan, the Tiger Giant Child.

"You're joking, right?"

"Do I look like I'm joking?"

"That's impossible. What about clothes and supplies? We'd have to pack everything right now."

"It's possible. Since when have we worried about having every little necessity? Just bring some fasting pills."

Huff! Huff!

What the hell? Was that Scorching Yang Qi?

Taishan blew an astonishingly hot breath through his nose and leaped to his feet.

“No! Taishan! Eating meat tonight!”

“Meat? Meat sounds good.”

I turned to Hyuk Mujin. “You heard him. Bring jerky too.”

“Jerky! Tastes bad!”

“…Just shut up and eat whatever the hell you get.”

The guy looked capable of chewing up a pair of chopsticks, and he was picky?

Sama Pyo caught the look I gave him and shrugged.

“Taishan. You little rascal.”

“L-Lord.”

“How long do you intend to carry on like this? If you keep throwing tantrums…”

“Taishan. Won’t do it. Forgive Taishan, Lord.”

The enormous man looked so dejected that I actually felt sorry for him.

I’ll leave Taishan to Sama Pyo from now on.

I turned to Song Ilseom, who was frowning.

“What? You’ve got a problem with it too?”

“Of course. We’re going to Nanman, of all places.”

He clicked his tongue.

“But I’ll act as though I don’t. Unfortunately, I’ve already taken a hefty advance, and I can’t afford to pay a penalty ten times that amount.”

“You’re much more straightforward than I expected. I like it.”

“When I make a contract, I honor it. If I didn’t, I’d never have earned the name Soul-Chasing Guest.”

He said it with quiet conviction and pride, then continued matter-of-factly.

“Of course, the final decision isn’t mine. It’s my employer’s. Isn’t that right?”

Naturally, he wasn’t asking me.

Ju Hwaran, the Dagger Hidden Flower, had been silent and deep in thought the whole time. At last, she spoke.

“I think you already know my answer. Don’t you?”

At the sound of her clear, gentle voice, I let out a quiet laugh. Song Ilseom sighed.

“I knew it. Damn it, Nanman.”

“I trust I don’t need to remind you of the terms of our contract, Great Hero Song.”

Leaving him to groan, Ju Hwaran turned her gaze on me.

My face was reflected in her dark blue eyes. They held a mysterious light. From this close, they looked almost…

“Great Hero Jin?”

“Ah, yes.”

What was that? Did I doze off for a second?

Her voice brought me back to my senses.

No. I can't do that.

Not now. With what lay ahead, I needed to keep a clear head at all times.

I told myself that a few more times, pulled myself together, and spoke as calmly as I could.

"Good. There's something I wanted to ask you. Specifically…"

"The fastest route to Nanman and what we'll need? All right."

"Pardon?"

"Was I wrong?"

"No. It's not that."

Quite the opposite. She'd guessed so precisely that she'd startled me.

What the hell? Can she read minds? Is that some kind of mind-reading technique?

I could only blink at her. Ju Hwaran smiled.

"There's no need to be surprised. I've been thinking about what I can do to help."

"Oh."

"I'm officially a member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion now. As I said before, I ought to do my share."

Tap. Tap-tap.

Her pale, rough fingers drummed steadily on the table, a reminder that she was a swordswoman too.

"First, as you said, Great Hero Jin, we should keep supplies to a minimum. We won't need extra clothing, and two days' worth of dry rations should be enough."

"Dry rations? Please! Anything but that! Taishan will die!"

Ju Hwaran quickly added, "And jerky, of course."

"What the hell is his guardian doing? Ah, Young Lady Ju, please go on."

"Of course. Now…"

With the interruption dealt with, Ju Hwaran continued without a pause. She covered everything from the supplies we'd need to the fastest route to Nanman.

Fortunately, she had traveled there on an escort assignment several years ago. She also knew the terrain and hidden roads in various places from the records her grandfather, the Escort King, had left behind.

Even Song Ilseom, who had roamed the realm as a wandering martial artist since he was a snot-nosed kid, was surprised.

"There's a road like that?"

Ju Hwaran nodded with confidence.

"Of course. According to my grandfather's records, it's definitely there."

"I spent about a year there myself. But as far as I know…"

"According to my grandfather's records, it's definitely there."

"Yes, I know. What I'm saying is—"

"My grandfather's records."

"Would you let me finish?"

"The Escort King."

"…I believe you. I believe you, so please continue."

And who was the Escort King? The legend among legends who had completed his legendary Ten-Thousand-Li Journey[2547] while a hundred thousand Demonic Cultists covered the realm.

Ju P. Hwaran[2548] had inherited the will of that very P-King. Like the Going Merry[2549] on open water, she sailed ahead without a hitch. Before half an hour had passed, she'd planned every leg of our route to Nanman.

"Whew. That's everything for now. Any questions?"

Whoosh!

An arm thick enough to make me suspect it belonged to a Troll shot up.

"Yes? Ask away."

Tiger Giant Child Taishan opened his mouth with a stiff expression.

"Taishan. Understood nothing after jerky."

"…"

"…"

Which bastard brought a kid into a no-kids zone?

I glared at Sama Pyo.

"Hey, guardian."

"My apologies."

Smack.

"Mmph! Mmph!"

Sama Pyo clamped a hand over Taishan's mouth at once, then gave Ju Hwaran a small nod.

"My apologies."

"…It's all right."

Her tone was calm, but she could not hide the lowered voice that accompanied it. Given the circumstances, it could not be helped.

No, it was only natural.

Even if it was a political marriage, they were engaged.

[2547] A Chinese li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

[2548] The "P" plays on pyo, the first syllable of pyo-wang, the Korean title translated here as "Escort King." The joke carries that initial into Ju Hwaran's name.

[2549] The Going Merry is a ship in the Japanese manga One Piece.

Maybe those big-nosed Hollywood bastards, supposedly as cool as ice magic, could shrug off something like that. But the Korea I'd lived in and Murim were both full of Confucian girls and Confucian boys.

It was awkward even for me to watch. How much worse must it have been for Ju Hwaran?

And I don't even know what happened between them.

The thought left me feeling strange. Suddenly, the fabric against my skin irritated me, as if someone I couldn't see were pricking me over and over with a tiny, thin needle.

"Captain?"

"Hm?"

Hyuk Mujin's voice broke through my thoughts. I didn't need to turn my head to know the others were staring at me.

I pulled myself together and tried to sound casual.

"All right. We'll follow the plan we've discussed. Minimal supplies. As for how long we have…"

Ju Hwaran answered when I looked at her.

"Half a shichen.[2550] Even allowing extra time, that should be enough. We need to arrange the horses and carriages without attracting attention."

"Where should we gather?"

"Hmm. What do you think, Great Hero Jin?"

This wasn't a public mission. We had to move as quickly as possible, but discreetly too. To slip away from this crowded area unnoticed, we would first have to split up and choose a second meeting point.

"Mount Daebyeol. We'll meet there."

"Good idea."

Ju Hwaran and the others nodded at the answer I had settled on after careful thought.

[2550] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Chapter 550

After everyone left, Hyuk Mujin hurried off to gather what we needed, leaving me alone. I spoke quietly.

“Quest Window Open.”

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest

Grade: Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung and Fire Dragon Pavilion members
Mission: Enter Nanman (Incomplete)
Reward: Linked Quest
???
Failure: Gain the Title Can’t Go to Nanman
Fame and Trust drop significantly.

The Journey to Nanman Quest had appeared when Mae Jonghak gave me the mission.

Judging by the description and mission field, the System wasn’t offering any useful hints this time.

There’s no time limit, either.

Not because we had plenty of time. Given how little we knew about what lay ahead, I didn’t think it was an overreaction to read it the other way.

I sighed quietly and closed the Quest Window.

If nothing happens, that’ll be a relief in its own way…

But if something did happen, it could spiral out of control. I would have to lead the Fire Dragon Pavilion, bring the situation under control quickly, and get everyone home safely.

I could barely look after myself, and now I was responsible for other people. The words Pavilion Master weighed on me more heavily than ever.

“Um…”

A voice abruptly slipped into my ear.

I turned to find Cheongpung standing before the half-destroyed door, a bundle in his hands, staring at me blankly.

“Benefactor, may I come in?”

“Anyone listening would think you always ask permission before coming in.”

When the door was intact, he’d barged in without so much as a knock. Now he was asking permission in front of the wreckage. I couldn’t believe him.

I let out a quiet laugh and waved him in.

“Just come in. I was going to see you anyway, so this works out.”

“I was going to come in whether you gave permission or not.”

The answer, of course, hadn’t come from Cheongpung.

I looked at Mungyeong, who had appeared like a ghost, and muttered, “I was talking to Cheongpung.”

“And I told you. I don’t need your permission.”

Mungyeong strolled into the annex and glanced at the cups on the table and the chairs left out of place.

“You had visitors. Six people in total, including you and Hyuk. One was a woman.”

“How did you know?”

“I can tell by looking.”

Cheongpung added innocently, “I saw the others leaving. I thought I should come when no one else was here.”

“…”

“…”

What the fuck?

Mungyeong met my suspicious stare with an expression that said What are you going to do about it?

“By looking,” he repeated.

“So when you said ‘by looking,‘ you meant you literally saw them?”

“I could have worked out something this simple without seeing them.”

“Don’t stare off toward the mountains. There are so many buildings around here you can’t see any.”

“I can see your future instead. Say one more word, and I have a feeling this room will smell of blood.”

“…”

Damn old man. And he goes around pretending to be a medical apprentice.

I shuddered at the phony medical apprentice’s vicious behavior and turned to Cheongpung.

“So what brings you here?”

"I came to say goodbye."

"What?"

Cheongpung scratched the back of his head and smiled.

"When you told me to go on ahead outside the Alliance Leader's Hall, I had a feeling you'd be leaving soon, Benefactor. Hehe."

I hadn't told him, but he'd guessed.

After a moment's hesitation, I nodded. "That's right. I have a mission."

"Ah! Where are you going?"

"Nanman."

"Nan…man?"

Cheongpung's eyes widened. Mungyeong thought for a moment, then murmured, "Nanman. The Beast Palace?"

"Yes."

"That strange phenomenon. It must be because of the rift."

"That's right. If a second rift opens, Dark Heaven would have a hard time finding a better place for it."

"It's certainly possible. Nanman is far from the Central Plains, and the route is difficult. If the Nanman Beast Palace falls, chaos will spread from Yunnan like wildfire."

I thought so too.

If Dark Heaven really was plotting something in Nanman and succeeded, the flames of war wouldn't stop at Yunnan Province.

They'd spread to neighboring Guizhou and Guangxi—and to Sichuan, which took considerable damage in the last battle.

Guizhou and Guangxi were particularly vulnerable. Both provinces had fewer sects and martial artists than other regions, and those they had were weaker. The flames would spread faster there.

"Nanman, at a time like this," Mungyeong said. "It'll be a difficult journey."

"If nothing happens, great. If something does… we'll stop it, whatever it takes."

"With only six of you?"

"A whole six."

"…?"

"I've heard one of them is a young, handsome Supreme Peak master taught by the Fire King and the Slaughter Saint. Ever heard of him?"

"No. I've certainly never heard anyone call him handsome."

"Ah. Right."

He cut me off without a moment's hesitation.

Having put an end to my nonsense, Mungyeong turned to Cheongpung.

“I have heard another rumor, though. About someone mad for dumplings who’s latched onto a young medical apprentice and is learning martial arts by watching him.”

“Huh?”

What did I just hear?

It must have shown on my face. Mungyeong nodded.

“It’s probably exactly what you’re thinking.”

“Really?”

“It’s true.”

“But why pass up the almighty Sword Saint to learn from someone with such a foul temper—sorry. That came out wrong.”

Mungyeong had somehow drawn a small sword from his sleeve. I avoided his chilling gaze and looked at Cheongpung.

“If he’s threatening you, blink twice.”

“You little bastard…”

“Hehe. It’s all true, Benefactor.”

I studied Cheongpung, then shrugged. “I know. I was joking.”

I didn’t need anyone to tell me why he’d sought out Mungyeong, or what he hoped to gain from him.

To become stronger. To change himself to fit this world.

It had been more than a year.

I’d been on my way to an inn when some ragged young man had walked up and asked me for a single sweetmeat. Despite Hyuk Mujin’s protests, I gave him every one I had. That was how I met Cheongpung.

We’ve both changed a lot.

The Third Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, once called the family’s disgrace, had become a Supreme Peak master who shook Murim. And the young genius who loved martial arts and delighted in everything the world had to offer, large or small, had developed a firm resolve somewhere along the way.

You couldn’t see the change, but you could feel it. Only a handful of people close to Cheongpung, myself included, knew it was there.

Tap.

I reached out and patted his shoulder. His eyes went round.

“Benefactor?”

“Nothing. Just telling you to hang in there.”

He stared at me for a moment, then his eyes curved into crescents.

“I will. You too, Benefactor.”

“I’m the one who needs to hang in there. At least you’ve got someone you can lean on. I don’t even have a hill.”

Mungyeong, who had been watching us in silence, spoke up.

“Come to think of it, I don’t see that hill.”

“That hill is staying in Henan. The rest of us are going without him.”

“Well, now I’ve seen everything. To think the Fire King would make that decision.”

“It’s embarrassing to say, but let’s call it the greater good. We need as many hands as we can get right now.”

Even as I answered, I felt a hollow place in my heart.

Maybe it was because this would be the first time since I’d met Jeok Cheongang that we’d gone our separate ways. Even when he’d been unconscious for so long, we’d stayed together.

But it’s time for me to stand on my own.

Jeok Cheongang’s arms were wide enough to shelter me, but I’d grown too quickly to stay in them. And with everything changing around us, we could no longer keep traveling together.

Could it be…?

A thought struck me, and I glanced out the window.

The faces passing along the main road were all unfamiliar, blurred together in the distance. The person I was waiting for never appeared.

Come on. That’s a little harsh.

He could at least have come to see my face before I left.

The words lingered on the tip of my tongue, then faded. I’d already said goodbye before leaving his office with my mission, but I couldn’t help feeling disappointed. Before I was a Hunter or a martial artist, I was a person.

“…I’ll see him again soon.”

“What was that?” Mungyeong asked.

“Nothing. Just talking to myself.”

I was about to look away from the window when a small baggage carriage came rattling toward the annex.

That would have been an ordinary sight anywhere, not just in Henan—if the man on the driver’s bench hadn’t been a disguised Peak master.

Song Ilseom.

Finally.

Ju Hwaran must have finished all the preparations within half a shichen[2551], just as she had boasted, and sent a carriage that could leave Henan discreetly.

I could already sense Hyuk Mujin coming up the stairs.

Time to go?

[2551] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

I'd grown used to this annex. But it seemed I was fated to spend this life on the road.

I gave the place one last look, then turned to my visitors.

"I'd better get going before it gets any later. Thank you for coming to see me. You too, Cheongpung."

Cheongpung hesitated, then thrust out the bundle he'd been holding all this time.

"This is for you, Benefactor."

"What is it?"

"Dumplings. I bought them from the best shop in Henan. I wanted to eat them, but I thought of you and held back."

Mungyeong added quietly, "He stuffed down at least five on the way here. That's how much he held back."

"Ah! Aah…"

I'd known what was in the bundle from the smell, but I was touched all the same. The missing five didn't change that.

"Thanks. I'll enjoy them. I'd better go."

I laughed quietly, took the bundle, and turned away. Then a line of Sound Transmission reached my ear.

—Do you know? Everyone who has received my teachings up to now has died.

"…!"

—So don't die a pointless death. If you die in Nanman, all that I've put up with until now will have been for nothing.

What a terrifying way to show concern. But like the dumplings in my hands, his feelings had come through clearly.

I stood there and gave a small nod before immediately setting off.

Step.

It was a powerful stride that echoed unusually loudly.

Chapter 551

On the night six young men and women slipped secretly out of Henan, two men clinked wine cups in a moonlit pavilion.

Clink.

The cups tilted with a clear ring. Fire King Jeok Cheongang drained his wine in one gulp and muttered, “The wine doesn’t taste right tonight.”

Mae Jonghak smiled from across the table. “Perhaps Yeoahong[2552] isn’t to your taste.”

“I don’t know. My throat’s been scratchy and my tongue bitter for a while now. You haven’t poisoned it, have you?”

No one else could have said that, even as a joke. Only Jeok Cheongang could—and only Mae Jonghak, sitting opposite him, could laugh it off.

“Me, poison Great Hero Jeok? Never. Though I may try it someday.”

“Do your research first. I’m confident I could withstand even Formless Ultimate Poison now.”

“Oh. Then I’ll look into it, even if I have to put the full strength of the Murim Alliance behind the effort.”

Jeok Cheongang answered gruffly. “How frightening. Anyone listening might think you were serious.”

“Oh, that was a joke? And here I thought…”

“…?”

Surely not.

Mae Jonghak nodded as though he had only just realized it was a joke, sending a chill down Jeok Cheongang’s spine.

What a lunatic old man.

His looks had grown younger, but he was just as insane as he’d been forty years ago. Then again, Jeok Cheongang didn’t have to look that far back for proof. Cheongpung alone made it obvious.

Like master, like disciple. Those two…

His hand jerked as he filled his cup.

Disciple.

Wine splashed over the brim. Reflected in it was the bitter expression of a middle-aged man.

Jeok Cheongang gazed at his own face, familiar yet still strange, then spoke without warning.

“Nothing will happen to him, will it?”

[2552] Yeoahong is a traditional Chinese rice wine whose name literally means “Daughter’s Red.”

Mae Jonghak filled his own cup. “Are you worried?”

“Worried? Why would I be? Once a man’s past twenty, he ought to go his own way. He’s old enough to start a family.”

Jeok Cheongang tried to sound confident, but his mouth still tasted bitter. He was thinking of someone who must be heading south by now.

Mae Jonghak caught the emotion that briefly crossed his face.

“He can’t have gone far.”

“Even though we already said our goodbyes, what would be the point of seeing him again? It would only make it harder to leave.”

“Now that you mention it, I suppose you’re right.”

“So? What’s your answer?”

“Hm? To what?”

“You become Alliance Leader and suddenly go deaf? You know… what I asked you earlier.”

Jeok Cheongang toyed with his cup before continuing more cautiously.

“Nothing will happen to him. Right?”

Mae Jonghak thought for a moment. “Maybe. Maybe not.”

“…You call that an answer?”

“Well, it was something I said. It just came out of my mouth.”

“Damn it. You’re driving me insane. Anyone could give me an answer like that!”

“Oh. I suppose that’s true.”

“Then give me a proper answer as Alliance Leader. A proper answer!”

Mae Jonghak smiled at Jeok Cheongang’s outburst.

“He’ll do fine. Just as he always has.”

“You mean that?”

“Of course. If I didn’t believe in him, why would I have entrusted the Fire Dragon Pavilion with such an important mission?”

Jeok Cheongang’s voice softened. “Have you made preparations in case things go wrong?”

“The Hidden Shadow Pavilion has eyes and ears throughout the realm. Nanman[2553] is no exception.”

“…!”

“Sending the Fire Dragon Pavilion to Nanman[2554] is the fastest and most reliable option. We don’t have enough time to raise an army right now.”

[2553] Nanman is a historical Chinese term for lands and peoples to the south, outside the central regions of China.

[2554] Nanman is a historical Chinese term for lands and peoples to the south, outside the central regions of China.

The Murim Alliance was by no means smaller than it had been during the Great Faction War. If anything, it was larger. Shaolin Temple, the Sichuan Sect, and several other sects had suffered heavy losses, but not a single province in the Nine Provinces[2555], still the territory of the orthodox faction, had fallen.

The problem was the time and supplies it would take to gather troops and send them to Nanman[2556]. The Fire Dragon Pavilion, led by Jin Taekyung, was one of the few cards the Murim Alliance could play with confidence.

"Hmm."

None of this eased Jeok Cheongang's worry. As he silently glared at his cup, Mae Jonghak muttered almost too softly to hear.

"There is one especially reliable source of support."

"Hm? What was that?"

"Nothing. Just talking to myself."

"Don't try to fool me! I heard you say something with these ears!"

"Calm down and finish your drink. Then I'll think about it."

Jeok Cheongang stared at him. "Why do you keep trying to make me drink this tasteless wine?"

"Great Hero Jeok."

"What?"

Mae Jonghak held his gaze. "You've already drunk five jars of that tasteless wine."

"…"

"You're on your sixth."

"…"

"Let's drink."

Jeok Cheongang fell silent and raised his cup. The fragrant wine slid down his throat, nowhere near as bitter as he'd claimed. Moonlight touched his face as he tipped his head back.

I wonder where he is down there.

Heartless brat. You could've at least shown your face once before leaving.

The words in his heart scattered on a breeze that came from somewhere.

Clip-clop. Clip-clop.

[2555]The Nine Provinces is a traditional name for the lands of China, not a reference to nine modern administrative provinces.

[2556]Nanman is a historical Chinese term for lands and peoples to the south, outside the central regions of China.

The old horse walked slowly, and the straw packed around my entire body was cold and prickly. Outside the carriage, the voices of hawkers and passersby gradually faded.

Did we make it out?

The thought had barely crossed my mind when someone whispered in my ear.

"Captain. I need to take a shit."

"…"

Hyuk Mujin, you insane bastard. You're really doing this here?

We needed to move as little as possible, which meant I could not even subdue him by force. I lowered my voice as much as I could and barked, "You lunatic. I told you to go before we left."

"I'm nervous. That's why. I'm nervous."

"Then hold it, you son of a bitch."

"Why are you swearing at me? I can't say a thing around you."

"How am I supposed to not swear? What are we going to do about the smell if you shit in here?"

Even a fart under the same blanket would make me swear. I refused to suffer anything worse while we were buried together in straw.

"I've been thinking about that. If I just went, wouldn't the smell make it easier to get through inspection?"

"Die. Please, just die."

"I'm sorry. I've held it as long as I can, but I don't think I can hold it anymore. This might be the end for me."

"Hey, Mujin. Wait. Just wait a second."

"I'll accept my punishment later."

No! You bastard!

I was so terrified I was about to spring up, disguise be damned, when—

"We've passed through the center of Luoyang. We're on an empty mountain road now, so you can come out for a moment."

"Gasp!"

"Phew!"

Rustle!

Hyuk Mujin burst through the straw and sprinted toward the bushes. Saved at the edge of a cliff, I bowed repeatedly to my savior.

"Thank you. I'll be a good person. Thank you so much."

"The inspection must have taken a while for Hyuk Mujin to be that desperate. I'm glad we weren't too late."

The voice was familiar. The smiling woman's face was not.

In the moonlight spilling between the high branches, the freckles across her cheeks and her dry, rough skin stood out.

No matter how many times I look, it's amazing.

Her features and a few small details had changed, yet the whole impression she gave was different.

Ju Hwaran noticed me staring and touched her face. "Ah, I have changed a little, haven't I?"

"Yes. But your eyes are still the same."

A smile flickered in her beautiful dark-blue eyes.

"That isn't something a disguise mask can alter. If Captain Song hadn't helped, it would have been difficult to obtain a mask this good on such short notice."

Song Ilseom, sitting on the driver's bench, added flatly, "It was nothing. Just a little trick I learned to survive."

"That's impressive for a little trick."

"I assume that's empty praise, but I'll thank you for it."

That bastard has to take everything the wrong way. I meant it.

Song Ilseom had made the mask that turned Ju Hwaran into someone else entirely. I knew he'd started at the bottom and been through all kinds of hardship, but I hadn't expected him to know how to make disguise masks.

He's more useful than I thought.

The things he'd learned as a wandering martial artist would surely help us on the road ahead. I was admiring him in spite of myself when a thought made my eyes widen.

"Wait. Why don't I have one?"

If I had a disguise mask, I wouldn't have needed to ride like a piece of luggage beside a shit bomb that might go off at any moment.

Song Ilseom clicked his tongue at my protest. "Everyone's features are different. Just making the mold for a disguise mask takes days. How was I supposed to make yours in the time we had? A poorly fitted mask would only draw more attention. If you're so upset, you should have learned a disguise technique."

Hyuk Mujin emerged from the bushes looking thoroughly relieved and joined in.

"Then what about Young Lady Ju? You said it takes days."

"The Young Bureau Head's mask…"

Song Ilseom trailed off, then frowned. "What a pointless question. Shut up and get back under the straw. And keep that shit smell out of my face."

"You shit too. What are you getting on my case for…?"

Song Ilseom glared as Hyuk Mujin grumbled his way back into the straw, then turned to me.

"Can I cut him?"

"No."

I turned to Ju Hwaran. "The others must be out by now, right?"

She knew whom I meant and gave a small nod. "Probably. They went through the West Gate, where inspections are the weakest. They should have left Luoyang ahead of us."

Taishan's size worried me, but Ju Hwaran had planned too carefully to overlook it. Besides, we had the Alliance Leader's Hall and the Hidden Shadow Pavilion behind us. I could afford to relax.

Rustle.

Hyuk Mujin poked his head out of the straw. "Are we going straight to Mount Daebyeol, then?"

"Of course. We'll change horses once along the way, but nothing will happen before then."

Ju Hwaran continued without pause. "If we keep moving, two shichen[2557]. With thorough inspections, it could take three shichen[2558]. Once we meet the other two at Mount Daebyeol…"

"We leave Henan immediately. Correct?"

She smiled and nodded. "Just as you said, Pavilion Master."

"…Pavilion Master?"

"Why? Isn't that the right title?"

Technically, it was. It just felt like a set of clothes that didn't fit. I smacked my lips and nodded.

"Well, never mind that. We shouldn't have any problems before Mount Daebyeol, then?"

"Not at all. You could have a good long sleep and wake up before we arrive."

Henan was the Murim Alliance's base. An enemy attack here was all but impossible. Still, I let out a quiet laugh, neither agreeing nor disagreeing.

"What is it?"

"Nothing."

How could I put it? I thought for a moment before going on.

"It just feels strange to think I'll be dreaming again after so long."

"Dreaming?"

"Yes. I dream sometimes. I sleep so deeply I wouldn't notice if someone carried me away."

Ju Hwaran looked puzzled. Song Ilseom frowned as if I were talking nonsense. Leaving them to it, I burrowed deep into the straw piled in the carriage.

[2557] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[2558] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Two shichen[2559] to Mount Daebyeol if we're quick. That's plenty of time.

It was time to have the dream I'd put off for so long.

Logout.

Ding.

With the clear chime of a bell, my alert consciousness slowly began to sink.

[2559] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Logout complete.

Ding.

Before my blackened vision had even cleared, a cool breeze swept over my entire body, as it always did.

No—it washed through me, cleansing me.

Synchronization.

It was a process I had gone through every time I traveled between Murim and reality.

Changes to my stats took effect immediately, while scars and injuries didn't carry over. There was even a considerate feature that made changes to my physique and appearance happen gradually and naturally—probably because a sudden transformation would make people suspicious.

Fwoosh.

This time was no different.

Strength flowed into my body, which had already surpassed human limits, and I felt my muscles grow more supple. The internal energy refined through my battle with the Water God Dragon and Mungyeong's teachings changed with it.

"Phew."

The first thing I saw was a ceiling without a speck of dust on it. Several meters[2560] above me, it was covered by an old-fashioned painting.

Is it because I haven't seen it in a while? Or am I still not used to it?

I'd last been here before traveling along a tributary of the Yangtze toward Hubei Province. Roughly two months had passed before I returned.

Maybe that was why everything around me felt unfamiliar.

I lay under the soft blankets, staring at the ceiling for a long while. Then I asked, "What was the title of that painting again?"

A quiet answer came from nearby.

"The official title is the Sistine Chapel ceiling frescoes, but in Korea, it's better known as The Creation—The Genesis. It's a masterpiece created by Michelangelo Buonarroti, a sculptor and painter of the Renaissance."

[2560] One meter is about 3.28 ft; several meters is roughly 10–20 ft.

"Ah, Michelangelo. Right."

"You've heard of him?"

"He's famous. Are you looking down on me because my school grades were Level 7?"[2561]

"What do your school grades have to do with it? You're much more famous than that painting now, Mr. Jin Taekyung."

Tap.

Soft leather slippers met the marble floor.

I turned my head on the pillow and saw a man crossing the vast—no, practically boundless—room.

How does he get more handsome every time I see him?

If he were merely good-looking, I might have been jealous. But once someone passed a certain point, all I could do was admire him. Especially when he had the presence to make those looks seem perfectly natural.

I grinned at the man I was seeing for the first time in two months.

"It's been a while, Team Leader Choi."

Team Leader Choi, handsome as ever in a silk robe, stopped in his tracks.

"You say that as though you've come back from somewhere far away."

"I dreamed about a pretty distant place. It was a long dream, too."

I'd spent more than two months in Murim, so it wasn't a lie. Considering everything that had happened, two months almost felt too short.

"It must not have been a bad dream."

"Not really. I had to fight a dragon right at the start."

"A Dragon?"

"Something a little different, but close."

"A nightmare, then. Better to wake up quickly from one of those."

Clink.

Team Leader Choi set the cup he was holding on the bedside table.

"Have some coffee."

"Is this made from some incredibly expensive beans?"

If it was coffee made from cat shit[2562]—or Hyuk Mujin's shit—like last time, I was going to refuse.

I glared suspiciously at the cup, but then my eyes widened as a familiar scent reached deep into my nose.

"Huh?"

[2561] Korean school-record grades use a nine-level scale, with Level 1 the highest and Level 9 the lowest.

[2562] Kopi luwak, or civet coffee, is an expensive coffee made from beans that have passed through the digestive tract of the Asian palm civet, a cat-like animal.

When I looked at him with an expression that said surely not, Team Leader Choi gave a quiet laugh.

"It's instant. Gold. Made strong."

"Damn, Team Leader Choi. You know what's good."

"At least I know you and coffee brewed from beans aren't a good match."

"Good. Ten points to Gryffindor."

I gave him a thumbs-up and downed the coffee in one gulp.

Mm. That's the stuff.

Cheap and sweet. Getting a taste of modern civilization again made me feel alive.

"Ah, that's good. I'm starting to wake up."

"Are you? You did sleep longer than usual today."

Like other Awakened and Murim martial artists, I had a body that had surpassed human limits. I needed even less sleep than most.

I rarely slept more than two hours a day, and even that was more to satisfy the desire to sleep than out of any real need.

Unless I've pushed my body too hard or worn myself out mentally, I'm fine.

So when someone like me slept like the dead for hours, people were bound to wonder why.

I yawned and stretched.

"Are you all right?" he asked.

"I get days like this sometimes. Maybe all the fatigue caught up with me at once."

I sat up groggily and reached out. The smartphone on the bedside table flew toward me through Seizing an Object Through Empty Space and snapped into my hand like a magnet.

Maybe it's because I haven't seen this in a while, but it feels really strange.

It was part of the disorientation I felt every time I returned to reality.

I tapped the screen awkwardly. The time appeared.

7:05 a.m.

Seven in the morning. I'd gone to bed not long after midnight, so I'd slept about seven hours…

"Hm?"

What was this? The date looked strange.

I stared at the smartphone screen. Then a thought flashed through my mind, and my eyes widened.

"Ah."

So much had happened that I'd forgotten what day it was—and why I'd waited until after midnight to return to my room.

Just as I remembered, Team Leader Choi spoke.

"I said this last night, but I suppose I should say it again."

Swish.

He held out his hand, his quiet voice following close behind.

"I look forward to working with you this year as well, Mr. Jin Taekyung."

January 1, 2047.

Right. It was the first day of a new year in the modern world. And…

"Happy birthday."

"…!"

It was also my twenty-eighth birthday.

Damn it. Already?

The number thirty loomed so close that my vision went dark. Then two people burst in from across the room, making a racket.

"Hey, Twenty-Eight! Mom says to come eat seaweed soup!"[2563]

"I hereby congratulate you on the day of your birth!"

I take it back. They weren't people. They were two monsters.

Jin Hayeon, my old enemy on the family register, whom I was seeing for the first time in a while—and the blond foreigner beside her, the Skeleton King.

I sighed at the sight of them.

The time difference between Murim and the modern world was enormous.

From what I'd learned, whenever I crossed into one world, time in the other slowed to a crawl. Ten days in Murim amounted to about an hour in the modern world. No wonder I sometimes felt out of step.

Especially this time. So much happened.

Both worlds had changed rapidly. One of the changes was the enormous mansion where I now lived.

Step. Step.

White marble gleamed beneath our feet, and old-fashioned paintings and statues filled the halls.

More than anything, though…

"Wow. This place is ridiculously huge."

Huge enough to leave me speechless. Even if I put together every place I'd stayed while traveling between the two worlds, the total would be nothing next to this mansion.

Its owner didn't seem to agree.

[2563] Seaweed soup is traditionally eaten in Korea on birthdays.

"As you said, Mr. Jin Taekyung, it is somewhat large. It also takes a lot of work to maintain."

"For a place that takes so much work, I don't see anyone else around. Right, old man?[2564]"

Hayeon, who'd been trailing behind us, had suddenly joined the conversation.

She wasn't talking to Team Leader Choi.

The foreigner with hair like molten gold and strangely gleaming golden eyes frowned. At a glance, he looked like the sort of man who'd be caught up in Hollywood dating scandals.

"Surely you don't mean me."

"I do."

"Hah."

The Skeleton King—given a human appearance by Magic Johnson's illusion magic—let out a short laugh.

"You seem to misunderstand. As I understand it, the term you used refers to a male relative of an older generation, or a middle-aged man."

"Yes."

"…"

The Skeleton King was silent for a moment before squeezing out his voice.

"What I mean is…"

"You said you're over thirty. That makes you an old man to me."

"I am over thirty, but…"

"Oh, I get it. You are an old man. You just don't want to be called one, right?"

"…!"

His golden eyes trembled. He stopped walking and glared at Hayeon.

"They say blood relatives resemble each other. You two really are siblings."

Hayeon and I answered together.

"I'm an only child."

"I'm an only child, old man."

Good heavens. Now there were two wicked humans.

That was written all over his face as he looked from one of us to the other. Finally, he shook his head in defeat.

"All right. All right, so stop it, both of you. And you, insolent human girl. If you ever call me an old man again…"

Step.

He never finished.

[2564] Hayeon calls him ajeossi, a Korean word for a middle-aged man or a male relative of an older generation, used much like "mister" or "uncle." It implies he is no longer young.

Hayeon had stopped walking. She was staring at him blankly.

“What did you say?”

“No. That isn’t what I meant. I misspoke.”

The Skeleton King scrambled to take it back, glancing at me. Team Leader Choi sighed as though he’d been expecting this to happen sooner or later.

“You’ve done it now. I’ll take him away, Mr. Jin Taekyung. Please calm your sister down, and be careful she doesn’t misunderstand.”

“…?”

What was he talking about?

I blinked at him.

“Why?”

“Pardon?”

“No, why? Why do I have to calm her down?”

“Why? Miss Hayeon was just insulted—”

Before he could finish, Hayeon spoke.

“‘Insolent human girl’? Is that something you say to a person, you long-nosed bastard?”

“…Huh?”

“…What?”

Here we go. I smiled warmly.

She hasn’t changed a bit.

Yes. This was Jin Hayeon.

As my capillaries swelled magnificently, I finally felt that I had truly returned to the modern world.

Hayeon whipped around to face me.

“Did you hear what that Yankee bastard just said?”

I nodded silently.

“I heard.”

“Does he have dirt on you? Did someone catch you doing a private webcam show? Why else would you hang around with a bastard like that? Someone who isn’t even human…”

That’s surprisingly accurate.

“Oh, right,” I said, impressed. “He really isn’t human.”

“He called me an insolent human girl. Does that psycho think that even counts as words?”

“Well, they are words. Just bad ones.”

“If he’d called me a crazy bitch or something normal, I wouldn’t even complain. But human girl? It feels so gross. Seriously.”

I took out my smartphone and whispered, “Siri, tell me today’s weather.”

“Today’s weather is clear.”

“You asshole. You think I’m in the mood for wordplay? Your one and only little sister just got called that by someone else!”

I hurriedly straightened my clothes and bowed politely.

“Hello. My name is Jin Taekyung, and I’m an only child.”

“You really are a lunatic.”

“That’s rather harsh for a first meeting. I’ll sue you for defamation by stating facts.”[2565]

Hayeon’s eyes turned cold.

“I’m telling Mom everything.”

“What?”

“I’m telling Mom. Every last thing.”

“Are you threatening me?”

“Yep.”

“You little…”

Wham!

Eyes bulging, I grabbed someone by the collar with all my strength.

Not Hayeon’s, of course. The Skeleton King’s.

“Apologize to my sister right now! You less-than-human bastard! You monster!”

“I-I’m sorry! I was wrong! I’ll apologize a hundred times, just please…!”

“Of course she’s insolent! And human! And a girl! But you can’t put all three together like that!”

“Ugh! Grrrgh!”

“Say it properly! Put the right words together!”

“I-Insolent! Person! Girl!”

Boom.

At least, I thought I heard something like that.

It was Hayeon’s anger gauge bursting. She picked up the nearest plaster statue.

“Die. Just die, both of you!”

Whoosh! Clang!

The hallway descended into chaos, beginning with the daily clang.

Hayeon charged at us like a brave Viking warrior, while Team Leader Choi stared at the scene unfolding before him in stunned disbelief.

That was when—

“I told you to come eat. What’s all this noise…!”

[2565] In South Korea, a true statement can still be grounds for a defamation claim if it harms someone’s reputation, subject to exceptions such as public interest.

The elevator at the far end of the hallway opened. A familiar face emerged and froze.

Dear Lady Kim Jeonghee.

My mother.

"…What are you doing, all of you?"

From her tiny body—not even 160 centimeters[2566] tall—I felt an aura to rival at least one of the Ten Kings.

[2566] 160 centimeters is about 5 ft 3 in.

Chapter 553

No matter how many levels I gained or how high I raised my stats, one fact would never change: to one person, I was still her immature little boy.

And… my mother, dear Lady Kim Jeonghee, had attack power that ignored every defense.

“What are you two doing?”

One hand was clenched into a fist. The other held a ladle. Sensing that things were getting serious, I spoke quickly.

“Lady Kim. You may have forgotten, but it’s your son’s birthday today.”

“So?”

“I’m almost thirty. Wouldn’t hitting me in front of other people be a little embarrassing?”

“I’ll be sixty before you know it.”

“Ah. Right…”

Wrong approach. I acknowledged my mistake deep in my heart and changed tack.

“Two months—no, not that long ago, I was fighting monsters for my life.”

“Thank goodness you came back safely, son.”

“Thank you, Mother.”

“Then why do you keep fighting with your little sister, who’s eight years younger than you, instead of a monster?”

“Mother. I don’t fight people. Therefore, that thing isn’t my little sister. It’s a monster.”

“Then you’re saying I gave birth to a monster.”

“…!”

“My palm or my ladle—which would you prefer?”

Checkmate. Realizing there was no escape, I closed my eyes and answered quietly.

“Your palm.”

“Forearm? Back?”

“I’ll take the back.”

I considered my answer carefully. The punishment came immediately.

“Mom told you—”

Smack!

“Not to fight!”

Smack!

“Didn’t I?”

Smack!

“Eek!”

"Ugh!"

Good heavens. Was that the Flame Divine Palm?

Pain bored into my back, and Hayeon and I screamed.

Even the perfect body known in Murim as the Heavenly Martial Physique was useless now. This fear—and this pain—were engraved on my soul.

I can't dodge, either.

If I did, she would apply the crime of insolence and trigger a tenfold event.

In the end, Hayeon and I weren't released until Mom had stamped her handprints on our backs. Team Leader Choi and the Skeleton King stared at Lady Kim as she turned away, breathing hard. Their eyes were practically shaking.

"Y-Your mother. I was trying to stop them."

"I am American. Citizen of the United States. Do not touch me. Please."

Their desperate attempts to survive were almost pitiful.

Of course, Lady Kim gave them a warm smile as though nothing had happened.

"Oh, my children were making trouble, weren't they? I'm sorry. Neither of them has grown up yet. I'm making breakfast, so come eat with us."

"Th-Thank you."

"Thank you. Thank you, Jeonghee."

What the hell, you son of a bitch?

I could let the rest go, but the Skeleton King was dead for that "Thank you, Jeonghee."

I promised him murder with a look, then headed toward the dining room.

The mansion was enormous, so the distance to the dining room was considerable. But the elevator installed inside the house and the short-range Teleport magic circles made the journey quick.

"…?"

Wait. Now that I thought about it, this was ridiculous. Why was there a Teleport magic circle inside a mansion?

I stared at Team Leader Choi in disbelief. He answered calmly.

"The mansion is quite large. As I understand it, they were installed to reduce travel time."

"…Right. That's what Teleport magic circles are for. Obviously."

He might as well have said, People eat to fill their stomachs.

Then again, perhaps all of this really was normal to Team Leader Choi.

He certainly didn't grow up in an ordinary family.

Even a third-generation Korean chaebol[2567] heir or the youngest son of a famed swordsmanship family would have to defer to him. His maternal grandfather was [2567] A chaebol is a large, family-controlled South Korean business conglomerate.

the immortal hero who had defeated the Demon King Asmodeus in the final battle and saved humanity.

Cheon Taemin.

If the birth of a prophet had divided an era into before and after, Cheon Taemin had decided the fate of humanity.

Tens of millions had seen him. Hundreds of millions remembered him. The vast records of his existence would remain through countless ages, until the day humanity itself came to an end.

And that very Cheon Taemin once lived in this mansion.

Even Team Leader Choi, his maternal grandson, did not know where he was or whether he was alive. But putting that aside, the thought was moving in its own way.

I was only staying here temporarily because the press wouldn't leave me alone, but it felt as though I was sharing a space with the immortal hero Cheon Taemin.

This is incredible.

I looked around the mansion, where immensely valuable A-rank Magic Gems had been slotted in like batteries to provide a constant supply of energy, and drew in a deep breath.

"Hoooh."

Team Leader Choi gave me an uneasy look.

"…What are you doing?"

"Should I say I'm absorbing the energy? Or that I'm sensing the scent of a hero?"

Hayeon rubbed her sore back and muttered, "He's just a pervert. He has a smell fetish."

"Would you be quiet, insolent human girl?"

"Oh, really? Mom—mmph!"

"If you don't want to get murdered tonight, keep your mouth shut."

I was almost thirty. I didn't want to get hit in front of other people again.

Fortunately, someone appeared just before Lady Kim, sensing that something was amiss, turned around.

"Good morning."

A smooth, low voice that sounded like a coffee commercial had started playing. Even at this early hour, his pompadour was immaculate, and his tailored suit was neat and dignified.

Butler Kim approached at an unhurried pace and bowed first to Team Leader Choi.

"Did you sleep well, Young Master?"

Team Leader Choi nodded as though this were perfectly ordinary.

"Yes. I went to bed a little late because I had a few things to take care of, but I'm feeling fine."

"The proposal from Mr. Johnson, I presume."

"A few terms in our agreement with the Wizard Guild need adjusting. I've put the details together, so…"

Hayeon, listening to them, muttered, "Is this a scene from a TV drama or what?"

"Not a drama. If anything, it's a web novel."

A webtoon, maybe. Turning this kind of fantasy into a TV drama would cost a fortune.

"Just let it go. You'll get used to it if you watch long enough."

"To that?"

"…At least try."

Honestly, it still threw me every time.

Barely six months ago in modern-world time, I'd been an F-rank Hunter getting by on blood sausage gukbap[2568] and cup noodles. Now the media hailed me as the new hero following in Cheon Taemin's footsteps, and an S-rank Hunter license made from specially processed top-grade Magic Gems sat in the old leather wallet I still hadn't replaced.

I should be getting used to this by now, but somehow it isn't happening.

Maybe I still had too much to do. Keeping up with one crisis after another while rushing between the modern world and Murim was hard enough. Perhaps it would be stranger if I could settle in and enjoy the wealth and fame I'd been given.

"We can discuss the details after breakfast, Young Master."

"Ah, yes. Let's do that."

Their brief conversation ended, and I followed Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim into the dining room.

No, dining room didn't do it justice. Banquet hall was closer.

It was enormous, spotless, and elegant. Robots equipped with advanced AI waited at their assigned positions.

Yet in this room, where every detail had been prepared with meticulous care, one thing wasn't ready.

"Hmm."

"Just as I thought."

Everyone except Hayeon and me blinked. The Skeleton King sounded genuinely confused when he whispered to me.

"Wicked human. May I ask you something?"

"Go ahead."

[2568] Gukbap is a Korean dish of rice served in hot soup.

“We were told to eat. Why, then, is there nothing on the table?”

The enormous table in the center of the banquet hall was completely empty. No dishes, no food—nothing but a perfect blank slate.

I had already guessed the reason, so I quietly nodded.

“That’s how it works.”

“What?”

“An absolute rule. Or a species-wide habit. Something like that.”

When Mom called us to eat, it meant she was still making the food. Whether she called once or ten times, yelling that everything was ready and we needed to come out right now, the result was the same when we got there.

Hayeon knew it too. She was already looking for the utensils.

“Sorry, where do you keep the spoons and chopsticks?”

“Pardon?”

“Spoons and chopsticks.”

Team Leader Choi blinked, then turned slowly toward Butler Kim.

“Butler Kim?”

At that moment, a single stray hair stuck out from Butler Kim’s perfectly arranged pompadour.

“Those functions are all integrated into the robots’ circuits, so they should bring everything automatically… But why aren’t the robots moving?”

Just then, Lady Kim peeked her head out from the kitchen. She had rushed there earlier with a ladle in hand, saying that the soup was boiling.

“Oh, I turned them all off.”

“What?”

“Pardon?”

“I already feel bad imposing on you. It seemed a waste of electricity. The kids can set things out in no time, so please, have a seat.”

“…”

“…”

There was no way Lady Kim would hear that every robot in the mansion ran on embedded Magic Gems rather than electricity, or that there was no need to save money on the electric bill.

She was a veteran homemaker who had spent her life scrimping and scraping to raise two children.

As everyone stared at me, speechless, I merely smacked my lips.

“Just accept it. I’ve tried explaining it more than once or twice, but it never gets through.”

She’d even saved every bit of the money I sent home, saying she couldn’t possibly spend it.

Remembering her old days working in a restaurant kitchen, I smiled bitterly, then smacked the Skeleton King on the back of the head.

Whack!

“Why me…?”

“What are you doing, asshole? Go help.”

“Wicked human. This is unfair. And un-American!”

“Then go to America. The moment you arrive, they’ll find out you’re a monster and drag you off to the Octagon.”

Team Leader Choi stared at me in bewilderment.

“It’s the Pentagon, Mr. Jin Taekyung…”

“Octagon, Pentagon—whatever. You and Butler Kim go help too.”

“Pardon?”

“We’re eating together. We should all help get it ready.”

Team Leader Choi’s gaze wavered.

“Eating… together?”

“You heard me. Go set out the utensils. I’ll be watching to make sure you do it properly.”

His gaze steadied again.

“Watching?”

“Yes.”

“And what about you, Mr. Jin Taekyung? Aren’t you doing anything?”

“It’s my birthday. Even at the Hunter training camp, they gave people free time on their birthdays.”

“…”

“What are you waiting for? We need to be ready before the seaweed soup[2569] comes out.”

His parents had died, his grandfather Cheon Taemin had disappeared, and Lee Jungryong had shut him out afterward. But Team Leader Choi was still the Young Master of a wealthy household.

This must have been something he had never experienced in his life.

I let out a quiet laugh as he walked away with Butler Kim, wearing a dazed expression I’d never seen on him before. Then I sat down and pulled out my smartphone.

Nothing beats the news when you need to figure out what’s going on.

Tap. Tap-tap.

A few touches took me to a large online community open only to Hunters. I found an article posted just ten minutes earlier, and my hand stopped.

[2569] In Korea, seaweed soup is traditionally eaten on birthdays.

> Former Ares Guild Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong, 68: National funeral scheduled for tomorrow.
>
> Where is the immortal hero Cheon Taemin?
>
> Amid global attention, Ares Guild members remaining in Sichuan Province depart the country. Interest from around the world turns to Hunter Go Jun, the late Lee Jungryong's Head of Security…

"Go Jun."

Right. That guy was still around.

Chapter 554

The monster wave in Sichuan Province, dubbed the Small Cataclysm, had devoured so much.

Buildings, people, hope… More than four million people were dead or injured, and property damage ran into the hundreds of trillions of won.[2570]

But as someone once said, people leave their names behind when they die. Among the countless dead, a few names stood out.

[Search Efforts Exhausted, but the Hero's Remains Were Never Found]

[Who Was the Late Lee Jungryong?]

[The Immortal Hero Cheon Taemin Always Had One Person at His Side]

[Wu Heixing and Lee Jungryong: Their Deaths Were the Same, but Their Nobility Was Not]

[Late Lee Jungryong to Receive National Funeral… Waves of Mourning Pour In from Around the World]

Every article occupying the top of the major forum sites contained the same person's name.

Lee Jungryong. Another hero of the Great Cataclysm, who had wielded full authority over the Ares Guild in place of the vanished Cheon Taemin.

No. A hero of the past now, I suppose.

Lee Jungryong was dead.

The world had been told that the Lich killed him, but I was the one who had ended his life.

Yes. That day.

I had broken Wu Heixing's neck while he begged me to spare him, then driven the blade of my spear into Lee Jungryong's chest and reduced him to ash.

There had been no other choice. I'd gone with them all the way to the Lich's stronghold despite suspecting they might stab me in the back. That was the last chance I'd given them.

Last meant there wouldn't be another.

Even if it hadn't happened then, I would have killed him eventually.

If Wu Heixing had been like a fish bone stuck in my throat, Lee Jungryong had been a blade digging into it.

He was as strong as a beast of prey and as cunning as a fox. When I first met him, he had seemed like a wall I could never overcome. I'd brought him down only because I'd grown far faster than he thought possible.

If Lee Jungryong had been a little bolder, things might have turned out differently…

[2570] "Hundreds of trillions of won" is roughly 200–900 trillion won: about $140–640 billion and €130–580 billion.

But he had misjudged me, and here was the result: me, reading about his death on my smartphone on the first day of the new year.

His final words flashed through my mind.

"I… have no regrets. None."

Lee Jungryong had been smiling when he said them.

His entire body was drenched in blood and battered beyond recognition, yet as he smiled brightly, his eyes burned with the obsession and fury he had refused to let go of until the very end.

As if this wasn't over. As if he'd become a vengeful spirit and haunt me even after death.

Well, he couldn't haunt me now that he was dead. But on one point, I agreed with him: it wasn't over.

There was still someone in this world who was practically another Lee Jungryong.

Go Jun.

Lee Jungryong's blindly devoted Head of Security. No—his Disciple.

I stared down at my smartphone and tapped an article.

Tap.

An image filled the screen at once. It showed Ares Guild members departing Sichuan Province, with Go Jun among them, his face set and rigid.

[Ares Guild Heads Home for the Funeral of the Late Lee Jungryong]

[Who Is Go Jun, Head of Security for the Late Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong?]

I read the bold headlines and scrolled down to the long stream of comments.

>
> ㄴ I don't know whether Jun Dragon[2571] was a good person. I heard some pretty suspicious stories about him, too.

>
> ㄴ King-sized possibility. Other communities are already digging into Go Jun's background. Apparently, he came from a children's home—orphanage?—that Lee Jungryong sponsored. He's never taken the ranker test, but they say he's stronger than the highest-ranked rankers.
>
> ㄴ So is he Ares Guild's next Vice Guild Master?

Clink.

The sudden noise drew my eyes from the phone.

Team Leader Choi had set the tableware down beside me. He looked faintly displeased.

“What are you reading so intently?”

“Something about you in the article comments, Team Leader Choi.”

“Pardon?”

“It’d be quicker to show you. Just a moment.”

I looked back at my phone and smacked my lips. The comment had been deleted in the brief time I’d looked away.

He said he was scared and would delete it. He really did delete it and run.

“What comment?”

“It’s gone now. But it was definitely about you.”

“If it was about me… was it related to my maternal grandfather?”

I gave a small nod.

I wasn’t the only one who’d drawn attention during the Small Cataclysm in Sichuan Province. While the world was in an uproar over the monster wave caused by the Lich, the media and the public had barely stopped talking about me. But at some point, word of Team Leader Choi had begun to spread as well.

A needle in a bag.[2576]

That was Team Leader Choi. He’d learned martial arts from me and taken his skills to another level, then distinguished himself on the battlefield. He was also handsome enough to put a celebrity to shame. The attention from people who cared about looks alone was nothing to sneeze at.

And he was Cheon Taemin’s only living blood relative.

But Lee Jungryong had kept Team Leader Choi’s existence under wraps while he was alive. Team Leader Choi had done the same.

Until then, the two of them had been a dinosaur and an ant. Even if revealing his identity turned him into a golden ant, he would still be an ant.

Now Lee Jungryong was dead, and the truth they’d hidden—whether by choice or circumstance—was slowly coming to light.

What bothered me was how natural it all seemed. How perfectly timed.

I gazed steadily at Team Leader Choi.

“This was what you intended, wasn’t it, Team Leader Choi?”

“To be honest, yes. I judged that now was the right time.”

“Wow. I didn’t expect you to admit it. Have you always been this honest?”

[2576] A Korean idiom meaning that exceptional talent will eventually reveal itself, even when hidden.

“What else do I have to hide from you, Mr. Jin Taekyung? Of course, even if I’m honest with you, you still have plenty of secrets.”

“…You didn’t have to put it like that.”

A twinge of guilt caught me off guard.

I already knew Team Leader Choi suspected there was more to me than he’d been told. Since getting the System, I’d spent more time with him than with anyone else in the modern world, and I’d heard him say as much himself.

Still, when he came right out with it, I had no answer.

I scratched my chin awkwardly.

“Putting that aside, can I ask you a few things?”

“Go ahead. The seaweed soup[2577] will be out soon, so you’ll have to be quick.”

“If this was your plan, wouldn’t it have been better for me to tell everyone what Lee Jungryong was really like?”

Lee Jungryong’s and Wu Heixing’s deaths had been blamed on the Lich. The truth had been buried, which was why people were mourning them with some goodwill.

Wu Heixing had always been a rotten bastard, and the atrocities involving his family had come to light, so people were still cursing him after his death. Lee Jungryong, on the other hand, was being mourned as a fallen great star.

They were giving him a national funeral. That said it all.

If the truth had come out, things would have been different. I might not have had hard evidence, but I’d earned enough Fame as a new hero that people couldn’t simply dismiss my testimony as nonsense.

Lee Jungryong’s reputation would have been ruined, and Team Leader Choi’s plan would have gone smoothly.

“But you told me not to tell the media what Lee Jungryong had done.”

Team Leader Choi nodded calmly.

“Yes, I did.”

“Why?”

His answer came without a moment’s hesitation.

“Because I didn’t want to dirty what’s mine.”

“What?”

“Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong was certainly a man with an ugly side. He helped my maternal grandfather and made major contributions during the Great Cataclysm, but he gradually became corrupted. He took full control of the Ares Guild and committed all kinds of crimes. The important thing is…”

Team Leader Choi went on in a dry voice.

“The blame wouldn’t fall on Lee Jungryong alone. It would fall on the entire Ares Guild.”

[2577] In Korea, seaweed soup is traditionally eaten on birthdays.

"…!"

"The Ares Guild's influence is immense. My maternal grandfather has been out of sight for years, and Lee Jungryong is dead, but people still have absolute faith in its power."

Clink.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung."

Team Leader Choi ran his fingers over the perfectly clean tableware, his eyes sinking into deep stillness.

"I don't want food splashed with filth. Even if there's hair in it and it's crawling with maggots, it must look better than anything else on the outside. I want it in my hands with all its influence intact."

I'd overlooked the power of the Ares name. Its influence.

And Team Leader Choi wanted the Ares Guild whole, without a blemish on its surface. He wanted all that power and influence for himself.

Removing the hair Lee Jungryong had planted and picking out the vermin would come afterward.

"I've waited a long time for this."

Team Leader Choi murmured the words, his eyes glinting coldly.

Chapter 555

He was built like an iron tower. His expression was as hard and unchanging as stone, his lips pressed tightly together.

And then… there were his eyes.

Bloodshot eyes filled with rage, grief, and emotions too tangled to name. Meeting his gaze alone was enough to send a chill down anyone's spine.

Even the Prime Minister of Korea—a permanent member of the UN Security Council and one of the world's great powers—was no exception.

What the hell is with that look…?

The gaze struck him like a blade the moment he entered the room. The Prime Minister flinched, then forced his pounding heart to settle.

The man before him might be one of Korea's most formidable Hunters, but he himself had spent sixty years of life in the mud of politics. There was no reason to be intimidated before they had even begun to talk.

Especially not now.

Having recovered some of his composure, the Prime Minister held out his hand.

"Oh, there you are, Mr. Go Jun."

Go Jun stared at the offered hand. Instead of shaking it, he answered in a dry voice.

"It's been a while, Prime Minister Jang."

That was no way to treat either a man considerably older than himself or the prime minister of his country. Wrinkles bunched across Prime Minister Jang's forehead.

"…Ha. You must be grieving more deeply than I realized. I understand how you feel."

"Understand?"

Go Jun's eyes grew redder. No one could understand what he was feeling.

Yet this sly old raccoon had the nerve to smile and say that.

Crack.

The bones in his clenched fist shifted with an audible snap.

Go Jun had once been so quiet and sparing with his emotions that he seemed carved from stone. The death of Lee Jungryong, the man he had respected and followed more than anyone, had changed him unmistakably.

"Ahem."

Prime Minister Jang was not too oblivious to notice. He glanced uneasily at Go Jun's fist and lowered himself awkwardly into a chair.

"I seem to have misspoken. If I offended you, I apologize."

"…It's fine. I let my emotions get the better of me as well."

Go Jun forced down his boiling anger.

He was no longer the orphan of thirty-odd years ago, with nothing left to lose. He had what his Master had passed down to protect, and a mountain of work to do if he meant to protect it.

“But did you really come alone, Prime Minister?”

There it was. Prime Minister Jang answered the abrupt question as calmly as he could.

“I did.”

“Then where is the President?”

“I imagine you already know where he is.”

Prime Minister Jang glanced toward the covered window. Specially treated blackout curtains hid the view, but drawing them back would reveal the Blue House[2578] directly beyond.

“The President has pressing matters to attend to. He’ll come when the national funeral officially begins in three hours. I believe his office already informed you…?”

As Prime Minister Jang’s words trailed off, Go Jun’s gaze darkened.

“That’s why I asked again. I couldn’t believe what I’d been told.”

“What?”

“Prime Minister Jang. No…”

Go Jun leaned forward from the sofa. The old politician’s reflection appeared in his red eyes, and a chilling voice passed his lips.

“Mr. Jang Taekhwan.”

“…!”

“Stop screwing around and let’s speak frankly. Go back and arrange a private meeting with the President right now. There are still three hours before the national funeral proceedings begin, so I’ll give you one hour.”

“H-Hey! How dare you—”

“How dare I?”

Crsh.

Prime Minister Jang’s eyes widened. The sturdy crystal glass in Go Jun’s hand was crumbling into fine powder, spilling between his fingers.

At the same time, the change in Go Jun’s tone cut into the Prime Minister’s ears.

“That’s right. How dare you act like this. Have you forgotten who paved the easy road you’ve walked all these years?”

“Y-You…”

The old politician’s voice shook.

[2578] The Blue House is the name of South Korea’s presidential office and residence.

Go Jun was telling the truth. The name Ares Guild was an indelible stain on Prime Minister Jang's decades in politics.

They were the ones who had cleaned up the filth he left behind, wiped his ass, and loaded heavy boxes into his car trunk.

But…

"That—that was Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong! Not you!"

"That's right. It was all the Vice Guild Master's doing. No—my Master's."

A dry smile touched Go Jun's lips.

"And now it's my job."

"…!"

"Don't get the wrong idea. He may be dead, but the Ares Guild still stands."

The Ares Guild was an impregnable fortress.

Cheon Taemin, the immortal hero and savior of humanity, had laid its cornerstone. Lee Jungryong had built walls no one dared challenge.

"There isn't a place in Yeouido[2579]—or anywhere in this country—beyond our reach."

This was a world ruled by the laws of capitalism.

None of the world's ten largest Guilds appeared in Forbes's annual rankings of major corporations. Everyone knew how much power and wealth those Guilds held anyway, and how much influence the Ares Guild held even among them.

Now that power would pass from the dead to the living.

"Do you think all he left me was his dying wish?"

"W-What?"

Prime Minister Jang's eyes widened. According to the NIS,[2580] Lee Jungryong had left no will.

No—there was not supposed to be a will.

The ignorant public had been talking about it endlessly, but the Prime Minister had firmly believed the information he had received.

"Then you…"

Go Jun's eyes flashed red.

"You should call me Vice Guild Master, not 'you.'"

"…!"

A faint tremor ran through the old politician's body. After a suffocating silence, he spoke weakly.

"Mr. Go Jun. No, Vice Guild Master Go. The situation isn't as simple as you think."

[2579] Yeouido is a district of Seoul that houses South Korea's National Assembly and major financial institutions.

[2580] The NIS is South Korea's National Intelligence Service.

The red light in Go Jun's eyes gradually faded. His voice remained dry, but his tone softened somewhat.

"I know. That's why you'll have to work harder, Prime Minister Jang. You and the others."

"Whew. That's… not easy. There are rumors, too."

"Rumors?"

"Hunter Jin Taekyung. No—I'm not trying to talk about him. Of course, he is connected to this to a considerable degree."

Prime Minister Jang had hurried to explain himself when Go Jun reacted to the name. He continued.

"You already know about the young Team Leader from the Peace Guild, don't you? His name is Choi Minwoo, I believe."

"…Go on."

"Since Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong passed away, people around us have had plenty to say. Even with someone to succeed him… it's true that the Ares Guild isn't what it used to be."

Lee Jungryong had been a symbol in his own right.

He was a hero who had suppressed the Great Cataclysm at Cheon Taemin's side, as well as an S-rank Hunter counted among the very best in the entire world.

His death would not bring the Ares Guild down overnight. But its strength and influence were bound to diminish sharply.

Damn it.

Go Jun knew that. Better than anyone.

The grumbling and resistance already rising throughout the Guild were proof. So was Prime Minister Jang's attitude—something he would never have dared while Lee Jungryong was alive.

If Master were here. If he were still alive…

The words lingered on Go Jun's tongue, but he did not let them out.

He could not afford to show any more uncertainty. His face hardened as he spoke.

"You seem to have plenty of worries, Prime Minister Jang. And plenty of time."

"What does that—"

"The Ares Guild will handle its own affairs. You should handle yours."

"No, that's not what I—"

Go Jun watched him try to explain, then leaned back against the sofa.

"Fifty minutes."

"F-Fifty minutes? What do you mean?"

"Ten minutes have passed since I gave you an hour. That leaves fifty. I don't think you have time to sit here any longer. Am I wrong?"

"…!"

It was a clear dismissal: arrange the private meeting with the President, whatever it took, before the national funeral began.

Prime Minister Jang rose on unsteady legs and turned toward the door. Go Jun's quiet voice reached him from behind.

"One more thing. That person… the Guild Master won't be coming. Keep everyone in line so there's no gossip."

What more could he say?

Prime Minister Jang nodded weakly and left the private room.

Click.

The door sounded unusually loud as it shut. Go Jun stared at the empty place where the Prime Minister had been, then glanced down at his left arm.

Two black stripes marked his mourning armband. With no suitable blood relative to take the role for Lee Jungryong, Go Jun had become the chief mourner.

Master. Are you at peace there?

He could not remember his parents' faces, yet he missed the face of Lee Jungryong—a man who shared none of his blood—with a pain that cut deep.

He would probably never forget his Master. Nor would he forget the two names that followed him like tags.

"…Jin Taekyung. Choi Minwoo."

The man who had killed his Master. And the man who meant to take everything his Master had built.

His voice came hot through clenched teeth, and his eyes burned redder than ever.

Still trembling with rage, Go Jun suddenly felt at his neck.

Clink.

Cold metal met his fingertips. He unclasped the necklace and stared down at it. Its plating had worn away in patches, leaving it ugly and battered.

Master.

He knew this necklace was not Lee Jungryong. It was not even something Lee Jungryong had left behind.

But one thing was certain.

It was the only thing that had kept its shape in the ruins of what had once been the Arch Lich's stronghold.

It was a mere trinket. To Go Jun, it had been worth paying the head of the investigation team a fortune in bribes to smuggle it out.

"…Whew."

Go Jun let out a deep sigh and rose from his seat.

He was the chief mourner at this grand funeral. He had to greet the countless people waiting outside and show his face to media from around the world, making clear who now wielded power in the Ares Guild.

Click.

When he opened the door, dozens of men and women lined up along the corridor bowed their heads.

Their eyes were fierce, and even their smallest movements carried force. Each one looked every bit the A-rank Hunter they were.

They were Go Jun's new hands and feet.

"Let's go."

At his quiet command, dozens of footsteps crossed the corridor.

The national funeral for Lee Jungryong, former Vice Guild Master of the Ares Guild, lasted five days and was held on a grand scale.

Media and powerful figures from around the world came to Korea. Hundreds of thousands of citizens took to the streets to mourn while the funeral was under way.

But not everyone did. To people hungry today, someone else's death could feel very far away.

Slash!

Stab-stab-stab!

"Kill it! Stab it now!"

"Keep your distance! Hey, you bastard! Don't rush out!"

—Kieeeek!

Shrill cries rang through a damp, dark cave.

Weapons deliberately smeared with mud to dull their shine moved without pause, seeking to end their enemies' lives.

Whoosh—thud!

"Seongha!"

"You monster bastards!"

—Kik. Kiririik!

The battle between Hunters and monsters was fierce, and desperate besides.

Then, as the two species' differently colored blood sprayed in every direction—

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The ground shook. Stalactites fell from the cave ceiling.

At the same moment, a surge of powerful magical power swept through the Gate from somewhere. The humans screamed.

"A Mutated Gate!"

"Fuck…"

That much magical power could not come from a low-level Gate. Mid-level at the very least. No, high-level.

Perhaps higher still.

Th-This is…

It's over.

Death. Just as despair settled over every face at the thought of it, someone's sighing voice echoed through the dark cave.

"Fuck. Brings back old memories."

Chapter 556

Whew.

I looked around with a sigh.

A damp, chilly cave. Narrow passages tangled together like a maze. Sharp stalactites hanging from the ceiling. Exhausted faces, frightened out of their minds.

Just like back then.

Three years ago. No—if I counted the time I'd spent in Murim, it had been four.

The accident that day remained seared into my heart like an indelible brand, and even now, after taking my revenge, I still couldn't completely forget it.

"Fuck. Brings back old memories."

Unlike me, muttering gruffly, the Skeleton King smiled fondly.

"I feel the same. It is as though I have returned to what you humans call home."

"…"

That's not what I meant, man.

We seemed to be remembering entirely different things. For all I knew, this guy might have been Skeleton One, some skeleton I'd run into back when I was going from one low-level Gate to the next.

Anyway…

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

That wave of magical power is much stronger than I expected.

It was lucky we had been nearby. Otherwise, twenty hardworking living people would almost have been wiped out.

I beckoned to the Hunters staring blankly at us.

"It's dangerous. Come over here."

A man in his late twenties who looked like the Team Leader blinked.

"W-What?"

"I said come over here. Hurry."

"W-Who are you?"

The cave was dark, and they were standing a considerable distance away. Their level was far too low for them to make out my face from that far.

I scratched my chin awkwardly. "I'm… Uh, look behind you."

"What?"

Their reaction was slow. Instead of answering, I snapped my fingers.

Whoosh—boom!

A faint whistle cut through the air, and green blood splattered everywhere. Behind one of the Hunters, a rusty ax slipped from the hand of a goblin that had been creeping up on him.

Then its headless body collapsed like a rotten log.

Thud!

“Gah!”

“Behind you! Watch your backs!”

“What the hell is this?”

What else? Finger Qi.

I muttered inwardly as I watched the Hunters hurriedly reform their ranks, then realized something.

It’ll be faster if I go to them than if they come to me.

They were struggling against goblins before they’d even made it halfway through the Gate. Being low-level Hunters was one thing, but they couldn’t have much experience, either.

The Skeleton King swept back his blond hair and put on a solemn expression.

“Hmph. It seems the time has come for this body to take the field.”

“Stay put. Don’t get cocky.”

“…”

I knew what needed doing, so there was no reason to hesitate. I headed toward them, neither hurrying nor taking my time.

Step.

One step. At the same time, ten streams of Finger Qi shot from my outstretched hands and tore through the air.

Whoosh—thud-thud-thud-thud!

Once more.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

And again.

Boom!

It took only a moment for nearly thirty goblins to end up sprawled across the ground as headless corpses. The last to fall was a hobgoblin that looked like their leader.

And then…

Step.

With my third and final step, a sphere of light summoned by an unknown mage’s Light magic shone on my face.

Flash.

“…!”

"…!"

An invisible shock wave and wave of agitation swept through the cave.

For a moment, everyone stared at my face in a daze. Then cries burst out from all around, like water breaking through a dam.

"L-Lord Fuck!"

"Lord Sibu-leol!"

"J-J-Jin Taekyung!"

The last one was better, at least.

The stutter had stretched my name to six syllables, but compared to those nicknames, it was practically respectable. Vice-minister[2581] respectable.

Come to think of it, the name fit the situation. The vibrations had grown steadily stronger, and now the whole cave was sh-sh-sh-shaking like a fucking earthquake.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The Skeleton King sauntered over, dodged a falling stalactite, and muttered, "This much commotion does not bode well."

"Tell me about it."

The magical power I was feeling was as far beyond what belonged in this E-rank Gate—or F-rank, even—as the Nanman Beast Palace was from Henan.

I clicked my tongue and beckoned to the still-stunned Hunters.

"Like I said, it's dangerous, so come over—"

Patter-patter-patter-patter!

"Whoa. You startled me."

"Undead, have mercy."

What was that, a Blink spell?

Being famous did have its advantages. Some old lady named Kim in the middle of nowhere had probably heard of me. Of course Hunters in the same line of work would know who I was.

Before I could finish speaking, all twenty of them came running at the speed of light. They looked at me with fear and trust in their eyes.

"Hyung.[2582] I'm a fan. A real fan."

"Eek! What do I do? What do I dooo?"

"…Thanks, but are you all out of your minds?"

How were they thinking about that at a time like this? I shook my head in disbelief and looked for the Team Leader.

At least he seemed to understand how serious things were. His face was stiff as he rummaged through his pocket and held something out to me.

[2581] A vice-minister served beneath a minister in a government department of Korea's Joseon dynasty.

[2582] Hyung is a familiar Korean form of address used by a younger man for an older brother or older male acquaintance.

“Could I get your autograph? Please write, ‘Go, Hunter Lee Seungyeop!‘”

“…”

“Please. I’ll make it a family heirloom and pass it down for generations.”

“…”

Ah, fuck. I had no words.

Feeling miserable, I scrawled my signature across the briefing board. The Team Leader cautiously added, “And if it wouldn’t be too much trouble, could you swear once?”

“What?”

“Swear at me. It’s my wish.”

“…You fucking bastard.”

“Thank you! Thank you!”

“I meant it.”

“Gasp.”

One person—or rather, one monster—watched the exchange with obvious envy.

“You are rather popular, wretched human. They say that if one defecates, one becomes famous and people applaud.”

“…”

He had that backward somehow. Taking a shit in public might make you famous, but wouldn’t people slap you instead of applauding?

I didn’t have time to correct the Skeleton King’s distorted understanding. Just as I opened my mouth, the cave, already shaking like an earthquake had struck, lurched violently.

Rumble-rumble—crack!

The ground split, and cracks spread across the ceiling like a spiderweb. One of the Hunters groaned, “Is it collapsing…?”

Half right. Half wrong.

While everyone stared at the ceiling, which looked ready to come crashing down at any moment, I was the only one who knew what was happening below as well.

Crack. Crack-crack.

A sprout pushed its way through the solid rock covering the ground.

Dark red. Even as I watched, it grew at a frightening pace.

It produced thorns. A flower bud burst open, scattering seeds that soon began spreading in every direction.

Crack-crack-crack-crack!

“W-What is that?”

“Eeeeeek!”

“Ugh!”

“Cut it! Chop it down!”

The Hunters finally noticed and sprang into action. But screaming and hacking at the undergrowth did nothing to stop it from spreading.

Because this wasn’t happening only here.

Even if the Skeleton King and I stepped in, we couldn’t make it through the entire Gate and deal with all of it in so little time.

This is…

Not a simple collapse. A change.

The entire Gate was taking on a new form.

Mutation. Literally.

Before everyone’s horrified eyes, the Mutated Gate neared the end of its transformation.

Rumble-rumble-rumble. Boom!

The hairline cracks spreading across the ceiling darkened, and the gaps opened wide. It looked as though a giant egg—the cave itself—was breaking open.

And then…

Crack!

Beyond the ceiling, where nothing should have existed, something appeared, wreathed in red light and dim mist.

A vast space that dwarfed the cave. Dense vegetation. Heat as muggy as a wet sauna.

“What is that?”

“A-A jungle?”

Everyone was struck speechless. The Skeleton King whispered so that only I could hear.

“Wretched human. This body’s power is growing stronger.”

Illusion magic hid his true appearance, but the Skeleton King was a monster. If his power was growing stronger, it meant one thing.

The amount and density of the magical power.

I couldn’t see it. But I could feel it.

Whoosh…

Immense magical power filled the air. It had swelled almost to bursting, pressing down on the jungle.

It was a level of magical power that would be difficult to sense even in an A-rank Gate. There was no chance ordinary low-level Hunters could withstand it.

“Hhk. Hhk.”

“I-I can’t… breathe…”

Their pupils gradually lost focus, and they staggered. Not one of the twenty Hunters was spared. As they began passing out one by one, the Skeleton King frowned at me for standing by and watching.

"Wretched human. You…"

"This is better."

"What?"

"Nothing good would come of them staying awake."

"…!"

I had to conceal the Skeleton King's existence as much as possible. If so, it was better to remove these people from the situation from the beginning, as long as doing so didn't endanger their lives.

The fewer witnesses, the better.

Thud.

Once the last Hunter had lost consciousness, the Skeleton King nodded at my signal and snapped his fingers.

Crack-crack-crack!

Countless bones rose from somewhere and closed around the Hunters without leaving a gap. The Skeleton King looked smug.

"Done. Since this body has personally demonstrated its abilities, the safety of those humans is guaranteed."

I studied the small dome. "I don't know. I think you should reinforce it."

"Tsk, tsk. Wretched human, you are distrustful indeed. This would hold firm even against a horde of ogres."

Ogres were monsters whose terrifying strength was always considered among the highest, regardless of their Grade.

"It'd probably be fine against ogres. But those things look a little different."

"Huh?"

The Skeleton King turned to look. In the vast jungle, something was slowly rising to its feet.

Twenty meters[2583] tall. Arms and legs longer and thicker than the countless giant trees around it.

And…

One enormous eye gazing down at the earth.

A Cyclops.

Mist shrouded the mythical giant from head to toe. Its single eye turned toward us, and an eerie voice boomed like thunder.

—Intruders. Humans. Kill.

[2583] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

And the next moment—

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

Along with the System notification drilling into my ears, the jungle shook.

No. It came alive.

Flap-flap!

Nameless birds shot into the sky. Beneath their beating wings, hundreds of trees rose with monstrous cries.

Ancient tree spirits from countless tales. Ents awoke from their slumber and roared.

—Gwoooooar!

—Grrrrrrrr!

One person—or rather, one monster—had watched it all in silence. He promptly changed his mind.

"…I shall reinforce the humans' barrier."

"Uh, yeah."

Crack-crack.

Far more bones than before surged upward, piling on in layer after layer.

The Skeleton King took care to finish the reinforcement, then fixed a grave stare on the advancing jungle.

"Ready, Jin?"

"Of course, King… Wait, where the hell did you learn this kind of thing?"

"The internet. It is entertaining."

"You bastard. Once we get out of here, I'm confiscating your phone."

I muttered a threat at him, then spoke under my breath.

"Inventory open. Summon."

At my command, the shaft of White Flame appeared in my empty hand. Its familiar feel was one I hadn't known in a long time.

I looked around at what had become a battlefield, and a smile touched my lips.

Let's go.

Whoosh.

[2584] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. In this martial-arts context, three jiazi describes the equivalent of 180 years of accumulated cultivation, not the cultivator's age.

Three jiazi[2584] of Scorching Yang Qi surged up from my lower dantian, became a fire dragon, and spread through every limb and bone in my body.

Chapter 557

Whew.

My breath mingled with the muggy air of the forest. Watching the enemies closing in from every direction, I quietly muttered to myself.

Keep my center low. Keep my lower body firm. When launching an attack…

Be fierce. Don't hesitate.

Flash.

The instant I half-opened my eyes, I kicked off the ground.

Bam—!

Compressed air burst from my toes, and tremendous wind pressure slammed into me. My superhuman body pushed through it. Leaning into the wind, I shot forward like a cannonball.

Whoooosh!

My hair whipped wildly. The forest blurred past.

Behind me, the Skeleton King yelled at me to take him along, but the rush of air swallowed his voice.

The hundreds of monsters advancing through the deep, sticky swamp and trampling the dense undergrowth were suddenly right in front of me.

—Gwoooooar!

Hundreds of them. Or hundreds of trees.

I didn't know which word to use for monsters called Ents, but I knew one thing.

I'll win.

That wasn't a guess. I was certain. Even the Cyclops watching from behind the Ents as though it were their king was no exception.

The three jiazi[2585] of Scorching Yang Qi coursing through me were my proof. I'd defeated countless powerful enemies to get here; I was my own witness. And the blue-white Force rising around White Flame's spearhead was the judge.

The verdict came swiftly, and it was destructive.

Now.

Hiss.

Blue flames evaporated the moisture around me. In less than an instant, White Flame's transparent spearhead had swept diagonally across the Ents at the front.

Shwaak!

There was no explosive sound. No scream.

Only a gust of wind, and a faint line drawn through the air by the Extreme Yang energy on my spearhead.

[2585] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional Chinese calendar; three jiazi are 180 years.

The line looked like part of something that belonged in a legend.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear. First form.

Fire Dragon's Single Tail.

Before I could even finish thinking the four syllables of the form's name, the faint line suspended in the air rippled.

The dormant blue-white flames awoke from their brief slumber.

Fwoosh.

Tiny embers flared. Feeding on the Ents' trunks, branches, and lush leaves, the flames became hellfire and devoured everything the line had touched.

Kraaaaaash—!

Blue-white light burst outward, illuminating the forest.

In its wake, the ground lay blackened and melted. Hundreds of Ents stood frozen in place. Then a clear bell rang from somewhere.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

Critical Strike!
You defeated Level 95 Corrupted Ent Great Warrior!
You defeated Level 90 Corrupted Ent Vanguard!
You defeated Level 89 Corrupted Ent Vanguard!
...
...
...
Since the level difference between you and the defeated targets is 20 or more, the EXP gained is reduced.
Since you defeated 20 or more Corrupted Ents with a single strike, bonus EXP has been awarded!
You obtained a large amount of EXP and Fame!

But the System notifications didn't end there.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You have been surrounded by a great many enemies. But do not be afraid. It is not you who must retreat, but the enemy.
The effect of the Title One Against a Thousand has activated!
Number of identified enemies: 281
Since you are facing a large number of enemies, all your attributes will temporarily increase according to the number of enemies.
When fighting a large number of enemies, your Stamina consumption during battle is greatly reduced, and you will not easily feel fatigue!

One Against a Thousand.

Two months ago, I'd earned the Title by single-handedly sweeping away the undead army serving the Arch Lich. At last, it was showing its worth.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

The bells rang in quick succession, and all my attributes—including Strength and Stamina—rose slightly.

But that wasn't all. One of the greatest effects of One Against a Thousand was its ability to maximize a single attribute.

SYSTEM

Intimidation has increased dramatically!
Your majesty and aura, rising like a wildfire, are overwhelming your enemies!
Your enemies are greatly intimidated by your Intimidation!
Your allies' morale is greatly increased by your Intimidation!

Intimidation.

The power to suppress enemies and encourage allies. An ability that could change the flow of an entire battlefield instead of affecting only me. The System's information hadn't been wrong in the slightest.

The encirclement closing around me faltered. Thick branches that had been thrashing violently stopped in place.

—Gwooooo…

The Ents—evil spirits dwelling in giant trees—let out frightened cries. Hundreds of pairs of black eyes trembled between their hard bark.

Fear.

I knew the feeling. Once, it had been mine. Now it belonged to the enemies facing me.

Exhilaration rose in my chest as I took a step forward.

Step.

—Gwoooooar…

—Grrk. Gwooooo…

Rumble-rumble-rumble.

The Ents retreated as I advanced.

No—the entire jungle moved.

The magical power they released as they huddled together was crushed beneath the wave of qi and Intimidation radiating from me.

Power. Momentum.

They couldn't match me in either of the two things that decided a battle. I had no reason not to fight, and no reason I couldn't win.

There was, of course, one variable.

—Kraaaaaaaar!

The Cyclops.

The mythical giant's roar shook the jungle. Its single eye was larger than a boulder, and the Ents that had been edging backward on their roots flinched.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Giant's Roar has activated!
The effect of Intimidation has been slightly neutralized!
Some enemies have escaped the pressure of Intimidation!

A fitting ability for the boss monster of this Gate.

But even the Cyclops couldn't completely lift the pressure on them, and I had no intention of giving it more time.

No. Correction.

We had no intention of giving it more time.

"Haaap!"

Krkrkrkrk! Pow-pow-pow!

With a powerful shout, a spear of bone shot through the air and pierced the Ents.

The Skeleton King had caught up with me. He was raising hell.

“Come at me, you worthless monsters!”

“…”

The bastard had completely lost track of what he was.

Apparently getting the full benefit of One Against a Thousand, he charged ahead without a thought.

“How dare you oppose this exalted body! Die! Die! Dieee!”

Papapapat!

The Skeleton King might have been a little off his rocker, but he was still a Named Monster who had undergone an evolution. There was no denying his power.

Bones erupted from the ground and the air, snapping branches and piercing Ent trunks without pause.

Pow-pow-pow!

“How dare you wave those adorable little leaves before this body!”

Craack!

“No matter how many of you attack, it’s like striking bone with an egg!”

—Gwoooooar!

The Ents’ mournful cries rang through the scene of forest destruction.

The Skeleton King’s arrival had cleared a path. I shot down it like an arrow.

Whoooosh! Slash!

I swept past like the wind, slashing in every direction. Flames crossed the air, and the Ents vanished before they could even scream.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

Hearing the bells ring noisily in my ears, I twisted aside. A tree trunk shot toward me with tremendous force, grazed my side, and pierced the ground.

Boom!

Mud exploded upward. I stepped onto another stem whipping toward me and sprang lightly into the air.

Tap. Swish.

Since Mungyeong’s lessons, my movements had grown smoother and more precise. I glided forward like a feather and arrived before an unusually massive tree.

Level 102 Corrupted Ent Elder

—H-u-man! D-i-e!

Its level wasn’t the only thing that was high. The Ent Elder had enough intelligence to speak.

I brought my spearhead down diagonally without hesitation.

“Welcome, Chikorita.[2586]”

[2586] Chikorita is a Grass-type Pokémon.

—…!

Whoosh. Slash!

The hundreds of branches it hastily gathered to defend itself were useless. So were the thorns it fired at me.

Along the path of my spearhead, the tree—several meters[2587] around—slowly split apart.

Crash! Fwoosh!

It fell with a thunderous crash and burst into flames.

I kicked off its stump, dense growth rings exposed, and shot upward. At last, I came face-to-face with the gigantic being blocking out the sky.

Level 130 'Red Eye' Cyclops

There it was. The master of this jungle. A savage, one-eyed giant with hundreds of Ents for servants.

Now that I could identify it, I saw that its level was higher than any monster that had served the Arch Lich during the Small Cataclysm. It even had an epithet. A Named Monster.

A Named Monster in a low-grade Gate like this…

The thought weighed on me, but I had to put it aside. A gigantic shadow was plunging down from high above.

Whoom!

A rock over ten meters[2588] in diameter—no, something closer to a meteorite—crushed the air beneath it as it fell.

I chose to break through it head-on.

Finish it quickly.

I shot upward. The rock plunged down.

At the moment of impact, I poured the Scorching Yang Qi within White Flame into the tip of its spearhead and thrust at the rock's center.

And then…

Slash.

Like a hot knife cutting through cheese, the spearhead slid into the rock and turned.

Krkrkrk.

It broke through at a single point. Mighty Force tore through the interior, and cracks spread across the enormous rock's surface.

Kraaaaaaang!

It shattered with a thunderous roar, scattering hundreds—thousands—of fragments in every direction.

[2587] Several meters of circumference is roughly 10–20 ft.

[2588] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

—…!

The Cyclops's single red eye widened. Unable to withstand the force, it staggered.

Rumble. Crack!

—Gwoooooar!

The ground broke beneath the giant's movements. Small-bodied Ents were trampled underfoot and screamed.

Neither the Cyclops nor I paid them any attention.

All that mattered was bringing down the enemy in front of us.

—Huuuuuu… maaaaan…

The Cyclops's roar sounded as though it had been slowed to 0.1 speed.

In that slowed world, I stepped onto empty air and shot upward again without a moment's hesitation.

Bam!

Stepping on Empty Air.

Compressed air exploded beneath my toes, propelling me farther and higher.

Whoooom.

Sensing danger, the Cyclops swung its fist too late. It was slow enough to make me yawn.

Boom!

The punch split the air with a terrifying sound. But by the time its fist struck empty space, I had already passed it and risen above its head.

Gooooong.

Blue flames spread across the spearhead, heavy with Scorching Yang Qi.

A force both sharp and destructive.

The second and final form of the Blazing Flame Divine Spear, which concentrated three hundred years of the Fire Gate Clan's macho spirit—the time-honored clan with absolutely no concept of retreat.

Heavenly Strike.

Blue flames fell toward the giant's head.

Shwooooooosh. Slash!

Chapter 558

Flash.

The man's eyes flew open.

For a moment, he stared dazedly into space. Then he began piecing together what had happened.

An F-rank Gate. Goblins. An earthquake. And…

Jin Taekyung.

That last name brought everything back. The man sprang up as if launched by a spring.

"Gaaaaah!"

There was just one problem. He had the large build of a tank, and there wasn't much room to spring up in.

Thump. Bang!

"Gah! Huh?"

He struck his head on the ceiling. His cry of pain cut off as his eyes widened.

It hurt. It really hurt. But if he could feel pain, that meant…

I-I'm alive!

He'd never expected to find himself thinking like a webnovel protagonist.

As the tension finally left his body, he realized he was lying inside a vehicle. An ambulance, to be precise.

An ambulance?

He was lucky to have escaped death, but this wasn't necessarily a good sign. Surviving only to be left disabled would be its own kind of misfortune.

He hurriedly began checking himself from head to toe.

That was when—

Bang. Rattle.

The door flew open, and light poured in. He raised both arms to shield his face.

Or perhaps it was the dazzling beauty of the woman who had opened it that made him do that.

"Oh, you're awake. I thought I heard something as I was passing by."

He stammered at the beautiful woman who had appeared out of nowhere. "W-Who are you?"

"You're Team Leader Lee Seungyeop, right? Thirty-three years old, a freelancer with no Guild affiliation."

"H-How do you know who I am?"

"Questions in a moment. First, are you feeling all right?"

Her gentle but firm interruption caught him off guard, and he nodded.

"You should be fine. All you had were a few scrapes—hardly enough to call injuries. The others, too…"

The others?

That casual mention made his eyes fly open.

"R-Right! My team! Are they all right? Did anyone die or get hurt?"

"Your team members are all safe. But if you keep shouting, my ears won't be."

"Really? You're sure? Guh, is that really true?"

"I know someone who always stakes something dirty on it at times like this. I don't have any balls, so I'll stake my ovaries. Satisfied?"

She delivered the answer without missing a beat, then continued.

"And to answer your earlier question, I checked your belongings. Thanks to that, we were able to complete your identity verification quickly."

Tap.

She set down a small extradimensional Pocket and a briefing board. A short message had been scrawled across the board's white surface in atrocious handwriting.

Go, Hunter Lee Seungyeop!

—Jin Taekyung

The woman gave a quiet laugh.

"That had actually fallen on the ground. Someone picked it up and handed it to me himself. Said it was going to be a family heirloom, so we couldn't let you lose it."

Team Leader Lee Seungyeop's eyes widened.

"Then the person who handed it to you was…?"

"If a name just came to mind, you've got it."

Her neat eyebrows lifted. Her voice was as open and bright as her features.

"Oh, I haven't introduced myself. I'm Song Song."

"Song? What kind of song?"

"…It'll be faster if I just give you my business card. Here."

Swish.

The Team Leader took the card from her long, pale fingers and stared.

"Peace Guild?"

"Officially, I'm the Healer Team Leader. I'm temporarily heading the emergency rescue team, too."

"…Oh."

He caught his breath. Even someone as busy making ends meet as he was knew about the Peace Guild.

You'd have to be a monster not to.

Jin Taekyung himself belonged to it.

Its enormous financial resources and ability to draw public attention had fueled explosive growth in just a few months. The Peace Guild was no longer some unremarkable small or medium-sized Guild.

I hear it's harder to get into the Peace Guild than Ares Guild these days.

It offered Hunters some of the best treatment in the industry, and its prospects seemed limitless. Of course talented people were flocking to it. After Lee Jungryong's national funeral a week ago, he'd even heard that Hunters from Ares Guild had transferred there instead of renewing their contracts.

And the woman in front of him was a team leader at that very Guild. She looked barely into her twenties, but she was already a big deal.

Come to think of it, he might have seen her celebrity-like face on television once or twice.

"But… what exactly is the emergency rescue team? I haven't heard of it before."

"Exactly what it sounds like. It's a new team dedicated solely to rescuing people."

"I know Guilds of a certain size have rescue teams. But neither my team nor I belong to the Peace Guild."

Freelance Hunters and small Guilds relied on government agencies for help; even mid-sized Guilds commonly ran their own rescue teams. He couldn't understand why the Peace Guild had shown up for them.

"Would you rather we hadn't?"

"N-No! How could I think that? I'm grateful, of course. We nearly died in that Mutated Gate, and you saved us."

Song Song gave a quiet laugh.

"Then that settles it. It's what we came to do."

"What?"

"The Peace Guild emergency rescue team is on a trial run, focusing on mid- and low-grade Gates in the capital region. We're working with government agencies, and we respond to all Hunters. You could call it volunteer work for public safety."

"Volunteer… work?"

"Oh, I and the others get paid, of course."

He stared past Song Song's shoulder. Hunters were hurrying in every direction, each with the Peace Guild emblem on their chest.

Volunteer work? With this many people?

No matter how much of a golden goose a modern Hunter Guild was, most of its income still came from Gates. Guilds paid Hunters enormous salaries because they could make even greater profits from raids.

But the Peace Guild had sent these Hunters out to rescue people instead—and paid them properly to do it.

They all look like at least mid-grade Hunters.

Dozens of them wore equipment that looked expensive even at a glance. As a low-grade Hunter, he couldn't begin to guess how much the Peace Guild had spent on them today.

"Um. You said you're Team Leader Song Song?"

"Yes. Go ahead."

"I was wondering… are there treatment fees? Rescue fees? Anything like that?"

"No. Have you ever seen a firefighter rescue someone and send them a bill?"

"Then…?"

"Transport and treatment are free, obviously. Oh, and if anyone's been hurt psychologically, we cover counseling too. For trauma and that sort of thing."

"…?"

Wait. What treatment? Did I hear that right?

He stared at her, dazed, then asked in all sincerity, "Does the Peace Guild dig its money out of the ground?"

Song Song winked.

"No, but the man funding us has quite a lot of it."

"The man funding you?"

"You know him. You even got his autograph."

"…!"

"Anyway, there's someone like that. He complains every day that he feels like he's being bled dry, but he's smiling the whole time."

A smile touched Song Song's lips as she thought of him.

When she'd first met him, she'd wondered what kind of lunatic he was. Watching him since then had taught her what it meant to be a true Hunter. What it meant to care about people.

"You. Let's do a job together."

"…That sounds like a line I've heard somewhere. First, you should know I'm not overseas Chinese.[2589]"

Jin Taekyung had come to her out of nowhere with that proposal a week ago. For a moment, she'd thought he wanted her to join Gold Moon[2590]—no, Ares Guild—and act as a spy.

What he'd said next had been nothing like she expected.

"You're better than I expected, Taurus."

To be a little more honest, he'd been kind of cool this time.

[2589] Overseas Chinese (hwagyo) means ethnic Chinese living outside China, including a long-settled community in Korea. The exchange echoes the Korean crime film New World (2013), whose ethnically Chinese hero is recruited by a superior for an undercover job.

[2590] Gold Moon is the crime syndicate that the undercover hero infiltrates in the film New World, the same film the earlier exchange echoes.

The same had been true when he'd used the money from selling the Black Wyvern's carcass to establish a charitable foundation. Every now and then, he showed her an unexpected side of himself.

Song Song let out a quiet laugh and looked up at the sky.

It was January, and the cold hadn't yet faded. But the sunlight overhead was warm.

Kiiiiing.

—Jin Taekyung. Iris recognition complete.

A red light swept across my pupil, accompanied by a mechanical voice. I stepped through the door as it opened automatically and entered the Guild House.

Everyone going about their work stopped in their tracks, as though they'd arranged it in advance.

"W-Welcome."

"Welcome!"

"Thank you for your hard work!"

"Ah, yes. Hello, everyone."

I told them not to do this. What is this, a gangster office?

I gave them an awkward smile. I still couldn't get used to it.

The Skeleton King whispered beside me, "Wretched human. This does not seem right."

"You, of all people? You have thoughts like that—"

Before I could finish, he strode forward and pointed at a Hunter who looked like a new recruit.

"You there. You're bending only eighty degrees at the waist. Make it ninety. Or you could try a grandjeol.[2591]"

"Y-Yes! Understood!"

"…"

Don't go adjusting their angles. And what exactly does he understand?

Just watching was enough to leave me speechless. I stopped the Guild member from attempting a grandjeol[2592], kindly advised him not to listen to this idiot, and finally made it to my destination.

Familiar faces were waiting there.

"Taekyung!"

"Welcome."

[2591] A comically exaggerated Korean bow performed with the body inverted.

[2592] A comically exaggerated Korean bow performed with the body inverted.

Im Kkeokjeong spread both arms to greet me. Beside him, Team Leader Choi was busy dealing with something.

“Take it easy. Take it easy. What if you reopen your wounds?”

“I’m just happy to see you, punk.”

“We see each other every day.”

As soon as I sat Im Kkeokjeong down—he was still undergoing rehabilitation training—Team Leader Choi suddenly spoke.

“I received a report over the hotline. A Named Monster appeared?”

“A Cyclops. Plus three hundred Ents for good measure.”

“A Cyclops in an F-rank Gate… It was fortunate you happened to be nearby, Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“They all knelt before this body’s majesty.”

“One more word and you’ll be listening on your knees.”

“…Sorry.”

That shut him up. Team Leader Choi handed me a folder.

“What’s this?”

“The data you requested. I compiled the number of Mutated Gates that have appeared recently in Korea and elsewhere in Asia.”

It didn’t take long to go through. Once I’d found what I was looking for, I let out a groan.

“Five in Korea alone over the past month…”

“The frequency of Mutated Gates is rising explosively. The incident in Sichuan Province is the most notable example.”

Mutated Gates were extremely rare. Even in Korea, with its hundreds of Gates, they normally appeared only once or twice a year—three times at most. Yet last month’s count had already passed five.

And it’s already happened twice this month, counting the one I just dealt with.

It was a bizarre phenomenon I couldn’t explain. But the fact that events in Murim came to mind right now couldn’t be a coincidence.

Something’s happening.

Tap. Tap-tap.

I drummed my fingers on the table in silence, then asked, “What about North America and Europe?”

“I expect the situation is similar. But for something more certain, I’ve requested data from someone I trust.”

“Someone you trust?”

The moment I asked, every one of my senses snapped awake.

Whoooooosh.

A sudden storm of qi.

An immense amount of mana, far beyond what even an A-rank Hunter possessed, was converging somewhere in the Guild House.

This is…

I knew that flow of mana. And I recognized the distinctive presence within it.

“Team Leader Choi, don’t tell me…”

“It’s the person you’re thinking of. Though I didn’t expect him to come in person.”

At Team Leader Choi’s calm answer, the Skeleton King turned to me with a bewildered expression.

“Wretched human. Whom are you talking about?”

“Your dad.”

“…?”

His confusion lasted only a moment. Someone’s message magic entered all our minds, and a smile spread across his face.

—Have you all been well?

The voice had a hip-hop soul and groove to it. I gave a quiet laugh as a name came to mind.

Magic Johnson.

The American Grand Mage had come to visit the Peace Guild.

Chapter 559

Teleportation.

The spatial-transference magic commonly called Teleport was notoriously difficult, even among mages. Get the coordinates wrong and you could die in an instant. It consumed so much mana that a mage attempting long-distance travel might well clutch the back of their neck and collapse.

The ultimate shitty cost-to-benefit ratio.

But in the end, what mattered was who used it.

In the hands of a Supreme Peak master, even the Three Calamities Sword Technique could rival a divine technique. The same principle applied to a Grand Mage—one of only three among the world's seven billion people.

"Fucking Korea. I think this every time, but it's too damn far away. I almost got motion sickness on the way here."

I gave a quiet laugh at Magic Johnson, the dark-skinned Grand Mage grumbling in front of me.

"Motion sickness is a small price to pay for crossing continents. Any other mage would be seasick on the Sanzu River[2593] by now."

"Sanzu River? What's that? Is it like Cheonggyecheon in Seoul?[2594]"

"…A little different. Anyway, let's move on."

Magic Johnson, who had turned Seoul into a city of hell in one sentence, spotted the people inside the room and broke into a wide smile.

"Hey, what's up, gays! It's been a while."

Team Leader Choi answered Time magazine's pick for the "world's most influential LGBTQ person" in the firmest voice imaginable.

"It's guys, Mr. Johnson. Not gays."

"Choi, now you're hurting my feelings. I came running the moment you asked."

"I appreciate you coming in person, but couldn't you have sent it by secure email?"

"Is that any way to treat someone you haven't seen in a while?"

"If I remember correctly, it hasn't even been a week since we last met. Isn't that right, Mr. Jin Taekyung?"

I nodded.

"That's true. Johnson was here for the national funeral, too."

The national funeral held this time had been enormous. Nearly a million citizens had come to pay their respects, and influential figures from countries around the world had traveled to Korea.

[2593] The Sanzu River is a Buddhist river associated with the boundary between life and death.

[2594] Cheonggyecheon is a restored stream running through downtown Seoul, popular as a walkway.

That said plenty about the influence Lee Jungryong had wielded in life. Quite a few of the mourners were presidents, prompting one news outlet to call the gathering a “summit meeting.”

Magic Johnson, one of the symbols of the United States, had been among them.

“Hey, Jin. Is this how you’re going to act? I didn’t come to meet you people. I came simply to pay my respects.”

“Your respects?”

“That’s right. I came to see off an old comrade.”

“Then why did you go to a gay bar in Itaewon? You even changed your face with illusion magic.”

“…Who told you that ridiculous nonsense?”

“The guy who went with you. Pretty conclusive testimony.”

There was no trace left of his initial delight at seeing Johnson. The victim of that day, the Skeleton King, spoke with an enraged expression.

“I knew something was wrong when something touched this body’s backside. That damned human tricked me.”

“You ungrateful monster-murder fucker…”

Look at that expression. I’d believe it if Time had named him the “world’s most violent LGBTQ person.”

Magic Johnson muttered in a threatening voice, then noticed everyone’s eyes on him and quickly adopted a serious expression.

“Don’t misunderstand. I only went to experience Korean culture.”

“Did you sell your tribute to an old comrade on eBay?”

“Jin, don’t be like that. I paid my respects at the funeral ceremony. You know better than anyone what Mr. Lee was like.”

I did. Who could know better than me?

And Johnson was one of the very few people who knew what had happened at the Arch Lich’s stronghold.

“Anyway, we’re meeting again, so let’s stop talking about this. You there, you agree, don’t you? Your name was… Robin Hood, right?”

Unfortunately, Korea’s Robin Hood—Im Kkeokjeong—didn’t have a translation Item. He answered with a frozen expression.

“I-I’m fine, thank you. And you…”

“I’m fine, of course. But I’m afraid what I have to tell you isn’t good news.”

Swish.

With a sigh, Johnson held out a memory chip no bigger than a fingernail.

Team Leader Choi took it and examined it, his eyes sharpening.

“Is this the information I asked for?”

“That’s right. I had to pull a few strings for the first time in a while.”

"I'll thank you after I've reviewed it."

"Take your time."

Tap. Whooooooosh.

It happened in an instant.

Team Leader Choi tapped somewhere beneath the table. Every window and opening in his private office was covered, and unseen mana spread across them like a curtain.

Magic?

If I'd noticed it, there was no way Johnson hadn't. He looked around the office with interest.

"Seven overlapping spells. Your security is tighter than I expected. Only a handful of mages in our Guild could manage magic at this level… Whose work is it?"

"Someone who has been my hands and feet since I was young."

Kim the Butler and Johnson had never met face-to-face. After that brief answer, Team Leader Choi inserted the chip into his smartphone, and a holographic video sprang up above the screen.

—Krrrraaaaaash!

With a thunderous roar, the ground within a radius of several dozen meters[2595] heaved over, spraying sand in every direction. It looked like an earthquake.

Around a hundred Hunters of different ethnicities shouted and cursed.

—"Fuck!"

—"Spread out! Spread out now! They're coming!"

—"Healer! Healeeer!"

Screams and shouts filled the scene. Several buildings were collapsing among the dead trees and sand dunes.

Im Kkeokjeong's eyes widened as he realized what that meant.

"M-Monster Wave?"

Correct. Modern buildings had no business being inside a Gate.

Every Gate contained at least a minimal amount of mana, and its Grade was determined by the total amount of mana it held.

But if a monster appeared whose power far exceeded the Gate's Grade, that was a different matter.

That was a Mutated Gate.

A Mutated Gate was already a serious problem. But if the presence of the higher-grade monster caused the Gate's mana to exceed the total amount it could contain, an even greater disaster awaited.

A Monster Wave.

[2595] Several dozen meters is roughly 100–300 ft.

When a sturdy dam gave way under pressure, the water it had held back came flooding out.

That was what we were seeing in the hologram.

—Sssshhhk!

More than ten enormous scorpions let out strange cries. Buried deep in the sand, they sent their tails shooting up through the surface. Screams erupted, and blood sprayed in every direction.

—“Gaaaaah!”

—“Joseph! Save Joseph!”

—“Commence volley fire!”

Krrrraack!

At the very moment humans and monsters threw themselves at one another in an attempt to kill each other—

Ffft.

The holographic video filling the office vanished as though it had been washed away.

Team Leader Choi had stopped the video. He spoke in a subdued voice.

“When did this happen?”

Johnson’s expression darkened.

“Four days ago. The Mojave Desert. It stretches across several states, but this was closer to Arizona. I don’t know the exact coordinates.”

I frowned as I listened.

“Four days ago?”

“Yes. Four days ago.”

“There should’ve been an official announcement by now.”

Gates were like ticking time bombs with a slim chance of going off. That was why every country kept watch on them, stationed government Hunters—the so-called “bomb disposal squads”—around the country, and required incidents to be announced within a set period.

Then why has everything been so quiet?

Mutated Gates were rare. Monster Waves were dozens of times rarer. An incident like this should have made headlines.

Team Leader Choi and I had both been watching news from around the world lately. It made no sense that neither of us had heard about it.

That left only one answer.

“There was no official announcement.”

Johnson gave a small nod.

“That’s right. The Ministry of National Defense stepped in and covered the whole thing up. As neatly as those monsters turned over the desert.”

"They can do that?"

"Can they? Come on, Jin. This was handled in secret by the United States Ministry of National Defense. You should be asking what they can't do."

He let out a dry laugh.

"Twenty-two people died and thirty-five were injured, but that doesn't change anything. It happened at a military base closed to civilians. Probably made it easier to hide."

"But that's… a cover-up."

"It is. It violates the constitution, too—the one extensively revised after the Great Cataclysm. But sometimes a kind lie is better than a cold truth."

"…!"

For a moment, it felt as though someone had struck me in the back of the head.

I knew this was wrong. And yet I'd been thinking the same thing as Johnson.

Dark Heaven.

People unprepared for the truth were bound to be thrown into confusion when it arrived without warning. That was true of Dark Heaven in Murim. I, too, believed it was too soon for their identities to become known.

But that wasn't the only reason the back of my head felt numb.

The vague fear I'd been carrying had just become real.

"How many times?"

I hadn't said what I was asking about. Johnson's face went rigid. He understood.

"Johnson."

"…Fuck."

He muttered the curse like a sigh, then turned to Team Leader Choi.

"Choi, how many videos are stored on the chip I gave you?"

Team Leader Choi stared silently at the smartphone screen before answering in a voice that sounded almost like a groan.

"Thirty-two."

"Right. Two were Monster Waves. The rest were Mutated Gates. And that's only what I managed to get my hands on."

No one could doubt Magic Johnson's standing and influence in the United States. But even he could not compare with the intelligence-gathering capabilities of the Ministry of National Defense of the United States, which still claimed to be the most powerful nation in the world.

Thirty-two incidents in the data Johnson managed to acquire alone.

How many more had there been?

At that moment, Team Leader Choi and I fell silent at the same time, as though we had arranged it in advance.

"Wait. Hold on."

The Skeleton King had been diligently counting something on his fingers. Now he looked at Magic Johnson with eyes as round as lanterns.

“Human I’m no longer grateful to—doesn’t what you just said mean incidents like this have been happening every single day?”

“You loose-lipped monster. Aren’t you taking this a little too lightly?”

“Huh?”

I would have been happier not hearing what Johnson said next.

“Not over the past month. They all happened in the past week.”

“…!”

“…!”

A suffocating silence settled over the room. Then the voice of the only person who hadn’t understood Johnson rang out.

“I-I’m fine, thank you. And you?”

“…”

“…”

To hell with ‘and you.‘ Holy shit. Fuck.

Chapter 560

Holy shit. What the fuck.

Even if I used every English-language curse I knew, I still couldn't express how fucked things were.

Thirty-two times in a single week.

An outrageous number. And that was only what Magic Johnson had managed to find out.

I didn't know the exact count, but it was bound to be higher than thirty-two.

Yeah. Maybe this was inevitable.

The United States was ninety-eight times the size of Korea and had nearly twenty times as many Gates.

It had been Demon King Asmodeus's top-priority target during the Great Cataclysm and suffered tremendous damage throughout the war.

Ironically, what had restored the United States to its position as the world's greatest power was what the war had left behind: Gates.

Oil fields.

Modern Gates were, quite literally, a new and far more abundant kind of oil field.

More than thirty years had passed since the disaster that swallowed the world. Monster byproducts had long fetched high prices, and Magic Gems had become an environmentally friendly energy source.

The survivors had built a civilization even grander and more dazzling atop the ruins of the war.

But…

"The party seems to be over."

As Magic Johnson had put it, the winners' lavish party was over.

The oil fields called Gates had caught fire. Explosions would soon erupt all over the world. No—they were already happening.

For now, an invisible hand was hiding them all.

"Ah, fuck…"

The words came out like a groan. I turned to Team Leader Choi.

"Things aren't like this in Korea too, are they?"

What I meant was: had other incidents happened without my knowing, like the ones in the United States?

Team Leader Choi thought for a moment before answering.

"I always keep unexpected possibilities in mind, but as far as I know, there aren't any."

"Team Leader Choi, we need to be sure."

"I know. That's why I'm thinking of arranging another meeting while I have the chance."

Magic Johnson, who had been listening, asked, "A meeting? With whom?"

"Some people I've come to know through circumstance. I doubt they lied to me, but you never know what people are thinking."

"True. Especially politicians."

Team Leader Choi nodded quietly at Johnson's offhand remark.

"So you knew."

"Choi looked awfully busy at Mr. Lee's national funeral. A lot of people were looking for you."

Team Leader Choi and I had attended Lee Jungryong's national funeral and paid our respects. Our private feelings were another matter, but maintaining our public image wasn't the only reason we had gone.

"They're looking for a new shadow to shelter under," Team Leader Choi said. "That's what I wanted, too."

Figures from politics and business, along with key members of mid-sized and large Guilds that Ares Guild had kept under its thumb, had shown enormous interest in us.

More than half of them had approached me first, of course. But I'd known from the start what I would say.

Don't talk to a nobody Hunter like me. Talk to our Team Leader Choi.

Earning a place at Lee Jungryong's national funeral, where every kind of heavyweight had gathered, meant they were people who had claimed their own victories in society after fighting tooth and nail.

They understood exactly what I meant and immediately set about arranging meetings with Team Leader Choi.

"The powerless are ignored," Johnson said. "But people reach out to the powerful from every direction. The world may have changed, but that hasn't."

It was the sharp truth.

No one had sought out Team Leader Choi or me before. Now the Peace Guild had risen to become the only force capable of standing against Ares Guild.

The public might not know it, but the people at the top of society knew it better than anyone.

By now, political and business figures were probably calculating what they stood to gain from a fight between the two Guilds—and whose shadow would be cooler to stand in.

The owners of the mid-sized and large Guilds probably wanted to use this opportunity to escape Ares Guild's excessive monopoly as well.

Team Leader Choi had gained new allies and the power they held.

It was his first step toward digesting the entire feast that was Ares.

Perhaps that was why, when he spoke again, the voice that emerged from between his immaculate lips carried more strength than ever.

“I won’t turn away the hands they’ve offered.”

Magic Johnson studied him for a moment, then spoke up.

“So… it seems the rumor was true.”

“What rumor?”

“That rumor. The one saying that Choi is connected to him.”

“There’s no reason to hide it anymore. It’s true.”

Johnson’s eyes widened.

“I didn’t expect Choi to admit it so easily. Have you told everyone else you’ve met recently?”

“No. But even without saying it, they know, and I know. We know whose blood runs through my veins.”

A quiet laugh escaped the Grand Mage’s thick lips.

“Right. No one can deny that fact. He’s the only pureblood in existence in the twenty-first century.”

No living noble or royal could compare to Team Leader Choi. Not even if the haughty Prince Felix of the United Kingdom became king.

If his ancestor had built a vast empire upon which the sun never set, then Cheon Taemin was the savior who had allowed billions of people to see the sun rise on another day.

“And it was wise not to mention him directly,” Johnson said. “People trust a man who keeps his own counsel and doesn’t reveal himself too easily.”

“Thank you for the compliment.”

“No need. It’s the truth.”

There was no trace of Johnson’s usual playful manner. He went on in a calm voice.

“But Choi, keep this in mind. Your grandfather, wherever he may be now, and I have always known what came first. We risked our lives and fought for a better future. Is that what people in the East call a greater cause?”

“…!”

He was telling Team Leader Choi, without saying it outright, that the crisis on our doorstep had to come before Ares Guild.

After a brief silence, Team Leader Choi answered, “I’ll remember, Mr. Johnson. But I’m not going after Ares Guild for personal reasons alone.”

“I know what kind of man Choi is. You want to weaken Ares in case the worst happens and build up the Peace Guild’s own strength. Teeth like yours aren’t enough to swallow a tiger.”

Team Leader Choi smiled bitterly.

“A hyena… I can’t deny it.”

Lee Jungryong might be gone, but Ares was still Ares.

The Peace Guild had grown rapidly, its name seared into minds around the world because of me. But we couldn’t bring down the impregnable fortress Ares Guild had spent decades building in a single blow.

“Keep building your strength, so long as you’re not doing it for personal glory,” Johnson said. “The Wizard Guild and I will help. If you need it, I can introduce you to a few friends of mine, too.”

“Yes. That’s what I intend to do. The bad blood from the past hasn’t run its course.”

“You mean that young fellow. Mr. Seok.”

Magic Johnson suddenly drew his brows together.

“I haven’t spent much time with him, but I know he isn’t particularly kind. Isn’t that right, Jin?”

I nodded at once.

“He’s a fucking asshole.”

“I had a feeling from his surname. Even the way it’s pronounced sounds like ‘suck.‘ And I didn’t like it when he attacked Jin at the Arch Lich’s stronghold while we were still investigating…”

Johnson’s expression grew serious.

“He gives off an even more dangerous smell now than he did before. Jin, you were right in front of me. Didn’t you notice?”

“…”

“Jin?”

I hesitated before answering. “Well, I did fart in front of you.”

“What the fuck…”

“Even so, there’s no need to swear. And Go Jun was already a dangerous bastard to begin with.”

“Whew. True. But please try not to fart when I’m standing behind you from now on.”

“…Yes.”

I had been uneasy about having Magic Johnson at my back too, but I had been the one to fart in the end, so I had nothing to say.

I looked away as I answered. Johnson’s nose twitched.

“All right. That’s enough for today. Whatever anyone else thinks, I want you two to know I trust you completely.”

He looked warmly at Team Leader Choi and me, then turned to the two standing there blankly—no, the one man and one monster.

“You two as well, of course.”

The Skeleton King and Im Kkeokjeong answered at the same time.

"Just don't take us to a gay bar."

"I-I don't speak English."

"…Very reassuring."

Johnson's face said otherwise. He pulled a small glass bottle from inside his clothes and drained it.

I recognized it as a potion to replenish spent mana.

"Are you leaving?"

"I should get back. I'm going to be busy from now on, too. There are friends I haven't seen in a while whom I need to contact."

"Friends?"

"The ones I mentioned earlier. About half have retired, but they can still be a great help. Oh, if Choi wants, I could take you to them right now. What do you say?"

Team Leader Choi hesitated under Magic Johnson's eager gaze, then quickly shook his head.

"N-No, that's all right."

"What a shame. My friend Joseph was interested in Choi."

"I'm disappointed too, but maybe next time… Wait. Did you say Joseph?"

"Unless your hearing's gone, you heard right."

"Then… do you mean former United States President Joseph Biden?"

"That's right. He retired quite a while ago, but we meet for a drink about once a month. He's so old he can hardly drink anymore, though."

"…!"

Team Leader Choi wasn't the only one shocked. My mouth fell open, and so did Im Kkeokjeong's.

"That Joseph Biden?"

"Ah, I know! I know Joseph Biden!"

I didn't care whether the name of the American president was Chakumba Okumbo or Kim Cheol Soo, but I had heard the name Joseph Biden many times since my days at the Hunter training camp.

The Great Cataclysm had struck during his presidency. He'd had it worse than the mayor of New York in a superhero movie.

Would you look at those connections.

In the United States, he was practically a second Founding Father after George Washington.

I knew Magic Johnson was a big deal, but I hadn't realized his connections were this impressive.

"Don't look at me like that. Joseph and I have been ball buddies for nearly fifty years. Most people don't know we're close."

"…!"

Team Leader Choi froze. Johnson hurriedly added, “Forget the ‘ball’ part. We’re just friends. Best friends.”

“Whew.”

“Shit. Do I really have to explain myself?”

“Mr. Johnson, we have a saying in Korea: you reap what you sow.”

“Damn it. I really got what I deserved. So, what are you going to do, Choi?”

Team Leader Choi answered without hesitation.

“Let’s go. I’ll take you up on your offer.”

“Good idea. You might get a little motion sick traveling between continents, though.”

“What’s a little motion sickness compared to this?”

Team Leader Choi answered calmly and took the hand Magic Johnson held out to him.

With a light nod, an enormous amount of mana wrapped tightly around their entire bodies.

Whoooosh!

At that exact moment, a blinding flash erupted and sent their figures flying somewhere else.

Brrrrrrr.

All three smartphones left behind—Im Kkeokjeong’s, the Skeleton King’s, and mine—began vibrating violently.

Chapter 561

Brrrrrrr.

A smartphone suddenly began vibrating. I, Im Kkeokjeong, and finally the Skeleton King checked the screen in rapid succession before opening our mouths one after another.

“What’s this?”

“T-Taekyung!”

“Oh. Ohoho. Look at this, you primitive humans. A girl-group member has sent this body a DM.”

“…”

“…”

That fucking bastard. I told him to stop screwing around on social media.

No wonder his phone was ringing when he isn’t even in the group chat.

I felt like stomping him until his illusion magic shattered, but that wasn’t important right now.

Which girl-group member… No. Another incident like this?

I barely swallowed my thoughts and stared at the smartphone screen.

Song Song had posted an urgent message in the group chat for the Peace Guild’s founding members, including Team Leader Choi and me.

> Peace Guild
>
> └ Song Song: Hey hey heyyy
>
> └ Song Song: C-rank Gate anomaly.

>
> └ Song Song: Fuck; why aren’t you reading this?
>
> └ Song Song: If you’ve read it, answer me, you crazy bastard.
>

>
> └ Song Song: Huh. Everyone but one person has read it?
>
> └ Song Song: Whoever’s seen this, get over there and check it out as fast as you can.

[2596] The Blue House was the office and residence of South Korea’s president.

> ㄴ Song Song: It's far from me, and I have something to take care of, so I can't go right away.
> ㄴ Song Song: [Map attached]
> ㄴ Song Song: ?
> ㄴ Song Song: Oh, but now that I've checked, that Gate is kind of…
> ㄴ Song Song: Just go for now.
> ㄴ Song Song: Especially you, Jin Taekyung. Reply as soon as you read this.

Where is it?

What kind of Gate would make her react like that?

I put my questions aside, left a reply saying I had seen the message, and checked the attached map. The moment I did, I understood why Song Song had reacted that way.

"Ah. Hmm."

The location was definitely a little… awkward.

Im Kkeokjeong checked the map a beat later, and his face hardened.

"Taekyung. Is this…?"

"Probably exactly where you think it is."

The C-rank Gate marked on the map sat on prime land near a subway station in Bucheon. It was also one of those Gates blessed with what Hunters called "luck."

The monsters that appeared there were relatively easy to deal with compared to those in other C-rank Gates, and Magic Gems dropped frequently.

Im Kkeokjeong had worked as a Hunter in Bucheon for over ten years. There was no way either of us wouldn't know the Gate—or the name of the Guild that controlled it.

"This isn't exactly welcome news…"

The Skeleton King looked up from the smartphone he had been fiddling with at Kkeokjeong's low mutter.

"Humans. Where is this place that has you making such a fuss?"

I answered quietly.

"The place isn't the problem. The owner is."

"Hm? The owner?"

"That's right."

Gates couldn't be privately owned, but mid-sized Guilds and larger effectively controlled them through long-term leases.

And there wasn't a person in Korea—or anywhere else in the world—who didn't know the Guild that controlled the C-rank Gate at this address.

"Then who owns it?"

Kkeokjeong gave the Skeleton King a curt answer.

“Ares Guild.”

My eyes went to both of his arms before I could stop them.

The arms severed on someone’s orders had been reattached so cleanly you would never have known anything had happened. But they were trembling faintly, as though he remembered the pain.

“Uncle Kkeokjeong. No—hyung.[2597]”

“…I’m fine.”

The answer rang hollow. His trembling was growing worse, and his expression had darkened.

As if he’d noticed the look on my face, he made an effort to relax his own.

“I’m telling you, I’m fine. Now hurry up and go. If the magical power readings are skyrocketing, we could have another Mutated Gate on our hands.”

“…No. Those bastards can handle it themselves.”

How am I supposed to go? Not in this situation. Especially to help them, of all people.

I stood rooted to the spot. Kkeokjeong gave me a faint smile.

“Taekyung.”

“Yes?”

“I meant it when I said I’m fine. Everyone who cut off my arms, Lee Jungryong included, has paid for it. My rehabilitation’s practically finished, too. These days, I’m happy spending time with my wife and watching the kids grow up.”

“Hyung[2598]…”

“I’m really fine, so hurry up and go. There must be plenty of good people in Ares Guild, too. If you let a petty personal reason stop you from helping, you’ll regret it for a long time. At least, the Taekyung I know would.”

“…!”

“I’d like to help too, but I can’t. My rehabilitation isn’t quite done, and honestly, I’m not strong enough.”

He laughed heartily at his own forced joke. I watched him for a moment, then nodded.

He was right. The people facing danger inside the Gate weren’t enemies of mine or the Peace Guild.

If I sensed danger and possessed the strength to save someone from it, then stepping forward was the right thing to do.

That’s why we created the rescue team.

Maybe what I had to do had been decided the moment I obtained the System.

I gave Im Kkeokjeong a brief look of acknowledgment.

[2597] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[2598] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

"I'll be back soon."

"All right. Don't get hurt."

"Deal with it quickly and return, you wicked human. As a reward, I shall show you this girl-group member's selfie."

I smiled warmly at the Skeleton King.

"Quit screwing around and follow me. Or I'll smash your smartphone as punishment."

"…Understood."

I should've done this from the start. You trying to get yourself killed?

By the time we reached the C-rank Gate Orc Wasteland, marked on Song Song's map, the area was full of frantic voices and shouting.

"The magical power readings are more than twice their usual level!"

"I know that. What about the request for backup?"

"N-Nothing yet!"

"Fuck, there have to be people left at the Bucheon branch! Tell them it's urgent and ask again for at least one A-rank Hunter!"

"We already passed that along, but most of the A-rank Hunters stationed in Bucheon are deployed overseas, and some of the others are on vacation, so they're refusing…"

"What? Vacation? They're refusing because they're on vacation? Those fucking—!"

It happened in an instant.

A fist filled with rage slammed into a parked car.

Bam!

With a thunderous crash, the foreign car worth more than a hundred million won[2599] crumpled, sending large and small fragments flying in every direction.

That was when the flushed, hard-breathing B-rank Hunter spotted the Skeleton King and me.

"Hell, this is driving me crazy. No matter how urgent things are, they should still be controlling access properly—"

His voice trailed off. His eyes went wide.

"Huh? Uh? Huh? Huhhhhh?"

Question after question spilled from his lips, his gaze fixed on my face. The Skeleton King snorted and opened his mouth with a meaningful expression.

"Heh heh. Yes, this human is that human."

"…?"

[2599] One hundred million won is about $71,000 or €65,000; the car is worth more than that.

Why is this bastard stepping in and making a scene when I'm just standing here?

I shot the Skeleton King a wary look and cleared my throat. Everyone who had been rushing around was now standing frozen, staring at us.

"Ahem. In case anyone here doesn't know who I am—"

"Jin Taekyung!"

"Lord Fuck!"

"Lord Sibu-leol!"

"…though I guess that won't be necessary."

I hated to say it myself, but at this point, I'd have to wonder if any Hunter who didn't recognize my face was actually a monster.

"Is that r-really Jin Taekyung?"

"I don't think he's a fake Jin Taekyung."

"Ah, that's not what I meant…"

"It's fine. That isn't important right now."

I turned to the B-rank Hunter who had smashed the car.

"From what I've seen, you seem to be in charge here. Am I right?"

"Y-Yes. I'm Gwak Hangu, Branch Leader of Ares Guild's Yeokgok Branch."

He wasn't even the Bucheon Branch Leader. He was one of the dozens of lower Branch Leaders beneath him, and he was a B-rank Hunter.

It reminded me just how large Ares Guild was—and how deep its talent pool ran. It also reminded me of something I'd briefly overlooked.

Maybe because of their public image, but the atmosphere here is better than I expected.

Ares Guild, the Peace Guild, and I had plenty of bad blood between us. But that fight had taken place beneath the surface. To people who knew nothing about it, everything above the surface looked calm.

No. If anything, the eyes of the Ares Guild members here held expectation and even goodwill.

Maybe we can build up our strength faster than Team Leader Choi expected.

But something more important needed my attention. I pushed the thought aside and spoke to the Branch Leader.

"Let's skip the rest and get straight to the point."

"Y-Yes?"

"Getting backup from the Guild is difficult, isn't it? Ares Guild has more than one or two Gates to look after, and you're sending people overseas too."

"Pardon?"

"Even if someone leaves now, they'll arrive too late. That A-rank Hunter on vacation probably has his phone and pager turned off while he enjoys himself.

And if the people here rush in, there's a good chance they'll die without rescuing anyone. Am I right?"

"W-We don't know that—"

"Come on. What we don't know is how long the people inside can hold out."

He gasped.

"It's been fifteen minutes since the readings first started rising. Your team members could be dying in there right now."

"W-Wait."

The B-rank Hunter barely managed to stop me before continuing in a trembling voice.

"I know. I know that too. But… letting an outsider intervene would be a serious violation of Guild policy."

"So?"

"Everyone here, including me, desperately wants to ask you for help. But we can't. You already know that. You've heard about it."

Anyone who worked as a Hunter had to know how strict and difficult Ares Guild's rules were.

Lee Jungryong had selected only the most capable Hunters from each rank and locked them inside a tall, enormous cage. The fact that no Guild would accept a Hunter expelled from Ares Guild wasn't some vague urban legend.

"Ha…"

"Fuck…"

Sighs and curses came from all around me. I looked at the Ares Guild members, then asked abruptly, "One person? Or two?"

"Huh? What are you—"

"I have a feeling two people have died while you've been hesitating."

"M-Mr. Jin Taekyung!"

"Hey, you by the measuring device. What's the reading now?"

A C-rank Hunter who had kept chewing his nails in front of the device even after I arrived answered with something close to a scream.

"Three times! It's passed three times the average magical power level!"

"…!"

Everyone there knew what that meant.

A Mutated Gate.

The third Mutated Gate to erupt in the week since the new year began.

I clicked my tongue softly and looked straight at the Branch Leader.

"What are you waiting for? Open it."

"…!"

“I wasn’t going to enter without the person in charge’s consent because it would be illegal. But people need to be saved, don’t they? So just say that I barged in while making a huge fucking scene and open it right now.”

He squeezed his eyes shut, his clenched fists trembling.

As I turned away from the silent Branch Leader, a trembling voice came from behind me.

“Let’s say… I gave my consent.”

I’d thought he was a complete moron. Maybe he was only a fool.

I let out a short laugh and left him with one final remark before striding toward the Gate.

“Call me if you get fired. The Peace Guild will take you in.”

Chapter 562

The wasteland stretched endlessly in every direction.

There was no sun, but a dark light made of magical power hung in the air. Hundreds of Orcs roamed in packs, hunted by the Hunters who came here.

Or rather, that was how it used to be.

Boom. Boom. Boom.

The ground trembled. The magical power saturating the wasteland swelled as though it might burst at any moment, squeezing the breath from their lungs.

The Hunters panted raggedly, their breath carrying a sickly sweet smell.

More than a hundred Orcs lay sprawled around them. The Hunters stood back-to-back in a circle, but beyond the bodies, a monster army ten times that size was advancing.

"T-Team Leader."

"Don't worry. We'll get out of here, whatever it takes."

The Team Leader's answer sounded hollow.

The one who had asked and the one who had answered both had some idea of the truth. None of them would leave this place alive today.

Even if they miraculously broke through the monster army's encirclement, there was one opponent they would never be able to bring down.

—Kraaaargh!

The Orc Lord.

At the roar of the powerful mutant said to be born only once in a million, more than a thousand Orcs shrieked and struck their weapons together.

—Chweeek!

Clang! Crash-crash-crash!

Despair flickered in the Hunters' eyes.

It's over.

Under the Orc Lord's command, the monster army had grown stronger. The Orcs were no longer a rabble roaming in groups of a few dozen, and the Hunters numbered fewer than twenty.

We can't win this.

The thought flashed through every mind at once.

It would have been no different even if they could overwhelm Hunters of the same rank. Their pride in belonging to Ares Guild crumbled before the death bearing down on them.

"…Damn Mutated Gate."

As someone muttered those words, the monsters filling the area began charging all at once.

At their head was the Orc Lord, the bastard they couldn't kill hard enough.

—Karchwi! Kalipto!

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

Shouting something unintelligible in the Demon Realm language, its massive body hurtled toward them.

The raid Team Leader gritted his teeth, raised his shield, and charged to meet it. His team members called out from behind him, but he focused every ounce of strength and attention on the enemy ahead.

"Come on!"

It was a great shout, forced out to drive away his fear.

Red light flashed in the Orc Lord's eyes. The enormous ax in its hands came down toward the crown of the Team Leader's head.

Whooosh—crash!

One strike. That was all it took.

The blow was unbelievably fast and powerful. With a thunderous roar, it shattered the Tower Shield reinforced with high-grade enhancement magic. The Team Leader's eyes widened, the pain of his broken arms forgotten.

Whoooosh.

The ax had not touched him, but already it felt as though his side had been cut open.

His life flashed before his eyes, and the world slowed. A second blow was coming to split his body in two at the waist.

No. Not the second blow. The last.

The Team Leader closed his eyes. He had no desire to spend the final moment of his life looking at that ugly, fucking monster.

And in the next moment, along with the pitch-black darkness blocking his vision, a sharp sound of something cutting through the air pierced his ears.

Fwooooooosh—crack!

The pain he had been waiting for never came. It felt so strange that he wondered if this could really be death.

"…?"

The Team Leader cracked his eyes open and gaped.

Less than five paces away, the Orc Lord's three-meter-tall[2600] body stood motionless.

Its head was gone.

[2600] Three meters is about 9.8 ft.

"…!"

"…!"

The world seemed to stop.

Humans and monsters alike stood frozen, staring. At that moment, only one thing moved across the endless wasteland.

Rrrrrr.

A single spear that had blown apart the Orc Lord's head, pierced through the ground, and now trembled violently.

The Hunters knew who owned that spear, with its soft, almost mystical glow.

Jin Taekyung!

Along with the name that flashed through their minds like lightning, the spear lodged deep in the ground shot upward and flew into someone's grasp.

Fwooooooosh—tap.

As though by agreement, they slowly turned their heads. Only then did they realize that the shadow of death looming over them had vanished without a trace.

"Little lambs wandering through the Mutated Gate. Run like fuck and get behind me."

Tap. Tap.

The middle-aged man walked with a confident, unhurried stride.

That did not change when he entered the skyscraper overlooking the Blue House[2601] and the National Assembly.

"If you're a Guild member, please show your access pass—"

"I haven't seen you before. New here?"

"Pardon? Yes, I am."

"Thought so. You must be new if you're acting like this. Looks like your Team Leader didn't tell you."

The Security Team Hunter, who had been staring blankly at the middle-aged man, sucked in a startled breath.

"Oh! I'm sorry. I didn't recognize you—"

"It's fine. I'm busy, so let me through."

"Y-Yes, sir."

The checkpoint that everyone, Guild member or outsider, had to pass through could not stop the middle-aged man. He glanced at the young Hunter bowing hurriedly to him and continued toward his destination.

[2601] The Blue House is the traditional name for South Korea's presidential office and residence.

A voice was already coming through the tiny communicator implanted beneath his ear in a simple operation.

“He’s waiting for you.”

The middle-aged man barely moved his lips.

“Where?”

“Section A.”

The skyscraper rose 150 stories, but Section A appeared on neither its building plans nor its signs. Only a tiny fraction of its countless Guild members were allowed into that space.

The middle-aged man was one of them.

“Have the Teleport ready.”

“It’s ready. By the way, that new Security Team recruit, Deputy Team—ah, sorry. Team Leader.”

Even I’m not used to it yet, so what can you expect?

Before he could finish the thought, the voice continued.

“In any case, I’ll inform the Security Team Leader and have the recruit disciplined.”

Not a report. Not a suggestion. A notification.

At some point, that had become normal, but it still felt strange to him. He frowned faintly.

“Do we really need to go that far?”

“Team Leader?”

“…Never mind. Handle it as you see fit.”

“Yes. I’ll deal with it appropriately.”

“Appropriately” meant a pay cut at minimum. It might mean a demotion.

He thought of the young man who had stopped him and felt a twinge of discomfort, but there was nothing he could do. That was the policy of the Guild he belonged to.

No. It was their policy.

And ever since that incident, it’s been getting worse.

He had long known that the Guild was ruled with an iron fist, but its grip had tightened even further since the recent unfortunate incident.

Perhaps the new king was impatient because his subjects had yet to fully accept his right to the throne.

The middle-aged man let out a small sigh and spoke as he walked.

“Update me on the VIP.”

“He’s in a bad mood.”

"Am I imagining things, or did you say the same thing yesterday?"

"Well… he read this morning's papers and—"

"That's enough. Send me everything the VIP is reading. Scrape it all and send it to me. Right now."

His magically secured smartphone vibrated as soon as he finished speaking. He tapped the screen lightly. The headlines of more than twenty morning newspapers that had left the presses only two or three hours earlier filled the display.

"…Whew."

After reading them all, the middle-aged man rubbed his dry eyes. The fatigue he had forgotten came rushing back.

[2602] The Blue House is the traditional name for South Korea's presidential office and residence.

"Damn it."

"Have you finished reading?"

"Yes. I'd have been better off not reading them."

"I'm sorry to interrupt, but you should hurry."

"I was about to. I'm almost there."

Tap.

He stepped onto a faintly glowing magic circle. After he authenticated his fingerprint and infused the circle with mana, it recognized him and released a brilliant flash.

Flash!

A sensation like his entire body floating into the air seized him amid a dazzling halo of light.

The next moment, he opened his eyes and knew the Teleport to Section A had succeeded.

White marble and Magic Gems adorned the room. Around a dozen men and women in lightweight tailored suits bowed to him.

"Welcome, Team Leader."

Many people, speaking with one voice.

He glanced at the subordinates moving like machines and slowly stepped off the magic circle.

"Where's the VIP?"

"Alone in his private office."

"Without security? I clearly told you to keep at least three people stationed in the hallway—"

Boom!

A muffled crash from somewhere cut him off. He could guess what had happened and clicked his tongue.

"I'll go see him. Leave one person here and clear Section A."

"Yes."

His subordinates moved in perfect order as soon as he gave the command. Leaving them behind, he headed down the wide corridor.

At least fifty Magic Traps guarded it against intruders, but the access card around his neck concealed a device that let him pass safely through the minefield.

Bzzzt.

> Head of Security Go Se-won

A red glow swept past him, and the mana churning on every side settled instantly.

Go Se-won crossed the seemingly endless corridor with practiced ease and stopped before a firmly closed door.

Knock, knock.

“It’s Go Se-won.”

An irritable voice came from the other side.

“Come in.”

Go Se-won slowly took hold of the knob and pushed the door open.

The office looked as though a bomb had gone off. In the middle of the wreckage, a man sat on a sofa, staring at him with a red glow in his eyes.

“You’re later than usual.”

Go Se-won bowed his head without a word. Amid the scattered debris, a nameplate gleamed.

> Ares Guild Vice Guild Master Go Jun

Chapter 563

"You're later than usual."

Go Jun was wrong. Go Se-won's watch was always accurate, and there was still plenty of time before he was due at work.

The one who was different today wasn't Go Se-won. His superior was simply in an unusually foul mood.

Go Se-won bowed his head and kept his reply brief.

"I'm sorry."

"Enough. Sit down."

Being allowed to share Go Jun's sofa was a privilege reserved for his closest aides. But before Go Se-won could sit on the Italian leather, he realized his superior's anger was far from spent.

> "Go Hyeon-woo, Rough News."

The reporter, a man in his early thirties who had been given the floor, continued smoothly on the holographic TV.

> "Just ten days into the new year, we've already had three Mutated Gates. What are your thoughts on that, Mr. President?"

Go Se-won glanced to the side.

Go Jun's face was rigid, his eyes bloodshot. He was glaring at someone in the broadcast.

Ah.

Go Se-won remembered an article he had seen on his way in: Jin Taekyung and the President were holding an official New Year's press conference.

He had more or less guessed what was happening, but watching the broadcast in his current state was no different from forcing Go Jun to swallow deadly poison.

Like showing a snuff film to a child.

Go Se-won had made up his mind and was bending down to pick up the remote from the floor when—

"Head of Security."

Go Jun's sharp voice cut in. He kept his eyes on the TV.

"Leave it."

"…I'm only putting it back."

Go Se-won hesitated, brushed the glass shards off the remote, and set it on the table in front of the sofa. On the TV, a man in his early forties had begun to speak.

> “That’s a good question.”

He had a pleasant voice and a kind face, though there was nothing weak about him.

Baek Hanseong, Korea’s twenty-seventh President and the youngest ever elected at forty, continued in a gentle tone.

> “As those of you who saw the Blue House’s[2603] official announcement yesterday afternoon will know, these successive Mutated Gates…”

His calm, unflustered manner inspired trust. Baek Hanseong was known for speeches that held an audience with his voice and slipped in humor so subtly it was hard to tell whether he was joking. Of course people listened.

By the time his lengthy speech—almost like the one he had given when announcing his presidential campaign—ended, the reporters broke into vigorous applause.

“It’s a campaign rally in there.”

Go Jun spat out the words, anger and mockery mingling in his voice. Then he muttered,

“How many of those bastards haven’t taken our fucking money, huh?”

“…”

“They couldn’t even breathe properly when Master was around. The youngest president in history? Anti-Ares Guild? That bastard Baek Hanseong was still beneath Master’s feet in the end.”

Humiliation and rage poured from his voice—emotions that had never been visible in him before.

Go Se-won lowered his eyes. His thoughts turned cold.

It’s true. Though it’s all in the past now.

Lee Jungryong’s influence had been immense.

Even before Cheon Taemin vanished, he had taken little interest in worldly affairs, like an immortal above the clouds. Lee Jungryong had remained on the ground, enjoying a position equal to—or greater than—a president’s or king’s.

Yes. That was how it was back then…

Politicians, business leaders, even the masters of the great Guilds that had risen into a new ruling class had bowed to Lee Jungryong.

He was a hero who had accomplished extraordinary deeds at Cheon Taemin’s side. As the vanished savior’s sworn brother, entrusted with full authority, he had been all but a pope.

[2603] The Blue House was the presidential office of Korea.

Another Vatican.

The people of Korea called this 150-story skyscraper a second Blue House.[2604] In truth, it had been closer to the Vatican, where the pope lived.

Even people who freely cursed the incompetent government and lawmakers had been reluctant to speak against Ares Guild. Its name had been practically sacrosanct.

But…

> "This world! The entire world! Is changing even now! We have entered a new phase!"

As the President's voice rang out over unending applause, everything was changing.

With the fall of the giant that was Lee Jungryong, the shadow he had cast was beginning to lift.

And at the center of all these events, one person's presence was exerting a powerful influence.

> "But, my fellow citizens! The government and I will do everything in our power to keep you safe! Together with the young man seated beside me, we will protect Korea from every threat, at home and abroad!"

President Baek Hanseong did not say the young man's name. He didn't need to.

In the past few months, that man in his late twenties had become one of the most famous people in human history.

> "Waaaaah!"

> "Jin Taekyung! Jin Taekyung!"

> "Fuck! Fucking fuck!"

Cheers louder than any before shook the press conference hall.

The young man who had been sleeping with his chin propped at an angle suddenly opened his eyes. Then he began clapping at a frantic speed while staring at the President.

[2604] The Blue House was the presidential office of Korea.

> “That was truly an incredible speech, Mr. President. Especially your final words. They moved me so deeply that I feel—”

> “Um, that last part was about you, Hunter Jin Taekyung.”

> “Ah, wait a moment. My stomach really is churning. I think I’m suddenly getting motion sickness.”

> “All of this is being filmed. Please wipe the drool off your face first—”

> “Edit this out. Please. Okay?”

> “I told you several times before we started. We’re live.”

> “Right. Wow. Fuck, I’m screwed.”

> “It’s live. I said it’s live, please. Hunter Jin Taekyung. Hello?”

The sight of the sweating President in his forties and the young hero in his twenties was broadcast in its entirety.

It was a broadcasting accident that would go down in the history of Korean television, but no one would scold or curse Jin Taekyung for it.

Even now, the people caught on camera were not frowning. They were smiling as they chanted his name.

Jin Taekyung.

Watching them, Go Se-won realized that the young man and the crowd’s reaction to him resembled something he had thought of only moments ago.

…Sacrosanct?

Compared to the sun that was Cheon Taemin, Jin Taekyung was still only a torch.

But one thing was undeniable. Jin Taekyung was walking the same path as the man remembered as an immortal hero.

And perhaps, regardless of what Jin Taekyung wanted, everything around him was trying to make him a second Cheon Taemin.

> “Mr. Jin Taekyung! I heard you suppressed all three Mutated Gates that appeared this time by yourself! Would you say a few words about that?”

> “I wasn’t alone. There were two of us, though—”

> “Mr. Jin Taekyung! Kim Jin-mu, Mudang Daily!”

> “I have a question about the Mutated Gates!”

Reporters with microphones swarmed toward him. Camera flashes went off without pause.

Go Se-won listened to questions flying in from every direction and felt a sudden sense of déjà vu.

This is…

Something was wrong with the flow of it. It looked natural at first glance, but everyone was being drawn in a direction someone had chosen for them.

Then an unfamiliar reporter shouted a question, and a chill ran down Go Se-won’s spine.

> “I have a question about the third Mutated Gate you suppressed two days ago! According to information obtained by our newspaper, that Gate was being handled by a famous Guild—”

“…!”

That’s it. So that’s what this is.

The moment enlightenment flashed through him, Go Se-won hurriedly reached for the remote.

Crunch!

Go Jun crushed the remote and the table beneath it. His eyes flashed red.

“I’m sure I told you to leave it.”

“But, Vice Guild Master…”

“I won’t say it twice.”

The blood vessels in his superior’s eyes had burst. The voice that followed was so chilling that it raised goose bumps.

“Stay still. Unless you want to die.”

“Hk…!”

Go Se-won swallowed a breath without meaning to and leaned back against the sofa as though his half-raised body had collapsed.

On the holographic TV, exactly what he had feared was happening.

> “That’s right. Ares Guild handled that Gate. Well, it’s technically on a permanent lease, but as everyone knows, that’s practically ownership.”

The great Guilds’ monopoly on Gates was an open secret. Everyone knew; no one said it aloud.
Jin Taekyung had just exposed it without hesitation at a live, official Blue House[2605] press conference. And he wasn’t stopping there.

> “What exactly happened? The magical power readings kept climbing, and no rescue team came.”

The reporters lunged at their prey. Quite a few had once taken Ares Guild’s dirty money, but money always gave way to more money.

> “Wait. Are you saying a rescue team didn’t arrive even after you waited?”

Jin Taekyung nodded.

> “Yes. They still hadn’t come fifteen minutes after the initial situation began. In the meantime, the magical power readings kept rising until the Gate became a Mutated Gate.”

> “Does that mean it could have been dealt with before the Gate fully mutated if the rescue team had arrived on time?”

> “Well, I can’t be a hundred percent certain, but if they had sent in even one A-rank Hunter early on, there probably would have been a high chance of resolving it without outside assistance.”

> “Unlike the other Mutated Gates, the Guild responsible for this one has enormous numbers of Hunters and considerable financial resources. Why do you think it failed to send a rescue team in time?”

> “The reason… Well, I’m not sure.”

Jin Taekyung thought for a moment, then tossed out an answer as though it were nothing.

[2605] The Blue House was the presidential office of Korea.

> “That family seems to be having a lot of trouble these days. Or should I say, the boss? Their management has changed, too, so I imagine there was probably some confusion here and there.”

Crack!

Something beside Go Se-won splintered. He closed his eyes.

It’s over.

An enormous Guild with vast manpower and capital. A change in management.

Those two clues were enough. Anyone who knew anything would understand without searching online. Even if no one had named it yet…

> “It was a serious mistake, but what could I do? Fortunately, I happened to be there, so no one died. Personally, I’m just glad about that. Oh, and while I have this opportunity, I’d like to once again offer my deepest condolences to the deceased.”

> “An excellent answer, Hunter Jin Taekyung. I’m certain the deceased would be grateful and proud of you.”

Damn it.

Go Se-won swore inwardly and opened his eyes.

Korea’s youngest President had the microphone again. He was delivering the final blow.

> “Fortunately, we were able to bring this incident to an end without any fatalities, but our government intends to take the initiative and begin a thorough investigation. As President of Korea—and as a citizen—I find this Guild’s negligent response deeply regrettable. However, the wishes and legacy of the deceased, who was a great hero, have been passed on in their entirety to Hunter Jin Taekyung—”

The President’s words did not reach the end.

No—in precise terms, Go Se-won could no longer hear them.

“…!”

He threw up his guard on instinct. Powerful mana shot out like a beam of light, shattering the holographic TV and tearing through everything around it.

Kwa-gwa-gwa-gwang!

The layered protective magic circles installed by ten high-ranking mages broke apart. Bulletproof glass and everything else shattered, then scattered into dust.

At the center of the destruction stood Go Jun, his eyes blood-red.

“How dare you! How dare you! How dare you—!”

Bang! Bang! Kwaaaang!

Everything had a limit.

Those last words had set fire to all the anger Go Jun had swallowed in the days since becoming Vice Guild Master.

“I’ll kill him! I’ll kill him no matter what!”

Kwaaaang!

Go Jun was Lee Jungryong’s de facto successor. But those who watched today’s press conference would see it differently.

They would believe that Jin Taekyung was the new hero—and the only person who had inherited the will of Cheon Taemin, who had still not revealed himself, and Lee Jungryong, who had died only recently.

“Jin Taekyung! Jin Taekyuuung!”

Go Jun screamed the name as though coughing up blood, all reason gone.

Go Se-won watched him, his gaze sinking deep.

Chapter 564

When a company grows, what's the first thing it should do?

Everyone would answer differently, but every CEO has a dream tucked away somewhere in their heart.

Build a headquarters of their own.

Or should I call it an expansion in this case?

I was walking through the Guild House when I stopped and looked down at the work going on below.

"Hey, can somebody lift these materials with gravity magic?"

"All right, listen up. Any former tanks here? Hands up."

"Me."

"Over here, too. Why?"

"Why do you think? I'm putting you to work. Five F-ranks, over here. Bring an E-rank or two as well."

Grrrind. Boom!

Smooth marble rose and fell through the air, while every swing of the muscle-bound giants' sledgehammers smashed apart the solid concrete walls.

More than a hundred workers bustled about. They were all Awakened, which probably explained their astonishing pace.

Of course, their wages were astonishing too. But to a young tycoon with deep pockets, they were pocket change.

"The Guild House is getting cramped now that we have more people."

Team Leader Choi had dropped that remark a few days ago and immediately taken action.

I'd heard he bought up all the nearby land, paying above market value for it, and started a massive expansion. I wasn't going to argue.

It's not my money.

Besides, I had other uses for my own money.

My fifty trillion won[2606] in untaxed assets was shrinking bit by bit as I spent it, but what I'd used so far was a drop in the ocean compared to what remained.

Fifty trillion won[2607]…

Even thinking about it again, it was an absurd amount of money. Like the figure of a man gradually approaching from beyond the corridor.

Swoosh.

A huge man glided through the air like a ghost and spoke without warning.

[2606] Fifty trillion Korean won is about $36 billion or €32 billion at the project conversion rates.

[2607] Fifty trillion Korean won is about $36 billion or €32 billion at the project conversion rates.

"Hey, I watched the press conference."

"…?"

Wait. What are you doing here, hyung?[2608]

I stared at Magic Johnson in disbelief before I finally managed to speak.

"What is it?"

"Why?"

"Why? That's what I want to ask you. Why are you here again today?"

"I had something to take care of."

"You didn't come to use the bathroom, did you?"

"Of course not. I came to give Choi something. I figured I'd check on the progress while I was here."

"Do you put emails in your cereal and eat them?"

"You're not uncomfortable because I'm here, are you?"

"You didn't think I was comfortable, did you?"

Magic Johnson let out a heavy sigh at my immediate reply.

"Hey, Jin. Harsh words hurt sensitive people like me."

"…Hurt?"

I looked at his thick neck and iron-hard, bronze-colored arms.

He looks like a knife couldn't cut him.

Damn, that Black dude is jacked.

With a build like that, he could quit being a mage and become a melee Hunter right now.

I wasn't exaggerating, either. Search for "Magic Johnson's staff," and you'd get page after page of videos. Practically everyone knew the story of how he'd caved in an ogre's skull with a single blow from a staff made for casting magic. People in fitness communities were still arguing over how much the thing weighed.

And he's calling himself sensitive? Give me a break.

Magic Johnson caught the meaning of my lingering stare and shook his head.

"Not my body. My heart. The heart's what matters, Jin."

"Someone with a sensitive heart wouldn't have survived the Great Cataclysm. You're still alive and people call you a hero because you're strong."

"Hmm. I can't tell if that was a compliment or an insult."

"Take it as a compliment."

Magic Johnson gave me a suspicious look, then went on.

"Anyway, I watched the press conference. There was a lot to read into it."

The press conference…

[2608] Hyung is a familiar Korean term a man uses to address an older man, whether or not they are brothers.

I scratched the back of my head, embarrassed.

The official Blue House[2609] press conference I'd attended at the President's request had caused an enormous stir. I'd heard domestic viewership had topped seventy percent, and it had made headlines abroad too.

Even two days later, related searches were holding firm near the top of the real-time rankings. They'd probably still be there a week from now.

"The broadcast mishap probably helped, and the ratings were pretty good. I didn't know you watched it, Johnson."

"What you're up to is always news in the United States, Jin. President Baek's final words must have meant a great deal to certain people. Me included."

"Oh, that."

"I wondered why he was praising Mr. Lee so much. Then he landed one hell of a blow, didn't he?"

"Well, I wasn't the one who landed it… But I bet it got under Go Jun's skin."

We weren't living in the Warring States period,[2610] but anyone inheriting an organization that big still needed legitimacy.

And Go Jun, the new Vice Guild Master of Ares Guild, didn't have much of it.

"Ares Guild is a vast empire. Even if he inherited the shares according to the will, he didn't inherit all of Mr. Lee's influence. If they had shared blood, he would at least have met certain expectations in Asian society. But he doesn't, does he?"

"Lee Jungryong did have a son, but I heard he died young. He was an ordinary person who never Awakened, though, so he couldn't have succeeded Lee even if he were still alive."

Modern Guilds were like Murim sects. A bookish scholar couldn't become the Sect Leader of Huashan; a Guild Master needed the power and authority of a Hunter.

Magic Johnson knew that as well as anyone. He nodded.

"True. Sseokkochoon, on the other hand, has the skill, whatever his faults as a person. I heard he passed the S-rank Hunter qualification assessment with an incredible score. The news got buried almost immediately under everything else that's been happening, of course."

"His name is Go Jun, not Sseokkochoon. And anyway, that bastard was Lee Jungryong's Head of Security."

"That's nowhere near enough. He needs the support of the other founding heroes who made Ares Guild what it is today. But…"

"He didn't have time."

"Exactly. Time. Mr. Lee probably wrote that will to prepare for the worst without ever imagining he'd die so easily."

[2609] The Blue House is the traditional name for South Korea's presidential compound.

[2610] The Warring States period was an era of competing states in ancient China, from the fifth to the third century BCE.

But he had died in the end, and Go Jun had inherited the crown before he could firmly establish himself as the successor.

Being Head of Security was proof that he had been one of Lee Jungryong's closest aides, but there were many difficulties involved in inheriting an enormous organization like Ares Guild.

Even with Lee Jungryong's will, it would not be easy for elderly veterans to respectfully serve a fresh-faced man in his thirties as their superior.

On top of that, Go Jun himself had rapidly fallen apart since Lee Jungryong's death.

And in the middle of all that, his legitimacy was openly denied during an official Blue House[2611] press conference with seventy percent viewership…

President Baek Hanseong's remark had been both subtle and sharp.

He had indirectly criticized Ares Guild over the Mutated Gate while praising Lee Jungryong's achievements and presenting me as the man who would carry on his legacy.

The whole thing was staged.

The press conference had been a joint production by President Baek Hanseong, who had shown an anti-Ares stance since his days as a lawmaker, and Team Leader Choi.

They'd won over reporters, fed them questions, and steered the conversation where they wanted it to go. The script and cast had been prepared from start to finish.

If Lee Jungryong had still been alive, they would have scrapped the plan. But Go Jun lacked the power to put down the new underdog's rebellion, so we finished the shoot without a hitch—with a domestic rating of seventy percent and the foreign press shining its spotlight on us.

"Either way, it's another small victory. We should have a glass of champagne. Where's Choi?"

"He was busy before, but lately he's been swamped. If we're lucky, he might be in his office."

"He's not."

Magic Johnson shrugged.

"I just stopped by there on my way here."

"Ah. Something else must have come up."

That was nothing new. Team Leader Choi might have held a team leader's title, but he'd effectively been the Guild Master from the start. By now, the public saw him that way too.

He was probably one of the busiest people in Korea.

"Hey, Jin. Want to walk with me?"

[2611] The Blue House is the traditional name for South Korea's presidential compound.

"Sure. As long as we stay away from secluded spots."

"You've gotten funnier."

"…"

"…Tell me that was a joke."

I walked faster without answering. Magic Johnson followed, stepping through the air as if he were floating, and grumbled.

"Jin, why do you keep making me out to be some kind of weirdo?"

"Because you keep saying weird things."

"I'm joking, obviously. Besides, I have preferences. You're not my type. That guy over there, maybe."

I followed his gaze to a tall, handsome man walking past.

"I haven't seen him before. New Guild member?"

"Someone might mistake you for a member of our Guild. How many people here do you even know?"

"That's ridiculous! You think I wouldn't remember a handsome man like that?"

"…"

Why is he so adamant about it?

He had an uncanny eye for this sort of thing. I sighed and answered.

"I don't really know his name, but he is new. C-rank, I think?"

"I don't know who his former Guild Master was, but he must be crying tears of blood. With looks like that, he'd draw plenty of attention. He could do well as a star Hunter."

"His former Guild Master is probably crying blood over something else. He was humiliated at the press conference."

"Oh. Then was he…?"

"Yeah. He used to belong to Ares Guild."

Leaving Ares Guild for Peace Guild meant more than a simple transfer. Magic Johnson seemed to understand.

"Living proof that the impregnable fortress is starting to shake. How many have come over from Ares so far?"

"Not many. Around ten."

"The number isn't the point. It proves a crack has opened."

I gave a small nod. If outsiders could see the crack, it was probably much bigger on the inside.

Of course, we can't rule out the possibility that Go Jun sent him deliberately as a spy.

That was why he had been accepted only after a thorough verification process, and I heard they planned to deploy him in actual operations little by little.

Even with the System, I couldn't read people's minds. Team Leader Choi's intelligence network would be a great help there.

"What's that place?" Magic Johnson asked. "The security looks serious."

I'd been walking in silence, lost in thought. I looked up and saw the titanium-alloy door he was pointing at.

"Oh, that? It's a training room."

"The training room? A training room?"

"Yeah."

"My goodness. What kind of training room needs security like that?"

Magic Johnson gave an incredulous laugh.

"Five overlapping spells? I can understand not wanting anyone to watch you train, but isn't that excessive inside a Guild House?"

"Who knows?"

I kept my answer short. The room had been prepared for only a handful of people.

More specifically…

For people training in the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique.

I hadn't even told Magic Johnson about it. Access was limited to Team Leader Choi, Butler Kim, Song Song, and Im Kkeokjeong.

"Judging by the security, it doesn't seem like a space open to every Guild member."

I nodded at his observation.

"That's exactly right. It's for the Guild's founding members, including me."

"Hmm. A secret, then. Now you've awakened my curiosity as a mage."

"Put it back to sleep."

"That's cruel. I can't even take a quick look?"

I hesitated, then waved him off.

"No. Someone's inside."

"Who? Choi?"

"No."

A sudden bitterness came over me.

"Someone who needs to train more desperately than anyone."

"…?"

"There is someone like that."

I couldn't see him now, but I could picture him clearly: a middle-aged Hunter training over and over, sweat pouring off him like rain. He tried harder than anyone to act as though he was fine, even as he willed himself back onto his feet with his spirit brutally crushed.

Maybe it's time to start that…

The thought that flashed through my mind slowly took shape as Magic Johnson spoke again.

"Can't be helped. Give this to Choi when you see him."

“Huh? Give him what?”

“This.”

Swoosh.

A small object slipped inside my clothes on a faint current of qi.

I felt the chip and looked up. The Grand Mage’s face had turned grave.

“It’s not just Korea and the United States. Magical power readings are soaring all over the world. Up seven percent from last year. That lucky number has never felt so ominous.”

“…!”

Chapter 565

After Magic Johnson left, I texted Team Leader Choi, who still wasn't answering his phone, then headed straight for my private office on the top floor of the Guild House.

Bang.

Hearing the door slam shut behind me, I dropped heavily onto the floor.

The place was over a hundred pyeong, but all it held was a small desk and a single chair.[2612] It was called an office. Really, it was a training ground.

I immediately took out my smartphone and inserted the chip.

Click.

The latest model I'd bought recently had every feature imaginable, including holographic video playback, which had become common over the past decade or so.

Bzzzz.

Light spilled from the phone's projector with a faint hum. I quickly used Seizing an Object Through Empty Space to draw the blackout curtains, then focused on the footage filling the dark office.

Crackle. Crackle.

Static.

Boom! Kraaang!

A deafening roar.

Shrieeeek!

A monster's cry.

"Aaaah!"

A human scream.

It all mingled before my eyes, then scattered. The place, lined with tents and buildings of every size, had become a horrific battlefield.

Mutated Gate.

The words flashed through my mind.

Then—

"In the name of Allah!"

"Waaaaah!"

A group in military caps and turbans charged forward, shouting at the top of their lungs. They looked Arab, and their bodies were soaked in someone else's blood.

There was even a child among them, no older than an elementary school student.

A child…

[2612] A pyeong is a Korean unit of area equal to about 3.31 m^2 (35.6 ft^2).

There was no way these people were regular soldiers. Their mismatched clothing had already told me as much. They had to be Arab rebels—the kind who had stained the Middle East with blood even before the Great Cataclysm.

Then, the next moment—

“Aaaah! G-God is great!”

Along with the terrified cry of a little boy, countless firearms in their hands opened fire.

Rat-tat-tat-tat!

Whoosh! Boom!

Enough firepower to riddle ordinary humans with holes poured out at once. But their enemies were neither ordinary nor human.

Kraaang!

A huge blaze rose from the explosion. The rebels stood panting as black smoke filled the area. Then the smoke parted, and a flash of light cut through it.

Whoosh. Shing!

One strike was enough. Dark red magical power swept outward in a crescent, cutting through everything in its path.

Necks, waists, chests. The wounds differed, but the result was the same.

Death.

Splaaash!

A beat later, fountains of blood stained the sand red.

The surviving rebels stared wide-eyed at the grisly deaths of nearly twenty comrades.

“M-Masoud!”

“My God…”

But their god neither appeared nor answered his followers. In his place came a monster clad from head to toe in green armor.

Chirr. Chiriririk.

A triangular head. Two quivering antennae. Forelegs curved like scythes.

It was a mantis, enormous enough to look down at a grown man. Powerful magical power radiated from its body, which bore not a scratch from the rebels’ attack.

“G-Giant Mantis…”

Someone groaned the name. The huge foreleg swept through the air again.

Whoom. Shing!

A rebel frozen in place split down the middle. Magical power shot from the foreleg like an arrow, tearing through everything around it.

Shing! Shing! Kraaang!

People. Weapons. Even the tanks hastily sent into battle could not stop it.

Explosions and screams rang out as the attacks cut in every direction. Before long, there were five Giant Mantises, and they leaped among the humans.

Chit-chit-chit!

Chiriiit!

Crack! Splaaash!

With every strange cry, limbs flew from the roughly hundred rebels, and blood sprayed across the sand.

Those who fought while calling on their god and those who fled in terror alike fell in the desert, never to rise again.

“Aaah! Aaaaah!”

Shunk!

A scythe-like foreleg slashed through the rebel’s back and shattered his breastbone.

Having struck down the last rebel still resisting, the Giant Mantis suddenly turned. A red eye protruding from the side of its head fixed on the camera.

It found the camera.

It saw the camera, and I saw it.

Then, just as the Giant Mantis sensed something strange and cautiously began approaching the camera—

“May the flames of God descend upon this place. Fire Rain!”

Fwoosh!

An aged voice rang out. At the same instant, dozens of fireballs formed from mana came hurtling over the Giant Mantis’s shoulder like meteors.

Chiririririt!

It shrieked and swung a foreleg at them.

Boom!

The impact dyed the screen—no, everything around it—red. Dozens of Hunters appeared in the distance and raced across the battlefield through the bursting fireballs.

“Allahu Akbar!”

“God is great! Kill every one of those devils!”

Krrk, chiiit!

Humans and monsters. Monsters and humans.

The two sides began killing each other again. But I couldn’t watch the battle to its end.

Crackle. Crackle. Pop!

In an instant, the hologram filling the room vanished amid a burst of heavy static.

“…Whew.”

I let out the breath I'd been holding and picked up the phone I'd set aside. The list on the chip held more than twenty videos I hadn't watched yet.

Fuck. How long has it been since the last batch? And there's already more.

Worldwide magical power readings had risen seven percent over the previous year.

Some idiots might call that only seven percent. But a drop of even a few percentage points in the air's oxygen concentration would cause an uproar. This was proof that things were going to hell.

No. Maybe…

This could be the beginning of the second Great Cataclysm.

As I watched the remaining videos one by one, my fears began to take shape.

Europe. The Middle East. West Africa. Southeast Asia… What is this, some kind of worldwide festival?

Changes were already happening all over the world at once.

A new Gate appeared among the green hills of Switzerland, where I could picture Patrache running around with a dog biscuit in his mouth.[2613] Elsewhere, rebels and regular soldiers rained shells on each other while monsters poured from low-rank Gates left unattended.

A few places had been prepared well enough to suppress the outbreaks early. In more than half the videos, though, the monsters were defeated only after causing considerable damage.

This…

I kept replaying the footage, my brow furrowing. The damage wasn't simply due to poor Gate defenses.

But insight wasn't the only thing that came to me then.

Ding.

I heard the faint chime of the elevator, followed by the presence of two people drawing closer. Recognizing my uninvited guests, I reached out.

Fwoosh.

A warm breeze swept through the room. Qi flowed from my palm and gently pushed the door open, revealing familiar faces.

"What took you so long? I texted you ages ago."

"I'm sorry. I couldn't be reached for a while."

I'd been about to lay into the latecomers, but I tilted my head.

"Couldn't be reached? Did you go into a Gate or something?"

"Something like that."

"…Either you did or you didn't. What's 'something like that' supposed to mean?"

[2613] Patrache is the dog in A Dog of Flanders.

"Butler Kim and I had somewhere to stop. It was important, so it couldn't be helped."

Team Leader Choi stepped inside as he answered. Butler Kim followed, closed the door, and gave me a slight nod.

Haven't seen him in a while.

Butler Kim had hardly shown his face at the Guild lately. What important business had the two of them been handling?

It had been about a week since I'd seen him, and the question lingered. But something more urgent needed our attention. Team Leader Choi knew it too.

"We can discuss this later. For now, we should check the information Mr. Johnson gave us."

"Oh. Here."

I played the footage again. By the time they'd gone through every video and the attached materials, both their faces had hardened.

"Worldwide magical power readings up seven percent?"

Butler Kim's usually gentle voice came out cracked.

"Young Master."

"Yes. It's progressing faster than we expected. This is serious."

Seven percent wasn't merely a rise. Surge was closer to the mark.

And that sharp change in magical power levels was especially obvious in the footage.

"The monsters…"

I nodded and finished Team Leader Choi's thought.

"Yeah. They've gotten fucking strong."

Rising magical power readings meant stronger monsters. The Giant Mantis in the first video had held its own even after taking a hit from Fire Rain.

It was like watching Chikorita get a tan from Charizard's flames.[2614]

Type advantages were supposed to mean something. But as magical power readings climbed, the monsters were growing strong enough to shrug those advantages off.

In a situation this fucked, places that kept their precious Hunters deployed in minimal numbers as a precaution were bound to be overwhelmed.

To sum it up…

"We're fucked. It's five minutes to a complete shitshow."

Things were moving at a ridiculous pace. Keep this up, and monsters might be part of the weather forecast by the end of the year.

[2614] Chikorita and Charizard are Pokémon. Chikorita is a Grass-type, which is vulnerable to Charizard's fire.

A pretty weathercaster would point to a map of the Korean Peninsula no bigger than a booger and explain it all:

"Tomorrow, goblins are expected to fall in Cheorwon, Gangwon Province, instead of heavy snow. They're expected to pile up to a height of twenty meters, so residents should grab their shields and antidotes and evacuate immediately."[2615]

"…"

Fuck. Heavy snow is annoying enough. Now monsterfall? Seriously?

Just imagining monsters pouring down from the sky made my heart shrivel.

Of course, I wasn't going to sit around twiddling my thumbs until then. I had to stop Korea from turning into Hell Peninsula, whatever it took.[2616]

I'd kept this possibility in mind, but… it's definitely happening too fast.

I'd thought we had a little more time. The prospect of bringing forward that thing —the plan I'd been working on little by little since Murim—weighed on me.

That was when Team Leader Choi spoke.

"At this point, we can't keep it hidden any longer."

He turned off the hologram. His voice was low.

"It's already beyond what can be concealed at a national level. The longer we wait to tell people, the worse the confusion will be."

This wasn't a wave that would pass. It was a tsunami that might sweep whole cities away.

"What are you planning to do, Team Leader Choi?"

"Gate defenses come first right now. We need a breakwater before the tsunami hits."

"Strengthen the Gate defenses?"

"That will leave us with fewer Hunters for raids, and we won't be able to make full use of all the Gates Peace Guild owns. But I know which matters more."

"That's a relief."

I let out a quiet laugh. Team Leader Choi knew where to draw the line. He had grand ambitions of swallowing Ares Guild, but he also knew when to push forward and when to stop.

That's the biggest difference between him and Lee Jungryong.

"Then we should focus on the Gates for now. It's unfortunate, but we'll have to put matters concerning Ares Guild on hold for a while…"

"Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"Yes?"

Team Leader Choi's clear eyes were fixed on me.

[2615] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

[2616] "Hell Peninsula," or Hellbando, is Korean slang portraying life in Korea as harsh or oppressive.

“I said that I would make Gate defenses my top priority. I never said I would put matters concerning Ares Guild on hold.”

“…!”

What?

My eyes widened. Team Leader Choi went on.

“I told you I had important business to take care of.”

“Then that important business was…?”

“A major figure in Ares Guild. A war hero who helped my maternal grandfather bring the Great Cataclysm to an end. Once the friend Lee Jungryong trusted most. And now the leader of the largest faction within Ares threatening Go Jun.”

His voice was gentler than ever, with thorns hidden beneath it.

“Everything crumbles from the inside.”

Chapter 566

What Team Leader Choi told me was the last thing I'd expected.

If magical power readings hadn't been rising so sharply, I might have found this even more interesting.

A traitor?

A few Ares Guild members had come over to our side after the recent incident, but those were ordinary transfers. Rank-and-file Guild members like them were a dime a dozen at Ares.

A traitor on the inside was another matter.

Especially if he's a big shot.

In Murim terms, he was a master of the previous generation. Having lived through the Great Cataclysm already made him interesting enough, but he was also the head of an internal faction powerful enough to threaten Go Jun.

Oh, now that's appetizing.

"…Mr. Jin Taekyung?"

"Oh. Yes? What is it?"

"Here, take this first."

It was a handkerchief. I blinked at him, and Team Leader Choi pointed awkwardly at my chin.

"I don't know why, but there's a lot of drool around your mouth."

"…Oh."

"It looks like it's about to dr—ugh."

What was with the ugh? A man could drool a little.

I wiped my mouth with my sleeve and got straight to the point.

"So who is he? The traitor."

"Traitor. I doubt he'd like hearing that. How should I put it… He'd probably prefer to be called a business partner. Or Ares Guild's next Vice Guild Master."

"What kind of bullshit is that? It sounds like you've more or less struck a deal with him already. If it looks like betrayal, I'm calling him a traitor. Is he just telling himself otherwise to feel better?"

Team Leader Choi wasn't the one who answered.

Butler Kim had been listening quietly. Now he spoke in a low voice.

"He craves honor."

"Honor?"

"As people grow old and death draws closer, they often begin to cling to honor. No… Looking back on the life he's led, greed might be the better word."

Had I ever heard Butler Kim speak so harshly about anyone?

Lee Jungryong was the only person who came to mind. But what Butler Kim had shown Lee was anger. What he felt toward this man sounded more like contempt.

He almost never shows his feelings this openly.

From everything I'd seen and heard, Butler Kim was practically up there with Jesus and Buddha. Sure, he seemed to have had a fiery temper when he was young, but that was a long time ago.

Who the hell is this guy?

Judging by how severely he was criticizing the man's entire life, they clearly knew each other well. But there were so many Ares Guild executives who wielded considerable influence that no name immediately came to mind.

As if he'd read my mind, Team Leader Choi spoke.

"Director Song. Song Cheonwoo is that kind of man."

"Song Cheonwoo. Song Cheonwoo…"

The name sounded vaguely familiar. I searched for it on my phone and found a short profile.

Calling it a profile was generous. It had his date of birth, a few lines about his life, and two photos of the same man side by side at the top of the page, one from his younger days.

Still, it gave me something.

"Huh? Wait, is this guy…?"

"Have you seen him before?"

"I think so. There's a framed picture of him in the hallway at the Hunter training center. Isn't there?"

"You probably remember correctly. He briefly served as head of the Hunter training center a little over twenty years ago."

"Oh."

That was before the rules for the position had been properly established, but even then, only a top ranker with an impressive record could become head of the Hunter training center.

He really is a big deal.

For someone with his reputation, though, there was barely anything about him online. A man like this had to have plenty of accomplishments and stories to his name, yet his biography was only two or three lines long. His profile hadn't even been updated in three years.

Three years ago?

Even a B-list celebrity would have more written about them. I frowned and tapped around for another source.

Bzz.

My phone vibrated faintly. A notification appeared on the screen.

> Team Leader Choi
> └ Team Leader Choi: [File attached]

“What’s this all of a sudden?”

“I thought it would be faster. I doubt you’ll find much detail about him through an Internet search.”

“Come on. In this day and age?”

“Then I’ll delete the attachment.”

“But since you went to the trouble of sending it, I’ll read it.”

“…”

“Listen until someone finishes speaking Korean.”

Having offered Team Leader Choi that valuable advice, I opened the file. Unlike the online profile, it ran to dozens of pages.

I started taking in the information on the screen as fast as I could.

Name: Song Cheonwoo. Age: seventies.

He was an A-rank Hunter, naturally. Twenty years ago, he’d ranked as high as third in Korea. The two people ahead of him had been Cheon Taemin and Lee Jungryong, which told me he was a formidable fighter in his own right.

During the Great Cataclysm, he’d taken part in dozens of major battles. His work had apparently been more prominent overseas than at home: he’d received medals from eight countries, including the United Kingdom, Germany, and France.

And the rest of his career? There was too damn much to go through line by line.

“That’s some résumé. How did I not remember him?”

“He isn’t as well known in Korea as you might think. Most of his notable work was overseas, and he spent very little time working here after the war.”

“Ah. Right.”

His stint as head of the Hunter training center stood out, but according to the file, he’d resigned voluntarily before serving even half of his four-year term.

The official reason was his health, but…

“Two months later, appointed Director of Ares Guild’s European regional branch.”

I read the line aloud. Team Leader Choi nodded.

“That was his last position here. From twenty years ago until now, he’s remained the Director of Ares’s European regional branch. That’s why younger Hunters like you and me know so little about him.”

“Leave yourself out of it. You probably know Song Cheonwoo better than almost anyone. Am I wrong?”

“What makes you think so?”

"Who do you take me for, an idiot? Cheon Tae—sorry. Anyway, you seem to have quite a connection with that person, and Butler Kim knows him too, so there has to be a link. To give one more example…"

"What would that be?"

I didn't have to think long. I pulled up a fairly recent memory and tossed out a phrase.

"Director of the European regional branch."

"…!"

"You told me that when you were at Ares, they kept shuttling you between overseas branches. I think Europe was one of them."

A faint smile touched Team Leader Choi's lips. I'd got it right.

"You remembered."

"I keep telling you I'm not that stupid."

"You're right. Song Cheonwoo followed my maternal grandfather long before I was born. When I was assigned to the European branch five years ago, Song used his authority as Director to keep me close."

"So did you know each other personally…?"

"On second thought, 'keep me close' isn't the right expression. I should say he kept me under surveillance and isolated me."

"…So you weren't close at all. Got it. Go on."

"From what I saw of him, Song Cheonwoo's abilities don't match the scale of his ambition. Though his rival at the time may simply have been too formidable."

His rival? I didn't have to think about that one.

"Lee Jungryong."

"A mountain can have only one master. Even if they were once friends, one of them had to leave."

Now it made sense. Why a man of Song Cheonwoo's stature had left Korea so soon after the war. Why he'd spent twenty years stuck in an impressive-sounding post overseas.

He was demoted.

There was no other way to put it. Lee Jungryong had won their power struggle inside Ares Guild and exiled his rival to Europe. Over time, Song had faded from people's memories.

No. Knowing Lee Jungryong, he'd made sure Song was forgotten.

Which means this file…

It wasn't a collection of Internet gossip. Experts had compiled and polished this investigation. It went beyond research and came close to surveillance.

So that's why he sent it separately.

Unlike the online profile, whose updates had stopped five years ago, the final page of the file dealt with recent events.

- November 15, 2046. Discussed retirement at a party hosted by the British ambassador. Audio file attached.
- November 28, 2046. Purchased a two-story mansion of approximately 300 pyeong[2617] in Samseong-dong, Seoul. Appears intended as a residence after retirement.
- January 1, 2047. Arrived through Incheon International Airport. Met secretly with key members of Ares Guild's board of directors. Exact number and names attached in supplementary materials.
- January 2, 2047. Attended Lee Jungryong's funeral. Held a second meeting with major political and business figures and key members of the Guild.
- January 4, 2047. Ares Guild's board held an official meeting to appoint a Vice Guild Master. Go Jun's appointment was approved after three revotes.

The file was packed with information on Song Cheonwoo's movements over the past two months. Just reading it, I could see exactly how his thinking had changed.

"Song Cheonwoo's got his heart set on a comeback."

Team Leader Choi nodded.

"In November, he subtly expressed his intention to resign in a private setting, and he even purchased a mansion in Korea where he could stay after retirement. But…"

"Lee Jungryong died."

"Yes. No one could have expected that. To a man on the verge of retirement, it must have looked like one last chance."

"And his opponent wasn't Lee Jungryong anymore. It was Go Jun. With you on his side, he must have thought he could win."

Go Jun had needed three revotes to secure the Vice Guild Master position. That alone was proof. Song Cheonwoo, seventy-something and about to retire, had been gathering support wherever he could for one last shot.

"Pretty energetic for a man his age."

Team Leader Choi gave a quiet laugh.

"That's the magic of power, isn't it? It's given me an opportunity too."

"Sure. That's all well and good, but…"

What was this feeling? My mouth felt gritty, as though I'd chewed a handful of sand.

[2617] Pyeong is a Korean unit of area equal to 3.31 m² (35.6 ft²). About 300 pyeong is 990 m² (10,700 ft²).

I stared at Song Cheonwoo's face on the screen. Then Team Leader Choi spoke softly beside me.

"And if this works… a grandparent and grandchild[2618] may finally see each other again after a long time."

What hand?

I blinked at him. A moment later, I understood.

"No way."

The savior of the twenty-first century. The immortal hero who had saved humanity and would live forever in its memory—yet had vanished one day behind an invisible curtain.

Cheon Taemin.

He hadn't shown himself even when his only blood relative was in danger. Not even after Lee Jungryong died.

And his maternal grandson, born of the hero's blood, spoke with the smile gone from his face.

"Song Cheonwoo knew where my maternal grandfather was."

Go Se-won, the Head of Security, gazed at the teacup in front of him.

The cup, once warm, had gone cold. Tea-leaf dregs floated in the little tea he'd deliberately left behind.

Looks just like me.

He'd been staring at the cup for over an hour since making his report. At this point, he was almost getting attached to it.

But there was nothing else he could do. His job was to report the facts as they were, not to give orders. And considering the gravity of what he'd reported, he was fortunate his superior hadn't smashed everything around him as he had last time.

He's thinking it over. The longer he thinks, the better the decision should be.

His superior's next words proved how badly he'd misjudged the situation.

"Kill him."

"Sir?"

"I said kill him. His children. His grandchildren. His daughters-in-law. All of them."

Thud.

A file folder slipped off the table, struck the floor, and fell open.

Go Jun stared at the three Korean characters spelling Song Cheonwoo, then at the photograph of a man with prominent cheekbones. Fire flickered in his eyes.

[2618] The Korean word joson means a grandparent and grandchild. Its final syllable sounds like son, the Korean word for "hand."

“Has this old bastard gone senile…?”

Chapter 567

“Has this old man gone senile…?”

Go Se-won had lost count of how many times he’d faced those red eyes.

Go Jun’s gaze had gone beyond ominous. It was chilling now, and Go Se-won swallowed before he realized he was doing it.

But he was the Head of Security.

He was the only person who could put the brakes on Go Jun’s rampage, if only for a moment. And after all that deliberation, his superior was about to make a disastrous move. Go Se-won had a duty to talk him out of it.

“Vice Guild Master.”

Go Jun looked at him. A chill ran down Go Se-won’s spine, but he managed to speak.

“What you just said… Were you serious?”

Go Jun frowned.

“Of course not. Do I look like that much of an idiot to you, Team Leader Go?”

“Oh.”

Go Se-won had waited for the answer with a sinking feeling, so he let out a quiet sigh of relief.

Come to think of it, the idea was absurd.

Go Jun had grown far more violent lately, but surely he wouldn’t order every member of Song Cheonwoo’s family killed…

“Don’t kill them. Capture them and bring them here.”

“Excuse me?”

“Didn’t you hear me?”

Of course he had.

Go Se-won was an A-rank Hunter who could hear a mosquito’s wings flutter from ten meters[2619] away.

He asked again because he’d heard something he would rather not have heard at all.

“Would you repeat that, please?”

Bang! Crack!

The table, replaced only a few days ago, was smashed to pieces again. Flames blazed in Go Jun’s eyes.

“I said bring them here. I don’t care if it’s the grandchild Song Cheonwoo fusses over every day or some white grandmother he met at a retirement community in Europe. Anything I can use to get a grip on that old man’s life!”

[2619] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

His shout rang through the room, the veins standing out on his neck. Then his voice dropped.

"So, Team Leader Go. Send the men out and bring them here. Now."

"…!"

"What? Didn't you hear me this time either?"

There would not be a third warning.

Realizing that there was nowhere left to retreat, Go Se-won lowered his head slightly.

"No, sir. I heard you clearly."

"Then get moving. Ah, where did you say that old man's family lived?"

"On the outskirts of London. The whole family lives together in a huge mansion converted from a castle."

A life worthy of European nobility.

Song Cheonwoo had been able to live that way after losing the power struggle within Ares because Lee Jungryong had allowed it and supported him.

Old affection between friends? Mercy? To Lee Jungryong, those words were about as useful as cabbage.

He could afford to look down on a rival several moves behind him. That arrogance was the ease of a man with overwhelming power.

He kept his only political rival completely under his thumb. His successor's first thought is to kidnap the man's family.

It came down to temperament. To the difference in what each man was made of.

Go Se-won pushed the thought from his mind and continued.

"There are about thirteen of them, counting his children, their spouses, and his grandchildren. Some of the grandchildren commute to school by helicopter or Teleportation magic circle. We receive updates on their locations in real time."

"You've taken measures? Since when?"

"Since he entered the country. I reported it at the time, but you seemed extremely busy, so I took care of it on my own authority."

"You're good at your job, Team Leader Go. I thought you'd lost your touch after getting married."

"…Thank you."

Praise and a jab in the same breath. Go Se-won bowed his head again. Go Jun looked down at him, then muttered in a cold voice.

"Come to think of it, what an ungrateful old man. He should have thanked me for letting him keep his position this long. And he stabs me in the back?"

Song Cheonwoo should have retired before the new year.

But the Monster Wave in China and Lee Jungryong's death had rekindled the ambition the old lion had never quite abandoned. The hyenas caught its scent and quietly lined up behind him.

The influential members of the elder generation, just before a sweeping change of generations.

They were the pack of hyenas.

"Damn old bastards."

Go Jun sprang to his feet and began pacing. Then he spoke again.

"What about him?"

Him.

He hadn't said a name, but Go Se-won knew immediately whom he meant.

The greatest threat wasn't the old lion leading the hyenas. It was the young male lion prowling the grassland beyond Ares Guild's high fences, waiting for his chance.

"Choi Minwoo has returned to Peace Guild."

"You're certain he met that old man, Song Cheonwoo?"

Go Se-won answered at once.

"They met in secret and concealed themselves with advanced illusion magic, but yes. We're certain."

"What about Director Hong? Can we trust him?"

Director Hong was one of the elders who, like Song Cheonwoo, had been approaching honorary retirement. He was also the helpful informant who had told them about today's meeting.

Go Se-won nodded.

"Yes. He read the situation quickly."

"He's always been quick on the uptake. Still, don't let your guard down. He's known Song Cheonwoo for over thirty years."

"We're watching his every move without letting him notice."

Betrayal upon betrayal. Everyone was scrambling to get what they wanted. Director Hong had simply chosen comfort and survival for the years he had left.

"And the security team?"

"All thirty members are on constant standby."

The security team was handpicked from Ares Guild's elite. Every member was an A-rank Hunter. Their abilities went without saying, and their loyalty was just as impressive.

The master they served had changed suddenly, but these were men who would handle a murder without batting an eye.

And I'm no different.

Go Se-won had done all kinds of dirty work under Lee Jungryong.

Sometimes he was disgusted by what he'd become, but until now, he'd managed to live with it.

That work had made him wealthier than most people could dream of being. It had also let him meet his beautiful, loving wife after he turned forty and finally get married.

But…

Have I been doing this too long?

Maybe this was the hypocrisy of a man who had forgotten what it meant to go hungry. Maybe it was the disgust he'd spent years suppressing.

Or maybe it was his son, who had only just started walking, and his wife, who had recently become pregnant with their second child.

Song Cheonwoo's youngest grandson is about Sangho's age, isn't he?

The thought of ordering his men to abduct a child too young to speak left him uneasy.

No. We'll be lucky if it ends with kidnapping.

Go Jun had become a different man in the past month or two. No one knew what he might do next, now that he'd grown so violently ruthless.

Even Lee Jungryong, who had never been particular about his methods, had left children alone…

"Team Leader Go."

Go Se-won straightened at his superior's voice.

"Yes, Vice Guild Master."

"Prepare the security team. You know what I mean, don't you?"

The gentleness in Go Jun's voice made Go Se-won's hair stand on end. After a brief silence, he answered.

"Yes."

"I'd like results as soon as possible. Is that too much to ask?"

Go Se-won already knew his answer.

He was just another piece of shit in the same shit pit. He'd stepped into the mud long ago. It was too late to turn back.

"No, sir. I'll bring you good news by tomorrow at the latest."

"Good. You may go."

That was the end of the conversation.

Go Se-won walked out of the office on stiff legs and raised a hand to his ear.

Beep.

The communicator he'd switched off for a while gave a faint chirp and lit up.

"Report the current personnel."

As soon as the brief command ended, a sharp voice came through the communicator.

“Team One, all members standing by. Nothing to report.”

“Team Two, all members standing by. Nothing to report.”

“Team Three, all members standing by. Nothing to report.”

The three teams had thirty members in total. Even within Ares Guild, where only the best were gathered, they had been chosen from among the best of the best.

Go Se-won possessed overwhelming skill befitting the Head of Security, but even he could not easily guarantee victory if five or more of these men joined forces. No matter how thoroughly the target had prepared, there was no way to stop them.

“Orders from the Vice Guild Master. Finish your preparations and assemble in one hour. Our final destination is…”

Go Se-won paused, then said in a low voice,

“London, United Kingdom.”

They wouldn’t need passports for this trip.

Advanced illusion magic and special makeup concealed their faces, names, and even fingerprints. Exactly one hour later, they gathered before a long-distance Teleportation magic circle.

Then they walked into the dazzling light.

Whoosh!

The next morning, Go Jun received the news he’d been waiting for from his Head of Security.

“It was a success. Of the security team’s thirty members, two were killed, but the rest—”

“What about Song Cheonwoo’s family?”

“…We captured them all alive. Teams One and Two have stayed behind, disguised as the existing security personnel. They’ve taken control of the mansion and are keeping watch.”

“Well done. I knew I could count on you, Team Leader Go.”

“The team paid a heavy price. We made the most of our advantage and took them by surprise, but security at the mansion was tighter than expected. Two of our men were killed…”

“It’s fine. You took care of the aftermath, right?”

After a short silence, Go Se-won answered.

“Yes. We’ve taken control of their communications network, and we used enchantment magic to learn every code word and reporting procedure. Even if someone contacts them, they’re unlikely to suspect much.”

“How long can you keep it up?”

“Four days at most.”

"That's long enough to finish this. Contact that old man, Song Cheonwoo. Tell him Lunar New Year is coming and it's been too long since we saw each other."

Go Jun laughed aloud, imagining the look on the old traitor's face when they met. Then he looked up.

"Oh, and Team Leader Go."

Go Se-won had been watching his superior with an unreadable expression. He quickly composed himself.

"Yes, Vice Guild Master."

"Sorry. The good news made me forget."

"Oh."

"You know how distracted I've been lately. You understand, don't you?"

"Not at all, sir!"

His answer came out more forcefully than before.

Of course. No matter how much he's changed, he wouldn't do that.

Go Se-won waited for the words he'd been hoping to hear. Instead, Go Jun's next remark stopped him cold.

"You're always working hard. Take this for yourself."

"…!"

Slide.

Go Jun set a spotless white envelope on the table.

Considering the nature of the matter, it obviously contained a check for a substantial sum. Judging from his experience, it was probably at least ten billion won.[2620]

But an envelope of bonus money wasn't what he'd wanted.

Still…

"Thank you, Vice Guild Master."

Go Se-won accepted the envelope politely and bowed deeply.

By then, his gaze had grown deep and unreadable as he stared at the man reflected in the spotless, gleaming marble.

Martial arts are made up of countless movements.

Thrusting and cutting. Striking and smashing.

Link movements like those together, and they become a form.

Whoosh! Bang!

I punched into empty space. Compressed air exploded, and my hair fluttered.

I continued through the forms against an imaginary opponent.

[2620] Ten billion won is about $7.1 million or €6.5 million.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh! Slash!

Everything I'd seen and learned firsthand, every insight I'd gained, flowed into the forms. One led naturally into the next without pause.

Forms linked together. A combat sequence.

Boom-boom-boom!

The edge of my hand. My elbow. My shoulder. Every part of my body turned and twisted as I struck in every direction.

Learning martial arts had taught me once again that a weapon didn't have to be a blade.

Anything that can hurt an enemy is a weapon.

That was why training mattered. With enough of it, you could break a neck with one finger or split a rock with a rusty carving knife.

Whoom! Bang!

My heel came down like lightning and slammed into the ground. That strike would have crushed the skull of even an A-rank monster with a hard outer shell.

But there were no enemies to bring down here.

The hundred or so corpses—human or monster—existed only in my imagination.

"Hoo…"

I let out a quiet breath.

Clap, clap, clap.

A vigorous round of applause rang out from behind me.

Chapter 568

Clap, clap, clap.

A vigorous round of applause rang out. At the same time, the voice of someone I'd been aware of for a while echoed through the room.

"Impressive. Very impressive."

Click.

Shiny black dress shoes came toward me. The man wearing them had on suit pants with razor-sharp creases and a leather coat that reached his knees. He stopped in front of me.

"Mr. Jin, I've heard a great deal about you… but coming all the way here was worth it. You're even more impressive than I expected."

I had no idea what was going on, and it must have shown. He answered with an easy smile.

"There's no need to be so flustered. The time has simply come."

"The time has come?"

"Yes. Did you think you were the only hero in this world?"

"What?"

"From this moment on, you've become part of a much greater world. You simply don't know it yet."

"…!"

A sharp current ran through my entire body. I let out a low groan and glared at the unwelcome guest.

"What the hell are you?"

"Not many people know my true identity."

He gave a quiet laugh and continued.

"As for who I am…"

"No, I'm asking what the hell you're doing."

"Huh?"

His eyes went round, as if this wasn't how the scene was supposed to go. I stared at him for a moment, then waved a hand.

"Never mind. Keep going. You've still got lines left, right?"

"Can I?"

"Sure. Finish them."

He cleared his throat and gave me a solemn look.

"My name is King Fury. Director of Barrier…"[2621]

Wham!

[2621] This parodies Nick Fury, director of S.H.I.E.L.D. in Marvel superhero films.

"Urgh."

I punched him in the face. The Skeleton King staggered like a drunk, and I followed up with a string of punches.

Wham! Wham! Crack!

"Urgh! Ugh! Wait! Wait! My jawbone!"

"Like hell I'm waiting, you fucker."

This guy needed a beating.

While some people were working their asses off day and night to build a bright future even in times like these, he had suddenly popped up dressed like a movie character.

I'd wondered why he was wearing a leather coat all of a sudden.

"Having fun? Are superhero movies that much fun?"

The Skeleton King, who'd been getting pummeled nonstop, suddenly set his face and raised a thumb.

"Fucking awesome."

"…"

"I hate them three thousand."[2622]

"What the hell is wrong with you?"

"Wait! You've cracked a bone!"

Wham! Wham!

"How can you call yourself human? Huh?"

"I—I'm a monster!"

"This bastard only claims he's a monster when it suits him. Is your species a buffet? You just pick whichever one you want?"

Wham! Wham!

"Wait! Stop for real this time! I've got an orbital fracture!"

"…"

That was a surprisingly precise diagnosis for a monster.

The medical terminology made my fist hesitate. The Skeleton King promptly slipped away, trembling with humiliation.

"You vile human. You aren't even a person."

"My God. Did a monster just say that to me?"

"You devil. When Judgment Day comes, may you be cast into hell."

"Have you been going to church lately? That's a strange choice of words for you."

The Skeleton King froze for an instant, then cleared his throat.

"A human woman…"

"What?"

[2622] "I love you three thousand" is a line from the superhero film Avengers: Endgame.

“A beautiful human woman spoke to me first. I met her at the crosswalk up ahead. She said if I followed her, we could all sing songs and eat good food.”

“…And?”

“So I went. It wasn’t particularly fun, but it wasn’t bad. A man called a pastor must have recognized my nobility, because he even presented me with a gift.”

“My God.”

An undead monster had gone to church. Was this for real?

While I was still at a loss for words, the Skeleton King lowered the collar of his coat, which he’d turned up like a middle-aged man from forty years ago.

“Heh heh. Behold.”

I’d doubted my ears before. Now I doubted my eyes.

Peeking proudly out from between the coat collars was none other than a cheap cross necklace.

“This is the symbol of a noble king.”

“…”

Wasn’t it a symbol of exorcism?

For a moment, I wondered whether he’d met an exorcist rather than a pastor. But Magic Johnson’s illusion magic was flawless. There wasn’t the slightest hint that anything about the Skeleton King was out of place.

His social media followers, whose numbers had grown exponentially, were proof of that.

Click.

“…You’re taking a selfie right now? Want me to smash your phone?”

“I bought it with my own money. A vile human has no right to say anything, so keep your mouth shut.”

A monster who’d adapted to capitalism. Maybe that was the real monster.

And since he’d bought it himself, I couldn’t argue. It wasn’t even some undisclosed sponsorship. He’d paid for it with the money he’d recently received from the Peace Guild.

“I’m quite a high earner among humans now. I hear the people of this world sort themselves into classes by annual income. Mine is a full six hundred million won![2623] Heh heh. And I’ll be making that much for the next ten years!”

“…”

Welcome to ten years of slavery.

If the Skeleton King were a Hunter, he’d qualify for S-rank with room to spare. Yet Team Leader Choi had him working for a mid-level Hunter’s salary.

Team Leader Choi’s cruelty made me want to give Hyuk Mujin’s balls a sharp tap.

[2623] Six hundred million won is about $430,000 or €390,000.

"What's that look for?"

"Nothing. Don't worry about it. Keep earning lots of money."

The Skeleton King narrowed his eyes and looked me up and down.

"Suspicious. And not just now. You've been acting strangely these past few days."

"Who? The undead monster who went to church?"

"You, vile human!"

He shouted, then went on.

"You keep getting lost in thought even inside Gates. A man without so much as a finger joint's worth of culture starts drawing pictures and taking notes. Yesterday, you even turned down an emergency rescue call, so I had to go in person!"

For a monster, he was pretty perceptive. Maybe because I'd spent more time with him than anyone else lately.

I scratched my chin and looked at him.

"I get what you're trying to say. So?"

"Huh?"

"What do you want from me? I'm not allowed to think? I can't draw a few pictures and take notes?"

"I—I didn't say that."

He faltered, then rallied.

"Even so, that emergency rescue call—"

"I put it off because I could. They still had you."

"Wha—what?"

"It wasn't a Mutated Gate, and from how much the magical power reading had risen, I figured it would be fine. So I sent you instead."

"You sent me in your place?"

He blinked at me, mouth hanging open.

"Why?"

"Because I trust you to handle it."

"…!"

"I'd been going with you just in case. But I've seen what you can do, and after hearing what other people had to say, I figured you could go alone."

The Skeleton King was a Named Monster in every sense of the word.

He had possessed powerful abilities even back when he was called a Warlord, but after his battle with the Arch Lich, he had evolved into an even more powerful being.

An ordinary Named Monster wouldn't stand a chance against him.

From what I'd seen firsthand, his physical abilities were exceptional. He could also use his own Authority to raise a one-man army.

In that respect, none of the S-rank Hunters alive today could match him. Though a Grand Mage like Magic Johnson, who could dominate an entire battlefield, might be another story.

And there's me, too.

The Skeleton King was an undead Lü Bu[2624] who could sweep a Gate by himself. There was only one reason I'd kept someone that powerful at my side.

His complete and utter lack of social skills.

He'd never come right out and announced what he was, but he went around advertising that he was born to be a monster.

If I had taken him to the official Blue House[2625] press conference last time, he would have referred to President Baek Hanseong as a "human male." Then the Liberation Army,[2626] led by the Lady of the House,[2627] would surely have risen up, waving Korean flags and demanding that they investigate the identity of that long-nosed bastard.

But now…

"This hyung[2628] can finally relax. You even went to church, you little punk. Go on, live a little more freely from now on."

Pat, pat.

I patted his shoulder. The Skeleton King's eyes widened—perhaps at the warmth of my touch, or perhaps at one word I'd said.

"F-freely?"

"Yeah. You've reached the point where I can trust you with things. You deserve that much freedom."

"Vile human. Weren't you keeping watch on me?"

"Keeping watch?"

I gave a quiet laugh.

"After you saved my life in China?"

"That…"

"Sure, you owe me too. Neither of us needs to say it out loud. Just know I've always been grateful."

"…!"

His golden eyelids quivered. He looked at me with an expression I couldn't quite place, then opened his mouth, eyes wet.

"Vile human."

"Oh, shit. Don't say anything."

[2624] Lü Bu was a Chinese military commander famed for his prowess in battle.

[2625] The Blue House was the office and residence of South Korea's president.

[2626] The Korean Liberation Army was a force organized to fight Japanese colonial rule.

[2627] "Lady of the House" refers to a wife or woman who presides over a household.

[2628] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male he is close to.

“But I have to say this.”

“Don’t. Seriously. I hate this kind of mood.”

I could almost hear soft background music playing somewhere. I looked off toward the distant mountains, uncomfortable, as his voice reached me.

“Then can I go to a club tonight?”

“…”

“That mage tricked me into going to a gay bar twice. This time, I intend to enjoy some noble bump-and-grind at a club.”

“…”

Noble bump-and-grind, my ass.

Give me back my emotions, you bastard.

“Please, vile human. I swear I’ll be back before midnight!”

“Fine. Go.”

“R-really?”

“Yeah. Go. If you want to die.”

“…”

“You crazy bastard. A club? What kind of trouble would you get into there?”

Hearing that he had gone to a gay bar twice did make me feel a little sorry for him, but the Skeleton King still wasn’t socially developed enough for that.

This had nothing to do with the fact that I’d never been to one myself.

…Really.

“Why? How can this happen when I’m so handsome!”

As the Skeleton King howled in anguish, the smartphone in his hand vibrated.

Bzzzz.

His face crumpled when he checked the screen. I didn’t need to look to know why. It might as well have been projected as a hologram.

“Emergency call?”

“…Damn it.”

Talk about timing. I checked the call details, then looked up at him.

“What are you waiting for?”

“I refuse, vile human. You go this time.”

“What are you talking about? One look tells me all I need to know. You can handle this by yourself.”

“Damn it! Why do you get to play around here while I work?”

Play around? Who?

But he had no way of knowing what I was doing.

I gave a quiet laugh and raised a hand instead of answering. He caught the hint and darted out the door.

Bang!

The door slammed shut and did not open again from sunset until the following morning.

And then…

Inhale. Exhale.

Whoosh. Boom!

In that quiet, isolated room, I circulated my qi and trained without pause.

It was a long journey in search of a path I'd never taken, with the faintest thread of a clue in my grasp.

A pale face. Trembling fingertips.

When had it started? A drop of cold sweat that had run down the back of his neck while he listened fell with a soft plop.

"W-what did you just say?"

He had the imposing build of a man whose age of seventy seemed impossible, along with the face of a middle-aged man. But the voice that slipped between his lips was as faint as that of someone standing on the brink of death.

What he'd just heard was that shocking.

"Th-that is…"

Even remembering what he had heard made his vision swim. The old man barely pulled himself together and forced out his trembling voice.

"You—you kidnapped our children?"

"'Kidnapped' sounds rather unpleasant. Someone might get the wrong idea."

"Y-you dare…"

"So let's call it protection."

Across a table laden with an elaborate feast, Go Jun answered brightly and took a bite of steak.

Juice from the rare beef ran down his angular jaw. His next words, added almost in passing, cut into the old man's ears.

"For now, at least."

"…!"

Go Jun smiled with pleasure at the frozen face of the old man, Song Cheonwoo.

Chapter 569

Thud.

The door closed behind Song Cheonwoo with a sound like thunder. His sturdy frame—hard to believe he was seventy—staggered.

Slide. Tap.

Neither his powerful mana nor the experience he had gained through a lifetime of hardship was any use to him now.

He braced himself against the wall and stared at the floor. A pair of black dress shoes stepped into view.

“Are you all right?”

At the sound of the businesslike voice, Song looked up, saw who the shoes belonged to, and gritted his teeth.

“Does this look all right to you?”

Head of Security Go Se-won bowed beneath his furious glare.

“I’m sorry if that sounded insensitive.”

“Spare me the words you don’t mean. Before I break your neck!”

“I wouldn’t recommend it. You’d have nothing to gain and plenty to lose.”

Go Se-won gave a gentle wave of his hand. At the far end of the hallway, the security-team members who had started toward them stopped.

“They’re my men. As you know, Director, they’re quite capable. And when the situation calls for it, they don’t care what they have to do.”

“You…”

“Please don’t misunderstand me. I only mean that I don’t want you to make matters worse.”

Crack.

The marble beneath Song’s hand, reinforced by magic, split in a spiderweb of cracks. He glared at Go Se-won through bloodshot eyes and forced the words through his teeth.

“So you kidnapped my children? They had nothing to do with this. They’d done nothing wrong.”

“They were exceptionally well guarded for people who supposedly had nothing to do with it. That means you had at least considered the possibility, Director.”

Two security-team members had died despite the whole team taking part in the attack. Given that they were among the best Ares Guild had to offer, it was no fewer than two.

“I regret what happened to your family. But if you suspected this might happen, you should have sent even more people to protect them.”

“…!”

"I shouldn't have said that. I apologize."

Go Se-won meant it. Song Cheonwoo was already like an old lion whose death had been decided. There was no need for Go Se-won to drive the knife in himself.

Would he believe me if I said it slipped out because I felt sorry for him?

Go Se-won was a father too. His first son had been born after he turned forty, and his second child was due in a few months. Both were already more precious to him than anything.

He would give his life for his children's safety and happiness. That was what it meant to be a father. A parent.

But Song Cheonwoo had weighed his ambition against his family's safety. Then again, if he had imagined the worst, he would never have tried to make an enemy of Go Jun.

...Not that I'm one to talk.

Go Se-won felt like a pathetic villain.

For well over a decade, he had lived more like a fixer than a Hunter. Ever since Lee Jungryong had noticed him and brought him into the security team, his main targets had been people, not monsters.

He was the one who had ordered his men to kidnap Song Cheonwoo's family and then cleaned up the aftermath.

And I have the nerve to lecture him.

They were all pieces of shit in the same shit pit.

Song Cheonwoo had let ambition consume him on the verge of retirement and brought danger upon himself. Go Jun swung his blade without caring what it took to get his way. And Go Se-won had become the sword in his superior's hand and kidnapped Song's family.

A war between bastards. In the end, there'll be a winner and a loser.

And he was nothing more than a component.

He was swallowing the bitter thought when—

Grab!

A hand far too strong to belong to a seventy-year-old man seized his collar.

"Team Leader!"

"Enough. Stay at your posts."

Go Se-won stopped his men and calmly looked up at Song Cheonwoo, who stood a full head taller than him.

"I told you. You stand to lose more than you'd gain."

"You bastards dare lay a hand on my children...!"

"The Vice Guild Master is listening inside. I don't know what the two of you discussed, but I hope there won't be any more unnecessary sacrifices."

"...!"

Go Jun held his family's lives in his hands. Go Se-won was telling him not to make Go Jun angry.

Song understood at once. His eyelids trembled, and though he kept glaring at Go Se-won through clenched teeth, his grip slowly loosened.

"You made the right choice."

"…Shut your mouth. I'd like nothing more than to smash your face in right now."

"I'm sure you would."

A bitter smile touched Go Se-won's lips. He would have felt the same in Song's place.

And even twenty years after leaving active service, Song Cheonwoo was still an extraordinary fighter. His ability simply hadn't matched his ambition. The fact that he had once been Lee Jungryong's political rival said enough about him.

Which is why Go Jun chose a method this dirty.

Go Se-won disliked it. But dirty as it was, it would work.

Song Cheonwoo would be eliminated soon, and it would look so natural that no one would suspect a thing.

"Follow me. I'll escort you outside."

Go Se-won bowed slightly and started down the hallway. Song cast one last glare at the closed door, then followed.

Step. Step.

Go Se-won had sent his men away. Only their footsteps sounded in the hallway until Song broke the silence.

"What you said earlier. Was it true?"

"…?"

"You said you didn't know what Go Jun and I had discussed. Was that true?"

Go Se-won considered the question for a moment, then nodded.

"I see. From what I found out about you, I suppose you were never much of a strategist."

"What do you mean?"

"It seems he doesn't trust you as much as I thought. Or perhaps he wanted to hide it even from his closest aide."

Song gave a weak, hollow laugh at Go Se-won's frown.

"Go Se-won."

In the brief span of time between one breath and the next, he seemed to have aged ten years. No—twenty. He continued in a desolate voice.

"There's such a thing as a line a person shouldn't cross. You know that?"

"…If you're criticizing the Vice Guild Master, I'd ask you to stop."

"Criticizing him? That's a much gentler word than I'd expected. Far too gentle for that bastard Go Jun."

“I understand how you feel. But no one involved in this has the right to condemn anyone else. I know you haven’t lived a particularly clean life either, Director.”

“Heh. True. There was a time when I’d use any means necessary to get what I wanted. But I never went this far.”

Song laughed again, empty and almost unhinged. Go Se-won fell silent.

Song wasn’t talking only about the kidnapping.

What is it?

His heart pounded. A current ran down his spine.

This was a warning. A danger signal telling him not to listen.

But his body moved contrary to his thoughts.

“What limit are you talking about, Director?”

“A monster who has forgotten even the most basic duty of being human.”

“What?”

Step.

Song stopped before the Teleportation magic circle leading outside. He stared at it for a moment before speaking again.

“The boundary between human and monster. That bastard Go Jun… has already become a monster.”

The old man’s empty gaze drifted through the air. As though searching through memories of a brilliant past, he took a weary step toward the magic circle and left Go Se-won with one last plea.

“I apologize for what I did to you. So please, don’t let those children die for nothing.”

Flash!

Before Go Se-won could ask what he meant, Teleportation magic manifested, and dazzling radiance swallowed Song Cheonwoo’s body.

Go Se-won stood alone, staring in confusion at the spot where Song had been. Then he turned.

The hallway was made entirely of white marble. At the far end of its long stretch stood a closed door. Behind it, someone was probably sipping wine, pleased with himself.

What in the world… have you done?

Go Se-won muttered toward something deep inside his heart.

Section A, which was always filled with light, felt like a pit overflowing with darkness today.

I had no idea how long I’d been shut away in the training ground—or training room, as they called it in the modern world.

One day. Two. Maybe three.

The walls blocked out everything beyond them, and the temperature stayed the same. Once I got absorbed in martial arts, I lost track of time.

Even though I had a smartphone, I never looked at it, so I had no way of knowing. Perhaps they vaguely understood my situation, because no one from the Peace Guild came to see me or contacted me.

"…"

Saying it like that made me sound like a complete loner. Which I absolutely wasn't.

…Probably.

The Skeleton King hasn't come by once since then, either.

It was good news in one sense: he seemed to be handling things better than I'd expected. But it also meant the emergency rescue team was busier, and more Gates were showing signs of abnormal activity. I couldn't exactly celebrate.

What I could celebrate was that my own attempt was nearly complete.

It's not finished yet, though.

I had never tried anything like this before, and the process so far had been anything but easy.

The pressure of having to create something exceptional while the current situation was on the verge of exploding may have contributed as well.

What I have now might be good enough…

Should I just take the plunge and go with it?

I'd asked myself that dozens, maybe hundreds of times. I was going over it again when the training room door opened with a familiar mechanical sound.

"So this is where you were. I need your help, as it happens."

Step. Step.

Combat boots polished to a shine. A skin-tight blue suit. A shield with a skull on it.

I gave him a look colder than the snow piled on the roof of King Sejong Station in Antarctica.

"Look at this fucking bastard."

"You heard from Director King Fury,[2629] didn't you?"

"…Are you playing two roles now?"

"Heh heh. Surely a citizen of the United States of America ought to be King-tin America.[2630]"

"This bastard keeps changing his name however he wants. I'm going to beat you so badly you'll want to go back to the glacier."

"I can do this all day."

[2629] King Fury is the Skeleton King's version of Nick Fury, the Marvel character who directs S.H.I.E.L.D.

[2630] King-tin America is the Skeleton King's version of Captain America. The blue suit, shield, and "I can do this all day" line continue the Marvel reference.

Whoosh! Boom!

White Flame shot toward him like a streak of light. Its spearhead grazed his neck and pierced the training room wall, burying the shaft.

The Skeleton King looked from the spear to me, then muttered, “All day might be difficult…”

“Cut the bullshit. Why are you here? If you dropped by because you were bored, I’ll kill you. Seriously.”

He answered in a hurry.

“N-no, that’s not it. It’s a mission. A mission!”

“A mission?”

“That is correct, wicked human.”

He nodded.

“It isn’t an ordinary Mutated Gate. The magical power reading is enormous.”

“…!”

Damn it.

Chapter 570

Eight in the morning.

The new year had arrived, but people's daily routines hadn't changed. Office workers in neat suits hurried to work with tired faces, and the roads were packed with cars.

Honk! Hooonk!

At the constant blare of horns, the middle-aged man driving a midsize van rolled up his half-open window and grumbled.

"Fuck. Even the Great Cataclysm couldn't get this goddamn road fixed. Are we supposed to drive on it or not?"

Swearing behind the wheel was practically inevitable. Especially in Busan.

He laid on the horn at a compact car trying to cut in without signaling.

Honk!

Then again, if its driver had any sense, he wouldn't have needed to honk.

The compact car flashed its high beams in broad daylight to celebrate its successful lane change and cruised away. The middle-aged man spotted the message plastered across its rear window and swore again.

> A child is on board.

"Goddamn it. Is the kid on fire? Is that why you're driving like that?"

Only then did he realize he'd cursed aloud. He glanced at the passenger seat and cleared his throat.

"Ahem. That slipped out."

The young man beside him answered calmly.

"It's all right. It happens."

He spoke to the driver, but his eyes remained on the view outside. The middle-aged man glanced at him.

"Your name was… Dongseok, right?"

"Yes."

"That's a relief. With things blowing up all over the place these days, it's hard enough to remember someone's full name."

"It happens. Don't worry about it."

"Ah, I don't know if I told you last time, but my name is…"

"I'll call you Team Leader. That's easier for me."

The Team Leader blinked, taken aback by the prompt answer. Lee Dongseok added, just as abruptly, "And, Team Leader."

"Uh, yeah?"

"The light's changed."

Hoooonk!

The horn behind them snapped the Team Leader back to his senses. He stepped on the gas, and as the van lurched forward, he frowned.

What a rude little shit.

But he soon reconsidered. So what if Dongseok was rude? They'd only be working together for a day. As long as he did his job, that was enough.

He's a hundred times better than a rookie who shakes in his boots or some loudmouth who can't back up his talk.

The Team Leader was a C-rank Hunter who had worked freelance for years. He knew a capable fighter with lousy manners was preferable to someone pleasant and polite who couldn't fight.

At least he won't shit the bed and disappear like that bastard a little while ago.

A team member had made a major mistake inside a Gate and then gone into hiding, leaving them in need of a temporary replacement. Lee Dongseok was the man they'd found.

His résumé gave them nothing to complain about, and from what the Team Leader could judge for himself, Dongseok was a skilled Hunter. Skilled enough that it seemed strange for him to be freelancing.

Well, I'm not complaining.

Finding people was hard enough these days. Even now, the DJs chatting quietly on the radio were discussing the main reason Hunters were in short supply.

"We have a comment from Shin Ayoung, a woman in her twenties who lives in Pocheon, Gyeonggi Province. 'A Mutated Gate appeared near my home three days ago. It happened only ten minutes away, and I've been so anxious I can't sleep.'"

"Oh, no… You live right near it? That's awful."

"I remember seeing that on the news. Apparently it was extremely dangerous. There could have been a lot of casualties."

"Thank goodness they stopped it just before it became a Monster Wave."

The Team Leader turned up the volume.

As a Hunter, there was no way he could have missed the Pocheon Mutated Gate incident three days earlier. Even Dongseok, who had been staring out the window, seemed to be listening.

"Fortunately, there were no deaths this time either."

"That's right. They stopped the Monster Wave, so there were no civilian casualties, and the Mutated Gate was dealt with quickly."

"That was Peace Guild's Emergency Rescue Team, wasn't it?"

"Yes. Hunter Jin Taekyung didn't go himself, but Peace Guild's Emergency Rescue Team did an impressive job."

"Rising magic power readings have become a serious problem here and overseas. Of all the countries in the world, ours has been recognized for responding the fastest and suffering the least damage."

"It really is remarkable. And it isn't just Hunter Jin Taekyung and Peace Guild's Emergency Rescue Team. All the Hunters fighting monsters under these circumstances deserve our…"

As the DJ went on, the Team Leader stole another glance at Dongseok.

"Come to think of it, you're pretty impressive yourself, Dongseok."

"What do you mean?"

"Going on raids at a time like this isn't easy."

As magic power readings rose, monsters grew stronger. Mutated Gates, which had once appeared only once or twice a year, now made the nine o'clock news headlines about every three days.

The Team Leader turned the wheel and continued. "I'm doing it for my family, but you're still in your twenties. You don't have a household to support. Is it youthful ambition or something?"

"No."

"Hm?"

"I'm doing what needs to be done. I have to do it."

His answer was firm, his eyes suddenly bright with resolve. The Team Leader blinked at this unfamiliar side of him.

"R-really?"

"Yes."

"Well. Good for you. That's some dedication to your job."

Dongseok's response had caught him off guard. So had the determination in his eyes. Sense of duty was about the only way to describe it.

What's with this guy?

A rude young man burning with a sense of justice? A kid dreaming of becoming a hero in troubled times? Whatever it was, he was an odd one.

The Team Leader eased onto the brakes. When he parked in the Gate management office lot and got out, the team members who recognized the van came over.

"Hey, Team Leader Kim. You made it."

"You're here, hyung[2631]."

"You're early, oppa[2632]. But who's that with you…?"

"This is Dongseok. You know—the temporary guy I told you about."

[2631] Hyung is a term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[2632] Oppa is a term a woman uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom she is close.

“Ah, is that right? I could tell at a glance. He looks just like someone from Seoul.”

“I think he is. Dongseok, these are the rest of the team…”

The Team Leader naturally turned his head, then blinked. Something about Dongseok didn’t look right.

“Dongseok. Are you feeling sick?”

“…”

“Hey. Dongseok?”

Dongseok stood staring silently at the Gate, his face rigid. He wiped the cold sweat from his forehead.

“No. I just got a little nervous all of a sudden.”

“Hmm. You’re all right, though?”

“Yes. There’s no problem.”

The Team Leader eyed him doubtfully, but they were already at the Gate. The manager responsible for Siren’s Black River, the C-rank Gate in Haeundae, was ambling over from a distance.

“Oh, Team Leader Kim. You’re here.”

“Yes. We’re a little late.”

“No trouble, right? Got everyone?”

The Team Leader glanced at Dongseok and nodded.

“Of course.”

“You sure? You know they’ve tightened the regulations. If something goes wrong, you and I both…”

“I know, I know. Have you ever seen me or my team cause trouble? You’re going to inspect everything anyway.”

“With things the way they are lately, I can’t help worrying. And yes, I was going to inspect you.”

The inspection was quick. The manager checked everything, finishing with Dongseok, then grinned.

“All right. Go on in.”

With permission granted, the team began moving, talking noisily among themselves. Everyone except Dongseok.

At the back of the group, he stared at the Gate with trembling eyes.

Thump. Thump.

His heart hammered. He’d suffered from cold hands and feet since his days at the orphanage, but now his palms were so clammy with cold sweat he might have developed hyperhidrosis.

Don’t get nervous. Not until the very end.

He had a mission. A mission he absolutely had to complete.

Dongseok took a deep breath. At the front of the group, the Team Leader suddenly looked back.

“Dongseok. You really are okay, right?”

“…Yes.”

“You don’t look good, and you took your time answering. Your mind isn’t somewhere else, is it?”

“No.”

The Team Leader would never know that Dongseok had been slow to answer because he still wasn’t used to the name, not because his mind was elsewhere.

And Lee Dongseok—or rather, the man behind that name—had not forgotten his purpose for a single moment.

“Don’t worry. I’ll definitely do it.”

“What?”

For a moment, the Team Leader looked baffled. Then he gave Dongseok a look that said What an oddball and turned away.

They stood at the entrance to the Gate.

“All right, before we go in—everyone together. Safety first, today too!”

“Safety first!”

The chant rang out, and the Team Leader stepped toward the entrance.

“Let’s go in!”

Whoosh!

The rippling magical power swallowed them one after another.

As the others hurried inside, Dongseok lifted his head and looked at the sky.

It was a January morning. The sky was blue, and the wind was still cold.

And… this might be the last sky he ever saw.

“I have a mission for you.”

A voice he had heard several days earlier seemed to reach him on the wind, along with his own answer.

“I’ll do it.”

“Your life could be at risk.”

“The former Vice Guild Master saved my life in the first place.”

He had been told that his mother, whose face he had never seen, gave birth to him in a subway restroom. Wrapped in toilet paper and thrown into a trash can, the newborn survived by sheer luck. He was sent to an orphanage secretly supported by Lee Jungryong, where he grew up healthy and strong.

“If I can help… I’ll do anything.”

To him, Lee Jungryong was a father, and Ares Guild was the home he’d shared with that father. He could do anything for him.

"Leave it to me."

At his resolute answer, the other person had smiled broadly. Then he had handed him something—an object now kept deep in his subspace pocket.

"You must succeed."

That was the last thing he'd said. After receiving his orders, Dongseok changed everything, including his face and name, and went down to Busan with that precious, dangerous object in his possession.

"I… will definitely do it."

His turn had come.

He fought down his fear, steadied himself with those murmured words, and stepped toward the rippling field of magical power.

Whoosh!

About an hour later, the people outside the Gate saw what happened.

Beep beep beep beep!

The magic power reading climbed at a frantic pace. Then a change began too quickly for anyone to stop.

Kiiiiing.

A rift tore open in the air, and a dense breath of death blanketed the sandy beach of Haeundae.

After arriving in Busan through three Teleportation magic circles, I knew at once.

No—I could feel it.

"Aaaaaah!"

"Aaargh!"

Kwaaaang!

The countless screams and tremendous din coming from far away. And…

Kuuung!

The immense magical power shaking the earth.

"…Fuck."

Chapter 571

Busan.

Before and after the Great Cataclysm, it had been one of the three most populous cities in the country.

A very long time ago, a handsome, clever elementary school student on a family trip to Busan spent his nights practically glued to the window.

“Taekyung, what are you looking at?”

“That leg! It’s sparkling! It’s pretty!”[2633]

“Whoa, you’re right. Is she a fit model?”

“…Not that kind of leg, Dad.”

“Oh.”

“That bridge over there! The long, sparkly one!”

“Aha. Gwangan Bridge?”

“Gwangan Bridge? What’s that?”

“It’s the name of that bridge. You saw it earlier, but it’s even prettier at night, isn’t it?”

“Yeah! I want to go! Take me to Gwangan Bridge right now!”

My father looked at his demanding young son as though he couldn’t have loved him more.

“Oh, my boy. Your dad’s exhausted from driving all day, and look at you thinking only of yourself. Who did you get that from?”

“Then can I ask Mom what a fit model is?”

“…You really are my son. Pack your bag.”

It was one of the moments I would never forget. Walking hand in hand with my dejected father to Gwangan Bridge left a vivid impression on my young mind.

The bridge was impossibly huge and glittering. Beside me was my father, who was always too busy for us to spend much time together.

I even got him to carry me on his shoulders by threatening him, despite his complaints about a bad disc in his neck. What more could I have wanted?

“Dad, let’s come back next week! And the week after that! And next month too! You have to carry me on your shoulders again!”

“Haha. What am I going to do? If we do what you want, I don’t think I’ll make it here next month.”

“Why?”

“Because at this rate, my neck will break the week after next. How many bowls of rice have you been eating a day lately, Taekyung?”

[2633] The Korean word dari can mean either “leg” or “bridge.”

"I haven't had much of an appetite, so only five!"

"…That's my good boy. No wonder the night sky looked yellow.[2634]"

It was a happy memory. We talked about all sorts of things that day, and when we got back to the hotel, I excitedly told my little sister Hayeon and Mom all about it.

Watching me, my father rubbed his neck, gave a quiet laugh, and made a promise.

"When Hayeon's a little older and you're in middle school, let's come back to see the ocean. All right?"

"Really?"

"Of course. Here—promise."

He never got to keep that promise.

As his two children grew, there were more and more expenses. When my mother fell ill from pushing herself too hard at her side job, my father grew busier still.

Then, on an ordinary day, an extraordinary accident took his life.

But I remembered his promise.

My father was no longer with us, yet even after more than twenty years, the Gwangan Bridge I'd seen as a child remained vividly etched in my mind.

And now—

Ruuuumble.

Gwangan Bridge was collapsing before my eyes.

"Ah."

A sigh escaped between my lips before I could stop it.

My mind screamed at me to get over there with everything I had, but my body wouldn't move. It was as if an invisible hand held me in place.

It's… already too late.

I wasn't the only one thinking it.

The Skeleton King, who had come with me, and the mage who had brought us here watched with exhausted eyes as the disaster unfolded several kilometers[2635] away.

"N-no!"

The cry of the mage whose name I did not know was hollow, and the scene spread out in the distance below us was overwhelming.

That's…

A wave.

A wave dozens of meters[2636] high had struck the place where my father's promise could never be kept, the bridge crossed by thousands—tens of thousands—of vehicles every day.

Whoooosh!

[2634] In Korean, saying the sky looks yellow is an idiom for being dizzy from exhaustion or shock.

[2635] Several kilometers is roughly a few miles.

[2636] Dozens of meters is roughly tens to hundreds of feet.

Carrying tremendous weight and force, the wave slammed into the middle of Gwangan Bridge, a suspension bridge thirty-five meters[2637] high and 7,420 meters[2638] long.

Spray burst in every direction, and screams were swallowed by blinding white foam. Hundreds of cars cruising along at the speed limit were flung away like toys.

Boom! Crash!

With a deafening roar, the suspension bridge's towers and anchors shattered.

Hundreds of cables snapped. No longer holding up the bridge, they became gigantic whips lashing out in every direction.

Whooooooosh—boom!

It happened in an instant.

People and cars that looked like ants were swept away by the cables and vanished.

Red blood flowed where they had stood, unable even to leave a final scream behind. Chain explosions, the screams of those who had survived by sheer luck, and the frantic blaring of car horns all reached my heightened senses.

Honk! Hoooooonk!

"Back up! Back the fuck up, you bastard!"

"Aaaaaaah!"

"Please! Please get my child out! There's a kid here…!"

I felt dazed, as though I were dreaming.

An advanced civilization built on magic and science was crumbling like a sandcastle.

Gwangan Bridge, which held my childhood memories, collapsed beneath the weight of destruction and death. Those who survived abandoned their cars and ran for their lives, crying desperately for someone to help them.

"Save me! Please save me!"

"Mommy!"

Their screams woke me from where I stood frozen like a statue.

"Ah."

I had to save them. I had to stop this disaster.

I'd been still for only a few dozen seconds, but hundreds had already died. If I hesitated any longer, thousands—tens of thousands—would die.

Smack!

I slapped both cheeks as hard as I could. The sharp pain brought me back to my senses.

I spat out the blood from my split mouth and grabbed the Skeleton King by the collar.

[2637] Thirty-five meters is about 115 ft.

[2638] 7,420 meters is about 4.6 mi.

Grab!

"W-what?"

"I'm going. Get a grip."

"W-wait. Where are you—"

Before he could finish, I took a running start and threw him out the window with all my strength.

No. I launched him.

Crash! Whoooosh!

The magically reinforced floor-to-ceiling glass shattered, and the Skeleton King shot out like a cannonball.

Hearing his scream disappear into the wind, I kicked off the ground with all my strength as well.

I did not forget to leave one instruction for the mage, who had already collapsed from exhaustion.

"Call for rescue using my name. Anywhere—right now!"

I didn't know whether he'd heard me properly in his exhausted state, or where he would send the request.

Nothing mattered more than what was happening in front of me.

Boom!

The force of my leap made the high-rise building where the Teleport Magic Formation had been installed tremble.

As I shot through the sky, an angry shout reached me.

"You lunatic!"

The Skeleton King. He had fashioned wings of bone with his own power and was flapping toward me at high speed.

Or he would have been, if I hadn't blocked his path.

"Go somewhere else."

"What?"

"It's too widespread. We split up and cover it."

A Monster Wave—and in Busan, of all places, with its dense population.

It might have been different in a desert or a sparsely populated military zone like the ones I'd seen in Magic Johnson's footage. Here, thousands of people were packed into a radius of just a few kilometers.[2639]

I had to keep the disaster from spreading, no matter what it took.

"I'll take the bridge first. You…"

"Damn it. Got it."

I didn't have time to say more, but the Skeleton King understood.

[2639] A few kilometers is roughly 1–3 mi.

He swallowed hard and looked far below.

His gaze swept over the road swallowed by screams and chaos and the people running for their lives. Then it suddenly began to tremble.

“Fuck. What are those?”

“What do you think?”

I answered shortly, pulled a spare spear from my Inventory, and aimed it at the ground.

Through my greatly enhanced eyesight, it looked as grotesque as any other monster. The scales covering its entire body and the fins extending down to its jaw were repulsive.

Merman.

An aquatic monster that lived in places like the sea.

It had the form of a male merperson, but it was neither beautiful nor kind like the ones in fairy tales.

The hundreds of Mermen surging out of the sea and descending on the people below made that clear enough.

“Ssssss!”

“Karruk!”

They charged with unintelligible cries, barnacle-covered tridents flashing in their hands.

Beyond those flashing points sat a little girl, collapsed on the ground and crying.

“Waaaaah! Mommy!”

“Minhee!”

The child’s cries. Her parents’ screams as they turned back.

And hundreds of monsters rushing toward their first prey.

Now.

I shifted my weight.

My body, angled through the wind, turned sharply downward. Internal energy flowed through my dantian and burst from my feet.

Bang!

I began a steep descent, using Stepping on Empty Air to kick off the air itself.

But no matter how quickly I hurried, the girl would inevitably die before I arrived if things continued like this.

Go.

With a short breath, I hurled the spear I’d aimed at the ground.

Whoooosh!

A single spear plunged down like a bolt of lightning from an unreachable height.

Cutting through the wind, erasing space, carrying the two characters for certain death—

It pierced its target.

Splurch! Crunch-crunch-crunch!

The Merman leading the charge toward the girl, along with a dozen or so monsters around it, turned into a handful of blood.

Hundreds of Mermen stopped at once and stared up at the sky, mouths hanging open.

As I met their gazes, half ferocity and half confusion, I muttered, “What are you looking at, you sons of bitches?”

Inventory Open. Summon.

Click.

The instant two spears appeared in my hands, my arms were already swinging toward the ground.

Boom! Crack!

Scales harder than steel shattered, and fins tore apart.

One Merman, lucky enough to lose only half its body, let out a mournful death cry.

“Krruk, krruruk!”

So noisy.

Inventory Open. Summon.

Whoosh! Boom!

It was around noon, with the sun high overhead. Fireworks erupted where none belonged.

Sticky blood trickled down the railing of the tilted Gwangan Bridge.

More. More. One more time.

Open. Summon. And summon. Summon again.

It happened in the blink of an eye. The System operated instantly, and my movements were faster than the wind and more powerful than lightning.

As soon as I thought of it, my hand shot out. In only a few seconds, I seized dozens of spears and hurled them at the ground.

Die.

Whoooosh—boom-boom-boom!

They split apart. They burst.

Those who tried to block the spears died along with their tridents. Those who tried to run died before they could take a step.

When the girl who had been crouched and crying just three meters[2640] away began to hiccup, there was nothing left around her.

[2640] Three meters is about 9.8 ft.

"Hic. Sob."

She looked about nine years old. Sobbing hiccups escaped through the little hands clamped over her mouth.

What did she see when she looked at me with those enormous eyes?

A monster that had defeated monsters? Or an angel come down from the sky?

I didn't know. But one thing was certain.

Unlike me… you won't have any good memories of this place.

A bitter taste filled my mouth. I landed lightly and, instead of trying to comfort her, crooked a finger.

Shhh.

Seizing an Object Through Empty Space. Qi reached out gently and pushed the girl toward her parents, who were running to her with anguished cries.

But that family's ordeal wasn't over.

Ruuuumble.

The sea had turned black beneath the sun.

I stared at the thing hidden inside another wave rising dozens of meters[2641] high and lowered the spearhead of White Flame.

[2641] Dozens of meters is roughly tens to hundreds of feet.

Chapter 572

How did this happen?

The thing blinked slowly as the question formed in its mind.

It had lived its entire life driven by instinct. Now, with intelligence far beyond anything it had known before, everything was confusing.

But it soon understood what had happened.

—Hu. Man.

Yes. That human.

Humans were small, strangely shaped creatures. Accursed things that occasionally invaded the black sea where it lived and stirred it up.

For countless years, the thing had fought them, driven by instinct and rage. Today had been no different.

But…

—What. Was. That. Human?

Several dozen humans had invaded the black sea.

Their weapons and magic brought down even the Mermen with their magnificent fins and the Sirens whose beautiful songs lured humans to them. Blood spilled into the water.

Then, as the thing sensed defeat and fought desperately on, one human stepped forward.

“Let’s stop here.”

He looked ordinary. Smaller than a Merman, and nowhere near as beautiful as a Siren.

Yet the thing knew instinctively: of everyone there, this was the only human who could kill it on his own.

The other humans, however, were different.

“Mr. Dongseok, sorry, what did you just say?”

“What are you doing in the middle of a raid, you crazy bastard? Move it!”

“That’s going to be difficult. I have something I need to do.”

“Something you need to do? Mr. Dongseok, what does that mean?”

“I told you. I’m going to see it through.”

“Wait. Mr. Dongseok, I’m asking because I really don’t understand what’s going on here…”

Shing.

“M-Mr. Dongseok?”

“T-Team Leader Kim! That guy…!”

Whoosh—slash!

Confusion turned to uproar, uproar to a fight, and the fight to a battle. The battle brought death.

Crack-crack-crack!

“Ghk, krrk…!”

One against many. But the difference in strength was overwhelming.

In moments, the human had killed everyone who stood in his way. He came to a stop before the thing, which lay wounded where it had fallen.

Then he held out an object containing a power both irresistibly alluring and terrifyingly strong, and spoke words the thing could not understand.

“Absorb it. It’s a gift from that person to you.”

The thing had no choice. Exhausted by the long battle, it had neither the strength nor the energy to kill the human before it.

Its mind filled with the scent of what he held out.

Magic power.

That was exactly what it was: the primordial power the thing had possessed since birth, and a meal so tempting it could not resist.

Whooooooosh.

When the brief meal ended, the thing realized it had changed.

Its body had grown beyond comparison with what it had been, and immense magic power overflowed from within. The vast black sea it had known all its life looked strangely unfamiliar.

Almost as if…

“It’s cramped, isn’t it?”

The human’s voice came from far below. Without thinking, the thing nodded.

Yes. Cramped. The black sea that had once seemed so vast was now too small and shabby for it.

What should it do?

“Go outside. There’s a wider sea.”

The answer could not have been clearer. Reborn as something new, the thing looked down at the human who had solved its problem.

—Thank. You.

“…!”

And that was the end.

Crack! Crunch!

The human who had seemed so powerful was no match for what the thing had become. It wrapped him up, crushed his tiny body in an instant, and stirred the power lying within itself.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The black sea—everything the thing had ever known—began to shake.

Waves filled with magic power swallowed the human corpses and woke countless Mermen and Sirens sleeping in the deep sea. Amid savage roars and beautiful songs, magic power surged beyond its former limits. A dozen or so whirlpools rose around the thing and swept outward in every direction.

Whooooooosh!

A storm tore through the once-calm black sea and ripped open space itself.

Beyond the rift lay blinding light and a world the thing had never seen.

Whoosh!

Nothing could contain its magic power now.

Knowing its time had come, the thing became a single enormous wave and moved toward the new sea, carrying the countless Mermen and Sirens clinging to its body.

Crack! Whooooooosh!

The sunlight it felt for the first time was painfully hot. The endless blue sea was impossibly vast. And the sight of humans frozen in fear was enough to rouse the savagery it had briefly forgotten.

—Kill. Them.

A Monster Wave. The beginning of another disaster.

—Aah, aaaaaah!

Humans fleeing the Sirens' alluring songs turned back as if bewitched. The Mermen fell upon them.

Stab! Stab-stab-stab!

Screams and death swept across the sandy beach. Humans with special abilities came running, but they were no match for the thing.

Whoom—crack!

One Strike.

A single powerful sweep of its leg crushed a dozen or so humans to powder. What insignificant, feeble creatures humans were.

—To. A. Wider. Place.

The vast blue sea was the thing's now, and nothing stood in its way. It sent nearly a thousand of its followers ashore, one after another, then swam on beneath the surface.

Whooooooosh.

Easy. Everything was astonishingly easy.

Humans were weak, and it was strong. It would make those worthless things understand.

The thing roused the magic power coiled within its body. At the same time, it churned the water with limbs that had multiplied from eight to dozens.

Whooooooosh!

A wave dozens of meters[2642] high rose and hurtled forward.

Nothing could stop a wave carrying that much magic power. Everything human hands had built broke apart and sank.

The long, enormous structure built over the sea was no exception.

Ruuuumble!

The wave slammed into the suspension bridge called Gwangan Bridge. The wide-ranging defensive magic installed for emergencies shattered under its immense power, and the bridge broke precisely at its middle.

“Aaaaaah!”

“S-Save me…!”

Honk! Hooooonk!

The thing surveyed what it had made: the collapsing bridge, the terrified humans screaming, the noise pouring from objects it could not identify.

It was all satisfying.

At least until that happened.

Whoooosh! Boom!

In an instant, flashes of light rained down from the sky without pause, reducing some two hundred Mermen to pools of blood.

And then the thing noticed the presence of a human floating high above.

—Sky?

Could humans fly?

The question had barely formed when the human descended gently and landed.

Splash.

The human stepped into a pool of green blood and stared straight at it. Sunlight shattered against the spearhead he held at an angle.

—Guh…!

The thing groaned at the painfully bright glare. Then it made its decision.

—I. Will. Kill. You.

A savage red light flashed in the eyes on either side of its head. With a surge of immense magic power, dozens of legs struck the water.

Rumble! Whooooooosh!

Another enormous wave rose. The disaster it had summoned blotted out the sun, and the thing charged with a vast roar.

—Grrrrrrooooooar!

There, in the path of the terror of the sea—the Kraken—stood a human.

[2642] Dozens of meters is roughly 20–90 m, or about 66–300 ft.

Of course the wave that struck Gwangan Bridge hadn't formed naturally.

Soon after the Great Cataclysm, many structures had been rebuilt to combine the best of magic and science. Gwangan Bridge, one of Busan's landmarks, was no exception.

But the fact that the powerful defensive magic on Gwangan Bridge was shattered by that wave…

The answer was clear. There was more than salt and seaweed in that water.

Something had torn through the boundary between worlds and emerged into ours.

I breathed out and tightened my grip on my spear.

"Come at me, you octopus bastard."

The Kraken took me up on it.

Whooooooosh!

Dozens of tentacles came at me with a tremendous shriek of displaced air. Their evenly spaced suction cups were so large they looked like black holes.

Damn it.

Who the hell said octopuses only had eight arms?

Internally clicking my tongue at the greater-than-expected number, I circulated internal energy through my legs.

Crack. Boom!

Spiderweb cracks raced across the hard ground, which burst apart beneath me. The recoil launched me between the Kraken's enormous tentacles.

An arc of White Flame slashed down like a flash of lightning.

Slash!

Three or four tentacles as thick as logs were cleanly severed.

They were only the relatively thin tips, but anyone would feel that pain.

The Kraken's tentacle, which had been about to strike the section of Gwangan Bridge where I had stood only moments earlier, twitched and trembled before slapping against the surface of the water.

Splash!

I had avoided the attack, but it was not over.

This is a bad place to fight.

Gwangan Bridge had already collapsed, almost split in two, but survivors were still scattered everywhere nearby. The screams coming from behind me were proof enough.

If I fought the Kraken here, there was a high chance of causing many unexpected casualties.

At this rate…

The battlefield, the surroundings, what I needed to do—there was only one answer.

Step. Tap.

The tip of my foot gently touched empty air.

Stepping on Empty Air. It consumed internal energy at a punishing rate, so I couldn't keep it up for long. I had no intention of dragging this fight out anyway.

Whooooooosh!

Nothing made an easier target than someone hanging in midair.

The Kraken's tentacles swept toward me as if dancing. I brought my spearhead down at an angle.

Fwoosh—shhhhhk!

Blue flames split into dozens of streaks and shot through the air.

However strong the Kraken was, it couldn't withstand Force.

Slash! Splash!

The tentacles swinging at me from every direction were severed in a single stroke.

Sizzle.

The Scorching Yang Qi carried by the Force burned the flesh even as it cut through. The Kraken roared in agony.

—Grrrrrrooooooar!

Of all kinds of pain, burns were the most agonizing.

I didn't miss the moment it faltered.

Bang!

Compressed air burst beneath my toes. The spearhead held upright plunged down, slicing through the fierce wind.

At its tip was the face of a gigantic octopus.

Shhhhhhhk!

Chapter 573

Everything had an order and a progression.

Mutated Gates were no exception.

When a magical power reading crossed a certain threshold, an alarm sounded and everyone nearby received an evacuation order.

But the ordinary Grade C Gate had become a Mutated Gate and then a Monster Wave in just a few dozen seconds.

The reading was so far beyond anything on record that the Gate management office could only suspect a measurement error.

Their deliberation lasted less than a minute. Then the Kraken tore through space into this world and smashed the Gate management office before anything else.

Boom!

And the flames of disaster spread in every direction in an instant.

The Kraken was the terror of the black sea, a king of immense power. And a king like that had savage, loyal soldiers.

—Ssssss!

Fins moved without pause. Gills opened and closed.

A Merman appeared, making a strange cry, and the intersection crowded with cars and people fell silent.

“What is that…?”

The question went unfinished.

Whoosh—crack!

It happened in an instant.

A barnacle-covered trident pierced through a human body and continued flying, punching straight through even a vehicle waiting at the light.

Boom!

Vehicle fragments flew in every direction with the sound of an explosion.

As people stared at the impossible sight, alarms around the intersection sounded and warnings arrived on their smartphones.

Weeeeeeeeng!

Ding. Beep-beep. Bzzzz.

The noise broke the silence.

People looked from the burning car to the Merman standing in the road. Only then did they realize the danger was right in front of them.

“M-Monster!”

“It’s a Monster Wave!”

“Aaaaaaaah!”

The crowds scattered, screaming.

All they could think about was getting away from the monsters and staying alive. Rules and laws meant nothing now.

“Fuck, move!”

“W-wait…!”

Crash! Crack!

“Graaagh!”

People knocked one another down. A car sped through a red light and struck a pedestrian in the crosswalk.

Hoooooonk! Thud!

“Ghk!”

After the Great Cataclysm, Korea had become the most densely populated country in the world.

An intersection in Busan, the country’s second-largest city, plunged into chaos and terror.

But there were exceptions.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

Figures pushed against the current of the fleeing crowd.

There were only four of them, but their calm eyes and lightning-fast movements marked them as seasoned Hunters.

“Three o’clock!”

“Okay. All at once?”

“Cut down the ones in front first.”

“Don’t let them scatter!”

They had never met, but a few words were enough.

Each had spent anywhere from one to ten years fighting monsters. They knew exactly what they had to do.

If we don’t stop them here… we’re finished.

We have to hold them back somehow.

Fortunately, only around a dozen Mermen had appeared at the intersection.

None of the four was a particularly high-Grade Hunter, but against that many, they might be able to hold out and buy time.

“Surround them!”

They charged toward the Mermen. Then they stopped, despair taking hold.

Thud. Thud-thud. Thud-thud-thud!

—Ssssit!

—Ssssss!

The asphalt trembled beneath the weight of hundreds of Mermen charging toward them.

The first group had only been the vanguard. The main force had arrived.

And even this many might be just a fraction of it.

"…Ah."

We're finished.

All four thought the same thing.

Fighting a dozen Mermen would have meant risking their lives. For four low-to-mid-Grade Hunters, taking on this many was nearly impossible.

No—it was impossible without high-Grade Hunters to back them up.

"W-we could hold out until reinforcements arrive…"

"Hold out?"

A middle-aged Hunter muttered through clenched teeth in response to someone's almost desperate suggestion.

"We'd get hacked to death a thousand times faster."

"…Damn it."

His entire body felt as heavy as cotton soaked in water. He had to fight, but he could not bring himself to do it.

They had families. They wanted to live. Only their duty and resolve as Hunters kept them from backing away.

But they would not be able to hold themselves back much longer.

—Aah, aaaaaah!

When had she appeared?

A song spread from atop a tall building. Its singer was a pale beauty wearing a pearl crown, her long, flowing hair covering her naked body.

A Siren.

A witch whose beautiful voice bewitched listeners and led them to ruin. The queen of the black sea.

There was only one, but her haunting, powerful voice filled the wide intersection.

People who had been screaming as they fled looked up at the half-human, half-bird monster floating like an angel. They stopped, rapture on their faces.

The Hunters gritted their teeth against her magic, but it did no good.

Drip. Drip.

Blood slipped between their clenched teeth and ran down their chins.

The song burrowed into their ears. Their grips on their weapons weakened, and the hundreds of Mermen drawing closer blurred before their eyes.

"God… damn it."

They could see death coming. Neither they nor the nearly thousand civilians around them would escape it.

And the massacre wouldn't end here. Even if high-Grade Hunters arrived, they couldn't protect every one of Busan's millions of citizens.

Fuck. I didn't think I'd die like this.

It was too late. There was nothing he could do.

The middle-aged Hunter had given up. He was staring at the Siren through blurred eyes when—

—Aah, aaaaaah…!

Fwooooosh—crack!

Something shrieked through the air, and the song cut off.

Dark blue blood, the color of the sea, burst from the Siren. Her beating wings snapped, and the half-human, half-bird monster fell from the sky onto the asphalt.

Whoooosh—thud!

"Huh?"

—Ssssit?

With the enchanted song gone, their minds cleared.

The surviving humans and the Mermen who had watched their queen die stared at the fallen Siren.

Her eyes were frozen wide. The impact had knocked off her pearl crown and spread her hair apart, revealing something long and pointed jutting out between her breasts.

Was that…?

"Bone?"

The question had barely left the middle-aged Hunter's lips when—

Whooooooosh!

A strange noise rang out, and a shadow fell over everyone's heads.

Everyone looked up.

Something enormous and pure white covered the sky far above them. At its center stood a man.

"This body. Descends."

The arrogant yet powerful voice pierced everyone's ears.

When golden hair flashed briefly in their vision, the unidentified man pointed toward the hundreds of Mermen and continued speaking.

"You. Die."

—…!

The Mermen's eyes widened. At the same instant, the white mass casting its shadow over them flashed.

Papapapapat!

Bone. It was bone.

Sharper than spearheads and as fast as arrows, bone fragments rained down on the intersection.

Fwooooosh! Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Thousands of bone fragments fired at once smashed scales and tore through fins.

A Merman that barely managed to knock away several bone fragments with its spear was immediately turned into a pincushion by another fragment that came flying at it, then collapsed.

Thud-thud-thud!

The downpour of bones struck monsters alone.

Amid that horrifying spectacle, the humans stood frozen as they watched the neatly paved asphalt road become stained with monster blood in an instant.

Thump. Thump. Crash!

In little more than ten seconds, nearly half of the two hundred Mermen collapsed.

No. They had melted.

One Merman, apparently their commander, let out an urgent cry.

—Ssssit, ssssssit!

—Sss. Ssssit!

As half-human, half-fish creatures, Mermen were monsters of considerable intelligence. At their commander's order, they moved as one, raising the enormous scallop-shell shields strapped to their backs to form a wall.

The stranger—the Skeleton King—clicked his tongue.

"What insolent wretches. How dare you resist this body?"

It would make no difference. The Skeleton King's power was beyond anything mere Mermen could contend with.

"I shall make you pay dearly for defying a king… Hm?"

Rrrrk. Boom!

Sensing something amiss, the Skeleton King turned his head.

Far away, Mermen swarmed toward him like a colony of ants. His golden eyes took them in from behind his mask.

"…Would you look at these wretches."

There were more than five hundred at a glance.

As he took fresh offense at their insolence, the Skeleton King remembered something he had briefly forgotten.

Ah. Undead.

However urgent things were, he couldn't raise an undead army in the middle of a Busan intersection.

Especially not with nearly a thousand humans watching him, eyes wide open.

“Oh. This isn’t right.”

He muttered uneasily. Then anger surged through him as the face of the wicked human who had placed restrictions on him came to mind.

That damned human. He puts me through all this?

The thought that the bastard had deliberately sent him to the area with the most monsters made his breastbone feel twisted.

The Skeleton King whipped his head toward the distant sky, in the direction Jin Taekyung had gone moments earlier.

Whooooooosh!

Gwooooooar!

Boom! Krrrrr-boom!

Even from here, he could clearly see enormous tentacles and hear the explosions.

The Skeleton King silently watched the scene, then turned his gaze back toward the cluster of Mermen gathered below.

“…On second thought, they look like a girl group.”

It was the first time the hideous Mermen had ever looked pretty to him.

Whoooosh—boom!

Seawater surged upward with a sound like an exploding shell.

But the attacks were much weaker than before, and their reach had clearly diminished.

That was probably because the Kraken’s nearly thirty tentacles were down to nine.

Slash!

No. Eight now.

—Gwooooooar!

“Now that’s a proper octopus.”

I shot forward with all my strength toward the roaring Kraken.

I dodged an incoming tentacle and stepped on empty air, leaping higher. Beneath my feet was a gigantic pair of eyes.

Time to finish this.

Fwoosh.

Flames wrapped around the spearhead and spun faster. I poured all my internal energy into the spear and drove it down toward the creature’s eye.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear, Third Form: Takoyaki.[2643]

[2643] Takoyaki is a Japanese snack of batter balls filled with octopus.

Chapter 574

Squelch!

The blade of White Flame pierced the enormous eye. The Kraken, terror of the sea, shuddered in agony.

But its pain was far from over.

Boom!

Flames burst forth, evaporating the blood. Powerful qi surged down the spearhead and tore through the Kraken's insides.

A full three jiazi[2644] of Scorching Yang Qi had done more than roast one of its eyes. It was enough to inflict grievous internal injuries.

—Gwooooooar!

Roaring in pain unlike anything it had ever felt, the Kraken whipped its eight tentacles in every direction.

It was trying to shake me off.

I held on, driving the spearhead deeper, and slammed my fist into its enormous eye.

Whoom! Thud!

With a divine weapon like White Flame in hand, I had little reason to use my fists or feet. But a fist thrown with strength and speed far beyond human limits was a deadly weapon in its own right.

Thud! Thud! Thuuud!

My fists came down like streaks of light, and the Kraken's massive body writhed again.

—Ghk, gwooooooar!

Boom! Splash!

Its eight tentacles hammered the sea, throwing up walls of water and raising waves.

I got drenched in salt water and licked my lips. The briny taste spread across my tongue.

"Stay still. I'm not done yet."

How many people had died or been injured in this Monster Wave?

The collapse of Gwangan Bridge alone had already caused hundreds of casualties. Every one of them was someone's father or mother, or a child so precious someone couldn't bear to see them hurt.

You have to pay.

The Kraken had destroyed more than a bridge.

[2644] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi equal 180 years.

Hundreds of precious lives had sunk beneath the white foam. So had promises made to people who would never be seen again.

Crack!

I tightened my grip on the spear shaft and sent internal energy surging through the mythical monster's body like an electric current.

Boom.

A small explosion sounded somewhere deep beneath its wet, glistening skin.

"Gaaaaaah! Hu. Maaaan!"

I had aimed for its head to end things quickly. But perhaps because of its enormous size, even a devastating blow couldn't kill it instantly.

I answered without the slightest hesitation.

"Give up. You're going to die here anyway."

That much wasn't going to change.

I felt the Kraken stiffen at my flat response. It must have been startled to hear a human speaking the Demon Realm language, which only highly intelligent monsters could use.

"You. Are. Clearly. Human."

"Of course I'm human, you fucking bastard. Do I look like an octopus to you?"

It was all thanks to the System's Integrated Language Pack, but I saw no reason to explain that to it.

Instead, while it hesitated, I drove a fist toward the area above its eye.

Fwoosh.

Blue flames flickered over my clenched fist.

The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist—the technique that had once turned Tibet's Potala Palace into a "Crash Mansion."

The hammer of Scorching Yang Qi pierced the Kraken's skin, protected though it was by magical power.

Gwaaaaaang!

Keep striking even the hardest rock, and eventually it will break.

With enough internal energy behind it, the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist could bring down not just a rock, but a monster hundreds of times larger than a human.

Fwoosh!

Blue blood surged upward, and the Kraken's body trembled.

It had thrashed so violently that every yacht and fishing boat moored nearby was smashed to pieces. Now, instead of a thunderous roar, it let out a faint groan.

"…You. Human."

"Shut your mouth."

At last, I could see the end of this fight.

Sensing victory, I yanked White Flame from its eye at lightning speed and brought it down.

Or I was about to.

“Did you. Humans. Not give me. Power?”

“…!”

The spearhead stopped in midair, just short of piercing the Kraken’s head.

Countless thoughts flashed through my mind. I stared at it in confusion.

“What did you just say?”

Its limp body stirred at my question.

The Kraken was laughing. I was sure of it.

“Interesting.”

“Answer my question. Before it stops being interesting.”

“Did I not. Tell you? You were the ones. Who gave me power.”

“What do you mean by—”

Something felt wrong. As I tried to ask again, the Kraken drew a ragged breath and spoke.

“It must be cramped. Isn’t it?”

“…!”

“Go outside. There’s a wider sea.”

I froze.

That wasn’t the Kraken’s voice. It wasn’t the Demon Realm language, either.

Unlike its halting speech until now, this voice flowed smoothly. It was unmistakably—

Korean?

Yes. It was definitely Korean.

The Kraken was imitating someone I didn’t know. No—it was closer to replaying a memory exactly as it had happened.

The unfamiliar voice that followed confirmed it.

“The one who gave me power. The one who led me outside.”

Blue blood ran like a tear from its charred eye.

The Kraken looked at me with that eye—already dead, yet still full of hatred and despair—and continued.

“They were all human.”

“…!”

At the word human, a chill so cold it made me shudder climbed my spine.

Things that hadn’t quite made sense flashed through my mind, one after another.

The Monster Wave had moved so quickly that no one could respond.

The Kraken was extraordinarily powerful, even for a named monster.

And the Kraken itself had admitted that someone else was involved.

If all of that is true…

Someone deliberately caused the Monster Wave.

My teeth clenched at the thought. An artificially caused Monster Wave? It shouldn't have been possible. It should never be allowed to happen.

But…

Damn it. It is possible.

The total amount of magical power determined whether a Gate mutated or a Monster Wave occurred.

If the magical power exceeded the amount a Gate could contain, the two phenomena described above would occur.

And there was a way to raise that amount artificially.

Magic Gems.

The scattered pieces fell into place.

If it absorbed a Magic Gem containing a monster's magical power—an unpurified Magic Gem that had not undergone the purification process at human hands—it could be the only answer to this mystery.

But who? Why?

Someone had made the Kraken absorb a Magic Gem, turning it into a named monster. Then they had brought about a Monster Wave and unleashed this disaster.

It was terrorism. An atrocity no human should have been capable of committing.

Who would do that?

The hand holding White Flame trembled. Question after question crowded my mind, leaving it dark as a sky covered in clouds.

Ironically, only one creature could answer them.

"…Tell me. Everything you saw and heard."

I spat out the words. The Kraken gave a low, rumbling laugh.

"Why. Should I?"

"Because if you don't tell me right now, I'll kill you."

"How frightening. Truly frightening."

The mockery was obvious.

I pressed the spearhead farther in, but it only laughed through the pain and refused to yield.

"Ask. Your own kind."

"You fucking octopus."

"Kill. Me. Human."

"…!"

I clenched my teeth, fighting the urge to put a hole through the damned octopus's head right then and there.

Grind.

I had to kill it. I knew I did.

I had watched it all with my own eyes—the Kraken sacrificing hundreds of people.

If I included the other monsters under its command, the number of casualties might exceed several thousand.

Even now, someone somewhere in this city was probably screaming as they died.

But…

"…Fuck."

I couldn't kill the Kraken.

For what it had done, I wanted to beat it to death a hundred times over. A thousand times. But finding the person behind this damned disaster mattered more.

If I couldn't catch the bastard who had made the Kraken absorb a Magic Gem and brought about the Monster Wave, this would only be the beginning.

And people would die every time.

Was it the internal energy I'd spent? Or the unexpected existence of a traitor? My body felt as heavy as waterlogged cotton, and fatigue hit me all at once.

Sunlight beat down on my head.

Fuck. Of course the weather's nice.

It was a damn beautiful day and a god-awful situation.

I let out a rough breath and pulled White Flame from the Kraken's head.

Fsssh!

Blue blood gushed around the white spearhead as it came free.

I have to keep this thing alive.

The only witness—and the only one who could testify—was a monster.

Exhaustion weighed on me as I loosened my grip on the spear shaft.

Slide.

And that was both the only miscalculation I made in this battle and the most painful mistake.

Whoooooosh!

"…!"

It happened in an instant.

The Kraken's massive body, limp as though half-dead, thrashed. All eight tentacles came flying at me.

"Hup!"

Tap-tap. Whoosh!

I belatedly came to my senses, stepped on the Kraken's head, and launched myself into the air.

For a heartbeat, I thought I'd dodged the ambush.

Then I realized what the Kraken had really intended.

Fwooooooosh!

Black liquid spread through the air for dozens of meters[2645] in every direction.

It had planned this from beginning to end. With my guard down, I had no room to dodge all of it.

Splash!

Even moving as fast as I could, I couldn't avoid all of it as it spread across such a wide area.

And the instant the black liquid—perhaps roughly the amount in a cup of milk—touched my entire body, an unexpected System alert rang out.

Beep.

SYSTEM

You have come into contact with Kraken's Ink!
Kraken's Ink is a deadly poison with tremendous toxicity!
Status Abnormality: Poisoned has been applied!
Status Abnormality: Paralyzed has been applied!
Strength temporarily decreases significantly!
Agility temporarily decreases drastically!
Unaffected by a Hundred Poisons begins resisting!
Using internal energy can rapidly drive out the poison!

"…!"

My body grew heavy along with the System alert.

The black liquid was ink—and a deadly poison at that.

Damn it.

Why had I let my guard down? Why hadn't I suspected it right to the end?

The regret was bitter, but it was too late.

I drew up Scorching Yang Qi to counter the poison and put on the Myriad-Poison Ring from my Inventory.

Ding.

Another System alert sounded, and purification began.

But that was another mistake. The Kraken had seized the moment I let my guard down, and I wasn't its target.

Splashhhhh!

[2645] A meter is about 3.28 ft.

Its massive body shot forward like a ray of light, throwing up waves.

Gwangan Bridge lay ahead. Survivors were still there, waiting to be rescued.

“You…!”

“Human! Try. To. Kill. Me!”

There was scarcely time to think. Countless thoughts flashed through my mind, but the answer had been decided from the start.

A Murim warrior fought. A Hunter had to fight and protect people at the same time.

Crack.

I tightened my grip on the spear shaft, still cold despite all the blood it had soaked up.

In midair, I drew back my shoulder and twisted my waist. Internal energy raced through my coiled muscles and acupoints toward the spearhead.

Fwoosh.

Blue flames burned beneath the blazing sun. Sunlight shattered against the spearhead.

And then…

Now.

Die.

I swung my arm with every intention of killing it. The spear, engulfed in hellfire, shot forward as a beam of light.

Whooooooosh! Boom!

Compressed air burst outward, and the sea split apart.

At the end of its path was the Kraken’s enormous body, bearing down on the survivors.

Boom!

Blue blood fell like rain.

Chapter 575

I didn't need to see it up close or rush over to check for a pulse.

The moment the blue-flame-wreathed spearhead drove into the Kraken's body, I knew.

It's over.

Slash! Boom!

The spear cut through it, and fire qi exploded from within.

The monster's head, some ten meters[2646] tall, burst like a balloon. Blue blood that hadn't evaporated rained down over the sea.

And then—

Whoooooosh—

As the Kraken's enormous body finally collapsed, a clear chime rang in my ears.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You have defeated Lv. 140 'King of the Black Sea' Kraken!
You have gained a large amount of EXP!
Myriad-Poison Ring has detoxified all poison within your body!
Status Abnormality: Poisoned disappears!
Status Abnormality: Paralyzed disappears!

Even with the System telling me I'd defeated the Kraken, my mouth felt as gritty as if I were chewing sand.

Damn it.

I should have kept it alive. Somehow, I should have kept it alive long enough to learn who was really behind this.

But one moment of carelessness had brought about consequences I couldn't undo. The Kraken was dead, and the question remained unanswered.

If it had attacked me directly, I might have had a chance to capture it, but…

Too late now.

The Kraken had been smarter than I'd thought.

It knew I was stronger than it, even poisoned. It knew it couldn't escape.

That was why it had gone after the survivors instead of me. It would rather die than be captured.

Faced with its final desperate move, I'd had only one choice.

[2646] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

"…Phew."

I sighed, looking at the Kraken's corpse half-submerged in the sea.

There had been no other choice. If I hadn't killed it with that one strike, someone would have died right in front of me.

People talked about sacrificing the small for the sake of the greater good, but that was just a pretty phrase. In the end, it was still a sacrifice—doing nothing while someone died pointlessly, despite having the power to prevent it.

I shouldn't have let my guard down. Not until it was over…

But what was done was done.

I was anxious and regretful that I had ultimately failed to uncover the truth behind the disaster. But I did not regret killing the Kraken.

People had survived because of my choice.

"Over here! Please, help us!"

"Cough! Please, my child…"

"Mom! Mooooom!"

Maybe fighting as far away from them as I could had helped.

Hundreds of people had been killed or injured before I'd even arrived, but there were still more survivors waiting to be rescued.

Their desperate cries came from the choppy water and the broken Gwangan Bridge. I forced down my exhaustion and shot toward them.

Fwooooooosh!

The briny, refreshing smell of the sea filled my nose.

I raced across the water like a gust of wind. Passing the Kraken's floating corpse, I reached the survivors and began pulling them up.

"It's dangerous out there, so everyone needs to stay here. If you still have the strength, help me rescue the others first."

A young man who looked relatively unharmed spat out seawater.

"Cough. B-but shouldn't we run somewhere else…?"

"Run?"

"Y-yes."

I raised a hand and pointed. Black smoke rose between the densely packed buildings all around us.

Ordinary civilians couldn't hear what I could, but my senses had already told me what was happening.

Hssssss!

"Tank! Three steps forward!"

"The building! The building is collapsing! The civilians are in danger!"

"Aaaaaagh!"

Rumble! Boom!

Faint screams and crashes. Humans and monsters were fighting in the streets not far away—and in several places at once.

“There are monsters in every direction. Still want to go?”

“…No. I’ll stay here.”

At least he caught on quickly.

The Kraken was dead, but this was far from over. If I was going to get this chaos under control, I had a busy day ahead of me.

Fwooooooosh! Boom!

The survivors stared, dazed, as I kicked off the water and shot into the sky.

Everyone ate. But who you ate with, and where, made a difference to how formal the meal was.

By that measure, the breakfast shared by the two people sitting across from each other had been formal indeed.

The late-starting breakfast had continued for a full two hours amid quiet conversation. By then, a beautifully decorated dish of sujeonggwa[2647] had been placed on the spotless white tablecloth.

“Since Seollal[2648] is just around the corner, I had tteokguk[2649] prepared… I’m not sure whether the meal suited your taste, Team Leader Choi.”

Choi Minwoo wiped his mouth with a napkin before answering the gentle, courteous voice.

“It was excellent, Mr. President. Thank you for taking such care.”

“Ha-ha. I’m glad.”

The middle-aged man across from him, President Baek Hanseong, smiled warmly.

“You’ve been so busy lately that I was worried you weren’t eating properly. So I repeatedly impressed upon the head chef here at the Blue House[2650] that you were an important guest and that he needed to take special care with your meal.”

“Important guest” was no empty compliment.

An invitation to breakfast at the Blue House[2651] already marked a person as powerful and influential. A meal alone with the President meant something more.

Baek Hanseong valued Choi Minwoo that highly.

“You eat well. It’s nice to see. Makes me proud, too.”

[2647] Sujeonggwa is a traditional Korean cinnamon punch, often served chilled with dried persimmons and pine nuts.

[2648] Seollal is the Korean Lunar New Year.

[2649] Tteokguk is Korean rice-cake soup traditionally eaten at Seollal.

[2650] The Blue House is Korea’s presidential office.

[2651] The Blue House is Korea’s presidential office.

Choi Minwoo dipped his head.

“Thank you. Still, I don’t go hungry as often as you seem to think, Mr. President. I feel I may have caused you unnecessary concern.”

“Oh? Well, I suppose you have a personal chef.”

“No. Someone has been making my meals for me lately.”

“Someone making your meals… Ah, do you mean…?”

Choi Minwoo gave a small nod.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung’s mother cooks for me.”

“My goodness. His mother does it herself?”

“Yes. I’ve tried to refuse—it doesn’t feel right—but she won’t hear of it.”

President Baek Hanseong let out a quiet exclamation.

He already knew Jin Taekyung’s family was staying temporarily at Choi Minwoo’s estate. Hearing Choi himself speak about it, though, gave that fact new significance.

If she’s even cooking for him… They’re closer than I thought.

Jin Taekyung and Choi Minwoo. Choi Minwoo and Jin Taekyung.

From President Baek Hanseong’s perspective, the two men were not only enormous fish he could never afford to let go, but also the only means of restraining the Ares Guild, which wielded tremendous influence.

Jin Taekyung, with his extraordinary standing. Choi Minwoo, Cheon Taemin’s maternal grandson and only living blood relative.

With those two on his side, Baek could rise still higher. After becoming the youngest president in Korea’s history, he might well become the first to win reelection under the amended law.

Whatever it takes, I have to bring them both over to my side.

While President Baek Hanseong entertained thoroughly political thoughts, Choi Minwoo was thinking about something completely different as he drank his coffee.

She said she was making dinner tonight… Kimchi stew, was it?

Strange. He had just finished breakfast, yet his stomach felt empty.

He wanted Jin Taekyung’s mother’s kimchi stew more than the tteokguk[2652] the Blue House[2653] head chef—a master of Korean cuisine—had prepared with such care.

Fluffy white rice from a pressure cooker of a kind rarely seen these days. Pork cooked until tender, and well-aged kimchi.

And the people huddled around the same table, frantically moving their spoons.

Hmm.

[2652] Tteokguk is Korean rice-cake soup traditionally eaten at Seollal.

[2653] The Blue House is Korea’s presidential office.

As Choi Minwoo realized he was unconsciously smacking his lips, he let out a faint, bemused laugh.

So that's what it is.

He wasn't particularly fond of tteokguk[2654] or kimchi stew. Nor was he looking forward to dinner because her cooking was better than the Blue House[2655] chef's.

He simply liked being there. The warm food, shared with warm people.

Home.

And family.

Choi Minwoo had lost both before he was as tall as the chair he sat in now. He had thought he could never have them again.

No. I do still have one family member.

A hero who had saved humanity. A living savior.

But a man who had been unable to protect his own family.

Choi Minwoo thought of the last time he had seen his maternal grandfather—a meeting he could no longer remember.

Soon… I'll see you again.

At the thought of the grandfather who had shut himself away for decades, a feeling he couldn't name rose within him.

Noticing that Choi Minwoo's mood had changed, President Baek Hanseong asked with concern, "Is something troubling you?"

"Ah. No. It's nothing."

"Ha-ha. I see. Well, now that we've finished eating, there's something important I'd like to discuss with you, Team Leader—"

The door flew open.

President Baek stopped mid-sentence. He frowned at the aide who had entered without knocking.

"I thought I told everyone not to come in."

"I'm sorry. I tried to avoid it, but you weren't answering…"

"Answering? Of course not. My phone's on silent."

With an important conversation under way, taking out a smartphone would have been discourteous, given who was at the table.

"Huff… I'm sorry. But it's urgent."

The aide was breathing hard, sweat beading on his forehead.

Sensing something was wrong, Choi Minwoo took the smartphone from inside his suit jacket. He had more than ten missed calls from Butler Kim and a string of text messages.

Dread rose in him.

[2654] Tteokguk is Korean rice-cake soup traditionally eaten at Seollal.

[2655] The Blue House is Korea's presidential office.

Don't tell me…

He opened the messages. One of his neatly groomed eyebrows twitched.

> Butler Kim
> └ Butler Kim: Butler Kim
> └ Butler Kim: Emergency Monster Wave in Busan
> └ Butler Kim: Extra-large named monster sighted
> └ Butler Kim: Young Master, where are you?
> └ Butler Kim: Young Ma□ter

The messages were from Butler Kim. They were short, but there was nothing small about the news.

A Monster Wave? In Busan?

Busan was Korea's second-largest city, home to millions. An extra-large named monster could cause an enormous loss of life just by doing a forward roll.

And what the aide said next made matters worse.

"The emergency alert was delayed for about ten minutes. The Monster Wave happened so suddenly, and the Gate management office and all the surrounding facilities were destroyed…"

"You idiot! Do you hear yourself?"

"I-I'm sorry."

Sweat poured down the aide's face as he continued.

"But according to the report that came in one minute ago, the extra-large named monster has been subdued. Hunter Jin Taekyung happened to arrive at the scene just in time…"

"What? Are you certain?"

"Yes. The remaining monsters are being dealt with, and survivors are being rescued."

"…Phew. At least that's a relief."

President Baek Hanseong exhaled in relief, while Choi Minwoo rose from his seat without hesitation.

The worst of the immediate crisis might have passed, but this was no time to sit and talk.

"I'll be going, Mr. President."

"Of course. We'll speak another time."

They exchanged brief farewells. Choi Minwoo had just left the Blue House[2656] when—

[2656]The Blue House is Korea's presidential office.

Bzzzzzt.

The smartphone he had turned back on began vibrating forcefully again.

Team Leader Choi thought he knew who was calling and answered at once.

“Yes, Butler Kim. I’m on my way ri—”

“…!”

Choi Minwoo stopped dead.

Song Cheonwoo’s aged voice came through the phone.

“Let’s talk for a moment. It’s urgent.”

Click.

The short call ended. The signal ringing from the smartphone stopped, but the hand Choi Minwoo had raised to his ear did not come down easily.

He crossed the Green Garden in front of the Blue House[2657] residence, his expression conflicted. His steps had slowed. One thought filled his mind.

Song Cheonwoo wants to meet me. Right now.

Song Cheonwoo—the Trojan horse who could get him inside the impregnable fortress that was the Ares Guild.

Choi had been waiting for him to make contact. He simply had not expected it today, much less an immediate meeting.

He went over their brief conversation again.

What should I do?

Choi stopped dead.

Two paths lay before him, like the choice he now faced.

Busan. And Song Cheonwoo.

There was no time. He had to choose. He stared at the two paths, then finally started walking.

Crunch.

Frozen grass crumbled beneath the heels of his dress shoes. The path might have split in two, but both ways led to the exit.

A familiar face was waiting outside the main gate, beside the Blue House security office.

“Young Master.”

Choi greeted Butler Kim with a nod and stepped through the gate.

A sleek limousine, five black SUVs, and around twenty Hunters waited by the roadside. Every one of them was skilled enough to count among the elite of the Peace Guild, which had grown considerably. The Equipment they wore showed they were ready for battle.

Butler Kim’s next words confirmed Choi’s suspicion.

“We were waiting to escort you.”

“I’m sorry. Given where I was, I failed to check in time. More importantly, I heard that Mr. Jin Taekyung defeated a named monster. What is the current situation?”

“As you said, the named monster that appeared during this wave, the Kraken, has been eliminated. However, over a thousand Mermen have spread throughout Haeundae and Gwangalli.”

[2657] The Blue House, or Cheong Wa Dae, is the traditional name of South Korea’s presidential office and residence in Seoul.

“The damage must be severe,” Choi said quietly.

Busan might not have been as large as Seoul, but it was Korea’s second-largest city, with a population approaching five million. For a thousand monsters to appear there, especially monsters strengthened by the recent rise in magic power, was nothing short of a disaster.

But Butler Kim calmly shook his head.

“It isn’t something to celebrate, but fortunately, casualties are far lower than we expected.”

“Even if Mr. Jin Taekyung defeated the Kraken, he couldn’t have stopped all thousand Mermen.”

“Skel—no. The Stone King was there.”

“Ah.”

The face of the blond foreigner who always wore an arrogant, self-assured expression flashed before Choi Minwoo’s eyes. He gave a small exclamation and nodded.

With him there, it’s possible.

Only a handful of people knew the truth about the undead monster caught in an identity crisis between monster and American. Choi also knew he was every bit as powerful as an S-rank Hunter.

“Yes. Fortunately, thanks to the efforts of those two, the damage is not particularly severe.”

It was extraordinary luck. Jin Taekyung and the Skeleton King were each a one-man army. And unlike the Skeleton King, whose abilities came with various restrictions, Jin Taekyung ranked among the strongest in Korea. No, in the entire world.

Except for one person…

“What about our Peace Guild?” Choi asked.

“About five minutes ago, we dispatched the emergency rescue team and three teams we had standing by to Busan. The Guilds and Hunters based there, along with outside reinforcements, are doing everything they can to keep the damage from spreading.”

Choi knew by heart how many Gates, Guilds, and Hunters there were across Korea. He blinked a few times as he calculated, then asked, “They’ll have the monsters contained within two hours at the latest. Correct?”

“Yes. Of course, rescuing the victims afterward will take considerable time as well…”

“Then we can’t call Mr. Jin Taekyung or the Stone King away under the circumstances.”

“Forgive me, Young Master, but call them away for what?”

“Never mind. Let’s go.”

Choi's reply was quiet and final, but his lips moved again as he walked toward the limousine.

The words reached Butler Kim's ear through what could no longer properly be called message magic. It was Sound Transmission.

—He has requested a meeting.

"…!"

Butler Kim's eyes trembled. Choi had not named him, but there was no mistaking who he meant.

—Song Cheonwoo?

—Yes.

—Young Master, it may be dangerous. The Busan Monster Wave is already nearing its end. We could go back to the Guild House instead—

—He spoke about my maternal grandfather's safety. And about a trap Go Jun is setting.

Choi watched Butler Kim's face go rigid and continued quietly.

—I have to meet him. Right now.

The B-rank Gate in Pyeongchang, Gangwon Province, known as Yeti's Winter Range, was not an especially appealing raid site.

Even with exceptional physical abilities and Magic Equipment, fighting furry giants on a snowy mountain where your feet sank with every step was hardly pleasant.

Still, not everyone avoided Yeti's Winter Range. Some Hunters continued to visit despite the recent, repeated rises in magic power. The group that had just ridden the lift down was among them.

"Damn it. No entry, all of a sudden?"

"Right? Hey, Team Leader, are we getting paid for today?"

"…You're worse than a yeti. We couldn't even get into the Gate because the magic power went up, and you're asking about pay? Have you got no shame?"

"Aw, I got my hopes up for nothing. By the way, who were those people up there? The handsome guy wearing the mask looked kind of familiar."

"Beats me. How would I know—huh?"

The thirty-odd Hunters came down the path grumbling. Their Team Leader, walking at the front, suddenly widened his eyes.

A man was walking up toward them at an unhurried pace.

"Tsk, tsk. Looks like he's going to strike out too."

The man had obviously come for a raid. The Team Leader called out to him. He looked to be in his forties.

"Yeti raid?"

The middle-aged man paused at the abrupt question, then nodded without a word.

The Team Leader clicked his tongue. "Then you're out of luck too, Boss.[2658] Don't bother going up. They've closed it off."

"…"

"They say the magic power reading suddenly went up or something. Anyway, entry's prohibited. That's why we got turned back too."

"…"

"…Hello? Did you hear me?"

The Team Leader frowned when he sensed something strange. Without answering a single word, the middle-aged man who had merely listened to him walked past the group.

Step. Step.

"What's with that guy?" the Team Leader muttered as the man receded up the path.

To the middle-aged man, however, the Team Leader's goodwill was nothing more than needless meddling.

Clatter.

The man rode the lift up with a slight jolt and found dozens of pairs of eyes waiting for him.

A Hunter who looked quite capable stepped forward to bar his way.

"Sorry, but due to the rise in the magic power reading, you can't enter the Gate—"

"He's my guest."

At the quiet voice, the twenty-odd Hunters standing like a wall parted to let him through.

Two people stood at the end of the path they made.

"You're late."

At Choi Minwoo's flat voice, the middle-aged man whose appearance had been changed by an illusion spell—Song Cheonwoo—finally parted his tightly closed lips.

"I had to be careful. And you were the one who chose this place, Minwoo."

"I wasn't the one who suggested meeting at a Gate. Surely that gave me the right to choose which one."

"We had to avoid wiretapping and any other surveillance. None of it will work once we're inside."

"Then there should be no problem. This Gate belongs to the Peace Guild. It's a suitable place for both of us to be cautious."

[2658] Sajangnim, literally "business owner," can be used as a polite form of address for an unfamiliar adult.

"…Both of us? You suspect me?"

It was Butler Kim, standing quietly behind Choi, who answered.

"Why should the Young Master trust you?"

"Come now, Hwajong."

"Do not call me by my name. Whatever relationship we had ended long ago."

"…!"

Song Cheonwoo's eyelids trembled at Butler Kim's glacial stare.

Once, they had been close enough to call each other brothers. Then their paths had split between loyalty and ambition.

As an icy chill settled between them, a quiet voice rang out.

"I believe there's something more important we need to discuss first."

The words were gentle, but they cut to the point. Both men backed down. Choi glanced from one to the other, then turned toward the Gate entrance, where a field of magic power shimmered.

"You two will come inside with me. The other Guild members will keep anyone else from entering."

Choi went first. Butler Kim and Song Cheonwoo followed.

Whoooooosh.

Cold, sticky magic power enveloped them. When they opened their eyes again, a world of white stretched before them.

Yeti's Winter Range.

Snowdrifts lay in every direction across its steep slopes. Somewhere in the mountains, a monster roared.

—Kraaaaaaaar!

The three men remained unmoved by the bitter cold and the chilling cry. They were far too powerful to fear a mere yeti. Besides, they had come for a private conversation, not a raid.

"Tell me about my maternal grandfather's safety," Choi said. "And the trap Go Jun is preparing."

Song gave a bitter smile at the direct demand.

"Although I have not watched you for long… your personality has not changed."

"Just get to the point. I don't think I'm asking much."

Song let out a shallow breath. White mist rose into the wind as he spoke, his voice sounding older than before.

"Would you walk with me a little? I'd like to speak to you alone."

Butler Kim frowned. Choi answered evenly.

"Is that necessary?"

"You still suspect me."

“I still have no reason to trust you.”

“This Gate belongs to the Peace Guild, not to me or Ares. You chose it yourself. How could I have set a trap here?”

“…”

“I’m not stupid enough to try something against my only ally.”

Choi had been looking out across the snowy mountains. He turned and studied Song’s eyes. They did not waver in the slightest.

“Very well.”

“Young Master,” Butler Kim said.

“Don’t worry. I won’t go far.”

“…Then I’ll follow at a distance.”

Song nodded and slowly drew the weapon at his waist.

“I suppose I can’t stop you doing that. Suit yourself.”

“You—!”

“Don’t misunderstand.”

Thud.

What Butler Kim feared did not happen. Song drove his weapon deep into the snow for them to see, and Choi started walking.

Crunch. Crunch.

Snow crumbled beneath their feet as they walked side by side.

After a few steps, Song finally broke his silence.

“Are you referring to Area A?”

“…!”

Song’s eyes widened at the unexpected question.

“I knew the area existed and what it was called,” Choi said calmly. “I couldn’t find out anything more.”

“…Impressive. How did you learn even that?”

“I put in more effort than you might imagine. What I need now isn’t praise, though. I need details. What does Area A have to do with my maternal grandfather’s safety?”

“Because that person is there.”

Crunch.

Choi stopped dead at those two words. After a moment of silence, he began walking again.

“That information is not certain.”

“Why do you say that?”

“You were pushed out of the Ares Guild’s inner circle long ago, Director Song.”

“…That stings. But you’re right. I can’t be certain.”

“I also can’t see why my maternal grandfather would be there. No—I can’t understand it.”

“A reason…”

Song sighed softly.

“You wouldn’t understand. No one knows what happened to that person—not even you.”

“What are you—”

Choi Minwoo turned to him with a questioning expression. Then, at the next words, he froze.

“It happened more than twenty years ago. That person lost consciousness.”

“…!”

Chapter 577

Choi Minwoo's face had gone rigid. His eyes trembled faintly as he stared at Song Cheonwoo.

"What… do you mean?"

"You may find it hard to believe, but it's true."

Song continued with a sigh.

"It happened suddenly, one day. No one saw it coming."

"…!"

Choi clenched his fists without realizing it.

He did not trust Song Cheonwoo, but he could sense no trace of a lie in the old man before him.

Then is it really true?

His heart sank. A bead of cold sweat rolled down the back of his neck.

He barely managed to force the words past his tightly pressed lips.

"But I've never heard anything like that from anyone. Not even Butler Kim, who was my maternal grandfather's closest aide…"

Before Choi could finish, Song shook his head.

"It isn't that he chose not to tell you. He couldn't."

"Then…"

"I'm sorry."

Wouldn't and couldn't. A small difference in words, but an enormous difference in meaning. Choi understood what Song was saying and glared at him.

"You hid it from Butler Kim too? Something this important?"

The old man nodded quietly. When he spoke, his voice sounded older than ever.

"Hwajong was always loyal. And he gave that same loyalty to a child born after the war—a boy who lost his parents in an accident and was left alone."

"…!"

"Even on the day everything changed, your grandfather's most loyal aide was at your side."

Choi turned his head without realizing it.

Far across the snow, Butler Kim stood watching them.

If the howling blizzard had not swallowed Song's voice, that loyal servant would have come flying over to kill the traitor.

"Is that why you asked me to walk with you alone?"

"I had no choice. If he'd heard us, we couldn't have continued this conversation."

"If Butler Kim had heard about my maternal grandfather back then, you two would already have…"

His usual calm composure was gone.

Blue fire seemed to flicker in Choi's eyes. Song could not bring himself to meet his gaze and looked away.

"At first, we were only bewildered. We thought he would regain consciousness soon, so we kept it strictly confidential."

Crunch.

Song took a weary step and continued.

"But then a month passed. Half a year. A year. And a strange thought occurred to me. What if… he never woke up?"

Song Cheonwoo and Lee Jungryong.

What the two men had scarcely dared consider at first hardened into certainty as time passed. Then that certainty gave way to something else.

"Another year passed, and we recognized the greed in each other."

The greed to fill the place left vacant by Cheon Taemin, a man no one had dared challenge. The desire to become master of the great fortress that was Ares Guild.

"The purge began quietly one day. Unlike Kim Hwajong, who had already drifted away from Ares Guild, several of his closest aides knew of his condition. They died in Gates."

Choi bit down hard on his lip.

From ancient times to the present, death had been the surest way to bury the truth.

Lee Jungryong and Song Cheonwoo had chosen that path to usurp the throne of a king who was still alive.

Crack.

Choi's smooth lips split, and red blood ran down his chin. As he walked, his angry steps crushed the drops falling onto the white snow.

"You managed to survive, Regional Director. You really do have a stubborn hold on life."

Song answered his cutting words in a weak voice.

"Getting rid of me wouldn't have been easy for Lee Jungryong. Besides, we'd both covered ourselves in filth fighting over Ares Guild. He must have judged that I was unlikely to talk. He was right."

Knowing the truth was reason enough to be killed. Having wallowed in the mud together could be reason enough to be spared.

And to Choi, Song Cheonwoo had never seemed capable of fighting Lee Jungryong to the bitter end.

"Was the European regional director's position the price of that deal?"

"Yes. It saved my life and my family's."

Choi drew a deep breath. At last, the pieces of the puzzle that had eluded him fell into place.

Why Lee Jungryong, cold and thorough as he was, had kept Song Cheonwoo alive.

And why Choi's grandfather, his only blood relative and a symbol to the world, had not appeared in more than twenty years.

—Kraaaaaaar!

A yeti roared somewhere in the mountains, as if giving voice to Choi's feelings.

Damn it.

Crack.

The bones in his tightly clenched fist shifted audibly.

He wanted to scream. To ask why they had done it, and what they had hoped to gain. He wanted to shout at the top of his lungs, seize the old man walking ahead by the collar, draw the sword at his waist, and stab him in the back.

But…

Swish. Thud.

His hand moved toward the hilt, then fell away before it reached it.

Not yet. Song Cheonwoo would answer for what he had done, but only after Choi had confirmed all the facts.

Choi forced his pounding heart to settle and spoke in a trembling voice.

"Why did my grandfather collapse?"

Crunch.

Song's footsteps stopped. Ahead of him, the ground gave way to empty air.

A crevasse—the kind of fissure found in snowy mountains and glaciers—cut through the mountain. It was enormous, and its depths were too dark to fathom.

"Why. Why, you ask…"

Song Cheonwoo stared down at the darkness spread before his feet and muttered in a low voice.

"I don't know."

"Be clear. Do you not know, or do you want to pretend you don't?"

"Do you think Lee Jungryong or I pulled some kind of trick? On him, of all people?"

"That…"

Choi fell silent. He remembered who his grandfather was.

Cheon Taemin. Humanity's immortal hero. The first and last Hunter to defeat the countless monsters that had descended upon Earth, along with their lord, the Demon King Asmodeus.

The people he saved had given him the name Slayer. It was also a mark of the reverence Hunters held for a man whose strength none of them could approach.

"I respected him, and I feared him. Lee Jungryong felt the same. If we hadn't, we wouldn't have waited years for him to wake up."

It was true. Even after Cheon Taemin, the object of their respect and fear, collapsed, Song Cheonwoo and Lee Jungryong had been unable to act easily.

Before they revealed their greed, they needed two years, countless experiments to verify his condition, and a certainty still tinged with unease.

“Then what could have…?”

At Choi’s bewildered question, Song shook his head.

“No one can guess the reason. But one thing is certain. He is still alive.”

Song had answered the question Choi meant to ask next. Choi gathered his thoughts.

“What makes you so sure?”

“If he’d died, Lee Jungryong would have had no reason to keep me alive this long.”

“…!”

“But I do not know exactly where he is being kept. For now, I merely suspect Area A.”

“Area A…”

Choi murmured the name and raised his head. Song stood at the edge of the crevasse, gazing down into it.

“I have a few more questions.”

“Ask me anything.”

Choi studied his back in silence, then said, “I want to know why.”

“…Why?”

“Why are you telling me all this now? We’re working together, but before long, I’ll be your rival again. Why give me information this important?”

The enemy of my enemy is my ally. That was all Choi Minwoo and Song Cheonwoo were to each other.

They had joined forces temporarily to bring down Go Jun and claim Ares Guild. Nothing more, nothing less.

Which made Song’s behavior all the harder to understand.

He’s changed.

Their last secret meeting had been barely a week ago. Song had been cautious then, faintly wary in both word and deed. As a man who had once been Lee Jungryong’s political rival, he knew their alliance would end the moment it achieved its goal.

So why?

Information about Cheon Taemin’s whereabouts was a secret within a secret. Considering the confrontation that would come later, it was also a powerful weapon that could force Choi Minwoo to withdraw.

It was not something he could simply disclose on a passing impulse.

Choi's fingertips touched his sword hilt. Song, who had been staring silently into the depths, slowly turned around.

"The reason."

The old man's voice was calm now. The hesitation and faint tremor it had held when they met outside the Gate were gone.

Choi felt Song's gaze move to his hand.

"Call it atonement."

Choi tightened his grip on the sword. "Atonement for what?"

"I wanted to tell you someday, even if it was late. About the wrongs I committed against him—and against you."

"More than twenty years late."

"Yes. But I had no choice."

"That's an excuse."

Choi's answer was firm.

Then—

Rrrrrumble!

The snow-covered mountain trembled beneath its blanket of white. An avalanche was taking place beyond the crevasse, which stretched dozens of meters[2659] across.

Fur-covered giants rode atop the surging waves of snow.

—Kraaaaaaaaaar!

—Kauu!

Their savage roars shook the mountain. There were hundreds of yetis charging toward them.

"That's strange," Choi murmured.

"What is?"

"Yetis usually live in groups of around a dozen."

"Yes. They used to."

Crunch. Shing.

With the crevasse at his back, Song stepped forward. Choi drew the sword at his waist—a sword left behind by a hero who had fulfilled his duty even in death.

"That's a fine sword," Song Cheonwoo muttered, taking another step.

Behind Choi, someone was already hurtling toward them.

"Young Master!"

At the old servant's shout, Song muttered, "Understand. I had no choice."

And then—

BOOM!

[2659] One meter is about 3.28 ft; a crevasse dozens of meters across is at least roughly 80 ft wide.

A thunderous explosion erupted, and a blizzard came whirling.

Chapter 578

BOOOOM!

The ground heaved under a massive wave of energy called mana, and the snow thrown into the air rose like a colossal wall.

The moment everything turned white—

Rrip.

A dazzling streak of light tore through Song Cheonwoo's sleeve and shot outward.

The slender, razor-sharp blade was an unusual weapon, modified for this one strike.

I'm sorry.

With that brief apology, unheard by anyone, Song Cheonwoo moved like a flash.

Swish.

He lowered his stance, straightened his rear leg, bent his front leg at an angle, and put his strength behind the thrust.

The motion flowed as smoothly as water, perfected through more attempts than anyone could count. Wrapped in blinding aura, the blade pierced through space.

SHWAAA!

A sharp whistle tore through the air, as though it could cut anything in its path.

Song Cheonwoo had retired from active duty and was nearing seventy, but no one could deny his strength.

The instincts engraved in his body by the Great Cataclysm—and the tremendous mana coiled within him—defied the passing years.

There was no way a youngster who wasn't even thirty could block his strike.

It's over.

Song Cheonwoo was certain.

Until, an instant later, something stopped his blade as it pierced the wall of wind and snow.

SKRAAAK!

"…!"

A powerful resistance ran up the blade. Song Cheonwoo's eyes flew wide as a thunderous roar rang out.

BOOOOM!

Mana collided with mana. The gale from the impact clawed at everything around them.

The wall of snow collapsed, and snow scattered through the air.

Beyond it was a pair of deep, steady eyes.

"So this was the trap Go Jun prepared."

Song Cheonwoo let out a low groan. Choi Minwoo had caught the strike with the flat of his sword.

“How did you…?”

It was impossible. Song Cheonwoo clearly remembered Choi Minwoo’s stay at the European regional branch several years earlier, when he had still been in his early twenties.

The youngster had possessed outstanding natural talent, but his skills had fallen far short of it.

Yet now…

Rrrrrumble.

Song Cheonwoo could feel the strength behind Choi’s sword pressing against his own.

The young man facing him was no longer a youngster. He had become a formidable fighter.

And Song Cheonwoo’s plan had suffered a major setback.

So blood really does tell.

Cheon Taemin.

The name weighed on his heart, and suddenly his sword felt heavier too. But he had come too far to turn back.

He had crossed the river long ago and sunk his own boat. If he wanted to protect the family Go Jun held captive, he could not retreat.

I have to kill him here. No matter what.

Song Cheonwoo clenched his teeth. Mana surged through his sturdy body, seemingly untouched by age.

His wrist traced an arc, and the sharp tip of his sword slid across the flat of Choi Minwoo’s blade.

Clack. Swish!

It missed by a hair. The tip grazed past Choi Minwoo’s neck and stabbed into empty air.

Sword pressure split the skin of his neck, sending a stream of blood into the air.

Someone watching cried out.

“Young Master!”

The shout held grief, urgency, and fury.

The newcomer closed the hundreds of meters[2660] between them in an instant. With a flick of his sleeve, the surrounding air grew hot.

Fwoooosh!

[2660] Hundreds of meters is an unspecified distance of at least 200 m, or about 660 ft.

Flames made of mana erupted and rose between Song Cheonwoo and the others. The snow on the mountain melted and evaporated.

Through the scorching heat, Song Cheonwoo saw the old butler approaching beyond Choi's shoulder. Choi backed away, steadying his breath.

"So you've come."

Song Cheonwoo looked calmly at Butler Kim.

Once, they had called each other older and younger brother. Butler Kim had been one of the few comrades Song trusted to watch his back on the battlefield.

For both of them, that belonged to the past.

"I resented you, but I never hated you. But…"

Fwoosh.

A fierce heat burst forth. Flames formed in midair, coiled around Butler Kim's hands, and took on a new shape.

Song Cheonwoo gazed wistfully at the man now holding a whip of fire in each hand.

"Now you finally look like yourself. The Kim Hwajong I knew."

Butler Kim—no, Kim Hwajong—gripped the fiery whips and stepped forward.

Thud.

Lava seemed to boil in eyes that had always been calm.

The old butler, who had preserved his loyalty without wavering through all the years that had passed, had returned to the vigorous figure he had been in the past.

"Shut your fucking mouth, you piece of shit."

"…!"

Choi Minwoo stared, mouth open. He had never seen Kim Hwajong like this.

Swish! FWOOSH!

Following the arc of the sword as it swung, the wall of fire separating the three of them split apart.

And Choi Minwoo saw it.

Song Cheonwoo was watching them with a calm expression. Somehow, a pure white necklace now hung around his neck.

That's…

Song Cheonwoo spoke the name of the necklace Choi knew so well.

"It's a Yeti's Necklace. When you told me to come here, I thought it was bound to be useful."

Song Cheonwoo turned his head. Beyond the crevasse, hundreds of yetis were surging down the mountain with the avalanche.

"And this time, it seems I was right. Don't you agree?"

—Kyaaaaaaar!

Watching the hundreds of yetis charge toward them, Choi Minwoo felt his grip tighten around his sword.

A Yeti's Necklace.

Choi Minwoo knew what the little necklace did. So did Kim Hwajong.

Only a few months earlier, Won Myunghoon had prepared the magic item to trap Jin Taekyung in the Black Wyvern's nest.

A slave's mark that draws in dragonkin monsters.

Even monsters had their hierarchies.

Yetis, the giants of the snowy mountains, were slaves and prey to dragonkin. But the Yeti's Necklace did more than attract dragonkin monsters.

It marked its wearer as a slave of the dragonkin—and, to yetis, as one of their own.

"You…!"

Choi Minwoo's shout toward Song Cheonwoo never finished.

RUMBLE! Rat-a-tat!

An enormous avalanche swept forward. Hundreds of yetis raced across it as though riding a wave, then leaped over the crevasse.

Song Cheonwoo was closest, but while he wore a necklace carrying a yeti's scent, he was no different from one of their own.

—Kraaaaaar!

The savage roar shook the snowfield.

Song Cheonwoo glanced at the hundreds of shadows leaping over his head and charging toward the other two before speaking.

"Hwajong. You'd better stay out of this."

"You fucking bastard! I'll tear you apart!"

Kim Hwajong roared and swung his whips of fire.

Whoooosh! BOOM!

Flames of tremendous heat swept through the air, burning everything they touched. But the hundreds of yetis had been strengthened by magical power, and the deaths of their own kind did not slow them.

If anything, the magical power rising from them grew more ferocious.

—Kraaaaaar!

"…!"

There were too many.

Kim Hwajong bit down on his lip. Then Choi Minwoo's quiet voice reached him.

"It's all right, Butler Kim."

"Young Master!"

"The yetis will only make my fight harder."

"But…!"

“Go. I’ll take care of things here.”

Kim Hwajong stopped before he could argue.

For a moment, the old butler looked into Choi Minwoo’s unwavering eyes. Then, without a word, he kicked off the ground.

He swung the fiery whips in both hands, drawing the hundreds of yetis after him.

RUMBLE!

—Kyaaaa!

The yetis moved away in pursuit of the heat. At the same time, Song Cheonwoo stepped forward.

Crunch.

He took one step through the snow. His hand blurred, and his aura-wrapped sword tore through the air on every side.

SHWAAAAK! Slice!

Aura was the essence of mana’s true power.

The razor-sharp, destructive energy surged outward, cleaving through space. Wind, snow, rock—none of them could stop it.

Only another aura could.

Swish! Slice!

Sword strikes slashed through the air without pause. Skin split, and drops of blood flew.

Choi Minwoo narrowly avoided the streaks of light cutting across him. His eyes grew steady, and he tightened his grip on his sword.

Whoooosh.

Hero’s Soul. The sword left behind by a noble hero trembled.

Pure white aura, resembling the snowy mountain, coiled around the blade and surged upward. Choi Minwoo gripped the sword tightly with both hands and smoothly rotated his upper body.

Shiiiiing.

Aura against aura. Light against light.

The instant two flashes of different colors met—

RUMBLE-RUMBLE-RUMBLE!

A massive shock wave shook the mountain. Snowdrifts within dozens of meters[2661] turned to powder and scattered.

Two pale figures streaked through the white.

Swish, swish, swish!

BOOM! CRASH!

Two figures. Two swords. Their auras cut through the air and collided.

[2661] Dozens of meters is an unspecified distance of at least 20 m, or about 66 ft.

Each clash sent out another tremendous shock wave, sweeping away snow and tearing up the ground.

Red liquid dropped onto the dark green ground, revealed for the first time in ages beneath the snow.

Trickle.

Choi Minwoo felt hot blood run down his wrist. His shoulder throbbed, and cold sweat gathered on his forehead until it touched his eyebrows.

He had no time to stop the bleeding or wipe away the sweat.

The man facing him was still raining down sword strikes filled with killing intent.

SHIIING! Slice!

The attack missed by a hair. Solid rock split like tofu.

Choi Minwoo exhaled sharply as he dodged. His opponent's face came into view, his killing intent so fierce it made Choi's whole body prickle.

Song Cheonwoo.

A hero of the Great Cataclysm, once counted among the greatest Hunters alongside Lee Jungryong. His skill was terrifying.

It was one reason he had survived despite knowing a truth that could never be allowed into the open.

Shing!

Choi Minwoo jerked his head aside. Fierce wind sent strands of hair flying. A moment slower, and it would have been his neck.

So why didn't he feel the terror of death he had felt in Sichuan?

Heh.

A quiet laugh escaped him instead. He had suddenly remembered a conversation with someone who wasn't here.

"This might sound a little crazy, but sometimes I start laughing when I'm in a situation where I feel like I'm going to die."

"You really are quite insane."

"But… whenever I start laughing, I always end up winning somehow."

Choi Minwoo didn't know why that passing conversation had come to mind now.

But at last, he felt he understood a little of what the man had meant.

I won't die.

It was faith in himself. The will to keep fighting until the very end.

Choi Minwoo had made that insight his own when, exhausted and wounded, he had walked toward thousands of monsters.

Shing. Slice!

Burning pain shot through his thigh.

Choi Minwoo twisted, staggered, and Song Cheonwoo pressed his attack even harder.

Swish, swish, swish! Slice!

This time, it was his arm.

Thunk!

Then his side.

Choi Minwoo endured the pain and kept moving forward.

He met the rain of sword strikes, taking one step, then another. The sword in his hand trembled.

Whoooom.

Hero's Soul. The sword passed down to him from a hero who had fulfilled his duty even after becoming a vengeful spirit.

A legendary blade that granted greater power to one worthy of wielding it.

Fwooooooom!

The blade shuddered. Brilliant light swelled around its aura.

Song Cheonwoo's eyes widened.

"You…!"

"One last question."

Choi Minwoo's gaze was cold, but his voice burned.

He put all his strength into a single strike.

"Have you forgotten whose blood flows through my veins?"

"…!"

Shiiing!

A massive streak of light cleaved through space.

Within the blinding flash that filled his vision, Song Cheonwoo felt a bolt of lightning cut across his chest.

Slice!

Chapter 579

Slice!

The instant a streak of light cut across his chest, Song Cheonwoo felt his vision dim.

It's hot.

It was lightning.

The kind of lightning even a hero of old—one who had left his mark on the chaotic, perilous Great Cataclysm—had been unable to stop.

Song stared at the sword in his hand, his eyes trembling. Only seconds ago, it had shone with aura. Now something sharper and more destructive had cut it in half.

Clang.

The sword slipped from his grip and clattered across the ground. A beat later, pain swept through his body.

"Cough."

Drip, drip.

Dark red blood spilled from his mouth, staining the snow. His clothes and armor split diagonally, exposing his bronze-colored torso. A fine line across his skin and taut muscles glowed red.

SHWAAA!

An enormous amount of blood burst forth like a waterfall.

It ran from his left chest to his right hip. The injury left by that bolt of lightning was devastating. It would never heal.

Song staggered backward as the strength drained from his body.

Crunch.

His unsteady foot came down on blood-soaked snow.

One step. Two steps. Three steps. And then…

Fsssh.

At the sound of piled snow falling away, Song barely managed to steady himself. A massive crevasse gaped behind him.

He could retreat no farther. There was nowhere to go forward, either.

Damn it.

His chest felt hollow. Perhaps that was the life still draining out of him.

Song raised his head. Someone was walking slowly toward him.

Choi Minwoo.

The only blood descendant of that person, whom Song had always respected and feared. He remembered the quiet words he had heard just before the lightning struck.

“Have you forgotten whose blood flows through my veins?”

But now Song saw someone else in the young man before him. Someone who was not here, who existed only in his memories. Someone he could not have watched from nearby without feeling both reverence and fear.

Song realized something he had long forgotten: Cheon Taemin’s blood flowed through Choi Minwoo’s veins.

“…Hyung[2662]?”

The word escaped between ragged breaths.

Through Song’s blood-red vision, the young man holding a brilliantly shining sword looked like his maternal grandfather. His somber eyes seemed to ask why Song had changed sides.

“Don’t come closer. Stay away!”

Song shouted with what little strength he had left and swung his sword. Or thought he did.

The hand that had dropped it moments earlier was empty. It swept through the air until someone’s firm grip stopped it.

Whooom. Thud.

Choi Minwoo seized Song’s wrist and squeezed.

Crunch.

Bones shifted out of place, and Song screamed.

“GRAAAAAH!”

Thud.

Unable to bear the pain, Song fell to his knees. Choi gazed down at him, his eyes steady. What he saw now was not Song Cheonwoo, but an old man.

Zzt, zzt, zzt.

The radiance surrounding Hero’s Soul slowly faded. The fight had already been decided.

“Stop. It’s over,” Choi said quietly.

“…!”

Song went rigid. He had lost? Impossible. It could not happen. It should not happen.

But there was no denying it.

His trembling gaze lifted to Choi, whose calm expression made the bloody fight they had just fought seem unreal.

“How? How did you…?”

“I’m not sure.”

[2662] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or a close older man.

Choi felt the immense power flowing through his body. Only a few months ago, he had been unable to sense it. It was the only gift his maternal grandfather had left him—and Jin Taekyung had torn open the wrapping and returned it to its rightful owner, along with a way to put the gift to good use.

"Perhaps… because I was stronger than you."

That was not all. Choi had believed in himself and acted with an upright heart. In return, the sword imbued with a hero's soul had granted its worthy wielder even greater strength.

He looked down at Song, his gaze unwavering.

"I won, and you lost. That is all that remains between us."

"…!"

The old man's trembling gaze gradually settled. A hoarse voice came through his bloodstained lips.

"Yes. You're right. Though I didn't expect this outcome."

"Neither did I. I never thought we'd end up here."

Anger. Hostility. A faint trace of pity for a man who had fallen so far. Choi felt all of them, but above all, he wanted to know why.

Why had Song done this? And could Choi believe what Song had told him earlier?

"Why did you do it? If we'd worked together, driving Go Jun out and taking control of Ares Guild wouldn't have been difficult."

"I know," Song answered hollowly. "I thought so too."

"Then why?"

"I had no choice. It was an offer I couldn't refuse."

Choi already knew who had made that offer.

"Go Jun. Was it all on his orders? Our alliance, everything up to now?"

"Cough. Orders?"

Song spat out more blood and gave a feeble laugh. He was plainly laughing at Go Jun.

"If it were Lee Jungryong, perhaps. But that bastard is nothing more than a powerful, immature brat. I may be a despicable and pathetic old man, but I haven't fallen so low that I would submit to the orders of some young punk. My alliance with you was entirely my own decision."

"Then—"

"I told you. It was an offer I couldn't refuse."

Choi looked into Song's fading eyes and suddenly understood what the old man still had left—and what the offer must have involved.

"Your family."

Song gave a small nod.

“I didn’t realize until after I lost to Lee Jungryong. I’d forgotten what mattered most.”

His had been a hard-fought life. Before the Great Cataclysm, he had worked day and night to support his family. During it, he had been unable to leave the battlefield. Afterward, he had begun another struggle to reach the center of power.

Losing that political struggle to Lee Jungryong had reminded him how precious his family was. Then Lee’s death had rekindled his ambition, and Song had forgotten them again.

“My absence was the root of all this. I suppose this is the price an old man paid for reaching too greedily after ambition too late in life.”

“You’re probably right.”

Choi’s answer was cold. Hearing Song lament his own choices stripped away the last of his pity.

“Because of you and Lee Jungryong, I lost the only family I had.”

His voice was cold, but fury burned beneath it.

Because of two adults’ ambitions, a child too young to know what ambition meant had been left little better than an orphan. Before he could even understand that his parents were dead, his maternal grandfather had disappeared too. Choi had lived all these years resenting him.

“…I’m sorry. It was my fault.”

“Then I suppose you wouldn’t have any objections if I burned you to death right now. Would you?”

The voice came from somewhere above them. It was not Choi’s.

Crunch.

Kim Hwajong stepped onto the ground, covered from head to toe in blue yeti blood. Flames burned in the old butler’s eyes, matching the whip of fire in his hand.

“Hwajong. It’s you.”

“Shut your fucking mouth, you bastard. Do you know how much the Young Master __”

Kim looked ready to swing the whip, but a slight glance from Choi stopped him. The old butler pressed his lips together and stepped back.

Choi turned to Song.

“Then is everything you told me about my maternal grandfather a lie as well?”

“I wish it were a lie. But it is all true. I’ve already come too far.”

Kim frowned, unable to understand what Song meant. Choi let out a breath, torn between relief and disappointment.

His grandfather was alive. That was welcome news, even if he had been unconscious for more than twenty years.

But that could wait. For now, Choi had to decide what to do with Song.

—Young Master.

Kim's message spell carried pride in Choi, fury toward Song, and a faint hope. Choi shook his head. He knew what the old butler wanted to say.

—Butler Kim. That isn't possible.

—What do you mean, it isn't possible?

—Give me a potion. We need to treat him just enough to keep him alive.

—But…!

Kim looked ready to protest, but Choi's calm gaze made him hold back. He knew Song was a crucial witness—and, while alive, evidence in his own right.

He simply wished it weren't so.

"Butler Kim."

"Damn it. All right."

Kim cursed as he handed over a mid-grade potion. Choi's eyes widened.

"Did you just swear in front of me?"

"Yes, I did. Why?"

"I'd heard a little about this, but you're nothing like the man I remember."

"This is who I am. When you were little, I watched what I did and said in case you picked it up from me."

"Why stop now…?"

"You're almost thirty now. Since things have come to this, learn from me if you want to learn. Or don't."

Is this really the man who's been by my side since I was a child?

Choi let out a quiet laugh at the old butler's gruff tone.

"Butler Kim."

"What? And stop laughing. That's no way to treat an elder."

"Thank you. For becoming my only family."

"…!"

"I've always wanted to tell you that."

After saying it, Choi could not bring himself to meet the old butler's eyes. He turned away without another word.

At the end of the path before him, an old man lay buried in the snow, waiting for death.

Click.

Choi pulled the stopper from the potion. Its delicate, fresh scent drove back the smell of blood.

Song watched him approach through eyes that seemed about to close for good.

"Are you… going to save me?"

“Do you want to live?”

“I… That’s…”

Choi felt a surge of disgust at his hesitation.

“If I had my way, I would kill you a hundred times, a thousand times over.”

“B-but my family…”

“There must be a way to help them. We’ll deal with it once we’re out of here.”

“…”

“Choose.”

Song hesitated, then nodded with a look of resignation.

Choi gazed at him coldly and slowly tipped the potion.

Hiss.

The wound began to close the moment the milky liquid touched it. It was an extremely weak recovery, but to someone, it was a lifeline that could give them enough strength for one final effort.

Crack!

Where had that strength come from?

Amid the snow exploding in every direction, Song Cheonwoo launched himself with superhuman force and slipped into the enormous crevasse.

Chapter 580

News spread quickly: a Named Monster called the Kraken had landed in Busan at the head of thousands of Mermen.

Go Se-won was one of the few who heard about it before the breaking news appeared.

A Monster Wave…

He was human, too. Busan was a major city with a population approaching five million. He had never met any of those people, but the thought of countless civilians dying still left him uneasy.

At least Jin Taekyung is there.

Step. Step.

Guild members moving through headquarters hurriedly cleared a path when they saw Go Se-won.

He strode past them and muttered, “Security Team. Respond.”

Beep.

A faint tone sounded in his earpiece, followed at once by replies.

“Team Three. Transmission complete.”

“Team Two. Transmission complete.”

“Team One. Transmission complete.”

“I’m going to see a VIP. Open Area A and report your current locations and personnel.”

Go Se-won intended to ask his superior for permission to send the security teams to Busan.

It would help rescue people, and it would also help repair Ares Guild’s recently damaged image.

But as the team leaders reported in one after another, he frowned.

“All of Team Three are monitoring the target’s family in London.”

“All of Team Two have returned from London and are standing by in headquarters’ Area A.”

“Team One has nine members present. We’ve returned from London and are standing by on the hundredth floor of headquarters.”

“Team Leader of Team One. Say that again. What did you say?”

“Team One has nine members present. We’re standing by on the hundredth floor __”

“Forget the rest.”

Go Se-won stepped onto a magic circle as he spoke in a quiet voice.

Whoosh.

White light flared as the Teleport spell activated, taking him to Area A.

“Why nine instead of ten?”

“An urgent matter came up.”

“An urgent matter. Who’s missing?”

“Kim Ho-jung.”

“Kim Ho-jung?”

“Yes.”

Listening to the Team Leader’s dry voice, Go Se-won crossed the hallway in Area A. His mood soured with each sharp click of his dress shoes.

“That’s strange. I don’t recall receiving a report.”

“My apologies.”

“I’m asking for a reason, not an apology. Did he leave without permission?”

“Of course not.”

Of course he didn’t.

The security team was a pack of hunting dogs raised by the late Lee Jungryong.

For a long time, Lee Jungryong had secretly operated enormous orphanages and children’s homes, instilling loyalty in orphans who had nowhere else to go.

Go Se-won had been one of them. So had the others.

Team One, in particular, was made up of only the most loyal and capable. A member going AWOL was less likely than a Monster Wave.

Especially a member like Kim Ho-jung.

Which means…

Ares Guild had plenty of senior executives and elders, but the security team took orders from only two people.

Kim Ho-jung had vanished without reporting to Go Se-won, one of those two. That could mean only one thing.

Step.

His unimpeded stride came to an abrupt halt.

Go Se-won silently stared at a door with no nameplate or decoration when a bright voice rang out from beyond it.

“Come in. Don’t loiter out there.”

“…!”

Go Se-won swallowed and opened the door. His one direct superior was waiting in the neatly kept room.

“Nice weather today. Don’t you think, Team Leader Go?”

“Yes.”

Go Se-won bowed briefly, his gaze sweeping the room.

The pleasant smile at Go Jun's lips. The whiskey glass in his hand. And the object he was rolling around in his other hand.

What is that?

Go Jun was not acting like himself. Everything about the room felt unfamiliar and unsettling.

Perhaps it was the noise working its way into Go Se-won's ears.

Grind. Grate.

Go Jun's voice mingled with the irritating friction.

"You don't need to worry about Kim Ho-jung, Team Leader Go. I gave him a separate assignment."

"I see."

"Aren't you curious what it was?"

Their eyes met. Go Jun's looked unusually red today. Go Se-won lowered his head politely.

"No. If it was your order, Vice Guild Master, I'm sure you had a reason."

"That's good to hear. I thought you'd been feeling a little slighted lately. I am younger than you, after all, and you were always particularly devoted to Master."

"How could I? It's true that I owe the former Vice Guild Master a great deal, but that does not diminish my loyalty."

"Is that so? Then that's a relief."

Grind.

Go Jun rubbed the object in his hand again. Smiling, he swirled his glass.

"It's a nice day. Care to join me for a drink?"

Go Se-won answered evenly. "I'm sorry, but…"

"You mean you won't drink? What a shame. It's good liquor."

Go Jun leisurely emptied his glass. Go Se-won watched him in silence before suddenly speaking.

"There's an urgent matter I need to report."

"Go on."

"In Busan…"

Go Se-won trailed off. Beside the glass Go Jun had set down was a holographic PC.

The paused screen showed an enormous octopus and the shattered remains of Gwangan Bridge.

"What about Busan?"

"…"

After a moment, Go Se-won murmured, "You already know."

Go Jun gave a low laugh.

"I did. Before anyone else."

His voice was as cheerful as ever. Go Se-won's heart sank.

As the unease he had tried to dismiss revealed its true shape, he forced himself to speak calmly.

"Then is Kim Ho-jung… in Busan right now?"

"I seem to remember you saying you weren't curious a moment ago."

"I'm sorry. That slipped out."

"It's fine. You need to know anyway."

Go Jun answered pleasantly as he filled his empty glass with whiskey.

"That's right. Kim Ho-jung is in Busan on my orders."

He paused to think, then added, "Though he might not be there anymore."

"…!"

"Don't just stand there. Sit down and have a drink. My neck hurts from looking up at you."

This time Go Se-won could not refuse. No, he had no reason to. He needed a drink to steady himself.

Gulp, gulp.

He drained the strong whiskey in one go. Only then did he feel able to breathe.

Holding the empty crystal glass, he hesitated before forcing out the words.

"Vice Guild Master. I don't know how you managed to cause this, but it won't do much damage to them."

"Why do you think that?"

"Because he's—because Jin Taekyung is there. He even killed an Arch Lich. He's already bringing the Monster Wave under control. This will only add to the Peace Guild's Fame."

"Yes. Jin Taekyung. Quite a man."

Go Se-won had risked his superior's anger by mentioning the name. Instead, the smile stayed on Go Jun's face.

And that gentle smile made Go Se-won feel even more uneasy.

"Vice Guild Master. Don't tell me…"

"If you want to capture the commander, you have to lure out the general. There'll be an uproar if anyone finds out, but no consequences to worry about afterward."

"…!"

"We can't do anything about Jin Taekyung right now. Choi Minwoo is another matter. Don't you agree?"

Grind. Grate.

Along with the irritating sound of friction, one name flashed through Go Se-won's mind like a bolt of lightning.

"Song Cheonwoo. It's Song Cheonwoo."

"Correct. I'll give you another drink as your reward."

Go Se-won accepted it, hiding the tremor in his fingers. He could not begin to grasp how far things had gone wrong.

Even now, though, he was certain his superior's plan would fail.

"…Choi Minwoo is a cautious man. On the surface, he is the master of the Peace Guild, and he also has Kim Hwajong, who has served him loyally at his side for a long time."

"I know. Master told me about Kim Hwajong more than once. And with the other guards there, Song Cheonwoo can't manage it alone."

"Vice Guild Master. Then why in the world—"

GRRAAATE!

The loud sound of friction drowned out Go Se-won's voice.

Go Jun gave a quiet laugh instead of answering and opened his hand. At last, Go Se-won saw what he had been holding.

It was the size of an egg, and the darkness inside looked as though someone had gathered up the abyss and sealed it there.

"A Magic Gem…"

An ordinary Magic Gem would not have surprised him.

But the one in Go Jun's palm could only have come from a Named Monster. It was what people called an S-grade Magic Gem.

Pure, unrefined magical power swirled inside.

"V-Vice Guild Master."

Only now did Go Se-won understand how Go Jun had been able to cause the Monster Wave artificially.

At the dread in his voice, Go Jun murmured, "Choi Minwoo will die today. He will."

And Choi Minwoo's killer would be one of two: an old man whose family had been taken hostage, or another being whose identity even Go Jun could not clearly determine.

"One thing is certain. Song Cheonwoo has no choice."

Go Jun murmured the words quietly, then smiled with satisfaction.

He reached up out of habit to stroke the old necklace around his neck. Darkness flickered in his eyes.

If anyone had asked how Song Cheonwoo could still move in his condition, he would have answered in one word.

Will.

That was all it was: the last of his strength, drawn out by sheer force of will. The old man, now entering his seventies, threw himself toward death with everything he had left.

Flash! Whoosh!

The world slowed.

The cold touch of snow vanished. For an instant, his whole body felt weightless.

In that moment, split into fragments of a second, Song Cheonwoo met two pairs of eyes staring wide at him.

Choi Minwoo and Kim Hwajong. Their eyes seemed to ask the same thing.

Why?

Song answered them silently.

Because there's no other way.

A few days earlier, he might have taken Choi Minwoo's hand.

But the last time he had faced Go Jun, the man had become… a monster.

Song had seen madness in his eyes. If Song left this place alive, Go Jun would kill his family without a moment's hesitation.

Neither the Peace Guild, nor even Jin Taekyung or "that person," could resolve that problem.

So this is how it ends.

With that fleeting thought, Song fell toward the pitch-black darkness.

He could see no end to it. It looked like a monster's gaping maw—and like his own life.

Was it Nietzsche?

Someone had said that if you gazed into the abyss, you became the abyss yourself.

Song understood that now, but too late. Everything was already too late.

SHWAAAA!

A cold, fierce wind battered him.

Through its howl, he seemed to hear a conversation from a few days ago.

"This."

"Keep it with you. You know how dangerous it is, Director. Expensive, too."

"…You bastard. You're insane."

"Then you'll have to go insane as well. If you want to save your family."

The man had been insane, and it had been an insane conversation.

Song had agonized over it, each day feeling like ten years. Yet in the end, he had never used it.

Was that the last thing I did right?

The wind grew fiercer. Song sensed something drawing near in the darkness and closed his eyes.

Crack! Crunch, crunch, crunch!

His long fall ended.

His neck broke first. Then the bones throughout his body shattered.

Then, through his fading consciousness, Song heard something growl.

—Grrrr.

It was the eerie cry of a monster unlike any he had heard before.

He wanted to say something, but the being that had crouched in the abyss for so many years allowed its prey no last words.

CRUNCH!

Darkness came.

Enormous teeth crushed his lifeless body and swallowed his blood.

They swallowed the thing deep in his pocket, too—the thing he had refused to use to the very end, wanting to die a human rather than a monster.

Whoosh.

Darkness itself turned to light and burst forth.

Chapter 581

Whump! BOOM!

A whip of fire lashed the ground. Piled snow melted, and yeti blood boiled. Kim Hwajong's voice came through his clenched teeth as if he were chewing the words before spitting them out.

"Song Cheonwoo, you fucking bastard…"

The old butler's wide-open eyes were fixed on the spot where someone had been lying only seconds ago.

If this was how it was going to end—if that bastard was going to meet a death like this—Hwajong should have killed him with his own hands. But Song Cheonwoo had summoned the last of some unknown strength, thrown himself into the deep crevasse, and met the death he had chosen for himself.

It was too good an end for a traitor. Worse still…

"We've lost an important witness. I'm sorry, Young Master."

"No."

Choi Minwoo shook his head at Kim Hwajong's sigh-like murmur. His gaze remained fixed on the crevasse whose depth could not be estimated.

"You have nothing to apologize for, Butler Kim. I should have been more careful."

Victory dulled vigilance. Perhaps all the more so after a fight that had been anything but easy. Choi poured the potion—still more than three-quarters full—over himself.

Hiss.

The sound of flesh burning filled the air as his wounds began to close little by little. Feeling a faint pain, he continued.

"Song Cheonwoo must have thought this was the only way to save his family."

"…"

"I understand his situation, but… he must have been more desperate than we realized."

Kim Hwajong muttered roughly, "Damn fool. There wasn't even any guarantee this would save his family. Why do it?"

"He must have been that afraid. People cling to hope even in despair, don't they?"

Choi answered quietly and took his eyes off the crevasse. He could not tell exactly how deep it was, but the drop had to be hundreds of meters.[2663] Song had already been at death's door. His chances of surviving the fall were close to zero.

"We should call the Guild members. No—it would be faster to have the Guild House send people."

[2663] Hundreds of meters is roughly hundreds to thousands of feet; 100 m is about 328 ft.

After more than twenty years together, Kim Hwajong knew at once what he meant.

"You want to recover his body?"

"I don't know if we can, but we have to try. Song Cheonwoo is still Ares Guild's European regional branch director."

Death would not erase his position. If they could prove even half of what had happened here, the repercussions would reach beyond the impregnable fortress that was Ares Guild and shake Go Jun himself.

"Attempted murder, murder-for-hire—whatever the charge, it will stain even Ares Guild's Vice Guild Master. Especially now."

A fortress built through decades of effort did not crumble easily. But Go Jun was different. Choi Minwoo intended to use every bit of power at his disposal to unseat him as lord of that fortress.

"We're going to be busier than ever. Both of us."

Kim Hwajong smiled with pride.

"I've been waiting for this day."

"I'm glad. That you're always at my side."

"Then put me to work before I get any older, Young Master. We'll make that bastard Go Jun regret doing this."

"That's the plan."

Choi nodded and walked away from the crevasse. Whether from his fierce fight with Song or the blood he had lost, exhaustion swept through him and made every step heavy.

Then, as his consciousness gradually grew hazy and he retraced the path he had taken, Choi Minwoo came to an abrupt stop.

Splash.

Muddy water mixed with snow and blood sprayed around him. Kim Hwajong, who had been following behind him, asked in confusion,

"Young Master?"

Choi Minwoo did not answer. He silently stared down at his foot, half-submerged in a puddle of murky water, then suddenly muttered,

"Regret."

"Yes?"

"You said we'd make Go Jun regret doing this."

"I did. Is there a problem…?"

"We left out why. Why did Go Jun do it?"

Choi looked at the puddle. A single step had splashed the water and sent ripples across it. Why, then, had Go Jun sent Song Cheonwoo, a member of Ares Guild, to assassinate him?

Because Song was powerful? Because he was a traitor?

Neither.

It's a trap.

The thought struck like lightning. Choi began to tremble.

Not from the shock of his realization, and certainly not from exhaustion.

No. His body was not the only thing that had been trembling from the beginning.

Rumble…

Fresh ripples spread across the puddle as it was settling, and a heap of snow that had yet to melt collapsed. The ground was shaking. Terrified yetis cried out across the trembling mountain.

At the center of it all came a tremendous rumble.

Crack—RUMBLE, RUMBLE!

Choi and Kim Hwajong turned together. The ground split in a spiderweb of cracks, thin fractures running back toward the darkness behind them.

Crack! Crack-crack-crack!

The crevasse.

An enormous darkness whose end could not be seen opened its jaws. Darkness poured from the widening gap.

Darkness—no. Immense magical power shook the mountain and tore through space-time.

SHWAAAA!

And the two men saw what lay beyond the split in space: a boundless blue sky and buildings.

The world they had lived in. The world they were meant to go on living in.

"…Monster Wave."

Two worlds that touched but should never have been connected had become linked. A roar announcing the beginning of the disaster reverberated in every direction.

—GRAAAAAAAH!

Facing the abyss as it finally revealed itself, Kim Hwajong stepped in front of his young master, his gaze darker than ever.

Step.

A snowstorm swept around them. Blackened by magical power, it was no longer white—or beautiful.

"Team Leader, how about a drink?"

A team member came over with a soju[2664] bottle and an easy grin. The Team Leader answered curtly.

"No, asshole."

Despite his words, his glass was already being raised ever so slightly. The team member grinned as if he knew everything and filled the empty glass.

Glug, glug, glug.

The Team Leader threw back the full glass in one gulp, then dipped a piece of flounder sashimi deep in the spicy-sweet sauce and swallowed it. The chewy bite lifted his mood a little.

"…Shit. At least it tastes good."

"Right? This place is famous in the Hunter community."

"Really?"

"Yeah. Search for it and you'll find plenty of reviews. People say it's perfect for a drink after a raid."

"Of course the drinks taste good to them. They finish a raid and pick up plenty of Magic Gems. They didn't come away empty-handed like me."

"…Oh, boy. Here he goes again."

The Team Leader smacked his lips. If he belonged to a Guild, it would hardly matter whether a raid came to nothing. But he led a freelance Hunter team. That meant paying the daily wages of everyone laughing and chatting around him, even if the money had to come out of his own pocket.

Including this shameless bastard who had come over to him.

"You're not mad, are you, Team Leader?"

"Forget it, punk. Pour me another."

"Yes, sir."

The team member snapped a salute and poured. The Team Leader gave a quiet laugh and looked out beyond the railing.

The raid had fallen through, but drinking while looking over the landscape, white from a recent snowfall, was not so bad.

Pyeongchang really does have nice scenery. The scenery, anyway.

That was probably why they had built so many ski resorts around here.

He kept emptying his glass as he took in the view. The crowds at the ski resort and the gondolas running nonstop up and down the mountain showed just how little sense those people had.

"Hey. Isn't this funny?"

The team member looked up from the sashimi he had been devouring.

"What is?"

[2664] Soju is a Korean distilled alcoholic drink.

“There’s a Gate right up on that mountain, and magical power has risen by seven percent. They’re still out there doing this shit.”

Worse, when he came down and checked the news, he had learned that a Monster Wave had broken out in Busan. The Team Leader shook his head.

“Then again, when COVID broke out while I was a kid, there were idiots who still went skiing.”

“Melona?”[2665]

“…Never mind. Just keep stuffing your face.”

He sighed and drained his glass. Thinking about what must be happening in Busan made his chest tighten.

“Uh—uh-oh! Oh, whoa! Whoa, whoa, whoa!”

“What?”

“…Why is she doing that again?”

Everyone turned toward the outburst. A female Hunter in her twenties, who had been deep in thought for a while, was waving her smartphone wildly.

“Wow! No way! This is insane!”

The Team Leader looked at her with concern.

“Yeah. Seems like it.”

“No, not that! I told you earlier, didn’t I? I thought I recognized that masked, incredibly handsome guy up there!”

The Team Leader recalled the Hunters they had encountered, particularly the young man at the back.

“Yeah. Thanks to them, our raid was a bust.”

“But it’s him! Wow, that’s incredible. Kim Sohye, how did you spot him? Are your eyes really that good?”

“I’m about to lose my mind listening to you. Could you please tell me what you’re talking about?”

“Look! Right here!”

She thrust the phone in front of his face. He frowned, then saw the face on the screen and opened his eyes wide.

“What the hell? Is this for real? They do look alike, I guess…”

“I’m telling you, it’s him! You don’t trust me, Team Leader?”

“No.”

“Ah, damn it! This time I’m certain, so believe me! I’ve got an eye for this that I honed through thirty years of idol fandom!”

“You’re twenty-five. Was your father a fan too?”

“Anyway, I’m right! If I’m wrong, you don’t have to pay me today!”

[2665] Melona is a Korean melon-flavored ice cream bar; its name echoes “Corona” in the original wordplay.

A slave to capitalism had put her day's wages on the line. Only then did the Team Leader start to believe her. He was curious, too.

If it's true… why would someone that important come all the way here?

Beside a face handsome enough to belong to a celebrity, the phone displayed a short article.

> Peace Guild Team Leader Choi Minwoo: "The Emergency Rescue Team Is for Everyone"

A big shot. A very big shot.

The Team Leader had not seen the masked man's face clearly, but the calm eyes and distinctive air in the photograph did seem familiar.

If it really was him, the other Hunters must be Peace Guild members too.

Choi Minwoo had become famous enough recently that the Team Leader had heard about him several times. But even if only half of those stories were true, the man should have been too busy to breathe. Why would he lead his Guild members to a B-grade Gate in Pyeongchang?

Wait. Then that older man I saw on the way down…

Before he could finish the thought—

RUMBLE, RUMBLE, RUMBLE!

A tremendous vibration began to sweep through the area. For an instant, every sound fell silent, and everyone turned their heads in the same direction as if they had planned it.

The Team Leader noticed what was wrong first. He had already been looking there before the shaking began.

…That place…

The place he had climbed toward with such high hopes, only to come back down empty-handed.

The B-grade Gate known as Yeti's Winter Range.

The next moment, what appeared in the Team Leader's widened eyes was part of the mountain slowly collapsing, with pitch-black darkness settling over it. Amid the wreckage of collapsing gondolas and buildings, a dreadful roar shook him to his core.

—GRAAAAAAAH!

A Monster Wave.

And there were still people inside the Gate.

Overcome by suffocating terror, the Team Leader forced out a voice he had barely managed to squeeze together.

"Report it! Right now!"

A frightened question came back.
“W-where?”
“The Hunter Association, the Peace Guild, Jin Taekyung—anywhere! Right now!”

Chapter 582

What could they call it?

Choi Minwoo, Kim Hwajong, and the twenty elite Peace Guild Hunters guarding the Gate from outside all had the same question. None of them could answer it.

They could only stare in disbelief at it, now standing in their world.

—GRAAAAAAAH!

A thunderous roar shook the sky.

It was a hippopotamus, an elephant, an ox, and a rhinoceros all at once. Yet it was none of them.

It was too enormous, too powerful, to be called a beast.

Whoooosh. CRUNCH!

A single step—and the impact was tremendous.

Its huge foreleg crushed the Gate control station beneath a shadow that stretched more than ten meters[2666] in every direction. The ground shook as if an earthquake had struck. The cable running down the mountain snapped, and a gondola fell.

Then, from a memory long buried, Kim Hwajong recalled a monster's name.

"…Behemoth."

Behemoth. Or Behemos.

A monster whose name came from the Hebrew word for "beast." Traces of the mythical creature that had risen from the deep, dark abyss could even be found in the Bible.

> Look at Behemoth. Just as I made you, I made it too.
>
> It grazes grass like an ox.

But the Bible was wrong.

Kim Hwajong did not know what being had made the monster before him, but Behemoth was nothing like a peaceful creature that grazed on grass and drank from ponds.

CRUNCH! CRRRUNCH!

—Kwooh! Kwoooooh!

Behemoth was not the only thing to emerge from the Gate.

Some two hundred yetis fled into the world, their cries sounding like screams. They were Behemoth's first targets.

The enormous creature trampled and devoured them without mercy, though they were both its kind and its subordinates.

[2666] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

SHAAK! Thud-thud-thud!

Blue blood fell like rain.

Four legs like temple pillars stamped across the earth. Each time tusks resembling an elephant's ivory scraped the ground, severed monster limbs and blood flew into the air.

A trembling voice escaped someone's lips.

"T-This…"

The sight alone was enough to bring despair.

Everyone stood frozen, staring blankly as the yetis met their gruesome deaths.

Then—

FWOOOOSH!

Beyond the black mist that had settled around them, dazzling light surged upward. Its warmth pushed back the mist, spreading little by little.

Only then did the onlookers release the breaths they had been holding and search for its source.

Twenty-odd pairs of eyes found a young man holding a sword that blazed with light. His own eyes shone brighter than ever.

"Everyone, behind me."

"…!"

The moment his calm voice reached them, the Peace Guild Hunters realized they had broken free of the Fear emanating from Behemoth.

And one person watching the scene trembled with emotion.

This is…

The feeling was deeply familiar and achingly distant. Kim Hwajong remembered a face whose features had grown faint with time and murmured, "So you were here."

Past and present overlapped. What Kim Hwajong saw reflected in his eyes was Cheon Taemin and Choi Minwoo at the same time—and Choi Minwoo and Cheon Taemin at the same time.

Song Cheonwoo had seen the same thing and felt despair. But even in this perilous moment, joy welled up from deep within the old butler's chest.

He took his place beside the young man, who had stood alone in the light.

FWOOSH!

Long, fierce whips of flame formed in his hands. Choi Minwoo met his gaze, his expression composed.

"We have to stop it. No matter what it takes."

There was no retreat in his voice. Below them, screams were already rising from those who had noticed what was happening.

"Aaaah!"

"A-Aaaah!"

—GRAAAAAAAH!

As Behemoth slaughtered the yetis, its roar sent the snow piled on the mountain sliding down like a wave.

More than a thousand people were scattering in every direction, their shrill screams carrying up the slope. Even if luck let them escape the monster for now, they would be its next targets.

Choi Minwoo, Kim Hwajong, and the Peace Guild Hunters knew it. They also knew they could not take on the monster by themselves.

"T-Team Leader."

They all possessed the strength of high-level Hunters, but their opponent was a monster that appeared only in mythology.

Choi Minwoo answered the frightened voice.

"I won't force you. If you want to run, run."

Before anyone could begin to murmur, he continued quietly.

"But don't forget the choice you made here. Ask yourselves whether you can still call yourselves Hunters."

"…!"

The wavering in their eyes stopped. The sword in Choi Minwoo's hand shone brighter than ever.

[Hero's Soul]. An ego sword that granted power worthy of a hero only to those who qualified.

Hummm. Fwoooosh.

The blade shook fiercely. Light burst from it in a flash, driving back the darkness, and its warmth enveloped them all.

By then, Choi Minwoo's eyes had turned golden. Reflected in them was Behemoth, which had finished devouring every last one of its kind.

"Wasn't the power we received given to us for a day like this?"

Not one person here was an exception. Each had been chosen one day by someone unknown and given power beyond the ordinary.

And that power came with duty and a sense of responsibility.

Hunters.

Swords that defended humanity. Shields against the threats it faced. Guardians who had to stand at the forefront of every battle against monsters.

Their wealth and fame might have dulled that ideal, but its pure essence remained.

"Attack formation. Take your positions."

Step.

Choi Minwoo advanced. The light moved with him, and Kim Hwajong and the twenty Hunters followed.

They formed an arrowhead as they approached. Their figures appeared in the enormous eyes of the monster that had just finished its first meal in this new world.

—G. R. A. A. A. A. H.

Behemoth let out a cry that sounded almost like a sneer. Though it had devoured hundreds of yetis, it was still hungry—ready to trample, chew, and swallow the humans approaching it with their irritating light.

—Come. Hu. Mans.

No one there understood Behemoth's Demon Realm language.

But its meaning reached them all.

Shing. Fwoosh.

Weapons were drawn. Magic surged up through staffs and hands.

Twenty-two Hunters shone in the deep darkness, bathed in the sword's radiance. They were drawn taut as a bowstring, and Choi Minwoo's shout loosed them.

"Charge!"

Their battle cry was loud enough to leave their ears ringing. Together, they shot forward as a single arrow.

SHWAAAAAAK!

A streak of light cut through the darkness. At its tip, the monster roared as if the sound had been dragged up from the abyss.

—KWOAAAAAAH!

The next moment—

BOOOOM! CRRRUNCH!

Shouts and roars, light and darkness, collided.

—Kik!

"Shut your mouth, you fucking bastard."

Wham!

The Merman's head vanished with a heavy impact.

I didn't bother checking whether it was dead. Before the body hit the ground, I launched myself forward and cut off the fleeing Mermen.

"You shit all over the place, and now you're running? What kind of business ethics is that? Huh?"

—K-Kiiik.

Their cries were desperate pleas to live. Too late. They were monsters, and I was human.

Besides, if they had crawled all the way to Busan and shit everywhere, they had to pay compensation for it.

An eye for an eye. A life for a life.

I swung White Flame without hesitation.

Whoosh!

Flames surged along the spearhead and swept sideways.

Fire Dragon's Single Tail. The fire dragon's tail, packed with immense heat, lashed some fifty Mermen in a single stroke. Screams rose with the horrific stench of burning flesh.

—KIEEEEEEK!

A pitiful death cry.

I flashed past the nearest Merman.

Slice.

Through my heightened senses, I felt its head lift into the air and heard the faint sound of the cut.

But I wasn't done.

Some five hundred Mermen had gathered here, looking for a way out. That meant some five hundred monsters I had to kill.

Slice. Slice. Shhhhhk!

Limbs flew amid sprays of blood. Everything in my spear's path was severed. From my outstretched palm burst the force of Flame Divine Palm, burning some twenty Mermen.

Fwoosh! KRAAAASH!

It was hot.

The asphalt melting under the extreme heat was hot. So were the tires of the car spinning uselessly after slamming into the side of a bus.

And my heart, as I looked at the driver dead behind the wheel, his foot still on the accelerator.

Drip. Drip.

Blood ran down the hood from the shattered windshield. Even a state-of-the-art airbag had apparently failed to stop the trident that had pierced the glass and lodged in the driver's chest.

The middle-aged man's eyes were empty, their light gone. A family photograph hung from the rearview mirror like a talisman, soaked in blood.

Middle-aged parents. A boy who looked to be in elementary school, and a girl who looked younger still.

The worst fucking part was that everyone in the photograph was inside the car. None of them was smiling anymore. All of them were covered in blood.

"You fucking bastards!"

Fwoosh! KRAAAASH!

The flames blazed fiercer and swallowed the monsters.

I cut through the path they made, swinging my spear. I cut, split, tore, and smashed without stopping.

Amid the heat and the evaporating blood, a thought came to me.

Maybe.

Maybe they had been on a trip too. Maybe this was their first family trip to Busan in years, and they had been laughing and chatting when the monsters appeared.

Maybe the father and son had looked toward nearby Gwangan Bridge and made a promise they would never get to keep.

Crack!

My fist punched through hard scales and crushed bone and flesh.

I watched the Merman silently as it let out a short groan. Then I grabbed the warm, pulpy thing my hand had touched and tore it out.

SPURT! Thud!

Green blood splashed across my face as I pulled my hand out. The stench was horrific, but I was already drenched in blood.

Eyes wide, I dropped the heart I had just ripped out onto the fallen Merman's body.

Plop.

I didn't like the disbelief in its eyes or the look on its face, as though it thought it had been wronged. So I stomped on it.

CRUNCH. Pop.

Only then did I realize no more monsters were coming at me. None were fleeing. None were alive.

I stood in a pool of green blood, breathing hard, when—

"…Wicked human. You."

"Why?"

The Skeleton King met my eyes as I turned. It sighed.

"No. Never mind."

For a moment, I wondered what I looked like to it. I didn't ask. The eyes of the hundred or so Hunters behind it gave me a fair idea.

"We're done here."

At the dry voice that sounded strangely unfamiliar even to me, a Hunter who appeared to be a superior jolted and answered, "Huh? Ah, yes. Yes."

"How are things elsewhere?"

“T-Those were the last ones. We were gathering our forces to hit them all at once, but…”

Gulp.

He swallowed and went on.

“It looks like everything has been taken care of.”

“Good, then. You worked hard too.”

I patted the Skeleton King’s shoulder and started walking again. When someone asked where I was going, I answered briefly.

“To save people. The ones dying right now. The ones who’ve survived this long.”

I was tired—more mentally than physically. But I couldn’t rest.

Somewhere, people were still waiting for rescue, facing the terror of death. I had to save at least one of them.

And then—

Splash.

My foot left a print of green blood on the city asphalt.

Bzzzt. Bzzzt.

An irritating electronic buzz sounded, and a billboard high on a building flickered. Through the static appeared a familiar face.

A face so handsome it was almost irritating.

Team Leader Choi.

A small inset image appeared beside him, along with a caption.

> Peace Guild Hunter Choi Minwoo. Caught up in the Monster Wave in Pyeongchang…

God fucking damn it.

Chapter 583

Team Leader Choi. Pyeongchang. Monster Wave.

The three words hit me all at once, leaving my thoughts in a jumble.

But the footage filling the electronic billboard gave me no time to think.

—Kwooooom!

“Aaaahhh!”

“An avalanche!”

People fled, screaming.

They hadn’t even thought to take off their ski equipment. They waddled forward, stumbled, and fell as a vast mass of snow and shattered rock came pouring down behind them.

—BOOOM!

The snow swept over dozens of people like a wave. Blood sprayed amid the thunderous roar.

A building crushed by the falling rock went up in flames. Beyond the surging fire lay the source of it all.

—Ruuuumble!

The sun had not yet set, but the sky above that place was dark.

Black clouds hung over a mountain peak I didn’t recognize. Each flash of dazzling light between them brought a tremendous tremor and a deafening boom.

A Monster Wave.

I knew it instinctively. Where light and darkness met, a battle was deciding the fate of thousands.

And Team Leader Choi, Butler Kim, and the Peace Guild Hunters were risking their lives against a named monster.

An announcer’s voice came through the static.

“The government has declared the Pyeongchang area of Gyeonggi Province a disaster zone and dispatched emergency support forces. Meanwhile, the Monster Wave in Busan…”

I had no reason to listen any longer. No time, either.

I spun toward the Hunters staring blankly at the billboard high on the building and shouted.

“Mages!”

“Y-Yes?”

“Mages, step forward! We have to get to Pyeongchang with Teleport! Right now!”

My shout, charged with internal energy, jolted them as though they’d woken from a nightmare. A few raised their hands hesitantly.

One A-grade mage and six B-grade mages. But their faces were grim.

“I-I’m sorry, but it would be difficult for us to cast Teleport on our own.”

“What?”

“We’ve all just fought monsters. Our mana fatigue is severe, and we’d have to draw a Teleport magic circle. Under these circumstances…”

Their voices trailed off as they looked around.

Victims’ bodies and monster carcasses lay everywhere. The roads had been torn apart.

Teleport was notoriously difficult even for high-ranking mages. These were about the worst conditions imaginable for casting it.

Skeleton King had been watching. Now he spoke, his face twisted.

“You stupid hu—bastards. Do you think this is the time to worry about conditions? Do it. Please? Fuck. Being polite is hard.”

He was barely holding back his anger, but the menacing aura leaking from him made the mages swallow hard.

“B-But we can’t help it. It’s too dangerous.”

“We can’t do it. Even if we somehow succeeded, it’s over 250 kilometers[2667] from Busan to Pyeongchang. We can’t cover that distance in a single jump.”

“Try! Just find some way to try!”

Skeleton King had said exactly what I wanted to say.

But I knew the mages weren’t making excuses. They weren’t Magic Johnson.

The dark-skinned Grand Mage who had sent me into a chaotic battlefield in Sichuan, China, without even a magic circle was probably on another continent by now.

Damn it.

Sticky blood dripped from my clenched fist. I couldn’t tell if it was mine or a monster’s. Maybe both.

“Is there another way?”

A middle-aged Hunter who seemed to be the highest-ranking one there answered anxiously.

“We contacted headquarters a little while ago. They’re looking for a high-ranking mage in Busan who can cast Teleport, but…”

His voice trailed off. His face was grim.

That told me enough. I urged him again to hurry, then clenched my teeth.

Damn it.

Their opponent was a named monster. One as powerful as the Kraken, or worse.

[2667] 250 kilometers is about 155 miles.

How much longer could they hold out against a monster whose might was conveyed even through the footage? How many of them would survive?

Just a little longer. Please, hold out a little longer.

I made the plea silently, knowing it would never reach them, and sat down cross-legged.

Until they found a mage, I needed to recover whatever strength I could.

"Whew."

I closed my eyes and tried to calm the anxiety and rage boiling inside me. Darkness filled my vision.

Through it flashed the faces of those fighting in a darkness deeper still.

Please… survive.

Until I get there.

Whoooosh.

Powerful internal energy, carrying my desperate wish, spread through every limb and bone.

The trunk swept through the air, long and enormous.

Like an elephant's, it knocked aside the incoming spells and arrows, then came hurtling toward the ground.

Whoooosh!

A deep shadow fell across the people below. Choi Minwoo gritted his teeth, sprang forward, and shouted.

"Scatter!"

Fwap-fwap-fwap!

Figures leaped like the wind and scattered in every direction. They moved like the high-ranking Hunters they were, at the top of the Hunter hierarchy.

But if they were A-grade Hunters, the enemy before them was a named monster out of ancient myth.

—GRAAAAAAAH!

Behemoth.

The monster that had risen from the depths of the abyss into the mortal world roared. Its powerful Fear seized souls and stilled movement, shaking the Hunters as they fled.

"Gasp!"

"Hk…!"

Two Peace Guild Hunters had strayed beyond the light of Hero's Soul. They caught their breath sharply.

Without their extensive combat experience and strong wills, they might have fainted or gone mad on the spot.

But even the momentary chaos brought on by Fear was enough for the cunning monster to achieve the result it wanted.

“No!”

Behemoth moved half a beat before Choi Minwoo’s warning. That was enough to seal their fate.

Whoom—CRUNCH!

A gust of wind erupted from empty air and slammed into the earth.

Their armor bore high-level defensive magic. Their muscles had been trained to their limits, and their vitality was tenacious.

None of it could withstand the blow. It broke and crushed everything.

“Ghk. Cough!”

Dark red blood burst out with their dying cries. Bones, flesh, even their organs had ruptured. Not even a top-grade potion could save them.

For an instant, Choi Minwoo met both pairs of fading eyes. He gritted his teeth.

Again…!

They had died. Died, and died again.

Trampled beneath enormous forefeet. Impaled on tusks. Crushed by that swinging trunk.

Of the twenty-two Hunters, including himself and Kim Hwajong, more than half had died horribly. Without the potions they’d brought, he would have watched even more of them die.

And now the potions were nearly gone.

Damn it.

Choi Minwoo clenched his teeth. The ache from a broken molar had faded without his noticing. He could no longer feel the blood running from his split lip.

Only anger and determination remained.

They kept him from collapsing in despair. They drove him past his fear and toward Behemoth.

“Young Master!”

Whoosh!

Kim Hwajong’s anguished cry fell behind him as he kicked off the ground, mana surging through his steps.

He shot forward like a ray of light. Something split the air above his head, and Choi Minwoo twisted aside with all his strength.

Whoom—BOOOM!

The ground shook. Snow scattered, and shards of rock scraped his forehead. Red blood ran across his vision. The sword gripped in both hands blazed with pure white light.

Fwoooosh—slash!

The thick darkness split.

A streak of light cut through the air and slashed Behemoth's two pillar-like forelegs. Green blood gushed from the deep wounds.

Fwoooosh!

Drenched from head to toe, Choi Minwoo let out the breath he'd been holding.

He wanted to dodge the blood, but he couldn't. His body shook from the strength he had spent in that brief attack, much like Behemoth's staggering legs.

"Two of its four legs…"

He murmured through a vision stained entirely green.

Fifteen Hunters. Far too high a price compared with his own life.

Still, Behemoth's scream of pain was not unpleasant to hear.

—GRAAAAAAAH! "Hu. Man!"

"…I hear you. No idea what you're saying, though."

Choi Minwoo's answer came out weak.

The pain and exhaustion he'd pushed aside rushed back at once. The light of Hero's Soul in his hands was fading, ready to go out.

Hold on a little longer. Just a little longer.

But that was asking too much.

His fatigue had been building since his bloody fight with Song Cheonwoo. With the healer dead and the potions gone, there was nothing to stop the bleeding or tend his injuries. They were finally bringing him down.

Ssssh.

The world tilted.

No. The world wasn't tilting.

Choi Minwoo was.

As his view slowly turned over, he saw something enormous flying toward him.

Whoooosh!

He felt the wind of a blow that would crush his entire body, and closed his eyes.

BOOOM!

With a thunderous crash, the only light vanished.

A cloud of snow and dirt rose through the dense black fog.

Ruuumble!

Behemoth's strongest blow yet shook the entire mountain.

The surviving Peace Guild Hunters stared in despair. What little hope they had held onto had vanished with the light.

With the young man who had led them.

It's over. All of it.

They all knew.

The world itself might not end, but the world they knew would end here today.

Strangely, they felt calm as they faced it.

They had done their duty, at least. Their duty as people and as Hunters. They had given everything to a sense of purpose that wealth and fame had made them forget for a while.

They had no regrets.

"Fuck. I signed the contract on my house two days ago."

A snort of laughter escaped the Hunters at someone's mutter.

"Crazy bastard."

"If you're scared, go. Nobody's stopping you."

But no one moved. Not even the Hunter who had spoken first.

He looked down at his trembling legs and said bluntly, "How are we supposed to leave? I'd rather die fighting."

They all felt the same. Thousands of people were still evacuating behind them.

The comrades who had fallen, and Choi Minwoo, who had charged Behemoth to the end, had died protecting those people.

"We've got money, and we've got pride."

"Still, what a shitty day to die. Can't even see the sky through this fucking fog."

"Why'd that elephant bastard suddenly stop moving?"

The few who remained steeled themselves to charge Behemoth. Just as they were about to rush forward, a quiet voice spoke.

"You needn't die."

At the quiet voice, the thick fog parted. It was fire, not light, that drove back the abyssal darkness.

Fwoooosh!

A man appeared through the fog amid fierce flames and continued,

"At least, you don't."

The Hunters' trembling eyes took in a middle-aged man with half-gray hair.

Kim Hwajong had disappeared into the fog after Choi Minwoo. He looked very different now.

"…Guild Master. Your arm."

"I'm fine."

His left arm had been torn off. Even so, Kim Hwajong smiled faintly through his exhaustion.

He had lost an arm, but he had saved something far more precious.

He passed the person cradled in his right arm to the Hunters.

“Leave this place at once. Take the Young Master with you.”

“B-But…”

“That’s an order from your Guild Master.”

Grrrrr.

The monster gave a low laugh. It had spotted the prey that had escaped it by a hair.

Kim Hwajong’s smile disappeared.

“Go!”

“…!”

The force of his shout left the Hunters no room to argue. They clenched their teeth, took Choi Minwoo’s limp body, and gave a brief bow before launching themselves down the steep slope.

Shhhh-shhhh-shhk!

Kim Hwajong watched them slide away. A faint smile returned to his lips.

You must make it out safely. You must.

When he turned away after murmuring the small plea that would never reach them, hellfire flickered in his one remaining hand.

“Come on, you fucking bastard.”

—GRAAAAAAAH!

Behemoth’s enormous eyes and Kim Hwajong’s flame-filled gaze collided in midair.

The old butler had sent everyone away and stood alone at the edge of the cliff. He began to recite what might be his final spell.

“Hellfire of the underworld, descend upon this place.”

Hell Fire.

Ruuuuumble!

Chapter 584

Ruuuuumble!

A pillar of fire shot into the sky. The mountain shook. For hundreds of meters[2668] in every direction, the air boiled with heat so intense that snow, dirt, and rock melted away.

Lava flowed across a land of death. Above the ground where everything else had evaporated, two figures stood like towers.

—Hu. Man. How. Dare. You!

The mythical monster raged, its body charred black. The half-gray-haired old butler regarded it calmly.

Hell Fire.

Even the hellfire summoned from the depths of hell had failed to bring Behemoth down. One of its enormous tusks had melted away without a trace, and its entire body was charred black, but the monster remained standing.

And yet…

“You’re a tough bastard.”

Kim Hwajong did not retreat. He could not.

He tightened his grip on his Magic Staff with his one remaining hand.

Fwoosh.

Flames engulfed the short, slender staff. When they passed, the staff that emerged was longer and thicker.

It was the cherished weapon with which he had reduced countless monsters to ash during the chaotic years of the Great Cataclysm—the weapon that had earned its master the name Hellfire Mage.

Kim Hwajong pointed the reddish staff at Behemoth and muttered,

“Stop. You’re not going anywhere.”

—Old. Man!

Behemoth roared. The black mist hanging over the area stirred like a living creature and shot toward Kim Hwajong.

Sssshhhh!

It was a rope that could bind his whole body and a blade that could tear through flesh and crush it.

Kim Hwajong watched it close in from every direction. Then the staff in his bloodied hand struck the ground.

BOOM!

[2668] One meter is about 3.28 ft; hundreds of meters span hundreds to thousands of feet.

A deep rumble sent a wave spreading outward. Flames rose around Kim Hwajong and joined into a single ring.

Fwoosh—FWOOSH!

Before fire was a symbol of destruction, it was a force of purification.

The instant the black mist touched the flames, it crumbled away like ash.

The enormous eyes of the monster looking down upon the earth reflected the figure of a lone human standing tall.

—What. Is. This?

Even Behemoth had not expected it.

Its opponent was a mere human. Yet the small, insignificant creature had wounded it—and now had nullified its attack.

—You. Hu. Man!

A roar laden with powerful Fear shook the entire area. But though fire flickered in Kim Hwajong's eyes, his heart was utterly calm.

The monster had misjudged one thing.

It did not realize that the old human standing before it possessed none of the fear that everyone carried deep in their hearts.

I'm glad, Young Master.

Kim Hwajong smiled at the words that would never reach him. His only fear was moving farther from this disaster even now.

As long as that child, Choi Minwoo, could survive… it did not matter what happened to him.

Even if I die here.

He could be crushed beneath the monster's feet, impaled on its tusks and killed without a final word, or reduced to ash after wringing every last bit of strength from his body and mana. It would be all right.

If the Young Master is safe, that is enough for me.

Kim Hwajong gripped his staff with a glad heart.

Mana poured into the tip of his reddish weapon in an amount that had already pushed him beyond his limits. It grew hot, then burst forth as flame.

"Sweep it away."

Fire Wave.

At the brief incantation, a wave of fire surged forward.

Behemoth stood in its path. With an enraged cry, it swung its trunk, shaped like an elephant's but dozens of times larger.

FWOOSH!

A powerful rush of wind slammed into the wave of fire. The blistering heat died in an instant, and invisible blades of wind raked everything around them.

Ssshhh-shhk! Slash!

The ground split and tore like paper. Kim Hwajong had already escaped by the narrowest margin.

A low voice escaped between the old butler's lips as he charged toward Behemoth's flank.

"Shoot forth."

Blaze.

BOOM!

Flames burst from the tip of the foot he planted.

The blast sent Kim Hwajong forward like a streak of fire. A dense shadow fell over his head.

Whoooosh!

"…!"

Instinct beat reason by half a step. Fire Shield. At the silent, unspoken spell, layer upon layer of fiery shields formed above him.

In the next instant, tremendous pressure crushed down on the more than twenty overlapping shields.

CRRRRUNCH!

They shattered and scattered.

The overwhelming force and weight—and the immense magical power behind them, whose limits he could not begin to fathom—broke through the shields and sent his mana reeling.

Ptooey!

Dark red blood sprayed from Kim Hwajong's lips.

His vision blurred as the spell collapsed. But instead of crumpling where he stood, he clenched his teeth and threw himself aside, almost falling.

CRACK! THUD!

The defensive spell had bought him a moment.

Behemoth's trunk swept past by a hair and smashed into the ground. Hundreds of fragments flew outward, scraping across Kim Hwajong's calf.

The pain felt like a burn. But instead of groaning, the old butler exposed his bloodstained teeth and smiled.

"Didn't I tell you? You're not going anywhere."

His staff gave off searing heat. A sphere of flame appeared in midair and swelled.

Kim Hwajong coughed up blood.

"Burst. Barrage of fire."

Flame Cannon.

Dazzling light-flames erupted as the spell was completed.

The ultimate fire spell, carrying power faster and more formidable than any cannon, shot toward the monster's two forelegs—the same forelegs that Choi Minwoo had already cut halfway through.

—You…!

FWOOSH—BOOOOOOM!

Behemoth's cry vanished beneath a blast that shook the entire area.

The fire that tore through space burst open the wounds that had not yet healed and swept through the inside of the legs.

Sizzle.

Agonizing pain surged from its forelegs, now blackened like charcoal. Behemoth roared.

—GRAAAAAAAAAAH!

Ruuuuumble!

At last, its two forelegs gave way.

The mythical monster that had risen from the abyss into this world dropped to its forelegs like a collapsing temple.

Its immense weight shook the earth. A great cloud of dust rose.

And the man who had brought Behemoth to its knees laughed as he spat blood.

"Ha! Hahahaha!"

It was the laughter of a Hunter once called the greatest fire mage, and the relief of a butler who had done his duty.

That's enough. That's enough.

Half of Behemoth's four legs were useless.

Unless it grew wings, it could no longer pursue Choi Minwoo. No small number of others would survive because of it, too.

Kim Hwajong smiled at the dark shadow flying toward him.

Still, just a little… I wish…

CRACK! Sssshhhh!

His vision flashed white. An enormous blow engulfed him in pain and sent him flying like a cannonball.

BOOM!

With a thunderous crash, his back smashed into solid rock and broke. Something unstoppable surged up from deep inside him.

"Gueeeeeegh!"

The old butler looked down at what he had vomited, the light fading from his eyes. Small pieces of his organs lay in the pool of dark red blood.

His ears felt blocked, as though his eardrums had burst. Through his blurred vision, a memory from long ago rose like a haze.

"Your fire magic is impressive. Were you an arsonist before this?"

"…What kind of crazy shit is that? If you're not going to help, get lost."

"Fortunately, I won't have to 'go out,' then. I'm going to help you and everyone here."[2669]

"Hmm. That changes things. What's your name?"

"Cheon Taemin."

He had not known that this man, who looked absurdly young for his age, would become the idol to whom Kim Hwajong would devote his entire life.

But that became reality soon enough.

One year, two years, five years… By the end of the long, terrible Great War, Kim Hwajong had become Cheon Taemin's shadow.

"What am I supposed to do now?"

The Great Cataclysm had changed Kim Hwajong's life completely, just as it had changed so many others. He had waited so long for peace, yet when it finally came, he did not know what to do with himself.

Cheon Taemin answered his question with one of his own.

"What do you want to do?"

"I don't know. But I'll do anything you ask."

"Then join the Guild. I need you. I've brought Jungryong and Cheonwoo in too."

"That Peace Guild thing?"

"Yes."

"The name's pretty damn lame. How about Ares instead? The god of war from Greek mythology. Ares."

"Ares, huh? Not bad. I'll take your suggestion, so join the Guild. I'll make sure you never have to worry about retirement."

"…Office work really doesn't suit me. All right, Guild Master."

"I've told you to call me hyung[2670] about five thousand times over the last five years. You never change."

As Taemin had said, Kim Hwajong never did.

Not even after his relationship with his two trusted comrades and closest sworn brothers grew distant, and after it became difficult to see Cheon Taemin's face.

Peace had come, but Kim Hwajong's fiery temper remained, and he still swore constantly.

He decided to change only after a child born amid everyone's blessings lost both parents in an unexpected accident.

"Hello."

"…Hello."

[2669] The Korean verb translated as "get lost" can also mean "go out," as a flame does.

[2670] Hyung is a familiar Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

Only a few people had gathered for the funeral. The boy, no more than four or five years old, looked lonely.

He clung to the leg of his maternal grandfather, now his only family, and greeted Kim Hwajong with a somber face. The sight pained the aging man.

Perhaps that was why, when Cheon Taemin came to him a few days later, he accepted without hesitation.

“Could you take care of Minwoo? Of the boy?”

The immortal hero who had become a symbol of humanity was always busy. Even after the Great Cataclysm ended, Cheon Taemin lived as though something were chasing him.

In his place, Kim Hwajong became family to the child left alone.

“Good day, Young Master.”

Neat hair and clothes. A gentle voice. A smile at the corners of his mouth.

That was how the Hellfire Mage, who had set a page of the Great Cataclysm ablaze, became Butler Kim.

“Young Master, you mustn’t run! You’ll hurt yourself—oh dear.”

“Young Master. Being a picky eater is bad for your health. Please eat.”

“Young Master, please don’t cry.”

Young Master. Young Master. Young Master…

Time flowed like a river.

The boy grew into a young man, and white frost settled over Kim Hwajong’s hair.

Even after Cheon Taemin vanished without a trace, Kim Hwajong remained steadfast in his place.

His Young Master no longer ran about recklessly, ate every kind of food without complaint, or cried while thinking of the parents who had left him too soon.

Then, one day, Kim Hwajong saw traces of someone he had not seen in a long time in the grown young man’s face.

“You said you were going to create a Guild.”

“Yes. I’m sorry to ask, Butler Kim, but I need you to serve as Guild Master.”

“If that is what you wish, Young Master, I will do anything. But what do you intend to name the Guild?”

“The Peace Guild. I’m going to call it the Peace Guild.”

“…!”

“Butler Kim, why do you look so… displeased?”

What could he say? So many thoughts came at once that the old butler hesitated. Then he burst out laughing.

“Not at all. The Peace Guild. What a wonderful name.”

And so the past met the present.

From the founding of the Peace Guild onward, Kim Hwajong greeted each day with joy and memories. His Young Master, who had worn a cold, rigid mask, softened after finding “comrades” for the first time in his life. The Guild grew day by day.

Kim Hwajong thought there would be nothing but good days ahead. From then on. Forever.

He thought he would stay beside his Young Master and watch him grow.

Today really was… the best day of my life.

Cough.

Kim Hwajong laughed as he vomited blood mixed with pieces of his organs.

There was only one reason he could laugh as he died: something his Young Master had said to him today.

“Thank you. For becoming my only family.”

And what else had the Young Master said?

“I’ve always wanted to tell you that.”

Yes. That was it.

Kim Hwajong raised his head, coughing. Thick black mist filled his fading vision.

Somewhere beyond it, his only hope—and his only fear—was probably alive and leaving this place.

“I want to… see you.”

The words trembled between his bloodied lips.

The mythical monster smiled in satisfaction at the dying old butler and opened its jaws.

FWOOSH.

A tremendous gust swept through the entire area.

The flames that had yet to go out, someone’s scattered limbs and blood, even the rocks—all were drawn in.

They spun like a tornado inside Behemoth’s mouth.

“Young… Master.”

No. That was not it. Though his words would never reach him, this was his final greeting.

A faint smile touched his wrinkled lips.

“Minwoo.”

At the very moment his fading voice escaped—

Sssshhhh—FLASH!

A burst of light erupted in midair and turned the whole world white.

Chapter 585

Whoooosh!

A fierce rush of air sounded overhead. Thousands of people who had been screaming and fleeing in every direction stopped in their tracks. One tourist looked up at the sky and spoke in a daze.

"…Huh?"

He wasn't the only one wondering.

The civilians fleeing the monster, the hundreds of reinforcements dispatched to stop it, even the Peace Guild Hunters hurrying down the mountain to fulfill their Guild Master's final wish—they all saw it and had the same question.

What is that?

But they saw it from different places and with different eyes. To the civilians, the streak of light crossing the sky was simply a mystery. The high-ranking Hunters among the reinforcements felt a powerful surge of mana far above them for the briefest instant.

Closer still, the Peace Guild Hunters on the mountainside realized how the light had appeared out of thin air.

…Teleport?

Who? How? Why?

Questions raced through countless minds. But no one saw and felt what was happening more clearly than Kim Hwajong.

On the brink of death, the old butler recognized the blue light spreading across the sky, pressing down on the black mist of magical power.

That's…

Power, pure and more destructive than anything else.

Flame. It was flame.

Brighter than sunlight and as fierce as the sun itself, it streaked across the sky. For a moment, a face seemed to pass through Kim Hwajong's blurred vision—a face somewhere inside that blinding light, too bright to look at directly.

Yes. It's you.

His smile deepened. The primordial monster risen from myth opened its enormous jaws toward the oncoming light.

Whooooooom—

The wind split. The air scattered. Inside jaws wide enough to swallow a mountain, an abyssal power churned.

But the light did not stop. It grew sharper and larger, becoming blue-white flame that surged through the air.

Gooooong.

The world stopped. Two forces that swallowed all space and sound as they advanced collided.

And in the next moment, Kim Hwajong could see. He could hear.

Fwooooosh!

Darkness torn to shreds beneath the blue sky.

Blue-white flames burning through everything in their path. And in that dazzling, silent world, one voice ringing clear.

“One Annihilation.”

Space warped. Unprecedented flames fell like a meteor and pierced Behemoth’s jaws before they could close, passing through its body.

As the monster toppled with a death cry like thunder, the old butler forgot his pain and laughed aloud.

Even the greatest master in the world could not escape death. Neither could an ancient monster that belonged in a myth. Not when a full-powered One Annihilation had entered through its mouth and pierced its entire body.

—Ho…w…

Bewilderment and death settled together in the eyes of a monster unlike any I had ever seen or heard of. It stared at me vacantly as its enormous body slowly tipped over.

Krrrrrrrung!

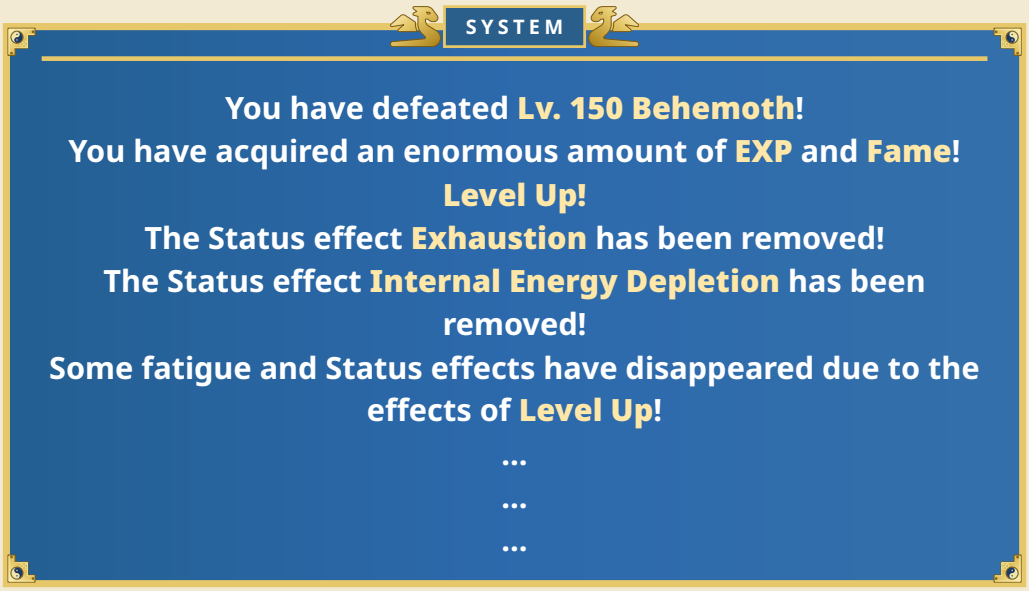
The mountain shook when its lifeless body hit the ground. Huge clouds of dust rose all around me, and I gritted my teeth against the pain and fatigue rolling over me in waves.

I can’t collapse.

One Annihilation was a double-edged sword. It poured out all the user’s strength at once.

But I couldn’t fall yet. Not now. Fortunately, I had a power ordinary people didn’t.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



Damn it.

I barely managed to steady myself.

Leveling up was one of the System's most broken features, but unless the effects stacked, it couldn't fix everything. Too much fatigue had built up in my body and mind. The aftereffects of One Annihilation left my hands and feet tingling as if I'd been electrocuted.

Still, I couldn't stop or collapse. I drew on the internal energy that had filled my dantian with the level-up and sent it surging forward.

Boom!

Compressed air burst outward, scattering the dust. At last I could see a rounded shape covered in white bones.

Step. Step.

My heart pounded with every step across the ruined ground. I couldn't hide the fear in my ragged breathing.

I was afraid of what I'd find. Afraid he wouldn't look the way I hoped. Afraid he would say goodbye before I was ready.

Tap. Shrrr...

When I carefully placed my hand against it, the membrane made of bones scattered as though it were melting. And then I could finally see.

Inside was a grim-faced blond foreigner. Leaning against him was a middle-aged man with half-gray hair, each faint breath seeming to be his last.

This is...

For a moment, my heart seemed to stop.

It took only a glance to understand. The top-grade potion bottle lying at the Skeleton King's feet was empty. The man appeared to have recovered without a mark on him, but strength was already draining from his body.

My vision swam.

"…Butler Kim."

His half-closed eyelids fluttered at my voice. When his fading gaze met mine, his bloodstained lips curved into a gentle smile.

"You came."

"…!"

"Yes. I knew it would be you. That light was so warm."

I clenched my teeth to hold back a groan. Butler Kim had already accepted what was happening to him. That was probably why he sounded different.

The man before my eyes was neither Butler Kim nor the Guild Master of the Peace Guild. He was simply a human being, Kim Hwajong, saying goodbye.

But…

I'm not ready yet.

I couldn't accept this sudden farewell. I wasn't going to smile and let him go. I would do anything to bring Kim Hwajong back—to make him Butler Kim, the Guild Master, again.

"But I'm a little cold now. I was so warm before."

I took his hand and slowly sent Scorching Yang Qi into him.

"It's because we're up on the mountain. You'll warm up soon."

"Will I?"

I forced a smile.

"Yes. It's still winter."

As the warmth seeped into him, Kim Hwajong smiled faintly.

"It really is. Just as you said."

"You'll be all right. Don't worry. I'll take care of—"

My voice failed me, and not only because my chest had tightened. The internal energy I'd sent through him had shown me the state of his body.

What in the world…

Everyone was born with innate qi, the root and source of all the body's energy. Almost none remained in Kim Hwajong.

No. Even what little remained was slowly burning away.

Like a dying flame.

Jeok Cheongang's innate qi had been damaged in Henan, but not to this extent. Kim Hwajong's condition was beyond repair.

I could tell from what my internal energy revealed.

What it had taken for him to face Behemoth. What he had sacrificed to hold back the monster that had crawled out of the darkness. And who he had burned his one and only life for.

"Young Master… Minwoo. Is the boy safe?"

I made my voice as bright as I could.

"He's safe. I caught a glimpse of him on the mountainside. He's fine."

"Good. That's good. What a relief."

What's a relief? Look what's happened to you.

I bit my lip rather than say it aloud. Then the Skeleton King's thought sounded in my head.

—I absorbed the magical power that had seeped into his bones and gave him a top-grade potion, but it was already too late. Even I couldn't save him.

I knew. I couldn't blame him when he'd done everything he could. His entire appearance was an illusion made with magic, but the guilt and sorrow on his face were real.

—…I'm sorry, human.

A question occurred to me. It was about everything happening around me.

Why was he the one apologizing? How had Kim Hwajong, who'd eaten with us and laughed with us just a few days ago, ended up lying here beyond recovery?

And why hadn't I stopped it?

Why?

I had power. The power to stop disasters and prevent tragic deaths.

It had started with a mysterious capsule that appeared in my life one day. It let me change the fate I'd been given and meet people who became precious to me. Now one of those bonds was about to break. One of those people was about to leave me.

So why couldn't I stop it?

In Shanxi, Henan, Sichuan, Hubei. In Sichuan, in Busan…

I had saved so many lives while traveling between the Murim and the modern world. So why couldn't I save the one person about to leave before my eyes?

Why?

I was sinking into that question, into helplessness, when—

Ssssh. Tap.

A cold hand covered my trembling fist. Kim Hwajong looked at me, warmth in his eyes.

"It isn't your fault."

"…!"

"You did your best."

His eyes were no longer clouded. His voice no longer sounded ready to fade. The kindness in his face caught the breath in my throat.

The final rally.

A last flame flaring at the edge of death.

No. I couldn’t let him go yet. I gritted my teeth and sent more internal energy into him, but his body was already at its limit. Strength continued to drain away.

More. Just a little more!

I poured every bit of internal energy in my dantian into him. I held his slowly closing acupoints[2671] open and tried to feed the flame dying deep inside his body.

The end came closer rapidly anyway.

“It’s cold. I don’t know if it’s winter, like you said, or if night’s already fallen.”

It couldn’t be either. Scorching Yang Qi was still pouring into him, and the afternoon sun remained in the sky.

Only Kim Hwajong could feel that cold and darkness. Death was freezing his body and drawing a veil over his eyes.

I struggled to speak to the old butler as his breaths grew thinner.

“It’s all right. You’ll see Team Leader Choi soon. Just trust me and…”

Thud.

A hand closed around my wrist. The Skeleton King shook his head, his face grim.

At last I understood. Nothing I said or did could stop this.

It was time to let Kim Hwajong go, so he could leave with whatever peace I could give him.

“Young Master… Minwoo. Is the boy safe?”

His eyes had turned milky. He’d asked me already, but that didn’t matter. I could answer him a hundred times. A thousand.

“He’s safe. Not a hair on his head was harmed.”

“I want to see him. Just once more…”

“You will. He’s already coming.”

“Is that… true?”

“Yes. Ah, there he is.”

It was a lie. A bright red, pure white lie.

On the nameless mountainside swept by a wave of chaos, there were only the three of us and the monster’s corpse.

But Kim Hwajong could no longer tell. With his sight clouded and his mind fading, he reached into empty air as though the person he’d been waiting for would take his hand.

Grab.

At my call and the look that accompanied it, Skeleton King firmly took that hand. The old butler’s eyes curved like crescent moons, and a radiant smile spread across his lips.

“You’ve come.”

[2671] Acupoints are points along the body’s energy channels in traditional East Asian medicine.

And then—

“My grand…son.”

The flame that had burned for one person and refused to go out for this moment finally guttered.

Sssrrk. Tap.

Everything went black.

Chapter 586

Some truths are cruel and cold.

When people face them, they sometimes turn away, unable—or unwilling—to believe what has happened.

Like me right now.

"…Human."

Skeleton King's voice broke the silence. I felt as though I had woken from a long, terrible dream.

And in the next moment, I realized that none of it had been a dream. It was reality.

He's gone. He really is.

Kim Hwajong's face was peaceful in death. Joy still lingered in the smile fixed upon his lips—the smile of a man who had fulfilled his final wish before he left.

But I kept sending Scorching Yang Qi through his body, along with questions that could no longer reach him.

Are you still cold? Is it still dark?

Perhaps the old butler I remembered was wandering an endless winter night even now. Shivering, unable to see an inch ahead, searching the darkness for one person.

I couldn't stop. I had to keep putting warmth into his body as it slowly grew cold.

Thud.

A cold hand came to rest on my shoulder. Skeleton King spoke in a subdued voice.

"Human."

"Let go."

"That is enough. Stop."

He was wrong. It wasn't enough, so I couldn't stop.

Just as I was about to roughly shake off the hand on my shoulder, Skeleton King continued.

"He will not be cold anymore, so let that human go… Let that person rest."

"…!"

Why did the strength leave my body when I heard that?

I didn't know.

Perhaps it was because Skeleton King had spoken respectfully of a human for the first time. Perhaps it was because his voice sounded so unusually weak.

Or perhaps it was because of the people who had returned to this nameless mountainside after disaster had swept through it.

Crunch.

Careful footsteps pressed into the snow.

I turned toward the sound and saw five men and women emerge. I recognized their faces from the greetings we'd exchanged once or twice at the Guild House.

Peace Guild members.

They must have realized the situation had changed and come back.

They had already fought Behemoth desperately ahead of me, exhausting themselves and suffering injuries. With vacant eyes, they stared at the monster collapsed before them. Then they turned their heads and looked in this direction.

And—

"No!"

"Guild Master!"

Shouts and screams rang out together.

They hurried over Behemoth's corpse and found Kim Hwajong in a deep sleep from which he would never wake.

"H-How could this happen?"

"…Damn it. I knew this would happen. I knew it!"

Their voices were filled with grief and tears.

I hadn't been there, but I could picture what had happened.

He must have told them to go. Told them to run with Team Leader Choi because he was all right.

That was the kind of person Kim Hwajong was.

Someone mattered more to him than his own life: a young man he called Young Master and thought of as his grandson.

I had stood there as though nailed to the ground, watching everything. Then I suddenly opened my mouth.

"Team Leader Choi."

"Y-Yes?"

My voice came out rough and hollow, so unfamiliar it might have belonged to someone else.

"Lay Team Leader Choi down beside him."

"…!"

"Hurry."

The Guild members stared at me for a moment, then understood and nodded. They carefully laid Team Leader Choi, unconscious after exhausting all his strength, on the ground.

The two men lay side by side. They looked nothing alike, yet somehow they resembled each other.

You finally met, the two of you.

Without a word, I placed their hands together.

Maybe it was my imagination, but for an instant Kim Hwajong's smile seemed to brighten.

"Hunter Jin Taekyung. Wouldn't it be better to wake the Team Leader…?"

I shook my head at the Guild member who had spoken.

"No."

"B-But…"

"We can't. Not right now."

I cut him off firmly. It wasn't as though I hadn't considered it myself.

If Kim Hwajong had still been alive, I would have done whatever it took to wake Team Leader Choi and let them see each other.

But…

It's too late.

Kim Hwajong was dead. Team Leader Choi's body was battered, and accumulated fatigue had pushed it to its limit. Even if I forced him awake and gave him a potion, the backlash would come down on him several times harder.

So would the grief and rage.

The dead had found peace after their suffering. The living had to carry theirs on.

I'd learned that three years ago. I couldn't wake Team Leader Choi in that condition just to tell him something so cruel.

But I could promise him one thing.

Before Team Leader Choi regained consciousness, I would bring him a gift that could soothe even a little of the rage and grief he would feel.

Whoosh! Slash!

The tip of the spear I swung without any preparation split the air, sending a crescent of Force through Behemoth's enormous body. Skeleton King murmured, almost with a sigh.

"Stop."

I swung again instead of answering.

Once. Twice. Three times…

Slash! Slash! Fwoosh!

The corpse fell into pieces, and the blood left inside it spurted up like a fountain.

The vast magical power Behemoth had once held was gone. Now it was only meat.

I cut through it without hesitation, like a butcher, until Skeleton King could stand it no longer.

"I said stop! What difference do you think this will—"

"It can make enough of a difference. That's why I'm doing this."

"What?"

He stared at me, puzzled.

"What in the world are you talking about?"

I didn't answer. One step carried me several meters[2672], bringing Behemoth's corpse right before me.

I studied the remains, cut so thoroughly that nothing of the monster's former majesty remained. At last, I found what I was looking for.

No—it had made itself known before I found it.

Vrrrr.

A faint vibration passed through the air. With it came a murky, powerful energy.

"...Found it."

I had worried that it might have been erased by the One Annihilation I had fired earlier, but fortunately, it was unharmed.

I murmured in relief and reached out without hesitation.

Whoosh. Clack!

Seizing an Object Through Empty Space sent it flying into my hand. I stared at it with a solemn gaze.

Item Appraisal.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Item Window
Behemoth's Turbid Abyss
Type: Magic Gem
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: None
Description: The abyss contained within Behemoth, a Named Monster and primordial beast, and the source of its magical power.
For some reason, it absorbed another source of magical power. Its once-pure darkness became turbid and even more powerful.
Using it requires an extremely demanding and difficult purification process.

My eyes grew hot as I read the System Window floating before me.

But my mind was colder and clearer than ever as it turned over the information.

Behemoth's Turbid Abyss.

The System had never lied to me. Not once. Every word of that description had to be true.

[2672] Several meters is roughly 10–20 ft.

It absorbed another source of magical power. For some reason. I see.

The questions that had been drifting through my head for the past several hours, ever since my conversation with Kraken, began to fall into place one after another.

Who had given Kraken a Magic Gem to cause a Monster Wave? Who had ordered him to do it?

Why had Team Leader Choi, busy as he was, left Seoul for Pyeongchang in Gangwon Province? Why had another Monster Wave happened here, of all places?

And what did the description of Behemoth's Magic Gem mean?

Why? Why? Why?

I asked myself each question and found its answer.

Only a short time passed, though it felt like hours. At last, I had answers to everything.

Everything but the final piece of the puzzle.

Right. One last piece.

I didn't hesitate. I already knew where to find it.

"Why did you come here today?"

I was speaking to the Peace Guild members. Their eyes turned toward a middle-aged Hunter who seemed to be the most senior among them. He answered grimly.

"Team Leader Choi had someone he needed to meet in secret. A man disguised with illusion magic. He looked very anxious."

"Who was he?"

"I'm sorry, but none of us know. I don't know who he was either."

The middle-aged man was probably telling the truth. But I wasn't disappointed.

I had heard the man's identity directly from Team Leader Choi himself not long ago. Even the temporary Head of Security had not been informed.

Song Cheonwoo.

A hero of the Great Cataclysm and Ares Guild's European regional Director.

And the political rival of both Lee Jungryong and his disciple, Go Jun—two generations of enemies.

But I knew Song Cheonwoo and Team Leader Choi had secretly agreed to work together for the time being. I wasn't foolish enough to think Song was behind this.

He had no reason. Not one.

Song Cheonwoo was still ambitious after all these years. Whatever else was going on, the idea that he would try to kill Team Leader Choi—a valuable ally in his effort to bring down Go Jun—made no sense.

Someone else was behind everything that had happened today.

Someone who stood to gain more than anyone from the deaths of those two men.

Someone who could use an S-grade Magic Gem of astronomical value and rarity to cause a Monster Wave.

Go Jun.

The final piece fell into place. I knew what I had to do—and that the consequences of my choice could reach the people around me.

Then…

I slowly closed my eyes.

There was no turning back. Right or wrong, I had to do this.

When I opened my eyes again, neither my resolve nor my voice wavered.

“If Team Leader Choi wakes up while I’m gone, please make sure someone tells him.”

“Pardon? Tell him what…?”

“S-grade Hunter Jin Taekyung…”

The unfamiliar, dry voice that sounded as though it belonged to someone else continued.

“…is leaving the Peace Guild as of this moment.”

“…!”

“…!”

The frozen expressions of the people before me came into view, along with someone’s face twisted in anger.

“You bastard. Don’t tell me you’re—”

“You stay here. Protect the people and the Guild, just in case.”

The one who had to leave would leave. The one who had to stay would stay.

I shook my head at Skeleton King when he tried to stop me again, then asked the Guild members who had gone rigid like statues.

“Anyone here capable of Teleport? Hands up.”

“H-Hand.”

A mage raised his hand without thinking and asked with a dazed expression,

“B-But where to?”

“Jongno. No…”

I looked at the old butler, asleep forever, and finished.

“Let’s go to Ares Guild.”

Chapter 587

The air. Time.

Everything seemed to have stopped.

That was how it felt to the master of Area A, hidden in the strictest secrecy within Ares Guild in Jongno, Seoul.

How?

The question kept circling through Go Jun's mind.

He had forgotten Go Se-won was standing beside him. His face rigid, he stared at the holographic television mounted on the wall.

Live footage from dozens of unmanned reconnaissance drones deployed by the government and various media outlets filled the screen.

"Right now, you're looking at Mount Balwang, near Pyeongchang in Gangwon Province, where the Monster Wave occurred. And…"

It was the voice of the public broadcaster's nine o'clock news anchor. Usually calm and serious, the unseen man sounded highly agitated.

"Can you see this, everyone? That is the corpse of Behemoth, the Named Monster! Around it, survivors of the disaster are being evacuated by emergency helicopter…"

Go Jun's eyelids trembled.

The brutally dismembered corpse of the monster. The survivors. The voices of the Peace Guild members and the anchor explaining the situation.

All of it fed his fury.

Bang!

With a thunderous crash, the latest-model holographic television—replaced more than ten times in the past month—burst into dust.

Go Jun did not care.

The instant Choi Minwoo appeared on the screen, being evacuated with a respirator over his face, everything else became meaningless.

He survived. Choi Minwoo survived.

The knowledge weighed on him.

To Go Jun, Choi Minwoo was a bastard who deserved to die. A bastard who had to die.

That was why Go Jun had laid the trap.

He had lured Jin Taekyung to Busan and used Song Cheonwoo to turn his enemies against each other, intending to leave both sides crippled.

But…

What went wrong?

Red light flickered in Go Jun's eyes. In his hand, two unpurified S-grade Magic Gems ground against each other without pause.

Crk. Crk.

What had he missed?

Crk. Crk.

He had thought the plan was perfect. Perhaps it really had been.

Its one flaw was that someone beyond perfection stood on the other side.

Jin Taekyung.

It had to be him. Behemoth's magical barrier had kept the media from learning exactly what had happened, but Go Jun had no doubt.

The bastard who had killed his Master, Lee Jungryong—a man who had seemed like a living god—and branded Go Jun with a terror he could never erase had interfered again.

Even after Go Jun had set a trap there was no escaping. Even then, again!

Crkkkk!

Instead of a roar filled with resentment, a chilling grinding sound filled the office.

Go Jun forced down his surging anger and barely managed to speak.

"Song Cheonwoo… What about Song Cheonwoo?"

When no answer came, he roared.

"I asked what happened to him!"

"…"

"Team Leader Go! Go Se-won!"

Go Se-won, the Head of Security, had watched his superior's fury in silence. He answered flatly.

"He isn't on any of the survivor or casualty lists we obtained."

"What about the Gate access records?"

"Nothing there either. We believe the Peace Guild, which effectively owns that Gate, deliberately left no traces behind."

"Of course. That makes sense. Even if Choi Minwoo is a little bastard, he's extremely careful. Isn't he?"

"…Yes."

When a secret never passed beyond the walls around it, that was both the strength and the weakness of keeping it.

Go Jun raked a hand through his hair. He picked up the whiskey in front of him, drank straight from the bottle, and muttered, "Fine. Things went to hell, but they still can't do anything about it. Song Cheonwoo can prove his alibi with the stand-in we prepared. If that gets too difficult, we make it look like he acted alone. There's no trace left in Busan, so we don't need to worry about that. Right?"

"But, Vice Guild Master, the Pyeongchang incident is too serious to pass off as Song Cheonwoo's lone crime. According to the information we obtained, Kim Hwajong—the nominal Guild Master of the Peace Guild—died, and Song Cheonwoo is unquestionably a member of Ares…"

"Listen, Team Leader Go."

A chill seized Go Se-won's entire body. His frozen figure was reflected in Go Jun's red eyes.

"Then make it less serious."

"V-Vice Guild Master."

"I don't care if it costs tens of billions[2673] or hundreds of billions[2674] of won. Throw money at the prosecutors' office. Threaten the old men sitting in the National Assembly. Grab anyone with a camera or a microphone by the collar. Isn't that your job?"

"…!"

Go Se-won's eyes trembled violently. The malice radiating from one man, along with his horrifying aura, pressed down on him.

How can someone become like this…?

It went beyond surprise. It was horrifying.

Could a person change this much in only a few months? Fall this far?

And what was this overwhelming power bearing down on him?

As he stared at Go Jun in disbelief, Song Cheonwoo's voice from several days earlier echoed in his mind.

The boundary between human and monster. That bastard Go Jun… has already become a monster.

Song was right. Go Jun—his superior—had already become a monster.

He had exploited his subordinates' near-religious loyalty and sent them to their deaths. He had deliberately caused two Monster Waves that might have left thousands, tens of thousands, perhaps even hundreds of thousands dead or injured.

All to eliminate his enemies.

A monster that has forgotten even the minimum duty a human being should possess.

Go Se-won was struggling to hide how shaken he felt when Go Jun spoke again.

"Make sure it's handled. Choi Minwoo survived, but at least we took care of Song Cheonwoo. Get us through this, and there won't be a problem."

Go Jun had regained his composure. His voice was cold.

He had failed to bring down the enemy outside Ares, but he had eliminated the one within it. That was half a victory.

[2673] Tens of billions of won is about $7–64 million or €6–58 million.

[2674] Hundreds of billions of won is about $71–640 million or €65–580 million.

Once the fake Song Cheonwoo he had put in place completed his retirement and disappeared, it would all be over.

No rumors or condemnation could bring down Ares Guild.

“Thirty years. It’s been thirty whole years. Politics, business, the prosecutors’ office, the media… They all grew under Ares’s shadow.”

Crk. Crk.

Cheon Taemin had laid the foundation, but after he lost consciousness, Lee Jungryong had built the pillars and roof.

Young politicians Ares had supported long ago had become prime ministers, ruling-party leaders, and opposition heavyweights. It was the same in business, the prosecutors’ office, and the media.

Some portion of the astronomical sums Ares Guild earned from Gates—the diamond mines of this world—had been scattered everywhere as dirty money. Those seeds had grown into a dense forest surrounding an impregnable fortress.

Go Jun was one of the people who knew that fact better than anyone.

Among the things he had inherited from his Master was a ledger packed with records of corruption and weaknesses.

“Even if everyone points fingers at us, this world itself is what protects us.”

In his impatience and anger, he had forgotten how much power he held.

And just as Go Jun’s confidence fully returned and a deep smile spread across his lips—

“You’re wrong.”

“What?”

Go Se-won looked directly at the monster before him—his superior—with an unreadable expression.

“The old politicians raised under Ares’s name, the Prosecutor General, the business and media dynasties dating back to the Japanese occupation[2675]—none of them will protect you, Vice Guild Master.”

“Team Leader Go. What are you—”

“Some of what you said is true. Ares won’t fall just because people point fingers and condemn it. But even if the whole world protects you, there’s one person it can’t stop.”

“…!”

Go Jun froze.

The thought of grabbing the Head of Security by the collar for daring to spout nonsense to his face vanished.

It was because of the name of the one person who had struck him in the mind.

Jin Taekyung.

[2675]Japan ruled Korea from 1910 to 1945.

Go Se-won read the thought in his trembling eyes and continued quietly.

“Have you forgotten who brought down the man who personally cultivated the world you’re counting on?”

“…!”

The words hit Go Jun like a blow to the back of the head. He clenched his teeth without realizing it.

Unfortunately, the bastard in front of him was not talking nonsense. Every word was true.

Master.

It was true. Lee Jungryong—Ares’s master and a man who had been no different from the king of Korea—had ultimately been killed by Jin Taekyung’s hand.

The whole world had been his, and no one in it had protected him.

Go Jun spoke through clenched teeth, his voice seething.

“Team Leader Go… You bastard.”

“I only said what someone had to say.”

“Shut up.”

“If that is your order, Vice Guild Master, I’ll obey. But please don’t dismiss what I said.”

“I told you to shut your mouth.”

Rumble!

A massive aura burst from Go Jun’s entire body like an explosion. The office shook as though an earthquake had struck.

Go Se-won’s face went pale before that overwhelming power, but his fear was nothing beside the disgust he felt.

Monster.

Go Jun saw it in his eyes and bared his teeth.

“Team Leader Go, have you gone mad? Lost your mind?”

“…”

“I only put you in the position of team leader because your abilities were at least useful. Did wearing a title that was never meant for you suddenly make the world look different?”

He gave an angry laugh and went on.

“Team Leader Go, you’re a coward and a piece of trash. You wrapped it in pretty words and called it loyal counsel, but you’re more afraid of Jin Taekyung than you are of my Master and me.”

“…That isn’t true.”

“It’s too late to deny it. Let’s admit what we both know. Yes, that bastard Jin Taekyung is strong. But how long do you think he’ll stay above me? Hmm?”

Crk. Crk!

“It’s only a matter of time. Now that I—now that I’ve decided to kill that bastard—I’ll find a way worthy of it… Damn it. Do you understand?”

Crkkkk!

His chilling voice mingled with the grinding of the Magic Gems. Go Jun glared at Go Se-won, his eyes so red they were nearly the color of blood.

He leaned his upper body forward toward the subordinate who had dared to commit an unforgivable crime. An old necklace slipped out and spun slowly in front of Go Se-won’s eyes.

“Team Leader Go. Go Se-won. You ungrateful piece of trash.”

“…”

“A year at most. Jin Taekyung… That bastard you’re so afraid of will die by my hand. Sichuan, Seoul—I don’t care where. I’ll kill him without anyone noticing, the same way Master was killed.”

“…”

“Until then, the world is on my side. No one can touch me unless I leave this fortress myself, you stupid bastard.”

The thrill of revenge mingled with his obsession with one man. Go Se-won watched the murk in his eyes for a moment, then spoke.

“A year. That’s a long time.”

“What?”

“I don’t know what method you’ve found, Vice Guild Master, but… Jin Taekyung won’t wait that long.”

“What, do you think he’s going to come charging in right now?”

“Yes.”

At the short answer, Go Jun laughed aloud. He laughed until his face twisted and the office seemed ready to fall apart from the sound. Then, suddenly, his expression sank, and he parted his lips.

“You fucking idiot. This is Ares Guild. Fall forward and you land at the Blue House[2676]; fall backward and you land at the National Assembly. Do you really think he’ll do something insane enough to turn the whole world against him?”

“I hear someone I know artificially caused a Monster Wave. Do you really think Jin Taekyung is incapable of doing something less insane than that?”

“…!”

“And, Vice Guild Master.”

Go Se-won let out a wry laugh despite himself. He remembered what he had learned from watching Jin Taekyung’s every move and investigating his past.

“Jin Taekyung is a lunatic. Didn’t you know?”

“You bas—!”

[2676]The Blue House was the traditional office and residence of South Korea’s president.

Go Jun’s eyes flew wide.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

Ares Guild headquarters shook. The skyscraper of more than a hundred floors trembled.

As the roar began to fade, Go Se-won’s voice reached him.

“Dealing with that lunatic will probably be my final assignment. Thank you for everything, Vice Guild Master. If I survive, I’ll submit my resignation formally.”

Carrying both his gratitude for everything until now and his disgust toward Go Jun as a human being, Go Se-won bowed deeply. He threw open the door that had been shut tight.

Emergency sirens were waking Ares Guild.

Chapter 588

That day, the air in Korea was heavy with unease.

The Monster Waves that had erupted one after another in Busan and Pyeongchang had been successfully contained, but not without a substantial number of casualties.

People who had been going about an ordinary day were confronted with shocking news and began trembling with anxiety.

“Manager, did you see the news?”

“I did. That’s why I dropped everything and came out here.”

“I can’t focus on anything either. What if there’s really a Monster Wave near our homes or workplaces…?”

“Hey, don’t say that. You’ll jinx us. Come on, let’s have a cigarette.”

Office workers escaped their stifling workplaces and headed for cafés. Students made their way home after class. Children, unaware of what had happened, clung to their parents and begged to play longer, while their parents pulled them away just in case.

It was an uneasy afternoon, and people’s hearts were in turmoil. Eyes filled with worry and fear remained fixed on smartphones broadcasting emergency news alerts.

> — You are now looking at the collapsed Gwangan Bridge. In the nearby waters lies the corpse of Kraken, the Named Monster responsible for the Busan Monster Wave…

> — The number of casualties reported so far is approaching four thousand. Rescue and search operations are still underway. The list of confirmed casualties is available through the Monster Disaster app…

> — I’m at Mount Balwang in Pyeongchang, Gangwon Province. The Monster Wave has ended with the death of the Named Monster Behemoth, but the more than seven thousand people visiting the nearby condos and ski resorts remain terrified.

> — The Pyeongchang Monster Wave resulted in 371 casualties. Among the forty-five confirmed dead is Mr. Kim Hwajong, Guild Master of the Peace Guild. His death has come as a tremendous shock…

Every report was horrible and shocking. Public broadcasts, cable channels, online news articles—everywhere was in an uproar, as though someone had stirred up a hornet's nest.

People in the streets swallowed hard at the sight of Gwangan Bridge in ruins. They had no words for a city awash in blood.

Disaster. There was no other word for it.

But the media's attention did not rest solely on the damage.

No, there was one name no report on the Monster Waves could leave out.

> — Nothing like this has happened in Korea since the Great Cataclysm. Two Monster Waves struck just two hours apart and caused tremendous damage, but a flawless initial response brought the chaos under control quickly. Remarkably, one person took part in suppressing both.

> — The whereabouts of S-rank Hunter Jin Taekyung, the young hero who appeared like a comet and killed two Named Monsters in a single day, remain unknown. The Peace Guild has yet to issue an official statement…

A hero who had quelled the chaos and then vanished. Of course everyone wanted to know where he had gone.

Within minutes of the government's announcement that Jin Taekyung's whereabouts were unknown, media outlets were churning out theories.

He was dead. He was missing. He had fallen unconscious from the strain of battle.

Most of them were Third Rate media companies famous for dealing in rumors and wild gossip, but ordinary people were wondering the same thing.

Did something really happen to him?

A man with no reason to disappear had vanished without a word, without showing his face to anyone.

He was already gone when reinforcements arrived, and the Peace Guild had issued no statement.

As the news swept across Korea and spread overseas, the question grew like a snowball.

That snowball rolled and rolled, growing larger and larger, until it came to a stop amid the skyscrapers of Jongno.

Step.

No one knew when or how he had appeared.

But the people hurrying through the densely packed forest of buildings for their own reasons realized something.

The man whose profile photo filled the screens in their hands was standing before them.

Drip. Drip-drip.

He was red, and he was blue.

Every time he moved, red and blue blood soaked into the sidewalk beneath him. He was covered in the blood of humans and monsters.

At 190 centimeters[2677] tall, with a perfectly balanced build, he moved slowly forward, stepping through the blood.

"…Jin Taekyung?"

Someone's dazed voice broke the sudden silence.

The young hero had finally appeared. But no one cheered, approached him, took out a phone to photograph him, or reported the sighting to the media. They stopped and fell silent.

Perhaps it was the look in his eyes beneath his blood-soaked hair. His gaze had sunk deep.

Step. Step.

Perhaps it was because profound exhaustion seeped from every one of his footsteps.

Huff.

Perhaps it was because the white breath escaping between his split lips carried the sorrow of someone who had lost another person.

But one thing was certain. Everyone in the crowded street understood it instinctively.

They must not stand in his way.

Swish. Swoosh.

Hundreds of people parted to either side.

In place of a prophet's staff from myth, the young man carried a pure-white spear as he passed through the human sea opened just for him.

People who had watched him go with dazed eyes began to follow.

No one there knew why. They moved as though under a spell. Hundreds joined hundreds more; thousands joined thousands more.

Soon the crowd numbered in the thousands. As if hypnotized, they walked and kept walking.

The great procession had begun when one man started walking. It seemed it might go on forever, until that same man stopped.

Step.

One last step.

[2677] 190 centimeters is about 6 ft 3 in.

The young man suddenly raised his head and looked at the sky.

Five in the afternoon. A January day that had been especially cold, exhausting, and sorrowful was slowly ending in a reddish glow.

But for one person, it was not over.

It's beginning now.

Sunset light from the west flashed across a skyscraper towering above the rest. The enormous letters mounted at its top reflected in his eyes.

ARES GUILD

An impregnable fortress that could not be brought down, and a magnificent royal palace.

How many Hunters were inside? How many enemies would he have to bring down before he could face the bastard on the throne?

Hundreds? Thousands?

It didn't matter. Hundreds or thousands.

Beneath the red sky, Jin Taekyung muttered, "Well, this is perfect weather for fucking someone up."

Whoosh!

Flames the color of the sunset coiled around his arm and surged upward. The entranced crowd drew back with a collective gasp.

At that moment—

"I'm here, you fucking bastard."

Whooooooosh—BOOM!

An unprecedented force shook the skyscraper.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A massive tremor shook everything around me. The area quaked as though an earthquake had struck.

Spiderweb cracks spread across the marble covering the floor without a gap, and the splendid, valuable works of art decorating the lobby fell like a sudden shower onto the cracked marble.

Crack! Crash!

That was what I saw as soon as I entered.

The thing that had just shattered was a plaster statue of some man. I couldn't remember its name, so I asked someone nearby.

"What was that statue? I saw it in an art textbook. Rodin's The Man Who Thought of Something?"

"…Ah. Ahh."

A young Ares Guild member who appeared to belong to the Security Team stammered with a frozen expression.

He looked so pitiful that I changed the question.

“Then what are your personal thoughts on today’s Monster Wave?”

“P-Pardon?”

“Lucky you. Just a grunt who doesn’t know anything.”

That was what saved his life.

Whoosh!

The Finger Qi I fired cut quietly through the air and struck his acupoints.

His body went rigid and collapsed. At the same instant, a streak of light shot toward me from beyond him.

Screeeeech! Boom!

An arrow grazed my ear and smashed into the entrance door. A middle-aged man who looked like an A-rank Hunter stood with his bowstring drawn taut, aiming at me.

And his was hardly the only weapon pointed my way.

Swish, swish, swish!

Dozens of Security Team members and hundreds of other Hunters filled the lobby, watching me with tense faces. Flames and ice gathered in some hands. Others held spears, swords, or bows.

A middle-aged Hunter presumed to be the Security Team Leader spoke in a rigid voice.

“Step back, Mr. Jin.”

Step back?

I couldn’t help letting out a hollow laugh. “That’s going to be difficult.”

“Why are you doing this?”

“I have plenty of reasons. I’m not sure you’d believe them if I told you, though.”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung, you…!”

I looked across the crowded lobby, my eyes hollow.

Who should I kill, and who should I spare? Which of them is directly connected to what happened today?

It took everything I had to hold back the urge to kill, rising as naturally as breathing.

Don’t forget. I’m not a monster.

If I killed everyone here today, I would become a monster. But I wanted to remain a human being until the end.

At the very least, I didn’t want innocent people dying for what their superior had done.

I thought that was the right thing to do for Kim Hwajong. For everyone.

“Let’s make this easy for everyone.”

I met hundreds of eyes and said, “Bring me Go Jun.”

“…!”

“…!”

An invisible resonance swept through the lobby and the hundreds of Hunters.

As the air tingled with it, I continued slowly.

“Right now.”

The Security Team Leader’s face stiffened. “I don’t think that will be possible.”

“Why not?”

“I have orders to stop you by any means necessary, Mr. Jin.”

“I see.”

“I don’t know what you came here for, but turn back while you still can. How many Hunters do you think are in this building? In Ares Guild House?”

“With this many in the lobby, a thousand altogether would be easy.”

“I guarantee that if you don’t leave now, everyone in this building will be after you within five minutes.”

I answered calmly.

“And I guarantee that if you don’t put down your weapons and run right now, within five minutes, every last one of you will be physically incapable of functioning normally.”

“…!”

“So get out of my sight. I don’t want to cripple people who had nothing to do with this.”

Whoooooosh!

A sudden wind swept through the lobby.

The Security Team Leader clenched his teeth beneath the powerful wave of qi pouring from my body. The polite tone he had struggled to maintain was gone, blown away by pressure beyond anything he had imagined.

“Why… Why go this far?”

“Because I’m a Hunter.”

“What?”

“Go Jun, that bastard, is a monster. Hunters don’t need a reason to kill monsters.”

Go Jun was hardly going to broadcast what he had done. Most of the people here probably had no idea what I meant.

But they would have realized one thing for certain.

Standing in my way would end badly for them.

The Security Team Leader looked at me with a complicated expression and muttered, “Fuck. What rotten luck.”

“I like your honesty. So, what’s your answer?”

The question wasn’t for him alone.

A conflicted light appeared in the eyes of the Security Team Leader and the roughly two hundred people surrounding me from every direction.

Their hands trembled around their weapons.

Then a voice boomed from the large speakers installed throughout the skyscraper.

> — Code Red. Code Red. Target: all Ares Guild members. Objective…

> — Jin Taekyung.

“…!”

“…!”

The air around us trembled.

The conflict vanished from hundreds of wide-open eyes, and countless streaks of light burst from their hands, becoming a gigantic flash that flooded every direction.

Kuwaaaaaaah!

Red, blue, and white.

I swung the dazzlingly white blade of my spear toward the enormous flash.

Whoooooosh!

Chapter 589

Countless rays of light gathered and gathered until they became a massive pillar.

Attack spells and debuffs descended from overhead. Spears, arrows, and other weapons hurled with all their might rained down around me.

But…

It was already too late to retreat. For me and for them.

Step.

I advanced toward the multicolored flashes.

As I stepped forward, I slashed White Flame diagonally downward. Scorching heat erupted from its spearhead and set everything around me ablaze.

Sssshhhhh!

Space warped. The searing blue-white hellfire forcibly dispelled every spell and devoured the weapons hurtling toward me at tremendous speed, still infused with mana.

Whoooosh!

"…!"

"…!"

Heat billowed upward, and the air shimmered. Beyond the haze, I could see hundreds of pairs of shocked eyes.

Realizing that every attack had come to nothing, the Security Team Leader drew his bowstring again. He fired ten arrows with Multi Shot and shouted, "Formation!"

Screeeeech!

While the arrows flew toward me, he moved like the wind in the opposite direction, retreating behind the tanks.

His quick judgment and precise attack were impressive, as befitted an A-rank Hunter of Ares Guild, but…

This time, you picked the wrong opponent.

I muttered the thought inwardly and thrust out my fist. The single punch driven along my smoothly rotating shoulder and arm smashed through the empty air.

Whoom! Bang!

A short, powerful straight punch.

Compressed air burst outward, whipping up a small typhoon around me. The ten arrows streaking toward me like rays of light struck it and veered off course.

Swish-swish-swish! Boom!

As the deflected arrows slammed into the lobby, I launched myself ahead of them.

I crossed the dozen or so meters[2678] between us and appeared before the Security Team Leader.

“You should’ve shot more gently. Then I would’ve made it hurt less.”

“…!”

I was far too close for him to draw his bowstring again.

Instead of answering, the Security Team Leader swung the bow in his hand. With a faint metallic click, a blade sprang from the tip of the bow and flew toward my chest.

Sssshhh!

He had probably mastered that move through thousands, perhaps tens of thousands, of repetitions.

But speed was relative. To my eyes, his attack was so slow and feeble that it made me want to yawn.

Slow enough to catch with one hand.

Clack.

The blade stopped half a handspan from me and trembled.

In a moment too brief to call an instant, I saw unmistakable shock flash across the Security Team Leader’s eyes. I tightened my grip on the middle of his bow.

Crack!

Strength beyond human limits shattered the defensive spell on the weapon, then snapped the bow made from hard monster bone.

Before the archer could cry out over the loss of his cherished weapon, my palm pressed against his chest.

Boom!

The Inner-Family Heavy Hand—striking the outside to damage the inside.

With a small explosive sound, the Security Team Leader shot backward like a cannonball.

He slammed into the lobby wall and spat blood. Screams and shouts erupted from every direction, and countless attacks poured toward me.

Swish-swish-swish! Boom-boom-boom!

Front, back, left, right. Thirty-six directions.

Watching the rays of light shoot toward me from every side, I let out a hollow laugh.

Three jiazi[2679] of Scorching Yang Qi rose from my dantian, became a fire dragon, and entered my spear.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear, First Form: Fire Dragon’s Single Tail.

Fwoosh! Whoooosh!

[2678] A dozen or so meters is roughly 12 m, or about 39 ft.

[2679] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Three jiazi represents 180 years of accumulated power.

I turned smoothly and swung the spear. Flames surged upward in a whirl, blocking and burning everything in their path.

I stepped forward without hesitation. The marble beneath my foot crumbled like sand.

Sssshhh!

A fierce wind brushed past my ears. Someone's desperate shout mingled with it.

"Stop him—!"

Boom!

The roar swallowed the rest of the shout. Dozens of tanks who had frozen in place to block my path were flung away, their screams filling the gap.

"Guh!"

"Graaaah!"

Bodies as hard as steel. Combat experience gained over hundreds of raids. None of it helped them now.

Overwhelming strength was enough to crush anything in its way.

Yet the Hunters in the lobby, who had turned against me after wavering, kept coming.

Their weapons caught the light of a half-severed chandelier and flashed as they closed in from every direction.

Pap-pap-pap!

Cheek, neck, armpit, waist, calf…

I saw and felt it all.

It wasn't only my body that had surpassed human limits.

Before my brain could pass along what my sharpened senses told it, I was already moving.

Crack!

I caught a swordsman's arm beneath my armpit and broke it.

Thud!

I drove my elbow into another Hunter's solar plexus and knocked him down.

Tap—swish-swish-swish!

I snatched an arrow flying toward my throat and flung it back the way it had come.

As I turned toward the enemies closing in from all sides, short screams pierced my ears.

"Gah!"

"Ugh!"

It wasn't happening in just one spot. Screams rang out across the lobby.

Every time I dodged a weapon, threw a punch or a kick, or swung the shaft of my spear, someone screamed and collapsed or flew away like a cannonball.

“Don’t hesitate! Fight!”

Boom! Whoooooom!

“Hit him all at once!”

Swish-swish-swish!

Two hundred against one.

No—a raid launched against a single human being. But I wasn’t the one being driven back. They were.

Magic? Weapons?

Nothing could touch me. I plunged deep into their formation and tore through it, wrecking it from within—without killing them.

I struck enough fear into them to keep them from charging at me again before today’s battle was over.

Crack-crack-crack!

“Graaaah!”

Boom!

Before one person’s scream had even ended, three people fell. By the time three screams rang out, five had collapsed.

They were sheep, and I was a great tiger.

With one difference: I had the patience to hold back from slaughtering them.

I’m not a monster. I’m not a monster.

I had to repeat it endlessly in my mind to calm the rage swelling inside me to the point of bursting.

Those who crossed to the other side of the river never returned. Jopil hadn’t. Neither had the forces of Dark Heaven, or Go Jun, who had stepped into the realm of monsters for the sake of his goal.

But I was a Hunter. A martial artist of Murim.

I suddenly remembered something a certain person had once told me—a person who had gone from being the greatest assassin of all time to the greatest physician under heaven.

The weak kill, but the truly strong can save lives instead. It means they can prevent innocent deaths, no matter the circumstances.

If I had been less powerful than I was now—if I had been both weak and evil—they would all have died.

But I was human, not a monster. And I had the strength to save them.

“Everyone… move aside.”

Boom!

The palm force I thrust out swept away dozens of people and sent them flying.

Maybe it was the battle that had gone on for hours without a break. Maybe it was the aftermath of One Annihilation. I was exhausted beyond measure.

Yet everything seemed slow and clear. Their movements. Their expressions. I caught every detail.

I could see the mages' staffs shining between the fragments of shattered Tower Shields.

Vrrrrrrm!

The Magic Gems embedded in the heads of the staffs vibrated faintly and gave off a dazzling glow.

But before their spells could take shape, I was already among the twenty or so mages.

"Ma—Magic Shi—!"

Too late.

Swish—thump!

A mage trying to cast a defensive spell went rigid and fell.

He wasn't the only one. Ten fingers sent out ten streams of Finger Qi. The instant they brushed the mages' acupoints, the mages crumpled like a collapsing wall.

But this was Ares Guild headquarters, a place said to recruit only the best. High-ranking Hunters—whom ordinary Hunters rarely even encountered—were as plentiful as grains of sand here.

"Binding!"

Shrrrriiiip!

Between the broken marble, vines burst from the wall where an unknown oil painting had once hung and wrapped around my ankles like whips.

Crack!

A magical rope appeared out of thin air and bound my wrists with tremendous force.

Was he the Team Leader in charge of the mages? An A-rank mage I had once seen on television fixed me with a look full of killing intent.

"Kill him."

At that moment—

Swish!

The air above my head rippled. A pale shadow, faint as mist, dropped toward the crown of my head.

Realizing that the sound cutting through the air came from a short sword, I let out a hollow laugh inwardly.

Look at these bastards.

I realized two things.

First, Code Red meant it didn't matter whether the target lived or died. Second, I had no reason to go easy on the ones who were actually trying to kill me.

In that case…

I welcomed it.

Boom!

The instant a short flame erupted, the assassin was flung away with his limbs twisted, unable even to scream amid the explosive roar.

The A-rank mage stared wide-eyed as I burned through every rope and vine, turning the assassin's short sword over in my hand.

"What are you doing? Why aren't you using Magic?"

"I-Ice Blo—!"

Crash! Thunk!

The short sword streaked forward like a ray of light, shattered the Magic Gem in his staff, and buried itself deep in his abdomen. The backflow of mana must have made the pain unbearable.

I struck the chest of the mage, who was screaming loudly enough to shake the lobby.

Boom!

The Inner-Family Heavy Hand was fatal to anyone, but it possessed even greater destructive power against those who directly handled mana, such as mages and healers.

Even if this one survived, he was in no shape to call himself a mage again. His eyes rolled back, and he collapsed.

I stared calmly at the mage, unconscious with an irrecoverable injury, and suddenly opened my mouth.

"Anyone else want to retire while we're at it?"

"…!"

"If not, go to sleep."

Swish-swish-swish! Thump!

Another volley of Finger Qi flew out. The remaining mages dropped without a fight, and silence fell over the lobby.

The clock straight ahead showed that only three minutes had passed since the battle began. Of the roughly two hundred Hunters, fewer than one in ten were still on their feet.

Wheeeeeeeeeeng!

Beneath the unending wail of the alarm, the scene was horrific.

Tanks were embedded in the walls. Damage dealers gasped in pain. Mages lay stiff, staring at the ceiling.

And there I stood, looking down at them all.

My voice came out through parted lips, hoarse and cracked.

“Don’t stand in my way again. There won’t be a second time.”

“…!”

“…!”

Those still standing and those on the floor alike stared at me with trembling eyes.

They must have understood by now. They weren’t alive because they had been lucky.

Step.

With the alarm blaring over the silent crowd, I walked slowly to the center of the lobby.

Then I channeled three jiazi[2680] of internal energy, kicked off the floor, and shot upward.

Screeeeech!

The lobby ceiling rushed toward me with the fierce wind. At the same time, blue-white flames flickered over my clenched fist.

The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist burst forth, burning through the air.

Kuwaaaaaang!

[2680] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Three jiazi represents 180 years of accumulated power.

Chapter 590

Everything began and ended in an instant.

Fwoosh.

The overwhelming heat of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist lived up to its name, surging upward in blue-white flames.

Kuwaaaaaang!

The tremendous roar that erupted the next moment swallowed every other sound.

Layer after layer of powerful defensive Magic gave way. Even ceilings made of exceptionally durable magical materials collapsed and melted under the extreme heat.

Boom! Boom! KABOOM!

One, three, five. Ten.

Each time a ceiling vanished, another appeared to block my path.

But I surged upward as a pillar of fire, smashing, piercing, and melting everything that stood in my way.

Boom. Crack.

How high had I climbed? How many ceilings had I broken through?

When I finally came to a stop, beyond the wavering flames…

“Fire!”

There were people waiting for me—no, enemies who had finished making every possible preparation.

Screeeeech!

As if they had been waiting for this moment alone, the enemies fired arrows, Magic, and everything else at once.

And at the moment countless rays of light shot toward me, I muttered a command in my mind that no one could hear.

Inventory. Store.

Swish.

The cool spear shaft vanished from my grip. I drew the lingering flames into both hands and thrust out my palms.

Flame Divine Palm.

Fwoosh. Whoooooosh!

Flame Divine Palm at eight-tenths mastery. A fire dragon burst from both palms and writhed through the air.

Terrible heat swept through the wide corridor stretching out on either side. Magic, arrows, and even people were caught in it.

“Graaaaaaaaaah!”

“Healer! Healeeer!”

When the flames died down, screams and a foul stench remained. The smell of cooking flesh hung over the corridor, and cries of pain rose from every direction.

If I had used my full strength, more than half of them would have burned to death without a scream.

“H-How could this…?”

I turned toward the voice.

At the end of the corridor, a dozen or so healers stood with their mouths open, staring at the scene before them.

“What are you doing? Get your asses over here and save your comrades.”

At my flat remark, a middle-aged woman who looked like a Team Leader bit her lip.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung, why on earth are you…?”

“Because there’s something I absolutely have to do. And because you people got in my way.”

“I don’t know what your circumstances are, but still… This is too much, isn’t it?”

Her eyes were full of fear and anger. Looking at her, I felt like the worst bastard in the world. Maybe that was why a hollow laugh escaped me.

The Ares Guild emblems sewn onto their clothes irritated me. So did the nerve of them.

That was why I stopped instead of walking away.

“Too far? Fuck, you’re the ones who went too far.”

“W-What?”

“I don’t think people who came swarming over to kill me at the words Code Red get to say that.”

“…!”

“I said all I needed was to meet one person. I even tried to avoid a fight with people who had nothing to do with this. But you attacked first, and you’re the ones who went down.”

I understood that they had no direct connection to Kim Hwajong’s death. How could the hands and feet know what the head had planned?

But receiving an order didn’t erase what they had done. They had assembled to kill a person because someone told them to.

“Why are you doing this? I don’t know what your circumstances are, but…”

My quiet voice carried over the low groans and echoed through the blackened corridor.

“Don’t spout bullshit. You should’ve thought about it before asking. Why did that bastard Jin Taekyung suddenly start acting like this? Why did a guy everyone praised for saving people and killing monsters come to our Guild and cause a scene, demanding that we bring out Go Jun? And why was an order given to kill him?"

These days, people called me a hero.

To give them the conclusion first: I wasn't. I didn't have some noble spirit of self-sacrifice. I cared about money, and I'd rather live for my own people than for strangers I'd never met.

But… I thought I'd lived without shame.

Since gaining power far beyond anything I deserved, I believed I'd used it for other people whenever I could.

I had always questioned myself—what kind of person I was, whether the choices I made were right.

"So why? Why? Why?"

I kept throwing out those empty questions. The vacant faces in my view disgusted and repulsed me.

"When you're told to kill someone, why do you come here without even questioning the order?"

No one answered. I knew the answer anyway.

Because they were nothing more than fingernails—not even Go Jun's hands and feet. Because they were dogs living off the food Go Jun and Ares Guild gave them.

Do the job, and they could gain more wealth and status. That was why they had stood in my way, just as they always had.

"Do you even have any idea what that bastard Go Jun has done? What if the Monster Waves in Busan and Pyeongchang were artificially caused by him?"

The moment I finished speaking, shouts erupted from every direction.

"Bullshit!"

"That's impossible!"

Right. I'd expected that. It was why I'd come all the way here.

I looked at their disbelieving faces and let out a laugh.

It was fascinating. They remained silent about why a man called a hero had invaded Ares Guild, yet when it came to other matters, they immediately denied everything.

"What did your bosses promise you for taking me down? A fast track to the top of the Guild? Enough money to keep your families fed for generations?"

"…!"

"And please, spare me the bullshit about needing money to raise your kids or support your widowed mother. None of you are going hungry."

Everyone here had made it. Whether they'd wanted to or not, they'd Awakened one day and shown enough talent to join Ares Guild.

I didn’t begrudge them the wealth or status that came with it. I’d once dreamed of having those things myself.

What disgusted me was that they’d chosen to do wrong to get even more, then found ways to justify it.

When each person stayed silent, the whole group learned to do the same. That was how they had become the defenders of Ares, an impregnable fortress.

“So.”

I took a deep breath. Exhaustion, anger, disgust—everything churned together in my chest.

“Stop spouting this fucking nonsense and lie down. Suck down your potions and get healed while you think about it. Today is my second birthday. Think of it that way.”

“…”

“…”

The corridor fell quiet. Even the groans I’d been hearing all around me stopped.

Those still standing and those lying on the ground alike either closed their eyes or firmly shut their mouths.

I ignored their trembling gazes and started walking. I didn’t forget a final goodbye.

“Morons.”

Whether my words had gotten through to them or they still thought like hunting dogs, I didn’t care. I had only one target.

And to reach the fucker who still hadn’t shown himself, I had plenty more obstacles to break through.

Step.

My foot came down on neatly trimmed grass.

The world was still in the middle of a bitterly cold winter, but after passing through the corridor, the garden spread out at its center was a lush spring.

I had no idea what floor I was on. Hundreds of flowers bloomed around me, and a smaller number of enemies waited among them.

“Quite a turnout, you fuckers.”

Swish!

My greeting was answered by an arrow packed with mana.

It was aimed straight at my eye. The archer was a nasty bastard, and with that much mana in the arrow, he was plainly trying to kill me.

In that case, returning the favor was only fair. At least, that was how I did things.

Clack. Swish!

I caught the arrow and hurled it back in the same motion.

The arrowhead flashed as it returned to its owner twice as fast and twice as powerfully as when it had first been fired.

Kang!

A white sword blade shuddered with a sharp metallic ring.

A middle-aged man in his fifties stared at me with deeply sunken eyes. He had deflected the arrow with an enormous greatsword.

His seasoned bearing and aura reminded me of a Murim martial artist nearing the far end of Peak.

“You’re as impatient as I heard, junior.”

“It’s nice to meet you, Senior.”

With all the courtesy of a junior, I cracked my knuckles.

Crack.

The joints, stiff with dried blood, made a sound like bones shifting out of place.

“If you step aside now, I’ll pass through quietly. Except for the bastard who fired that arrow.”

Slap!

The archer’s head snapped to one side.

The middle-aged man slapped the archer on his right across the face with lightning speed, then looked at me.

“He’s young and foolish. I ask you to show him mercy.”

“That wasn’t a mistake. I’ll have to break his wrist.”

“He should be grateful to get off with that. What matters is that he survives.”

What was with this guy?

He was different from the Ares Guild members I’d faced so far. As I watched him, the middle-aged man went on calmly.

“I appreciate your offer, but I’m afraid I have to refuse. I may not look it, but I’m a Guild executive. I have to hang on to your trouser leg, if nothing else.”

“That won’t end well for you.”

“What can I do? I’m a hunting dog too, in the end. I can guess how this will turn out, but I’d appreciate it if you went easy on me.”

What was it about his attitude?

I silently studied the middle-aged man. Then I suddenly arrived at a conclusion and opened my mouth.

“Song Cheonwoo. No—you’re with Director Song’s faction.”

His eyes widened. I’d guessed right.

Which meant I had no reason to fight them.

Song Cheonwoo had led his own faction within Ares Guild and openly opposed Go Jun. The middle-aged man in front of me must have shared his convictions.

“You… knew?”

“I heard it from someone close to him. We don’t need to fight. Step aside.”

The middle-aged man let out a hollow laugh.

“The enemy of my enemy is my ally?”

“At least right now, I don’t want to waste my strength or my time.”

Step.

As I started forward again, he raised his greatsword at an angle.

He was ready to attack. His troubled voice reached me.

“Stop. I don’t want to do this either, but I have no choice.”

I answered without stopping.

“If you don’t want to, why are you here? Because you’re a hunting dog who can’t do anything but obey orders?”

“…!”

“If you’re afraid of Go Jun, say you’re afraid. Don’t dress it up as having no choice.”

It wasn’t only the middle-aged man. Everyone looking at me had trembling eyes.

I continued forward. The more than a hundred people ahead of me backed away.

The middle-aged man’s composure began to crack.

“The tide has already turned. I heard Director Song returned to the United Kingdom this morning. What do you think that means? I had to find a way to survive. Even if it meant acting like a hunting dog.”

Song Cheonwoo had gone to the United Kingdom this morning? Obviously a lie.

Certain that Go Jun had put forward a stand-in, I let out a quiet snort of laughter.

“What if that hunting dog’s master dies today?”

“…!”

Every eye widened.

I reached into empty air and summoned White Flame from my Inventory. Its blade swept down diagonally.

Swish!

A single line cut through the air.

Everyone caught their breath. But there was no spray of blood, no death.

The Force that shot from the white spearhead had cut something other than a person.

Slice. Crash!

At the center of the garden stood an ornate fountain. The enormous stone statue planted atop it broke apart and collapsed.

The remains of a statue modeled after a man who was already dead crushed the flowers beneath it.

Its head, severed from the body, rolled and rolled until it reached my feet.

The statue was so lifelike I had no trouble recognizing its face.

Lee Jungryong.

That was right.

Today, the magnificent palace built by an ambitious warlord who had wanted everything would fall.

Along with the Disciple who had become a monster.

I tossed a few words at the stunned crowd.

“You have two choices. Put down your weapons and clear a path, or cover my back.”

“…!”

Chapter 591

Beep. Beep. Beep.

The ringing went on for a long time before abruptly cutting off.

Instead of the voice he had been waiting for, a familiar yet still strangely unfamiliar woman's voice came through the phone.

"Your call cannot be connected. After the beep, you will be directed to voicemail…"

Normally, he would have hung up. No, he would never have called in the first place.

But the middle-aged man had a vague sense that the words he was about to record might be the last he ever left his family.

Beeeeeeep.

The tone sounded, but he couldn't bring himself to speak.

What could he say to his wife, who was carrying their second child, and their child, who had only just turned four?

And just as the middle-aged man—Go Se-won—was finally about to speak after much thought…

Rumble…

A faint vibration shook the entire building. At the same time, the voice of a security-team member waiting outside seeped through the crack in the door.

"Team Leader, I think you need to come out."

"…"

"Team Leader?"

"Wait. I'm coming."

Go Se-won ended the call.

Maybe it's a sign. Someone telling me to stay alive and see my family again.

And if it isn't…

Then I suppose I don't even deserve to leave them my last words.

Go Se-won muttered bitterly to himself before opening the door. A security-team member with a hard, expressionless, familiar face was waiting for him.

"I'm sorry. It's just that outside—"

"I know. Let's go."

Go Se-won cut him off calmly and crossed the unlit corridor.

Ahead lay a vast circular hall befitting the top floor, with roughly a hundred fully armed elite Guild members inside.

And filling the hall was a holographic image.

BOOM!

A flash burst across it with a deafening explosion.

Fwooooooosh!

Rays of light surged from two opposing formations and shot toward each other.

“Graaaaaah!”

“Tanks! Reform the line!”

Screams and shouts came from every direction. Hundreds of Hunters clashed in a scene so vivid it might have been unfolding right before him.

Only minutes ago, they had belonged to the same Guild. Now they fought as enemies.

That’s…

Go Se-won watched the fierce battle in the hologram, his gaze darkening.

He recognized the faces fighting at the front: Guild executives from Song Cheonwoo’s faction.

Anti-Ares… So it’s come to this.

A body without a head was bound to fall.

But not this time. Song Cheonwoo, its head, had been removed, only for a stronger one to grow in his place. That was how a body sentenced to death had risen again.

In the hologram, a young man walked forward drenched in human and monster blood. He had become their new rallying point.

“A monster…”

Someone watching muttered the word like a groan.

At that moment, blue-white hellfire blazed around the young man—Jin Taekyung.

Fwoosh! KABOOOOOM!

A streak of flame tore through the space, scorching everything around it.

Huge Tower Shields shattered. Dozens of tanks who had held firm as an iron wall were sent flying at once, and the balance that had held until then collapsed.

“Graaaaaah!”

“Now! Attack!”

Amid spraying blood and falling bodies, the flame that had incapacitated an entire raid team in one blow kept shooting forward.

Screeeeeech!

It was an inextinguishable flame, an unstoppable meteor.

Ceilings said to withstand bombardment collapsed like dominoes, and the forces waiting on each floor fell like bundles of straw.

Whenever the hologram wavered, unable to keep pace with the flame, Jin Taekyung was already on another floor, bringing down new enemies.

“St-Stop him…!”

KABOOOOOM!

Nothing could stand against that overwhelming power. Jin Taekyung had become a streak of flame, shooting onward without pause.

As the troops stationed floor by floor crumbled, the executives in Song Cheonwoo's faction—still wavering, still unable to decide—finally turned their weapons on their former allies.

"W-we're on the eighty-fifth floor! Managing Director Kim Jong-pil and Team Thirteen have betrayed us. Gah!"

"Headquarters, respond! There's a revolt on the ninety-seventh floor…!"

Fwoosh! Boom!

A strong current became a wave. A rolling snowball grew larger.

That was what was happening now. The fire that had been racing in one direction had spread on all sides.

And Go Se-won knew Jin Taekyung's flame would not go out until his anger subsided—until it swallowed one man whole.

"The target has broken through the hundredth floor!"

"Fighting has broken out on twelve floors at once! Hostile elements have joined the target and are engaging our forces!"

"The target is moving alone! He's on the 103rd floor! No—the 104th!"

Urgent reports flew from every direction. The executives who had seemed so relaxed when first summoned to the top floor now looked anxious.

"H-hey, Team Leader Go. May I ask you something?"

Go Se-won answered without looking away from the hologram.

"Go ahead, Executive Director Choi."

"I've been wondering for a while…"

The half-gray-haired man swallowed. Then he voiced the question on everyone's mind.

"Where… where on earth is the Vice Guild Master?"

Go Se-won glanced around. Among the hundred or so people in the hall, the one man who should have been fighting ahead of them all was nowhere to be seen.

Yet despite the bleak situation, Go Se-won felt lighter.

Yes. This should be enough.

When told to bite, he bit. When told to bark, he barked.

He had been one of the countless war orphans left by the Great Cataclysm. He had risen to his present position by living as a faithful hunting dog.

The irony was that knowing it made him sick with himself.

With this, I've repaid everything I owed you. Whether I live or die, it has nothing to do with you anymore.

Go Se-won muttered those words in his heart toward the person who still refused to appear, then firmly drew his sword.

Shing.

His calm voice cut through the sharp sound.

“The Vice Guild Master… He won’t be coming.”

“W-what did you say?”

“So fight if you want to live. You’ve eaten far too much from his hand to spit it back out now.”

Everyone here was a hunting dog. They had taken the food their master gave them and lived well on it. They had no choice left.

I’m no different.

A humorless laugh escaped Go Se-won. The executives stared at him.

Then a cry rang through the enormous hall.

“The 119th floor! The target has broken through the 119th floor!”

“…!”

“…!”

No one had trouble understanding what that meant. They all knew the building they came to work in every day had 120 floors.

He’s coming.

There was no avoiding the fight.

Clad in full armor, a sword in one hand and a spear in the other, Go Se-won spoke with a heavy heart.

“Formation. Prepare for battle.”

His quiet command reached the hundred Hunters around him.

Rumble! KABOOM!

With a deafening roar accompanied by a tremendous vibration, one of the world’s most famous skyscrapers shook.

An uninvited guest had set foot on the top floor of an impregnable fortress no one had ever been able—or dared—to challenge.

Step.

A lone figure appeared through the rising dust.

Every hair on Go Se-won’s body seemed to stand on end. He hurled his spear with all his strength.

Whoosh! Screeeeeech!

Slice!

The spear hurtling toward me split apart, along with the cloud of dust.

Through the clear path White Flame had cut, I saw a middle-aged man who looked strangely familiar.

Where have I seen him?

The answer came almost at once.

At Lee Jungryong's national funeral, a new Head of Security had stood beside Go Jun like a shadow. This was him.

The name I had heard in passing back then was probably…

"Go Se-won."

His eyes trembled faintly when I said it.

Maybe he was surprised I knew his name. Maybe it was how easily I'd dealt with his spear.

Either way, I'd finally found someone who might give me a proper answer. I asked the question I'd repeated dozens of times since entering the lobby.

"Go Jun. Where is he?"

Before I'd finished speaking, a flash shot from Go Se-won's hand.

Whoosh! KABOOM!

A throwing spear missed me by a hair and buried itself in the floor, leaving a small crater.

It was a signal.

Fwish-fwish-fwish!

Go Se-won wasn't the only one waiting on the top floor. Roughly a hundred Ares Guild members filled the hall, every one of them worthy of being called a high-ranking Hunter. They attacked together.

Fwoosh!

A vast surge of energy shook the hall, filling it with blue, red, and brilliant light.

Their attacks were stronger and their barrage denser than anything I'd faced on the way up. I stepped forward alone.

Step.

My foot struck the floor, charged with internal energy, and flames rose to heat the air.

Flamefire Path.

Fwoosh! Screeeeeech!

One step was enough. I erased more than ten meters[2681] of distance and struck at the air with my palm.

Arrows melted before the blue-white hellfire. Every spell flying toward me came apart.

BOOM!

Water, earth, wind, flame.

[2681] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

The intense heat of Scorching Yang Qi ignored even elemental affinities. As attack spells made from all four elements burst outward, the tanks at the front swiftly raised their Tower Shields.

KABOOM!

Despite the considerable impact, the Tower Shields didn't waver an inch. They blocked the aftermath of the Magic without suffering the slightest damage, then tilted diagonally.

At the same moment, twenty figures sprang up, using the wall of steel as a foothold.

Pat-pat-pat!

I understood at once. Everyone gathered here was among Ares Guild's elite. But the ones coming at me now were in another class.

Killing intent.

Their movements were spare and swift. Their calm, impassive eyes had the look of practiced killers.

More than twenty weapons stabbed and slashed at the speed of light, flashing brightly.

Screeeeeech!

As they came at me from every angle, I couldn't hold back a short laugh.

"What a load of bullshit. You fucking morons."

"…!"

In the slowed world, I saw shock spread across their blank faces.

But it was too late to turn back. For them and for me.

Slice!

Blue-white Force extended from White Flame's spearhead. The incoming weapons lost their strength, and five bodies split in two.

Having turned five bodies into ten with one strike, I drove my fist into empty air.

BOOM!

Compressed air wasn't the only thing that burst.

A stealthily approaching assassin toppled over, headless. By then, the chain sickle in his hand was already moving at my will.

Whoosh! Thud!

Wielded by Seizing an Object Through Empty Space, it buried itself in another man's neck.

His once-calm eyes flew wide. As he began to fall, I planted my palm against his chest.

BOOM!

The force of my Flame Divine Palm wasn't meant to finish him off. He was already dead.

It struck the enemy behind him, who had been about to use his comrade's body as a shield while thrusting his spear.

"Graaaaaah!"

Blood burst from the man's seven apertures[2682].

Before the man whose heart meridians had been severed throughout his body could even lower his head, I was already moving toward another enemy.

Crack!

My fist crushed a head.

Fwish! Thud-thud!

Finger Qi shot through another enemy's neck and chest. He dropped his weapon and pressed a hand to the blood gushing from his throat. It wasn't enough.

"Ghk. Guh…"

The light faded rapidly from his eyes. I watched the last of them collapse, my gaze cold.

You brought this on yourselves.

On another day, I might have let them live. But not today. Not now.

As when the Black Hunters had attacked Uncle Kkeokjeong, I had no intention of stopping. I couldn't stop.

I have to show them here. Make sure this never happens again.

I had been a Hunter long before I became a martial artist.

I had also been a modern man born in the twenty-first century, someone who had lived in a civilized society where reason and the law existed. That was why I hadn't been able to eliminate Go Jun in Sichuan.

Unlike Lee Jungryong, whom I had been able to eliminate amid chaos and destruction, Go Jun had been protected by a fence built from the two-syllable Korean term for the rule of law.

But now none of that mattered.

My choice had allowed Go Jun to live. He had crossed a river he could never cross back. And I—no, all of us—had lost Kim Hwajong.

I would never again see the half-gray-haired old butler who had always spoken to me with a polite, gentle smile.

That was why I had come here. Why I had torn down the fence called the rule of law and made myself an outlaw.

Splash.

My blood-soaked footsteps sounded unnaturally loud.

A suffocating silence had settled over the vast hall. Everyone stood frozen by the slaughter they had witnessed.

[2682] The seven apertures are the eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouth.

But the face I wanted wasn't among them. Neither was the one man who could tell me where to find him.

Go Se-won.

I turned my head to look for Go Jun's right hand.

A faint, stealthy sound cut through the air.

Whoosh!

I turned around and slammed my hands together as though in prayer.

KABOOM!

The sharp sword blade caught between them stopped just above my forehead.

Its owner, Go Se-won, spoke calmly.

"Looking for me?"

"Yeah."

I pressed my palms together harder. The Sword Energy—or rather, Aura—formed from powerful mana yielded to my blue-white Force.

Unable to withstand my immense internal energy, the sword glowed red and began to melt.

Drip, drip. Hiss!

As the molten steel struck the floor, I thrust out a hand blazing with heat.

BOOM!

One palm strike was enough. Layer upon layer of defensive Magic shattered, and Go Se-won's armor broke apart.

But the blow that shook him to the core didn't bring him down. He swallowed the blood rising in his throat and reached for my shoulder with his gauntlet.

He tried to, anyway.

Tap-tap-tap! BOOM!

A flowing grappling technique followed seamlessly. Another burst of heat drove Go Se-won back, and he thrust out his hand.

Fwish!

A blade sprang from between the plates of his gauntlet and grazed my chin. I felt a sting, caught his wrist, and twisted.

Crack! KRAK!

My grip crushed the gauntlet. Flesh tore, exposing white bone.

The pain must have been worse than he'd imagined, but Go Se-won didn't scream. Pale-faced, he asked flatly,

"Is that it?"

"No. Not yet."

I caught his other arm.

KRAK!

He sucked in a breath.

This time the pain broke through his composure. Blood ran between his lips, and his voice shook.

“Take it easy… and finish it.”

“That’s the plan. After I hear where that bastard Go Jun is.”

“What if the confidentiality clause in my employment contract says I can’t?”

I gripped his collarbone.

“Then it definitely won’t end with just taking it easy.”

Go Se-won gave a weak laugh.

“You searched everywhere and still couldn’t find him. Of course you couldn’t.”

Unfortunately, he was right. I’d fought my way through an endless pack of hunting dogs and wrecked the inside of the building, but Go Jun had never appeared.

If there was one thing I had gained from all the information I had collected so far, it was the identity of the secret area where he was staying.

“Area A. I think you know where it is.”

Cough.

Go Se-won spat blood.

“I picked a bad day. I was planning to hand in my resignation soon.”

“Enough talking. Tell me.”

“That’s easy. But I have a condition.”

“T-Team Leader Go. You’re not going to tell that crazy bastard—!”

There was always someone who couldn’t read the room. The nameless executive who stepped forward soon went quiet, though. Few people could go on talking after taking Finger Qi to the throat.

“A condition?” I asked.

“Yes.”

What he said next caught even me off guard.

“…You want me to kill you?”

Go Se-won gave a small nod. Even as pain wracked his body, his eyes remained calm, reflecting my face.

“It’s too late to go back to how things were. Do it cleanly. Right here. That’s all.”

“…”

“I think you understand.”

Breathing heavily, Go Se-won raised a trembling finger and pointed somewhere.

When I finally learned where Area A was, I stopped short.

Empty air?

It was hard to make sense of at first, but the world called things like this Magic. Besides, I’d experienced things far stranger and more dangerous than Magic.

Where?

I stared into the empty air. After a moment, an unfamiliar sensation stirred in my exhausted body.

What's this?

I couldn't see it. But I could feel another space there, surrounded by an immense, carefully concealed energy.

It was hidden so perfectly that it could only be detected by someone who recognized its existence.

Go Se-won had kept his end of the bargain. His lips, turning blue, began to move.

"Now kill—"

Bzzzz.

A vibration cut him off.

A smartphone slipped from the trouser pocket of the suit exposed beneath his broken armor and rolled across the floor.

Tap. Bzzzz.

A family photo lit up its cracked screen beneath the caller's name: Wife.

A young child and his wife smiled brightly. Beside them stood Go Se-won, his expression stiff.

"…"

For a moment, neither of us spoke. I looked from the photo on the cracked screen to the cracks showing in his expression.

I remembered his request to be killed. The calm way he'd said it was too late to go back.

"Let me ask you something."

"…?"

"Why is today your last day at work?"

Go Se-won hesitated, then answered with a sigh.

"Turns out the job doesn't suit me. Especially… my boss is a fucking asshole."

"Yeah. Got it."

Did Go Se-won know that answer had decided his fate?

I quietly drew up my internal energy.

Not toward my fist.

Toward my legs.

"You—"

KABOOM!

The rest of his words vanished beneath the roar.

I was already soaring into the empty air high above. Fierce wind rushed past me. I felt the strange buoyancy of being seized by invisible hands, and the unknown space that refused entry to anyone without permission.

But I was an outlaw. I didn’t need permission.

There.

Everything had a flow.

I took a deep breath and closed my eyes. Blue-white Force burst from the spearhead in my hand and tore through the empty air.

Swooooooosh!

Chapter 592

Whoooosh.

Red mist rose with his exhaled breath.

It was a long, slow breath—so long and slow that one might mistake him for not breathing at all. It was also a secret technique he had learned from his Master long ago.

“I’ve been watching you all this time.”

“M-Me?”

Nearly thirty years had passed, but Go Jun had never forgotten that day. It was the day he first found a dream.

He had lost his parents, been abandoned by his relatives, and drifted from one orphanage to another.

“The other children you live with are talented, too. But you’re different. You’re very special.”

The Great Cataclysm had left behind more than death and peace. It had created an enormous number of war orphans, and Go Jun was one of them.

Just one of countless war orphans. If he had remained ordinary, he would have been raised like a chicken confined to a poultry farm, then turned loose on society.

But meeting his Master, Lee Jungryong, had made him someone special.

That was the greatest reason he had stayed alone in Area A after everyone else had disappeared, waiting for the person who would soon come crashing in.

He could not flee his Master’s enemy from the place where his Master had once lived.

“…Jin Taekyung.”

Go Jun’s voice was chilling. His tightly shut eyes slowly opened, and he drew the red glow back into them. Then he instinctively reached for his neck.

Clink.

His fingers touched cold metal.

He did not even know who had originally owned this cheap necklace. Yet it had become the keepsake his Master had left him, and his most precious possession, for one reason alone: it was the only thing that had kept its shape when everything else in that place turned to ash.

Are you watching, Master?

Go Jun clenched his fist. Red qi shimmered like heat haze over the skin stretched taut across his prominent veins.

Only two months ago, Jin Taekyung had trampled him mercilessly. But things were different now.

Hatred greater than his fear, and the power he had newly acquired, had allowed Go Jun to overcome it.

I'll kill him. Today. With my own hands.

Was it his imagination? Or a coincidence?

At that very moment, the black jewel set into the necklace gave off a strange light.

Rumble!

A tremendous vibration shook the space.

This was a place where anyone who had not been granted permission could not even become aware of its existence. Now, at last, it had allowed someone to intrude.

Countless spells and barriers that had never once been broken since their creation were collapsing even now.

"He's here."

Go Jun muttered quietly, released his cross-legged position, and slowly rose to his feet. Top-grade magic armor surged up around his body, wrapping around him according to his will.

Clatter-clatter-clatter!

The transformation began and ended in an instant.

By the time Go Jun stood firmly on both feet in blackened full-body armor, blue-white flames were flickering like will-o'-the-wisps at the end of the unlit corridor.

No. It was the glow in someone's eyes.

"Jin Taekyung…!"

He spat the three syllables with hatred. The man whose name he had called answered willingly.

"Yeah. So you were here."

Unlike the burning glow in his eyes, his voice was cold.

But Go Jun could clearly feel it—the ember hidden inside that voice. The fuse that had refused to burn while waiting for this one moment.

And then—

"Thanks."

Fwoosh.

At last, the flame caught. A voice boiling like lava heated the dark corridor.

"For staying here all this time."

An overwhelming energy pressed down on the space.

Rrrrmmble!

There would be no more waiting.

As the world shook, two figures became streaks of light and shot across the corridor toward each other.

The instant the blue and red streaks met—

Whoom, KABOOM!

A blinding flash and a deafening roar that seemed to split the sky erupted, coloring the entire area.

The most important thing when facing an enemy was composure. When reason grew clouded, the mind became unsettled. When the mind became unsettled, the hands and feet lost their coordination.

Maintaining composure was the surest way to win.

That rule held true in both the modern world and Murim, and I had always followed it.

But…

"Jin Taekyung."

The moment I heard the hatred in his voice and saw that fucking face clearly beyond the dark corridor, I realized something.

Composure was no shield against anger reason could not contain.

Once that fire caught, there was no controlling it.

"Thanks."

My eyes grew hot. I had fought my way through a 120-story skyscraper and around a thousand enemies without wavering once, but now my heart churned.

I thought of the silver-haired old butler collapsed against a snow-covered rock and continued.

"…For staying here all this time."

I meant every word. I was sincerely grateful to Go Jun.

Because he had stayed instead of running, I could end his life with my own hands.

Rrrrmmble!

My dantian was half empty after all the internal energy I had spent, but what remained was enough. A massive wave spread out from me and shook Area A.

For this moment, I could forget the fatigue of the endless battles and the growing weight of my limbs.

I'll kill him.

With that one thought, I stepped forward.

Flamefire Path.

Flames rose from the tips of my feet as I kicked off the ground and surged forward. They drove back the darkness that had conquered the corridor and illuminated the way.

At the far end, a figure was streaking across the corridor as a beam of light.

Go Jun.

I could see the red glow of his eyes between his clenched teeth and the helmet pulled low over his face.

The instant light flashed from the waist of the man charging toward me without hesitation, I raised White Flame's shaft.

Whoom, KABOOM!

Two enormous energies of different colors tangled amid the roar.

The collision sent a tremendous force back through my weapon. A wave of energy slashed in every direction like a blade.

Beyond our locked weapons, I saw his red eyes. Then his voice reached me.

"You're not much, are you? Don't you think?"

"…!"

My eyes widened despite myself.

His feet should have been knocked backward. Instead, they were planted firmly in the ground.

And that was not the only thing I had failed to anticipate.

Crunch. Crrrunch.

An unbelievable pressure traveled up White Flame's shaft. An enormous power, large enough that it would not have been strange for it to explode at any moment, continued to flow out and wrap around the sword blade.

Slowly, but without stopping, it continued to grow in size and crushed White Flame's shaft.

What is this?

I had never faced Force this immense—or rather, an Aura Blade of this magnitude.

At the sight of me frozen there, Go Jun's eyes filled with delight.

"You should've put that stupid head of yours to work and wondered why I stayed."

"You…!"

Before I could finish, the Aura Blade surrounding his sword swelled outward as if it had exploded.

Craaaack, KABOOM!

A roar left my ears ringing. A powerful shock swept through my body, and a red flash filled my vision as I flew backward.

Before I could fully feel the wind rushing past my ears, my back struck a solid marble wall.

KRAK!

The layers of defensive Magic surrounding it scattered, and the whole wall caved in.

I was embedded in the exact center of the wall, leaving behind a crater large enough for three or four people to stand inside. I blinked.

My vision trembled from the impact to my head. Through it, I saw Go Jun charging at me with his teeth bared.

“I’ll kill you.”

Whooooooosh!

He moved faster than he spoke. His sword cut diagonally down through the air, sending out a burst of red light.

Then, in the next instant, a crescent-shaped Aura Blade that had crossed dozens of meters[2683] came rushing right up to my face.

Slice! KRAAAAAASH!

I escaped by a hair.

My aching body moved on instinct, carrying me clear of the attack. Looking at the space the Aura Blade had shredded, I thought:

What if I’d tried to block that head-on?

The answer was easy enough.

I was more exhausted than I had realized.

Suppressing two Monster Waves had made me bear the full aftermath of One Annihilation. Then, from the moment I entered Ares Guild, I had fought while holding back enough to avoid killing most of my opponents.

Facing an attack like that head-on in my current condition would not have ended well.

“Jin Taekyung. Jin Taekyung. Jin Taekyung.”

Go Jun hummed my name like a tune, then grinned.

“You should see your face. You’re no hero. You’re just a rat. You’ll die crying and begging for your life.”

I watched him approach, his voice almost cheerful. Then a thought struck me.

“Did you take something?”

“What?”

“No, wait. In this case, should I call it a Magic Gem instead of drugs?”

“…!”

At that moment, the smile on Go Jun’s lips faded.

I no longer needed an answer. His face had given me one.

“Hah.”

I let out a small, hollow laugh.

The rage that had paralyzed my mind and body for a moment began to fade, and only then was I finally able to see the cold reality in front of me.

“Of course. That’s how you did it.”

[2683] Dozens of meters is roughly 20–90 m, or about 66–300 ft.

“Seeing someone in a new light” and “improving by leaps and bounds” were just four-character idioms. At least when it came to martial arts.

Martial strength had to be honed through training and real combat.

Even with the System, I could not have grown stronger at that rate. Go Jun certainly could not have done it.

No one became this strong in only two months.

There had only ever been one answer.

“You juiced up. You really did. You fucking idiot.”

I couldn’t hold back my laughter.

It wasn’t amusement. It was disgust. Go Jun had chosen to give up being human and become a monster, and the sheer stupidity of it kept making me laugh.

“Fuck, I’ve never seen an idiot like you. You couldn’t beat me any normal way, so you started sucking down Magic Gems? If you were going to do that, why not go to Magic Johnson? I bet that guy would’ve taken real good care of you with his magic wand.”

I had hit a nerve. Go Jun’s face went rigid, and his already-red eyes darkened further.

“Shut your fucking—”

“Just shut up and listen, you son of a bitch.”

Thud. Thud.

Rubble and chunks of marble fell away as I got up.

I cracked my stiff neck from side to side and stared at him.

“What? You set off a few Monster Waves with an S-grade Magic Gem and pissed yourself over how well it worked? Watched people die because you barely lifted a finger and thought you were a god? No, sir, you fucking moron. You’re just a monster. At best, you’re some idiot side character with a Named Monster for a constellation.[2684]”

“Shut up!”

“Fuck off. Want me to give it a title, too? Go Jun Swallows an S-Grade Magic Gem.”

“Jin Taekyuuung—!”

Fwooooooosh!

A gale rose with a tremendous wave of energy and swept through the area.

But I calmly answered as I watched that unprecedented power swell until it looked ready to burst.

“What, you fucking idiot?”

I had never been afraid. Now that I knew what he had become, I had no reason to hesitate.

[2684] In Korean fantasy fiction, a constellation is a powerful being who acts as a character’s patron.

He was a monster who had crossed the line, and he had to die by my hand today.

For the old butler who had fallen into a darkness from which he would never return. For the people and Hunters who had died in the Monster Waves.

And… for me, furious at this goddamned reality.

“You have to die.”

I bit out the words with all my heart. Go Jun’s blood-red figure blurred.

Whoooooosh! KABOOM!

The red Aura Blade stopped above my head.

The tremendous pressure transmitted through White Flame’s spearhead made my wrists throb, and my ankles sank deep into the ground.

But I did not give way. At least the power I wielded had been built through countless hours of training and insight, with the good fortune of the System added on top.

“Get lost, you drugged-up bastard.”

Rrrrmmble!

I grinned as I looked into Go Jun’s wide-open eyes, then thrust my fist forward with all my strength.

Wham!

Chapter 593

Wham!

My fist slammed into Go Jun's chest with a dull thud.

The layers of defensive Magic shattered at once, and part of his sturdy full-body armor caved inward. He gritted his teeth and roared.

"Jin Taekyung!"

That punch would have left most high-level Hunters or Peak masters with severe Internal Injury, unable to fight.

But Go Jun was different. Perhaps it was the Magic Gem's influence, but even my Inner-Family Heavy Hand had failed to do much damage.

An S-rank Hunter. And more.

Whatever else had happened, he was already a recognized S-rank Hunter. He had learned an internal cultivation technique—what the modern world called a mana cultivation technique—and absorbed the energy of an S-grade Magic Gem from a Named Monster. His strength was immense.

"Die!"

Whoooooom! KABOOM!

The energy had gone beyond red. Now the color of blood, it burst outward like an explosion.

White Flame's shaft trembled under the mountain of pressure bearing down from the enormous Aura Blade.

I haven't been pushed this hard in a long time.

Right now, even three jiazi[2685] of internal energy and physical abilities beyond human limits felt inadequate.

Maybe it was the fatigue I'd built up over the course of the day. Or maybe Go Jun had absorbed that much magical power.

One thing was certain: this idiot had gained far more strength than I'd expected.

Rrrrrumble. Crack!

The tremendous pressure drove me and the ground beneath me downward. By the time I was buried up to my ankles, Go Jun was baring his teeth in a grin.

"Starting to get it? Hmm? Finally feel like you're fucked?"

He gave a low laugh.

He was enjoying this. He thought he was finally going to avenge his Master.

"Ever since the day my Master died, I've killed you every night. Over and over. I've lived for a moment like this."

I watched for an opening as I answered.

[2685] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi are 180 years.

“No wonder I felt like I’d been born again every morning. I thought I was just waking up refreshed from dreaming about Jungryong dying every night.”

Fwoosh!

The instant his blood-red energy wavered, I yanked my foot free and kicked upward.

Boom!

My toes, swinging like a beam of light, were blocked by his shin with a thunderous crash. Go Jun, who had been about to pour out his anger, let out a hollow laugh.

“It’s too late to struggle. Now that it’s come to this, killing the rest of them will be easy.”

“What?”

I blinked, not quite understanding him. Then his quiet voice reached my ear.

“You and that goddamned Peace Guild. Your parents and that bitch of a little sister waiting at home… Ah. Your father’s already dead, isn’t he? Doesn’t matter. If he were still alive, he’d be following his son to the grave soon enough.”

“…”

“Did you like having the world call you a hero? Think you’d all live happily ever after? It’s bullshit. Kim Hwajong, that old man, was only the beginning.”

His sticky, unpleasant breath touched my face. He cackled.

“This time it’s you, then Choi Minwoo. After that, I don’t care who it is. I’ll kill everyone with even the slightest connection to you, one by one. Sweeping them all away with a Monster Wave sounds good, too. What do you think?”

I stared at him, blinking as he went on.

What the fuck is this bastard saying?

It was strange. The thing in front of me looked human, but all that came out of its mouth was the sound of a dog barking.

Here stood a monster in a human shell.

He’s going to kill them? All my people?

I felt sick.

Go Jun could make good on those words. I hated that he could. And when I pictured the people I couldn’t live without lying dead, my mind went blank.

Mother. Hayeon. Team Leader Choi. Uncle Kkeokjeong, Song Song, Jinho hyung[2686]…

Their faces flashed before my eyes, one after another. So did the graying old butler who had died on the snow-covered mountain.

He’s going to kill them all, and he wants to know what I think?

My answer came out calm.

“Fine. I understand.”

[2686] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male friend.

"What?"

"Go ahead. Try it."

The smile on Go Jun's face faded. I drew on every bit of strength I had.

Grrrrrkk.

The spear, slowly sinking under the pressure, stopped. So did my bending knees.

For that moment, I forgot my fatigue. My muscles still ached as though they might tear from the lingering aftermath of One Annihilation, but I forgot the pain, too.

The anger layered over my fatigue and pain covered and paralyzed everything else.

Internal energy boiled like lava through my Eight Extraordinary Meridians and hundreds of acupoints.

When I spoke, my voice burned.

"You shouldn't have said that."

"…!"

"You shouldn't have talked about my people that way. At the very least, you shouldn't have."

I'd suspected it. Go Jun was capable of doing exactly what he'd threatened.

But suspecting it myself and hearing it directly from his mouth were entirely different matters.

"Don't you think, you inhuman piece of shit?"

Go Jun was a monster. Whether he'd always been one or I'd made him into one no longer mattered.

He had to die for my people to live. And they had to live for me to live.

Grrrrrrkk!

I hauled my foot out of the ground and straightened my knee.

Putting my back and arms into it, I drove the spear shaft up against the Aura Blade's pressure.

Slowly. Little by little. Without stopping.

"How are you…?"

As Go Jun's eyes widened, I whispered a command in my mind.

Inventory open. Store White Flame.

Pop.

It happened in an instant.

The spear and the blue-white flames holding back the enormous Aura Blade vanished. With nothing opposing it, the blood-red energy plunged straight down.

Whoooooom! Slice!

It cleaved through the space where I'd stood. But I was already gone.

Dozens of hairs, severed by the sword pressure, scattered past my shoulder. My fist was already deep inside Go Jun's guard, wreathed in blue-white hellfire.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

The world slowed. Space warped in the ultra-high temperature heat. It looked almost like the expression Go Jun was making now.

"No—"

Too late.

I answered without a sound and threw my punch.

Fwoosh! KABOOM!

The impact drowned out the rest of his cry. My fist burned through the air and struck his solar plexus, sending him flying like a cannonball.

I launched myself after him.

Whooooooosh!

Wind rushed past my ears.

In less than an instant, I covered more than ten meters[2687] and overtook him. As he hurtled toward me, I clasped my hands together and brought them down like a hammer.

CRASH! KRAKAKAK!

The blow struck his abdomen. Already battered, the upper half of his armor melted under the Scorching Yang Qi.

Go Jun hit the ground on his back and smashed through it. Blood erupted from his mouth.

Pshhh!

I moved to drive my fist into him while he was down, but the blood he spat drenched me.

My vision turned red. I faltered for a fraction of a second, and my senses screamed a warning.

Danger!

He hadn't spat blood by accident. It was part of his attack.

I kicked off the ground the instant I realized it. Red energy shot toward me as I retreated.

Shhk! Slice!

Heat seared my side.

I'd moved as fast as I could, but the Aura surging from the sword Go Jun had never let go of was too large to evade completely.

Drip. Drip-drip.

I pressed a hand to my bleeding side and wiped the blood from my eyes.

[2687] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

Go Jun was already on his feet and charging, his helmet discarded.

His furious shout rang through the devastated corridor.

“You fucking bastard!”

Whoooooosh!

Blood-red Aura burst from the tip of his sword and tore through the air.

I narrowly avoided it with a series of backward steps, then flung both arms out.

With the Magic only I could use.

Inventory open. Summon.

Shhk-shhk-shhk!

A moment ago, my hands had been empty. Now dagger handles met my palms, and the blades flew from my grasp.

Streaks of light shot toward Go Jun. He hurriedly turned his sword sideways, holding the blade across his front.

Clang-clang-clang-clang!

Four daggers bounced off it and lodged in the walls and ceiling. I drew up my internal energy and sent it into my legs. Flames rose from the foot I set forward.

Flamefire Path.

Fwoosh! Whoooooosh!

I became a streak of flame racing toward Go Jun. Seeing me charge without my spear, he roared.

“I’ll kill you!”

His eyes were blood-red now, their glow bright in the darkness.

Then an energy unlike anything he’d unleashed before burst from his body and swept in every direction.

WHOOOOOOOOOM!

It was a raging storm, a fog with no way out. Far from tiring, he was giving off an even stronger wave of energy.

I kept going, shooting through that murky, violent fog of magical power.

Go Jun charged through it toward me.

Zzzzzzzzz!

His Aura Blade, an absurd two meters[2688] long, came cleaving through the air.

Each time I twisted aside to avoid it, the sword pressure carving up the space around me tore my skin and drew blood.

That was fine. As long as I didn’t fall.

As long as I could bring him down, make him pay for Kim Hwajong’s death, and protect everyone still alive from another threat.

Slice!

[2688] Two meters is about 6.6 ft.

A burning pain swept across my chest.

My clothes and armor had long since been torn away in the fight. A thin line appeared on my bare skin, then reddened.

Fwoosh!

Blood spurted from my chest. The cut was shallow, but the immense energy forcing its way through it made my vision swim.

I steadied myself and kicked off the ground.

Boom!

I shot forward, leaving the crash behind me. At the end of my path stood a monster who had chosen to stop being human.

“Jin Taekyuuung!”

Go Jun charged with his sword held upright. The Aura Blade around it had turned a murky, dark red.

The closer I got, the more clearly I felt that sticky, unpleasant energy.

That isn’t mana anymore.

The world had another name for energy so corrupted and ominous, the opposite of pure mana.

Magical power.

The moment the words came to mind, I knew I had to use everything I had.

Go Jun and me. Me and Go Jun.

We were close enough to kill each other now.

I could see the fury in his eyes and smell the stench on his hot breath.

And then…

We extended our arms almost at the same time.

Shhk!

The world slowed to a crawl. The wind split, and space vanished between us.

Faint delight spread across Go Jun’s face as he thrust his sword toward my chest.

I’ve won.

That was what his eyes seemed to say.

I was empty-handed. His sword was wrapped in murky magical power, with strength and reach on its side. Of course he thought he’d won.

He was wrong.

Inventory open. Summon.

Thought was faster than light, and the System answered without hesitation.

White Flame appeared in my hand as though it had been there all along.

Blue-white hellfire coated its transparent spearhead.

Fwoosh!

The searing heat burned through the air.

The spear had started after Go Jun's sword, yet it slipped past the murky Aura Blade and reached its target first.

Squelch!

Flesh parted with a sickening sound, followed by the smell of it burning.

Go Jun's eyes bulged. There was no delight left in them.

He stared down at the spear piercing his chest, shock and pain filling his eyes, and forced out a few words.

"What… is this?"

I answered calmly.

"Striking Second, Hitting First. You got your strength from a Magic Gem. You wouldn't understand it even if you died and came back."

Every fight, every movement, had a flow.

Know your opponent's movement, predict it, and you could reach your target first even if you started later.

Training and experience had taught me the principle of Striking Second, Hitting First. Go Jun had pursued nothing but greater power.

That was what decided this fight.

"Idiot. You should've used that rock of a head at least once to think about why your dead Master never recommended Magic Gems to you in the first place."

"…!"

At the anger and disgust in my voice, Go Jun's eyes trembled as if he'd accepted his fate.

Then the sword that had fallen short of me shot upward like lightning.

Shing!

It happened in an instant. Murky energy—much smaller than before—gathered at its tip and thrust toward my heart.

A fraction of an instant earlier, I'd spoken another command in my mind.

Inventory open. Summon.

KRAK!

The concentrated energy, with all its destructive force and cutting power, struck an obstacle.

Go Jun's eyes widened again. Reflected in them was armor with a faint red glow.

Fire Dragon Armor.

"What, what is this…?"

"What do you think, idiot? Life insurance."

I'd kept Fire Dragon Armor hidden all the way to the top floor, even after taking that shallow cut across my chest, for a moment just like this.

And I'd been right.

“You… What the hell are you…?”
I looked into his frightened eyes.
The eyes of a human—no, a monster—driven to the edge.
Then I drove the spear deeper into Go Jun’s chest.
KRAK!

Chapter 594

Crack!

The grisly sound came with a sensation I had felt hundreds—thousands—of times before, traveling up through my fingertips.

Flesh splitting. Bone breaking.

Somewhere along the way, I had grown used to it. Sometimes that left a bitter taste in my mouth. Being used to it meant I had taken that many lives with my own hands.

But not this time. As I looked down at the dying man, I felt no bitterness at all.

"Kh…!"

A final groan escaped with a deflating sound. At the same time, the solidly built man dropped to his knees.

Thud.

The blood-red glow in his eyes, once chilling to look at, slowly faded. His whole body trembled before the death closing in on him.

No. Perhaps it wasn't death itself that Go Jun feared. Perhaps it was me, the one who had dealt it to him.

"J-Jin Taekyung."

His voice was fading, and so was the light in his eyes. I felt no pity.

He wasn't human like me. He was a monster.

The Peace Guild had lost Kim Hwajong today. Thousands of people whose names I would never know had lost family and friends they loved. For the madness Go Jun had caused, this death almost seemed too easy.

"Cough. I-I can't die like this…"

I looked down coldly at him as he knelt there, convulsing in pain.

"Die. Oxygen is wasted on a piece of shit like you."

I had no intention of listening to a long-winded final speech, or giving him the chance to make one. I wrenched White Flame from his chest.

Fwoosh!

The moment the transparent spearhead came free, the blood that had not yet evaporated sprayed out like a fountain.

Go Jun stared blankly up at me, a fist-sized hole in his chest. Then his body slowly tipped over.

Splash.

That was the end. His face fell into a pool of his own blood, and he stopped moving, eyes still wide open.

As I looked at the monster's corpse, with no breath or trace of life left in it, a thought came to me.

It's over.

Lee Jungryong's loyal Disciple of several decades—the man who had effectively ruled Ares Guild, one of the foremost Guilds in the world—had died by my hand.

He had deliberately caused two Monster Waves, leaving thousands dead or injured and costing Kim Hwajong and some twenty Peace Guild members their lives. He had paid for it with his own.

So this really is the end…

Then why did I feel so hollow? I had taken my revenge, yet it felt as though the hole was in my chest, not Go Jun's.

It was probably because I knew that the people who had left my side would never return.

Are you still cold? Is it still dark?

I turned away, asking questions that could never reach them.

Fatigue and drowsiness weighed on me more heavily than I could have imagined. I fought them off and slowly crossed the dark corridor, wrecked by our battle.

Step.

With every step, faces and memories rose before my eyes and obscured my vision.

I saw Gwangan Bridge collapsing. I heard people screaming in terror. A family photograph dangling from a car's rearview mirror brought back a promise I had made long ago, pinkies linked with someone I missed more than words could say.

"When Hayeon gets a little older, and you, Taekyung, start middle school, let's come see the sea again. All right?"

"Really?"

"Of course. Come on, pinky promise."

But today, the place from the promise I had kept deep in my heart had collapsed.

Innocent people had died, and monsters had spread like a plague. I had done everything I could, but I hadn't saved more of them.

Step.

My thoughts were as unsteady as my feet. Through the confusion, a warm voice echoed in my mind.

"It wasn't your fault."

"…!"

"You did your best."

The graying old butler who had comforted me even as he died had gone somewhere he could never return from.

I had no way of knowing whether it was night or day where he had arrived. Whether it was cold or warm. I could only hope that his world was a little brighter. That he, who had shivered in the cold, was somewhere warmer.

And… that he had believed my lie to the very end—the lie that the person he had wanted to see one last time had come.

Step.

There is no process without a result. Someone had to pay the price. I believed it was only natural to be punished for doing wrong.

That was why I had come here. I had thrown open the gates of a palace no one had dared approach and brought down an impregnable fortress.

I had fought, and fought, and fought again. And after finally killing the monster wearing a human face, I suddenly felt hollow inside and found myself wondering:

What am I supposed to do now?

I had thought that killing Go Jun, the cause of it all, would ease my anger, even a little. I had thought I might laugh out loud with relief.

But that wasn't what happened.

With one gesture, I could make a massive pit and fill it again. But I couldn't fill the empty place in my heart.

It had been the same three years ago. It was the same now.

Damn it.

My mouth tasted bitter. In the end, the wounds were left for those of us still here to bear.

I almost regretted giving Go Jun such a painless death.

Step.

I stopped.

At some point, an inexplicable sense that something was wrong had taken hold of me. A chill crept up my spine.

What is this feeling?

Was it the exhaustion? Or everything weighing on my mind? My thoughts were as murky as fog.

I stood there for a moment. Then I realized what was wrong.

Go Jun should be dead. So why…

Why hadn't the System window announcing the kill appeared?

I had driven a spearhead into the center of his chest and burned his organs. I had watched his face fall into the pool of blood and felt him stop breathing.

"Don't tell me."

I muttered the words and turned around. An unusually deep darkness had settled over the ruined corridor.

The System was absolute, and it was immediate.

I knew that better than anyone. I simply had not noticed anything strange because I had been overwhelmed by exhaustion and deep thoughts in the moment of victory.

So when I found the pool of blood empty, I was not especially surprised.

He's alive. Go Jun is alive.

That much was certain. What I wanted to know was how.

There had been only two of us in Area A: Go Jun and me. He had been dead. His heart had stopped, and he had stopped breathing. Even a half-body bath in top-grade potion could not have brought him back.

Then how?

I followed the traces he had left behind.

Area A was a maze, fitting for a secret zone open to only a handful of people. But the trail of blood led in one direction, and it was easy enough to follow.

I moved quickly, taking in what I saw.

No one helped him. He didn't have time to cover his tracks, either.

The marks told me he had been desperate. I could almost see him crawling alone, pressed flat against the floor, struggling to keep going.

And then…

He got to his feet. Right here.

Two clear footprints stood out in the blood. Countless handprints marked the wall beside them.

What had happened to him? Why had he been writhing in pain?

Before long, I found the answer.

That's…

Blood.

Not the bright red of human blood. Drops of monster blood tinged blue.

There was no mistaking what that meant. I stared at the monster blood on my hand, then shot forward.

Whoosh!

The wind rushed past me, carrying a strong scent of blood and a foul stench. Even through my exhaustion, I could sense someone drawing closer.

Then I entered another corridor and saw him with my own eyes.

He looked nothing like he had the last time I saw him.

"Go Jun."

My quiet voice echoed down the corridor. Go Jun—or rather, the monster—turned as he staggered along.

"Krrk. Kurruk."

Whatever he was trying to say came out as a metallic rasp. Compared with the rest of him, that was nothing.

He stood four meters[2689] tall. His arms and legs were grotesquely swollen, as if they might burst. His body looked like creatures of different species had been thrown together, each part bearing its own shape and features.

Only his face had kept anything like its original form: a human face half-covered in scales, with blood-red eyes shining between them.

"Jin… Taekyung. Karruk."

Fear and hatred mingled in his eyes as he looked at me. I took in the sight of him from head to toe and spoke with disgust.

"Did you want to live that badly? Even if it meant becoming a monster?"

"Shut… up. This… this wasn't what I wanted either—"

Crack! KRAK!

It happened in an instant.

Before he could finish, his right arm suddenly bent as if an invisible hand had twisted it. Blue blood burst from the break.

"GRAAAAH!"

As he screamed, his grotesque body began changing rapidly.

Shlk. Crackle!

The thick skin covered in hide and scales like a monster's began to heal, while his crushed joints fitted themselves back together like puzzle pieces.

"Hah. Hah."

Go Jun panted, still in pain. Watching him, I began to understand how he had made it this far.

"Troll. Right?"

"…!"

His eyelids trembled at the question. I had my answer.

Trolls had extraordinary regenerative abilities. The Named Monster that had originally owned the S-grade Magic Gem Go Jun had absorbed must have been an immensely powerful Troll.

And…

The S-grade Magic Gem he absorbed wasn't the only one, was it?

One look at him was enough to tell me. His swollen body and incredible regeneration were Troll traits, but the scales and hide covering half of him had come from another monster.

Mutation. That's what he's become.

Unlike mana, magical power was dark and turbid. It corrupted humans. After absorbing two S-grade Magic Gems packed with it, of course the forces inside him would clash.

[2689] Four meters is about 13 ft.

“Kurruk. I could have been stronger. Stronger than this. But you. You…”

I cut him off.

“Not stronger. You would’ve become an even more horrifying monster. Look at yourself.”

“…!”

“You’re worse than a monster. You’re no Hunter, no human—just a monster. That’s what you are.”

Step.

I moved toward him. Go Jun stared at me, eyes wide, and shouted as though he were screaming.

“Don’t come closer! Krrk! Stay away!”

“That’s a problem. There’s a monster right in front of me.”

“T-This can’t be!”

His blood-red eyes filled with fear.

He must have known it, too. His body was showing signs of falling apart while he stood still. There was no way he could fight me in that condition.

Tap-tap-tap!

When Go Jun turned and ran, I wasn’t surprised. I reversed my grip on White Flame’s shaft and hurled it.

SHWAAAAK! BOOM!

A streak of flame-wreathed light burst through his legs and buried itself in the ground. He screamed and thrashed, both legs gone, while flesh and bone rapidly grew from the severed ends.

I wasn’t going to stand there and watch.

“Go on. Regenerate. Keep doing it as long as you can.”

Thud!

Drawing up the internal energy I had left, I rushed him. I planted my foot on his back, grabbed both of his thick arms, and pulled.

Crack. KRAKAKAK!

Go Jun lost both arms after his legs, and his scream rang through the corridor.

I didn’t blink. I kept moving.

Slice! Stab!

I pulled the spear from the ground and slashed and stabbed his body in several places. I seared the sections trying to regenerate with the Flame Divine Palm, then gripped them tightly and tore them apart.

Under ordinary circumstances, I would never have done anything so brutal. Now I did not hesitate.

KRAKAKAK!

Regeneration. Destruction. Again and again.

Go Jun was the first to give out under the endless pain.

“GRAAAAH! S-Stop!”

His voice was hoarse, and his eyes were not as red as before. His regeneration had been slowing for some time. Now it had stopped altogether.

“Now… kill me…”

“I was going to.”

This time, I would make sure he could never come back.

I looked into his eyes.

“Whether you’re going to heaven or hell, go on ahead and wait for me. When I get there, I’ll kill you to my heart’s content.”

“…!”

Those were the last words Go Jun heard in this world.

It ends now.

I did not wait for an answer. Without a moment’s hesitation, I brought the transparent spearhead down.

Slice! Thud!

His head came free with a sharp cutting sound and rolled across the floor.

That was the end of the monster who had become neither a hero like Cheon Taemin nor an ambitious warlord like his Master, Lee Jungryong.

Ding.

The familiar chime rang in my ears. I picked up Go Jun’s head from the pool of blood and crossed the space where I alone remained, my steps slow and unsteady.

I was tired.

Chapter 595

Unlike the way in, the journey back was long and hard.

Exhaustion made my body feel like waterlogged cotton, and my eyelids kept falling shut.

I want to collapse right here.

But I couldn't. I still had somewhere to go. First, though, I had to drive off the hyenas who had caught the scent of trouble and gathered in front of me.

Quite a crowd.

I staggered out of Area A and looked around through half-closed eyes.

I was back in the spacious hall on the top floor. Around two hundred Ares Guild members waited there, their faces tense.

Then I spotted a familiar face at the front and sighed.

"Maybe I should've just killed you."

The middle-aged man at the front, Head of Security Go Se-won, answered in a calm voice after hearing my mutter.

"Yes. That wouldn't have been a bad choice either."

He looked fully recovered. He must have received treatment while I was gone. Gazing at the sword in his hand, he went on.

"It must have been thirty years ago when I first picked up a sword. I was trained even before I awakened. And on the day I awakened as an A-rank Hunter, the former Vice Guild Master gave me this sword as a gift. The other members of the security team probably received theirs the same way."

That didn't surprise me. Team Leader Choi had told me Lee Jungryong took in war orphans after the Great Cataclysm and trained them as his personal guards according to their mana affinity.

The man in front of me was one of them.

"So, are you going to avenge that grudge now?"

"…That grudge."

Go Se-won murmured the words, then asked, "Before that, tell me one thing. Why did you spare me?"

I thought for a moment.

"I figured you should at least get to answer the phone."

"What?"

"You should at least have told your family you were working late. Or that you weren't coming home. My father couldn't do either. I thought he'd come home when the time came, but… he never did. Now I can barely remember his voice."

"…"

Maybe I was tired. I'd said more than I needed to. I clicked my tongue, and Go Se-won studied me for a moment before asking, "What about the Vice Guild Master?"

Instead of answering, I shrugged. It had been a fight that could only end with one of us dead. But I was the only one who had appeared.

"He's dead, then," Go Se-won muttered.

"Go up and check. It's quite a sight."

The Ares Guild members surrounding us stirred at once. Several executives who were plainly loyalists urged Go Se-won on through clenched teeth.

"Team Leader Go, what are you waiting for?"

"Eliminate him immediately!"

"I've already told you. Kill Jin Taekyung, and we won't hold you responsible for revealing Area A's location. The Guild will reward you handsomely, too. You could even put yourself forward for the next Vice Guild Master."

Anger and temptation mingled in their voices.

As Go Se-won stood silently among them, I rubbed my stiff, tired eyes and spoke.

"I'm exhausted. If you're done asking questions, let's get this over with. I've got somewhere to be."

His sharp gaze traveled over me.

"Even someone like you seems to be having a hard time in your current condition."

"That's my problem, not yours."

"…Fair enough."

Go Se-won replied quietly. Then, just as his fingers toyed with the hilt of his sword —

Whoosh! Slice!

Blood sprayed. One of the executives fell, eyes wide at the unexpected strike. It was the man who had just offered Go Se-won the Vice Guild Master position.

"You crazy—!"

"What the hell are you doing?"

"T-Team Leader Go!"

As the executives shouted, Go Se-won turned the area into chaos in a single instant and spoke in an even voice.

"Subdue them all. The fight is over."

The executives here had plenty to lose. The other Guild members didn't. They had no direct ties to Go Jun and no reason to take a needless risk—especially against a monster who had wrecked Ares Guild headquarters single-handedly.

Clatter-clatter-clang!

"…!"

Weapons were leveled from every direction the moment Go Se-won spoke. Realizing they had no chance, the loyalist executives lowered their own with a groan.

Go Se-won turned to me. “That was quick enough, wasn’t it?”

“You…”

I was about to say something, but then I nodded.

“Looks like sparing you paid off.”

“Thirty years,” he said. “That’s how long I’ve lived as a hunting dog. I’ve done enough.”

“A late change of heart?”

“I don’t know. I’m not that good a man. But it doesn’t matter anymore. It’s been more than I could bear for a while now.”

Apparently, I wasn’t the only one who was tired. Go Se-won surveyed the chaos with weary eyes, then stepped aside.

“Go. No one will stop you.”

I didn’t refuse and began walking. Just as I was about to pass by Go Se-won, a quiet murmur reached my ears.

“…Thank you for the call.”

That was enough. I gave him a small nod and walked past him and the two hundred or so Ares Guild members.

Step. Step.

I dragged my exhausted body onward, walking and walking. I had to meet someone before sunset.

I don’t remember how I reached my destination. Only fragments remain.

The troops surrounding the devastated Ares Guild headquarters. Combat drones filling the sky.

President Baek Hanseong’s rigid face as he arrived under heavy guard, despite his aides’ attempts to stop him.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung, what in the world…?”

He couldn’t finish. I offered to surrender peacefully on one condition, and after giving it some thought, President Baek agreed to my request.

That was why I was here.

“Hey, you!”

“T-Taekyung!”

Familiar faces approached through my blurred vision. I wanted to smile and wave, but my body wouldn’t cooperate.

My legs buckled. Song Song and Im Kkeokjeong hurried to catch me.

“Sorry. My legs gave out.”

“How can you say that right now…?”

Song Song pressed her lips together before she could finish. She rubbed at her reddened eyes.

“What about my family?” I asked. “They’re not here, are they?”

“Are you insane?”

“I sent Guild members to bring them somewhere safe,” she continued, her voice hoarse. “Luckily, your mother was in the middle of cooking and didn’t know anything. Hayeon, who’s with her… is pretending she doesn’t know.”

Relief washed over me. I couldn’t imagine how badly the news about me would have shaken my mother.

Hayeon was there, though. She’d handle it. She had always been more thoughtful than I was.

“And Team Leader Choi is safe,” Song Song added. “He still hasn’t regained consciousness.”

“Thanks. For looking after him.”

“You…”

Song Song was looking at me with a complicated expression when Im Kkeokjeong’s shoulders began to shake.

“I’m sorry, Taekyung. I’m so sorry…”

What did he have to be sorry for? Why was he so sad?

I wanted to answer his sobs, but my throat closed up. I knew exactly how he felt. The helplessness and guilt of being unable to do a thing—there were no words for it.

Song Song had turned away, too. Tears slipped down her cheeks.

Damn it.

I clenched my teeth and tried to ignore the heat in my eyes. Then I managed to force out a question.

“What about him… Butler Kim?”

“He’s been waiting. All this time.”

The answer came from neither Im Kkeokjeong nor Song Song. I turned my head and saw a blond foreigner standing in front of a door.

“So you’ve come, wicked human.”

The Skeleton King’s voice sounded far away. I had seen the sign before I saw his face.

Morgue

My heart sank. As I stood frozen, the Skeleton King opened the door.

And through the gap in the open door… I saw the body of a person covered in a pure white sheet.

“It is impolite to keep the dead waiting, human.”

“…!”

“Do you intend to send him off like this?”

At those words, I left Song Song and Im Kkeokjeong behind and forced my unmoving feet forward.

The door closed quietly behind me. In the chill of the morgue, it was only him and me. Just the two of us.

Swish.

With trembling hands, I drew back the white sheet.

Kim Hwajong had died with a faint smile on his face.

He looked as though he were having a pleasant dream. But I knew that dream would never end.

He would never again greet me in a pressed suit, smiling gently. He would never again get up early and offer me coffee.

Today, he had said goodbye to us. Now we had to let him go.

Drip. Drop.

Something hot rolled down both my cheeks. They were the first tears I had shed today, and tears I must never shed again.

I swear.

It felt like being taken back three years. Regret came with a vow.

I’m sorry. I won’t let anyone else go the way you did.

So please…

“Rest in peace.”

With those quiet, heartfelt words, I took Go Jun’s head out of my Inventory and set it on the floor.

So the monster who had died with his eyes wide open might understand what he had done. So Kim Hwajong might rest a little easier.

It was the promise I had made to myself while holding the old butler’s hand as it slowly grew cold on the snow-covered mountain.

Fwoosh.

As if in answer, Kim Hwajong’s face flushed red. Violet sunset light streamed through the morgue window.

I gazed at its beauty through blurred eyes and felt the strength leave my body.

Ah.

I had reached my limit, body and heart alike.

I leaned my back against the wall and sank down as if collapsing. Accepting the sleep pressing down on me with a weight greater than Taishan[2690], I thought:

Today was a long day.

Click.

The firmly shut door opened with a faint sound.

A slender beauty, a middle-aged man who looked like a bandit, and a blond foreigner who might have stepped out of a magazine saw the severed head first and startled. Then they saw the peaceful face of the dead man and felt sorrow. Last, they saw the young man asleep where he had collapsed, and fell silent.

Jin Taekyung.

Indescribable emotions filled the three pairs of eyes gazing at him.

What more could they say?

Today, he had fought desperately against disaster and threats. He had made himself an outlaw and exacted the price for an innocent death.

There was only one thing they could do for him now.

Sleep well. Don’t worry about what comes next.

The fire would spread in every direction. No one knew where it would die down.

Even if the whole world condemned him for what had happened today—even if the authorities branded him a criminal—they would stand beside Jin Taekyung.

They would protect him, no matter what.

Just as you did for us.

Warm sunset light spread through the morgue.

One person’s long day had ended, but the day of the other three had not. No—in fact, they were about to become even busier.

[2690]Taishan, or Mount Tai, is a mountain in China. Its name is used here to evoke an immense weight.

Chapter 596

Just because the sun had set and the second hand had passed midnight didn't mean the day was over.

As long as people were awake and there was an interesting story to follow, their day went on.

That was how it happened on a bitterly cold, windy afternoon in mid-January.

[Breaking News] S-Rank Hunter Jin Taekyung Launches Solo Assault on Ares Guild Headquarters

The breaking news threw Korea into an uproar. No—the entire world was shaken.

Almost as soon as it broke, posts and comments flooded websites everywhere.

> └ Hey, what is this?
>
> └ What is?
>
> └ I got a sudden alert and checked it out, and… holy shit, Lord Fuck[2691] supposedly stormed Ares Guild headquarters alone?
>

> └ Quit talking bullshit, lol. I was watching the news just now, and they were looking for Lord Fuck[2692] because he disappeared from Pyeongchang. So why is he suddenly storming Ares Guild headquarters—
>
> └ Fuck, it's real. What the hell is this?

> └ ?? What is this, The Truman Show? You're not doing this to fool newbies like me, are you?
>
> └ If it were The Truman Show, at least the ratings would be good. Why would we bother fooling you? It's real. Turn on WBS—they've got an exclusive report. The Capital Defense Command[2693] has been dispatched and everything's going crazy;
>
> └ Why would the fire department be involved?
>
> └ Not the fire department. The Capital Defense Command[2694];

> ㄴ I get that Lord Sibu-leol[2695] went to Ares Guild headquarters, but isn't saying he "stormed the place" a bit much? Maybe he went to have tea with Go Jun.
>
> ㄴ Probably not. There were more than a thousand witnesses, and apparently Jin Taekyung punched the Ares headquarters building right in the solar plexus before going inside. Even if he went for tea, I bet every teacup in there got smashed.
>
> ㄴ Got proof? If more than a thousand people saw it, someone must've taken a video. Post a link.
>
> ㄴ The thousand witnesses part is real, but apparently nobody took a video or even a picture. They said they only came to their senses after Lord Fuck[2696] went inside. Before that, they just watched like they were possessed.
>
> ㄴ ?? Lol. That many people and not one piece of evidence? Sounds like a false report.
>
> ㄴ Yeah. Why would Lord Fuck[2697] go there after disappearing for a while? Even if he did go, the rest sounds like rumors. Feels like the media's using rumors as kindling.

Immediately after the media began broadcasting the breaking news on a massive scale, most people refused to believe the shocking report.

A hero who had put down two monster waves in succession and then vanished had supposedly stormed Ares Guild, of all places, alone. It made no sense.

But within minutes, Jongno was designated a temporary disaster zone. Hunters and troops from the Capital Defense Command[2698] began evacuating civilians and establishing a defensive line, and the mood changed completely.

> ㄴ I think this might actually be real.
>
> ㄴ Damn, what the hell is going on?
>
> ㄴ Why all of a sudden…
>
> ㄴ I'm living in the United States. They're broadcasting breaking news here, too. Every major news program, including CNN and FOX, is monitoring the situation.

> ㄴSeems like it’s the same all over the world, not just the United States. Korea and the foreign media are both going crazy;

Everyone who heard the news, at home and abroad, felt the atmosphere grow heavy.

President Baek Hanseong delivered an emergency letter concerning the current situation to the media, while experts in every field busied themselves analyzing the situation and its causes.

But before a complete answer could be found, the person at the center and beginning of everything revealed himself.

“Hunter Jin Taekyung.”

President Baek Hanseong stepped forward despite his aides’ attempts to stop him. At his call, the young man raised his head. Cameras carried both their faces across Korea and around the world.

Jin Taekyung. It was him.

Red and blue blood—human and monster—covered him from head to toe. He looked exhausted, and his eyes held a sadness no one could name.

His voice came out bleakly through dry, cracked lips.

“I… only did what I had to do.”

That was all the people staring at the screen, having forgotten even how to breathe, were allowed to see.

The live broadcast was cut off immediately at the Blue House’s request. For some reason, reporters from around the world who had been at the scene said nothing more.

At the end of that day, one enormous question remained.

Jin Taekyung and Ares Guild. Ares Guild and Jin Taekyung.

An unprecedented clash between one man and an organization.

No one could say for certain what had happened inside. But the effects of a battle lasting roughly an hour had swept through Jongno, and Jin Taekyung had walked out on his own two feet to stand before them all.

Two names with enormous influence in Korea and across the world had collided for reasons unknown. The individual had won.

That was shocking enough when the organization in question was Ares Guild. But what everyone wanted to know most was why.

Why had a man in his twenties, newly established as both a powerful Hunter and a young hero, gone to Ares Guild alone?

That night, a major news outlet broke the guidelines agreed upon in advance and set fire to the powder keg.

[Exclusive Report] Hunter Go Jun (Current Ares Vice Guild Master) and 25 Others Confirmed Dead; Total Casualties Around 500

[Chief Editorial Writer Lee Kanghee—Jin Taekyung: The Hero's Hidden Side. The Devil's Face.]

It was a bombshell.

Two monster waves unlike anything seen since the Great Cataclysm had struck in succession. Before the shock of them could fade, this new explosion shook everything again.

The whole of Korea boiled like a furnace beneath a bed of charcoal, and the heat spread throughout the world.

Midnight passed. The hours before dawn wore on. Still, the uproar showed no sign of subsiding.

The barrage, once begun, seemed as if it would never end.

Some condemned Jin Taekyung as a devil. Others submitted formal petitions demanding that he be executed.

But not everyone pointed a finger at him. In fact, most people still held a mixture of belief and doubt.

The belief that Jin Taekyung, who had accomplished so much, couldn't possibly have done such a thing.

The suspicion that media reports without an official announcement were nothing more than nonsense.

Those unbelievable hours passed, and morning came.

[Close Aide of the Late Hunter Go Jun, a Mr. Go, Turns Himself In]

[Official Blue House Press Conference at 10:00 a.m. Draws Worldwide Attention]

Then came a downpour that dampened the fierce flames of condemnation.

And through the rain that fell without pause for two full days—from the media and from the sky—one person finally woke.

Drip. Drip-drip-drip.

At the sudden sound of rain, I blinked blankly.

As my vision cleared, the first thing I saw was an ornate, magnificent painting.

I knew that ceiling. I knew the painting. I'd heard about it so many times that it would have been strange not to recognize it.

Michelangelo's The Creation (The Genesis).

Only then did I realize I was lying in Team Leader Choi's mansion.

I turned my head. Raindrops tapped against the window that took up an entire wall.

No way.

A single thought flashed through my empty mind, and my heart began pounding violently.

What if—against all odds—it had all been a nightmare? What if nothing had happened yet, and I had only just left Henan and logged out?

The absurd hope burst like a bubble a moment later.

"You're awake. I'd just come to check on you. I'm glad."

A smooth, low voice. Younger than Butler Kim's, and impossible to read.

How had I failed to notice him until now?

I clenched my teeth when I saw the face of the unwelcome guest who had broken through my deep thoughts and approached me.

President Baek Hanseong.

It was him.

And if the President was here instead of at the Blue House, then everything that had happened was real.

"Ah…"

"Hunter Jin Taekyung?"

What more was there to say? I felt hollow.

Instead of answering, I sank back into the bed from where I'd half risen.

He pulled a chair close and spoke with concern.

"You still seem unwell. The doctor will be here soon, so please wait just a moment…"

I didn't need a doctor or a Healer. Perhaps because I had gotten such deep rest, my body had completely recovered. My physical condition was not what mattered right now.

"How long… how long has it been?"

"Hmm."

President Baek Hanseong paused at the sound of my hoarse voice, then held out the newspaper in his hand.

"This morning's paper. It'll be quicker if you see for yourself."

I took it and checked the date first.

Two days had passed since the day I remembered. An enormous photograph of my face covered the front page, accompanied by a bold headline.

The Truth of That Day, Sullied by Countless Misunderstandings. The Hero Who Has Not Awakened.

I could tell from the headline alone. It told me how much the media had talked about me and about what had happened that day over the past two days.

But I felt neither irritation nor anger. Only a heavy, numbing sadness.

So it was true. It really was true.

Butler Kim—Kim Hwajong—was dead.

Weighed down by that reality, I stared blankly out the window. President Baek Hanseong spoke carefully.

"One news outlet acted rashly and broke the agreed guidelines, so public opinion was against you at first… Fortunately, the misunderstandings about this incident have been cleared up. Go Se-won stepped forward at just the right time. Thanks to him, matters were resolved sooner than we expected."

"Go Se-won?"

I turned from the window at the unexpected name. President Baek Hanseong met my eyes and nodded.

"Yes, the same Go Se-won you know. The closest aide who served as Head of Security for the Vice Guild Master—no, for the late Go Jun."

"…"

"He turned himself in first. The executives from Go Jun's faction who resisted until the end had already been subdued by him. His testimony was very conclusive as well."

When I'd spared him, I hadn't expected this kind of help.

I looked at the newspaper again. My face wasn't the only one on the front page.

Halfway down was a photograph of Go Se-won before a crowd of cameras and microphones, wearing his usual calm expression. Beside it was his testimony that Go Jun had caused the two monster waves two days earlier.

"It was decisive testimony. And furthermore…"

President Baek Hanseong frowned before continuing.

"It also corroborated the evidence concerning Go Jun's body, which had been discovered earlier."

Go Jun had died as a hideous blend of human and monster. His corpse alone was clear physical evidence.

President Baek Hanseong shuddered, as though he had seen the scene with his own eyes, and continued.

"Go Se-won played a very important role. Thanks to him, Hunter Jin Taekyung was able to clear himself of most of the charges."

I nodded, feeling nothing.

Charges. Judgment under the law. Words everyone feared, but right now they meant little to me.

"I see."

"Yes. He's being held in a special detention center for now… but he's asked to see you as soon as possible. He says he has a debt to repay."

A debt to repay.

I repeated the words to myself and shook my head.

I had no objection to seeing Go Se-won, but something more important was on my mind.

Butler Kim. And Team Leader Choi.

Had the old butler's funeral begun? Had Team Leader Choi regained consciousness?

That was what I wanted to know most.

I was just about to part my dry lips when the door flew open without a knock.

A blond foreigner ignored President Baek Hanseong entirely and spoke with a grave expression.

"That human. No—he's awake."

"…!"

Chapter 597

The path I had walked until now had been strewn with countless deaths and screams.

But I could say with certainty that I had never felt grief as quiet and suffocating as this.

Tap. Tap-tap.

Beyond the silence, wind and rain battered the window.

We had said everything we needed to say long ago, yet silence still filled the room where only the two of us remained.

Team Leader Choi had been staring out the window with his head turned away. At last, he spoke.

“I think I was seven when Butler Kim came to me.”

His memories of those early years had grown hazy. More than twenty years had passed since then.

The child who had suddenly lost his parents had grown into a young man, and frost had settled in the butler’s hair.

“I can barely remember my parents’ voices anymore, but every memory I have with him is vivid.”

When his parents died and even his only maternal grandfather disappeared, Butler Kim had always been there beside him.

“One day, I realized how much he had devoted to me. More than I could ever measure. But…”

His voice trailed off, and he turned toward me.

Perhaps it was because he had spent so long looking out at the rain, but his eyes were drenched when they met mine.

“Now I can’t give anything back. Not ever.”

Tap. Tap-tap.

I had never seen him like this.

A tear rolled down his cheek as he spoke in a heavy, subdued voice. It fell onto the snow-white blanket.

No. That was the wind and rain striking the window. For now, I chose to believe it was.

“Mr. Jin.”

I nodded instead of answering.

Team Leader Choi had spent more time with Butler Kim than anyone. The grief I’d felt earlier was nothing beside what he must be feeling now.

He’d lost family.

To Team Leader Choi, Kim Hwajong hadn't been a butler. He had been family—the one person who stayed beside a child left alone, the only person that child could lean on.

He could blame me for failing to save him. He could grab me by the collar and curse me out.

Right now, that would be fine. Better to let it all spill out than keep forcing it down. I didn't want Team Leader Choi drowning in everything he was holding back.

Then his next words caught me off guard.

"Thank you."

"…!"

"For watching over his final moments. For doing what I couldn't… I sincerely thank you."

I couldn't speak. I wanted to answer, but something rising inside me had locked my throat shut.

I stared at Team Leader Choi in silence for a long time before finally forcing out my voice.

"Team Leader Choi."

Before I could say more, he shook his head slightly.

"I'm all right. Really."

It was an obvious lie. I knew it was, and I had no choice but to let him tell it.

I pressed my lips together. Team Leader Choi gave me a faint smile.

"I'm embarrassed you had to see me like this. Would you mind giving me some time alone?"

What could I say to him now? I had neither the words nor the right.

Team Leader Choi needed time. Time to accept the death of someone who had been as close as blood. Time to find the courage to face his body.

"Get some rest, then. There are people standing by, so call if you need anything."

I tried to sound cheerful as I got up and headed for the door. But when I put my hand on the doorknob, I thought of one last thing I wanted to tell him.

"Team Leader Choi."

"Yes?"

"It's all right to lose your balance sometimes. You can cry out loud. No one will hear you. Except for him."

"…!"

"I'll be going now."

My back was already turned, so I couldn't see his expression or know how my words had struck him.

I was glad I couldn't.

Click.

As I stepped out and pulled the door shut, I heard a faint sob through the narrowing gap.

It was the quietest, saddest sob I had ever heard. The sound of a man who had never wavered, no matter what happened, finally breaking down.

"Taekyung, how's Team Leader Choi—"

I wasn't the only one who could hear him.

Im Kkeokjeong had started to ask with a worried look on his face, but he fell silent. So did the other two waiting with him in the hall.

"Ah, I'm tired. I need some coffee."

Song Song stretched and walked away quickly. The Skeleton King caught my eye, scratched his chin, and said, "This body could use some coffee too. I haven't been sleeping lately. I feel like I might collapse…"

"Huh? Oh. Yeah, me too."

Im Kkeokjeong was one thing, but an undead monster claiming he was sleepy and needed coffee? I let out a quiet laugh at the ridiculous excuse and patted the Skeleton King's shoulder.

"Make me a cup too."

"You wretched human. Have you no hands? No feet?"

"I have a spear."

The Skeleton King fell silent for a moment at my answer, then narrowed his eyes.

"…Black?"

"Mix."[2699]

"You don't even know what good coffee tastes like. I'll make it for you this once. Just this once."

By the time Im Kkeokjeong had left the hallway after the Skeleton King, who continued grumbling curses under his breath, the sound of dress shoes echoed from the distance.

Step. Step.

Three men in black suits came into view.

Their steady breathing and measured steps told me they were well-trained Peak masters—or rather, A-rank Hunters.

But the fact that they had entered this mansion at all meant they were no ordinary Hunters. They belonged to an organization very different from a Guild.

"Pleased to meet you, Hunter Jin Taekyung."

Instead of answering, I looked at them. More precisely, at their tie pins.

Each black-and-gold badge bore a rose of Sharon[2700] and tiny engraved letters.

President's Security Service

[2699] Korean coffee mix is instant coffee packaged with sugar and powdered creamer.

[2700] The rose of Sharon is South Korea's national flower and appears on government insignia.

It was clear whose orders they were following.

I gave a small nod. “President Baek Hanseong is looking for me?”

“No, sir,” the officer in front replied in a stiff, military tone. “His Excellency left thirty minutes ago. He asked for your understanding. Affairs of state required him to leave without saying goodbye.”

He must have gone while I was in Team Leader Choi’s room. I understood his situation well enough. I had no complaints.

“There’s nothing to apologize for. I’m sure I’ve made him ten times busier than usual.”

“…”

“…Twenty times?”

“Ahem.”

“Cough.”

They couldn’t bring themselves to say it, but the repeated throat-clearing told me he was busy as hell.

I hadn’t checked what was happening outside yet. Still, the events of two days ago must have turned not just Korea but the whole world upside down.

No wonder.

Several monster waves in a single day were unprecedented. Learning that they had been deliberately caused—and that Ares Guild’s Vice Guild Master was behind it all—would hit harder than a nuclear bomb.

Even I, who knew little about the situation, couldn’t easily guess how large and far-reaching the aftermath of this incident would be.

“So did you stay just to give me that message?”

“Not exactly.”

“Then…”

As my voice trailed off, all three bowed politely.

“By order of His Excellency the President, we have been assigned to provide temporary security for Hunter Jin Taekyung and your family. Although we have been described as a surveillance detail on the surface, we ask that you put yourself at ease.”

“A surveillance detail?”

“This will only continue until the current situation has settled down. It has only been two days, after all, and under the current circumstances, Hunter Jin Taekyung remains a suspect who has been booked without detention.”

Booked without detention. Like surveillance detail, it didn’t have a pleasant ring to it.

I’d heard the phrase since I was a kid. Whenever a high-ranking politician or chaebol[2701] chairman got into trouble, it seemed to turn up on the news.

At least I haven't been detained.

Being booked without detention meant that the suspect or defendant's physical freedom was guaranteed, while the case itself had been formally registered with the judicial authorities.

"What are the charges?"

"There are extenuating circumstances for the other matters, but… for now, the main issue is the injuries you inflicted."

The officer who seemed to be in charge added, looking at me with a mixture of respect and fear, "As you know, more than five hundred people sustained injuries, major or minor, at your hands."

"Oh."

"Of course, you needn't worry too much. Given public opinion at home and abroad, as well as the circumstances of the incident, there's a strong possibility your actions will be recognized as self-defense."

I had expected some kind of punishment, but my situation was far better than I'd thought.

Once the truth came out, people in Korea and overseas had begun to accept that my actions were justified. Meanwhile, the late Go Jun had become a fucking bastard in the eyes of the entire world.

That was the gist of it.

I thought I might be going straight to prison.

Right before I went to Ares Guild Headquarters, I'd said I was leaving Peace Guild in case my actions brought trouble down on them. Things had turned out so well that the decision almost seemed pointless.

Of course, I couldn't really call any of this good. It had begun with Kim Hwajong's death.

And…

Things probably settled down this fast because someone gave them solid testimony.

I thought back to my conversation with President Baek Hanseong an hour or so earlier, and to the photograph of a middle-aged man who had looked composed before a crowd of cameras and microphones.

Go Se-won.

The President had told me Go Se-won was being held in a special detention center and wanted to see me. He said he had a debt to repay.

A debt to repay. What could he mean?

We'd met only briefly, but Go Se-won didn't strike me as someone who would ask for a meeting just to exchange pleasantries.

[2701] A chaebol is a large, usually family-controlled South Korean business conglomerate.

Even if I was wrong, I needed to talk to him at least once. He had given up everything to reveal the truth.

The countless crimes Go Se-won must have committed while rising to become Head of Security could never be washed away, but it was also an undeniable fact that I owed him a debt.

While I stood there thinking, the Skeleton King came swaggering down the hall.

“I brought your coffee. Drink it.”

I looked at the steaming cup of instant coffee mix. Then I made up my mind.

“Don’t want it.”

“…You shitty hu—bastard.”

Leaving him growling behind me, I turned to the officers.

“Let’s go. Show me the way.”

“Pardon?”

“Go Se-won. He’s being held in a special detention center, right?”

The officers looked bewildered for a moment, then nodded.

Chapter 598

There is always a reason behind things described as special.

The special detention center where Go Se-won was being held was no exception.

“Stop. We need to verify your identities.”

The soldier’s voice was stiff, his sharp eyes visible behind dark sunglasses. He wore a bulletproof vest and carried an automatic rifle.

The Blue House[2702] security officer in the driver’s seat held out a thin card.

“The warden should have received a call already.”

“I’m sorry, but everyone goes through the same procedure here.”

The soldier didn’t budge. Only after checking us with a magic detector to make sure no one was disguised did he raise the barrier. A little later, I got my first glimpse of the detention center I’d heard so much about.

Around a hundred soldiers stood guard, armed to the teeth. Hunters disguised as soldiers were hidden among them.

As if that weren’t enough, heavy weapons were positioned throughout the facility, along with concealed magic traps.

Most people wouldn’t be able to walk out of here in one piece.

This place held people who hadn’t yet received a verdict. Even so, security was far tighter than at a prison reserved for serious criminals.

One look at the warden waiting outside the main building told me why.

“Ho-ho. I’ve been waiting for you.”

He had the warm, genial face of an old man from a fried-chicken restaurant. The energy he gave off was anything but warm.

A former A-rank Hunter with an impressive record, the warden greeted me with a friendly attitude.

“When I first heard the news about you, I felt so relieved. This isn’t something I should say as the warden, but… honestly, every time I see the bastards in here, I feel like smashing their heads in with a mace. Isn’t that why I’ve gone bald from holding myself back?”

“…Oh. I see.”

His confession caught me so off guard that I could only give an awkward reply. Then I looked at his gleaming head and muttered, “You must have held back a lot.”

“What else could I do? Though when I really can’t stand it, I do give one of them a beating now and then. Only the worst ones, of course.”

“Pardon?”

[2702] The Blue House was the office and residence of South Korea’s president.

"Give them a cup of potion and plenty of healing, and they're good as new. What are they going to do? There's no evidence. None."

"…"

"Criminal bastards need a beating. Especially the ones in here."

The Blue House[2703] security officers wore expressions that seemed to ask whether they should report this to the President, and I began to worry about whether one particular person was still alive.

"Is Go Se-won still alive?"

"Ah, that fellow."

The warden laughed heartily.

"Of course. He's perfectly fine. On his first day, I thought he might cause a major incident, but… he does as he's told, and from what I hear from the prosecutors' office, he's been giving his statement without any trouble. I had the visitation room cleared out for you. Follow me."

The security officers and I followed him inside.

The corridors were dark and cold. Alloy doors stood in rows like cages where iron bars would normally have been. Small hologram projectors outside each door showed every movement and expression of the people inside.

I'd heard about this place, but I'd never seen it for myself.

What made the special detention center special was that everyone held here was Awakened.

If an Awakened person committed a crime, they were brought here immediately, regardless of the charge. They might not have been convicted yet, but that didn't spare them the tight security or constant surveillance.

They're Awakened, after all.

Even an F-grade Awakened could easily subdue two or three grown men.

If they were higher-ranked and had obtained a Hunter license through formal training, that went without saying.

"They're awaiting verdicts, sure, but most of them are obviously guilty. You never know what they might try. We get two or three escape attempts every year without fail. Once they're convicted and transferred to a special prison, they won't have another chance. That place is hell."

As he explained while crossing the corridor, the warden pointed toward three or four metal doors that looked particularly thick and sturdy.

"We're watching the bastards who came in this time particularly closely. They've got nothing left to lose, and they've been pretty rough."

[2703] The Blue House was the office and residence of South Korea's president.

I checked the holograms to see who he meant. They were the Ares Guild executives I'd briefly glimpsed on the top floor. Go Se-won and the other Ares Guild members must have subdued them and sent them here.

They lay wrapped in mana suppressors from head to toe like mummies. I studied them, then made a heartfelt request.

"Please beat the shit out of them—good and proper."

"I was planning to. I've already greased up the mace I used back in my active days."

"You really do have everything planned, Warden."

The warden smiled, pleased by my compliment, then asked, "Ah, but what's going to happen to you, Hunter Jin Taekyung? I hope things work out for you, but the law is a complicated thing."

"Who knows? I still have no idea."

"It would be nice if you came here. I'd take good care of you."

"…Oh. Right."

Why was I suddenly picturing a mace glistening with grease?

While that unpleasant image occupied my mind, the long, twisting corridor came to an end at a large door.

Once we had finished every procedure at the security checkpoint, the warden explained, "You'll meet with him alone, Mr. Jin Taekyung. By special request from above, there won't be a guard in the room or a time limit. But everything inside will be recorded on audio and video, so please bear that in mind."

Given Go Se-won's situation, that much was only natural. I nodded, and the door opened.

Click.

Cold air met me as it swung inward. The room looked like one of the prosecutors' interrogation rooms I'd seen in movies, and a familiar face was waiting inside.

"You came. Sooner than I expected."

Go Se-won.

He looked noticeably more haggard than he had two days ago. Once the door closed, he pointed to a chair.

"Don't just stand there. Sit down. My neck hurts from looking up at you."

Clank.

Heavy metal rattled whenever he moved. He noticed me looking at the chains linking his neck, arms, and legs, and shrugged.

"Mana suppressor. It's uncomfortable, but all things considered, they're treating me well."

I pulled out a chair and sat.

“I suppose so. On the way here, I saw your friends looking about ready to move into a pyramid.”

“Who? Executive Director Park? Managing Director Lee? Or…”

“Probably both. I couldn’t tell you which was which.”

“Fair enough. Neither of them is my friend anyway.”

Even now, he was as calm as ever. I watched him for a moment, then asked, “Should I thank you?”

The question came out of nowhere, but Go Se-won knew what I meant. He gave a quiet laugh.

“I’d been thinking about doing it for a long time. I just needed a reason.”

“Any regrets?”

“Not a single one.”

His face was haggard, but his eyes were clearer than ever. Maybe that was why I’d spared him.

When everyone else in Ares Guild had looked at me with anger and fear, he’d kept that clear, steady gaze. Even when death was right in front of him.

“You must have lost a lot over this.”

“I lost as much as I gained. I’ve only gone back to the way I was then—a war orphan who had nothing. More importantly, I protected my precious family. I should be satisfied with that.”

Everyone gets a chance to change. For Go Se-won, his family had probably been the reason. Maybe that last phone call, arriving when death was almost upon him, had led him to this choice.

“I saw the photo on your phone. Your son’s cute. Looks like a tough kid, too. He’s already got a solid build. He’d be perfect as a tank when he grows up.”

“She’s my daughter.”

“Ah…”

They do say the eldest daughter takes after her father.

When I fell silent after accidentally assigning someone’s daughter to the tank class, Go Se-won let out a small sigh.

“I called you because I thought you might be able to help me, but you make me lose the desire to ask.”

“…”

“Well, never mind. In any case, the fact that you came to see me means you’ve already heard about it, right?”

Relieved that he’d changed the subject, I nodded.

“What did they tell you?”

“That you had a debt to repay me. I didn’t hear anything more specific.”

“Then you heard right. Passing it along through someone else didn’t sit right with me, so I kept quiet.”

Didn’t sit right with him?

Go Se-won was cooperating with every investigation and interrogation. He was laying out even his own wrongdoings without holding anything back, almost like a confession.

Yet there was something he hadn’t told them.

I knew there was more to it.

Just as I sensed that something serious was coming, he began fiddling with his earlobe.

It wasn’t a signal we’d agreed on, but I had no trouble understanding it.

Fwoosh.

Internal energy rose from my dantian and surrounded the visitation room. Sound was cut off in an instant.

Go Se-won noticed despite the mana suppressor. He pretended to rub the corner of his mouth and whispered, “Area A isn’t the only secret area hidden in the Guild headquarters.”

“What?”

“Search Area A carefully. There’s another secret area inside it.”

Another hidden space.

I blinked at him, then hurriedly asked, “Where? What’s the exact location?”

But contrary to my expectations, the answer that came back was low and brief.

“I don’t know.”

“What?”

“If I knew, I’d tell you. But only Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong and Go Jun could enter. I don’t know where it is or how to get in. I only learned it existed shortly after I became Head of Security.”

Go Se-won had once been counted among Go Jun’s closest aides. Even he knew only that the second secret area existed, and nothing more.

“Then maybe…”

“Of course, I don’t know what’s inside or what they do there. That’s all I know.”

He cut me off sharply, then continued.

“The government investigation team must be searching Area A from top to bottom by now, but they probably haven’t noticed it yet.”

“Why?”

“If they had, they would have asked me about it before anything else.”

“…!”

“So, Jin Taekyung. Find it. I don’t know what secrets it holds, but…”

I was about to ask another question when the heavy door opened with a metallic clang. The warden and the Blue House[2704] security officers looked at us suspiciously.

“We couldn’t hear anything. Is there a problem?”

Go Se-won answered calmly.

“The visit is over.”

[2704] The Blue House was the office and residence of South Korea’s president.

Chapter 599

All the way back to the estate after my visit, I sensed a subtle change in the air.

Their glances and movements looked natural enough, no doubt thanks to rigorous training. But they couldn't escape my senses.

They definitely suspect something.

The A-rank Hunters of the President's Security Service.

They'd said they were there to provide temporary protection for my family and me, but I wasn't naive enough to take their word for it.

If they notice even the slightest thing out of place, they'll report it straight up the chain.

They weren't Peace Guild members or ordinary Hunters. They were government employees whose direct superior was one person: the President.

President Baek Hanseong might already have received a report about today's visit —my private meeting with Go Se-won, and the minute or two when no one had been able to hear what we said.

What should I do?

I sank into thought as I stared at the specially treated window that prevented anyone from seeing inside the vehicle.

Go Se-won had told me there was another secret area. Now I had to decide when to reveal that information, and to whom.

I didn't have to think for long.

I can't do anything right now anyway.

Only two days had passed since that day. The world was still in turmoil, and people had yet to recover from their grief and shock.

Even Team Leader Choi, who needed to know more than anyone, was no exception.

So I had to keep my mouth shut at least until Kim Hwajong's funeral was over.

It wasn't only for Team Leader Choi's sake. I needed time to sort things out myself.

"Phew."

At my quiet sigh, the security officer in the driver's seat glanced at me in the rearview mirror.

"Is something bothering you?"

"No. It's nothing."

I sank deeper into the seat as I lied.

The truth was, I was uncomfortable. Everything around me made me uncomfortable.

Silently repeating the truth I hadn't voiced, I looked out at the world beyond the window.

The scenery slipped past, and time passed just as quickly.

January 19.

A week had passed since the day that came to be known as the January 19 Incident,[2705] and the world was still in an uproar.

The flames that had erupted that day refused to die down easily. No—no one could control them as they continued to burn.

The media in Korea and around the world threw firewood and oil onto the flames, while public opinion fanned the growing blaze.

> January 19. The day darkness descended upon Korea.
>
> Two artificially induced monster waves. UN Secretary-General: “An international crime that can never be forgiven.”
>
> The Vatican: “He is not human, but Satan. Another Demon King.”

>
> Families of the January 19 Incident’s victims prepare a massive lawsuit against Ares Guild and the government.
>
> Go Se-won’s continuing revelations: “Ares is rotten.”

The ones taking the greatest beating were, of course, Go Jun and Ares Guild.

Go Se-won had briefly been second-in-command within the Guild, and he gave detailed testimony about every act of corruption and every crime he knew of.

As secrets that no one had known—or that people had known and kept quiet about—came to light, the world was turned upside down once again.

The prosecutors’ office issued countless search and arrest warrants. Several overseas branch directors sensed what was coming and even tried to flee.

> └ Did you see the news? I heard the Chinese branch director got caught over there while trying to flee.
>
> └ Yeah, saw it. A wanted notice went out right away, and the Public Security Armed Forces Department caught him.
>
> └ Of all people, he had to get caught by those Chinks. Fucking idiot. What a disgrace to the country.

[2705] The Korean name for the January 19 Incident also reads as “119 Incident.” In Korea, 119 is the emergency telephone number for fire and ambulance services.

> └ ??? The Public Security Armed Forces Department are good Chinks, so don't insult them. Don't you know they teamed up with Lord Fuck during the Small Cataclysm and smashed an Arch Lich's head in?
>
> └ What's a good Chink?
>
> └ A good Chink.
>
> └ The King Public Security Armed Forces Department deserves credit. The guy who caught the Chinese branch director is Xiao Shen, the youngest ever head of the department. He's a die-hard Jin Taekyung fan.
>
> └ For real?
>
> └ In interviews he kept saying "Big Brother Taekyung" and "Big Brother Lord Fuck." Turns out the Chinese branch director damaged local cultural relics too, so the Ministry of Foreign Affairs is pissed.
>
> └ ?? Was this asshole a Red Guard[2706] in his past life?
>
> └ Maybe it's revenge for the Northeast Project.[2707] Those mainlanders still call hanbok hanfu.[2708]
>
> └ Winnie the Pooh[2709] died ages ago, but hanfu's still alive and kicking…

It was the first—and worst—crisis Ares Guild had faced since its founding.

Nearly half the Guild's executives were summoned by the prosecutors' office. Even those who had committed no apparent crimes or acts of corruption had to be questioned as witnesses.

In stark contrast, public opinion toward Jin Taekyung and the Peace Guild, who had played a greater role than anyone in the January 19 Incident, was overwhelmingly favorable.

> Summary of Lord Fuck's achievements.jpg
>
> I was at the scene during the Pyeongchang monster wave. I'm grateful to the fifteen Peace Guild Hunters, including the late Guild Master Kim Hwajong. May the deceased rest in peace.
>
> Honestly, what crime did Jin Taekyung commit? (Long post warning)
>
> The Blue House national petition has surpassed ten million signatures.

An enormous number of posts defending Jin flooded the internet every day.

[2706] Red Guards were youth groups mobilized during China's Cultural Revolution.

[2707] The Northeast Project was a Chinese historical research program disputed in Korea for treating ancient kingdoms associated with Korean history as part of Chinese history.

[2708] Hanbok is traditional Korean clothing; hanfu is traditional Han Chinese clothing. The comment alludes to disputes over claims about the origins of Korean dress.

[2709] Winnie the Pooh has been used online to satirize Chinese leader Xi Jinping, and references to the character have faced censorship in China.

They passionately insisted on Jin Taekyung's innocence, submitted national petitions, and even held protests condemning the media outlets that had recklessly targeted Jin during the earliest days, before the truth had come to light.

Even so, some voices stubbornly continued to criticize him.

> Lee Kanghee, chief editorial writer at Patriotic Daily: "Jin Taekyung is nothing more than a lawless thug. The matter of Go Jun should have been left to the law…"

The statement by one famous journalist won a considerable amount of support, but its significance quickly faded once the meaning of the Code Red issued against Jin Taekyung by Ares Guild—and the exact casualties from the January 19 Incident—came under scrutiny.

> 538 casualties in a fierce battle. Yet only twenty people died…
>
> The identities of the dead finally revealed: the late Go Jun and his security team.
>
> Go Se-won: "Go Jun's security team were loyal hunting dogs and fanatics. The Busan monster wave was also carried out by a security-team member on Go Jun's orders."
>
> Testimony from a victim at the scene: "Jin Taekyung knocked down everyone who blocked his path, but he never attacked the healers."
>
> The chivalry of a modern knight shines amid a bloody battle.
>
> Murders in London, United Kingdom. Ten security-team members flee after murdering the family of Ares Guild European Branch Director Song Cheonwoo, whom they had held captive. Interpol issues wanted notices…
>
> Lee Kanghee, chief editorial writer at Patriotic Daily: Why did he criticize Jin Taekyung? Where did the hundreds of billions of won[2710] in real estate held under borrowed names come from? Prosecutors begin an investigation.

As more truths emerged, the voices criticizing Jin Taekyung faltered. Meanwhile, statements from famous figures who had firmly supported him from the start resurfaced.

[2710] Hundreds of billions of won is roughly 100–900 billion won, or about $71–640 million and €65–580 million.

> Xiao Yang, Chairman of China: “We have not forgotten what happened in Sichuan. Sir Jin is a Great Hero, and he acts only according to justice.”
>
> Grand Mage Magic Johnson of the United States: “Jin is a hero, and the Korean media are trash. The truth will come out soon, so Kanghee Lee, who wasted paper on his stupid letters, should prostrate himself before my thick, enormous magic wand.”
>
> Prince Felix of the United Kingdom: “Jin was not born of noble blood, yet he proved his nobility himself. Unfortunately, those who insult him appear to possess lowly character. Come and kiss the back of my hand.”
>
> Japanese Prime Minister Shinjiro Koizumi: “I think the Korean media should reflect on insulting Mr. Jin, and although they are reflecting, I think they should reflect on the fact that they are not failing to show that they are reflecting.”
>
> Former U.S. President Joseph Biden: “He is a good young man. I met him in person not long ago, and he was calm and kind.” When a reporter asked when they had met, he thought for a moment before adding, “I think I confused him with someone else.”

The world remained chaotic, and people could barely keep up with each day’s news.

In a public apology, President Baek Hanseong promised that nothing like this would ever happen again.

At the same time, under the slogan of cleansing society, he set his sights on the massive Guilds that had grown too powerful to touch.

Prominent figures and heads of state around the world continued to defend the Peace Guild.

Go Jun had committed crimes too horrifying to imagine, and Ares Guild was riddled with corruption. Even its former Vice Guild Master, Lee Jungryong, could not escape condemnation.

Yet among all the truths coming to light, one question remained unanswered.

Why? Why, even now, had Cheon Taemin himself not appeared?

It was the question everyone carried, and at the same time, a truth no one could uncover.

The whereabouts of Cheon Taemin, the immortal hero who had vanished without warning one day, remained shrouded in mystery.

He had not appeared when an Arch Lich emerged in China several months earlier and caused astronomical damage. Nor had he appeared at the national funeral of Lee Jungryong, who had been practically his sworn brother.

Not even when Jin Taekyung reduced the headquarters of Ares Guild—the Guild Cheon Taemin himself led—to ruins…

Cheon Taemin never showed himself. The questions people had about his incomprehensible seclusion swelled like a snowball rolling downhill.

And while the chaos and uncertainty had yet to subside, a massive national funeral was held for the victims of the January 19 Incident.

Korea, usually so noisy, was quiet that day.

The government declared a temporary public holiday. Roads that should have been packed with cars were empty, and the news reported in solemn tones that nearly thirty million people had gathered at locations across the country to mourn.

And… I was here.

At the place where those who had served with honor and devotion were laid to rest.

The National Cemetery.

Step.

Perhaps spring was slowly approaching, because the grass at the end of January was green and full of life.

A breeze brushed my face, and the sunlight was warm.

It was a beautiful day. A day to send someone off, and to remember them again.

> January 19. Remembering them.

I looked up from the short phrase engraved at the bottom.

Dazzling sunlight stung my eyes above the tall memorial. Among the names of more than two thousand victims carved into its surface, I found one I knew.

> The late Kim Hwajong

I was suddenly glad the weather was so fine.

He had shivered in the cold until the moment he died. On a warm day like this, with countless people there to pay their respects, I thought he could finally rest.

It must be warm now. Isn’t that right, Butler Kim?

His ashes would be buried somewhere other than this memorial, but I believed part of his spirit remained here too.

Just as I offered Kim Hwajong a question that could never reach him, a voice spoke.

“Butler Kim will rest peacefully.”

Team Leader Choi gazed at the memorial with sorrow in his eyes, then added, “But we’ll be even busier from now on.”

I nodded.

It was time to tell him what I had kept hidden.

Chapter 600

The grief of losing someone precious never disappears. Time only wears it down, little by little, until it grows faint.

In that sense, the past week had been exactly what Team Leader Choi needed to gather himself.

“He’ll rest peacefully. Butler Kim will. But we’ll be even busier from now on, won’t we?”

Those quiet words told me he was ready.

Ready to rise while keeping the person who had left us in his heart. Ready to start walking forward again.

So now I could tell him.

“I met Go Se-won a week ago.”

Team Leader Choi looked at me.

“Go Se-won… Ares Guild’s Head of Security?”

“Yes. Go Jun’s closest aide.”

At the mention of Go Jun, Team Leader Choi’s eyebrows twitched. He quickly steadied his expression and answered calmly.

“Please continue.”

“He asked to see me. Said he had a debt to repay.”

“A debt? Given what he’s done since, I doubt he only wanted to thank you.”

Team Leader Choi had never met Go Se-won, but he’d guessed right.

I nodded and told him everything I remembered about that day: our private meeting at the special detention center, and the existence of another secret area, which Go Se-won had told only me about.

“He didn’t know exactly where it was or what it was for. He said only Lee Jungryong and Go Jun could enter.”

When I finished, Team Leader Choi murmured, “I suspected as much… So it was true.”

“What?”

That wasn’t the reaction I’d expected. As I stared at him, eyes wide, he asked, “Does anyone else know about this, Mr. Jin?”

“Uh, I think Go Se-won and I are the only ones. We temporarily blocked the sound, and we covered our mouths while speaking.”

“I thought you said the President’s Security Service accompanied you.”

“They looked suspicious, but they haven’t asked me anything or reacted since. They might’ve reported it to President Baek Hanseong, though.”

“I see.”

I'd answered his questions. Now it was my turn.

"Did you already know, Team Leader Choi? It sounds like you did."

He nodded without trying to deny it.

"Someone told me."

"…So there weren't two of us. There were four. At this point, doesn't President Baek Hanseong know too?"

"I doubt it. Ares Guild's security is thorough, and very few people were allowed access to information about Area A. Besides…"

He added evenly, "There are three of us, not four."

"What?"

"The man who told me died recently. At one time, he was as close to Ares Guild's darkest secrets as Go Se-won."

As far as I knew, there couldn't have been many people like that. In fact, there had been so few since Ares Guild's founding that they could be counted on one hand.

And if he died recently…

A name flashed through my mind.

"Song Cheonwoo."

Team Leader Choi nodded. "The last time we met, inside the Gate, he told me several secrets he'd kept until then. I don't know whether his conscience finally troubled him or he just wanted to ease his own mind."

His reason didn't matter. What was done couldn't be undone. We needed to look for the traces it had left behind.

"Did Song Cheonwoo know where the other secret area was, or what it was for? That old man seems like he would."

"He didn't know where it was. He did know its purpose."

"What is it?"

That was what I'd wanted to know most. If Area A was the shell, the secret area inside it was the core.

What secret had Lee Jungryong and Go Jun—master and disciple—shared between them? What was hidden in a place that remained undiscovered even while Area A was being searched from top to bottom?

An astronomical amount of cash? S-rank Magic Gems siphoned off in secret? Or… a human experimentation lab?

Possibilities straight out of conspiracy theories and movies raced through my head.

Then Team Leader Choi spoke, and every thought vanished.

"My maternal grandfather."

"What?"

"The purpose of the other secret area is to hide my maternal grandfather's existence from the world."

"…!"

How much time had passed? Even as the wind blew and clouds drifted slowly overhead, I couldn't move for a long while.

This is insane.

I hadn't imagined this.

Cheon Taemin. That Cheon Taemin was in the secret area.

I felt as if the A-Gwi[2711] of Gyeongsang-do had smashed me in the back of the head with a sledgehammer. Frozen like a statue, I barely managed to speak.

"Um… You don't happen to have two maternal grandfathers, do you?"

"…"

"No, we need to be sure about this."

Team Leader Choi gave me a look that said Are you an idiot? before answering.

"Not as far as I know."

"…Huh."

Fuck. It really is him.

While I stood there speechless, Team Leader Choi hit me with another home run.

"I heard he lost consciousness more than twenty years ago. Lee Jungryong and Song Cheonwoo concealed that fact and kept it secret all this time."

"…He lost consciousness? Cheon Taemin? I mean… the Cheon Taemin?"

Humanity's immortal hero. The Slayer.

Cheon Taemin, the man who had defeated even the Demon King Asmodeus, was in a vegetative state.

That was harder to believe than Jinho hyung[2712] passing the civil service exam or Hyuk Mujin becoming the Murim Alliance Leader.

How is that possible?

Cheon Taemin held a place in this world much like the Martial God's in Murim. More than twenty years had passed since he withdrew from public life, yet no one had come close to matching him.

A flawless man of absolute power. That power was why he was called the immortal hero and held the authority he did.

And now I was supposed to believe he'd spent decades in a vegetative state—even in a world with cutting-edge medicine and magical treatments?

[2711] A-gwi is a ravenous ghost in Korean Buddhist folklore.

[2712] Hyung is a form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend.

Something stinks.

It seemed that thought had shown plainly on my face. Before I could say anything, Team Leader Choi shook his head.

“I don’t think Lee Jungryong or Song Cheonwoo did this to him.”

“Why not?”

“People tend to be honest when they’re facing death. Especially when their families are being held hostage.”

“…Right. Fair point.”

“The important thing is that my maternal grandfather is hidden in another secret area within Area A. And no one except those three knows about it. Not even the government, despite its thorough investigation of Area A.”

I thought of President Baek Hanseong, who had stood beside me throughout the national funeral. If anyone knew how to hide what they were thinking, it was a politician.

“Are you sure?”

“This isn’t a simple guess. It’s a certainty based on information. Several key insiders within the government investigation team sent to the site have already joined forces with us.”

“…!”

“So for now, at least, we don’t have to worry.”

Watching Team Leader Choi explain it so calmly, I had a sudden thought.

Maybe the past week had done more than get him back on his feet. Maybe it had set him running.

He’s already started.

After the life-or-death crisis in Sichuan and the grief he’d suffered in Pyeongchang, Team Leader Choi had grown tremendously. And I had a fair idea where his next long stride would take him.

“The investigation is expected to last at least a month. What would you do, Mr. Jin?”

“We’d have to stop the government’s investigation first. To secure that person while avoiding suspicion.”

“And the fastest way to stop it?”

“Put this whole mess to rest and become the legal owner of Area A as soon as possible.”

There was only one way to become Area A’s legal owner.

Team Leader Choi reached out and ran his hand over the memorial.

“I made Butler Kim a promise once.”

The impregnable fortress surrounding the royal castle had collapsed miserably, and the prince who had been stripped of his right to inherit the throne and sent into exile had finally returned after a long passage of time.

To reclaim the crown stolen from him long ago.

“I promised I would make Ares Guild mine. No matter what.”

His deeply sunken eyes gleamed.

Team Leader Choi stared at the name of the late Kim Hwajong, carved highest of all, then turned toward me.

“Will you help me?”

He didn’t need to ask. My answer had been settled the day I signed the contract he’d offered me.

“There’s still plenty of time left on my contract, so sure. But I’m not going to have to kill anyone else, am I?”

Team Leader Choi let out a quiet laugh at my deadpan question. It was the first time I’d seen him smile since he woke up.

He took out his phone.

“No. This time, you only need to be the stick.”

“The stick?”

“Yes. A little carrot and stick for those who can’t make up their minds.”

Beep. Beep. Beep. Click.

Someone picked up after the third ring. Team Leader Choi addressed them in a flat voice.

“Hello, Vice President Park Daewon. This is Choi Minwoo.”

I’d heard that name often enough in the news lately to know who he was calling.

The most senior executive left at Ares Guild.

With Vice Guild Master Go Jun dead and most of the executives who held real power dragged in for questioning by the prosecutors’ office after Go Se-won’s revelations, he was the man who had inadvertently become Ares Guild’s acting head.

“Yes, I’m listening. Team Leader Choi Minwoo—no, Mr. Choi Minwoo.”

Park’s voice sounded grim through the phone. Team Leader Choi answered gently.

“You still haven’t made up your mind, it seems. You left after the national funeral without saying anything to me.”

“I, well… It’s just…”

“Six o’clock this evening.”

“What?”
