
“Ah. Does this have something to do with the Young Bureau Head of the Seongun Escort Bureau who was supposed to come?”

This man’s ability to read the room was anything but ordinary.

He’d already figured out the gist of it, so there was no point explaining every little detail. I shrugged.

“Something like that. How did you know?”

“Young Master Jin, I lived in the imperial palace for over twenty years.”

“Excuse me?”

“I survived by reading the room. Reading children’s expressions is easy enough.”

Hong Jin gestured with his chin toward the young prodigies of the Five Gates of Shanxi.

At the far end of a table some distance away, they had been sneaking glances at us with frozen expressions. The moment they realized they’d been noticed, they flinched and shrank back.

“They’ve been like that since they first came in. Carefully watching Young Master Jin’s every move.”

“Really?”

“Yes. They looked so pitiful that even I felt sorry for them. What on earth did you do?”

“Something similar to what happened with the people who left earlier.”

“The Three Hands of Zhongnan? Tsk, tsk. They failed to recognize who they were dealing with, didn’t they?”

As expected, Hong Jin caught on at the slightest hint. He clicked his tongue in sympathy while Li Feng whipped his head around to stare at the young prodigies.

His gaze seemed to say that he intended to remember exactly who had provoked Martial Uncle Cheongpung.

“Gasp.”

“A-Assistant Military Commissioner! No, Great Hero Li! It’s not like that…”

Li Feng was not only a powerful figure in the Shanxi Province military but also a lay disciple of Huashan.

The government and Murim might supposedly stay out of each other’s affairs, but getting entangled with him in the wrong way would make the future of the Five Gates of Shanxi very unpleasant.

Leaving them as they hurriedly offered excuses, Li Feng asked me,

“Could you tell me in detail what happened?”

“It’s already over. The person involved even laid into them himself. What more is there to say?”

“Laid into them?”

“Ah, I mean he beat them up. They apologized first, of course.”

“Martial Uncle did it himself? Hmm.”

Strictly speaking, Cheongpung had only dealt with one of them, but he had beaten him all the same.

Li Feng looked at the young prodigies with a much gentler gaze.

“Do you understand what you did wrong?”

“Yes, sir!”

“We feel it in our bones!”

Their booming replies erupted immediately. Li Feng’s position was one thing, but now they also knew who Cheongpung was. No wonder they were sweating bullets.

Never mind that he was a Peak master. He was the Disciple of the Sword Saint and Huashan’s direct-line Disciple.

They’re completely fucked.

The Five Gates of Shanxi were ultimately just a collection of minor and mid-sized sects. If Huashan, one of the Nine Sects and One Gang, got angry, even their extended families might get beaten with a bat.

No, they would be lucky if it ended there.

“The conversations and events that took place here today…”

Li Feng’s heavy voice had barely begun when the answers came flying out.

“We’ll keep silent!”

“We’ll take it to our graves!”

“I’ve already forgotten everything!”

“Where am I? Who am I?”

What a fucking performance.

As I watched an epidemic of amnesia break out before my eyes, I added one more thing.

“Is that enough?”

“Y-Yes?”

“What do you mean…?”

“What do you think I mean? If you want to be part of the family, put your spoon on the table too. You there. What does ‘family’ mean?”

The young prodigy I had pointed at stammered out an answer.

“People who eat together… Unless that’s wrong. Then I’m sorry.”

“That’s right. So, how do you become family?”

“Ah!”

The young prodigy cried out and slapped his forehead.

At least this one had some sense.

“Then I’ll arrange somewhere nice for our next meeting. How does Honghwaru sound?”

“…”

What a complete blockhead.

With heirs like these, I didn’t even need to look to know the state of the Five Gates of Shanxi. I heaved a deep sigh and spelled it out for him.

“Forget Honghwaru. I’m telling you to do whatever our side tells you to do. For example, anything involving the Seongun Escort Bureau. Understand?”

“Ohhh.”

The Jin Family of Taiyuan had certainly become the greatest power in Shanxi, but if the minor sects united and resisted, it would inevitably become a nuisance.

We belonged to the orthodox faction, after all. If we seized whatever we wanted and held people accountable like a band of mounted bandits, everyone would point fingers at us.

In Murim, wasn’t legitimacy every bit as important as martial arts?

But if there’s no one to point fingers, it won’t be a problem.

I slowly took in the four men and women before me—the heirs of the four sects among the Five Gates of Shanxi, excluding the Seongun Escort Bureau.

If they took the lead in supporting the Jin Family of Taiyuan, everything would become much easier.

“When you’re eating, pay close attention to where you sit. That way, you can at least get a bite or two.”

The Seongun Escort Bureau was supposedly one of the most prominent powers in the province, despite being located in a frontier region. It was more than enough of a feast to share around.

At my words, the quick-witted one's eyes quietly gleamed, while the clueless one cautiously opened his mouth.

"Even so, that might be a little…"

I cut the dim-looking bastard off without hesitation.

"What sect are you from?"

"M-Me?"

"Yes, you."

After a long hesitation, he finally coughed up the name Gopyeong Sect.

I vaguely recalled hearing it before, but it was some obscure sect I could barely remember. That was the extent of Gopyeong Sect's standing.

No, the same was true of every sect in the new Five Gates of Shanxi.

"Gopyeong Sect. Gopyeong Sect… It doesn't have a very pleasant ring to it. Should I recommend a new name?"

"Excuse me?"

I stared into the eyes of the bastard who still hadn't caught on.

"Starting next month, let's begin again under a new name. The Gopyeong Branch of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. How does that sound?"

"…!"

"…!"

"You don't seem to like it. I was only joking, you idiot."

Of course, I wasn't joking.

I patted the deathly pale Young Sect Leader of Gopyeong Sect on the shoulder and swept my gaze across the room.

"Is anyone here sworn brothers or sisters with Woo Jintae?"

"N-No, sir."

"Or maybe you've been close since childhood, knowing each other for more than ten years? Betrothed before birth? There are plenty of possibilities."

"Absolutely not! Absolutely not. We've only spent time together a few times."

"I-I only received a few bolts of silk and a little jewelry…"

"Then that settles it."

Clap!

The sharp crack of my hands coming together made all four of them flinch.

"Choose. Are you going to make enemies of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, Huashan, and the government, or…"

I grinned and enunciated the final words clearly.

“Are you going to abandon someone you aren’t even close to and share the feast with us?”

Clap, clap, clap, clap.

This time, it wasn’t me. Hong Jin was cackling and applauding.

“Our Young Master Jin—I like you more and more every time I see you.”

“…”

Please refrain from making such dangerous remarks, brother.

“Are you leaving already?”

His tone was still arrogant, but his voice and eyes brimmed with regret.

The more I see this kid, the cuter he gets.

I reached out to pat my little fanboy—no, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao—on the head, only to lower my hand when I saw Li Feng’s expression.

Oh, right. He’s a king. And a member of the imperial family, at that.

“Ahem. I have urgent business to attend to.”

“Can you not put it off?”

“I’m sorry, but every moment counts.”

“I see…”

Looking at the dejected kid’s face made me feel a little guilty—like hell it did. I wanted to hurry back home to my family and get some proper rest.

Right on cue, Hong Jin cut in with his delicate voice.

“Your Highness, you have me, so please let Young Master Jin go now. All right?”

But Zhu Bao merely stared at me, his expression stubborn.

“Then when shall I be able to see you again?”

“Hmm, I don’t know. After a thousand nights?”

“A thousand nights!”

Zhu Bao cried out in shock.

That was approximately three years. For a child who was only ten years old, it must have seemed like an enormous amount of time.

“A-Are you truly that busy?”

“There are such things as adult matters, Your Highness.”

“Good heavens. Even my late father was never that busy…”

He looked utterly crushed. Zhu Bao’s head drooped, only to shoot back up at Li Feng’s next words.

“Your Highness, how about this?”

“What do you mean?”

“I hear the Jin Family of Taiyuan will be holding a grand banquet in fifteen days. Why not visit the Jin Family of Taiyuan in person?”

“The Jin Family of Taiyuan?”

“Yes. All the renowned masters of Shanxi will be gathered there, so I’m sure you’ll be pleased.”

Zhu Bao’s eyes sparkled.

“Of course! Why didn’t I think of that?”

“Yes, Your Highness.”

“…”

What the hell were these two talking about?

They hadn’t even been invited, yet here they were letting their imaginations run wild. But if I told him not to come, it felt as though something would explode, so all I could do was nod.

“Great Hero Li is right. Come visit us then.”

“Would that really be all right?”

A little late to ask, wasn’t it?

I put on my best customer-service smile.

“Of course. My brothers will be happy to see you too.”

“I-Is that really true?”

“You know who my brothers are, don’t you? You’ve already met my second brother.”

“The Heaven Shaking Sword?”

A dark cloud suddenly fell over Zhu Bao’s bright, innocent face.

“Your second brother dislikes me. Three years ago, he only ate and left without saying a word. He was even rude.”

“He didn’t say a single word?”

“I do not wish to speak of that day anymore.”

Hong Jin whispered in a tiny voice,

“His Highness asked him for an autograph, but he flatly refused.”

Jin Mukyung had been invited three years ago, which meant…

Zhu Bao had been seven at the time.

Good grief. How could anyone flatly refuse a seven-year-old asking for an autograph—especially when that seven-year-old was a king?

That man really is something else.

In a way, it was very Jin Mukyung.

Recalling how his fanboy enthusiasm had been so brutally crushed, Zhu Bao silently fidgeted with his fingers.

Watching him, I felt a pang of sympathy.

“If you come this time, I’ll ask him to give you his autograph.”

“Really?”

“Pinky promise. Seal it.”

I hooked pinkies with the bewildered boy and even stamped our thumbs together.

“What is this?”

“It means I swear before the gods of heaven and earth. Something like that.”

“Oh!”

Everyone around us was making a fuss because he was royalty, because he was a king, and so on. But a child was still a child.

Everyone smiled fondly at the sight of Zhu Bao beside himself with delight.

“I know. After dealing with this boring Assistant Military Commissioner every day, he’s smiling brightly for the first time in ages.”

“I’ve done nothing but my best.”

“Doing your best doesn’t always produce the best results. It happens.”

“Deputy Military Commissioner!”

“What is it, Assistant Military Commissioner?”

Li Feng and Hong Jin.

I could never tell whether the two of them got along or hated each other as they bickered back and forth.

Meanwhile, Cheongpung approached Zhu Bao with anticipation written all over his face.

“I-I could give you an autograph too?”

“…You’ve never given anyone an autograph before, have you?”

“Gasp. How did you know? I’ve left my hand mark as a caravan porter on the way here, but this is my first autograph.”

“Wouldn’t it be strange if I didn’t know?”

Just look at that expectant face. He was dying to give someone his first-ever autograph.

“C-Can’t I give him one?”

“Sure. Do whatever you want. His Highness will probably be pleased.”

But Zhu Bao’s reaction was unexpected.

“An autograph? From you?”

“Yes! I really want to give you my autograph!”

“No.”

“W-Why not? They say my grandfather is very famous. Haven’t you heard of the Sword Saint?”

“I know. Of course I know. But…”

Zhu Bao put on a deliberately stern expression and shook his head.

“You don’t have a martial title yet, do you?”

“Excuse me?”

“Come back after you’ve acquired a cool martial title. Then I shall certainly get your autograph.”

“…”

“…”

So this was something only named characters could do.

Chapter 146

Every meeting must eventually end in parting.

As the familiar six-horse carriage drew near, Zhu Bao held out something about the size of my palm.

“What is this?”

“My reward for today’s meeting.”

“Oh, you really didn’t have to…”

I accepted it and took a closer look. It was some kind of gold medallion.

Clouds and a dragon had been delicately engraved into its surface, which flashed brilliantly in the sunlight.

Ding.

SYSTEM

The Quest target is extremely pleased with today’s meeting!

As a Quest Reward, obtained Prince Shangshan’s Token!

“It is my token. If there is anything else you desire or a wish you would like granted, bring this token and come find me. I shall fulfill it to the best of my ability.”

“Oh.”

An exchange coupon.

Twenty coupons from a Chinese restaurant would get you a large serving of sweet-and-sour pork. Since this was an exchange coupon from Prince Shangshan, I might be able to trade it for all kinds of elixirs or treasures.

I do need a weapon, too.

Thanks to absorbing the Blazing Flame Divine Pill, I had more than enough internal energy.

It was just a shame that I didn’t have a decent spear. I’d been using and discarding other weapons like disposable chopsticks from the very beginning.

Should I just trade it in right now?

I considered it for a moment, then shook my head.

The greatest danger had already passed. With no urgent need, trading the prince’s token for a single weapon would be a waste.

“Thank you. I really wanted something like this.”

When I bowed deeply from the waist, Zhu Bao rose onto his tiptoes and gently ruffled my hair.

"I am happy that you like it."

"…"

This felt really strange. I'd let it slide because he was cute.

Meanwhile, the carriage that would take us home came to a stop. As I was about to climb aboard, Zhu Bao waved at me.

"Take care! Come again!"

Next time, you should come to me, you little punk.

There were only a little over two weeks left until New Year's Day. I would probably see the young prince again around then.

"Then I shall take my leave."

"I'll return, Your Highness."

The carriage was so large that even its entrance was wide. Hong Jin and I climbed aboard side by side.

"…Hm?"

Wait a minute. That had been so natural that I'd almost let it pass.

I stared at Hong Jin in disbelief.

"What is it?"

"Hm? Why?"

"This carriage is going to the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"I know. That's why I got on."

"What?"

"You know what they say—strike while the iron is hot. Shouldn't I take this opportunity to speak with the Lesser Family Head Jin?"

Hong Jin smiled pleasantly and snapped his fingers. An official came running over like the wind.

"Deputy Military Commissioner. Do you have an order for me?"

"We're visiting without an appointment, so we should at least bring plenty of gifts. Don't forget to send a messenger ahead to offer our respects."

"I shall carry out your orders!"

Li Feng also issued an order to one of his officers.

"He is an honored guest. Escort him to the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"Yes, sir!"

At the two men's commands, nearly a hundred soldiers and a hastily assembled delegation began moving in perfect order.

Cheongpung, who had been about to climb aboard after us, gave a small round of applause at the sight.

"Wow."

Having obtained the royal guard gear set he had longed for so desperately, he decided to stay at the Jin Family of Taiyuan for the time being.

Li Feng dipped his head toward me.

“I entrust Martial Uncle[826] to you.”

“Of course.”

Even without hearing him say that, Cheongpung was someone I wanted to befriend first.

If I used him as a bridge to strengthen the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s relationship with Huashan, our family’s future would surely be bright.

Besides, he’s an interesting guy.

Cheongpung waved with a sunny smile.

“Martial Nephew[827] Li Feng, don’t worry about me! Interesting things keep happening whenever I’m with Young Master Jin!”

“Just in case, let me say this now. Don’t cause any trouble.”

“Yes!”

At least he was good at answering.

I turned toward the people who remained behind.

“What have you decided to do?”

The young prodigies of the Five Gates of Shanxi answered hesitantly.

“We plan to stay at Honghwa Inn until New Year’s Day.”

“There isn’t enough time to visit our families and return…”

“To be honest, we don’t even dare go back.”

“If I return now, my father might kill me.”

Their answers couldn’t have been gloomier.

Then again, rumors about what had happened the day before were probably already racing across the land like a winged horse, so their fear was understandable.

I clicked my tongue as I looked at them.

“Behave yourselves until New Year’s Day. I’ll smooth things over with the Sect Leaders later.”

“R-Really?”

“But in return, each of you needs to do your part. You know what I mean, right?”

“The Seongun Escort Bureau… Yes, sir. We understand.”

The tide could no longer be turned. By now, both these young men and the Sect Leaders of the Five Gates of Shanxi would know that.

---

[826] Martial Uncle is a sect seniority title for someone of one’s teacher’s generation, not necessarily a relative.

[827] Martial Nephew is a sect seniority title for a disciple of a junior generation, not necessarily a relative.

From now on, all they could do was grow as large as possible under the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

"All right, then. Do your best, and I'll see you on New Year's Day."

"What?"

"Why? What is it?"

"W-we're going the same way."

"Where? To Honghwa Inn?"

"Yes."

I tossed one final remark at the bewildered young men.

"This is the express carriage to the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

Bang!

The carriage began moving almost the instant the door slammed shut.

The inside had been spacious even with six people seated in it. Cheongpung, Hong Jin, and I each claimed several seats and leaned back against the soft cushions.

"I think I could live here."

Cheongpung continued with a blissful smile.

"When I lived with Grandfather, I slept on grass or rocks. I don't think I could live like that anymore."

He's a primitive man discovering civilization.

Hong Jin gave him a curious look.

"Then have you always lived on Huashan, Young Master?"

"Yes. Ever since I was very young. But apparently I wasn't born on Huashan. I asked Grandfather about it once, and he said I came to Huashan when I was three or four."

That figured. No matter how great a master the Sword Saint was, even he had his limits when it came to raising a child.

Reaching the Supreme Peak realm wouldn't make milk come out of a man's chest, after all.

"…"

Actually, a Supreme Peak master might be able to do it.

They were monsters who could use Sword Energy and Sword Force. Producing a little milk couldn't be beyond them.

I imagined a white-haired old man nursing a newborn baby.

"Ugh."

"Benefactor, are you all right?"

"Young Master Jin, are you all right?"

“I’m fine. I just felt a little nauseous.”

“Oh my, that won’t do. Here, lie down on my lap.”

“…”

Maybe I should just smash his knee.

When I hurled silent curses at him with my eyes, Hong Jin covered his mouth and laughed.

“Hoho. Young Master Jin really is so much fun to tease.”

If a beautiful woman had said that, I would have laughed along with her. But Hong Jin was unmistakably a man. No amount of white powder on his face or lipstick on his lips could change that fact.

He said he used to be a palace attendant.

Didn’t that make him a palace eunuch?

I’d once heard that not every palace eunuch had necessarily been castrated. But there was no way to tell whether Hong Jin was equipped or not.

“Young Master Jin.”

“Y-Yes?”

“What are you looking at?”

“Ah, I thought there was something stuck there.”

Damn it. He caught me.

He wasn’t a Murim martial artist, but his ability to read the situation was on the level of a Peak master. I quickly pulled my gaze away from Hong Jin’s lower body and changed the subject.

“By the way, how did Great Hero Li Feng end up joining the military?”

“Assistant Military Commissioner Li? He passed the military examination, of course. After that, it was smooth sailing all the way.”

“As expected of a Huashan lay disciple[828].”

“I can’t say that had no influence, but that wasn’t the only reason. Becoming a Third-Rank Assistant Military Commissioner in only ten years is extremely difficult.”

“Third-Rank means…?”

“What’s Third-Rank? Is it something you eat?”

I vaguely understood that it was a high position, but that was about it.

Seeing that Cheongpung and I had no idea what he was talking about, Hong Jin explained patiently.

“It’s a high office. There are only four such positions in each province, and Assistant Military Commissioner Li is among the top three in the military hierarchy.”

[828] A lay disciple trains under a martial sect without joining its resident religious community.

Hong Jin counted them off on his fingers.

“First is the Military Commissioner, the commander in chief. Then me, directly beneath him. And third is Assistant Military Commissioner Li. Of course, His Highness Prince Shangshan stands above us all.”

“The Military Commissioner?”

“He’ll be retiring soon. He was born the son of a Great General, accomplished a little, and has a tremendous fondness for bribes.”

A corrupt military official. The kind whose petty corruption had become a way of life.

With the commander in chief being that kind of man, it was easy to understand why security in Shanxi Province had been such a mess lately.

“The current Military Commissioner is incompetent. You only need to look at the mounted bandits roaming freely the moment the Mount Heng Sword Sect collapsed.”

“If he’s that incompetent, why not just…”

I swallowed the rest of the sentence before it left my mouth.

Who was I to meddle in someone else’s workplace? Especially when they were all high-ranking government officials.

Seeing my reaction, Hong Jin kindly added an explanation.

“The Military Commissioner is appointed directly by the Emperor. The same goes for dismissing him.”

“Oh.”

“Well, at least he has no ambitions beyond that. I like bribes too, so I’m hardly in a position to criticize him.”

What kind of person was this?

I’d seen plenty of politicians on television proclaiming their innocence against accusations of accepting bribes, but Hong Jin was the first person I’d met who openly admitted to liking them.

“Why? Did I look that upright?”

“No. You did look like someone who would enjoy bribes, but…”

“But you didn’t expect me to say it so openly?”

“Well, yes. Honestly, I’m a little flustered.”

“Young Master Jin. Do you know what?”

Hong Jin continued with a serious expression.

“I don’t have a thing.”

“What?”

“I’m a eunuch.”

“…”

What the hell was I supposed to say to that?

I'd suspected as much, but I hadn't expected him to drop a bomb like that out of nowhere.

Cheongpung, who had been looking out the window, abruptly joined in with a curious expression.

"What's a eunuch?"

"…Please, please shut your mouth."

He's saying he doesn't have his thing—his thing!

Every second dragged by. Sweating coldly, I forced myself to speak.

"I'm sorry to hear that."

"There's no need to be sorry. Some people live without one, and some live with one. Right?"

"Th—that's right."

His admirable attitude made me solemn for no reason.

Meanwhile, the mountain-dwelling primitive who didn't know what a eunuch was kept chattering without the slightest hint of tact.

"Benefactor, could you please tell me what a eunuch is?"

Even if I die, I'm not telling him. Never.

Even if I explained it, there was a 99.99 percent chance he would say something like, Wow, I've never met anyone without a dick before!

But Hong Jin remained composed.

"A eunuch doesn't have a dick."

"Wow, I've never met anyone without—"

"Oh, shut up already!"

Cheongpung sucked in a startled breath.

"B-Benefactor."

"Calm down, Young Master Jin. If he grew up in the mountains, it's understandable. And besides, it's not as if I've only been living as a eunuch for a day or two."

"Still, that was too harsh."

"Was I in the wrong? I'm truly sorry."

"It's fine. Chin up. Yours is still attached."

Decades of experience as a eunuch hadn't gone anywhere.

Hong Jin waved a hand as if to calm us down, then continued as though nothing important had happened.

"I've never regretted my decision. When your own family is starving to death, what wouldn't you do? Am I wrong?"

"Of course not."

"I—I would have done the same!"

Whatever Hong Jin said now, we had to agree with him. Cheongpung and I could only nod, feeling like condemned criminals.

“I’m not an upright man, but I’m not cowardly enough to betray a trust. If I were, I wouldn’t have continued serving His Highness all this time.”

Hong Jin gazed out the window with hazy eyes.

“Long ago, I served at the late Emperor’s side. He ordered me to assist His Highness Prince Shangshan.”

“The late Emperor?”

If the previous Emperor had entrusted Hong Jin with such a request, Hong Jin must have held a considerably high position among the palace attendants even back then.

Hong Jin nodded and continued.

“I came to the frontier in what was practically exile, but… I’m satisfied with things as they are now. Truly, this is enough.”

Despite his words, an unmistakable light shone in his eyes.

Ambition? Hope?

Before I could understand what that light meant, it disappeared, and the coachman’s quiet voice reached my ears.

“The Jin Family of Taiyuan is in sight.”

Chapter 147

Jin Wikyung let out a deep sigh.

“I have to start working the moment I return to the family.”

“Haven’t you been away for several days?”

“That was due to circumstances beyond my control!”

“Getting angry like this won’t make the work disappear.”

“Wipeng, save me. At this rate, I’m really going to die of overwork.”

Despite his desperate, pitiful plea, Wipeng answered coldly.

“Finish your work before you die. I’ll give you a grand funeral.”

“…You’re a demon. Are you even human?”

Jin Wikyung had returned to the Jin Family of Taiyuan half a day earlier only to find a mountain of work waiting for him.

Because he had been away for nearly ten days, hundreds of bamboo slips were scattered across not only the writing desk but also the floor.

“How am I supposed to do all this alone?”

“You can do it. You’ve done fine until now, so why are you making such a fuss?”

“Does our family really have so few people? No—are there really so few capable people in all of Shanxi Province?”

“Have you considered lowering your standards?”

“Are you saying this is my fault?”

“More than ten people have already come and gone. They all seemed like decent scholars to me, but you made the mistake of hiring only two.”

“Decent scholars? Please. Do you have no eye for people?”

They couldn’t accept just anyone simply because he had studied.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan was, after all, a Murim sect. How much of the Four Books and Three Classics[829] someone had memorized, or what they had learned from which great scholar, wasn’t important.

Jin Wikyung wanted practical thinkers with flexible minds, not rigid scholars who spent their lives quoting Confucius and Mencius.

“Those two were the only useful ones among them.”

He still didn’t regret that choice. At his firm answer, Wipeng picked at his ear.

“Oh, really? Then where are those two now? What are they doing?”

“…Well, that’s…”

When Jin Wikyung was momentarily at a loss for words, Wipeng continued in his place.

---

[829] The Four Books and Three Classics are canonical Confucian texts studied as part of a classical education.

“They worked four straight nights without sleep, then ran away.”

“R-ran away? Who says they ran away? One of them had a gravely ill mother…”

“I looked into him after he disappeared. His mother died ten years ago.”

“…Really?”

“The other one said he was going to the latrine, then slipped away and never came back. Am I wrong?”

“Ahem! Ahem!”

“My lord, you’ve trained in martial arts, so you can go without sleep for several nights and remain perfectly fine. Those men can’t. They’re ordinary commoners who have never read a single line of a cultivation technique formula in their lives.”

“Ah, I know that. That’s why I’m paying them generously.”

“Another fifteen days and that silver would have gone to their surviving families.”

“…”

“Anything else to say?”

“…No.”

“Then start working. From now on, if the scholars who come looking for work seem useful, hire them all.”

Jin Wikyung nodded gloomily and reached for a bamboo slip.

That was when one of the martial artists from the guard detail waiting outside the office cautiously entered and delivered an unexpected report.

“Who did you say?”

Wipeng answered Jin Wikyung’s question.

“A messenger sent by the Deputy Military Commissioner of Shanxi Province.”

“I heard that much. But the Deputy Military Commissioner is… the man said to be Prince Shangshan’s closest aide and the true power behind him?”

“Yes. There was plenty of talk about a mere palace attendant securing such a high-ranking military post.”

“Right. I remember.”

Jin Wikyung had heard the rumors about the palace attendant who sat at the top of the military hierarchy and single-handedly kept the young prince under his thumb.

“We’ve never even met. What could he want all of a sudden?”

“What do you think?”

“Could it be because of the Third Young Master?”

“Given the circumstances, that’s highly likely. Bring the messenger inside first.”

“Yes.”

“Ah, and call Mukyung too, just in case.”

“Understood.”

Not long after Wipeng nodded to one of his subordinates, a man entered the office.

His movements were precise and disciplined, and he wore light armor.

One glance was enough to tell that he belonged to the military. This was the messenger Hong Jin had sent.

“Are you the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?”

Jin Wikyung nodded.

“I am Jin Wikyung. Let’s skip the tedious formalities between us. What brings you here?”

“I have come to deliver a message from the Deputy Military Commissioner.”

“Does this concern my younger brother?”

“Yes. He is on his way here now, together with the Deputy Military Commissioner.”

“Together?”

“Yes. They should arrive in half a shichen.[830]”

Jin Wikyung silently stroked his chin as he listened.

Hong Jin was effectively the second-most powerful man in Shanxi Province. He wasn’t the sort of person who moved without a reason.

A letter alone would have been unexpected from a man with whom they had never had any connection. The fact that he was coming in person made it all the more bewildering.

“I don’t recall making an appointment.”

Wipeng added a remark with a face dripping with frost.

“No matter how high-ranking an official the Deputy Military Commissioner may be, this is a clear insult to our family. Are you aware of that?”

“Th-that…”

Beads of sweat formed on the messenger’s forehead.

He had received some minor training in military martial arts. Faced with the gaze of the Peak master known as the Ghost Sword, he felt his heart drop.

“What business brings him here?”

“I-I was only ordered to deliver his message…”

“He acts as though he owns the place.”

The messenger, who had become so nervous he could hardly sit still, was rescued by Jin Wikyung.

“Wipeng, that’s enough. So what exactly did the Deputy Military Commissioner say?”

“He told me to convey his apologies in advance for his sudden rudeness. And…”

---

[830] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

The messenger took a small cylinder from inside his robes and handed it to Jin Wikyung. Inside the palm-sized cylinder was a rolled sheet of white paper.

“What is this?”

“I haven’t heard anything myself. He merely said that you would understand once it was delivered.”

“Hmm.”

Jin Wikyung deliberately furrowed his brow and unfolded the paper.

At that moment, the office door opened, and a second guest entered.

“Did you call for me?”

“…”

“Older brother?”

Jin Wikyung stared silently at the paper in his hand for a while before raising his head.

“You’re here.”

“Yes. I was training when I heard you were looking for me… Why did you call me?”

“We have an honored guest coming. We need to prepare to go out and greet him.”

“An honored guest?”

“My lord, what do you mean, an honored guest? Do we really need to go out and greet him?”

Wipeng frowned and objected.

“He’s coming without even giving us notice. What kind of honored guest is that? He’s an uninvited guest.”

He didn’t restrain himself even with the messenger standing right there. Considering the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s current standing in Shanxi, he wasn’t entirely wrong.

Jin Wikyung quietly handed him the paper.

“Look at this, then say that again.”

“Seeing is believing.”

“You could simply tell me instead of making such a fuss…”

Wipeng’s voice gradually grew quieter before cutting off completely. His eyes trembled as they darted back and forth.

He stared intently at the paper. A moment later, his lips parted.

“An honored guest is coming.”

“Right?”

“Yes. Exactly.”

The two men turned toward Jin Mukyung, who was still standing there without a clue what was happening.

“Mukyung.”

“Second Young Master.”

“You said you came straight from training, right?”

“You smell of sweat.”

“Go wash.”

“Wash immediately.”

Baffled by their reaction, Jin Mukyung asked in frustration,

“Who on earth is coming to make you act like this?”

Jin Wikyung and Wipeng answered at the same time.

“A big spender.”

“And an extremely big one at that.”

Wipeng waved the paper in his hand. It was a thousand-nyang bank draft issued by the Golden Star Exchange, valid anywhere under heaven.

“This isn’t just a thousand nyang. It’s a thousand silver nyang.”

A thousand silver nyang was worth one hundred thousand nyang in iron coins. To the Jin Family of Taiyuan, which was already pouring money out in every direction, it was a fortune as welcome as rain during a drought.

For the first time in a long while, Jin Wikyung gave his second brother a stern look.

“Mukyung, let’s go wash up.”

“…”

The moment I got out of the carriage, a word slipped out on its own.

“Wow, fuck…”

There was no way I could stop myself from swearing. Atop the towering wall, a fluttering cloth banner displayed enormous letters that read:

The Day the Deputy Military Commissioner Came to the Jin Family of Taiyuan

This isn’t even Buddha’s Birthday. What the hell is this?

I was too embarrassed to lift my head when Hong Jin climbed down behind me and burst out laughing, clutching his stomach.

“Wow. This is even more than I expected.”

"Are you and my eldest brother old ball buddies[831] or something? How else did you get such an enthusiastic welcome…?"

"Young Master Jin, I don't have balls."

"Ah—oh. I'm sorry. I'm really sorry."

That was a tremendous blunder. Without a stick, there was no way any fertilized eggs would be left behind.

As I writhed under the weight of my guilt, Cheongpung approached and comforted me.

"Benefactor, my grandfather used to say that people who don't know how to read the room have no friends around them. But don't worry. I'll be your ball buddy.[832]"

"…"

I don't need one, you bastard.

As I struggled to swallow the curse, Hong Jin spoke.

"Young Master Jin, do you know what binds people together? Wealth. They say gold and silver can make even ghosts work for you. Living people should be even easier, don't you think?"

"So?"

"I told you I'd give him a present. It's basically a bribe."

Money can make even ghosts work for you.

I agreed with that to some extent, but I didn't like the fact that the person in question was Jin Wikyung.

I already thought of him as my older brother deep down. I didn't appreciate Hong Jin making him out to be some materialistic opportunist who could be bought with a bribe.

Perhaps that displeasure showed on my face, because Hong Jin smiled and said,

"Was that too harsh? But it's only natural. Who doesn't like wealth?"

"He's still my eldest brother. Don't think you've won over the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan with a measly few silver nyang."

"Young Master Jin…"

Hong Jin's eyes widened at my low voice.

"A few silver nyang? I gave him a thousand."

"A measly… How much?"

"A thousand silver nyang. One hundred thousand nyang in iron coins."

By now, I had a rough grasp of Murim prices and currency.

[831] "Ball buddy" renders a Korean colloquial term for a close childhood friend. Its literal wording makes the exchange awkward for Taekyung.

[832] "Ball buddy" renders a Korean colloquial term for a close childhood friend. Its literal wording makes the exchange awkward for Taekyung.

The private suite at the Phoenix Inn, which could be considered a luxury hotel, cost fifty silver nyang per night. That was said to be close to twice the annual living expenses of a family of four commoners.

In modern money, that would be tens of millions of won.[833]

A thousand silver nyang was twenty times that. In other words, Hong Jin had casually tossed several hundred million won[834] at them in one go.

"That's… a lot, isn't it?"

"A lot, yes. I put in some effort this time."

"Still, that's far too much."

"It's for the sake of our future relationship. And right now, the Jin Family of Taiyuan is probably losing money faster than it's bringing money in. Winning a war and occupying the enemy's territory isn't the end of it."

"Ah, yes."

"The assistance you give at times like this feels much greater. I learned that after giving and receiving so many bribes myself. Ah, of course…"

Hong Jin continued with a wink.

"I also spent a little extra because I've taken quite a liking to you, Young Master Jin. You know how I feel, don't you?"

The moment he finished speaking, I felt a hard foreign object against my butt.

The repeated poking sensation jolted me wide awake.

No way. Is this bastard seriously…?

I swear, it was the most spine-chilling moment of my entire life.

Fine. You die, I die. Let's have another war!

I spun around at lightning speed.

What met my eyes was a silver lump about half the size of my palm. What did they call those again? A silver yuanbao?

"Here. Pocket money from me."

Oh, right. He's a eunuch.

I calmed my pounding heart and answered.

"Th-thank you."

"Sure. Go buy some candied hawthorn skewers.[835]"

"Benefactor, could you take me with you when you buy them?"

Cheongpung smacked his lips as he joined in.

Just then, a familiar voice rang out from behind us.

---

[833] Tens of millions of won means roughly 10–99 million won, or about $7,100–$71,000 and €6,500–€64,000.

[834] Several hundred million won means roughly 200–900 million won, or about $140,000–$640,000 and €130,000–€580,000.

[835] Candied hawthorn skewers are a traditional snack made by coating fruit in hardened sugar.

"Heh heh. I'll tell the cooks separately, so ask for as many as you like. Isn't that right, Wipeng?"

"We'll build a mountain of candied hawthorn skewers.[836]"

"Who is that fellow? Candied hawthorn skewers?[837] He isn't even a child, so what's this about?"

I didn't need to look to know who it was.

I turned around with a happy smile, only to find a scene that left me speechless.

Flutter. Flutter.

Jin Wikyung was smiling broadly. So was Wipeng. Jin Mukyung's face was bright red.

In the hands of all three men, tiny scraps of cloth fluttered in the wind. I had no idea when they had made them.

> Long live the Great Nation! Long live His Imperial Majesty the Emperor!
> His Highness Prince Shangshan, may you become a sage king!

"…"

"…"

What had I said to Hong Jin earlier?

Had I told him not to think he'd won over the Lesser Family Head of the mighty Jin Family of Taiyuan with a measly few silver nyang?

Fuck, "won him over" my ass.

At this point, he was burned—burned to a crisp.

Chapter 148

In the atmosphere warmed by the enormous sum of a hundred thousand nyang[838], Jin Wikyung and Hong Jin exchanged greetings.

“I am Jin Wikyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. It is an immense pleasure to meet the Deputy Military Commissioner I’ve heard so much about.”

“To receive such a warm welcome from the Lesser Family Head of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan—I hardly know what to do with myself. Please, call me Comrade Hong from now on.”

“Even so, how could I address an official that casually?”

“Come now, you’re being too stiff. I said to call me casually.”

“Ha-ha. Then shall I, Comrade Hong?”

What was with the sudden communist atmosphere?

As I wondered whether I was in Pyongyang or the Murim, Jin Wikyung finished exchanging introductions and turned his gaze toward me.

“Hmm. Taekyung, you’re here?”

“Yes.”

His voice was heavier than usual, so I answered politely and read the room.

Apparently, he understood that acting as he normally did in front of outsiders would not only damage his personal dignity but also humiliate the entire family.

“So, did you greet His Highness properly?”

Properly? I didn’t just greet him. I even held a private autograph session.

Hong Jin smiled and patted my shoulder.

“His Highness was delighted. He’d always wanted to meet Young Master Jin here.”

“Oh, is that so?”

“Yes. He was so happy, he simply wouldn’t let him go.”

“Uhehehe. It seems our youngest—no. It seems His Highness has taken quite a liking to my younger brother.”

“I can see why. He’s handsome, tall, and well-built. He’s strong in martial arts and has such an easygoing personality. Who could dislike him?”

“Ahem. It feels rather awkward to say this myself, but Taekyung truly is an extraordinary talent. If he had been born into one of the Five Great Families instead of our family, no one would be surprised if he became the greatest under heaven.”

Jin Wikyung got so carried away that he forgot all about acting dignified. As he chattered excitedly, Hong Jin’s expression hardened.

“The greatest under heaven? Lesser Family Head Jin, that joke goes too far.”

---

[838] A nyang was a traditional Korean unit of money, distinct from the modern won.

“Pardon? What do you mean?”

“You’re saying Young Master Jin has what it takes to become the greatest under heaven? Even if I have no connection to the Murim, surely you aren’t making light of me.”

“…Ahem.”

As the atmosphere instantly turned cold, Jin Wikyung gave an uncomfortable cough. Hong Jin immediately continued.

“Someone like Young Master Jin could become the greatest of all time.”

“…!”

“Allow me to congratulate you in advance, Lesser Family Head. For the greatest of all time to come from the Jin Family of Taiyuan—what a blessing for Shanxi Province.”

Jin Wikyung cried out, overcome with emotion.

“Comrade Hong!”

“Lesser Family Head Jin!”

“…”

They say Hong Jin lived in the imperial palace for twenty years. His skill with his tongue certainly wasn’t ordinary.

I clicked my tongue as I watched Jin Wikyung rejoice as though he had found his soulmate.

“This won’t do. There’s no point staying here. I’ve already arranged a place, so why don’t we have a drink?”

“What should I do? I’m not very good with alcohol.”

“Ah, what a shame.”

“The only time I can’t drink is when there’s none to be had.”

“Comrade Hong!”

“Lesser Family Head Jin!”

“…”

“…”

Look at how perfectly they clicked together.

When the two men disappeared, laughing loudly with their arms around each other’s shoulders, Wipeng stared at me with an utterly dumbfounded expression.

“Is that man really the Deputy Military Commissioner?”

“Unfortunately, yes.”

“I heard he was once a palace attendant, but I never imagined he would be so frivolous.”

Well, then what did that make Jin Wikyung, a martial artist who had played along with every bit of it?

Jin Mukyung, who had been wearing a sour expression for some time, finally spoke.

"That's just the kind of man he is. Last time, he subtly stroked my shoulder. I barely stopped myself from breaking his arm."

He tore the cloth in his hands to shreds and flung it to the ground. Looking much more relieved, he said,

"Then I have important business, so I'll be leaving."

"What business? Training again, I assume."

"Is anything more important to a martial artist than training?"

"…No."

That left me with nothing to say.

As I stood there at a loss, merely smacking my lips, a clear, ringing voice rang out.

"Wow, that's exactly what my grandfather always says."

Wipeng and Jin Mukyung's gazes pierced Cheongpung like awls.

To ordinary people, Cheongpung was merely a young man with a slightly unusual air about him. To masters, however, he was something else entirely.

When both men's eyebrows shot upward, Cheongpung turned to me with a flustered expression.

"Uh, Benefactor. Did I do something wrong?"

"Wrong? Of course not. They're just intrigued. Right, gentlemen?"

Neither man took his eyes off Cheongpung. They merely nodded.

An extraordinarily young Peak master. It was only natural that they would be curious about the identity of this Cheongpung who had suddenly appeared out of nowhere.

"While we're at it, why don't you introduce yourselves? This is Cheongpung."

Before I had even finished speaking, Cheongpung bowed deeply.

"Hello, I'm Cheongpung! I've only been in Shanxi for a few days. Before that, I was in Henan, and before that…"

Where did this guy crawl out of?

The question was written all over their faces.

Just as I expected. I explained Cheongpung's identity simply and clearly.

"He's the Sword Saint's disciple."

"…!"

"…!"

The name of Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was practically a cheat code among martial artists.

Both men gaped at Cheongpung, too stunned to speak. Cheongpung cautiously asked,

“Um, which of you is the Heaven Shaking Sword?”

Still reeling from the shock, Jin Mukyung stammered out a reply.

“I-I’m the Heaven Shaking Sword. But are you really the Sword Saint, Great Hero Mae Jonghak’s…?”

“Yes. He’s my grandfather.”

“Gasp!”

He looked several times more shocked than when he had seen the Flame Divine Palm martial arts manual.

A young man claiming to be the disciple—and grandson—of a Supreme Peak master who was known to have gone into seclusion decades ago had suddenly appeared before them. Their reaction was understandable.

“This can’t be…”

“The Sword Saint’s successor…”

Cheongpung looked back and forth between the two astonished men, then smiled brightly.

“I didn’t know either until I came down the mountain.”

“Y-Young Hero. Did Great Hero Mae also descend the mountain…?”

His voice was filled with expectation and excitement.

Both men were swordsmen who had trained with the sword their entire lives. Mae Jonghak had attained such heights in the Way of the Sword that he had earned the title Sword Saint. To them, he was practically a god.

But Cheongpung’s answer shattered their expectations.

“No. I snuck out alone. There were people I wanted to meet.”

“Ah…”

“How unfortunate…”

“But putting that aside…”

Cheongpung looked at the two crestfallen men before speaking again.

His gleaming eyes had been fixed on Jin Mukyung for some time now.

“Are you really Young Hero Jin Mukyung, the Heaven Shaking Sword? The one from the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes?”

“That’s right. I am Jin Mukyung.”

“Wow, I finally found you!”

“…Hmm?”

“I’ve been searching everywhere for you. From Heaven’s Gate Temple in Henan all the way here.”

What? The person that guy had been looking for was Jin Mukyung?

Wipeng, as well as Jin Mukyung himself, asked with bewildered expressions,

“You were looking for me?”

"Yes. Since you were nearby, I thought you'd be a decent place to start."

"A first? What does that mean?"

"A dueling tour."

Cheongpung smiled softly. It was completely different from the bright, innocent smile I had seen from him until now.

"I decided it while coming down the mountain. I won't return until I've defeated all the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes."

"…!"

"My grandfather told me this: A martial artist has no need for conversation. We contend through martial arts alone."

Sssss.

At that moment, I felt a wave of heat. Violet light-flames had risen around Cheongpung's entire body, surging upward.

I had already seen this once before.

The Zaha Divine Technique.

The Extreme Yang qi burned the cold away. The earth melted, and the soil scorched. Cheongpung opened his mouth with all traces of his smile gone.

"Shall we move somewhere else?"

"Is there any need?"

"Draw your sword."

Jin Mukyung let out a long breath. His rapidly beating heart slowly began to settle. Breathing was important in battle. Only now was he finally ready to draw his sword.

As he placed a hand on the hilt, he thought of one man's name.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

Not once had he forgotten that name since the day he first held a sword.

A legendary swordsman said to have reached the ultimate realm of the sword—or perhaps a realm beyond it.

Everyone revered the Sword Saint, but Jin Mukyung was different.

Someday, I will defeat him.

If anyone had heard him say that, they would have snorted. They would have pointed at him and called him crazy.

No matter how much of a genius Jin Mukyung was, he could never reach the Sword Saint's name. Ever since Mae Jonghak had begun to be called the Sword Saint, no one had surpassed him.

Decades ago, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak had already written a new chapter in the history of the orthodox Murim and become the protagonist of a legend.

It doesn't matter. This is my goal.

It was not reckless arrogance. It was a goal.

A goal he had etched into his bones and heart every day as he trained with his sword.

And at this very moment, someone who had inherited everything from Sword Saint Mae Jonghak stood before him.

"My grandfather used to tell me, 'Compared to the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, you are nothing. Don't become arrogant.'"

Cheongpung slowly stepped forward. A single blue-steel sword dangled from his waist, tied on haphazardly, and his footsteps were as light as though he had come out for a stroll.

But…

There are no openings.

He looked utterly careless, but Jin Mukyung had no idea when or how he could attack.

Jin Mukyung licked his parched lips.

"I've never even met him… He praised me too highly."

"No. Honestly, you surprised me a little. I mean that."

Jin Mukyung knew that Cheongpung meant every word. That only made him feel stranger.

Only a little?

It had been more than twenty years since he began training with the sword. Talent and effort had brought him this far.

People called him a genius, gave him the martial title Heaven Shaking Sword, and counted him among the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.

He had believed he had never once become drunk on such empty fame, but…

I still have a long way to go.

At some point, he must have grown accustomed to the gazes of people who looked up to him.

The wound Pung Yang had inflicted on him not long ago seemed to throb again.

"Do you know something?"

"What?"

"That you're strong."

"Until recently, I wasn't certain. But now I know."

"Because you met me?"

"Yes. Because I met you, Young Hero Jin. Now I know what the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes are capable of."

“Is that so?”

Jin Mukyung let out a quiet laugh.

What an interesting guy. He possessed martial arts that rivaled—or even surpassed—those of an Elder of the Nine Sects and One Gang, yet he remained untainted by the world. He was pure. Honest.

He was a martial artist, but he didn’t fit in the Murim.

He’s the exact opposite of someone I know.

One person suddenly came to mind.

A guy who seemed like he could somehow survive no matter where he was thrown in the Murim, and who fought in the least martial-artist-like way imaginable.

“How old are you?”

“I turned twenty this year.”

“The same age as him, too. Coincidence? Or fate?”

“What?”

Instead of answering, Jin Mukyung shook his head.

In truth, he already knew the outcome of this duel. The qi of the Zaha Divine Technique surging through Cheongpung’s entire body was that overwhelming.

His only regret was that he couldn’t display the full extent of his skill against an opponent of this caliber.

What would that troublemaker do in a situation like this?

Jin Mukyung glanced at his troublesome younger brother. With a grin like a little devil’s, Taekyung was mouthing something.

You. Are. Fucked.

What a goddamn bastard.

Laughing hollowly, Jin Mukyung placed a hand on his sword hilt. The internal energy boiling up from his dantian coursed through every part of his body.

Cheongpung looked at Jin Mukyung’s sword and spoke.

“My grandfather told me something else, too. A duel doesn’t need an opening stance or anything like that.”

“I agree.”

The next moment—

With a tremendous boom, violet light-flames and silver Sword Energy collided.

Chapter 149

Xi’an’s history ran deep. Until the dynasties changed, it had been called the center of all under heaven for hundreds of years.

Its enormous population, the abundant resources produced by its plains and mines, and the famous scenic and historic sites left behind by three unified dynasties swept away by the passage of time still drew countless visitors to Xi’an.

In one of Xi’an’s bustling inns, two Confucian scholars dressed in thick fur coats were among those visitors.

“Come on, hurry up. If we want to get back to the inn before sunset, we’re running out of time.”

Unlike his enthusiastic friend, the other scholar shook his head with a thoroughly fed-up expression.

“Again?”

“What do you mean, again?”

“Can’t we just rest for today? We’ve been walking around for days. My legs feel like they’re about to break.”

“Don’t be such a baby. We walked a thousand ri[839] to get here—how can we just turn around and go home? At our age, do you really think we’ll ever have another chance to visit Xi’an?”

“Good grief. I came to sightsee in Xi’an, and now it looks like I’m going to end up sightseeing Mount Beimang.[840] Leave me alone.”

“Come now. I don’t know about the other places, but we absolutely have to visit Western Peak. You’ll regret it until the day you die if you miss such a magnificent sight.”

“Western Peak…”

The five most renowned mountains under heaven were known as the Five Great Mountains.

Western Peak referred to Huashan, which lay near Xi’an.

“Imagine climbing Huashan and looking down upon all under heaven. Doesn’t your lofty spirit surge at the mere thought?”

“Well… I suppose it does.”

Unable to resist his friend’s fervent persuasion, the scholar reluctantly nodded.

He knew perfectly well that Huashan was as famous for its breathtaking scenery as it was for its rugged terrain.

---

[839] A Korean ri is about 393 m (0.244 mi); a thousand ri is about 393 km (244 mi).

[840] Mount Beimang is traditionally associated with burial grounds and death.

“Do you think a famous mountain became famous for no reason? We need to soak up plenty of its spiritually efficacious energy this time if we want good news at the next civil service examination. How many times have you already failed?”

“Why are you bringing that up all of a sudden?”

“Don’t get angry. Anyway, we’ll go to Huashan, take in some lofty spirit and some spiritual energy. That’s all I mean.”

When the scholar still looked hesitant, his friend added coaxingly,

“I won’t ask you to visit anywhere else. We’ll just stop at Lotus Peak and come straight back down.”

At that, even the scholar who had been stubbornly resisting began to waver. Who knew? Perhaps he really would pass the civil service examination with flying colors next year.

But one rumor still bothered him.

“I heard Huashan is crawling with martial artists…”

“If you mean Huashan’s Daoists, there’s nothing to worry about. An acquaintance of mine went there years ago and said he didn’t have any trouble.”

“Ahem. Then shall we give it a try?”

The scholar made a show of giving in as he rose, but suddenly lost his balance and staggered. The strength drained completely from his legs, which had been trembling for some time.

He was about to crack the back of his head against one of the many table corners scattered around him.

“Huh? Wh-whoa!”

Just as he was about to fall with a short scream, a rough, sturdy hand braced the scholar’s back.

“Ugh. I barely survived that.”

After barely righting himself, the scholar sighed in relief and looked at the owner of the hand.

The young man looked to be around thirty. He wore a white robe and had an ordinary appearance, but he offered the scholar a gentle smile.

“Are you all right?”

“Th-thank you, Young Master.”

“It was nothing.”

Having narrowly escaped disaster, the scholar looked at the young man with curiosity.

He looks ordinary.

He was of middling height and had a slender build. Yet he had supported the scholar, who outweighed him by several dozen geun,[841] with one hand.

[841] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb).

Wondering whether he might be a martial artist, the scholar glanced at his waist. It was bare, so apparently not.

He's much stronger than he looks.

Regardless, the young man had saved his life. The sages of old had said that repaying kindness was a person's duty.

"Thank you again. Thanks to you, Young Master, I avoided a terrible mishap."

"I only did what anyone should have done. Please don't concern yourself with it."

"You helped me greatly. How could I leave it at a few words? Why don't you join us? The meal is on me."

His fellow scholar cut in with an incredulous look.

"What are you talking about? What about Huashan? What about Lotus Peak?"

"Didn't you just see me nearly go to the grave? This is a sign that I should rest at the inn. And since the Young Master here saved me, I ought to repay him. Isn't that right?"

The young man smiled and waved him off.

"I'm really fine. I'm waiting for my companions."

"Companions? I've been watching you, and you've been sitting here alone for more than a shichen.[842]"

"Ha-ha. It seems something came up and they're running late. I have no choice but to wait."

He had already been there for more than a shichen,[843] and he still intended to keep waiting? He was as good-natured on the inside as he looked.

Still, with the young man saying he had companions, the scholar could hardly insist that he join them. He smacked his lips regretfully.

"Then it can't be helped. May peace prevail throughout your household for as long as you live, and may you enjoy good health and a long life."

"Huashan! Lotus Peak!"

"I'm going, so shut that obnoxious trap of yours."

"I knew I could count on you."

"I might just throw you off the summit of Lotus Peak."

The scholar glared at his companion and was just about to take a step when—

Bang!

A deafening boom that made everyone's hair stand on end rang out. The inn's door was smashed apart, and a man and a woman appeared amid a thunderous shout.

"We're here!"

"Eunhyang's here too!"

Every patron in the inn stared at them with their mouths hanging open.

---

[842] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[843] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

They were shocked by the man's enormous physique and the beautiful girl's appearance.

What kind of combination is that?

Good heavens. I've never seen anyone so huge in my life.

The inn fell silent. Only one person showed no surprise—the young man who had helped the scholar moments before.

"You're late."

The man, who stood several heads taller than everyone else, scratched his head vigorously.

"I'm sorry. We got caught up in a little dispute on the way."

"What happened that made you more than a shichen[844] late?"

"Well, the thing is…"

When the man began to mumble, the girl who had introduced herself as Eunhyang cut in with a broad grin.

"Big Brother, have you ever heard of the Black Serpent Sect?"

"The Black Serpent Sect? I can't say I have. Going by the name alone, they don't sound like they do much good."

"That's right. They're a dark-path gang that runs a gambling den just up ahead. Their boss took one look at Brother Chulwoo and asked if he wanted to work with them… Mmph! Mmph-mmph!"

"No, he didn't! I swear! I look so innocent!"

The man named Chulwoo covered Eunhyang's mouth and protested, but no one in the inn believed him.

Look at that face. With a face like that, he's already one of the dark-path figures.

Even if I were the Black Serpent Sect's boss, I'd have tried to recruit him.

He'd be their number-one pick. Number one.

Everyone only muttered those words inwardly because Chulwoo had widened his eyes and was glaring around the room. Faced with the gaze of an enraged beast, the people could only swallow nervously.

Of course, one person was an exception again.

"So, what happened?"

At the young man's question, Chulwoo answered at once.

"I just told them I wasn't interested and sent them away."

"Is that true?"

Chulwoo's gaze slid away.

"Y-yes, it's true."

"There's blood on your fist."

---

[844] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

“Gasp! Really? I definitely wiped it off!”

“…”

“…”

“Mmph. Mmph!”

The young man let out a deep sigh.

“Let go of Eunhyang first.”

“…Yes, Senior Brother.”

“Mmph—phew!”

Eunhyang was finally released. She scrunched up her face and spat repeatedly.

“Ugh, salty. When did you last wash your hands, Brother?”

“Yesterday.”

“What? I could swear I’ve seen you visit the privy at least five times between yesterday and today. Then… Ahh!”

“Are you insane? No wonder women hate you.”

“What did you say?”

As the two growled at each other, the young man rubbed the corners of his eyes wearily.

These two were notorious troublemakers even within their sect. He had known that something like this would happen eventually, but he hadn’t expected them to cause trouble before they had even left Xi’an.

I couldn’t refuse when it was the Sect Leader’s order.

What could he do? He could only consider it his karma.

Already half drained of energy, he spoke.

“Do you both want to go back? Should I tell the Sect Leader to put you through wall-facing meditation until you come to your senses?”

“Gasp! No, Senior Brother.”

“I’m fine too, Big Brother.”

The young man deliberately hardened his expression.

“Come now. I’m not Big Brother. I’m your Senior Brother.”

“Yes, Big Brother.”

“Eunhyang, you… Phew. Never mind.”

“Hehe.”

How powerful was a beauty’s smile?

When Eunhyang smiled sweetly, the chilly atmosphere in the inn warmed at once.

That was when the innkeeper, who had been watching them nervously, approached.

“Um, sirs…”

The young man recognized the innkeeper and spoke with an apologetic expression.

“Ah, I’m sorry for causing such a commotion. We’ll leave right away.”

“No, that’s not it…”

The innkeeper glanced at Chulwoo with terrified eyes before continuing with difficulty.

“Compensation, please.”

“Ah.”

Only then did the smashed door come into view.

As the young man sighed again, Chulwoo swiftly pulled a silver nyang from a heavy pouch.

“This should be enough.”

“Where did you get this silver nyang?”

Eunhyang answered with a bright smile.

“The Black Serpent Sect.”

Chulwoo cried out in horror.

“Hey!”

“What? I didn’t do anything wrong.”

“You took a jade hairpin, too!”

“Oops. How did you know?”

“…”

Apparently, smashing the Black Serpent Sect hadn’t been enough. They had stripped the place of its valuables as well. The young man’s forehead began to throb.

“Return it immediately.”

“Senior Brother, even if those men kept this wealth, they’d only use it for evil deeds.”

“That’s right. Since it’s already happened, we could eat something delicious while we travel to our destination…”

The young man cut them off in a stern voice.

“Since when was running a gambling den an evil deed? Or have you seen them commit any evil with your own eyes?”

“We don’t need to see it. It’s obvious. They’re dark-path figures.”

“How could this vast Murim contain only one color? And if the Black Serpent Sect were truly a group of villains, the main sect would have taken action long ago.”

“But…”

“Enough. We’re in a hurry, so we’ll leave the valuables here. Is that all right, Innkeeper?”

By now, everyone in the inn knew that these people were martial artists—and that they had made enemies of one of Xi'an's dark-path factions.

The innkeeper, who desperately wanted to avoid entanglement with martial artists, looked as though he had stepped in filth.

"G-Great Hero, forgive me, but this is more than an old man like me can handle."

Chulwoo, about to lose the fruits of his hard work, spoke gruffly.

"Don't worry. Nothing will happen."

"Nothing may happen right now, but once you leave, I'll be in serious trouble."

"Come now, I said that won't happen. Even after we leave, they won't be able to touch a hair on your head."

"No, that's not something you can say so easily…"

Is his brain made of muscle too? He's damn short-sighted.

The innkeeper couldn't bring himself to say that aloud and could only suffer in silence. At that moment, the young man smiled calmly.

"When they come, just tell them one thing along with this pouch."

"Great Heroes, I don't think you understand what I'm saying…"

The innkeeper's words were cut short by the young man's voice.

"Tell them that Baek Museong, a first-generation disciple of Huashan, apologizes for his junior disciples' mistake."

The inn fell silent.

The name Huashan was intimidating enough, but the young man's name also sounded familiar, as though they had heard it somewhere before.

"Baek Museong of Huashan?"

"Baek Museong… Baek Museong… Wait. Could it be?"

Xi'an was practically Huashan's front yard. It didn't take long for a few martial arts aficionados to realize the young man's identity.

"Baek Museong, Huashan's Lone Crane!"

The title had been given to him because of his lofty bearing, like that of a solitary crane.

Renowned as an outstanding prodigy from the moment he entered Huashan, he also held another title.

"If he's Huashan's Lone Crane, isn't he the first of the Three Plum Blossom Elites?"

The current Sect Leader of Huashan had three disciples, every one of whom had grown into an outstanding master.

Naturally, they had been appointed Plum Blossom Swordsmen—the pride of Huashan—and soon distinguished themselves.

"I heard one of them was a woman… Then are those two—?"

"Why even ask? Didn't you hear her call Huashan's Lone Crane her Senior Brother?"

“Good heavens. I never thought I’d live to see all of the Three Plum Blossom Elites in a place like this.”

Ignoring the exclamations erupting throughout the inn, Baek Museong spoke.

“Would it really be impossible?”

The innkeeper answered with a solemn expression.

“I’ll return this property to the Black Serpent Sect at the risk of my life. At your command!”

“…”

“Ah, that’s right.”

At Baek Museong’s mutter, his two junior disciples turned toward him.

“What is it, Senior Brother?”

“Did you leave something behind?”

Baek Museong shook his head.

“I forgot to tell him that Huashan has been sealed off.”

“Tell who?”

“I don’t know his name. That man is going to drag his aching legs all the way there for nothing.”

Eunhyang clicked her tongue sympathetically.

“What a shame. He won’t have a chance for the next few months.”

“Indeed.”

They recalled the incident that had thrown all of Huashan into an uproar several days earlier.

While the Sect Leader—in other words, their Master—was asleep, an intruder had entered and left without anyone noticing.

The intruder had committed the audacious act of leaving a dagger and a handwritten letter beside the Sect Leader’s head.

> “I’m going out to get some air. Don’t slack off just because you’ve become Sect Leader. Train your martial arts when you should be sleeping.”

Under ordinary circumstances, they would have immediately cast a dragnet across the entire mountain. But if the intruder’s identity was Sword Saint Mae Jonghak, the matter was different.

The Sect Leader had immediately sealed Huashan tight and ordered a search for the Sword Saint’s place of seclusion. The search had continued ever since.

“Grandmaster really is something. He’s an amazing person.”

“I’d only heard about him. I didn’t know he was this extraordinary either.”

“If that messenger pigeon hadn’t arrived, we would have been stuck searching Huashan too.”

In the midst of all that, the messenger pigeon that flew in from Shanxi Province had been a light of salvation.

After much deliberation, Huashan’s leaders had decided to dispatch the exceptional talents known as the Three Plum Blossom Elites.

“But what about that person named Cheongpung? Have you ever met him, Senior Brother?”

“Yes. Once, ten years ago.”

A disciple whom Sword Saint Mae Jonghak had raised like a son—like a grandson.

Baek Museong had been there that day ten years ago as well. The eyes of Huashan’s Lone Crane, Baek Museong, gleamed.

“I’m looking forward to it. I wonder how much he’s grown.”

Chapter 150

The training ground was so vast and empty that it looked desolate. Sweat trickled down the forehead of a young man sitting cross-legged.

What should I have done?

He closed his eyes and sank into thought. One person came to mind.

He recalled Cheongpung's crude blue-steel sword and his footwork. The smile that had vanished the moment he began displaying his martial arts.

At last, from the pitch-black darkness, a figure wrapped in violet light-flames burst forth.

Cheongpung.

Grandson of the Sword God Mae Jonghak. His disciple. It didn't matter what he called him.

What mattered was the fact that four days ago, he had exchanged martial arts with Cheongpung—and lost.

Jin Mukyung had shut himself away in the training ground and his quarters ever since. He staved off hunger with fasting pills and drove away sleep by training.

He had no need for warm food or honey-sweet rest.

I lost. Completely.

Barely three hundred exchanges. Even considering that his condition hadn't been normal, he had fallen far too easily.

Who was he? A genius who had reached the Peak realm at barely twenty and set the Central Plains abuzz.

Heaven Shaking Sword. One of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes… What a joke. Was this all I amounted to?

The grand titles attached to someone as mediocre as himself seemed laughable, nothing more than empty reputations. And yet the way he had secretly held himself in high regard left him feeling hollow.

Wasn't that the very definition of hypocrisy?

Who was it that said the world was vast?

The Nine Provinces and Eight Wastes. The Four Seas and Five Lakes.

How many masters lay hidden across this vast continent?

Only after meeting Cheongpung did Jin Mukyung understand what those words truly meant.

I was a frog in a well.

Heaven's Gate Temple was undoubtedly the finest educational institution in the orthodox Murim, but not every genius under heaven became one of its students.

The direct descendants of the Five Great Families and the true-line disciples of the Nine Sects and One Gang were too busy inheriting their sects' secret ultimate techniques.

Cheongpung was one of them. They had been born outside the well and had lived there all along.

Wait for me, Cheongpung. And all the rest of you.

The instant Jin Mukyung's eyes opened halfway, his body shot upward like lightning and light burst from his waist.

Whoosh!

Sword Energy.

Silver Sword Energy slashed relentlessly in every direction, denser and clearer than it had been four days ago—no, than ever before.

His duel with Cheongpung had given him insight and fighting spirit. His vague goal of simply becoming stronger had finally gained focus.

Swish, swish, swish, swish!

Jin Mukyung's sword did not stop after that, either.

Not until he was exhausted, utterly spent, and collapsed…

In Murim, the dantian is called the qi sea.

The qi sea. The sea of qi. The place where all the internal energy in the body begins and gathers. Whoever coined the term had chosen very well.

Ding!

SYSTEM

Qi circulation has begun.
Follow the formula of the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique to circulate your internal energy.

The Jin Family's Cultivation Technique had already reached the eighth stage. Following the path I had traveled hundreds—no, thousands—of times before, I sent forty-five years of internal energy coursing through it.

Hot.

The Scorching Yang Qi I had gained from taking the Blazing Flame Divine Pill amounted to a full half-jiazi.[845]

That tremendous energy, boiling like lava, swept through the blood vessels throughout my body. Its unstoppable momentum filled me with anticipation.

[845] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Half a jiazi is thirty years.

Maybe I can do it now…

Whenever I circulated my qi, there was one place where I always got stuck.

Two acupoints, sealed tight as iron gates, refused to let my internal energy pass. I had only recently learned that they were called the Conception and Governor Vessels.[846]

The Conception and Governor Vessels.[847] I've seen those plenty of times in novels.

Wasn't this a stage every protagonist in a martial arts novel passed through at least once?

In martial arts novels, opening the Conception and Governor Vessels[848] was standard, and Bone Transformation[849] was an optional extra. Of course, I wasn't a protagonist or even a supporting character, so I had been forced to retreat every time.

That was then. Until now.

Fifteen years of internal energy hadn't been enough. It was like ramming a compact car whose airbags didn't even work straight into a boulder.

But things were different now. Add half a jiazi[850] of Scorching Yang Qi, and that compact car turned into a military tank.

This is worth a shot.

No. I had to succeed.

It was a mountain I absolutely had to overcome if I wanted to advance to a higher realm.

I drew up my internal energy as its momentum reached its peak, split it into two streams, and launched them toward the Conception and Governor Vessels.[851]

Boom!

The collision between my internal energy and the acupoints sounded like thunder. At the same time, a sharp, tingling pain reverberated through my spine and lower abdomen.

The stronger the impact, the more vicious the recoil. But I couldn't give up now. Gritting my teeth, I rammed my internal energy against them again and again.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

What the fuck is this?

[846] In traditional East Asian medicine, the Conception and Governor Vessels are paired pathways running along the front and back of the torso.

I'd put my body through hell in my own way. Getting stabbed was practically routine, and I'd even had my internal organs damaged before.

But this was a completely different kind of pain.

Fine, my back hurts—but why does it hurt there?

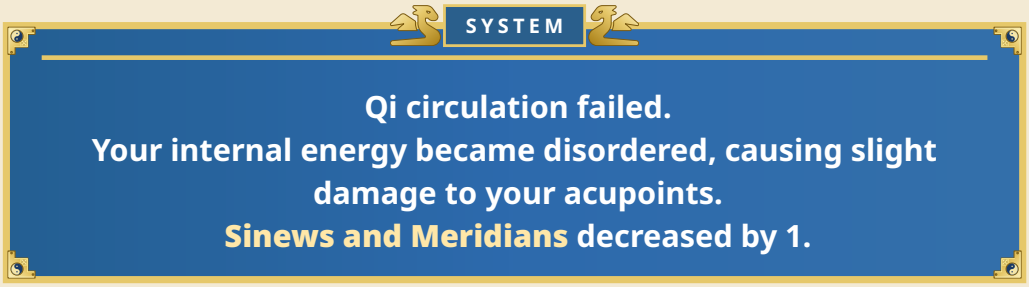
A part of a man as important as his life throbbed painfully. It felt as if someone were repeatedly squeezing it with all their strength, then letting go.

Opening the Conception and Governor Vessels[852] felt like it would earn me an incredible reward. Like enduring this would make me a Peak master…

But the more I battered the acupoints with my internal energy, the yellower my vision became.

"Ugh!"

Beep! Beep!



My balls already hurt enough to make me want to die, and now my Sinews and Meridians had dropped too.

Clutching the still-throbbing area, I collapsed facedown on the bed.

"Ugh! Uuugh!"

The riper the rice, the lower it bows its head. The more a man's vital spot hurts, the lower he bends at the waist.

I stayed facedown for a long while as though praying, and the pain gradually subsided.

"Huff, huff."

I'd almost ended up like Hong Jin.[853]

I had just sprawled out on the bed, drenched in sweat, when hurried footsteps approached and uninvited guests burst in.

"Captain!"

"Benefactor!"

Hyuk Mujin and Cheongpung charged through the door, then stopped short when they saw me.

"What happened… Whoa."

[853] Hong Jin is a delicate-looking, high-voiced man Taekyung met earlier.

“Benefactor, what are you doing?”

“Huh? What about it?”

Only after asking did I realize what I looked like.

“Oh.”

A hot-blooded young man in his twenties, in a sealed room, soaked in sweat despite the middle of winter, lying on a bed with one hand clutching that particular spot.

Hmm. There was definitely room for misunderstanding.

I calmly opened my mouth.

“You’ve got it wrong.”

After a brief silence, Hyuk Mujin’s eyes curved into a smile.

“I know. I know all about it.”

“No, that’s not it.”

“Oh, come on. Why are you acting like this? We’re both men of the world.”

“What do you mean, men of the world, you lunatic?”

“You’re still pretending you don’t know. Do I look that narrow-minded to you?”

“I’m telling you, it’s really not what you think!”

“Did it feel good? If you haven’t finished yet, should I step outside?”

“I haven’t even started!”

“Oh, then you were just about to start. Should I come back when you’re done?”

“I’m not doing it! I wasn’t planning to!”

“It’s all right. There’s nothing to be embarrassed about. I do it five times a day when I’m in good shape.”

“Is that actually true…? No, wait, you little—”

Chaos. Destruction. Ruin.

As the misunderstanding only deepened with every passing moment, Cheongpung tilted his head.

“What’s the misunderstanding? What do you know?”

“Young Hero Cheongpung, you really don’t know why the Captain is like that?”

“I don’t. Does he need to pee?”

“Good heavens, how can this be? I’ll explain it just once, so take it to heart. All of this becomes flesh and blood. I’m telling you, it’ll change your life.”

“Yes!”

“Where is the Captain’s hand right now? Answer me.”

“On his lower half.”

“That’s right. And what’s on his lower half?”

“Underclothes.”

“Underclothes! Good. You’re almost there. Now, what’s inside the underclothes?”

“Huh? But his hand isn’t on his lower half anymore.”

“What?”

“Benefactor’s hand is coming this way.”

“Gasp.”

Smack!

Thud.

It was a slap aimed precisely at his lower jaw. Hyuk Mujin crumpled with a peaceful expression, and Cheongpung caught him.

“I haven’t heard the whole thing yet.”

“…What would you do with the rest?”

“He said hearing it would become flesh and blood and change my life. Isn’t that a good thing?”

“…”

Come to think of it, that wasn’t entirely wrong.

Cheongpung gazed dejectedly at the unconscious sex-education teacher.

“But what were you doing while holding your lower half?”

“…”

Anyone overhearing this really would get the wrong idea.

“…And that’s what happened.”

By the time I finished my explanation, packed to the brim with facts, Hyuk Mujin had regained consciousness. He muttered sullenly, “Then you should’ve just said so from the start.”

“Whew. Do you really want me to beat you to death today?”

“Ah, I’ll pass. My head is still ringing.”

Hyuk Mujin winced and shook his head.

“But why did you suddenly try to open the Conception and Governor Vessels?[854] You’re not a Peak internal-energy master, and you don’t have the guts to risk something like that.”

“…I just tried it once.”

“What?”

“Forget it. You’re annoying, so shut up.”

I waved dismissively at the wide-eyed Hyuk Mujin.

It was too embarrassing to admit that watching Jin Mukyung and Cheongpung’s duel four days ago had made me want to become far stronger than I was now.

[854] In traditional East Asian medicine, the Conception and Governor Vessels are paired pathways running along the front and back of the torso.

"Anyway, just know that I failed spectacularly. I couldn't do it properly because it hurt down there. Why is this happening?"

"How would I know? I'm not a physician, or a Peak master like a certain someone."

Hyuk Mujin and I naturally turned our gazes to the side. The aforementioned "Peak master" blinked and opened his mouth.

"Hmm. I've heard something about it from my grandfather."

Hyuk Mujin now knew Cheongpung's identity too. We both exclaimed in anticipation.

"Ohhh."

"Oooooh."

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was one of the greatest masters under heaven. When it came to martial arts, we would believe him even if he claimed he could make fermented soybean blocks out of red beans.

"What did he say?"

"He said that if I mishandled the Conception Vessel,[855] I might not be able to perform as a man, and that the same was true of the Governor Vessel.[856] What else did he say? Oh, right!"

Cheongpung, who had been thinking hard, smacked his forehead.

"He told me to leave them alone because they'd open on their own with time. He said I'd become a cripple if I mishandled both of them."

"…?"

"…?"

What the hell is he talking about?

Hyuk Mujin and I exchanged glances almost simultaneously.

"Do the Conception and Governor Vessels[857] normally open with time?"

"I don't know. That's the first I've heard of it, too."

"But it can't be nonsense. The man's the Sword Saint."

"Right. Maybe it takes a very long time?"

"How long?"

"How would I know? My father is almost sixty. Should I ask him?"

"Oh, ask him whether his Conception and Governor Vessels[858] have opened?"

"Yes."

“Is he a martial artist?”

“He owns the Hyuk Family Textile Shop.”

“Try not to speak unless you have to. Listening to you is infuriating.”

“Yes.”

I pitied myself for taking someone like this around as my subordinate.

I heaved a deep sigh and spoke to Cheongpung.

“Could you explain in a little more detail? Surely your grandfather didn’t say only that…”

“He said exactly that.”

“…Really? Word for word?”

“I don’t lie to my Benefactor.”

That was true. Cheongpung wasn’t sly enough to lie.

Whether it was his nature or the environment in which he’d grown up, he was so honest and guileless that, to put it unkindly, he seemed stupid.

Cheongpung added with an aggrieved expression, “And my grandfather isn’t a liar either. I waited, too, and mine opened. Not both of them—only the Governor Vessel.[859]”

“I’m not saying the Sword Saint lied… Wait. What did you just say?”

“Young Hero Cheongpung, what was that? You opened the Conception and Governor Vessels?[860]”

“Oh, only the Governor Vessel[861] for now. Maybe it’s because I’m still young.”

I stammered, “H-How did you open it?”

“Two years ago, I was just training when I suddenly felt strange, and then—bang!”

“Bang?”

“That’s how it opened.”

“…”

“…”

“I thought it was strange, so I asked my grandfather. He said it was enlightenment. Hehe.”

This was hopeless. We were far too different.

The Sword Saint had been right that the Conception and Governor Vessels[862] would open naturally with time.

The problem was that it only applied to Cheongpung.

The guy smiling innocently in front of me was practically a new breed of human, fundamentally different from someone like me.

Genius. Talent bestowed by heaven. That's what this is.

Cheongpung and Jin Mukyung had both been born with talent entirely unlike mine. There was nothing I could do about that.

When I remained silent for a while, Cheongpung cautiously watched my expression.

"Benefactor, did I do something wrong?"

"No. You didn't do anything wrong."

"Really? That's a relief."

Watching Cheongpung sigh with relief, I licked my dry lips.

"But, um…"

"Yes?"

"Could I ask you for a favor?"

"Anything."

Damn it. Now that I had to say it, the words wouldn't come out.

I had thick skin. I'd been called brazen and shameless before.

But why was this one sentence so difficult?

"Benefactor?"

With great difficulty—truly, great difficulty—I forced out the words.

"Could you help me with my training?"

"Of course. Certainly."

"What?"

"I'll help you. With your training."

The moment I looked into his clear eyes, I finally understood why I had hesitated.

It was competitive pride.

Competitive pride that made me unwilling to accept help from this guy, of all people.

Not because I disliked him, but because he was an opponent I wanted to defeat solely through my own strength.

"…Aren't you agreeing a little too easily?"

"I owe you a lot, Benefactor. I'll teach you plenty of good things. Oh, except for the martial arts my grandfather warned me not to teach!"

Teach me?

A corner of my petty heart grew uncomfortable. And that made it clear.

I wanted to defeat this guy. I wanted to stand on equal footing with him.

But to do that…

"Then I'll be counting on you."

I had to learn. What else could I do?
Turns out I had a thicker hide than I thought.

Chapter 151

The pavilion where I was staying had only been completed a few days ago.

Apparently, Jin Mukyung had made such a spectacular mess on his first day back at the Jin Family of Taiyuan that they tore down the old pavilion and built a new one.

The important thing is, I have a training ground now.

There was no way Jin Wikyung, who absolutely melted whenever it came to his younger siblings, would have cut corners.

The inside of the pavilion was decorated far better than before, but more importantly, I now had a private training ground of my own.

“They brought in the finest carpenters and stonemasons in the area to build it.”

“Really?”

I looked around the training ground as Hyuk Mujin gave me the sales pitch like a real estate agent.

There was a high wall to keep out prying eyes and a spacious training ground. In one corner, weapons for training—what were commonly called the eighteen traditional weapons—rested on a rack.

“Look here in particular. See how the floor has a bluish tint?”

“You’re right. It looks like stone.”

“Yes, it’s called bluestone. And it isn’t just nice to look at. Want to see?”

Bang! Bang!

“Hey!”

I shouted in surprise when Hyuk Mujin suddenly stomped down with all his strength.

This bastard had completely lost his mind just because it wasn’t his training ground.

But Hyuk Mujin pointed at the floor as though nothing had happened.

“Now, before you get angry, look at the floor. It’s perfectly fine.”

Really?

At Hyuk Mujin’s Level, he was more or less qualified to be called a First Rate martial artist, yet the floor had only suffered a few minor scratches. They must have spent quite a bit of money.

“High-quality bluestone is extremely hard. It takes quite a lot to break it.”

“Nice.”

“Wow, they have things like this too? I’ve only ever trained on dirt.”

Cheongpung tapped the floor in fascination, then lightly stamped his foot.

Crack!

"Huh? It broke."

"…"

"…"

You little bastard. Who told you to put internal energy into your foot?

I stared sadly at the training-ground floor, which had been smashed before I had even gotten to use it properly, then turned toward Hyuk Mujin.

"I-I didn't do anything wrong."

"I didn't say anything."

"You just cursed me out with your eyes."

"Want me to do it with my mouth too?"

"…No, thank you. I'll be going, then. I just remembered something important."

Look at him trying to casually edge away.

I grabbed him by the back of the neck as he tried to sneak off.

"Why? Why?"

"Where do you think you're going? You have nothing to do."

"Nothing to do? Do you think I'm some idle wastrel? I told you, I have something important to take care of."

"Then why have you spent the last two days lounging around my pavilion?"

"…"

"I heard you got reward leave. My eldest brother told me."

Cheongpung shot his hand into the air and shouted,

"Wow, reward leave! I want some too!"

"…Young Hero Cheongpung, are you making fun of me?"

"You there, clean up the broken pieces of bluestone."

"Oh, yes!"

What a pointlessly cheerful guy.

Meanwhile, Hyuk Mujin, still kicking his feet in my grip, let out a deep sigh.

"Whew. Fine. Just hit me once and get it over with."

"Why would I hit you?"

"Isn't that why you grabbed me?"

"Of course not. Do I look like the kind of violent bastard who'd hit someone for no reason?"

"Yes."

"Some people repay a thousand-nyang[863] debt with a single word, but you earn a thousand blows with your mouth."

Smack!

"Guh!"

[863] Nyang is a historical Korean unit of money, not a denomination of modern won.

“Don’t be such a baby.”

Hyuk Mujin rubbed his red, swollen forehead.

“You hit me once, so that settles it, right? I’ll be going now.”

“Going where? Stay here.”

“What good would staying do me? You’ll obviously just send me on pointless errands.”

When I merely stared at him without answering, Hyuk Mujin continued grumbling.

“You may have forgotten, Captain, but I’m a martial artist too. If I want to become Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion, I need to train my ass off.”

“Who told you not to train?”

“Huh?”

Was he stupid, or had the thought simply never occurred to him? I clicked my tongue at Hyuk Mujin, who still hadn’t caught on.

“I’m saying you should train with us here.”

“…Me? Here?”

He stared back and forth between Cheongpung and me in bewilderment before stammering out a response.

“Am I really allowed to?”

“No reason it wouldn’t be. Is that okay with you, Cheongpung?”

Cheongpung, who had been proudly examining the pieces of bluestone he had somehow managed to fit back together, nodded.

“I don’t mind. But you have to buy me lots of candied hawthorn skewers[864] later.”

“…Are you possessed by a ghost who died because they couldn’t get any candied hawthorn skewers[865]?”

“A ghost? Benefactor, is there a ghost attached to me right now?”

“No, that’s not what I meant.”

“Wow! A ghost! A ghost!”

“God, this is driving me crazy.”

This guy was completely out of his mind.

I shook my head repeatedly and looked away from Cheongpung. Hyuk Mujin was still standing there in a daze.

“So, what’s it going to be? You don’t want to?”

Snapping out of it, he vigorously shook his head.

“I do. I’d love to… but are you sure I can join you?”

"I told you, you can. What, did you commit some crime?"

"Still, it's an unwritten rule of the Murim not to show others your martial arts…"

It was the same among Hunters, too.

It wasn't as pronounced as in the Murim, where people killed one another, but Hunters were also reluctant to reveal the full extent of their abilities.

And the higher a Hunter's rank, the more true that was.

Mediocre low-rank Hunters had no money, so they packed together and trained like regulars at a neighborhood gym. But once a Hunter reached the middle ranks and had some money to spare, getting a private training room was practically a given.

"Captain and Cheongpung are masters who inherited the secret arts of your respective sects, but I'm different. I won't be of much help while the two of you train."

"Hmm. That's true."

"…Right."

I continued speaking as Hyuk Mujin lowered his head with a dejected expression.

"That's why you should take this chance to learn properly and make yourself useful."

"What?"

"How long are you going to keep getting your ass kicked? Is becoming Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion the goal of your life? If you're going to advance with me into broader waters, you need to get stronger too."

"…!"

"Just train hard. Instead of wasting time worrying about whether you're qualified, keep your mouth shut, be shameless about taking the opportunity, and train even if you have to cut into your sleep."

That was what I had done. For the past several years, I had struggled desperately to survive just one more day.

I had even waited hand and foot on senior Hunters, doing everything I could to learn one more thing from them. Then, through blood and sweat, I had absorbed those lessons and made them my own.

Having gone through that myself, I understood Hyuk Mujin's hesitation. At the same time, it frustrated me.

He even has outstanding talent.

Martial artists and Hunters were different. Hunters received their abilities overnight, while martial artists built their skills from the ground up, one layer at a time.

In that sense, Hyuk Mujin's talent was considerable.

I only have to compare him with the deadwood among the Five Gates of Shanxi to see that.

They had been born into martial families and practiced martial arts from childhood.

Hyuk Mujin, on the other hand, began learning martial arts at an age when his bones and muscles had already hardened, yet he reached the First Rate realm in only five years.

Of course, that was based on Level alone, but even in a real fight, he could easily overpower men of their caliber.

And it isn't just talent… He's got grit.

Five years. That was how long it had taken the son of a textile-shop owner to become a First Rate master. Hyuk Mujin had said that he had not returned to his family home even once during that entire time.

I remembered something he had told me a few days ago.

"I started learning martial arts a little late. What else could I do if I wanted to catch up? I had no choice but to work ten or twenty times harder than everyone else."

Easy to say, but not something an ordinary person could do.

It meant that he had continued his grueling efforts while sacrificing even his sleep. In that sense, Hyuk Mujin and I clearly had something in common.

The problem is that our inferiority complexes are similar too.

That was why he couldn't readily accept the goodwill Cheongpung and I were offering. He knew this was a great opportunity, but he couldn't help wondering whether a nobody like him really belonged here.

Those feelings were holding him back. I looked him straight in the eye.

"I've made the offer. The decision is yours. If you want to keep going the way you are, I won't stop you."

"…May I ask you one thing?"

I nodded. After a brief silence, Hyuk Mujin parted his lips.

"Why are you going this far for me?"

"You said you were my right arm, didn't you? Or was it my heart?"

"Pardon?"

"What do you mean, 'pardon'? You went around saying that yourself."

"And every time I did, you told me to stop talking nonsense."

"That was just something I said. If I disliked you, would I have kept you around all this time?"

"Wasn't it because you were bored? Sometimes you seemed to enjoy hitting me when your hands got restless."

"…"

Just how much of a piece of trash did this bastard think I was?

When I glared at him, Hyuk Mujin hurriedly pretended nothing had happened.

“Ahem. Ahem, ahem…”

“Listen, if I hadn’t planned to raise you up, I would have gone around alone a long time ago. Why would I lug around deadweight like you?”

“Deadweight? Can you really change your story that easily? A moment ago, I was your right arm or your heart.”

“Right arm, my ass. At your current level, I’ll let you be my little toe.”

“Wow. That’s harsh. Really.”

He sounded hurt, but he couldn’t hide the corners of his mouth, which kept rising.

Right arm or little toe, they were both important parts of the body. That fact didn’t change.

Feeling strangely embarrassed, I shouted, “Enough! Are you doing this or not?”

“I’m actually a martial arts genius, you know. I might copy everything you do. Are you sure that’s okay?”

“Bullshit. Copy it if you can.”

“Really?”

“Ask one more time and I’ll hit you so it really hurts.”

Hyuk Mujin broke into a broad smile.

“I’ll do it.”

His voice sounded lighter, as though he had shed an old skin.

Hyuk Mujin and I sat on the floor of the training ground and looked at Cheongpung. Taking a seat was the basic requirement before the real lecture began.

“All right. Let’s begin.”

“I look forward to learning from you, Young Hero Cheongpung.”

“Yes, yes! Hoo, hoo…”

Every time Cheongpung took a heavy breath, white steam puffed from his nose into the cold winter air.

What was wrong with him all of a sudden?

“Are you all right?”

“I’m fine!”

“You startled me. Why are you suddenly acting like this?”

“Oh. Um, well…”

Cheongpung hesitated, then spoke with a face flushed bright red.

“This is my first time teaching anyone, so I’m too excited and worked up… Whew, give me a moment.”

"…"

"…"

I knew this would happen.

Perhaps he was still nervous, because Cheongpung spoke in a trembling voice.

"Th-then I'll begin."

"Don't make it so stiff. Just relax."

"R-relax?"

"Yes. Relax. Just teach us in whatever way you're comfortable with, Cheongpung."

"The way I'm most comfortable…"

"The way your grandfather taught you."

"Oh. What an easy solution!"

Hyuk Mujin and I looked at Cheongpung with a mixture of anticipation and curiosity.

This was the teaching method of the Sword Saint himself. How had that great martial artist raised this genius?

It must be something completely different.

As Cheongpung sank into thought, a smile appeared on his lips. Apparently, merely thinking about the method put him in a good mood.

"Oh, I thought of something. This training will probably help both of you a great deal, too."

"Ohhh."

"Oooooh. What is it?"

"Do you see that?"

We turned in the direction Cheongpung was pointing.

Hyuk Mujin spoke first, and I finished the thought.

"That's…"

"The training hall."

It stood roughly two hundred jang[866] from the training ground. I had a pretty good idea what kind of training he meant, and a quiet laugh escaped me.

It was the classic touch-and-go method: repeatedly running like hell to touch the destination and come back.

I expected something special from the Sword Saint, but I guess he wasn't that different.

It was certainly a classic, but it was an effective exercise for building endurance and strengthening the lower body.

I stood and began stretching leisurely.

"Do we just go there and come back?"

[866] A jang is ten cheok, about 3.03 meters (9.94 feet). Two hundred jang is about 606 meters (1,990 feet).

Cheongpung tilted his head.

“Huh? You’ve done this before?”

“Until I was sick of it.”

“Oh, I see. That’s a relief.”

Cheongpung smiled brightly and pointed to me, then Hyuk Mujin.

“Then I’ll give you half a shichen[867] and one shichen[868], respectively.”

“…?”

“…?”

“What?”

I asked in confusion.

“Half a shichen[869]? What do you mean?”

“Didn’t you say you’d done it until you were sick of it? That should be plenty of time for you.”

“That’s true, but… Ah, I get it. Do we have to make nonstop round trips for half a shichen[870]?”

“No. Once will be enough for now. I’ll wait for you at the summit.”

“What? The summit?”

“Yes. There.”

This time, I saw it clearly. Cheongpung’s raised fingertip was pointing at the cliff behind the training hall.

Hyuk Mujin and I dropped our jaws at the same time.

Holy shit. What the hell is that?

The height was impossibly vast. Even judging by eye, it was a steep cliff hundreds of jang[871] high. My vision went dark, and my hands and feet began to tremble.

If it affected me this badly, Hyuk Mujin had to be even worse.

“Are you saying… we have to climb that?”

“Yes! I picked it because it’s about the same height as the place I climbed every day when I was little.”

“…”

“…”

“Ah, that brings back memories. I fell halfway down and nearly died twice. It really hurt back then.”

“…!”

“…!”

"Yaaawn."

A middle-aged martial artist let out a long yawn and glanced to the side.

Only a few paces away, the new recruit who had been assigned here today was standing stiffly and staring straight ahead.

What a guy. He's got one hell of a build.

Limbs like pestles. Broad, squared shoulders.

Judging by his size alone, anyone might have suspected he hailed from the Hebei Peng Family, renowned for its sturdy physiques.

Come to think of it, I don't even know his name yet.

The weather was cold, and there were still three shichen[872] left in his shift.

On days like this, you had to flap your gums to make the time pass faster and keep warm. The middle-aged martial artist quietly opened his mouth.

"Hey there."

"Yes, sir!"

"Good heavens, did you swallow a thunderbolt? Why are you shouting so loud?"

"I'm sorry!"

"No need to apologize. Is it because you're new? It's good to see someone so full of spirit."

"Ah, thank you."

"Yeah, yeah. That's right."

The middle-aged martial artist smiled, pleased. They had only exchanged a few words, but the kid seemed decent. His manner was straightforward, and unlike young people these days, he was polite too.

For a man who was slowly being treated like an old-timer fit only for the back rooms, he had found himself a pretty good conversational partner.

"Is your surname Peng, by any chance?"

"No. It's Jang."

"I was only curious. You've got quite the physique. I wondered if you might belong to some distant collateral branch of the Hebei Peng Family."

The new martial artist scratched the back of his head.

"I've been pretty strong ever since I was a snot-nosed kid."

"I thought so. Your limbs are packed with muscle. Reminds me of myself when I was young."

Of course, that was utter nonsense. But despite his appearance, the new martial artist was perceptive enough to immediately bow deeply.

[872] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

“Compared to you in your youth, Senior, I’m nothing.”

“Come now, none of this ‘Senior’ business. Call me hyung[873] from now on. Ah, my surname is Hong.”

“Yes, hyung[874]!”

“Heh heh. Looks like I’ve gained a good little brother. So, Little Brother Jang, when did you join our family?”

“What? That can’t be right. If a man like you, with a general’s bearing, had joined, I would’ve heard about it long ago…”

Hong had served the Jin Family of Taiyuan for nearly twenty years. As something of an old fixture, he knew exactly which martial artists came and went.

“Ah, I haven’t been a martial artist for even a month. Before that, I was a servant doing odd jobs here and there. I mostly worked out of sight, so you may not have noticed me.”

“Ahh, I see.”

Hong looked at the new recruit with fresh interest.

A servant who became a martial artist. It wasn’t unheard of, but it wasn’t common either.

“You must have a powerful backer.”

“Pardon?”

“Oh, come now. Don’t play dumb when you know exactly what I mean. Do you think it’s easy for a new recruit to land this post?”

Grinning, Hong poked him in the side.

“Who is it? The Chief Steward is far too strict to be behind it, so did you manage to secure a solid connection somewhere in the leadership?”

“Well, I…”

“Just tell me quietly. I’ll keep it to myself. Is it the Outer Hall Master? Or the Iron Sword Squad Leader?”

The Lesser Family Head sent me here.

The new martial artist, Jang Childeuk, swallowed the words that had nearly slipped out.

People had loose tongues. If he told the truth, the rumor would spread before sunrise tomorrow.

I can’t cause trouble for the Lesser Family Head!

When it came to loyalty toward the Jin Family of Taiyuan, Childeuk was no less devoted than any martyr.

[874] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

He avoided the middle-aged martial artist's intensely curious gaze and opened his mouth.

"By the way, was this really such a difficult place to get into?"

The middle-aged martial artist looked disappointed at the change of subject and clicked his tongue. Since Childeuk clearly didn't want to say, pressing him further would be a bit awkward.

"Tsk. You said you'd been with the family for several years, right?"

"That's right. As a servant, though."

"Then how many times did you come to the training hall during those years?"

"Exactly twice."

"Right? Now, take a good look around."

"Right now?"

"Or would you rather do it next year?"

Jang Childeuk looked around as instructed.

The Jin Family's rear was completely enclosed by steep cliffs. Beneath them yawned a vast cavern—the entrance to the training hall.

Aside from Childeuk and Hong, not a soul was in sight.

"What do you think?"

"It's deserted."

"Right? How many people do you think come here in a day?"

"How many?"

Hong answered indifferently.

"No one."

"Pardon?"

"Other than the people who come to change shifts every four shichen[875], nobody comes here. Ah, there is a servant who delivers meals."

"But… this is the training hall, isn't it?"

"It is. But does anyone train here? No. The Third Young Master came in and out a few times after causing trouble, but that's about it."

What an absurd thing to say.

Come to think of it, despite the name, Childeuk had never seen anyone actually training there.

The training ground, on the other hand, was always crawling with martial artists, no matter the season.

"Then why are we guarding this place?"

"It's a symbol."

"A symbol?"

[875] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

“Long ago, Founder Jin Muryang trained here. According to legend, he suddenly attained enlightenment while training on this cliff and unleashed his martial arts. With One Strike, he blasted open the base of the cliff.”

Jang Childeuk’s jaw dropped.

He remembered hearing legends about Founder Jin Muryang. Hadn’t he been one of the greatest masters under heaven some three hundred years ago?

But how could such a thing be possible with a human body?

“Is—is that really true?”

“It happened hundreds of years ago. What does it matter whether it’s true or false? There’s a much more important fact.”

“…Yes?”

“If you sit around in front of this training hall for a few shichen[876] every day, your monthly pay arrives like clockwork. That’s what matters. The only downside is that time passes damnably slowly.”

Hong grinned and patted Childeuk on the shoulder.

“Congratulations. You’ve been assigned to the finest post every martial artist in the family dreams of. What they call a cushy post.”

“…”

Childeuk’s face twisted.

It would be one thing if he were old enough to retire at any moment, but he was still in his prime. He had no intention of wasting his time in the training hall with nothing to do.

Oblivious to Childeuk’s thoughts, Hong pulled a strip of jerky from his robes and began chewing.

“Want one?”

“I’m fine.”

“Why? It’s salty and pretty good. Looking at the sky while chewing jerky makes time pass quickly.”

The middle-aged martial artist leaned against the entrance to the training hall and tilted his head back to look at the sky.

“Well, would you look at that. The sky is so clear. Just looking at it makes my chest feel wide open.”

Jang Childeuk reluctantly glanced upward.

As Hong had said, the weather was clear. Wisps of cloud drifted slowly across the blue sky, accompanied by several black specks.

“What are those?”

“Birds, probably.”

---

[876] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

As Childeuk stared blankly at the sky, his gaze drifted toward the dizzyingly high cliff. Suddenly, his eyes narrowed.

“What about that thing clinging to the cliff?”

“The cliff? What’s on the cliff?”

“Yes. It’s pretty big.”

“Dunno. Must be a pretty big bird. Hold on, I brought a bottle of liquor somewhere…”

Without even looking where Childeuk was pointing, Hong pulled a small porcelain bottle from his robes.

“It looks a little too big to be a bird.”

“It could be a Heavenly Eagle. Those things are as big as people. They aren’t ordinary hawks.”

“Wow. It really is as big as a person.”

“They’re even called spirit creatures. I heard their wingspan alone is more than a jang[877]. I’ve only seen one from a distance, myself.”

“But, hyung[878].”

“What? Why do you keep calling me?”

“Do Heavenly Eagles fall, too?”

“What the hell are you talking about?”

Hong, who had been tipping the bottle toward his mouth, hurriedly looked at the cliff.

At that dizzying height, a massive dot was plummeting rapidly.

“Aaaaaaah!”

Childeuk marveled.

“It really is a spirit creature. Its scream sounds exactly like a person.”

“That’s a person, you lunatic!”

“Whaaa!”

“Move! Move!”

The instant Hong screamed, a person crashed into the ground amid a shower of stone fragments.

Boom! Rumble, rumble!

Rocks and dust burst in every direction. The two men swallowed at the same time.

“D-do you think he’s dead?”

“Try falling from that height. Even the Jade Emperor[879] would die.”

How had such a horrific calamity intruded upon their peaceful routine?

---

The middle-aged martial artist clutched his trembling chest and stared at the body lying facedown.

“What kind of madman falls from a cliff…”

“He looks young.”

“Does it matter whether he’s young or old? The important thing is that he’s dead.”

“That’s true, but…”

“Go turn him over.”

“M-me?”

“Who else is here besides you and me? Hurry!”

At the middle-aged martial artist’s shout, Jang Childeuk hesitantly began approaching the body.

He had only been a martial artist for a month. This was the first time he had ever witnessed someone die right in front of him.

“Huff, huff.”

The closer he got, the more clearly he could see the body.

Its limbs lay limp, and blood streamed from the back of its head as it lay facedown on the ground. Considering the height of the fall, the corpse looked surprisingly intact.

“M-may you be reborn in paradise.”

He squeezed his eyes shut and reached out to touch the body.

That was when it suddenly shot upright.

Crack!

The world flashed before Childeuk’s eyes, followed by a wave of excruciating pain.

He landed hard on his backside, his mouth hanging open, unaware that blood was streaming from both nostrils.

“Uh… uhhhh.”

“What in the… Ugh, ughhh!”

Hong’s legs gave out, and he collapsed.

“The corpse—the corpse is alive!”

“Ugh! It’s a jiangshi[880]! A jiangshi[881] has appeared!”

The dirt-covered stranger who had suddenly been written off as dead staggered to his feet.

His hair was wild, and blood vessels had burst in his eyes. He looked around, then ground his teeth.

“Fuck, Taecho Village[882] again?”

Damn, that hurts.

Head, shoulders, knees, feet, knees, feet… There wasn't a single part of me that didn't ache. Luckily, I'd driven a dagger into the cliff and slowed my fall. Otherwise, I might have kicked the bucket.

Of course, the Muscles and Bones and Toughness stats I had steadily raised had helped, too.

"Ow, the back of my head is throbbing."

I touched the tender spot and found it wet with blood.

I tore off a strip of my sleeve and was wiping away the blood when—

"W-who are you?!"

"Reveal your identity, you scoundrel!"

Oh, right. These two guys were here too.

One of the two men pointing swords at me looked familiar. What was his name again…

"Jang Childeuk?"

Mr. Jang Childeuk, who had been working hard to manipulate public opinion at Honghwa Inn until just a few days ago, recoiled in terror.

"Gasp! How do you know my name?!"

"The jiangshi[883] is talking! It's bewitching people with its words!"

"…Who are you calling a jiangshi[884]? Can't you see I'm breathing just fine?"

The middle-aged man with the patchy beard glared at me and shouted.

"You evil creature! You can't fool my eyes. If you were human, you couldn't possibly be fine after falling from that height. Who sent you? The Demonic Cult? The Blood Cult? Or perhaps…"

"Taecho Village[885]! Hyung[886], that jiangshi[887] definitely said 'Taecho Village[888].'"

"That's right! You're a jiangshi[889] sent by Taecho Village[890]!"

The middle-aged man shouted as if he had finally figured it out, then suddenly stopped and asked Childeuk,

"But where is Taecho Village[891]?"

"I don't know either."

It would have been strange if he did.

I gave up on the conversation and wiped the dirt from my face with my sleeve.

The middle-aged man might not know me, but Childeuk knew my face well. This would be faster.

"Gasp! Third Young Master!"

"Yes. Long time no see."

"Little brother, the Third Young Master? What in the world are you talking about?"

"The Third Young Master has become a jiangshi[892]!"

"…"

How the hell did he reach that conclusion?

Chapter 153

"So…"

Jang Childeuk continued haltingly.

"You were training?"

"Yes."

"Were you perhaps practicing the Wall Lizard Technique?"

"I'm not entirely sure myself, but I think so."

The Wall Lizard Technique. I'd seen it plenty of times in wuxia novels.

Apparently, it was a martial art inspired by the way lizards climbed walls.

It was similar to the real-world sport of climbing, with two key differences.

First, unlike climbing, it used internal energy.

Second, there was no safety equipment.

This really is the Murim. No holding back.

If you fell, you were as good as dead. It was the ultimate macho martial art.

When I nodded, the two men stared at me as though I were a ghost.

"From this height?"

"Is that even possible?"

"It worked."

When I first heard Cheongpung suggest it, I'd wondered what kind of insane nonsense he was talking about, too. But once I tried it, it worked.

It had only seemed unrealistic because I'd never tried it before. It was no exaggeration to say my body had already entered the realm of the superhuman.

"Oh, my. Third Young Master, what if something serious happens to you?"

The middle-aged guy fussed over me, brushing the dust from my clothes.

Only three minutes ago, he had treated me like a jiangshi[893] from Taecho Village.[894] Now he was handling me as carefully as though I were his family's precious only son, three generations in the making.

"Come now. I think you should stop training for now and return to your quarters."

"Why?"

"What do you mean, why? You were lucky this time, but if you fall again, you could really die."

I waved a hand dismissively.

"It's fine. It's not like this was my first or second time."

"What?"

"This is already the fifth time. Why act surprised now?"

---

[893] A jiangshi is a reanimated corpse in Chinese folklore.

[894] Taecho Village evokes the starting village of a game, where beginners first appear.

“The fifth… time?”

“Yes. Five times.”

His trembling gaze darted between me and the steep cliff.

“H-how are you still alive?”

“It’s fine. Someone else has fallen more than ten times.”

“…”

“…”

“Looks like it’s about time for him to fall again… Oh, there he comes.”

I pointed toward a spot high up on the cliff. A black dot that grew larger by the second was followed by a piercing scream.

“Aaaaaaah! Caaaaaptain!”

The two men’s mouths fell open.

“My goodness. There really was someone else.”

“Who is that?”

“My right arm—no, my little toe.”

“What? What does that mean?”

“Never mind that. Shouldn’t we save him right now?”

“Save him? That?”

I shook my head.

Hyuk Mujin was a healthy adult man. If I tried to catch him as he fell from that height, it would end with more than just a broken bone somewhere.

“Just leave him alone. Don’t get involved and hurt yourselves.”

The two men screamed.

“He’s falling! He’s falling!”

“He’ll die if you leave him like this!”

“He won’t die.”

If that could kill him, he would’ve died more than ten times already.

But Hyuk Mujin had a lifeline—a sturdy rope that always saved him by the narrowest of margins.

“Aaaaaaah!”

Hyuk Mujin’s scream drew closer by the second. The instant even his horrified expression became clearly visible, a streak of light flashed above us.

It plunged downward as swiftly as a meteor, glowing with a soft purple light.

“W-what is that…?”

“What is it?”

I answered briefly.

“The Zaha Divine Technique.”

More precisely, it was someone channeling the Zaha Divine Technique.

The two men couldn’t see him, but I could clearly make out Cheongpung, wrapped in the technique’s distinctive purple qi.

He was grinning from ear to ear.

“Whoooooa!”

“…”

Look at that bastard having the time of his life.

His personality might have been a little unhinged, but his ability was in a league of its own. I could only marvel at what happened next.

How is that even possible?

Shooting downward like an arrow, Cheongpung snatched Hyuk Mujin by the waist in the blink of an eye.

Then he extended his palm toward the ground rushing up beneath them.

Bang! Boom-boom!

Once. Twice. Three times…

Compressed air exploded, gouging deep craters into the ground.

Was this what it would look like if an invisible giant pounded the earth with its fists?

Every time Cheongpung struck out with a palm, the frozen ground flipped over. The resulting recoil stopped the falling figure in midair.

A moment later, Cheongpung’s feet landed lightly on the ground.

“Whew, that was fun again. Right?”

Hyuk Mujin, already unconscious, groaned.

“Uhh… uhhh.”

“I knew you’d like it.”

“…”

What part of that made him look like he’d enjoyed himself?

Cheongpung cheerfully set Hyuk Mujin down, then acknowledged my presence.

“Oh, Benefactor! You’re still here?”

“I fell. Thanks to someone.”

I glared steadily at Cheongpung.

In fact, I had already had several chances to reach the summit. The problem was that Cheongpung was not exactly a man in possession of an ordinary state of mind.

“Hehe. It makes me happy to hear it was thanks to me.”

“Shut up! I would’ve reached the top ages ago if you hadn’t kept interfering from up there!”

“Gasp! Please calm down, Benefactor!”

“Calm down? You should’ve said that before rolling rocks at me!”

Think about it.

Climbing a cliff well over a hundred jang[895] high with your bare hands was hard enough. But every time I thought I'd made decent progress, rocks the size of children came tumbling down from above.

Cheongpung's innocent cries were an added bonus.

Benefactor, rocks are rolling!

Only someone who had experienced it could understand. Even if Shakyamuni[896] himself had been in my position, he would have strangled that bastard to death with his prayer beads.

Now that I think about it, I'm getting pissed off again.

Should I just charge him?

The moment I clenched my fist, Hyuk Mujin—who had been lying on the ground with only his fingers twitching—sprang upright with a scream.

"Aaaaaaaah!"

"Hey, hey. Breathe. Take a breath. You're on the ground."

"Huff, huff. Am I really alive?"

"Yeah, you idiot. You're still alive."

"W-water, please."

Cheongpung held out the bamboo tube hanging from his waist.

"Here."

"Thank…"

Hyuk Mujin absentmindedly accepted the bamboo tube, then froze stiff.

A moment later, he unleashed a lion's roar.

"You fucking bastard!"

Cheongpung recoiled in alarm as Hyuk Mujin went berserk, his eyes rolling back.

"W-why are you suddenly acting like this toward me?"

"You seriously don't know? Captain, catch that bastard!"

"I'm only doing exactly what my grandfather taught me."

"Get over here right now!"

"See you up there later, Benefactor!"

Cheongpung scampered away from Hyuk Mujin and kicked off the ground.

Boom!

He shot more than ten meters[897] into the air in a single bound, slapped onto the cliff, and began climbing with the Wall Lizard Technique.

Papapapapak!

---

[895] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred jang is about 303 m (994 ft).

[896] Shakyamuni is a name for the historical Buddha.

[897] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

Now that was a true veteran.

Cheongpung vanished as quickly as if he'd been born walking on all fours. Hyuk Mujin sank to the ground.

"That bastard threw rocks at me. Rocks…"

I answered solemnly.

"I know. I saw you fall earlier. One hit you in the eye."

"He's completely insane. He throws rocks as big as a child's head."

"That's smaller than what he threw at me. He even threw dirt at me."

"Captain. I've made up my mind."

"About what?"

"I won't give up until I catch that bastard and beat the shit out of him. I swear it on the name of Hyuk Mujin, a true man."

Hyuk Mujin's eyes blazed.

I'd never seen him so fired up. Whatever he might be like inside, he'd always seemed cheerful and laid-back on the surface.

Could this be what Cheongpung was aiming for?

Was all of this Cheongpung's way of drawing out Hyuk Mujin's anger so that he would give it his all?

No. That wild man from Huashan didn't have the brains for that.

Well, whatever works.

I tossed a bundle to the fuming Hyuk Mujin.

"Keep it secure inside your clothes."

"What is this?"

"Fasting pills. I packed them before we started training."

Nothing was better for staving off hunger and replenishing energy. They were also small, light, and easy to carry.

"Eat some if you start running out of strength on the way up."

"We're surrounded by sheer drops. Where am I supposed to eat fasting pills? I'm going up there right now and cutting that bastard down in one stroke…"

"You're the one who'll die in one stroke."

Apparently, he wanted to use his newly learned Wall Lizard Technique to climb straight up Mount Beimang.[898] I smacked him on the back of the head.

"Ow!"

"And the cliff isn't sheer all the way up. There are ledges here and there, so find somewhere to stop and eat. Don't get impatient and fall. Take your time, and focus on making it in one attempt."

[898] Mount Beimang is traditionally associated with burial grounds. Here, climbing it means going to one's death.

"Hoo."

"Then let's go."

"Yes, Captain!"

Hyuk Mujin and I were standing before the cliff with determined expressions when—

"Um…"

"T-Third Young Master."

Right. These two were here, too.

Jang Childeuk and the middle-aged guy spoke hesitantly.

"Would it be all right if we reported this to the Lesser Family Head?"

"Considering the circumstances… If you suffer even an injury, Young Master, then we…"

I raised a hand to stop them.

I could easily guess what they were going to say next. I knew the perspective of ordinary employees better than anyone.

"Go ahead and report it. But…"

"But?"

"After your shift ends. How much longer do you have?"

"About three shichen."[899]

"That's enough."

I'd already spent half a day climbing the cliff.

I intended to conquer the damned thing within the remaining three shichen.[900]

This tall, steep, nameless cliff bore the full marks of time. Some sections were uneven, while others were smooth.

In some places, thick roots or rocks jutted out, making them easy to grab. In others, I had to wedge a single finger into a tiny crack and hang on.

This would be much easier if I could at least use internal energy or a weapon.

With internal energy, even solid rock would crumble like tofu.

If I took weapons from my inventory, I could drive daggers into the cliff like steps and climb that way.

I was putting myself through all this instead of taking the easy route because it was training…

Well, that was part of it. But every time I tried to use an easier method, Cheongpung would uncannily sense it and drop rocks on me.

[899] A shichen is a traditional period of approximately two hours; three shichen is about six hours.

[900] A shichen is a traditional period of approximately two hours; three shichen is about six hours.

Rattle, rattle.

A sudden shower of rock dust from above was an ominous sign.

Hyuk Mujin and I hurriedly shielded our heads with our arms and shouted.

“We didn’t do anything! Seriously, we didn’t! Don’t roll any rocks!”

“Uuughhh!”

A pale face cautiously poked out from above.

“Really?”

We nodded frantically.

We weren’t even halfway. If we were hit by a stone shower and fell now, all the bold claims we’d made before climbing would become a dark stain on our past.

“Please believe us!”

“Young Hero Cheongpung! No, Great Hero Cheongpung!”

“My grandfather always said there must never be any shortcuts in training. Martial arts are earned through blood and sweat.”

After delivering an entire speech, Cheongpung added magnanimously,

“I’ll let it go just this once.”

“…”

“…”

What an absolute tyrant.

Hyuk Mujin and I swallowed our outrage and resumed climbing.

One tiny mistake would send us plummeting all the way back down.

As a result, our senses grew sharper, and we had to pay tremendous attention to every single finger and toe.

If it weren’t winter, I would’ve reached the top ages ago…

The higher we climbed, the more treacherous the slope became and the smoother the surface grew.

The cliff was already slippery enough. On top of that, the scattered snow flurries that came almost every day and the wind blowing in from the northern Gaoyuan had turned it into one enormous sheet of ice.

Dead end. I can’t see a way forward.

As I worried at my lip, something suddenly caught my eye.

A crack in the rock blocked by a snowball that had not yet frozen.

It was a tiny space, barely wide enough for one finger. It would be difficult, but I had no other choice.

“Hup!”

I launched myself forward with a shout, simultaneously jamming my smallest finger—the little finger—precisely into the crack.

Thud.

My prediction had been only half right. I could break through the unfrozen snowball, but the crack was much shallower than I had expected.

It was barely one finger joint deep. And I had to support a body weighing 0.1 tons[901] with my little finger.

“Ungh.”

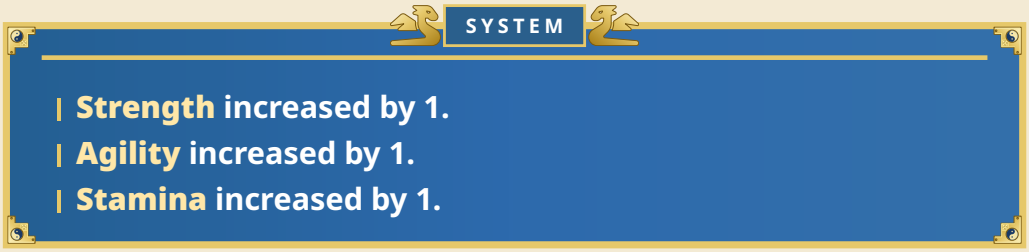
Even for me, this was asking a bit much.

To make matters worse, my finger was slowly slipping because of the moisture pooled inside the crack.

If I waste any more time, I’ll fall.

There was not much farther to go. I steadied my breathing and calmed the tension in my body. Using my little finger as a support, I lifted my entire body.

Physical ability truly worthy of the word superhuman.



Even my stats rose at just the right moment.

Just as I smiled triumphantly and reached toward the next crack—

Hup!

“Captain!”

Damn it. My breathing faltered at the worst possible moment. As I steadied it again, Hyuk Mujin kept shouting.

“Th-this! This!”

“What are you saying? I can’t hear you!”

The fierce snowstorm scattered sound and obscured my vision.

I was about to open my mouth again when a clear shout struck my ears.

“Above! Above!”

“Above?”

The fact that I could hear Hyuk Mujin’s voice meant the savage wind had paused. Only then did my obstructed vision clear and my ears open.

Following Hyuk Mujin’s gesture, I raised my head and finally saw it.

A massive boulder falling straight toward my face.

Whoooosh!

“Ah, shit.”

Boom!

[901] A tenth of a metric ton is 100 kg, about 220 lb.

"Wow. I can't believe you broke such a huge boulder with your bare fist."

I let Cheongpung's admiration go in one ear and out the other as I collapsed onto my back.

Only a moment ago, I had wanted nothing more than to beat that bastard senseless. Now I was completely drained.

I made it up. It's over!

Just as I lay there, unable to move even a hand and cheering inwardly, a bluish, frozen hand reached the summit.

"Huff. Haaah."

"You succeeded in only one day! You're both incredible!"

If it weren't for you, I would've made it in one shichen, you idiot.

I wanted to lay into him, but I was too exhausted to speak. As Hyuk Mujin and I panted with exhaustion and accomplishment, Cheongpung bowed deeply.

"Thank you both for your hard work! Now that you've succeeded once, you should be able to climb the remaining nine times much faster."

"..."

"..."

The words were so shocking that Hyuk Mujin and I forgot even to pant as we stared at him.

What is he talking about?

Could he possibly mean what I thought he meant?

No, surely not.

As an intellectual of modern society, I spoke with a calm demeanor.

"The remaining nine times? What kind of bullshit is that?"

"My grandfather..."

Was this bastard a wild man or a boy detective?

At that moment, Sword Saint or whatever be damned—I couldn't help seeing red.

"So you're telling us to do this nine more times?"

"Yes!"

"And you'll throw rocks at us from up here just the same?"

"Yes!"

"No."

"What?"

Hyuk Mujin and I dropped flat at the same time.

"I'm not doing it. I don't even have the strength to go back down. Go ahead and gut me."

“Gut me too, you vicious bastard!”

“Puhahaha.”

“…Are you laughing?”

Cheongpung smiled brightly.

“Sorry. You looked just like I did when I first started training, so I couldn’t help it.”

“See? You didn’t want to do it either!”

“No. I thought it was fun and wanted to keep going, but my body wouldn’t keep up.”

Hyuk Mujin muttered quietly enough that only I could hear.

“…Is he insane?”

“So I told my grandfather. I asked whether I could continue the next day because my legs wouldn’t listen to me.”

As he reminisced about his happy past, Cheongpung suddenly drew his sword.

At the same time, purple Sword Energy shot forth.

Shhk.

Ice, dirt, rock—Cheongpung cut through all of it without distinction, then continued speaking.

“My grandfather said climbing up was hard, but going down was easy. He said if I endured it for just a moment, I’d be back down in no time.”

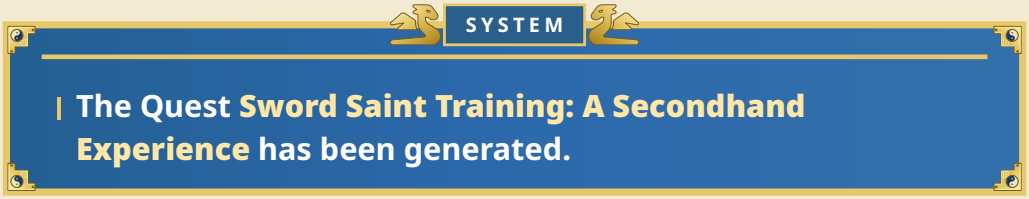
Rumble, rumble, rumble.

The edge of the cliff ledge where Hyuk Mujin and I were lying—barely ten square meters[902] in size—began to shake.

Is this for real?

As we lay there in a daze, Cheongpung waved at us.

“Nine more to go.”



[902] Ten square meters is about 108 ft².

Chapter 154

The middle-aged martial artist and Jang Childeuk were staring at the sky again today—or rather, at the cliff.

“Say, Brother Jang. Have you ever trained in the Wall Lizard Technique?”

“The Wall Lizard Technique? Good heavens, a coward like me would never dare. What about you, hyung[903]?”

“Once, about five years ago.”

“Why did you stop?”

“I’d been training for about three months when I lost my footing, fell, and broke my ankle.”

“Oof. You must have fallen from pretty high up.”

“Barely five jang[904] or so. I trained for three months without missing a single day, only to break my ankle.”

“That’s a shame.”

“A shame?”

“Who knows? If you’d kept at it, you might have become a master of the Wall Lizard Technique…”

“A master of the Wall Lizard Technique? Me? I’ve practiced sword techniques my entire life and still haven’t made it past Second Rate.”

The middle-aged martial artist let out a quiet laugh and pointed at the cliff.

“Whatever the martial art, you need talent to be called a master. Don’t you feel anything when you look at those two?”

“That’s certainly true.”

The two men watched the figures rapidly climbing the cliff.

There was no mistaking them. Jin Taekyung and Hyuk Mujin were dedicating themselves to Wall Lizard Technique training again today.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Stones and snowballs came tumbling down from far above.

At that very moment, both men were thinking the same thing.

Are those people or lizards?

Their hands and feet moved without hesitation as they scaled the nearly vertical cliff.

There was a considerable difference in their speed, but given how little time they had spent training, their progress was truly remarkable.

“How many days has it been?”

---

[903] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older man with whom he is familiar.

[904] Five jang is about 15.2 m, or 49.7 ft. A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to about 3.03 m.

"Let's see. This is our third shift, so… exactly three days."

"Only three days. If I'd trained for a year instead of three months, could I have learned the Wall Lizard Technique that well?"

"…"

Both the middle-aged martial artist and Jang Childeuk knew the answer.

After a brief silence, Childeuk spoke.

"Hyung[905]."

"Hmm?"

"What can people without martial talent do?"

"We're useless. Get out the jerky."

"Yes, sir."

Jang Childeuk promptly pulled some jerky and a bottle of liquor from his robes. He was quickly adapting to duty at the training hall, reputedly the cushiest assignment in the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Whoooosh!

I flattened myself against the cliff and dodged the boulder plummeting past at terrifying speed. Far above, Cheongpung smacked his lips in disappointment.

I knew you'd pull this, you bastard.

It wasn't like this was the first or second time he'd done it.

I might have been bad at studying as a kid, but when it came to learning with my body, I had been second to none.

"Haaaargh!"

Hyuk Mujin, on the other hand, was a little slower. Then again, there was a clear difference between his level and mine now, so perhaps that was only natural.

I shouted down at Hyuk Mujin, who was crawling up from far below.

"Mujin, you okay?"

"…Oh. Right."

What a brutally quick answer.

Of course he wasn't okay, but most people would at least pretend they were. Hyuk Mujin didn't bother.

"Quit whining and get up here!"

"My whole body is cramping! I barely dodged that last one!"

For all his complaining, he was keeping up fairly well. This training had confirmed it once again: Hyuk Mujin had a fair amount of grit and martial talent.

“We’re almost there. Grit your teeth and climb!”

I wedged myself into a hollow in the cliff and took a moment to catch my breath.

Open the Quest window.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest

Sword Saint Training: A Secondhand Experience

A master is forged through countless rounds of tempering and hammering.

Cheongpung, who received harsh training from the Sword Saint, will revive his childhood memories and put you through training!

Grade: Peak

Restriction: Those who have Cheongpung’s permission

Mission: Climb the cliff 10 times (9/10)

Reward: Acquire Wall Lizard Technique

Cheongpung is extremely pleased.

???

Failure: Injury or death

Cheongpung is extremely saddened.

Today marked exactly three days since we started climbing this damned cliff.

We had only one climb left before completing the Quest, but I still couldn’t let my guard down.

Because…

“Benefactor! Where are you? Poke your head out!”

“No! Get lost!”

“Oh, there you are! I ran out of things to throw nearby, so it took me a while to find more!”

Because of this psychopath who wanted to drop a boulder straight onto my face at any moment.

The first climb had been hard enough, but Cheongpung’s interference had grown more intense with every round.

I curled up as tightly as I could and shouted.

“Why would you go looking for more? If you run out of rocks, just stop throwing them!”

“But… if I don’t do this, you won’t be able to learn the Wall Lizard Technique properly, Benefactor!”

“…”

Was this guy insane?

How many people in the world learned the Wall Lizard Technique by getting pelted with boulders?

Just as I was rendered speechless by the sheer absurdity of it, a battered hand shot up into the hollow where I was hiding.

It wasn't the hand of some ghost who had died here long ago while training in the Wall Lizard Technique.

Naturally, it was Hyuk Mujin.

"Haaaargh. I'm dying."

When you were truly exhausted, you couldn't even speak. You got so out of breath that your head rang, and merely breathing made your chest ache.

Even so, Mujin still looked like he had plenty of life left in him. He crawled in beside me and spread his legs wide.

"Hey, it's cramped in here."

"You think you're the only one cramped, Captain? So am I."

"Pull your legs in or move over. This is basically a one-person seat."

"Ah, I'm exhausted. You move over, Captain. Aren't you being too harsh on your right-hand man after he worked so hard to get up here?"

"I treat my right arm well. But you're my little toe, so I can be a little harsh."

"Wow, you're really going to be like this? This is the only place we can hide from the rocks. Would you feel better if I jumped out and took one straight to the face?"

I answered with a perfectly serious expression.

"Why would you say that? Of course not."

"Oh, wow. What's gotten into you all of a sudden, Captain…"

"I'd feel stifled and guilty for a while. But after a year or so, I'd be fine. After ten years or so, I'd have forgotten your face."

"…That's awfully realistic."

"That's life, punk. Now pull your legs in before you give me something to feel guilty about."

"Yes, sir."

I didn't care if a manspreader got his skull cracked by a rock. That was what he got for manspreading.

Hyuk Mujin pulled his legs tightly together, caught his breath, and sighed.

"No matter how I think about it, this is insane."

"What is?"

"Cheongpung is insane for making us do this, and I'm insane for doing it just because he told me to."

"You're doing pretty well for someone who thinks it's insane."

"I'm just going at it like it's do or die."

“That’s the answer.”

“What?”

“Going at it like it’s do or die. That’s the answer. Later, when death really is staring you in the face, you’ll regret this moment.”

I tied back my disheveled hair and continued.

“Ah, I should’ve worked harder back then. You know, that kind of regret.”

I prided myself on having worked hard enough as a Hunter to practically shit blood. But even after all that, I was still left with regrets.

Regret always came too late. It only sank bone-deep after you had lost something precious.

“Your life, your wealth, or someone you care about. If you don’t want to lose something precious, put your life on the line now. Working yourself to death while you’re alive is still better than actually dying, isn’t it?”

“Uh…”

Hyuk Mujin stared at me with round eyes.

“You sound like you’re speaking from experience.”

“Why? Is that strange?”

“Words feel different depending on who says them. The Captain I know is, um…”

“Not exactly someone who should be saying that, having grown up as a young master who never wanted for anything?”

“If I had to put it that way, then yes. You look like someone who’s never lost anything precious in his life, but you talk like a battle-hardened veteran who’s been through every possible hardship.”

This guy had pretty good instincts.

Or maybe that was how I looked to everyone else, too.

I simply let out a quiet laugh without answering. Hyuk Mujin eyed me suspiciously.

“What’s with that laugh?”

“I was just thinking you’re pretty perceptive.”

“Captain, you’re not a fake, are you?”

“What?”

“It’s a little late to bring this up, but… you’ve changed too much. Your personality, your martial arts—everything. It’s like you’ve become a completely different person.”

“Haven’t you heard the rumors? I’m a secret weapon raised in secret by the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“Rumors are just rumors. Unverified rumors. Plenty of people saw you carousing and wasting your days, Captain.”

“You were one of them?”

“Yes. At first, I thought you might be wearing a human-skin mask, but that doesn’t seem to be it.”

“A human-skin mask? The kind where you peel the skin off someone’s face and wear it?”

“See? You ask again as if you’re hearing about it for the first time. You also say things that make no sense all the time.”

“Hmm.”

Come to think of it, at some point I had stopped worrying so much about avoiding suspicion. Everyone around me thought I was Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. I had also long since accepted my Murim self as part of who I was.

“If you’re some kind of double put forward by a shadowy organization like the ones in novels, tell me now. I’ll quietly let it slide.”

“What an absurd thing to say. Then you should report me immediately.”

“Well, I like you much better now than before. And I owe you my life. Hehe.”

His lips were smiling, but he wasn’t joking. The subtle bob of his throat and the slight tremor in his eyes proved it.

I thought for a moment, then spoke.

“Want me to tell you honestly?”

“H-honestly?”

“I’ve been itching to tell someone anyway, so this works out. The location is perfect, too.”

Hyuk Mujin glanced around anxiously.

The hollow in the cliff was just large enough for two people to plant their backsides. As luck would have it, the lunatic who would drop a rock on us the moment we stuck our faces outside was waiting nearby, too.

It was the perfect spot for two people to sit together until one of them died, with no one the wiser.

“You really are stupid, aren’t you?”

Hyuk Mujin swallowed hard.

“C-C-Captain. I don’t care who you are.”

“Too late.”

“Gasp! I won’t say anything! I meant what I said earlier!”

“Even if I belonged to the Demonic Cult?”

“The Demonic Cult!”

“I’m only going to say this once. Listen carefully.”

“I’ll pretend I didn’t hear it. No, I won’t listen!”

Hyuk Mujin’s face turned deathly pale as he tried to cover his ears, but my words came a moment faster.

“I’m actually from another world.”

"…?"

"People can talk to each other even when they're ten thousand li[906] apart, and monsters with horns or wings roam everywhere. If you put it in Murim terms, I suppose you'd call them Fiends."

"…What?"

"Anyway, somehow I ended up here from that kind of world. Then strange things started appearing before my eyes, and suddenly—Level Up! Bam! Points! Boom! Ding-ding-ding inside my head!"

"…"

"Anyway, I only entered the world of martial arts two or three months ago. I've wiped the floor with dozens of First Rate masters and taken down three Peak masters. So, any questions?"

Hyuk Mujin slowly lowered the hands that had been half-covering his ears.

His expression was a complicated mixture of irritation and relief.

"Whew. Let's just say I was wrong. Happy now?"

"Why? It's true. You don't believe me?"

"Not even a stray dog would believe that. If only my martial arts were stronger…"

Smack!

I smacked him on the back of the head, then stood up.

It was a true story, but it didn't sound true.

Of course, I had expected Hyuk Mujin to react this way. That was precisely why I had told him.

Someone coming from another world? Anyone would think it was ridiculous.

"Nevel-up? Poin-two? Good grief. I should've kept my mouth shut. I don't know what I expected from you, Captain."

"What did you expect? The Demonic Cult? The Blood Cult?"

"Oh, come on! Just stop!"

I grabbed Hyuk Mujin by the shoulder as he stood up. The next instant, a boulder as tall as a grown man shot past us with a murderous shriek of displaced air.

"Watch yourself. We still have a long way to go."

I patted him on the back and resumed climbing.

We were only halfway to the summit.

The moment Hyuk Mujin and I finally reached the summit, System notifications erupted like celebratory cannon fire.

Cheongpung beamed at us.

“Wow! You really did it!”

“…What’s that supposed to mean?”

“By any chance—”

This bastard. Don’t tell me…

At the sharp looks we gave him, Cheongpung shook his head.

“It’s nothing. It took me fifteen days, you see. I didn’t expect you to finish so quickly.”

“Fifteen days?”

Hyuk Mujin repeated the number, then stared at me in disbelief.

Who was Cheongpung? The Sword Saint’s successor and a Peak master who had defeated Jin Mukyung. Mujin must have found it hard to believe that we had achieved this faster than he had.

But…

“What are you so happy about, punk? We’re not the same age. Right?”

“I wasn’t even that young! I was already ten years old!”

“…Isn’t ten usually considered young?”

Cheongpung smiled brightly as he reminisced about those days.

“Back then, climbing up Falling Goose Peak and falling back down was part of my daily routine. It was so much fun.”

“Falling Goose Peak?”

“It’s a peak on Huashan. It’s easily more than five hundred jang[907] high. Oh, of course, I couldn’t make it all the way to the top until I was eighteen.”

“…”

[907] Five hundred jang is about 1,515 m, or 4,970 ft.

"…"

Wasn't ten too young even to watch a movie rated fifteen-plus?

At that age, he would've only been in third grade—barely old enough to count as a snot-nosed schoolkid.

When I was that age, I played on the jungle gym in the schoolyard…

That bastard Cheongpung had played on the peaks of Huashan.

As expected of the continent. Everything was on a different scale.

"Anyway, thank you both so, so much for your hard work. You achieved something amazing!"

Cheongpung clapped excitedly all by himself, then continued.

"So, about that…"

Sensing something ominous, Hyuk Mujin hurriedly cut in.

"No. Hold on. Wait just a second."

"I know lots of even more fun training exercises."

"Hey! I said wait a second!"

Hyuk Mujin lunged at him with a shout, but it was already too late. Cheongpung effortlessly subdued him with a grappling technique and called out energetically,

"Let's all give it our best!"

As I listened to Hyuk Mujin shout, a question suddenly occurred to me.

How many linked Quests are there?

One thing was certain.

There was no way Cheongpung would stop at a measly two.

He's going to work us into the ground.

Leaving Hyuk Mujin's squawking behind me, I looked up at the sky.

The vast sky was a brilliant blue. The air was cool, and several hawks drifted overhead with their enormous wings spread wide.

New Year's Day was ten days away.

Chapter 155

A silent room. Six or seven scholars were frantically immersed in their work.

With haggard faces, they processed the bamboo slips piled up like mountains one by one while reporting various matters to the master of the office.

“There’s been a dispute between the Yellow River Gang and the Sogong Sect. They’ve asked our family to mediate…”

“Tell them we’ll set aside time on New Year’s Day to discuss it. Inform the Inner Hall Master in advance.”

“What should we do about the matter concerning the Five Gates of Shanxi?”

“Ah, is this related to the third one?”

“Yes. The hall masters of the Five Gates of Shanxi are waiting to offer their apologies.”

“Send them back. If they were truly sorry, the heads themselves should have come in person instead of sending their hands and feet. Inform the Inner Hall Master of that, too.”

“Next, there’s a matter from the Southern Merchant Guild…”

Even as he received their reports, Jin Wikyung, the master of the office, never looked up from the bamboo slips.

But the next report made even him raise his head.

“Lesser Family Head, mounted-bandit groups from the northern plateau are showing suspicious movements near Datong.”

“Mounted bandits? Is this information from the Lower District Sect?”

“Yes. If left unchecked, they’ll launch a large-scale raid against the common people.”

“How large is their force?”

“Five mounted-bandit groups have formed an alliance. Around five hundred men are gradually gathering.”

“Mounted bandits, huh? They’ve been a constant nuisance.”

Jin Wikyung rubbed between his brows, his face weary.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan was undeniably powerful, but it still lacked the strength to cover all of Shanxi Province.

That was also why the mounted bandits kept watching for an opportunity despite knowing that the Red Wind Band had been annihilated.

“Should we draft some martial artists?”

At the scholar’s question, Jin Wikyung immediately shook his head.

“No.”

“We’ve had more martial artists join our family recently than we can count. We have men to spare.”

“We’ve already shed too much blood for that. Besides, those we accepted this time still lack experience. Even if we recruit several hundred, several hundred will die.”

The Mount Heng Sword Sect.

One of the legs supporting the tripod of Shanxi Province had broken, and the water inside was beginning to spill over.

They had to devise a countermeasure before the boiling water scalded them.

After a moment’s thought, Jin Wikyung spoke.

“For the time being, focus on establishing and stabilizing branches in each prefecture and county. That is our top priority.”

“Lesser Family Head!”

The scholar cried out in surprise. The others, who had been focused on their own tasks, also raised their heads.

Hundreds of mounted bandits were supposedly invading, and yet establishing branches was the top priority. Did that mean they did not care whether the common people died?

As disappointment spread across the scholars’ faces, Jin Wikyung continued.

“Instead, ask the Five Gates of Shanxi for support. Two hundred men should be about right… What do you think?”

“That won’t be nearly enough.”

There was no one in this office, at least, who could speak so bluntly to the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Jin Wikyung grinned at Wipeng as he came through the door.

“Is that so? I thought it would be enough.”

“What sort of people are the Five Gates of Shanxi now? They’re obsessed with clawing at one another for scraps. They’ll hide their carefully trained elites inside their walls and send us a force packed with clueless Second Rate and Third Rate martial artists.”

“That sounds plausible.”

“It’s not just plausible. That’s what will happen nine times out of ten. The mounted bandits will see all those peach-fuzzed little punks and be so delighted their mouths will split open.”

“Haha. So we have to step in?”

“What choice do we have? If you attach some useful men to the force, I’ll go there myself. Then the Five Gates of Shanxi won’t be able to pull any sneaky tricks.”

“Exactly. Isn’t the Ghost Sword more frightening than a ghost?”

At Jin Wikyung’s teasing tone, Wipeng shook his head from side to side.

“That’s enough. Tell me.”

“Tell you what?”

“You already have a plan, don’t you?”

“What plan? Your idea sounded good to me.”

“Good grief. Since when have you listened so closely to anything I say?”

“Every word from your mouth is a golden rule to me.”

Wipeng let out a deep sigh and turned toward the scholar standing blankly nearby.

“What do you think?”

“P-pardon?”

A thin frame and a pale, washed-out face. He was the very picture of a pale-faced scholar who did nothing but pore over books in his room.

At Wipeng’s sudden question, he stammered out an answer.

“I-I don’t think it will be enough.”

“Is that all?”

“We should draft more men…”

Watching him, Jin Wikyung cut in with a laugh.

“That’s enough. And you.”

Already cowed by Wipeng’s sharp aura, the scholar flinched.

“Yes.”

“Send word to the Five Gates of Shanxi and the Shanxi Provincial Office. Tell them mounted bandits are swarming near Datong and that we request their assistance.”

“The Shanxi Provincial Office?”

“The people are in danger. The government ought to roll up its sleeves and help. Ah, casually give the Five Gates of Shanxi a hint about it, too.”

“Judging by the government’s passive attitude over the past several years, the chances of that succeeding are slim.”

“Then make it succeed.”

Jin Wikyung’s face lost its smile as he added one more thing.

“Isn’t that your job?”

“Ah.”

The scholar’s mind snapped awake. He was exhausted from staying up several nights, but he had been thinking far too simply.

Request help from Shanxi Province? The countermeasure proposed by Wipeng, a man who was a martial artist down to his bones, was much more plausible.

“I apologize.”

“You’re still inexperienced, so I understand. But what our family needs isn’t scholars. We need wise men who can offer the best possible measures for the sake of our family. I hope you’ll remember that.”

There was nothing the scholar could say. Seeing that not only the man before him but everyone else had reddened faces, Jin Wikyung spoke again.

“You’re all tired, so go in and rest for today.”

No one would refuse an order to rest, least of all men who had spent the last three days surviving on brief naps with bamboo slips for pillows.

Once the scholars dragged their exhausted bodies out, Wipeng pulled over an empty chair.

“Are those the new recruits?”

“Being on my own was too much. Still, they’re better than nothing.”

“I’m not sure. They all seem rather bland.”

“How many of them studied in order to join our family? It’s only natural.”

Jin Wikyung stretched his arms high. The loud cracking of bones echoed through the room.

“It’s only been a few days. We need to separate the jade from the stones and send away those who need to go.”

“Is that also why you didn’t tell them about the secret agreement with the Shanxi Provincial Office?”

“Why is a secret agreement called a secret agreement? The fewer people who know about it, the better.”

In truth, securing the assistance of the Shanxi Provincial Office was not particularly difficult. Hadn’t he and Deputy Military Commissioner Hong Jin already exchanged plenty through their conversation five days earlier?

“Our family hasn’t fully established itself yet. It would be troublesome if rumors spread that we had entered into a secret agreement with the government under these circumstances.”

“True. Especially when the rumors happen to be facts.”

The conversation Jin Wikyung had exchanged with Hong Jin had included several topics that the small and medium-sized sects of Shanxi Province—and especially the Five Gates of Shanxi—would not welcome.

If the Seongun Escort Bureau heard what Jin Wikyung and Hong Jin had discussed, they might collapse frothing at the mouth.

“So, are the other preparations going well?”

“Yes. I’ve completed the personnel changes as you ordered. The heads of the Inner and Outer Halls have been left in place, and we’ve established three new squads…”

The report flowing from Wipeng’s mouth concerned the first matter Jin Wikyung had handled immediately after the war ended.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan was like a rising sun. To the hot-blooded young people of Shanxi Province, it was the finest choice available.

To embrace the endless stream of people coming to them, the family had to widen its arms even further.

"…That's how I handled it, but with our numbers expected to keep growing, we'll likely need to reorganize again later."

"That's what we should hope for."

Jin Wikyung tried to appear calm as he listened to Wipeng's report.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan had declined slowly but steadily since the Great Faction War. Now, however, it was rapidly regaining its former glory.

No. Perhaps it will become even stronger than it was before the Great Faction War.

If that happened…

Only then would they truly earn the right to be called a great family.

They would break free of their status as a frontier martial family and stand shoulder to shoulder with the towering powers of the realm.

A great family. A great family, huh.

It was a word that made his heart race just to think about it.

Just as every martial artist dreamed of becoming the Martial God, Jin Wikyung had long dreamed of raising his family onto the foundation of a great family.

New Year's Day is almost here.

On that day, before all the sects of Shanxi Murim, the Jin Family of Taiyuan would be recognized as the undisputed hegemon of Shanxi Province.

Jin Wikyung had no doubt that the first day of the coming year would become the Jin Family of Taiyuan's first stepping-stone—and the harbinger of its rise—as a great family.

And it was at the very moment he secretly clenched his fist that—

"Um… May I come in?"

"Hm? Of course."

The voice belonged to the scholar who had just left.

"What is it? Did you leave something behind?"

"It's not that…"

Under Jin Wikyung and Wipeng's puzzled gazes, the scholar continued cautiously.

"There's some news I failed to report."

"You're too conscientious for your own good. You've been working hard for days without even getting proper sleep. Don't worry about it. Go in and get some rest."

"No. I should have told you earlier, but it slipped my mind…"

"Now, now. It's fine. I told you to rest."

Wipeng chimed in.

"My lord is right. You aren't a jiangshi.[908] You need to get enough rest so you can have the strength to work again tomorrow…"

"Huashan has sent the Three Plum Blossom Elites."

[908] A jiangshi is a reanimated corpse in Chinese folklore.

Jin Wikyung and Wipeng shot to their feet at the same time.

“What!”

“What did you say?”

Who were the Three Plum Blossom Elites?

They were the most exceptional talents among the Plum Blossom Swordsmen, Huashan’s finest.

In particular, Huashan’s Lone Crane, Baek Museong, was a major figure expected to become the next Sect Leader and carry Huashan’s future upon his shoulders.

After hearing such news, how could the two men’s eyes not nearly pop from their sockets?

“Is that really true?”

“Yes. I meant to tell you at the end, but I forgot. And there’s one more thing.”

“One more?”

“Another? Tell us quickly!”

The visit of the Three Plum Blossom Elites was shocking enough, and now he was saying there was something else.

Frowning, the scholar continued.

“They say the Grandmaster has disappeared. He seems to have gone to our family, so they asked us to send word if we happen to meet him… But who is the Grandmaster?”

The scholar was still unfamiliar with the realities of Murim and wondered what this was all about. Jin Wikyung and Wipeng, however, stood with their mouths hanging open.

“If Huashan’s Grandmaster is…”

“Th-th-that…”

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

Unable to bring themselves to say the name aloud, the two men merely mouthed the words and swallowed hard.

Huashan still wanted to keep the Sword Saint’s whereabouts secret. At times like this, it was best to keep one’s mouth shut.

“Th-that… What did you say?”

“Th-that thing. You know, that sort of thing.”

“Pardon?”

“You can leave now. Erase everything that just happened from your mind. Understood?”

The scholar bowed with a bewildered expression and left. Only then did the words they had been holding back burst out.

“The Sword Saint is coming!”

“Shh! Lower your voice. We don’t even know for certain yet.”

Despite his words, Wipeng's face had also flushed bright red. To a swordsman like him, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was greater than even the Jade Emperor.[909]

To think they might be able to meet such a person in the flesh! No, perhaps he might even receive instruction from him.

"B-but why would the Sword Saint come to our family?"

"What else could it be?"

"Ah."

He had been so excited that he had momentarily forgotten who was currently staying at the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

"That Sword Saint broke his seclusion to look for his beloved disciple."

"It's only a guess for now, but that's highly likely. I hear he raised him like his own grandson. How deep must his affection be?"

Jin Wikyung grinned broadly.

Whatever the reason, the Sword Saint's visit was something to welcome with open arms—not only as a martial artist, but also as the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

"You said his name was Cheongpung, right? Where is he now? I seem to remember hearing a while ago that he was training my youngest brother in the Wall Lizard Technique.[910]"

"The Wall Lizard Technique[911] training ended two days ago, and now he's…"

"And now?"

"He's beating the crap out of the Third Young Master."

"Whaaat!"

[909]The Jade Emperor is a ruler of the heavens in Daoist tradition.
[910]The Wall Lizard Technique is a martial art used to climb walls and cliffs.

Chapter 156

Thud!

Timing, speed, strength. And finally, even the point of impact.

That blow had landed perfectly. There was just one unfortunate fact: that perfect blow had buried itself in my solar plexus.

“Guh!”

In an instant, excruciating pain robbed me of my breath. Through my blurred vision, I saw Cheongpung raising his fist.

“W-wait!”

“Why?”

“You hit me in the solar plexus. My solar plexus.”

“Grandfather said that once a fight begins, you have to beat your opponent to a pulp.”

“This is a spar!”

“Grandfather also said you have to treat spars like real battles if you want to survive in the harsh martial world.”

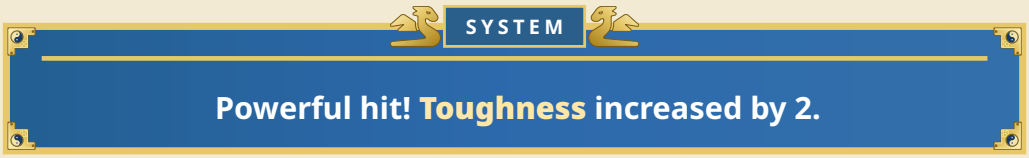
I had nothing to say to that. This wasn’t some old man who ran the neighborhood supermarket. The Sword Saint had taught him that. What could I possibly say? Besides, treating every fight like a real battle wasn’t exactly bad advice.

Once I gave up on everything, I felt at peace.

“…Fine, fuck it. Hit me.”

“Yes!”

Smack!



My vision flashed white, and my legs gave out. My body slowly toppled backward against my will.

Can’t crack the back of my head.

Fortunately, what I feared didn’t happen. Hyuk Mujin had already passed out and fallen over, and his butt cushioned the back of my head.

It’s filthy. Filthy, but soft. Filthy, but firm.

This bastard had an apple-shaped ass, minimum.

It was enough to make me wonder whether he’d been doing Pilates or yoga between shifts at the Gate Guard Pavilion.

Using Hyuk Mujin's butt as a pillow, I looked up at the sky. Maybe it was because I was seeing it after getting beaten senseless, but the sky looked yellow.

Quest
Sword Saint Training: A Secondhand Experience—2
Cheongpung, exhilarated by your outstanding results, has presented a second training challenge.
Knock him down at least once before New Year's Day!
Grade: Peak
Restriction: Those who have completed the prerequisite Quest
Mission: Win the duel against Cheongpung (Incomplete)
Reward: ???
Cheongpung is very pleased.
Failure: ???
Cheongpung is very saddened.

The thought that I would win at least once had vanished the moment the spar began.

My duel with Cheongpung was even more one-sided than my duel with Jin Mukyung, and that much more brutal.

How does he know so many martial arts?

I had seen more than a dozen different martial arts over the past two days alone.

Just when I thought I might be getting used to the Taeeul Miri Palm, he would bring out the Falling Flower Chasing Shadow Palm. Just as that technique began to look familiar, the Crouching Tiger Fist would come flying out.

On top of that, countless supreme techniques that had helped turn Huashan into one of the Nine Sects and One Gang[912] had seeped into every part of Cheongpung's body.

His martial arts are rooted in Huashan. His teacher was the Sword Saint.

Didn't this guy need a balance patch?

"Heh heh. Hehehehe."

As I let out nothing but hollow laughter, Cheongpung approached and asked,

"Benefactor, are you all right?"

"If you're going to ask that, you could at least go easy on me."

[912] A conventional grouping of major orthodox martial factions in martial-arts fiction.

“But then it wouldn’t be training. Doing something half-heartedly is worse than not doing it at all…”

“Your grandfather said that, didn’t he?”

“Gasp! How did you know? Have you ever lived on Lotus Peak?”

“…No.”

I was born and raised in Gyeonggi Province, you punk.

I heaved a sigh and pulled myself upright. Hyuk Mujin, who had been unconscious for quite some time, still hadn’t moved an inch.

“What did you do to him? Isn’t he going to die at this rate?”

“I did try to control my strength, but I guess I was a little inexperienced.”

“Control your strength?”

“Yes. I’ve only ever had one sparring partner in my entire life.”

Cheongpung had spent his life sparring daily with the Sword Saint, a Supreme Peak master, as casually as if they were sharing meals. Naturally, he would only have learned how to go all out.

He continued with sad eyes.

“Now that I’m out in the world, it’s much harder than I expected. I was so clumsy that I injured the Senior from the Zhongnan Sect, and now even Warrior Hyuk…”

It seemed this mountain hermit was having a rough time adjusting to Murim.

I scratched the back of my head.

“Don’t worry about that. The Zhongnan guy was someone who deserved to get hit, and Mujin won’t take it to heart. It’s training, after all.”

“Really?”

“Yes. You’re getting better and better, so don’t worry too much.”

Cheongpung smiled brightly, as though none of that had ever happened.

“Benefactor, did you know?”

“How would I know?”

“Of all the people I’ve met in Murim, I like you best, Benefactor!”

I drew up my internal energy.

“Back off right now. If you lay so much as a fingertip on me, I’ll bite my tongue and die.”

“Because even if I hit you with all my strength, you always get back up!”

“Oh.”

“And you’re the most satisfying to hit!”

Listen to the way he said that.

Relief and irritation surged through me at the same time. I had wondered why he seemed to be beating me so enthusiastically. Without realizing it, I had become a sandbag for testing punching power.

No wonder my Toughness kept shooting up.

Toughness was the last stat I'd acquired, and I'd barely invested anything in it. Even so, it had already caught up with the combat stats I'd poured points into.

Should I be grateful for this?

It had only been a few days of short-term training, but I was certainly seeing substantial results.

Scaling the cliff had earned me the Wall Lizard Technique and a considerable boost to my stats. Now I was experiencing Huashan's martial arts firsthand while raising my Toughness like crazy.

"Please continue to take good care of me. I'm learning a lot by hitting you, Benefactor."

"…Ah. Yes."

I wanted to smack Cheongpung on the back of the head as he bowed politely, but I held myself back. I knew there was no real malice behind anything he said.

Part of me was relieved, too.

If he were any stronger than this, I'd be completely screwed.

Cheongpung was a mountain I absolutely had to climb.

If he'd been holding back even while facing me, I would've found that more insulting than anything else.

Consideration from someone you wanted to defeat never felt like consideration.

I spoke in a solemn voice.

"Let me ask you one thing."

"Anything, Benefactor."

"When you fight me, give it everything you've got."

"Everything I've got?"

"Yes. Your best. That's all I need."

Cheongpung stared at me for a moment, then nodded.

"Understood."

"Thank you—"

Ssssss.

Before I could finish speaking, the heat of the Zaha Divine Technique blazed up from Cheongpung's entire body like a wildfire, burning through the cold winter air.

His eyes, already tinged with a faint violet hue, fixed on me.

"I'll really give it my best, Benefactor."

"…Oh. So this is your best?"

Damn it. I'd forgotten about that.

At my vacant stare, Cheongpung smacked his forehead.

"Oh, right. I'm sorry. I can be a little slow on the uptake."

"It's all right. As long as you understood me eventually, that's—"

Shing.

This time, Sword Energy rose in a long, surging blade from the sword in Cheongpung's hand.

"Now I'm ready to give it my best."

"Ah…"

"Benefactor, I'll really work hard! Even if I fight you with all my strength, you're bound to get back up anyway!"

I wasn't so sure. I had a feeling I wouldn't be getting back up this time.

I silently stared at the undulating energy of the Zaha Divine Technique and the blazing Sword Energy before finally managing to speak.

"L-let's put away the Sword Energy."

Let me live too, you bastard.

Whoosh!

The spearhead tore through the air. A fast, razor-sharp strike. Cheongpung rolled his shoulder aside, and the second and third attacks followed like a storm.

"Hah!"

With a shout, spearheads rained down. The martial art itself was simple and heavy.

But the movements of the man wielding the spear were light and fast. Hidden between his efficient movements were unpredictable attacks.

Swish! Swish-swish-swish!

A smile tugged at Cheongpung's lips as he narrowly evaded the spearhead.

Wow, this is fun. Was Benefactor always this good?

He beamed as he watched the young man pressing him relentlessly.

Jin Taekyung. They hadn't known each other long, but he was the Benefactor who had helped Cheongpung in many ways.

When Jin Taekyung had given him every last candied hawthorn skewer[913] at their first meeting, Cheongpung had nearly cried.

He's a good person. He gave me something so precious.

Grandfather had been wrong. He had said Murim was crawling with frightening people who were vicious and utterly ruthless, but everyone Cheongpung had met was gentle and kind-hearted.

[913] Traditional fruit skewers coated in hardened sugar.

He didn't even dislike the Senior from the Zhongnan Sect whom he'd injured through his own mistake not long ago.

He's my Senior, so he can't be a bad person.

As far as Cheongpung knew, the bond between Seniors and Juniors was no ordinary relationship. It was a close tie forged by something thicker than blood.

And Grandfather had always told him to protect the weak.

The Senior from the Zhongnan Sect had been weak in martial arts. Cheongpung had felt terrible for hurting him.

But…

It was nice that there was no reason to feel bad about Jin Mukyung and Jin Taekyung.

They were the strongest people Cheongpung had met since leaving Huashan. Even now, as he exchanged blows with Jin Taekyung, he was enjoying himself immensely.

Whoosh!

Cheongpung easily dodged the spear thrusting toward his shoulder, then burst out laughing despite himself.

"Hehe."

"You laughing?"

"Because I'm happy."

"You really need to watch what you say. That's a dangerous thing to say."

Swish-swish-swish!

Six killing attacks and twice as many feints came raining down from every direction. But Cheongpung was no longer where he had been.

Jin Taekyung pierced the faint afterimage and shouted with the expression of someone who had seen a ghost.

"What the hell was that?"

"Dark Fragrance Drift. Hehe."

"That's cheating!"

"Would you like me to teach you?"

"Great Hero Cheongpung, as for me, I've been barely scraping by in this harsh world with the paltry Jin Family's Manoeuvre Technique…"

"Oh, right. Grandfather told me not to teach it to anyone."

"This little bastard?"

Whoosh!

Jin Taekyung changed direction and thrust low.

Just before the fiercely spinning spearhead pierced his instep, Cheongpung raised his foot with dazzling speed and pressed the spearhead down toward the ground instead.

Scrape!

"Wow, that was a little dangerous."

But Jin Taekyung wasn't listening to him. With a short shout, he lifted the spear shaft beneath Cheongpung's foot.

"Hah!"

"Benefactor, it's no use. This is the Thousand-Catty Drop[914]—"

Whoosh!

The next moment, Cheongpung felt himself floating.

Jin Taekyung's tremendous strength whipped the spear shaft skyward, flinging Cheongpung's feet clear and leaving them treading empty air.

He lost his balance for an instant and hurriedly drew up his internal energy.

Boom! Boom! Swish-swish!

The force of the Falling Flower Chasing Shadow Palm struck the air and shoved his body backward. A split second later, Jin Taekyung's spear stabbed and slashed through the space where Cheongpung had been.

Wow.

Jin Taekyung's strength was beyond Cheongpung's imagination, even if it was still inferior to his grandfather's.

No. It wasn't just his strength.

He had incredible stamina, enough to fall countless times and keep getting back up. Agility that shouldn't have been possible for someone with his build. And tremendous Toughness.

Even the way he uses martial arts is different from everyone else.

Cheongpung was a Peak master. He had been raised by the Sword Saint and had grown up watching the Sword Saint's martial arts.

He could gauge an opponent's level from a single move and half a form of the martial arts they displayed.

Jin Mukyung was sharp.

Jin Mukyung, whom he'd dueled a few days earlier, possessed an aura that seemed sharp enough to cut anyone who touched it. His martial arts were the same.

But despite sharing the same blood, Jin Taekyung's disposition and martial arts were the exact opposite of his brother's.

What should I call this?

Though his martial arts were rough, still unrefined, and otherwise unremarkable, his movements created a strange tension. His aura seeped out naturally…

"Whew. You coming? If not, I'm coming to you."

[914] A catty, or Chinese jin, is 500 g (1.10 lb). The technique's name evokes immense downward weight.

At the sight of the man striding toward him, Cheongpung finally thought of a word.

Wildness.

A beast hell-bent on biting through its prey’s throat.

Jin Taekyung’s claws had not yet been honed, and that was precisely why they seemed even larger.

Chapter 157

Since ancient times, it had been said that the masters of famous mountains were spirit creatures. Huashan, one of the Five Sacred Mountains of the Central Plains, was no exception.

Before humans ever set foot there, tigers had ruled its lofty, sprawling forests.

These spirit creatures possessed the majesty of kings and the ferocity of beasts. When their territory was invaded, they grew furious and soon began attacking the uninvited trespassers.

“Wow! And then?”

“When the loss of human life became severe, the Huashan Sect had no choice but to step in. That was how the Crouching Tiger Fist was born.”

A fist technique that subdues tigers. The Crouching Tiger Fist.

Cheongpung clearly remembered what his grandfather had told him when he learned the Crouching Tiger Fist long ago.

“Pung, the Crouching Tiger Fist is a powerful martial art capable of subduing the king of the mountains. Master this one technique, and no one your age will be able to stand against you. Do you understand?”

“Yes!”

As a child, Cheongpung had believed his grandfather’s words without question.

But now, ten years later—

Whack!

“Ow, that hurt.”

“…Huh?”

For the first time, he realized that even his grandfather could be wrong.

It was the third day since I’d begun sparring with Cheongpung. During our forty-fifth duel, I witnessed him stumble over his words for the first time.

“B-Benefactor, are you all right?”

“I know. That was the Crouching Tiger Fist, right?”

I’d seen it with my own eyes and even experienced it firsthand by getting hit.

It was yesterday that a Crouching Tiger Fist to the solar plexus had laid me out flat.

I’d committed the way Cheongpung moved when he used the Crouching Tiger Fist to memory—the footwork, the position of his shoulders, even the sequence of forms that followed.

And yet I had still allowed myself to be hit.

There was no doubt about it. Cheongpung was one step ahead of me.

“What was the name of that form just now?”

Cheongpung answered with a dazed expression.

“One Fist Subdues the Tiger.”

A single fist that brought down a tiger? It certainly packed enough destructive power to justify the name. If my ability to take a hit hadn’t improved with every duel, I would have dropped to my knees just like yesterday.

Should I take comfort in doing much better than yesterday?

And it wasn’t only my ability to take a hit that had improved. After experiencing Cheongpung’s martial arts firsthand, I was gradually getting used to them.

“All right, let’s go again.”

But Cheongpung didn’t seem interested in continuing.

“How did you dodge it?”

“Huh?”

“I was aiming precisely around your Fengwei acupoint…”

The Fengwei acupoint was around the ribs. I’d twisted aside to dodge, only to take the blow square in the middle of my abdomen.

Since I’d avoided his intended target, maybe that technically counted as dodging? I shrugged.

“I just struggled to avoid getting hit even once. I got hit in the end, though.”

“Could you see the sequence of forms?”

After being beaten up for several days, I could make out the forms vaguely. Where and how an attack would come from. How the next form would follow.

The problem is that I’m still clumsy.

I rubbed my aching abdomen as I answered.

“After taking this many hits, I should be able to read at least that much. Every time you hit me, I made sure to keep my eyes wide open and watch.”

Wasn’t keeping your eyes open even while getting hit and figuring out your opponent’s sequence of forms the most basic thing?

“Huh. That’s strange. I’ve only used the Crouching Tiger Fist a few times.”

“That’s why it took me a little longer to figure out than the others.”

“The others?”

“Yeah. The Plum Blossom Fist was pretty easy. Maybe it’s because you used it the most during our duels, but I more or less figured it out.”

Cheongpung clapped in admiration.

“Wow! Can you show me?”

I performed a poor imitation of the Plum Blossom Fist. My footwork and movements were both terribly awkward, but every form came from the Plum Blossom Fist Cheongpung had used in our duels.

This much is easy.

At some point after I began learning martial arts, I'd realized something.

Executing a technique required an understanding of the martial art and the internal-energy control to match. But merely copying its shape was easy.

I moved like this here, didn't I? Probably?

From the first form to the seventh. I occasionally stumbled, but I managed to perform them as naturally as possible without much difficulty. Then I turned my head.

"That's about it for now… Cheongpung?"

"Ah, yes, Benefactor."

"Is something wrong? Why do you look like that?"

"No, it's just…"

Cheongpung stared at me with an oddly complicated expression before hesitantly opening his mouth.

"I suddenly remembered something my grandfather once said."

"The Sword Saint old man—I mean, your grandfather?"

"Yes. He used to call me a thief."

"It's all right. When I was young, I secretly took a thousand won[915] from my mother's wallet and got beaten half to death."

"That's not what I mean…"

Cheongpung let out a deep sigh.

"He always said it while teaching me martial arts. He called me a thief who stole martial arts."

"Oh."

That was a compliment, right? To think a talent freak like Cheongpung was praising me.

As I stood there dumbfounded, Cheongpung said, "Benefactor, you're definitely a martial-arts genius."

"A genius? Me?"

"Yes."

A genius, my ass…

No, wait. He was right.

When I thought about it, I had mastered the Jin Family's Manoeuvre Technique and spear technique—both First Rate martial arts—in barely two or three months.

Of course, that was all thanks to the System.

"It's just a shortcut. I'm pretty good at using my body. My eyes are good, too. Heh heh."

[915] A thousand Korean won is about $0.71 or €0.65.

“My grandfather used to say that martial arts are seventy percent eyes and thirty percent feet.”

“I think he was right about that, but either way, I’m not a genius.”

“Think about it carefully. I’m sure something similar happened before.”

Was that so?

I suddenly remembered my childhood. I’d always been good at sports thanks to my natural athletic ability, but as for anything that could be called martial arts…

Oh. There was one.

When my expression changed, Cheongpung nodded as if to say, See?

“Something did happen, didn’t it?”

“There was one. Taekwondo.”

“Taekwondo?”

Back in elementary school, I’d been lured into enrolling at a taekwondo academy with the promise of a portable game console.

The older high school students had put on a taekwondo demonstration, and after watching it exactly twice, I could follow all eight Taegeuk forms.[916]

Of course, less than a week later, I beat up a middle schooler two years older than me and got kicked out.

Could that have been it?

Come to think of it, even when I was an F-rank Hunter, I’d been pretty good at copying almost anything.

My lousy physical abilities had simply held me back.

If a bottom-tier Hunter like me tried to imitate the movements of a mid-rank Hunter, I wouldn’t be able to generate any destructive power. I’d just tear my groin apart.

But things are different now.

Overflowing internal energy. Excellent physical abilities. And martial arts learned in Murim.

Now that I thought about it, I might not be a martial-arts genius, but I did seem to have a fair amount of talent.

“How long did it take you to learn the Plum Blossom Fist, Cheongpung?”

“One month.”

“One month?”

From my own experience, the Plum Blossom Fist was a Huashan martial art, but it wasn’t complicated enough to take that long.

[916] The Taegeuk forms are a standardized sequence of eight color-belt patterns in taekwondo.

And this guy had needed a month to learn it, while I'd managed a rough imitation in three days?

That's insane.

As I grinned so broadly that the corners of my mouth nearly split, Cheongpung added, "It took me a whole month to achieve Great Completion, so my grandfather scolded me terribly."

"…"

Right. Of course.

As I stared at him in disbelief, Cheongpung muttered, "Still… it doesn't feel very good. Having someone copy my martial arts."

An ominous aura rose from him.

After regaining consciousness, Hyuk Mujin stared blankly at the training ground.

This is incredible.

The training ground had already been half reduced to rubble.

More than half of the bluestone carefully laid by stonemasons famous throughout Shanxi Province had been smashed apart, and the destruction was continuing at a rapid pace.

Clang! Ka-ka-ka-clang!

Despite the season, the center of the training ground was scorching hot. Spear and sword clashed amid bursts of flame.

The men wielding them moved at dazzling speed, exchanging blows so quickly that even Hyuk Mujin, a First Rate master, struggled to follow.

How can they be that fast?

Cheongpung wore white martial robes, while Jin Taekyung wore black. The stark contrast between them was obvious at a glance, yet it was astonishing that they were around the same age.

That Cheongpung fellow is a monster.

He had an average build and a gentle appearance. Spend half a day on the streets of Taiyuan, and one could probably find three or four young men his age who looked much like him.

But that ordinary-looking young man concealed an identity no one could easily have guessed.

The heir to everything Sword Saint Mae Jonghak possessed.

Whoosh! Swish!

Beneath the high sun, Jin Taekyung's spearhead flashed.

The forms were heavy and concise, but once power and speed were added, they transformed into an extremely fast spear technique that made Hyuk Mujin dizzy just watching it.

What if that spear were aimed at me?

Hyuk Mujin shook his head from side to side.

It was embarrassing, but he wasn't confident he could last even the time it took to drink a cup of tea. No, perhaps even that thought was merely a consolation meant to preserve his pride.

But Cheongpung was different.

Swish, swish-swish-swish!

The spearhead surged in from every direction, only to slice uselessly through empty air. Cheongpung's face remained calm as he effortlessly dodged every attack.

Then his hand blurred, and a streak of light split the air.

Whoosh! Boom!

"Hng!"

Jin Taekyung let out a groan amid the thunderous impact. He had barely blocked the sword, but sword strikes poured toward him like a torrential downpour.

Watching the scene, Hyuk Mujin opened his mouth without realizing it.

At that moment, a single thought filled his mind.

Graceful.

That was the only way to describe it.

Cheongpung's movements were delicate and fluid, like the brushstrokes of a master painter. They resembled flower petals drifting and fluttering down at the end of the season.

Hyuk Mujin watched in a daze before suddenly muttering, "Plum Blossom Sword Technique…"

He had never seen Huashan's martial arts before.

But he could be certain of one thing. The very essence of Huashan martial arts had seeped into every one of Cheongpung's movements.

He's a monster. A monster in every sense of the word.

But "monster" was not a word that applied only to Cheongpung.

Swish-swish-swish-swish!

Ka-ga-gang!

Another man was blocking every strike of the Plum Blossom Sword Technique unleashed by the Sword Saint's disciple.

The young man with a powerful build and striking, ruggedly handsome features ground his teeth.

"Fuck, Huashan really made its martial arts a goddamn nightmare!"

If Huashan had heard the thick profanity Jin Taekyung spat out, the entire sect would have turned upside down.

A rough aura poured from his body.

Its domineering force momentarily suppressed Cheongpung's fluid grace before flowing straight into a counterattack.

Whoooosh! Boom!

A ferocious strike.

Cheongpung went flying after blocking the spear amid the thunderous impact. Jin Taekyung had knocked aside Cheongpung's offensive with a single move, but he immediately frowned.

"Ow, that stings."

Slice.

Before his words had even ended, the black martial robes he wore split open in a long tear.

Several long wounds scored his exposed chest, blood welling freely from them.

"What martial art was that?"

"The Heavenly Eagle Claw."

"You really do have everything."

"Would you like me to teach you?"

"You're allowed to?"

"Oh, I just remembered. My grandfather told me not to teach it to outsiders."

"Again? I knew it."

"Would you like to join Huashan?"

"No!"

Jin Taekyung shouted and kicked off the ground, charging forward.

His movements were instinctive, like those of a wild beast, yet they barely retained the form of martial arts. Hyuk Mujin shuddered.

Why does that man get scarier the longer I watch him?

Everyone had their own distinctive aura.

Jin Taekyung's was tenacious and fierce. There was something about it that struck fear into anyone watching him.

It isn't about his martial arts.

Jin Taekyung was certainly a highly skilled master, but he was not yet the equal of Cheongpung, the Sword Saint's disciple and a true Peak master.

Yet Hyuk Mujin had watched him from close by for the past several months, and he could say this with certainty.

Even if the sky fell, that man would survive.

No matter what kind of hell Jin Taekyung was thrown into, Hyuk Mujin felt certain he would return alive.

Three Peak masters had tried to kill him so far, but in the end, they had been the ones to fall. In Murim, the one who survived was the strong one.

And Jin Taekyung had survived to the bitter end.

Besides…

Captain's rate of growth is beyond imagination.

It was something Hyuk Mujin knew because he had watched him from closer than anyone else.

From the moment Jin Taekyung defeated Jopil, One Question, One Kill, after a desperate battle to this very moment as he fought Cheongpung—

Jin Taekyung was growing stronger every day.

And that's still true right now.

Just a few days ago, he hadn't been able to last even a hundred moves against the supreme techniques of Huashan that Cheongpung unleashed.

But now?

Hyuk Mujin had personally watched them exchange well over three hundred moves. Even after being struck by the Heavenly Eagle Claw, a martial art taught only to disciples of Huashan's main sect, Jin Taekyung's sole reaction had been, "Ow, that stings."

He's a monster. A monster.

Everyone around them was around the same age, and they were all Peak or Supreme First Rate. Wasn't that taking things too far? It seemed as though nothing but monsters surrounded him.

Hyuk Mujin let out a deep sigh and recalled what Jin Taekyung had told him a few days earlier during their Wall Lizard Technique training.

"If you don't want to lose something precious, then risk your life and do it now. Working yourself to death while you're still breathing is better than dying, isn't it?"

Those words were true.

You had to work yourself to death to survive and become strong. Every second counted if you wanted to avoid being swept away by the waves of Murim.

After silently watching the two men spar for a while, Hyuk Mujin rose to his feet.

I can't finish this with just my little toe.

He had to become stronger. Strong enough to be recognized as Jin Taekyung's right arm—or perhaps his heart.

And…

Strong enough for everyone to remember the name Hyuk Mujin.

He gripped his sword case tightly.

Chapter 158

Seven days and nights.

Seven days and nights had passed since I began sparring with Cheongpung. Eyes closed, I thought,

According to the Quest Window, I have to defeat Cheongpung before New Year's Day…

Only three days remained. How many times had I fought Cheongpung by now?

All I knew was that we had dueled at least sixty times. Of course, I had lost every single one of them without exception.

And he hasn't even used Sword Energy.

Cheongpung wasn't fighting at full strength. For a Peak master, not using Sword Energy was an enormous handicap, but Cheongpung was still strong without it.

He had learned Huashan's supreme martial arts under the guidance of Sword Saint Mae Jonghak since childhood.

Even Jin Mukyung, considered one of the greatest young prodigies in the current orthodox Murim, had lost to Cheongpung.

Jin Mukyung was injured at the time, but… Cheongpung is definitely different.

I recalled Cheongpung's movements, which I had seen so many times that I was sick of them.

They were grace itself.

That was probably a characteristic of the martial arts he had learned, but it was only possible because his own strength supported them.

So he's simply a cut above me.

Of course, I hadn't shown him everything, right down to my underwear.

I still had One Annihilation, the Inventory System, and the Unnamed Sword, which could contend with Cheongpung's Sword Energy.

But this was a spar, not a life-and-death duel.

I have to beat him with martial arts.

As far as I was concerned, the System was my final card.

In a battle where the slightest margin could decide life or death, it could turn the tide. But if my attack was blocked even after I used the System, only death would await me.

It was literally my final card. There was nothing after that.

I can't rely on the System every time I fight.

The world was vast, and there were many masters.

To prepare for powerful enemies who could appear at any moment, sharpening my martial arts had to come first.

"Whew."

With a deep exhale, my forty-five years of internal energy, which had been flowing steadily through me, coiled once more within my dantian.

SYSTEM

You have successfully completed circulating your qi.
The realm of the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique has risen slightly.
Your stamina and fatigue have recovered.

When I opened my eyes, the first thing I saw was Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin locked in a fierce battle.

Whack! Whack-whack-whack!

"Gaaagh!"

"..."

Correction. It wasn't a fierce battle. Mujin was just getting the crap beaten out of him.

Disoriented by the forms of the Crouching Tiger Fist raining down on him like a sudden shower, Hyuk Mujin gritted his teeth.

"Hah!"

The sword in his hand shot forward like a ray of light.

The forms weren't particularly unpredictable, nor did the sword technique reveal any extraordinary profundity, but his fundamentals were solid. He had probably swung that same sword thousands, perhaps tens of thousands, of times by now.

Swish! Swish-swish!

Head, shoulder, then chest. Cheongpung evaded all three attacks in an instant, only for Hyuk Mujin's sword to thrust toward his chest.

Whooosh!

A clean, sharp strike stripped of all unnecessary movement.

Unfortunately, he had picked the wrong opponent.

"Wow, you've improved a lot!"

The blade trembled violently between Cheongpung's index and middle fingers as Hyuk Mujin poured strength into it.

Empty-Hand Seizes the Blade.

It was a technique possible only when one's martial arts were overwhelmingly superior to one's opponent's.

Hyuk Mujin's face flushed red at the unexpected humiliation.

"Hngh!"

"Putting more strength into it won't—"

Cheongpung's eyes suddenly widened.

Hyuk Mujin had appeared to be putting more strength into the sword he had seized, but he abruptly released the hilt and lunged into Cheongpung's arms.

Look at that bastard.

A quiet laugh escaped me. I had a pretty good idea why Hyuk Mujin, who had fought so honestly until now, had suddenly tried something like that.

They say even a dog at a village school can recite poetry after three years.

It was a method I often used: abandon the weapon a martial artist valued as much as his own life, catch the enemy off guard, and seize the advantage.

A good attempt. His only mistake was trying it against someone far too skilled for such a trick to work.

Boom!

With a sound like a drum bursting, someone's body sailed through the air. Grinning, I looked down at Hyuk Mujin, who had landed right at my feet.

"Lose?"

After a fit of coughing and retching, Hyuk Mujin replied irritably,

"You watched the whole thing. Why ask?"

"What number was that?"

"That makes ninety."

"You'll hit a hundred soon. How about Hundred Battles, Hundred Losses as your nickname?"

"I'll pass."

"Still, that last move wasn't bad."

Hyuk Mujin's ears twitched at my praise.

"Really?"

"Yeah. But the difference in skill was way too great. Size up your opponent before trying that."

"I knew it. I was wondering why you were praising me for once."

"Do you think you could have landed even one hit with a move like that?"

"If Cheongpung hadn't used a palm technique, I could've hit him at least once."

As Hyuk Mujin grumbled with his lower lip sticking out, Cheongpung ran over with an innocent expression.

"Are you all right?"

"No, weren't you supposed to use only fist techniques?"

"I was going to start using palm techniques now. You've improved much faster than I expected."

"Ahem. Well, go ahead, then."

Look at that bastard. His grin was about to split his face.

Normally, I would have cut in to knock him down a peg, but I largely agreed with Cheongpung.

He really is improving quickly.

I wasn't the only one who had grown over the past week. Hyuk Mujin had as well.

Even though he had Cheongpung's help, he had completed his Wall Lizard Technique training despite having far inferior stats. He had also improved enough for Cheongpung to bring out his palm techniques first.

That's not all.

I activated Qi Sense to check Hyuk Mujin's Level.

SYSTEM

You used Qi Sense. At its current six-star realm, you can search for targets at Level 80 or below within 60 jang.[917]

Qi Sense has identified the target.

Lv. 50 Hyuk Mujin

Only ten days ago, Hyuk Mujin had been Level 48. But after training, he had gone up two Levels.

Level 50? Already?

By checking Levels with the System, I could roughly gauge an opponent's strength.

The problem was that most people's Levels either stagnated or rose so slowly that it was difficult to notice.

But this guy's Level keeps shooting up.

I suddenly remembered when I had first met Hyuk Mujin.

Back then, he had been only Level 20. He wasn't anywhere near me—I had already passed Level 60—but even so, his Level-up speed was no joke.

Maybe it's because he's been dragged around with me.

Now that I thought about it, he had gone through every kind of hardship while traveling with me. Had actual combat naturally trained him?

Under my gaze—as though I were studying some fascinating creature—Hyuk Mujin asked,

"Why are you looking at me like that?"

"Huh? Nothing. I was just thinking you really have improved a lot."

"Ahem. Ahem!"

"That was me being generous. From now on, you're my pinky."

"…You're awfully stingy."

"Never heard the phrase 'the painful pinky'?"

[917] A jang is ten Korean ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Sixty jang is about 182 m (597 ft); three jang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

“So you’re saying I’m your painful pinky, Captain?”

“No. I’m just telling you the phrase exists. Remember it.”

“…”

“All right, our Great Hero Hyuk Mujin of Hundred Battles, Hundred Losses can step back now.”

“I told you I’m not using that nickname!”

Letting Hyuk Mujin’s shout go in one ear and out the other, I steadied my breathing and stepped forward.

“How about circulating your qi once?”

Cheongpung smiled brightly.

“I barely moved, so I didn’t even break a sweat. Why would I?”

Mujin was going to cry. He really was.

I smiled along with Cheongpung’s radiant expression.

“You’re going to sweat a little now.”

“Someone at your level is a fun opponent, Benefactor.”

That challenging tone was unusual for Cheongpung. But from everything I had seen, this was his true nature—the competitive spirit of Cheongpung the martial artist.

I clearly remembered how he hadn’t smiled even once while fighting Jin Mukyung with his sword.

“It won’t be fun much longer.”

“That’s all right. Winning is always fun. Hehe.”

“Sure you won’t regret saying that?”

“Yes! I’m already beating you without Sword Energy!”

“…”

Damn. That hit a nerve.

I calmed myself after that brutal statement of fact and tightened my grip on the spear.

“This time will be different.”

“My grandfather told me something. He said only weaklings say things like that. True masters show it through their actions.”

“Don’t worry. That’s what I intend to do now.”

“I’m looking forward to it.”

I looked at Cheongpung, who was still grinning from ear to ear, and murmured inwardly.

My combat stats had finally broken through 200 thanks to training the Wall Lizard Technique and sparring. And I still had the points I had diligently saved in preparation for encountering an enemy.

At this moment, I didn't envy even the greatest under heaven.

"I was really saving these up… but I'm using them because of you."

"Huh?"

"Sword Energy, the Zaha Divine Technique—anything is fine. Give it everything you've got."

"Then it'll be too bland."

"You should taste it before deciding whether it's spicy or bland."

Before I had even finished speaking, an order had already been delivered to the System in my head.

Assign fifty points to Agility.

Whooosh.

It was a force only I could feel in this world.

The moment an unprecedented power, whose origin I could not identify, flowed through my entire body like a wave—

"Let's start with mild Neoguri."[918]

Whoooosh!

[918] Neoguri is an instant-noodle brand. Taekyung is using its mild flavor label to describe his attack.

My spear began moving faster than ever before.

Swish—boom!

Cheongpung twisted his neck. His hair, tied tightly behind his head, burst through the air.

But the spear didn't stop there.

Whoom—whooosh!

More than ten spear images charged in from every direction. Cheongpung stepped forward without hesitation.

Crack!

The few remaining bluestones shattered, and dirt erupted into the air.

Jin Taekyung looked at Cheongpung, who had retreated three jang[919] in an instant, and asked,

"Knew it. Dark Fragrance Drift?"

"I mixed in the Five-Element Plum Blossom Steps."

"Can you even do that?"

"It worked, didn't it?"

"So how does it taste?"

"Bland. Very bland."

"That's possible. For now."

After finishing his sentence, Jin Taekyung suddenly shuddered from head to toe and grinned.

"Next up: spicy Jin Ramen."[920]

The incomprehensible words had barely left his mouth when he charged.

The spearhead rose as if it would pierce the sun, then slashed downward with a terrifying sound as it tore through the air.

Whooooooosh!

At that moment, Cheongpung drew his sword. Vivid violet Sword Energy had already gathered along its blade.

No—the Zaha Divine Technique was flowing from his entire body, not just his sword.

Boom!

Force collided with force.

A thunderous roar rang out as though the sky itself were splitting apart.

---

[919] A jang is ten Korean ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Sixty jang is about 182 m (597 ft); three jang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

[920] Jin Ramen is an instant-noodle brand with a spicy flavor variety.

The smile vanished from Cheongpung's lips. A considerable backlash traveled through his aching wrist.

How?

He was different. Far too different.

Even the phrase looking at someone with new eyes fell short.

Before Cheongpung could even rub his eyes, Jin Taekyung had grown stronger, then stronger again.

And his internal energy…

The Zaha Divine Technique was an Extreme Yang internal-energy cultivation technique. Yet the internal energy transmitted through Jin Taekyung's spear was no less powerful.

Cheongpung felt a faint tremor coming from the spearhead pressing down on his sword.

Vrrr. Vrrrr.

They said that those who reached the wall of the Peak realm could hear someone crying before breaking through it.

A martial artist's weapon, as precious as life itself, was the first to notice its owner's transformation.

Internal energy that had reached the realm. A physique fully prepared to become a Peak master.

When all of those conditions were met, this was the sound that rang out.

A Sword Cry?

But it wasn't a sword. It was a spear.

A Spear Cry.

As Cheongpung stared openmouthed, Jin Taekyung grinned.

"All right. Now for spicy Puramyeon."[921]

Krrrnnng.

With the force of a thousand geun,[922] the spear's cry rang out even louder.

[921] Puramyeon is an instant-noodle brand used as the last step in Taekyung's flavor joke.

[922] A Korean geun is a traditional unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). A thousand geun is 600 kg (about 1,320 lb); here, the weight describes the spear's immense force.

Chapter 159

Fifty points to Agility. And fifty points to Strength.

That made a hundred points in total. I had poured them all in at once—a massive number of points that would normally take ten Level-ups to earn—but I didn't regret a single one.

Points really are the best. Always thrilling. Always new.

The toes kicking off the ground and the hand gripping the spear shaft cried out.

The me of now was far stronger than I had been only a few seconds ago.

And at last, I had taken the first step toward winning this duel.

I'll end this quickly.

Whooooooosh!

The instant the spearhead came crashing down with a terrifying sound, a violet haze rose from Cheongpung's entire body.

The Zaha Divine Technique.

It was proof that Cheongpung had finally begun fighting at full strength. But there was still one crucial thing left in this match.

Whoooosh!

As expected, a streak of Sword Energy shot up from Cheongpung's waist.

Sword Energy, the exclusive domain of Peak masters, possessed enough cutting power to slice through steel.

I hadn't yet crossed the wall into the Peak realm. I couldn't meet it head-on.

I had to either retreat a step or factor in the spear being destroyed and continue with my next attack.

What is this feeling?

A strange sense of déjà vu. My heart pounded, and my vision grew sharp. In a world that seemed to have slowed down, the cool spear shaft in my grip trembled.

Vrrr. Vrrrr.

A cool head. A hot heart.

That was how I had fought for seven years…but this time was different. This was instinct. Nothing but instinct ruled over my entire being.

I can do it.

Like a man possessed, I put more strength into the descending spearhead.

Forty-five years of internal energy raced along my fingertips toward the spearhead. The trembling in my grip grew stronger, and Cheongpung's violet Sword Energy dazzled my eyes.

That was all.

Boom!

Two enormous forces collided.

A thunderous roar. A brutal blast of wind. Cheongpung's eyes flying wide.

And then…

It's fine.

The snow-white spearhead was still there.

It pressed down on Cheongpung's Sword Energy without so much as a hairline crack, trembling all the while.

Vrrrrrrr.

It sounded like hundreds of bees beating their wings.

How is this possible?

Was this also the effect of raising my Strength? Or was it simply a coincidence?

At that moment, the answer to my question rang out.

SYSTEM

You have finished preparing to step into a new realm.
Your weapon is resonating with your qi.
Quest Beyond the Wall has been generated.

Ah.

It wasn't the effect of raising my Strength. Nor was it a coincidence.

This was the natural order of things. After enduring countless hardships, I had finally come face-to-face with the wall. Now I had to cross it.

The wall of the Peak realm—a wall countless people had failed to overcome.

A Peak master.

True superhumans who wielded Sword Energy, or Aura.

A shiver ran through me at the thought alone. Memories from the past flashed before my eyes like a cheap monochrome film.

A mere F-rank Hunter, one of countless others, had made it this far. There had been countless crises, and someone had made a sacrifice.

SYSTEM

Quest: Beyond the Wall
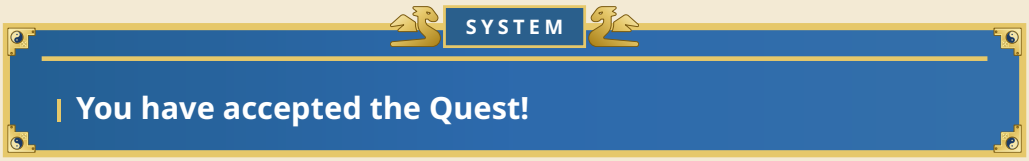
Would you like to accept this Quest?
Y / N

I had crossed the boundary between life and death countless times. I had to cross a mere Peak wall with ease if I didn't want to be ashamed of the days I had lived through.

Obviously yes.



Ding.

As the cheerful System notification rang out, I pulled up the corners of my mouth.

My thoughts had been long, but only a short time had passed. I whispered to Cheongpung, who was looking up at me with bewildered eyes.

"Now, it's Puramyeon spicy flavor."[923]

I'll show you what Korean spice tastes like.

Krrrnnng.

My Strength had risen by twenty-five percent compared to roughly a minute ago.

It was the difference between heaven and earth. Cheongpung was visibly flustered by my sudden transformation.

"B-Benefactor. Where did this sudden strength come from?"

"It's Korean rice power. Especially gukbap."[924]

"Pardon?"

"I used to eat two bowls of pork-bone hangover soup every morning. And five bowls of rice."

"What does that even—gasp!"

Krrrnnng.

Cheongpung swallowed a breath as my force continued to build.

He had Sword Energy and the Zaha Divine Technique, but neither was having much effect. Filled to the brim with my qi and resonating with it, the spear had grown sturdy enough that even Sword Energy could no longer cut through it.

I have a real shot at winning.

But Cheongpung wasn't going down that easily.

"Hup!"

With a short shout, an incredible force knocked the spearhead upward.

---

[923] Puramyeon is an instant-noodle brand. Taekyung uses its spicy flavor as the next step in his escalating flavor joke.

[924] Gukbap is soup served with rice; bone haejangguk is a hearty pork-bone soup traditionally eaten as hangover food.

It had only been lifted a handspan, but the instant Cheongpung escaped the pressure, he didn't let the opportunity pass.

"I'm sorry. I took you far too lightly, Benefactor."

Before he had even finished speaking, an invisible force shot from his palm.

The Taeeul Miri Palm. A secret ultimate technique of Huashan, personally taught to him by the Sword Saint.

"Hngh!"

Bam-bam-bam!

Sharp pain shot through me as I staggered backward five steps in succession.

Thank goodness I had improved my bones and muscles as well as my Sinews and Meridians with every Level-up. Otherwise, I would have been in serious trouble.

"Damn, that hurt."

Cheongpung stared at me with the wide, startled eyes of a rabbit.

"A Seven-Star Taeeul Miri Palm…"[925]

"Don't say that. You'll make me crave cider."

"Pardon?"

There it was. Exactly the reaction I had expected.

The instant Cheongpung asked what I meant, my spear was already thrusting toward his chest.

A perfectly timed surprise attack. But there was no way it would end with just that.

As if answering my thoughts, Sword Energy slammed into the spearhead.

Clang!

I wasn't expecting it to work.

With no expectations came no disappointment. My emotions remained steady, and so did my forms.

Next, the waist.

Whoooosh!

Cheongpung twisted his waist as the spear moved.

The gust raised by the spearhead silently sliced through his shirt. A faint line of blood appeared across the exposed flesh.

A small gain was still a gain.

Next, the neck.

I turned with the motion and swung the spear shaft at Cheongpung's neck.

Boom!

[925]The Korean word for "seven-star" also appears in Chilsung Cider, a Korean lemon-lime soft drink, setting up Taekyung's next line.

That was not the sound that should have come from a collision between a human body and a steel spear.

But Cheongpung had martial arts—the Zaha Divine Technique, both one of the greatest internal-energy cultivation techniques under heaven and a protective qi art.

I clicked my tongue as I watched the violet energy around him grow denser.

Even so, how can there be absolutely no damage? This is outright cheating.

Talk about a plum-blossom silver spoon. How was I supposed to spar with this kind of unfair advantage?

But I didn't have time to complain. Cheongpung had closed the distance to right in front of me in barely half a step, and the Sword Energy he scattered filled my vision.

Whoooosh!

The tip of his sword bloomed with flowers.

The movement was so fluid it was beautiful. But if I let myself be mesmerized, I would soon find myself standing before a sign for Mount Beimang.[926]

The Plum Blossom Sword Technique I had watched until now was a frightening martial art composed of extremely intricate, complex forms.

When Cheongpung wielded it, it felt as though I were trapped in a rainstorm.

But…

I can see it.

I opened my eyes wide. My breathing slowed, and my vision sharpened. The sound of my heartbeat was like thunder, and the spear trembled in my hands.

Vrrrr. Vrrrrr.

The spear was ringing.

At this moment, the spear and I were practically one body.

The spear shaft no longer felt cool.

Shishishishik!

Sword and spear became a blur.

I continuously deflected and knocked away the Sword Energy pouring down like rain.

Ten times, twenty, maybe thirty…

Cheongpung was tenacious and sharp beyond anyone I had ever fought.

When I countered the Sword Energy digging toward my waist, the Taeeul Miri Palm flew at me. When I avoided the Taeeul Miri Palm, the Crouching Tiger Fist aimed for my chest.

Thud!

[926] Mount Beimang is traditionally associated with burial grounds. Taekyung means that losing focus could get him killed.

The shoulder that blocked the Crouching Tiger Fist throbbed.

A momentary pain. As my movements slowed for an instant, Cheongpung opened the fist he had curled shut.

Air burst from the tips of his five fingers.

Ah, damn it. Right, he had that too.

The moment I realized it, I bent my waist backward like a bow.

The Plum Blossom Five-Point Finger. He had shown it only once during his duel with Jin Mukyung.

Pip-pip-pit!

Five streams of finger force grazed the bridge of my nose and earlobe by a hair.

He really is strong.

I felt it again: Cheongpung was not an ordinary swordsman.

He was not only the heir of the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak. He had also mastered Huashan's secret techniques—in other words, he was a complete gift set of Huashan martial arts.

I wiped away the blood seeping from my wounds and spoke.

"You're coming on a little strong, aren't you?"

"That's what I'd like to say to you, Benefactor. Honestly, you surprised me."

"Why? Because someone who seemed like no big deal is fighting much better than expected?"

"Yes!"

"…"

"You're better than I thought. Seriously. And…"

"And?"

"It's fun."

As I watched the faint smile on Cheongpung's lips, I thought about it.

Setting his competitive pride aside, this guy simply loved martial arts themselves. He was proving to me how frightening a genius who truly enjoyed martial arts could be.

"Aren't you the same as me, Benefactor?"

"Young Hero Cheong, do you know what my dream is?"

"…"

"To retire in one piece and put up a building in my name. I'll collect rent and spend my old age in comfort as a landlord."

"A landlord?"

"Put simply, um… Yes. You can think of it as being one of those people up in the sky."

"Ah-ha."

Cheongpung nodded as though he understood.

“You want to become the Martial God.”

“No, that’s not what I meant. Where did the Martial God come from?”

“Is that not it?”

“No. It’s completely different.”

“But you do seem to like martial arts.”

“Me? Not to that extent.”

“You look happy for someone who doesn’t.”

Only then did I realize that the corners of my mouth had been raised the entire time.

Since when?

As I stood lost in thought, Cheongpung smiled brightly.

“If you’ve caught your breath, shall we start again?”

“…How long have you known?”

“It’s a method I’ve used on my grandfather many times.”

People really did think alike. I burst out laughing.

“You’re more perceptive than I expected.”

“My sword is faster.”

Tsssss.

The moment violet Sword Energy surged from Cheongpung’s blade, the spear in my hands trembled violently.

Clang!

The First Form of the Jin Family’s Spear Technique. The spear thrust straight ahead was blocked by the sword blade.

The Jin Family’s Spear Technique was an honest martial art. Simple and rough.

It was clearly a First Rate martial art, but when it came to subtle principles, it was far too simple.

Compared to Huashan’s secret techniques, it falls hopelessly short.

Martial arts ultimately came down to combinations of movements.

Thrusting, striking, cutting.

By circulating internal energy, adjusting the angle by the slightest degree, and linking one form into the next, one could create endless variations.

I had finally mastered them after arduous effort, but the Jin Family’s Spear Technique and the Jin Family’s Manoeuvre Technique lacked that sort of subtlety.

Whooooooosh! Clang!

In that respect, my opponent was a terrible match for me.

Cheongpung was a Peak master with eyes sharp enough to see through my martial arts at a glance.

As if he had decided to stop holding back, he began pressing the attack in earnest.

Whoosh! Bam-bam!

Sword techniques, fist techniques, palm techniques, water arts, even claw techniques.

He really was a genius of martial arts. He chained together roughly ten different martial arts, yet every movement fit perfectly into the next, like interlocking gears.

His eyes shone like morning stars, and his breathing was slow and steady.

So this is what it means to be the Sword Saint's Disciple.

An excellent Master and excellent martial arts.

And talent on top of that.

The world was always unfair. And over the past seven years, I had learned how to adapt to that unfair world.

Persist, move slowly, and never give up.

That was my way.

I had never wanted to be a tortoise that caught up with a rabbit far ahead.

Crossing the finish line was enough.

Surviving and retiring. That was the greatest dream a lowest-rank Hunter could have.

I had to claw my way to survival.

I learned everything in the Gates. Goblins holding rusty knives and firing poison needles were my sparring partners.

Unlike duels in the Murim, I had to stake my life on every fight. But that was why I learned faster.

And then…

I came to the Murim.

Clang-clang-clang! Slash!

My side burned. I could feel blood flowing, but I didn't make the stupid mistake of checking the wound.

The human body was weaker than you might think, and stronger in its own way. Even if some blood was flowing, the bleeding would soon stop once it clotted.

"Ugh!"

Funny enough, Cheongpung's weak stomach gave me an opening.

I charged at the faltering Cheongpung.

Second Form of the Jin Family's Spear Technique.

Whooooooosh!

It had been about a week after I fell into the Murim, I think.

I found two martial arts manuals in a dust-covered archive: the Jin Family's Spear Technique and the Jin Family's Manoeuvre Technique.

If you asked why I learned them, the answer was simple.

To survive.

To me, the Murim was another Gate.

I had to learn if I wanted to survive.

That was how I entered the world of martial arts. Before I knew it, several months had passed.

And then everything changed completely.

Shishishishik! Bam!

Hngh.

The Plum Blossom Five-Point Finger.

The instant I avoided the five streams of finger force, the Taeeul Miri Palm struck me.

I had poured in a full hundred points, but I still hadn't caught up to Cheongpung.

However, to fight someone who already knew the Jin Family's Spear Technique inside and out, I had no choice but to keep charging forward like a rhino.

Third Form of the Jin Family's Spear Technique. Fourth Form.

The Jin Family's Spear Technique grew more powerful the farther it advanced. Its footwork was designed to match.

The essence of both arts was to pressure an opponent with simple forms tailored for actual combat.

If I can't do it with my teeth, I'll do it with my gums.

My understanding of martial arts might be lacking, but my stats were not inferior.

As I pressed forward, Cheongpung retreated.

Riding the momentum, I thrust and slashed with all my strength. Even as I panted until my mouth tasted sweet, I suddenly remembered the conversation I had just had with Cheongpung.

But you like martial arts, don't you?

Me? Not to that extent.

Then why have you been smiling this whole time?

That was obviously because…

It's fun.

Whoooooosh! Boom!

Sword and spear collided.

The bluestone laid neatly across the training ground shattered into powder and scattered through the air.

As the thick cloud of dust cleared, Cheongpung came into view.

His smile was clear and bright, completely at odds with the situation we were in.

“Martial arts are fun, right?”

After thinking for a moment, I nodded without a word.

“Why did you say they weren’t earlier?”

“Let’s just call it a difference in how we’ve lived.”

For seven years, I had lived as though I were being chased by something invisible.

Guilt, perhaps. Or a sense of responsibility.

Or maybe it was simply self-satisfaction, a way to rationalize all of it.

As he watched me hesitate, Cheongpung spoke.

“My grandfather once told me something. He said, ‘Martial arts? They’re nothing special!‘”

“Hmm? The Sword Saint?”

Cheongpung continued with an aggrieved expression.

“He said it wasn’t martial arts, but empty space[927]. Since it’s empty to begin with, you just accept it as it is and fill it in.”

“Accept it as it is and fill it in.”

“I’m serious. You can ask my grandfather later…”

Cheongpung’s voice gradually faded, then cut off completely.

I closed my eyes.

In the pitch-black darkness, forgetting the passage of time and the place I was in, I muttered a single sentence as though possessed.

Accept it as it is and fill it in…

Why did those words keep catching at my heart?

The more I repeated them, the harder my heart pounded and the more my entire body itched.

It felt as though the boulder weighing down my chest were shifting.

It isn’t martial arts. It’s empty space. Accept it as it is and fill it in…

I didn’t know whether several seconds or several hours passed.

In the darkness, even the flow of time seemed to have stopped.

In that suffocating darkness, where it would not have been strange for a day, two days, three days, or even a year to pass, I opened my eyes.

“Benefactor, how do you feel?”

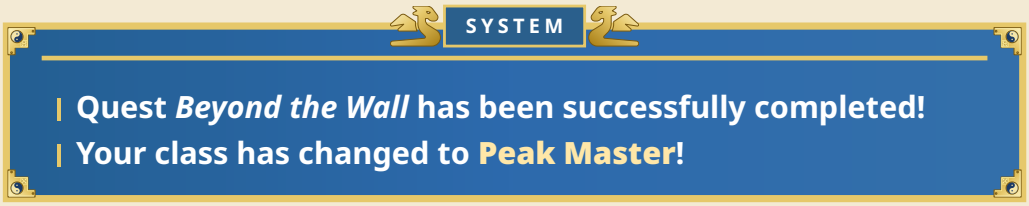
Instead of answering Cheongpung’s question, I looked around.

Hyuk Mujin was dozing in the corner, while the ink-dark sky was filled with a cluster of stars that looked ready to pour down at any moment.

Was this really the world I knew?

[927] Mae’s line is wordplay on two Korean terms pronounced mugong: “martial arts” and “empty space.”

“Was my grandfather right?”
His second question.
I answered in a hoarse voice.
“No. Not at all.”
Martial arts were fucking hard.
Still…
Ding.



Now I knew one thing.

Chapter 160

"Was Grandfather right?"

"No. Not at all."

There was a simple reason I was flatly denying the words of Mae Jonghak, the great martial artist known as the Sword Saint.

Look at the Sword Saint trying to con me.

Nothing special, my ass.

They said the view changed depending on where you stood. Beyond the wall of the Peak realm I had barely managed to cross, a rugged mountain range awaited me.

I still have a long way to go.

They said there was no end to learning. Martial arts were no different.

I was nothing more than a beginner who had barely gained enlightenment from a casual remark tossed out by the max-level Sword Saint.

Still…

"Thank you."

When I bowed with those heartfelt words, Cheongpung panicked.

"Benefactor, why are you suddenly doing this?"

"Because I'm grateful. That's all."

I knew there were countless martial artists, as numerous as grains of sand on a white-sand beach. I also knew that only a tiny fraction of them reached the Peak realm.

I also knew that even with advanced First Rate martial arts and internal energy, anyone without the enlightenment to match would spend their entire life stuck in place.

If not for Cheongpung, I would have wandered for a long time.

But I had been lucky. Cheongpung had devoted nearly ten days to helping me train, and he had even passed on the Sword Saint's teachings.

That was far too generous a return for a few candied hawthorn skewers.[928]

"Please don't do this. I barely did anything."

"Barely? I may be shameless, but I'm not an ungrateful bastard."

"Huh? Really?"

"…"

Just what did this guy think of me?

As my eyes narrowed, Cheongpung hurriedly waved his hands.

"No, that's not what you're thinking."

"What am I thinking?"

[928] Candied hawthorn skewers are traditional fruit skewers coated in hardened sugar.

“I mean, it’s just…”

Cheongpung looked around with a lost gaze, then spotted Hyuk Mujin snoring in the corner of the training ground and shouted.

“Young Hero Hyuk! Wake up! This isn’t the time to be sleeping.”

“…”

This was genuinely pathetic.

Hyuk Mujin’s eyes suddenly flew open at Cheongpung’s shout. When he saw me, he spoke as though nothing had happened.

“As expected. I believed in you.”

“…”

This bastard was taking it even further.

“I, Hyuk Mujin, stood guard with the single noble purpose of protecting my Captain.”

“…”

“Enlightenment is hard-won and easily broken. So I stood right here! Eyes wide open! Making sure not even a single rat could get through!”

Forget the rat. You sure seem like a fucking bastard…

I stared at him, saliva stains covering the area around his mouth, and quietly spoke.

“Mujin.”

“I’ve become a Peak Master, you know?”

“Congratulations!”

“Yeah. And now my body is overflowing with strength. My fists are itching, too.”

“…”

“Guard duty? Rats? If your snoring had been even a little louder, I might have suffered qi deviation, you bastard.”

“…You heard me?”

“Did you think I wouldn’t?”

He had been snoring so loudly that even my mother in Ilsan probably heard him.

As he scratched the back of his head and grinned sheepishly, I spread my fingers wide.

“This is your last chance. I’m counting to ten, so get out of my sight. One, two, three…”

Dadadadada!

Cheongpung watched Hyuk Mujin flee at tremendous speed and exclaimed in admiration.

“Wow, training really does work! He’s incredibly fast!”

So that was how he interpreted it.

I said to Cheongpung, who was clapping like a seal and looking proud of himself.

“Then let’s start again.”

“Huh?”

“The duel. It isn’t over yet.”

“I’m fine with that, but… Aren’t you tired?”

“Not at all.”

It was a lie. My body, having entered a new realm, was overflowing with vitality, but my mind was utterly exhausted. It felt like the strength had gone out of me after an all-out sprint.

But I wanted to continue sparring with Cheongpung even more.

I want to test it.

Gaining enlightenment was worlds apart from raising my stats with points.

Right now, I felt as though I could unleash martial arts that were entirely new—not merely faster or stronger.

“I’m perfectly fine.”

I said it again, but Cheongpung shook his head.

“My grandfather said rest is also training.”

“Not even once?”

“No. Benefactor, you need to rest now. And…”

“And?”

Cheongpung giggled as he continued.

“I’m going to win anyway. So what’s the point?”

“…!”

“You know that now too, don’t you?”

“That… is true.”

I didn’t want to admit it, but it was a fact.

You could only see as much as you knew. After reaching the Peak realm, I realized all over again just how much of a monster Cheongpung was.

I also realized that, as I was now, I could never defeat him if he fought at full strength.

Unless he went easy on me.

But that was not what I wanted. Winning a duel against an opponent who was not giving his all would only leave a bitter taste.

“Don’t be impatient. For the time being, you’ll have your hands full just absorbing the enlightenment you gained today.”

“Then…”

“Let’s postpone our duel until next time. It’s a shame. I was having fun too.”

Ding.

Since the Quest proposer made the decision themselves, you will not receive any penalty.

"Get plenty of rest today!"

I watched Cheongpung's back recede for a long time before returning to the pavilion.

The System notifications reminded me of the things I had been putting off.

Check messages.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

Endless System notifications rang out as all the messages I had yet to check unfolded before my eyes.

I stared at the translucent System window with my mouth hanging open.

How many of these are there?

It looked like I would have to wait quite a while before I could rest.

Hot water sloshed inside the large wooden bathtub.

I had gone several days without washing properly and desperately needed a bath. As soon as I sank into the steaming tub, a moan escaped me.

"Ahhh. This feels great."

Now I finally felt alive again. After closing my eyes and savoring the sensation for a while, I opened the System window.

"Check messages."

Ding. Ding. Ding.

System messages poured out like water bursting through a broken dam. I read them one by one.

SYSTEM

You have successfully completed Quest Beyond the Wall!
Your class has changed to Peak Master!
You have acquired a massive amount of EXP!
Level up!
Level up!
Level up!
Level up!
Level up!

Oh. I gained five Levels at once?

Someone might think that was stingy, but not me.

The Murim was another reality, but I was practically a game character here.

Back when I was a beginner, killing a single bandit could raise my Level. Things were different now. The amount of EXP required kept increasing, and my leveling speed had been slowing down accordingly.

This is more than enough.

But the rewards did not end there.

SYSTEM

The realm of Jin Family's Cultivation Technique has risen to the ninth stage.
You can now acquire more internal energy with greater stability.
The realm of Qi Sense has risen to the seventh stage.
You can detect targets at Level 90 or below within 70 jang.[929]
You have acquired EXP due to the dramatic advancement of your martial arts.
Level up!
Level up!

I was already satisfied that the realms of Jin Family's Cultivation Technique and Qi Sense, which had stagnated for so long, had risen. Gaining two more Levels on top of that was a double blessing.

Just from the messages I had seen so far, I had already leveled up seven times.

Now that's a proper reward.

I smiled contentedly and continued reading the other messages.

[929] A jang is ten ja, a traditional length unit. Seventy jang is about 212 m (696 ft).

A Peak Master is a powerhouse capable of leading an entire school. You can create your own martial art and establish a new sect.

You have gained insight into the manipulation of internal energy that you had not known before. Through training, you can use the new Skill Sound Transmission.

Creating a sect and inventing martial arts.

The System was certainly giving me the full Peak Master treatment. It was worlds apart from how I had been treated as a First Rate martial artist.

Well, I am a Peak Master now.

Shanxi was crawling with thousands of martial artists. Even so, there were fewer than twenty Peak masters.

I didn't know how things were in the Central Plains, but at least in Shanxi Province, that was what it meant to be a Peak master.

But none of that is very useful to me.

I didn't know anything about inventing martial arts yet, and I had no intention of founding a new sect. Why would I leave the dependable Jin Family of Taiyuan?

More importantly…

Sound Transmission is good. Very good.

Sound Transmission. A technique for secretly transmitting sound through internal energy.

I couldn't think of any immediate use for the first two, but Sound Transmission had considerable practical value.

It would require training, but that was no problem.

Only three left now?

The countless message windows had all disappeared, leaving exactly three.

With equal parts relief and regret, I checked the remaining messages.

Ding.

Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron* has been added to your Inventory.

A martial artist and their weapon are one body. Finding a weapon capable of drawing out all of one's strength is also a martial artist's duty.

Quest Find the Craftsman has been created.

"…Huh?"

Northern Gaoyuan.

This land had once been home to the nomadic empire founded by a great ruler. But it had changed with the passage of time.

The vast pastures covered in green grass were gradually disappearing, and wooden buildings from the Central Plains were beginning to replace the gers, the nomads' homes.[930]

The customs of the nomads still remained, but the clothing and culture of the Central Plains were slowly infiltrating the plateau.

The man draped in sheepskin did not like it.

"Han Chinese bastards swarming the sacred grasslands."

"Temur, bear with it. It's not as if this started today or yesterday."

"Chinggen. We are descendants of the khans. We must not forget that."

"I haven't forgotten. I'm simply telling you not to forget what kind of gathering this is."

"Damn it. An inn instead of a perfectly good ger.[931]"

Temur and Chinggen, two chieftains who each commanded a hundred tribespeople, entered the inn.

Built by Han Chinese who called themselves mounted bandits, it was the only establishment of its kind in Northern Gaoyuan—and it was enormous to match.

The moment the two men stepped inside, they saw mounted bandits packed all the way to the upper floor, along with two men seated at the center of the crowd.

"Ha-ha-ha! The chieftains of the Great Steppe have arrived! Come, sit. I've warmed some mare's-milk wine for you."[932]

Unlike the middle-aged man who welcomed them with both arms spread wide, the other man did not so much as nod. He merely gestured.

"Sit."

"…!"

"…!"

Veins bulged on Temur and Chinggen's foreheads.

Who were they? They were descendants of the Great Khan who had once crossed the steppe and ruled the Central Plains.

It had happened centuries ago, but their pride had never died.

"You Han Chinese bastard, lower than a dog!"

---

[930] A ger is a traditional round felt dwelling used by nomadic peoples of the Central Asian steppe.
[931] A ger is a traditional round felt dwelling used by nomadic peoples of the Central Asian steppe.
[932] Mare's-milk wine is a traditional alcoholic drink made by fermenting mare's milk.

Temur was hot-tempered and reckless by nature. Before Chinggen could stop him, his hand seized his curved saber.

"I'll offer your head to the god Tengger—"[933]

And that was when it happened.

"I said sit."

The voice was cold, and the eyes were like an abyss. Even Temur, who led a tribe across the harsh steppe, found himself unable to draw his saber.

Seizing the moment, Chinggen hurriedly grabbed Temur by the shoulder and whispered so quietly that he could barely be heard.

"Temur, don't act rashly. You know who he is, don't you?"

Temur swallowed.

Four people had gathered here today. They had never met before, but each was a powerhouse who held up one of the major forces of Northern Gaoyuan.

But if there was a master capable of intimidating him this badly…

There was only one person.

The Human Butcher.

No one knew his surname. No one knew his name.

No one knew where he came from or what he had done.

He was Han Chinese, and he had ridden across the steppe with only fifty subordinates. He had earned the nickname Human Butcher because he killed people as though slaughtering livestock.

In other words, he was a butcher of men.

"You're a slow one, friend."

[933]Tengger is a sky deity in traditional steppe belief.

Chapter 161

“You’re a slow one, friend.”

The Human Butcher’s words sent a chill through Temur. He could feel the killing intent lurking like a dagger beneath the man’s calm voice.

They call him the Human Butcher, but what the hell is with that killing intent…?

But he could not back down here.

The tribespeople he had brought for this gathering, along with the Han Chinese mounted bandits, were watching his every move.

Damn it.

His honor as a chieftain clashed with his last shred of reason.

Should he draw his saber or not? As Temur wavered, a burst of laughter came to his rescue.

“Ha-ha-ha! As expected of the heroes of the world. A timid little man like me is too frightened to get involved.”

Temur looked toward the source of the laughter.

“Who are you?”

“Me?”

The middle-aged man, whose hair was half gray, smiled warmly.

If not for the eyepatch covering one eye, he would have looked as gentle as a kindhearted merchant.

“I have two names. I abandoned one when I left my homeland, while the other was given to me by friends I met on the steppe. Which one are you curious about?”

Temur did not need to answer. The Human Butcher revealed the man’s identity for him.

“Black Sand. Enough of your pointless drivel.”

“Oh, come now. What kind of person gives someone away like that? I was just getting to the fun part.”

“It wasn’t fun at all.”

“That’s why people call you a butcher. Tsk, tsk.”

As Temur and Chinggen realized who the middle-aged man was, their eyes widened.

“Black Sand? The Black Sand Band?”

“You’re that man?”

The eyepatched middle-aged man, Black Sand, nodded readily.

“That’s right. I’m Black Sand.”

“…”

“…”

The Black Sand Band. Composed entirely of Han Chinese, they ranked among the strongest powers on the harsh steppe.

There were only a hundred of them, but every single one was said to be a master of mounted combat and a martial artist of exceptional skill.

To think the leader of the Black Sand Band was such a frivolous man.

Chinggen was astounded.

So that's why that vicious Human Butcher didn't react when he was called a butcher.

Only Black Sand could get away with such a thing. Anyone else would already have had his tongue torn out and his head cut off by the Human Butcher.

But…

"Why are you here?"

As his surprise faded, Temur also gave Black Sand a suspicious look.

"I'd like to ask you the same thing."

Black Sand smiled faintly at their open wariness.

"Didn't you receive a letter?"

Temur and Chinggen both flinched.

"A letter?"

"How did you know about that?"

"Because I'm the one who sent it."

"That's impossible. The letter clearly bore the seal of the Heavenly Wind Band Leader."

Unlike the bewildered Temur, Chinggen seemed to have grasped part of the situation. He regarded Black Sand with a grave gaze.

"What is your relationship with the Heavenly Wind Band Leader? Where is he now?"

"So you're Chinggen. I've heard you're calm and sharp for a young chieftain."

"That isn't the answer I want."

"What a frightening look. How am I supposed to speak with you glaring at me like that? Still, now that you're here, there's no point keeping it secret. I'll tell you."

After that bit of banter, Black Sand continued.

"The Heavenly Wind Band Leader has been roaming around near Datong under my orders, drawing attention."

Under his orders.

The implication was obvious.

We've been completely fooled all this time.

The Heavenly Wind Band Leader was clearly Black Sand's subordinate. That meant the Heavenly Wind Band, which numbered a full five hundred, was merely an organization under the Black Sand Band.

Temur and Chinggen exchanged silent glances.

The Black Sand Band is already strong enough. And if you add the Heavenly Wind Band…?

It would be more than enough to change the balance of power on the steppe.

A deep smile spread across Black Sand's lips as he watched them.

"You two seem to have a lot on your minds."

"To be honest, this has caught us off guard."

"What exactly are you plotting?"

"Plotting? I'm simply proposing a deal that benefits us all. You would know that if you read the letter."

Temur and Chinggen recalled the letter they had received fifteen days earlier.

The letter, tied to an arrow and shot to them, contained one short line.

If you want to become a khan, come.

Khan! The ruler of the steppe, a great king commanding countless warriors.

The mere thought was enough to make their blood boil—especially for two young, powerful chieftains who dreamed of restoring their clans to glory.

"The steppe is fractured into pieces these days. It's hard to believe when you think of the glorious great empire founded by your ancestors."

Black Sand swirled his mare's-milk wine as he continued.

"If you help me, I'll help you in return. Weapons, horses, wealth. If necessary, I'll even send you some of my subordinates. Unite the fragmented steppe. Bring your enemies to their knees and force them to swear absolute obedience. I guarantee that you can become the khan of the Great Steppe within ten years."

"Easy for you to say."

Unlike the sarcastic Temur, Chinggen remained calm.

"Why us?"

"Because you're young, capable, and ambitious. Your legitimacy as descendants of the khans played a part as well. In any case, my proposal is simple."

Black Sand pushed a hard lump of dried horse dung into the dying fire. Flames leaped up, flickering in his eyes.

"Would you care to seize a city with me?"

"A city? You mean Shanxi?"

"Where else?"

Only then did the two chieftains roughly grasp his intentions. He intended to force his way into the power vacuum left by the collapse of the Mount Heng Sword Sect.

The problem was that, for all his grand talk of khans and support, his proposal held little appeal for them.

“None of you look very pleased.”

Chinggen answered with a dissatisfied look.

“If you’re thinking of raiding the north now that it has no master, wouldn’t that be difficult?”

“Why?”

“Because the Jin Family of Taiyuan is moving quickly. I’ve heard they’re establishing branches throughout the north, and the government is getting involved as well.”

Even they had a line they could not cross.

Attacking merchant caravans made them mounted bandits. Invading a city and plundering civilians would make them rebels.

If an army of tens of thousands were dispatched to suppress the rebellion, they would have no way to oppose it.

“I don’t want to be driven out of my homeland. Nor do I want to die a dog’s death like Pung Yang.”

Temur nodded at Chinggen’s words. Hot-tempered though he was, he had to acknowledge reality.

“That bastard Pung Yang never even touched the government. The Jin Family of Taiyuan’s young brats killed him.”

“Pung Yang had nearly four hundred men. Fewer than one in ten returned alive.”

The Human Butcher, who had been listening in silence, suddenly spoke.

“Pung Yang was a man who fled from the steppe. The people under him were nothing more than a bunch of ragtag strays he hastily gathered.”

“You’ve met Pung Yang?”

“Once or twice. He was nothing special. I can say this with certainty: no one here is weaker than he was. Ah, that includes that idiot, of course.”

“You bastard!”

“Lower your voice before I carve out your Adam’s apple.”

“The Han Chinese bastard is all talk. You think you can do it?”

“Of course. Right now, if you want.”

Schriing.

Just as the blades at both men’s waists slid from their sheaths—

“Oh, honestly. That’s enough.”

No one there could ignore Black Sand, whether because of his age or the power he commanded.

After the two men exchanged a tense battle of wills and sheathed their weapons at the same time, Black Sand laughed as though he found it amusing and spoke to Chinggen.

"You don't need to worry about the government. This will end as a matter between the Jin Family of Taiyuan and us."

"What do you mean?"

"If we finish the job like a bolt of lightning, before anyone has time to react, what can they do?"

"Do you think that's possible? Shanxi Province is practically in the Jin Family of Taiyuan's hands already. Even if we break through Datong, the family's main force and countless small and medium-sized sects will be waiting for us by then."

"What if we strike before they gather? And target only their heads?"

"…What?"

"In three days, on the coming New Year's Day, the heads of every sect in Shanxi Province will gather at the Jin Family of Taiyuan. We'll enter through Hequ instead of Datong, then charge straight toward Taiyuan."

"…!"

"If we keep our weapons to a minimum and secure hardy steppe horses with excellent endurance, we can easily cover five hundred li in a day.[934] We can strike the enemy in as little as two days, or three at the most."

Crossing half of Shanxi Province to strike directly at the enemy's head.

The plan was so bold—and so reckless—that Chinggen's voice trembled.

"W-Wait. What if they realize what we're doing in advance and prepare?"

"Prepare? What exactly do you mean?"

"As I said, branches of the Jin Family of Taiyuan are being established throughout the north. If we advance while fighting our way through each one, we'll lose our mobility. If we ignore them and pass by, they'll hear about us before we even arrive."

"Don't worry about that. We only need to smash one—the Hequ branch."

"Then what about the others?"

"By then, they'll be locked in a bloody battle at Datong."

"Datong… Ah. You can't mean—"

"The Heavenly Wind Band Leader will do his part. I told him to run wild without restraint on that day."

Everyone knew the Heavenly Wind Band as a major power of the northern plateau.

In both numbers and individual skill, they were at least the equal of the Red Wind Band, if not superior.

[934] In this Chinese setting, one li is 500 m (0.311 mi); five hundred li is 250 km (about 155 mi).

“In half a day, the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s branches throughout the north will be empty. With a fire burning in front of them, do you think they’ll have time to look behind them?”

Black Sand’s words were exactly right. The branches would scrape together every martial artist they had and send them to Datong to stop the Heavenly Wind Band. Taking advantage of that opening, the real main force would cross Hequ and advance south.

Trampling everything in their way beneath their horses’ hooves…

“Also, the Jin Family of Taiyuan is currently devoting all its strength to stabilizing the north. From what I’ve learned, there might not even be a hundred martial artists in the main family.”

Black Sand’s voice continued.

“This is a gathering attended by every sect in Shanxi Province. No matter how large the Jin Family of Taiyuan is, it can’t feed and house all of them. Even if you add every martial artist remaining at the main family, there may be only two hundred.”

Chinggen’s throat went dry. The forces under the people gathered here alone totaled three hundred without difficulty.

No, if they scraped together every last man, they could field twice that number.

We won’t be outmatched even in a battle between masters.

Black Sand. The Human Butcher. Temur and Chinggen.

All four gathered here were exceptional Peak masters.

According to the Human Butcher, who had personally met the late Pung Yang, not one of them was weaker than Pung Yang in martial arts.

But the Heaven Shaking Sword and the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi from the Jin Family of Taiyuan only barely defeated Pung Yang after joining forces.

That had already been confirmed as fact.

Pung Yang had even defeated the Tiger of Mount Heng, a veteran of the martial world. As a result, rumors had spread that the mounted bandits of the northern plateau were stronger than most First Rate martial artists.

This might actually…

Black Sand watched Chinggen sink into thought, amusement glinting in his eyes.

“What do you say?”

Temur, who had been listening with hard swallows, shouted.

“Damn it! How can you tell me about such a fantastic plan and then ask what I think? I’m in, no matter what!”

“I’ll accept as well.”

Chinggen finally finished thinking and agreed. The Human Butcher cut in with a vicious smile.

“I don’t need anything else. Just leave Ghost Sword Wipeng to me.”

“Of course. You have my word.”

Black Sand looked around at the three men, a broad smile covering his face.

Now that they had accepted his proposal, he had effectively become the presiding chair.

“Everything we gain from this will be divided into four equal shares. If anyone breaks that agreement, I’ll chase him to the ends of the world and cut off his head. Any objections?”

“None.”

“Me neither.”

“Keep the promise written in the letter.”

“Of course.”

Black Sand answered readily, filled an empty bowl with mare’s-milk wine, and passed it around.

“Now that we’ve sealed our resolve, let’s get thoroughly drunk today!”

“Waaaaah!”

“Let’s drink! Bring more wine!”

Cheerful shouts erupted from every corner of the inn.

They were raising their bowls amid an atmosphere as heated as the mare’s-milk wine itself when—

Creeeeak.

Amid the uproar, the inn’s door opened, and someone stepped inside.

Chapter 162

There are moments when a place bursting with noise suddenly falls silent.

This was one of them.

Creeeeak.

The inn went quiet as its old door swung open.

The four leaders had been raising a toast to their plan to turn Shanxi Province upside down. Now, their gazes—and those of the more than two hundred mounted bandits and nomads around them—all turned toward the entrance.

Step. Step. Step.

What the…?

Black Sand's eyes narrowed as the uninvited guest slowly approached.

What's with this old man?

The intruder was an old man. Quite literally, an extremely old man.

Black Sand had never seen anyone as ancient as the figure shuffling toward them.

He's practically a corpse.

He tottered as though he might collapse at any moment. His wrinkled skin looked frozen stiff, and each breath that escaped his lips was faint and shallow.

Temur, Chinggen, and the Human Butcher watched him for a moment before exchanging a few words.

"That's the oldest person I've ever seen. He's even older than our tribe's shaman."

"But what's an old man doing here? And why does he look like that?"

"He must have run into some mounted bandits."

The old man did indeed look utterly wretched. His clothes hung in tatters, as though he had suffered some terrible misfortune, exposing a body that was little more than skin and bones.

"What an unlucky old man. He barely survives, only to end up in a mounted-bandit den."

The Human Butcher clicked his tongue.

"I don't even feel like killing someone that old. Get rid of him."

"Yes, sir."

His subordinate was about to step forward when—

"Wait."

Black Sand raised a hand to stop him. His brow furrowed as he stared at the old man.

Something's strange.

Mounted bandits had built this inn. Its owner, cook, and servers were all either mounted bandits or former ones.

As the only neutral ground in Northern Gaoyuan, it sometimes hosted gatherings and reconciliations like the one taking place today.

But he came crawling into a place like this on his own? An old man like that?

Anyone who set foot in Northern Gaoyuan knew about this inn.

They also knew that any ordinary civilian who entered it was as good as dead.

"What is it?"

"Shh. Wait a moment. Something about this doesn't feel right."

Black Sand's reaction made the others notice the oddity as well.

"Come to think of it, how did he get here?"

"He looks like an outsider…"

"He couldn't have come from outside. There's no way an old man like that could have made it here in one piece."

Hundreds of mounted-bandit groups and nomadic tribes were scattered throughout Northern Gaoyuan. No one without extraordinary nerve would even consider crossing the plateau alone.

The four men, including Black Sand, fell into thought.

Could he be…?

It would be possible if he were a martial artist.

A martial artist? That old man?

He bothers me. I should kill him.

To the Human Butcher, murder was hardly different from breathing. He reached for his scabbard without hesitation, but Black Sand shot him a glare.

A thread of Sound Transmission pierced the Human Butcher's ear.

—I told you to wait. It won't be too late to act after we watch him a little longer. Haven't you ever heard that in the Murim, you should beware of women, children, and old men?

—You worry too much. Over that sickly old man?

—Don't act rashly. You never know what might happen in the Murim.

The old man looked as though a single poke would kill him.

Still, the Human Butcher could not simply ignore Black Sand's warning.

With an irritated sigh, he took his hand off his scabbard.

—Good choice.

By then, the mysterious old man had tottered all the way up to the four men.

A strange tension hung in the air. The old man looked around through hazy eyes, then opened his mouth.

"W-Water…"

At the sound of his parched voice begging for water, everyone shook their heads as if to say, Of course.

Everyone except Black Sand. Careful and calculating by nature, he refused to lower his guard until the very end.

"The elder seems thirsty. Bring him some cool water."

"Yes, sir."

A mounted bandit handed the old man a cup, and he gulped down the water as though his life depended on it. He drank so frantically that it seemed he might collapse.

Only after downing five or six cups in succession did he finally raise his head.

"Whew."

"Feeling better now?"

A broad smile spread across the old man's wrinkled face.

"Yes!"

"…"

"Thank you, mister!"

Mister?

Startled, Black Sand shot to his feet and seized the old man's wrist.

There was no resistance. No strength whatsoever. His gaunt bones felt as though they might snap under the slightest pressure.

"Elder?"

"Yes? Why?"

The old man smiled and spoke like a child. Black Sand stared at him, and his expression twisted.

"Damn it. He's senile."

All the tension drained out of him. He had definitely sensed something strange, but apparently it had all been in his head.

With such an important undertaking ahead of him, his nerves were bound to be on edge.

As Black Sand shook his head, the Human Butcher laughed at him.

"You said anything could happen in the Murim, and you were right. An old man suffering from the infirmities of old age! Ha-ha-ha!"

"Shut your mouth."

Black Sand answered curtly and started to release the old man's wrist.

That was when—

"Where the hell is this?"

His voice was sharp and clear, completely different from before. His eyes had suddenly regained their focus. He looked around, then heaved a deep sigh.

"Damn it. Once you get old, you ought to die."

It seemed he had finally returned to his senses. Laughter trickled from all around the inn at his grumbling.

Black Sand had relaxed completely as well. He let out a quiet laugh and asked,

“Elder, have you come to your senses?”

The old man answered.

“Who told a little bastard like you he could use hao-style speech with me? Are you from the Lower District Sect or something?”[935]

“…”

“And why are you holding my wrist? You trying to get fresh with me?”

“H-Hey, you.”

“Are you letting go or not? I’ll count to three. One, two, three.”

Whoosh.

Before he knew what he was doing, Black Sand had released the old man’s wrist. The sudden turn of events had left him completely bewildered.

What the hell is this old man?

The stream of coarse curses and rapid-fire words had made his body move on its own.

The man was clearly nothing more than a deranged old fool who did not know a single martial art, yet Black Sand felt as though he had been bewitched.

“Ha-ha-ha-ha! He got you good!”

The Human Butcher burst into raucous laughter. He had already resented Black Sand acting as their leader despite being a step below him in martial arts.

Seeing Black Sand humiliated by a senile old man was deeply satisfying.

“That old man has quite a mouth on him. He gave me a good laugh, so I suppose I’ll let him live.”

But the satisfied smile on the Human Butcher’s face did not last long.

A single sentence from the old man wiped it away.

“You worthless bastard… Don’t you have a mother and father?”

“…!”

The inn plunged into icy silence.

Who were Black Sand and the Human Butcher?

They were major figures who dominated the Northern Gaoyuan. Their forces were formidable, but each of them was also a Peak master capable of crushing an average mounted-bandit group with ease.

They commanded respect and fear in equal measure, yet the old man had carved them apart with a few words.

---

[935] Hao-style speech is a semi-formal Korean speech level; its name sets up the pun on the Lower District Sect’s Korean name, Haomun.

"One's a sodomite from the Lower District Sect. One grew up without parents and has only half a tongue. And as for the other two…"

The old man glanced at Temur and Chinggen, both of whom wore their hair in queues,[936] then sighed.

"You're still young, but your foreheads are already bare. How pitiful."

No one had the energy left to be surprised. Amid the atmosphere of shock and horror, the old man clicked his tongue. Then he noticed the food spread out before the four men, and his eyes widened.

"Well, damn. You've laid out one hell of a feast. I was hungry, too. Perfect."

No one had time to stop him.

The old man grabbed a well-roasted duck by one leg and ripped into it.

"Would you look at how tender that meat is? Melts right on the tongue."

Crunch, crunch.

After devouring both legs in the blink of an eye, he abruptly held out a chunk of meat to the Human Butcher, who was trembling with rage and shock.

"You're still young. Why are you shaking like that? Don't go wasting away from weakness—eat this. I don't like dry breast meat. No, I can't eat it. My teeth are bad."

Crack.

Everyone in the inn heard the same sound.

It was the sound of the last thread of the Human Butcher's reason snapping—and the death knell of a man.

"You goddamn old bastard!"

The next moment, the Human Butcher, beside himself with rage, shot upward like lightning. At the same time, crimson Sword Energy poured from the horse-chopping sword in his hand and swept across everything in front of him.

"What the hell!"

"Move!"

Kaboom!

Temur and Chinggen had barely thrown themselves aside when a thunderous explosion shook the inn.

Hundreds—thousands—of wooden fragments flew in every direction as a cloud of dust billowed through the air.

"Die! Die! Die!"

The sight sent chills down the onlookers' spines. Judging by the madness pouring from the Human Butcher, the old man could not possibly have survived. There would not be so much as a scrap of flesh left.

"How dare a senile old man—! Aaaaargh!"

[936] A queue is a hairstyle with the front of the head shaved and the remaining hair worn in a long braid.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

A relentless storm of Sword Energy continued to pour forth. The Human Butcher finally withdrew his horse-chopping sword after the time it takes to drink a cup of tea.

“Huff… huff…”

Breathing heavily, he swung his weapon through the air. The resulting pressure scattered the dust cloud, revealing ruins that had been half reduced to powder.

Just as everyone had expected, the old man was nowhere to be seen.

“He was the bravest man I’ve ever seen.”

“Farewell, elder.”

“Why did he have to provoke the Human Butcher…?”

“As expected of those Han Chinese. They’re unbelievably savage.”

The more than two hundred mounted bandits and nomads were whispering among themselves when—

Crunch, crunch. Gulp. Guh-hup!

“…”

“…”

“…”

At first, they were simply dumbfounded.

What kind of clueless bastard would be eating and drinking at a time like this?

But it took only an instant for their disbelief to turn to shock.

“T-The old man! The old man’s alive!”

“What? Where?”

“Behind us! It came from behind us!”

Someone shouted.

Then a sharp, clear voice followed, making everyone doubt their own ears.

“Young people these days have no manners. Is my name ‘old man’? Am I your friend?”

“W-Whoa!”

“That does it. I’ll teach you bastards some manners today.”

Thud-thud-thud! Whoosh!

The mounted bandits and nomads filling the inn went flying one after another.

Every one of them was hurled aside with mangled limbs and smashed faces. The sight made the leaders break out in cold sweats.

W-What is this?

How did he get over there?

I didn’t even see him move.

A master.

A master capable of deceiving the eyes of Peak masters like them.

Black Sand, Temur, and Chinggen went rigid. Only one man charged toward the old man.

“You goddamn old bastard!”

The Human Butcher had already lost all reason. Nothing could hold him back now.

The old man saw him barreling forward and frowned.

“You’re…”

“That’s right! It’s me! This time, I’ll kill you for sure!”

“So you’re the one without parents.”

“Graaaargh!”

Whoooosh!

Mount Tai Presses Down on the Crown.[937]

The horse-chopping blade, its crimson Sword Energy blazing, was about to split the crown of the old man’s head. The old man swung something.

Slice! Thud!

Time seemed to stop.

Not a single breath could be heard. Everyone stared in disbelief.

The horse-chopping sword had been cut in half.

And in the old man’s hand was something tiny.

“T-That’s…”

For the first time, sanity returned to the Human Butcher’s eyes. He stared at the old man in fear and astonishment.

“…A chicken bone?”

“No part of a chicken goes to waste. The meat tastes good, the bones make a fine broth when you simmer them long enough, and sometimes they’re even handy for wielding Sword Energy.”

Sword Energy wielded through a chicken bone.

The Human Butcher had never seen or heard of anything so bizarre.

He understood instinctively.

A master. A Supreme Peak master. Someone I could never hope to fight.

The old man looked at the stunned Human Butcher and muttered,

“Come to think of it… You’re a vicious one. The stench of blood is pouring off your entire body.”

Every word sent goose bumps crawling across the Human Butcher’s skin. He had lived his entire life as a predator, yet now he was no more than a rat before a tiger.

“Can’t leave someone like you running around…”

[937] Mount Tai is a mountain in China’s Shandong Province and one of the Five Sacred Mountains of China.

A sudden chill swept through the Human Butcher. His teeth chattered at the deadly aura seeping from the old man's entire body.

"P-Please."

"Hm?"

"Please spare me. Please…"

Tears ran down his cheeks. His trousers grew damp, and the horse-chopping sword slipped from his limp hand.

The Human Butcher had spent his life taking the lives of others. No one could believe they were now watching him beg for his own.

The old man stared at him for a moment, then spoke.

"Don't be afraid."

I'm safe. I'm alive! I escaped death!

The Human Butcher let out an involuntary sigh of relief.

That was when—

Thump.

A rough, wrinkled hand, its knuckles jutting sharply beneath the skin, pressed against his chest.

That was the end.

"…Huh?"

The world turned upside down along with his faint question. Blood poured from the seven orifices[938] of his fallen body and soaked the floor.

He said he'd spare me. Why?

As his vision dimmed and the sounds around him receded, he heard the old man speak.

"Don't be afraid. I'll send you off without pain."

The old man had told the truth.

There was no pain.

The Human Butcher.

A Peak master whose evil reputation had spread all the way to the Central Plains had died in a single move.

"Well, then…"

The old man addressed the people who had frozen in place.

"Where is this place?"

[938] The seven bodily openings are the eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouth.

Chapter 163

"What? The Northern Gaoyuan? And there are only three days left until New Year's Day?"

"Yes."

"Well, now."

The old man fell silent. Before him, the three leaders and more than two hundred of their men knelt respectfully, hanging on his every word.

"Is that really true?"

"W-We're certain."

"How could we possibly dare lie to your face?"

"…I see."

The old man's expression darkened at their desperate excuses.

He knew what they were saying was true. He had only wanted to deny it, if only a little—the fact that he was growing old.

So I was out of it for seven days and nights. Seven days and nights… It's getting longer.

It was because of the infirmities of old age.

He had first noticed the strange symptoms more than twenty years ago. While cultivating, he had felt his essence, qi, and spirit falling out of alignment and realized that time had finally caught up with him.

He was already nearing a hundred. He did not fear death, but he had no desire to be remembered as a senile old man.

Even after all that effort…

He had reached his limit. The curse of time could not be held back even by two jiazi[939] of internal energy or the Force of a Supreme Peak master.

He had managed to stave off the infirmities of old age for twenty years. He should be satisfied with that alone. The old man forced himself to cast aside his bitterness.

"Pour me a drink."

"Um, the wine has gone cold, so we're preparing a fresh batch."

At Black Sand's cautious reply, the old man clicked his tongue.

"How long will that take? Never mind. Bring me the cold wine."

"Yes."

Who would dare argue with him? At a glance from Black Sand, two burly mounted bandits hauled over a wine jar, grunting with effort.

The enormous jar, tall enough to reach a man's chest, sloshed with half-cooled mare's-milk wine.

[939] A jiazi is one sixty-year cycle in the traditional Chinese calendar; two jiazi are 120 years.

"Tsk, tsk. Young men these days are so weak. Don't you feed your men?"

"H-How could we not?"

"Then why are they struggling so much? Good grief. I can't stand watching this."

The old man sprang to his feet and snatched the jar away. Weighing several hundred geun[940] at the very least, it rose effortlessly in one hand.

It was almost impossible to believe such strength could come from a body reduced to little more than skin and bones. Black Sand wanted to gouge out his own eyes.

I must have been insane. I thought a monster like that was nothing more than a senile old man.

At least he had watched his words. The Human Butcher had swung his sword around while calling the man an old geezer, and look how horribly he had died.

Black Sand had no desire to meet the same end, bleeding from all seven orifices.[941]

"Elder! I'll do it!"

"Don't call me elder. Sit down and stop talking nonsense."

"No, no. Mare's-milk wine tastes best when it's piping hot. I'll heat it myself…"

"Piping hot, you say?"

Black Sand fell speechless.

The next moment, tremendous heat burst from the wine jar.

It came from the old man's hand gripping the jar.

White flames that made them feel suffocated and sent goose bumps crawling over their skin at the mere sight instantly heated the jar and warmed the mare's-milk wine.

"T-That's…"

"S-Samadhi True Fire?"

Temur, Chinggen, and the more than two hundred underlings were stunned by the sight before them.

The three leaders were particularly shocked.

What the hell?

He's using Samadhi True Fire on a wine jar that size?

That's an unbelievable amount of internal energy. Who is this old man?

Samadhi True Fire was a flame produced by burning internal energy. Any Peak master with sufficiently profound internal energy could use it without much difficulty.

However, the flames were weak compared to the enormous amount of internal energy they consumed, making them hopelessly inefficient in actual combat.

"Bring me a bowl. A big one."

---

[940] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Several hundred geun would weigh at least about 120 kg (264 lb).

[941] The seven orifices are the two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, and mouth.

But this old man was different.

The heat they had felt, though momentary, had been tremendous. If he wished, he seemed capable not only of harming people but of melting steel.

His martial arts and internal energy have already reached a transcendent realm.

It isn't only the Samadhi True Fire. His internal energy itself is overwhelmingly powerful Scorching Yang Qi.

Keep your mouth shut. One wrong word and… you're dead.

The three men swallowed hard and hurried about like waiters attending an honored guest.

"Allow me to pour you a drink."

"Bring meat! Meat!"

"Just tear off the legs!"

Black Sand, the Squad Leader of the Black Sand Band—known across the steppe as a harbinger of death—poured the mare's-milk wine. The two tribal chieftains, descendants of the Great Khan and commanders of hundreds of mounted warriors, circled the table, tearing off only the tender leg meat and presenting it to the old man.

It was a sight even gold could not buy.

"Mm. This is why rude bastards need a good beating. They only learn manners after someone teaches them a lesson."

"You're absolutely right, elder."

The old man, who had been washing down carefully stripped meat with mare's-milk wine, paused.

"Elder?"

"Y-Yes. Did I make some kind of mistake?"

"You're making me sound old. Like some old man who could drop dead at any moment."

Yes. You really do look like you're about to drop dead.

Black Sand barely swallowed the words before they escaped. His opponent was a peerless master whose realm he could not even begin to fathom. He had to stay on the old man's good side somehow.

"Then, big brother…"

"Do I look like a pushover?"

"I-I'm sorry!"

Bam!

Without another word, Black Sand slammed his forehead against the floor. He wanted to die. The man hated "elder" because it made him sound old, but apparently "big brother" made him sound like a pushover. What the hell was Black Sand supposed to call him?

The old man gave the prostrated Black Sand a light kick.

“Get up.”

“Yes, sir!”

“You two with the scraped foreheads as well.”

Whoosh!

Temur and Chinggen, who had been diligently stripping meat from the bones, rushed over at the speed of light and knelt.

Only after taking a long drink of mare’s-milk wine did the old man finally speak.

“So, what kind of bastards are you?”

Mounted bandits. And nomads who were little different from mounted bandits.

They had no idea what would happen if they told the truth to an old man who was clearly a senior master of the orthodox faction.

Just as the three desperately exchanged glances—

Smack! Smack! Smack!

“Ghk!”

“Gasp!”

“Argh!”

The old man struck each of them on the head with a knuckle at a speed too fast to see, then glared.

“You goddamn bastards. An adult asks you a question, and all you do is roll your eyes at each other?”

“I-I’m sorry, elder.”

“I told you not to call me elder. Are you performing some ritual to pray for my death? Huh?”

Smack!

Black Sand answered and got hit again for his trouble. He felt tears welling up. He was over fifty, and all his subordinates were watching him…

“Oldest one first. Answer me.”

Black Sand gazed at the old man with watery eyes and opened his mouth.

“I, that is… I roam the steppe with like-minded brothers, with our horses as companions…”

“So you’re a worthless mounted bandit. You loot, murder, and set fires every chance you get.”

“…”

The old man regarded Black Sand with utter contempt before turning away. Temur and Chinggen flinched and lowered their heads.

“You two call yourselves nomads, but you’re no different. Am I wrong?”

“N-No, sir.”

“You are absolutely right.”

“The only way you’re better than mounted bandits is that, although you loot and kill, at least you aren’t arsonists setting fire to everything in sight. Bastards who burn down other people’s homes deserve to be beaten to death!”

“…”

“…”

“…”

Wasn’t murder normally considered the gravest crime?

The three men tilted their heads at this strange distinction, only to be struck by another hail of blows.

Smack! Smack! Smack!

“Anyway, I have a general idea what sort of holes you crawled out of. What I want to know is how much influence you have around here.”

“Ow… What do you mean by influence?”

“Exactly what I said. Do you have any clout?”

Rubbing the tops of their heads, the three men answered carefully.

“If we join forces, there aren’t many who could stand against us.”

“Most of our people are spread across separate branch families, but if all our relatives gathered, we could easily make up dozens of tribes and still have people left over.”

“We share every piece of news from across the steppe.”

The old man’s eyes flashed at Chinggen’s final answer.

“Oh? That’s useful.”

Quick to read the situation, Chinggen realized the old man wanted information and immediately answered.

“If you need information, we’ll tell you anything you wish to know.”

“I’m looking for someone. I don’t know exactly where he is, but… he probably isn’t too far away. Can you find him?”

“Yes. If you could describe his appearance or any distinguishing features, it would be even easier.”

“Wait here.”

The old man pulled a crumpled sheet of xuan paper[942] from his robes. A fairly skilled artist appeared to have drawn it, and the face of the person he sought was clearly depicted.

“Will this do?”

Chinggen nodded without hesitation.

[942] Xuan paper is a traditional Chinese paper used for painting and calligraphy.

"Of course. With a portrait sketch as well, we should be able to start asking around immediately."

If they sent messengers in all directions and dispatched messenger eagles, they could learn the answer within fifteen days at the longest.

The steppe was vast, but no one could escape the eyes of the nomads.

Besides, every scrap of news about outsiders reaches my ears.

But Chinggen's confidence faltered at the old man's next words.

"He's a Peak master. He primarily uses a sword and palm techniques."

"…Did you say he's a Peak master?"

"Why? Doesn't that make things easier? He'll stand out wherever he goes, so you should find him quickly."

Chinggen struggled to speak.

"I-I'm sorry, but if he's a master of that level, my brothers would have noticed him long ago."

"Hmm. What do you two think?"

"I oversee a fairly wide territory myself, but I've never heard of such a master appearing."

"If Chinggen cannot find him, then neither can I."

After receiving similar answers from Black Sand and Temur, who had been sitting quietly with their shoulders hunched, the old man furrowed his brow.

"Damn that bastard. Making an old man go through all this trouble."

The three men's ears perked up at the bitterness in his mutter.

What circumstances could have driven an unidentified Supreme Peak master to search for someone personally? Especially while suffering from the infirmities of old age.

His son? Or his Disciple?

Judging by his attitude, the man had to be a blood relative or Disciple…

Black Sand felt his heart pounding. An old man standing at the end of his life was searching for someone while struggling to hold on to a mind that came and went.

Someone he had to meet before he died. A final lingering regret he had to resolve, even if it meant going to such lengths.

Could this be…?

Black Sand's thoughts raced. Perhaps he could turn the greatest crisis of his life into an opportunity.

His lips parted slightly, and Sound Transmission slipped out.

—Chinggen.

Despite the sudden Sound Transmission, Chinggen showed no reaction. As expected, he was a shrewd one.

—Are you listening? Answer me.

—Accept the old man's offer. Quickly!

—Impossible. I can't find the person he wants. If we succeed, we may earn a tremendous favor, but if we raise his hopes for nothing and fail, all we'll earn is his resentment. I have no intention of taking that risk. Nor do I want to become any more entangled with that old man.

—Find him.

—What?

—If you find him, you can obtain the old man's martial arts. Martial arts powerful enough to look down upon the entire world!

At that moment, Black Sand was utterly convinced. Whether the person was the old man's Disciple or his son, they had to find him. If they did…

We could steal not just one city, but the entire world!

He intended to blackmail a Supreme Peak master. Chinggen's lips trembled slightly as he grasped Black Sand's meaning.

—Are you insane? Greed has blinded you!

—No, it's entirely possible. You're too frightened of that old man to think clearly.

—Don't be ridiculous. Do you think he'll fall for a threat like that? He'll tear us apart before that happens!

—He's already an old man whose mind comes and goes because of his infirmities. First, we scour the surrounding area and find the bastard. Then we drag things out until the old man loses his mind again.

Even Black Sand thought it was a perfect plan. When the old man's mind was not clear, he was no different from a child.

They would wait for that moment, then subdue him. Through persuasion and threats, they would steal every bit of that powerful martial arts knowledge.

—What are you hesitating for? Accept already!

That was when an answer came.

"Yes, hurry up and accept. What are you waiting for?"

Black Sand froze.

The old man was staring at him with reddish, glowing eyes. Flames no one could possibly resist streamed from his dark, sunken pupils.

"Are you finished?"

"E-Elder."

"You aren't particularly bright, are you? You've already made me say the same thing three times."

Thud.

At that same instant, the old man's palm pierced Black Sand's abdomen. Scorching Yang Qi at its utmost burned his organs and seared his blood vessels.

"Didn't I tell you not to call me elder?"

Thump.

Black Sand collapsed as a charred lump. Chinggen closed his eyes as a voice drier than desert sand bored into his ears.

“I’ll be back in about a month.”

When Chinggen opened his eyes again, the old man was nowhere to be seen.

The old man clicked his tongue.

“Nothing has changed. Absolutely nothing has changed.”

The world he had returned to after so long was still the same. Evil men, righteous men, and those who belonged to neither side were all mixed together.

No matter who lived or died, someone always filled the empty space they left behind. The same was true of those mounted bandits. They had simply been unlucky.

“Speaking of which, the Northern Gaoyuan…”

“I certainly came a long way,” the old man muttered as he looked around.

The horizon stretched to the ends of the world. Here, where green grasslands and parched earth existed side by side, there was only one place for him to go.

I’ll leave this area to that nomad bastard and search Shanxi Province myself.

The old man began to walk. With every step, the landscape flashed past and the grasses bowed low.

His stride was leisurely, yet he moved as swiftly as a loosed arrow.

The arrow was bound for Datong, on the border between Shanxi and the Gaoyuan.

I checked my Status Window more than ten times a day, but it still made me grin every time.

Who knew the four characters meaning “Peak Master” could make me this happy?

The System calls me a master. A Peak Master.

Only a few hours ago, the Class field had read First Rate Martial Artist. But now I was a Peak Master. Not just a martial artist, but a master.

I had become a genuine master, recognized even by the System.

And I’m already Level 71.

The rewards had been incredible.

Seven level-ups, a one-stage increase in both the Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique and Qi Sense, and…

I even got something money couldn’t buy.

Open Inventory.

As soon as I entered the command in my mind, a familiar System notification chimed and a translucent holographic window appeared.

My Inventory was packed with all kinds of junk I had collected in the Murim, but my gaze went straight to one item.

Summon Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

Whoosh.

A heavy sphere suddenly popped into existence in midair. It was about the size of a bowling ball, its unpolished surface rough and jagged, with lumps jutting out in every direction.

At first glance, it looked like nothing more than a useless lump of metal or rock. But anyone who looked a little closer would recognize its true value.

Unprocessed Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron
Type: Material
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Master Artisan
Description: Ten-thousand-year-old cold iron is harder, sharper, and rarer than any other mineral in existence. Only a craftsman who has reached the level of Master Artisan will be able to work with this precious material.

"Now, this is the real deal."

Personally, I was happier about obtaining the Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron than I was about leveling up. I was a Hunter and a martial artist. Everyone in this line of work dreamed of owning great equipment.

I had simply never had the means to make that dream a reality.

I had no money in the real world, and in the Murim, I didn't have a decent spear.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan's roots lay in sword techniques, not spear techniques.

Supply followed demand. Most of the family's members, from its lowest-ranking martial artists to its leadership, were swordsmen. Naturally, both the family's martial arts and the weapons in its armory favored swords by a wide margin.

If Jin Wikyung hadn't looked out for me, I might have ended up fighting with a cheap wooden or bamboo spear.

How many times had my guts twisted whenever I swung an iron spear while leaving the [Unnamed Sword], made from Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, at my side?

But that humiliation is over now.

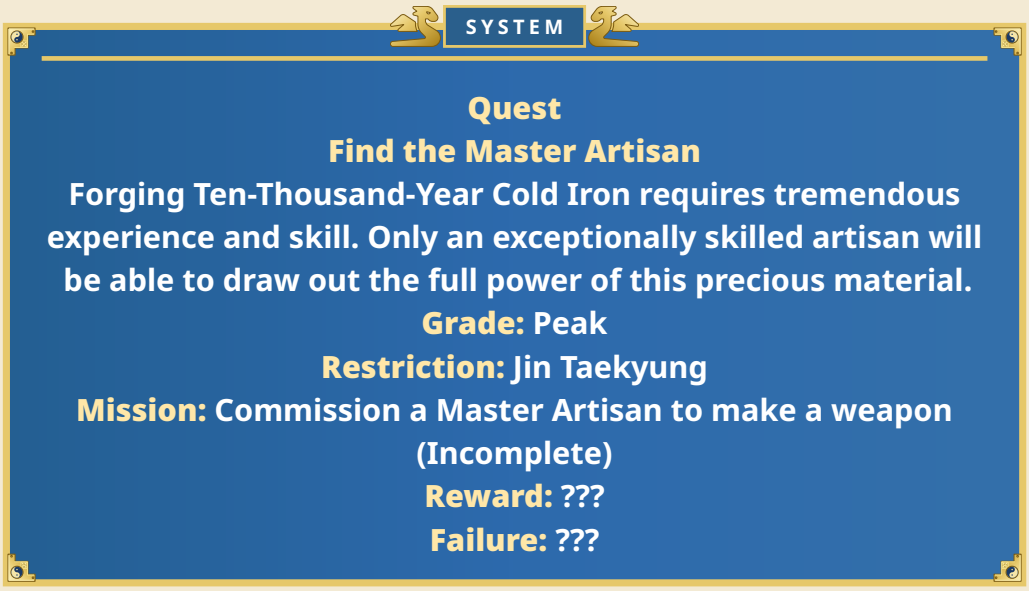
I had obtained the finest mineral in the world. Now I could have a weapon of my own made from it.

Of course, there was one prerequisite.

The Quest I had just received was related to that.

Inspect Quest.

Ding.



I smiled contentedly and closed the Quest Window.

Of course. I can't entrust something as valuable as Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron to just anyone.

Even without the Quest, I would have looked into it myself.

Just as a famed sword only revealed its true brilliance in the hands of a master, the same was true of a precious material like Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

Although the Quest was graded Peak, the mission itself didn't seem particularly difficult.

Finding someone shouldn't take long.

Surely there had to be at least one Master Artisan in this enormous land.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan had branches throughout Shanxi. If I asked Jin Wikyung to send out word, we would soon know where to find one.

And if that doesn't work, I can ask the Lower District Sect.

I even had a powerful connection in Wolhwa. With eyes and ears planted throughout Shanxi Province, finding someone like that would be a piece of cake for her.

Whatever it takes, I'm completing this Quest before I leave.

A month in the Murim was only three hours in the modern world.

I still had plenty of time.

“Hehehe. A spear made from Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. A spear made from Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron…”

Just as I was grinning from ear to ear—

Bang!

The door blew apart with a deafening crash. Someone rushed in like lightning, charging toward me with both arms spread wide.

“Youngest!”

Yep. I knew it would be you.

I let out a deep sigh and asked Jin Wikyung, “What’s going on?”

“What do you mean, what’s going on? I heard the wonderful news that you broke through the wall and rushed here at once!”

“…How did you hear about that?”

It had only happened an hour or two ago, but the speed of the information network was no joke. Had this guy attached a Familiar to me or something?

As I stared at him in bewilderment, I spotted Hyuk Mujin standing in front of the blown-open doorway with a proud smile. He rubbed beneath his nose and said, “Shouldn’t such wonderful news be delivered first by one’s closest aide?”

“…”

Not a Familiar. A Hyuk-miliar.

That bastard had definitely used my name to score points with Jin Wikyung.

“Waaah! Our youngest broke through the wall! He reached the Peak realm!”

Sure enough, Hyuk Mujin quickly cut in.

“Lesser Family Head, I stood guard over him!”

“Thank you. Truly, thank you. Your contribution was enormous!”

“Not at all. As your right arm, I merely did what I was supposed to do. I had not a shred of selfish intent. However, I noticed that the position of Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion is still vacant…”

“It’s yours without question! No, you’ll be the next Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan!”

“W-Whaaat? Is that really true?”

“…”

Of course it wasn’t, you dumbass.

Did it make any sense to appoint someone Family Head just because he had stood guard? Besides, all that bastard had actually done was snore.

But the two men, blinded by joy and power, were already out of their minds.

“Hyuk Mujin. You said your name was Hyuk Mujin, right?”

“Yes, Lesser Family Head!”

“Our Mujin can do whatever he wants! Become Family Head! Smash the Nine Sects and One Gang! Smash the world!”

"Smash!"

"...What are you smashing, you lunatics?"

The future of the Jin Family of Taiyuan looked bleak.

Once the commotion died down, Jin Wikyung finally managed to calm himself and looked at me with moist eyes.

"Your brother is proud of you."

"I'm proud of you too, Captain. But if I hadn't stood guard over you..."

"Mujin, let's keep quiet unless you want your pot cracked. And by 'pot,' I mean your head."

"Yes, sir."

Hyuk Mujin, now sporting a lump on his forehead, answered at once. As expected, he only listened after getting hit.

"Your useless older brother couldn't even look after you properly, and yet you grew up so well all on your own. Sniff."

"..."

Look at this human weapon getting all sentimental.

Whenever Jin Wikyung acted like this, I was grateful that this world had no social media. If it did, a post tagging every member of the Jin Family of Taiyuan would have gone up on Outstagram.

Complete with a teary-eyed selfie and hashtags.

Imagining the reactions from countless Shanxi Province celebrities made my vision swim.

I hurriedly pushed the horrifying thought from my mind and tried to soothe Jin Wikyung.

[943] "Is this what you call a country?" is a Korean expression of exasperation at a perceived injustice or absurdity, often used sarcastically.

“Please stop crying. How old are you?”

“Sniff. How did my immature youngest brother grow into such a fine man?”

Jin Wikyung gazed at me with a mixture of emotion and pride, then wiped the corners of his eyes with his sleeve.

“No, this won’t do. I need to go right now and…”

“You’re not planning to write ‘Jin Taekyung has become a Peak Master’ on a gigantic banner like last time, are you?”

“Gasp.”

“…”

I knew it. Judging by everything Jin Wikyung had done until now, there was no way he would let this opportunity pass. I had to make myself perfectly clear.

“Don’t do anything like that. It’s cringe.”

“Cringe? What does that mean?”

“It means embarrassing.”

Jin Wikyung looked shocked.

“Are you saying you’re embarrassed by me? By your own brother?”

“No, that’s not what I…”

This was driving me insane.

Before I could answer, Hyuk Mujin, who had been sitting quietly with his shoulders hunched, suddenly cut in with a baffled look.

“Huh? Captain, you usually like getting attention.”

“When have I ever?”

“You don’t? If I remember correctly, you seemed to love it. When we returned from the Mount Heng Sword Sect, you stood at the very front and waved like crazy.”

“…Ahem.”

If he had made that up, I would have punched him. But it was true, so I had nothing to say.

I quietly avoided Hyuk Mujin’s gaze and replied, “That was different. I had my reasons.”

“What reasons?”

“There were reasons. You don’t need to know.”

“Wow, there he goes again.”

I ignored Hyuk Mujin’s muttering and turned back to Jin Wikyung.

“Anyway, we’re not doing anything like that. The attention I’m getting now is more than enough.”

“Hmm. If that’s truly what you want…”

Jin Wikyung couldn't hide his disappointment, but I was so firm that he reluctantly nodded. That let me breathe a sigh of relief.

What's the point of advertising that I became a Peak Master? I'll only attract a whole swarm of flies.

There had been a time when I would have risked my life for Fame, but not anymore.

If anything, Fame now felt ominous.

Why does it feel like the higher my Fame gets, the stronger the people it attracts become?

My life's motto was to live a quiet, long life. Of course, living large and long would be even better, but people who tried that rarely had peaceful lives.

Constantly fighting battles where my life hung in the balance had also left me exhausted in both body and mind.

I need to make at least the bare minimum of preparations.

I planned to make one hell of a spear from the Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron and hone my martial arts. To do that, I absolutely needed Jin Wikyung's help.

"Could you do me one favor?"

Jin Wikyung was not the sort of person to refuse. He nodded confidently.

"Say the word."

"I need information."

"Information? About what, exactly?"

"Two things. First, the whereabouts of a Master Artisan skilled enough to work with Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. Second, news about the Fire King."

"The first is understandable, but the Fire King… Surely you aren't thinking of learning that?"

That referred to the Flame Divine Palm.

I had never told Jin Wikyung directly, but he already knew everything.

It made sense. The Flame Divine Palm was the Fire King's signature martial art, and touching it carelessly was no different from holding a bomb that could put the entire family at risk. I had already assumed Jin Mukyung would have reported it to Jin Wikyung, the Lesser Family Head, long ago.

"Taekyung."

Hearing the concern in his voice, I waved a hand.

"I'm not planning to learn it right away. I just want to confirm whether the Fire King is alive or dead before I decide."

"Hmm."

After a brief silence, Jin Wikyung spoke.

"Will you promise me one thing? Before you do that, you'll consult with me first."

"Yes."

“Then that’s settled.”

Jin Wikyung nodded decisively and rose from his seat.

“Information about the Fire King may take some time, but I can tell you about the first matter right now.”

Already? That was the Jin Family of Taiyuan for you. They seemed to have a handle on almost everything.

The progress was much faster than I had expected. My butt practically itched with impatience to go find the man immediately.

“He must be nearby?”

“Yes. He has been living in seclusion, hidden from everyone. Even our family only learned of his existence recently.”

“And his skill?”

“I guarantee that even if you scoured every inch under heaven, he would rank among the ten best.”

If Jin Wikyung could speak that confidently, then the man’s skill was beyond question.

A Master Artisan capable of handling Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. I had found him much faster than expected.

“I’ll go back and confirm it once more, then send word. Now, get some rest. Ho ho, you broke through the wall. A Peak Master at twenty!”

Jin Wikyung disappeared with a broad grin. Hyuk Mujin opened his mouth, looking as though his curiosity might kill him.

“What is it?”

“Hm? What is what?”

“What on earth is that ‘thing’ related to the Fire King?”

“Oh, that? The Flame Divine Palm.”

“The Flame Divine Palm?”

He looked utterly bewildered. Of course. He wasn’t a martial arts expert like Jin Mukyung, so it was only natural that he didn’t know.

“Yeah. The Flame Divine Palm. It’s the Fire King’s signature martial art.”

“…What?”

“Why are you so surprised?”

“H-How did you get it? No, before that, is it really all right to tell me something this important?”

Despite the shock and confusion on his face, I kindly answered him.

“Yeah. You even saw it yourself.”

“…What?”

“What do you mean, ‘what’? You’ve seen the Flame Divine Palm martial arts manual before. No, you didn’t just see it—you almost ended up owning it.”

“I did?”

“Yeah. Don’t you remember? Before the battle at Eight Spring Gorge, we stayed behind as the rear party. With those Samdo Sect guys—Gwak Jun or whatever his name was, and the others.”

Hyuk Mujin sank into thought, and his mouth slowly fell open.

“Don’t tell me it was that thing back then…”

“That’s the one. The thing you refused when I told you to take it.”

“…!”

“Whew. Good thing I didn’t give it to you back then.”

Hyuk Mujin’s face twisted miserably.

Chapter 165

Knock, knock, knock.

The information I had asked Jin Wikyung for arrived sooner than expected.

What surprised me was the identity of the messenger.

“Huh? What brings you here?”

“My lord said he had a letter that needed delivering, so I came.”

“You came personally?”

The man who had come to deliver Jin Wikyung’s letter was none other than Wipeng.

He stared silently at me for a while before tossing out a single remark.

“So it was true. You really crossed the wall.”

From a low hill, one could not see what lay atop a high peak. But someone standing on that peak could see everything below.

The same was true of Wipeng now.

An accomplished Peak master himself, he recognized the change in me at a glance. He regarded me with a mixture of awe and disbelief.

“How is such a thing possible?”

“Uh…”

What was I supposed to say to that?

Most people believed the ridiculous rumors about me without question, but Wipeng was different.

Along with the brothers of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, he was one of the very few people who knew the truth.

It really is absurd.

A Third Rate thug had become a Peak master in only two or three months.

Even the most open-minded person would find that impossible to comprehend. Perhaps that was precisely why people believed the rumors.

Because those actually sound more plausible.

When I hesitated, unable to answer, Wipeng waved a hand. He was probably mindful of Hyuk Mujin listening beside us as well.

“We should save that discussion for another time.”

Still looking troubled, Wipeng pulled a letter from inside his robes. It contained the information I had asked Jin Wikyung to find.

As I accepted and unfolded it, Wipeng began to explain.

“His name is Jang Taebo. Until a little over ten years ago, he belonged to the Ironcraft Guild.”

“The Ironcraft Guild?”

“It is a guild based in Hubei. Most of its members are skilled craftsmen rather than martial artists.”

In other words, it was a blacksmiths’ guild.

I asked the most important question.

“How skilled is he?”

“He was the Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild.”

“Oh.”

That brief answer told me everything I needed to know.

If he had risen to become Guild Leader in the Ironcraft Guild, which was packed with skilled craftsmen, then he was practically a Master Artisan already.

I carefully read through the information about Jang Taebo.

“He lives fairly close by, too?”

“In a village near Jeongyang. Do you remember? The place where we received Prince Shangshan’s invitation…”

“Oh, there.”

Had it been about fifteen days ago? That was where I had marched with the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s elites like a victorious general.

Hyuk Mujin, who had been listening quietly beside us, spoke up.

“If we don’t slacken the reins, we should arrive around sunset.”

“Right?”

“Yes.”

“So what are you still doing here?”

“…What?”

“Go get ready to leave. Set aside two strong horses and pack some food for the road.”

“Wait, what… Am I a servant?”

“There’s no high or low in honest work. Are you looking down on servants now? Should I call every servant in the Jin Family of Taiyuan and give you a lecture?”

“Oh, fine! I get it, so stop already!”

Unable to endure my nagging any longer, Hyuk Mujin grumbled his way out of the room. Wipeng clicked his tongue.

“Your subordinate’s attitude is terribly insolent.”

“…”

Well, from where I was standing, he wasn’t exactly one to talk.

The way you constantly hounded people to work whenever you had the chance was enough to make even a mother-in-law slap someone across the face with a bundle of kimchi.[944]

Look at this hypocrite.

Oblivious to my thoughts, Wipeng continued.

“In any case, you must return by noon tomorrow at the latest. You have not forgotten that New Year’s Day is in two days, have you?”

“Ah, right.”

The entire Jin Family of Taiyuan was already in an uproar over it. I had nearly grown used to the sight of servants and maids rushing around in a frenzy.

That was only natural. This was a grand banquet that would last at least three days, not some event that would end in a single day.

It is a pretty big deal.

It was an occasion to reaffirm the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s position as the ruler of Shanxi Province.

With so many guests arriving, everyone in the family was working day and night to ensure that nothing went wrong.

Everyone except me, of course.

“Do you really think I’ll be late? It’s only half a day away at most.”

Wipeng’s eyes narrowed.

“This is an important occasion, so I trust you will conduct yourself appropriately.”

“Your eyes say you don’t trust me at all.”

“That is a misunderstanding. A misunderstanding.”

“I’m just going to ask him for one favor and come straight back, so don’t worry.”

“Given the Third Young Master’s track record, I cannot help but worry.”

“…”

Trouble did seem to follow me wherever I went, so he wasn’t entirely wrong.

But I was a full-fledged Peak master now. I was far too grown-up to be treated like a little kid playing by the water.

“Even if I look like this—”

“I trust you were not about to say, ‘I’m a Peak master now, so stop treating me like a child by the water.‘”

Was he a ghost or something? I hurriedly swallowed the rest of my words.

“Of course not.”

“In Murim, no one knows what awaits them even a single step ahead. And be respectful toward Jang Taebo—Guild Leader Jang. The Ironcraft Guild has close ties with the Nine Sects and One Gang,[945] and its current Guild Leader is Jang Taebo’s Disciple. It would be unwise to offend him.”

---

[944] A kimchi slap is a melodramatic Korean television trope in which someone strikes another person with kimchi.

[945] The Nine Sects and One Gang is a grouping of major martial-arts organizations in the story.

“My hobby is filial piety, and my specialty is respecting the elderly.”

“I can still vividly recall the Third Young Master hurling every imaginable obscenity at the Head Elder.”

“Hey, that was different!”

“Of course. I was merely pointing it out. Why are you getting so angry? Do you think I’m a pushover now that you’re a Peak master?”

Look at those eyes. He looked ready to challenge me to a duel.

Of course, if we actually fought, I would still be the one getting beaten. I casually changed the subject.

“But aren’t you busy? You must have a lot of work piled up.”

Wipeng frowned.

“I do need to return as soon as possible. There has been suspicious activity near Datong.”

“Datong… the northern Gaoyuan?”

“I hear the mounted bandits are prowling around again.”

“How long has it even been since the Red Wind Band was crushed?”

“Precisely.”

Rubbing his dry eyes, Wipeng rose from his seat.

“Then I will be going. I suppose we will see each other again at noon tomorrow.”

Wipeng placed pointed emphasis on noon tomorrow right to the end. He was about to leave when he suddenly stopped.

“And there is something I have been meaning to ask…”

“Yes?”

Looking utterly bewildered, Wipeng pointed at the badly mangled door.

“What happened to this? It can’t have been more than a few days since it was completed.”

“Who do you think did it?”

The same person you, I, and everyone else would suspect, of course.

Wipeng appeared to realize who the culprit was. He let out a long sigh and left the room. Judging by the murderous set of his shoulders, he was clearly going to lay into Jin Wikyung.

“Well, I should get going too.”

I was on my way to have my own custom weapon made. My steps felt light enough to fly.

“Are you ready?”

In front of the stables, Hyuk Mujin was inspecting the saddles. He answered curtly.

"Not yet."

"Still?"

"Yes."

What was taking him so long?

When I approached, I saw the horse's flanks were covered in bundles. One sniff told me they were all filled with food. They were still warm, as though they had only recently been cooked.

"What's all this?"

"What do you think? Food."

"You think I'm asking because I don't know that? Huh? Why did you pack so much? Some jerky and water would've been enough."

Hyuk Mujin gave me a wounded look.

"I didn't pack it."

"If you didn't, who did?"

"Who do you think?"

Hyuk Mujin pointed behind me. A young man came racing toward us, weighed down by bundle after bundle.

The moment Cheongpung spotted me, his face lit up.

"Oh! Hello, Benefactor!"

"Ah… hello."

Sure, hello. But why are you here?

I turned a demanding look on Hyuk Mujin, and he began to explain.

"I ran into him on the way to the stables. He said he wanted to come along. What was I supposed to do?"

Cheongpung shouted enthusiastically.

"Benefactor! Take me with you! I want to go on a trip too!"

"This isn't a trip."

"Oh, really? I heard we were leaving today and coming back tomorrow…"

Did going somewhere today and returning tomorrow automatically make it a trip?

When I explained that I was going to meet a blacksmith in Jeongyang, Cheongpung's eyes lit up.

"Wow! A blacksmith!"

Hyuk Mujin and I spoke at the same time.

"You've never seen a blacksmith before, have you?"

"This must be your first time seeing a blacksmith."

"Yes, that's right! How did you know?"

"…"

"…"

It was more surprising that he didn't know.

Anyone who had spent even a single day with Cheongpung would understand exactly how I felt.

"Anyway, please take me with you."

"Well, I don't mind if you come along, but…"

"Wow!"

"Let people finish speaking, you idiot."

Ugh, this was exhausting. Was this what extrovert energy felt like?

Already feeling tired, I leaped onto my saddle. I also made sure to remove the securely tied food bundles ahead of time.

One dropped to the ground with a thud, and Cheongpung screamed.

"Ah! That's five-spice pork!"

"Why did you pack five-spice pork? I told you we'd be back soon!"

"No! My five-spice pork!"

"…Fuck."

It wasn't even mine.

Cheongpung insisted on gathering every last bundle, then grinned.

"Now let's go!"

I really do want to go. Just without you.

Clicking my tongue inwardly, I took hold of the reins and set off.

Then I had to listen to him chewing behind me until the sun went down.

Winter days were short.

As the sun vanished beyond the plateau's horizon, a dry voice slipped between the huge man's lips.

"It is time."

No sooner had he finished speaking than hundreds of silhouettes stirred in the darkness.

Draped in the hides of all manner of beasts, they mounted their horses, armed with curved sabers, sandalwood bows, and lances.

Within moments, a cavalry force of some four hundred riders had formed before the huge man. His parched voice rang out once more.

"Our task is simple."

His eyes gleamed dangerously. The veins bulging along his forearms and the breath steaming from his lips made him look like a wild beast.

"To kill and trample."

Low laughter rose here and there.

Their leader had given them permission to run wild. The roughly four hundred mounted bandits of the Heavenly Wind Band trembled with excitement.

The sight brought a satisfied smile to the huge man's face.

At last, I can do this properly.

The plan devised by his sworn elder brother, Black Sand, was brilliant.

Of course, what he liked most was that he only had to slaughter and plunder the enemies before him without thinking.

His role was the most important—and the simplest.

My blood is boiling.

These men were nothing like the ragtag forces of the Red Wind Band and the other dregs they had scraped together from far and wide.

They had eaten from the same pot and fought side by side for over a decade. They were seasoned elites, veterans of a hundred battles.

Heh heh. Just wait. Jin Family of Taiyuan or not, I'll trample every last one of you.

A thunderous roar erupted from the Heavenly Wind Band Leader's mouth.

"Go! Kill and plunder them all! Slaughter and burn everything in sight!"

"Waaaaah!"

"Let's go!"

The roughly four hundred mounted bandits, wild with excitement, had just turned their horses south when—

"You goddamn sons of bitches. What the hell do you think you're burning?"

A diminutive figure emerged with a sharp, ringing voice.

The unidentified old man's hand shone a blinding white.

Chapter 166

Old Man Jang's daily routine was simple: eat, sleep, and shit.

Every now and then, he visited a pleasure house or an inn for a drink, or sat in on a gambling game and played dominoes, but he spent most of his time at home.

By now, the villagers had grown accustomed to him. They would sometimes ask,

"Don't you get lonely?"

But Old Man Jang's answer was always firm.

"Don't talk nonsense."

People whispered that the solitary old man only said that out of pride, but he meant every word.

Life couldn't be more comfortable.

He slept when he was tired, ate when he was hungry, and shit when he needed to.

Some might mock him for living like a beast, but Old Man Jang had more than earned the right.

No—he felt even that was insufficient.

After the life I've lived.

He had spent an entire jiazi[946] before vats of boiling molten iron.

Once he started something, he had to see it through to the end. He had forgotten people and love alike. The anvil and hammer had been his friends and lovers.

I lived like a man possessed.

Then one day, he came to his senses and found that his hair had turned white and his vision had grown dim.

He had become one of the finest smiths under heaven and the Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild, but that was all.

No matter how many times he brought down his hammer, he could not fill the emptiness in his heart.

In the end, he decided to retire. And so Jang Taebo, the Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild, became Old Man Jang.

"Grandpa!"

"Uh, hm?"

Old Man Jang jerked out of his reverie. He had been squatting in the yard, staring blankly into space.

A little boy from the neighboring house was looking at him with enormous eyes.

"What are you thinking about?"

"I was thinking that if you used polite speech, I might give you a piece of candy."

"What are you thinking about, Grandpa?"

[946] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

"…What a sly little brat. Here."

"Tank you!"

Old Man Jang watched the boy busily suck on the candy.

He had known the child since he was a newborn. At first, the boy had been a nuisance, constantly clinging to him and calling him Grandpa. Then, at some point, Old Man Jang had found himself carrying snacks around for him.

Well, this isn't so bad either.

For a blunt and prickly old man like him, the boy was his only real conversation partner.

Looking at the child sometimes made him wonder what it might have been like to have a family of his own.

"Would you like another one?"

"Yeah, yeah!"

"Ahem. Polite speech."

"Yes!"

"Eat them slowly so you don't ruin your teeth. Understand?"

"Yeah!"

"…That polite speech didn't last long."

After licking two pieces of candy clean in the blink of an eye, the boy suddenly spoke.

"Oh, right. Grandpa."

"What is it?"

"What's your name?"

"You should ask an elder's name more respectfully… No, never mind. Why do you suddenly want to know?"

"Hmm, I was just curious."

"Hmm."

"I asked Mom and Dad too, but they said they didn't know your name. Nobody knows."

Though he had settled here more than ten years ago, Old Man Jang had never revealed his name to anyone.

He had been worried that flies might start buzzing around him. No—mere flies would have been a blessing.

Skilled smiths were needed everywhere, especially by Murim sects whose members would stake their lives on their weapons. If his identity became known, his remaining years would be anything but peaceful.

"Grandpa, aren't you going to tell me?"

Old Man Jang looked into the boy's large, innocent eyes.

Well, it should be safe to tell him a little.

He was too young to understand what any of it meant. Besides, a few more pieces of candy would distract him, and he would soon forget.

Old Man Jang only had to conceal enough to keep his identity hidden.

“I’ll tell you one character of my name. It’s Bo.”

“Your family name is Jang, so… are you Jang Bo?”

“No. I said my name ends in Bo.”

“What’s the other character?”

“Curious, are you?”

“Yeah!”

“Fine. Use polite speech properly for the next month, and I’ll think about telling you.”

“Wow, that’s mean.”

Old Man Jang let out a quiet laugh as the boy puffed out his cheeks.

“Hng. Can’t you just tell me? I need to know so I can eat something tasty.”

“…?”

“Whew. I guess it can’t be helped.”

What was that supposed to mean?

As Old Man Jang wondered, the boy heaved a sigh like an old man and sprang to his feet.

“Where are you going?”

“I’ll come back later!”

“Don’t bother. The sun’s already down, you brat. Go home and sleep!”

“I don’t want to!”

For someone with such short legs, the boy had boundless energy. He quickly disappeared in the opposite direction from his house.

“That boy never listens.”

Muttering under his breath, Old Man Jang hauled his stiff body upright.

Until about ten years ago, he had still been able to manage well enough. But once he began losing muscle, his joints started aching all over.

“Good grief. I’d better warm up the room.”

He fed firewood into the firebox and lit the brazier.

After puttering around for a while, he stepped outside to use the privy before bed.

That was when—

“Grandpa!”

The boy’s innocent cry rang out.

But Old Man Jang did not hear it.

His seasoned gaze was fixed on the three large men standing behind the child.

Martial artists?

The sun had already set, leaving their faces hidden in darkness, but he could clearly make out the sword sheaths protruding from their waists.

He had made countless such objects himself.

Without taking his eyes off the men, Old Man Jang beckoned to the boy.

“Hanga, come here.”

“Yeah!”

Now that he looked, the boy was clutching a large bundle to his chest. It radiated warmth and gave off an appetizing smell.

Having roughly grasped the situation, Old Man Jang glared at the figures in the darkness.

“Who are you?”

A spark snapped in the darkness, then flared to life. The fire starter in someone’s hand illuminated the three men’s faces.

They were all young men around twenty. One stepped forward.

“My goodness. Good evening.”

He had a handsome face and a sly smile.

Old Man Jang studied the vaguely familiar face before speaking.

“Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?”

He had seen that face from a distance about half a month ago.

The young man, Jin Taekyung, broke into a wide grin.

“Oh, you know the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. That’s me. Hahaha.”

“An old man named Jang?”

“Yes. I was told he definitely lived in this village.”

“Well, there are so many of them. There must be twenty old men with the family name Jang.”

“He’s around eighty…”

“They all suffered when they were young, so they’ve all aged about the same. Mr. Jang next door is fifty, but he looks a hundred and fifty.”

“…”

“Anyway, they’re all like that.”

“Um, he lives alone, and his name is…”

“Who bothers remembering everyone’s name? Once they get old, they’re all just Old Man Jang. Plenty of people live alone too. War, drought, epidemics… Whew.”

“…”

Damn it. We had arrived before sunset, only to run into trouble immediately.

I had wondered why such a tiny village had so many old men named Jang. It turned out to be a clan village.[947] Half the people we passed on the road had the family name Jang.

"Do you know where he lives?"

As Hyuk Mujin grew frustrated, I waved the letter containing the information in front of him.

"No. It only says he lives here. I guess they thought we'd find him quickly since it's a small village."

Cheongpung pulled some meat from his bundle and began tearing into it.

"Chomp, chomp, chomp."

"Then how are we supposed to find him? Jang is already a common family name."

"We'll have to find out for ourselves. There are only a few hundred people here, and he's an old man, so we should locate him quickly."

"Chomp, chomp, chomp."

"…"

"…"

That bastard Cheongpung had done nothing but eat this whole time.

Then again, maybe that could work in my favor. I was just about to give up and ask him for a piece of meat when—

"Oh, the grandpa who lives three houses down from us is a Jang too."

The speaker was a little boy whose head barely reached my waist. With his enormous eyes, he was pretty cute.

I ruffled his shaggy hair.

"Really?"

"Yeah. He's Grandpa Jang."

"Really?"

I played along, though I wasn't expecting much. The woman selling vegetables at the roadside stall was a Jang, and so was the butcher over there. In a clan village crawling with Jangs, what were the odds?

The boy sniffed and continued.

"Grandpa is always alone. He doesn't have a family, so I go play with him."

"Oh, you little rascal. That's kind of you—wait. He doesn't have a family?"

"Yeah! I asked Mom, and she said he'd been alone ever since he first came here."

"Since he first came here? He isn't originally from this village?"

The boy nodded vigorously.

"My dad told me Grandpa came from somewhere else. Since he came from outside, he doesn't have any friends or family."

[947] A clan village is a settlement where many households share the same family name and ancestral lineage.

"I see."

Hyuk Mujin and I exchanged glances. This sounded promising, but it was hardly conclusive.

"Little one, do you know his name?"

"Do you know anything else about him?"

"I don't know his name. He's just Grandpa Jang."

It seemed that was all the boy knew. Hyuk Mujin asked with an eerily kind smile,

"Little one, could you tell us where he lives?"

"Waaay over there. At the edge of the village."

As expected of the continent. This damn village was absurdly large for its population.

Hyuk Mujin roughly gauged the distance before turning to me.

"It'll take about fifteen minutes."

Even on horseback, it would take that long. I shook my head.

"What if he isn't the one? Let's search nearby first and work our way over there."

"Yes, that's probably better. Aside from the fact that he came from elsewhere, there's nothing that really marks him as the man we're looking for."

Cheongpung nodded.

"Chomp. Chomp. Chomp."

"…"

"…"

While I wondered whether I should simply hurl away that food bundle, the boy boldly held out both his little hands toward Cheongpung.

"Hmm?"

"Grandpa Jang said there's no such thing as a favor without a price."

The kid already understood how the world worked.

He had given us information, so now he wanted a bite in return. That Grandpa Jang or whatever his name was sure had taught a fine lesson to a child of five or six.

"Wow, my grandfather said something similar. Here."

"Wow! Thank you!"

Look at them, united under the banner of grandfathers.

Cheongpung casually handed him a large leg of meat. He had been periodically warming the food with the Zaha Divine Technique, which was based on Scorching Yang Qi, so the meat was still hot.

He's using the Zaha Divine Technique to heat meat?

The boy happily tore into the meat, then looked at us with naked longing in his eyes.

"By the way, I need to go home anyway. And on the way back, I'm going to visit Grandpa Jang three houses down."

"Oh, really?"

I immediately understood what he meant. When you were desperate, you would borrow even a cat's paw. Why not a child's?

"Then could you ask Grandpa Jang his name? Meet us back here in half a shichen.[948]"

"Hmm. I think I'll be even hungrier by then."

"See those food bundles? I'll give you a whole one."

"Really?"

The boy's eyes lit up, but then he hesitated.

"Why are you looking for Grandpa Jang?"

"It's nothing serious. We just have a favor to ask him."

"You're not bad people, are you?"

Introducing myself as the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi from the Jin Family of Taiyuan would only draw a crowd. I gave him my most innocent smile.

"Of course not."

"Ugh. Why are you smiling like such a bad person?"

"…"

Should I just smack him on the head and send him away?

Hyuk Mujin stepped in on my behalf.

"I'll give you two bundles."

"So you were good people after all. I'll be back!"

The child was already becoming a monster born of capitalism.

Hyuk Mujin shrugged.

"Where should we start looking?"

"Search everything from the nearest entrance onward."

"That'll take half a shichen.[949]"

Hyuk Mujin was wrong. It took us more than half a shichen[950] to search half the village.

Then the boy returned with an extremely valuable clue.

If his name starts with Jang and ends with Bo…

The former Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild, Jang Taebo.

That had to be him.

[948] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.
[949] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.
[950] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

“Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?”

“Oh, you know the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. That’s me. Hahaha.”

The fact that he knew who I was was a good sign. It felt strange to say this about myself, but wasn’t the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi practically Shanxi Province’s idol?

If this world had internet access, I would already have a fan club.

“I’m sorry to visit so late at night. The thing is, I have a favor to ask…”

“There’s no need.”

“Pardon?”

Jang Taebo was over eighty, but he still had a sturdy build. He fixed me with a cantankerous stare.

“I won’t accept the commission anyway.”

“Still, you should at least hear what it is…”

“No!”

Well, that was decisive.

Chapter 167

"No!"

What a set of lungs.

The shout rang out so loudly that it belied the speaker's eighty years, and Cheongpung gulped down whatever was in his mouth.

"Benefactor, he really doesn't want to do it, does he?"

I heard him, you idiot.

I'd heard he was pretty cantankerous, but I hadn't expected this.

Still, if a few shouts were enough to make me back down, I never would have come this far in the first place. I calmly tried again.

"Elder, please calm down and hear me out—"

"What is there to hear? You want me to make you a weapon, don't you?"

"Uh, well, yes."

"You barge in on an old man who retired ten years ago, in the middle of the night no less, and ask him to make you something meant for killing people?"

Jang Taebo glared and shouted,

"Get out of my sight this instant!"

"Waaah!"

At the sound of yet another shout, the little boy in Jang Taebo's arms burst into tears.

Holding the fire starter, Hyuk Mujin muttered quietly enough that only I could hear him.

"What a temper on that old man…"

I agreed, though it was also true that I'd been in too much of a hurry.

Judging by the way things were going, he wouldn't accept my commission even if I died and came back to life.

This is a problem.

I had to be back by tomorrow for the New Year's Day banquet.

As I hesitated, villagers alarmed by the commotion began poking their heads out of their doors one by one.

"What's all this racket?"

"That was Old Man Jang's voice, wasn't it? I heard Hanga crying next door, too."

"Elder, is something wrong over there?"

There was nothing to gain from having our identities exposed here. No—in fact, they were the ones who stood to lose.

Jang Taebo frowned.

“It’s nothing. Seems some young men got dead drunk and came to the wrong house.”

“Tsk, tsk. Young people these days are all like that. If you need any help…”

“Your concern is enough.”

At his firm reply, the open doors closed one by one, and the murmuring voices abruptly fell silent.

When the surroundings grew quiet, Jang Taebo fixed us with his bulging eyes.

“Go home. And don’t come back.”

His tone was gentler than before, and his voice had dropped, but icicles still seemed to fall from every word.

There was nothing to be done. I turned away and bowed toward Jang Taebo’s back as he soothed the whimpering child.

“I’ll come see you again tomorrow.”

“You’re hard of hearing, aren’t you? Didn’t you hear what I just said?”

“…Then we’ll be going.”

I was about to leave when another thought occurred to me, something that might move him even a little.

“I truly need the help of a Master Artisan. That’s why I came to find you, elder.”

But Jang Taebo answered without even looking back.

“Go west for one shichen[951] and you’ll find a large village with a smithy. The owner there is fairly skilled.”

“Is he skilled enough to forge Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron?”

Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron—a mysterious mineral imbued with supernatural properties, the hardest and sharpest material in the world, capable of withstanding even Sword Energy.

It was so valuable and rare that even highly skilled blacksmiths could go their entire lives without ever laying eyes on it.

If anything could pique his interest, it would be Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

But Jang Taebo’s reaction fell far short of my expectations.

“Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron? Then go to the Ironcraft Guild. Leave it with that Guild Leader fellow, and he should do a passable job. He learned a thing or two by watching me work.”

The indifference in his voice told me everything.

To him now, even a legendary metal like Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron was no different from copper.

[951] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

It was an unmistakable dismissal. I had no choice but to turn away. Hyuk Mujin and Cheongpung followed me.

“What are you going to do?”

“What do you mean? I’ll keep pestering him until tomorrow.”

“Chomp, chomp, chomp.”

“He’s not just stubborn… By the way, where did you get the Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron?”

“That’s a long story.”

“Chomp, chomp, chomp.”

“…”

“…”

Cheongpung cautiously studied the looks Hyuk Mujin and I were giving him, then held out a bundle.

“Would either of you like some? There’s still plenty left.”

We shouted in unison.

“We’re not eating it!”

We spent the night at a half-collapsed inn. As the only inn in the small village, it was old and shabby in every possible way, but it did have one advantage.

The innkeeper was a local who had lived in the Jang clan village for forty years.

He had been wary of the three of us, dressed as martial artists, but the moment I pressed a silver nyang[952] into his hand, his grin stretched from ear to ear.

“Old Man Jang?”

“Yes. The man who lives over the hill.”

The innkeeper immediately nodded.

“Ah, of course I know him. He comes to our inn from time to time.”

“Does he?”

“Yes. Sometimes he drinks by himself, and sometimes he joins a gambling game.”

“He likes gambling?”

“Not exactly. I think he only does it to pass the time. Usually, he barely leaves his house once every seven days.”

“He’s a homebody.”

“Pardon?”

“Nothing. I was talking to myself. Is he any good at gambling?”

The innkeeper thought for a moment before answering.

[952] A nyang is a traditional unit of weight and currency; here, it denotes an amount of silver used as payment.

“He’s about average. If anything, he tends to lose a little each time. But considering he keeps coming despite not working for a living, I suppose he must have made a fortune in his youth.”

That made sense. Geeks never spared any expense when it came to their obsessions.

Every martial artist was a weapon geek in one way or another, and Jang Taebo was one of the best custom weapon makers in the world.

He had clearly earned more money than most.

So luring him with money is out?

I’d suspected as much after last night, but the man really was difficult.

A deal only worked when you could satisfy something the other party wanted, and Jang Taebo seemed quite content with his current life.

“Is there anything else? Does he ever make things, for example?”

“Make things?”

“You know, like kitchen knives or pickaxes.”

A repetitive life eventually became a habit. That had to be especially true of someone like Jang Taebo, who had spent his entire life working with fire and iron.

If I were in his position, I’d be too restless to sit still.

But the innkeeper gave me a strange look.

“Old Man Jang? He hates moving so much that he pays the Escort Bureau extra to deliver his winter firewood. I’ve never heard of him making anything.”

“…”

Escort Bureau rocket delivery, huh?

A homebody with a severe case of laziness. There wasn’t a single opening to exploit.

Hyuk Mujin and Cheongpung, who had been listening while they ate breakfast, suddenly joined in.

“He’s completely impenetrable.”

“Chomp, chomp. Wow, I’ve never seen anyone like that before.”

“…I’ve never seen anyone like you before, either.”

One of the inn’s flaws was that the food was absolutely terrible.

The state of the owner’s hands alone raised serious questions about the place’s hygiene, but Cheongpung swept up the remaining food as though none of that mattered.

“Is it good?”

“Yes! When I lived with Grandpa, all I ate was grass and fasting pills every day.”

“Ah, fasting pills.”

That, I could understand. I'd rather make pancakes out of Jinho hyung's[953] vomit than eat those.

"…"

"Captain, why do you look like that?"

"Munch, munch. Benefactor, is something wrong?"

"…No. My stomach just feels a little queasy."

On second thought, even that was going too far.

I rose from my seat after watching Cheongpung clean out the last plate.

"All right, let's go."

"Already? It's only between seven and nine in the morning."

"Can I have just one more dumpling?"

The innkeeper quickly cut in.

"Old Man Jang is getting on in years, so he doesn't sleep late in the morning. And I'll pack the dumplings for you right now."

"There. Happy?"

I handed the innkeeper another silver nyang[954]. He stood in front of the inn and waved until we disappeared from view.

"Elder, did you sleep well?"

Jang Taebo was standing in the courtyard. When he saw us, he frowned. More precisely, he frowned when he saw me.

"I believe I told you not to come back."

"Could I really just leave after coming all this way?"

I gave him an easygoing smile.

Back when I was a lowest-level Hunter, people had hurled obscenities right to my face. This was nothing.

"It felt wrong to come empty-handed, so I brought you a small gift."

"Hmm?"

"The innkeeper was quite talkative. Apparently, an acquaintance of his dug up a thirty-year-old He Shou Wu[955] not long ago."

He Shou Wu was still used as a medicinal herb in the modern world.

Century-old and millennium-old He Shou Wu appeared all the time in martial arts novels, but here, even finding a thirty-year-old specimen was said to be as difficult as plucking a star from the sky.

---

[953] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male friend.

[954] A nyang is a traditional unit of weight and currency; here, it denotes an amount of silver used as payment.

[955] He Shou Wu is a traditional medicinal herb made from the tuberous root of Polygonum multiflorum.

In other words, it was hard to find in this area even if you had money.

“A thirty-year-old He Shou Wu… So?”

“I was worried you might be feeling weak lately. It made me think of you, so I brought it along.”

Jinho hyung[956] was always saying that the body started breaking down once a person passed thirty.

Your eyes got dry, your stomach started burning, and the day after you lent someone a USB, you could barely stand on your own legs.

If that was what happened to Jinho hyung[957] in the prime of his life, how much worse must it be for the elderly? A thirty-year-old He Shou Wu was perfect for looking after one’s health.

“Hmm. Why don’t you eat it?”

“Oh, goodness, me? No, no. I brought it for you, elder.”

The bait had caught his interest.

Feeling a tug on the line, I held out the He Shou Wu.

Properly consumed, it could provide about a year’s worth of internal energy, but I didn’t begrudge it in the slightest.

“Please, eat it. They say it’s best to chew it raw, roots and all.”

“Hmm. Should I?”

Yes, hurry up and eat it, then spit out a Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron spear.

At my bright smile, Jang Taebo popped the He Shou Wu into his mouth and began chewing noisily. The atmosphere was completely different from last night.

Oh, this is looking good.

If I coaxed him gently while the atmosphere was this pleasant, then submitted my commission…!

But the next moment, I heard the sound of my hopeful future being abruptly cut off.

“Ptooey!”

“…?”

“…?”

“…?”

Hyuk Mujin, Cheongpung, and I stared at the half-chewed He Shou Wu lying on the ground.

He spat it out? A thirty-year-old He Shou Wu? Why?

When we stared at him in confusion, Jang Taebo asked as though nothing had happened.

“Why are you looking at me like that? Is something wrong?”

---

[956] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male friend.

[957] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male friend.

"...Why did you spit it out?"

"It's bitter."

"Pardon?"

"I said it's bitter."

His unabashed answer left me speechless.

What kind of bullshit was that?

"Of course it's bitter. It's good for you."

"Tsk, tsk. You've never eaten He Shou Wu before, have you?"

"...No."

I had eaten Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng once, but I hadn't been in my own body at the time, so I couldn't say.

When I found myself agreeing, Jang Taebo rummaged through his robes and tossed something at me.

"What is this?"

I caught it and found myself holding a wooden box about the size of a pencil case. Jang Taebo gave me a scornful smile.

"Open it."

For a man who only gambled occasionally, he sounded exactly like a cardsharp.

I opened the wooden box with an inexplicable sense of tension.

"A fake! ...Wait, no, it's He Shou Wu?"

He Shou Wu?

And not just any He Shou Wu.

Its body and roots were thicker than those of the He Shou Wu I'd given Jang Taebo moments ago.

A fragrant scent struck my nose.

Even a thirty-year-old specimen was supposed to be difficult to obtain. Where on earth had he gotten one that was fifty years old?

I was too dumbfounded to speak. Jang Taebo gave me a triumphant smile.

"It comes through the Nine-Room Escort Bureau once every four months. The head of the bureau owes me a favor. He knows how to keep his mouth shut, too."

"…I see."

So it was a regular delivery from the Nine-Room Escort Bureau. No wonder the old man looked healthier than most young men.

"Enough with these transparent tricks. I'm a man who no longer needs anything."

"You certainly seem that way."

He had money saved up and had achieved professional success.

He even had a full head of hair.

The only thing he lacked was a family—but if I offered to introduce him to a pretty old lady, he'd probably try to kill me.

"What would it take for you to accept my commission?"

Jang Taebo dug his pinky into his ear.

"Bring me the Herb of Eternal Youth, and I'll think about it."

"Pardon?"

"You didn't hear me? The Herb of Eternal Youth. The spirit herb said to grant eternal youth and immortality."

You rejected the Quest.

Just look at this damn quest. Even its Grade was nothing but question marks.

What? "If you have about a thousand years left to live, it might not be a bad idea to give it a try"?

What kind of bullshit was that?

At my incredulous stare, Jang Taebo stroked his beard.

"What? Can't you do it?"

"...How exactly am I supposed to do that?"

"Then forget it. Give me back the He Shou Wu.[958]"

Jang Taebo snatched the He Shou Wu[959] from my hand and began chewing it with a crisp crunch.

"Oh, it's sweet. Just what you'd expect from a fifty-year-old specimen."

"..."

"Hm? Are you all still standing there? Did you need something?"

[959] He Shou Wu is a plant used in traditional Chinese medicine.

“No, elder.”

“Why?”

“Does asking someone to bring you the Herb of Eternal Youth sound remotely reasonable?”

“It’s been a long time since I met someone who cared about common sense in the Murim. There’s Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng, so why wouldn’t there be an Herb of Eternal Youth?”

“…”

That sounded surprisingly plausible.

I almost let myself be persuaded, but quickly came to my senses. Somehow, I had to convince this old man who seemed impervious even to a needle.

“If there’s anything else you need, I’ll get it for you. Anything you want. Just not something like the Herb of Eternal Youth.”

“Really?”

“Of course. If necessary, I’ll mobilize the full strength of my family.”

“Hm. I’ve heard plenty about how formidable the Jin Family of Taiyuan has become these days.”

Jang Taebo nodded and opened his mouth.

“Then I’m thirsty. Bring me a bottle of gongcheong seokyu.[960]”

“Pardon?”

Gongcheong seokyu[961]? The stuff said to grant a jiazi[962] of internal energy with a single drop?

I barely stopped myself from letting loose a stream of profanity. Jang Taebo continued with a sly grin.

“You said you wanted to make a weapon out of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, didn’t you? Then you’ll need a fine scabbard, too. I hear there’s a dragon at the end of the world. Pull out one of its claws and bring it back. And while you’re at it, bring me a dragon pearl.”

Feeling my insides boil, I closed the Quest window. Hyuk Mujin covered his mouth and whispered,

“I think the old man’s senile.”

“I can hear you. You wet-behind-the-ears brat certainly have a lot to say.”

Just as Jang Taebo began waving a fist the size of a pot lid, Cheongpung thrust his hand into the air and shouted,

“I’ll go find them! Let me do it!”

“What?”

“The Herb of Eternal Youth! Gongcheong seokyu[963]! A dragon!”

At last, the neighborhood’s resident lunatic had stepped forward.

His eyes sparkled like morning stars, and his every gesture burned with enthusiasm. Faced with Cheongpung’s intensity, Jang Taebo flinched and took a step back.

“Who are you?”

Cheongpung answered energetically,

“I’m my grandpa’s grandson!”

“Who’s your grandfather?”

“My grandpa!”

“…What a lunatic.”

Welcome. First time dealing with Cheongpung?

As Jang Taebo shook his head from side to side, I casually added,

“Do you happen to know Great Hero Mae Jonghak?”

“Though I’m not a martial artist, I’ve spent my entire life with one foot in the Murim. Do you think I wouldn’t know the Sword Saint, whom even butchers have heard of?”

“That friend is the disciple personally raised and taught by the Sword Saint.”

“What? Is that true?”

“Why would I lie? Especially while staking the name of someone as distinguished as the Sword Saint?”

“Hah. So he’s the Sword Saint’s successor…”

Had that worked? No matter where you went in the world, connections were king: school ties, hometown ties, and blood ties.

In the Murim, the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak’s very existence inspired respect and awe.

Jang Taebo stared at Cheongpung in evident surprise, then opened his mouth.

[963] Gongcheong seokyu is a rare martial-arts elixir. Its Korean name also carries a petroleum-related pun.

“So what do you want me to do about it?”

“Ah…”

“I have nothing to do with Huashan. Well, I did make a sword at the request of the current Sect Leader of Huashan, Heavenly Sword True Person,[964] about thirty years ago. But that’s all.”

His firm voice continued.

“I’m eighty years old. I’m still in good health, and I’ve accumulated plenty of wealth. As a man who has worked iron all his life, I can proudly say that I rank among the top three in the world.”

“That’s why I’m asking you.”

“That’s why I’m refusing you. I’ve finished all the work I care to do. I’ve made swords until I’m sick of them.”

“I use a spear.”

“Oh, did you?”

“Yes.”

“A spear would take even more work. I’d rather make a sword.”

“Elder!”

I grabbed Jang Taebo’s hand and gave him an earnest look.

“Couldn’t you think of it as something to pass the time and help me just this once?”

“When did I say I wouldn’t?”

“You just said you wouldn’t.”

Jang Taebo harshly shook off my hand.

“I said I’d help you. If you bring me the Herb of Eternal Youth.”

“Oh, please.”

“Bring me the gongcheong seokyu[965] and dragon pearl while you’re at it. I hear that when fighting a dragon, you should avoid its tail, circle around behind it, and choke its neck. I’m telling you so you don’t get hurt.”

“…A dragon isn’t a person. How am I supposed to kill it by choking it?”

“Then burst its balls.”

“What if it’s female?”

“See you in the next life.”

I had finally met a formidable opponent.

His way of screwing with people had been honed over decades. My fists trembled, and the back of my head throbbed.

“Are you really going to be like this?”

[964] “Heavenly Sword True Person” is a Taoist-style title; “True Person” is an honorific for someone regarded as spiritually accomplished.

[965] Gongcheong seokyu is a rare martial-arts elixir. Its Korean name also carries a petroleum-related pun.

“That is precisely how I’m going to be.”

“I didn’t want to go this far…”

“Go on. Spit it out.”

“Should I spread the word that the former Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild lives here?”

I was only saying it. Obviously, I had no intention of actually doing it.

But Jang Taebo merely grinned at my threat to make his life difficult.

“Then I suppose I have no choice. I’ll have to return to the Ironcraft Guild before all sorts of gnats start swarming around.”

“Huh?”

This wasn’t how it was supposed to go. As I was thinking that, Jang Taebo asked,

“If I return to the Ironcraft Guild, what do you think I’ll do?”

“…How would I know?”

“I’ll devote the rest of my life to making ten weapons. Then I’ll distribute those weapons, each made with all my heart and soul, to the leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang,[966] while having in-depth conversations with them about the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Your name will come up quite a lot, especially.”

“W-What are you planning to tell them?”

“I’ll leave that to your imagination. Oh, and you do know that martial artists will stake their lives on their weapons regardless of how advanced their martial arts are, don’t you? I’m sure they’ll be happy to grant a small request of mine.”

“…”

It might be a small request to the leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang,[967] but it would be anything but small to me or the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

If he bad-mouthed us with even a few words in front of them, a hit to our reputation would be the least of it. We might even face real pressure from them.

“Well, I suppose I should start preparing to leave. Let’s see, what should I pack…?”

As he turned to go into his room and pack, I grabbed his wrist. Jang Taebo asked innocently,

“What is it?”

I lowered my head helplessly.

“Please stop. I admit defeat.”

“Is that all?”

“I’m sorry for acting cocky.”

“And?”

“I won’t tell anyone that you’re living here.”

[967] The Nine Sects and One Gang are a major grouping of martial-arts organizations in the Murim.

“Given that you came looking for me like this, it can’t be something only you know, can it?”

“I’ll explain everything properly to my eldest brother, too.”

“You’re sure?”

“Of course.”

“Hm. You’re not completely ill-mannered, then.”

Having gotten every answer he wanted, Jang Taebo smiled with satisfaction.

I had defeated enemies stronger than me time and again, but I couldn’t break the will of an old man enjoying a quiet retirement.

So where am I supposed to have the Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron forged?

I’d finally thought I was about to have my first cherished weapon…

I was staring dejectedly at the half-chewed, discarded He Shou Wu[968] when Jang Taebo spoke.

“You said you were making a spear?”

“Pardon?”

“Are you deaf? Why do you keep asking me to repeat myself?”

I hurriedly raised my head and saw Jang Taebo’s gruff face. He continued,

“Well, if you ask me to make it myself, I’ll obviously refuse. But I can at least give you an introduction.”

“You mean the Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild, your disciple…”

“Do you think the Guild Leader has that much time on his hands? He’s busy, too. Even someone like you would have to wait several years at the very least.”

“Several years?”

“What, did you think a weapon could be completed overnight? He’s not as good as me, but he’s skilled enough that his orders are bound to be backed up. Even picking and choosing which ones to accept, it still takes that long.”

Even so, several years?

The prospect of such an unexpectedly long project left me short of breath.

“T-Then what do I do?”

“What do you mean, what do you do? I’ll write you a letter of introduction. Take it with you. You’ll be going there with a recommendation from his master, so he’ll probably finish it a little sooner. That fellow makes one hell of a spear.”

“Ooh. Ooooh.”

“The village was in an uproar because of those mounted bandits, and I heard you were the one who dealt with them. I’ll do this for you as a special favor. Do you have paper, a brush, and ink?”

Hyuk Mujin, suddenly singled out, answered with a bewildered expression,

[968] He Shou Wu is a plant used in traditional Chinese medicine.

"No."

"Right. One look at you, and I can tell you don't carry such things. Then what about you…?"

"Chomp, chomp, chomp."

He's eating those now?

Jang Taebo sighed at the sight of Cheongpung stuffing the dumplings we had bought at the inn into his mouth until his cheeks looked ready to burst.

"…Are the dumplings good?"

"Chomp, chomp. Yes."

"Mae Jonghak took in a strange one in his later years. Fine, wait here a moment."

"Old people should just die. Young people these days have no manners."

Muttering loudly enough for us to hear, Jang Taebo went inside and returned with paper, a brush, and ink.

"First, the weapon is a spear… Do you have a particular shape or weight in mind?"

"Ah, yes."

"Tell me."

I described in detail the weight and shape that had become thoroughly familiar to me over seven years of wielding a spear.

Each time, Jang Taebo either nodded silently or added advice on how to make a spear better suited to me.

He really is an expert.

Sixty years in the trade had not gone to waste.

He gave my body a quick once-over, then rattled off one correction after another. He gauged the size of my hands and the length of my arms and legs with uncanny accuracy, then adjusted the thickness and shape of the spear shaft little by little.

"All right, this is the last thing. Where are you planning to put the Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron? In the spearhead, presumably?"

"…?"

"Why are you making that face? You said you had Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. You're not planning to leave it out, are you?"

"No, I'm going to use it…"

"Do you not have much? By my estimate, ten nyang should be enough to produce something worthy of being called a renowned spear. You could pass it down as a family heirloom without shame."

How much was ten nyang? I still wasn't used to the unit of weight, so I had no idea.

As I hesitated, Jang Taebo barked,

"Ah! How much of it are you going to put in?"

"That's… Just a moment."

Seeing was believing. It would be faster to show him directly.

Pretending to rummage through my travel bag, I took the Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron from my Inventory and casually held it out.

“…”

“Elder?”

Jang Taebo didn’t answer. He stared intently at the Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, which was larger than an adult’s head, for a long time before asking in an intensely hoarse voice,

“This… This is all Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron?”

“Yes. This isn’t your first time seeing it, is it?”

“I-I can’t believe this.”

His wrinkled hands trembled faintly. Jang Taebo stroked the cold, blue-tinged Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron as though he had been reunited with a child after sixty years. A sharp light flashed in his eyes.

“Entrust it to me.”

The old man who had found everything a nuisance was nowhere to be seen. His voice brimmed with passion and vitality.

“I’ll make you the greatest divine weapon in the world.”

Ding.

Chapter 169

In the dim light before dawn, a group of people made their way through the thick fog.

At their head, two middle-aged men spoke in low voices.

“Are you sure the information is reliable?”

“More than ninety percent.”

“Ninety percent?”

“I can’t be certain until we confirm it ourselves.”

“Then the other ten percent…”

“They may have leaked the information deliberately.”

“Which would make this a trap.”

“That’s why we’re taking every possible precaution, isn’t it?”

The two middle-aged men swallowed hard. So did everyone following them.

Each man gripped his weapon tightly, his eyes brimming with anxiety and tension.

“Damn it. We really stepped in shit.”

“Same here. I had a bad feeling from the moment they put me in charge of the Datong Branch.”

The two middle-aged men exchanged sympathetic looks. They were the Branch Leaders of the Jin Family of Taiyuan and the Lower District Sect’s respective Datong Branches, both established barely a month ago.

“I was bragging to my wife about my promotion just the other day. At this rate, I’m going to make her a widow.”

“Stop whining. I told you, we’re more than ninety percent certain.”

“And if we land in the other ten percent?”

“We die surrounded by more than four hundred mounted bandits.”

“…”

“Look at your face. Enough with the ill-omened talk. Watch where you’re going—we should be there soon.”

After the Lower District Sect Branch Leader finished speaking, silence descended.

They continued forward, slow but steady, muffling even their footsteps. The dense fog blanketing the area concealed both their figures and the sounds they made.

How long had they been walking?

By the time everyone was drenched in sweat and moisture—

“Stop!”

The low, restrained shout came from the Datong Branch Leader of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Gripping the hilt of his sword hard enough to crush it, he asked the Lower District Sect Branch Leader,

"Did you hear that?"

"What…? Ah!"

The Lower District Sect Branch Leader's face stiffened.

A sound from beyond the fog had reached his ears.

That's…

Horses snorting. And not just one or two.

The two men raised clenched fists. At once, dozens of sword blades smeared black with ash emerged from their sheaths.

Beyond the dense fog, which limited their vision to less than a zhang,[969] it felt as though hundreds of mounted bandits armed with bows and lances might come charging out at any moment.

Gulp.

Just as someone's throat bobbed loudly, a sudden gust swept across the grassland and brushed away the fog.

The sight it revealed made everyone's eyes fly open.

"Gasp!"

"W-What in the world…?"

Beneath the grassland's blue sky lay a field of red. The earth had been scorched black, and the stench of blood and death hung heavy in the air.

The Lower District Sect Branch Leader groaned involuntarily.

"So the information was true."

Dozens of bewildered gazes swept the area. Hundreds of men and horses lay sprawled across the ground, every trace of life already gone.

Severed limbs lay scattered like weeds, and eyes frozen wide with terror and shock stared blankly into space.

The few horses that remained alive let out hungry snorts as they trampled a flag covered in hastily scrawled red characters.

HEAVENLY WIND

There was no mistake. It was the flag of the Heavenly Wind Band.

The annihilation of the Heavenly Wind Band, which had once made a name for itself throughout the northern Gaoyuan through its brutality. The ninety-percent guess had finally become a hundred-percent certainty.

For nearly half a month, the Jin Family of Taiyuan and the Lower District Sect had been closely monitoring the Heavenly Wind Band's movements. They should have felt the relief of having a rotten tooth pulled, yet the longer the two Branch Leaders surveyed the scene, the darker their faces became.

"T-This…"

[969] A zhang is a traditional Chinese length unit of approximately 3.33 meters (10.9 ft).

“That’s right. One person did all this.”

The scattered corpses told the story themselves.

A single person had killed them all.

“What a terrifying master. I can’t even begin to fathom his strength.”

The Jin Family Branch Leader, the strongest martial artist among them, continued in a trembling voice.

“Every one of them was killed in a single strike. Judging by their burned-out organs, the killer must have cultivated Scorching Yang Qi to its utmost limit.”

“W-What about his martial arts? Can you tell what he used?”

“Not at all. He didn’t use any distinctive martial art. This was… nothing but overwhelming power crushing everything in its path.”

One person had slaughtered four hundred mounted bandits as easily as crushing ants.

The bodies strewn in every direction showed that they had tried to flee. Their horribly contorted faces showed the terror they had felt.

Not a single person had escaped the hands of this unidentified master and his fearsome martial arts.

“C-Could something like this really be possible?”

“It must be. We’re seeing it with our own eyes.”

He was right. The scene before them was both evidence and witness.

The two men fell silent, unable to find anything more to say.

“Over here! There’s a survivor!”

A survivor?

Their eyes snapped open at the sudden shout. The two Branch Leaders immediately displayed their movement techniques and ran like the wind. As they arrived, they muttered like men groaning in disbelief.

“A survivor?”

“He’s still breathing. Not for much longer, though.”

As the man had said, the sole survivor was already little better than a corpse.

His left arm had been ripped off as though devoured by a beast, and a sickening smell of charred flesh rose from the gaping hole in his side.

The Lower District Sect Branch Leader stared intently at the man’s relatively intact face.

“This is the Heavenly Wind Band Leader.”

“…Are you sure?”

“Certain.”

The Heavenly Wind Band Leader had begun making a name for himself ten years ago, and his face was widely known.

Though only recently appointed head of the Lower District Sect's Datong Branch, the Branch Leader had memorized the features of every major figure in the region.

Lately, he had seen the Heavenly Wind Band Leader's face more often than those of his own children.

"He was one of the five strongest men in the Gaoyuan—no, one of the top three… To think he would end up like this."

The chieftains of the mounted-bandit forces ruling the Gaoyuan were all accomplished martial artists, but the Heavenly Wind Band Leader had stood out even among them.

He was dull-witted, but his innate talent for combat alone had made him one of the pillars of the Gaoyuan—a Peak master.

Now, however, he was nothing more than a defeated man on the verge of death.

"I suppose being a Peak master earned him two attacks. One tore off his arm, and the other put a fist through his side."

A Peak master defeated in only two exchanges?

It was so absurd that he could no longer even feel shocked.

Everyone stood speechless when—

"Khrrk. Khrrrk."

A wet rattle came from the Heavenly Wind Band Leader's throat as his body twitched.

He laboriously opened his eyes, and a hoarse voice leaked between his lips.

"Save… save me."

"You're the Heavenly Wind Band Leader. Is that right?"

"Y-Yes. That's me."

The Jin Family Branch Leader sent internal energy toward his wrist. The man's eyes became a little clearer. Just a little.

"Don't worry. You can survive."

It was a lie.

They would gladly have saved him if they could, but it was already too late. There was a mountain of questions they needed answered before he breathed his last.

"Who did this?"

Before the words had fully left his mouth, the Heavenly Wind Band Leader jerked like a bird struck by an arrow. His remaining hand shot up and seized the Branch Leader's collar.

His grip held a strength impossible for a dying man. The stench of death poured from his open mouth.

"An old man. It was an old man. He's a demon who rose from a pit of fire."

"Let go!"

“They’re all dead. I’m dead too. I’m already dead. The demon killed me.”

“Y-You!”

The horrified Branch Leader hurriedly tried to pull away, but the strength slowly drained from the Heavenly Wind Band Leader’s grip.

The lifeless body slowly tipped over and collapsed. His wide-open eyes glared at the blue sky.

“Hah… Hah… Is he dead?”

The Lower District Sect Branch Leader nodded and sighed.

“He had completely lost his mind.”

“No wonder. It’s a miracle he was alive at all. He survived in that condition for nearly two days.”

“At least we learned something.”

“What do we know besides the fact that he was old?”

“He was an old master in the Supreme Peak realm who primarily used Scorching Yang Qi. Judging by the fact that he didn’t leave a single person alive, he’s merciless as well. If he came this way past Datong, he’d attract attention in no time.”

After a moment’s hesitation, the Lower District Sect Branch Leader added,

“…One way or another.”

Whether he was merely an old master who showed no mercy or a great fiend beyond anything they could imagine, they had no way of knowing.

There was only one thing they could do to prepare for the worst.

“We need to send word to our family.”

“I’ll do the same.”

The two men exchanged dark looks, each thinking much the same thing.

Who—or what—was the old man the Heavenly Wind Band Leader spoke of? And…

Where is he now?

The woodcutter met the old man halfway up an unnamed mountain.

The moment he saw the old man strolling leisurely along the rugged mountain path, only one thought crossed his mind.

Is he a mountain spirit?

In all his life, he had never seen anyone so old. Looking at the woodcutter awkwardly prostrating himself, the old man asked,

“What is it?”

“My name is Jang-pal.”

“…So?”

“I’ve come to pay my respects, Mountain Spirit.”

After a brief silence, the old man spoke.

“What kind of lunacy is this…? Are you trying to make a perfectly healthy living man ascend to immortality?”

“Y-You’re not a mountain spirit?”

Jang-pal the woodcutter looked the old man up and down.

Now that he thought about it, more than a few things seemed strange. An immortal should radiate a sacred aura at first glance and speak with dignified elegance…

“Have you ever seen an immortal dressed like this? My robes gape so badly that the cold wind blows straight through them.”

That eccentric way of speaking, those loose clothes torn in places…

The only thing about him that resembled an immortal was his extraordinary age.

“I’m sorry. I’m completely uneducated.”

Jang-pal gave an embarrassed smile, and the old man waved him away.

“If you understand, then be on your way.”

“Yes.”

Jang-pal bowed politely and continued walking.

“…”

“…”

“…You there.”

“Yes?”

The old man scowled.

“Why do you keep following me?”

“Oh, this is the road to my village.”

“What’s down this road?”

“Jang Family Village. It’s a small place. I live there myself.”

“Jang Family Village? From the name, I take it everyone there belongs to the same clan.”

“That’s right.”

The old man clicked his tongue.

“Why are there so many clan villages around here? Half a shichen[970] ago, I passed one called Hong Family Village or something.”

“Hong Family Village?”

“Why? You know it?”

“Yes. Of course I do. But…”

Jang-pal tilted his head.

[970] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

"Hong Family Village should be at least three hundred li[971] from here. Are you perhaps confusing it with somewhere else?"

"Do I look like an idiot who can't remember what happened half a shichen[972] ago?"

Three hundred li[973] was far enough that even Jang-pal, who had sturdy legs, would need two full days to cover it.

But three hundred li[974] in half a shichen[975]?

Jang-pal, a simple country bumpkin, clicked his tongue inwardly in pity.

The poor old man's senile.

His appearance certainly fit. His body was painfully thin, and his hair hung wild and unkempt.

What had brought an old man like him to a mountain climbed only by woodcutters like Jang-pal?

Ah, could it be…?

He suddenly recalled stories of unfilial sons abandoning their elderly parents in the mountains to leave themselves one less mouth to feed. Perhaps this old man had suffered the same fate.

Jang-pal gazed at him with guileless sympathy, then took something from inside his clothes and held it out respectfully.

"Elder, please have this."

"Hmm? What is it?"

Jang-pal scratched the back of his head.

"I brought it along just in case… but I'm full."

It was a rice ball his wife had prepared early that morning. He was hungry after working so hard, but surely the old man before him must be even hungrier.

"It isn't much, but please eat it."

"It certainly doesn't look like much."

"…"

"I'm joking."

The old man glanced between Jang-pal and the crude rice ball.

"My stomach happened to be empty. This will do nicely."

He devoured the palm-sized rice ball in the blink of an eye. Jang-pal then offered him the wooden carrying frame on his back.

“Please climb on. If you sit atop the bundle of firewood, the ride should be bearable.”

“Hmm? You want me to ride on that?”

“Yes. The mountain path is rough, and you’re heading down anyway, aren’t you?”

“I am, but…”

Jang-pal smiled guilelessly.

“You remind me of my father, who passed away long ago.”

A complicated expression crossed the old man’s face. He clicked his tongue, then climbed onto the carrying frame.

He was so light that Jang-pal could lift him with one hand.

“Are you comfortable?”

“These sticks are poking my backside to death.”

“Should I walk a little more slowly?”

“Slowly? You should be running as if you’re flying. Oh, and about that late father of yours…”

“Yes?”

“What sort of man was he? If I reminded you of him, he must have been exceptionally handsome and strapping.”

“…”

Jang-pal suddenly became much less talkative.

Ahead of him, Jang Family Village began to come into view.

Chapter 170

Old and small.

That was the old man's first impression of Jang Family Village.

Seated atop the gently swaying wooden carrying frame, he gazed at the sparse scattering of houses and added in a voice too quiet for anyone to hear,

"…And peaceful."

It seemed the years had passed after all. Even an insignificant view like this made his body relax and a corner of his heart itch.

Just like that day, more than twenty years ago.

It was the same when I took that child in.

The image of a child he had met long ago suddenly flashed before his eyes.

Normally, he would have tossed the child a few iron coins or simply ignored them and walked on. But that day had been different.

Perhaps it was because he had only just realized that he was suffering from the infirmities of old age.

He had stared at the owner of that desperately outstretched hand and, before he knew it, spoken a single sentence.

"Will you come with me?"

"Elder, we're here."

The woodcutter's voice brought the old man back to his senses.

They had stopped in front of a small house. Something tiny burst out from behind a loosely woven fence made of bundles of branches.

"Dad!"

"Oh, my daughter!"

The little girl, no more than six or seven years old, came pattering over and flung herself against her father's leg.

The old man hopped lightly down from the carrying frame and watched them.

"Is she your child?"

"Ah, yes. She is. Hanga, say hello. This gentleman is…"

Come to think of it, Jang-pal did not even know the old man's name.

As he trailed off, the old man waved a hand.

"No need to exchange names. It's nothing."

Just then, Hanga, who had been gazing up at the old man with sparkling eyes, toddled over and slapped his bony thigh.

"Grandpa!"

"Hm?"

"What's your name, Grandpa?"

"I don't know. I've forgotten it too."

The old man had only said it to spare himself the bother, but Jang-pal took it differently.

He's not sound of mind enough to remember even his own name.

As a simple mountain villager, Jang-pal found the old man terribly pitiable.

He could not leave someone who had apparently been abandoned by his children to wander around in clothes scarcely better than rags.

"Elder, why don't you at least stay for a meal? We'll have something ready in no time."

"No need. What you gave me earlier was enough."

"Even so…"

"There's someone I must find. I've already been delayed for quite some time, so I ask for your understanding."

After speaking, the old man paused.

Understanding?

The word that had slipped from his mouth felt foreign.

He had lived his entire life without restraint. Everyone had feared and revered him. Even the most renowned masters of Murim had tucked their tails between their legs in his presence.

And yet such words came easily before this country bumpkin he had known for less than half a shichen.[976]

I'm old. I really have grown old.

As the old man stood there in bewilderment, someone tugged at his sleeve.

He looked down and saw plump, baby-soft cheeks twitching.

"Who are you looking for? Hanga is good at finding people."

"…Is that so?"

"Uh-huh! Yesterday, I found Grandpa Jang from three houses over."

"Well done."

"When I found him, he gave me something tasty. I ate until my belly almost burst."

After that baffling remark, she planted a hand on her waist. Her expression was almost solemn.

"And people need to eat so they'll have strength. At your age, Grandpa, you can even chew up iron."

"H-Hanga!"

"Ha ha ha!"

The old man laughed heartily for the first time in a long while. When was the last time he had laughed like this? It must have been more than ten years ago.

[976] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Once his laughter subsided, he patted Hanga's round head.

"Yes, you're right. This old man can chew up iron."

"Uh-huh. I'm always right."

Beaming with pride, Hanga caught hold of his sleeve and led him into the house. The old man let himself be dragged along.

Even the strongest man under heaven could not have made him budge, but today was an exception. More importantly…

This isn't half bad.

He rather liked the situation. For once, he almost felt like an ordinary old man.

When they entered the room, Jang-pal's wife soon brought out a meal.

"I'm afraid the side dishes aren't much."

As she had said, the food was simple: a few kinds of namul[977] and mixed-grain rice. Even the meat soup they had served for his sake was pale and bland.

But everything had been prepared with care. They were clearly not well-off, yet they treated the shabby old man seated at their table as a guest rather than an unwelcome intruder.

Well, now.

The old man finished the meal with a strange feeling in his heart. Hanga asked him with sparkling eyes,

"Grandpa, was it good?"

"Yes. It was the best meal I've had in quite some time."

"Right? My mom is the best cook in our whole village."

"…Is that so?"

"Uh-huh!"

I wouldn't go that far.

The old man swallowed the words and nodded.

He had not enjoyed the meal for its taste, but for the care with which it had been prepared.

Oblivious, Hanga continued chattering away.

"Grandpa Jang from three houses over sometimes comes to eat at our house too. Yesterday I ate at his house, though. Hee hee."

Jang-pal watched his daughter fondly.

"Hanga, did you go to the elder's house again?"

"Uh-huh. Grandpa gave me something tasty yesterday. So did the other older brothers."

"How many times have I told you not to bother the elder? But what do you mean, older brothers?"

---

[977] Namul are Korean side dishes made from seasoned vegetables or wild greens.

Jang Family Village was a small place. The few young men there had either left for other regions or joined Murim sects with dreams of making their fortunes in the martial world.

Those who remained had families of their own, so there was hardly anyone Hanga would call an older brother.

“Were they strangers?”

“Uh-huh. They were tall and handsome, and they gave me this much food. So I found Grandpa for them.”

“You found him? Were they looking for the elder?”

“I don’t know. They were just looking for Grandpa. They were cool older brothers with sticks hanging from their waists.”

“Sticks at their waists… Swords?”

Martial artists. They had to be.

Jang-pal and his wife exchanged grave looks.

To ordinary civilians like them, martial artists were objects of fear.

Only a few months had passed since the war between the Jin Family of Taiyuan and the Mount Heng Sword Sect. How terrified had they been then?

Now, unidentified martial artists had appeared right next door—and their only daughter had become involved with them.

Jang-pal asked anxiously,

“What happened after that?”

“When I took them to Grandpa, he shouted.”

“D-Did you hear who those older brothers were?”

“I did, but I forgot!”

Her answer was bright and innocent, but dark clouds gathered over her parents’ hearts. Jang-pal hurriedly rose to his feet.

“I need to go. The elder may have come to harm.”

“Hanga’s father!”

“You stay here with Hanga. I’ll only sneak over and take a look, so don’t worry.”

Despite his words, he picked up the axe propped against one corner of the room. His horrified wife was about to stop him when—

“Sit down.”

“Pardon?”

“Are your ears clogged? I said sit down.”

The old man, who had been sitting quietly, rose to his feet. His bony knees cracked loudly.

“I’ve had a hearty meal. I might as well go for a stroll. Consider it payment for the food.”

Jang-pal stared blankly at him, then gave a hollow laugh.

“Elder, that’s no place for you.”

“You have it backward. It’s no place for you.”

“Please stay here. I’ll be back soon.”

“Will you be able to come back?”

The old man gazed at Jang-pal with an unreadable expression.

The moment Jang-pal met those deep, still, unfathomable eyes, his breath caught.

“If they’re even a little—just the slightest bit—unsavory, you won’t be coming back. Do you intend to leave your daughter without a father?”

The old man’s eyes flashed like a streak of light, then faded.

As if nothing had happened, he patted his lower back and held out a hand to Jang-pal.

“Give it here.”

That was all.

Yet Jang-pal handed him the axe as if under a spell.

“You’ve maintained it well. Best use this only for chopping wood.”

The old man calmly studied the sharpened blade, then grinned at Hanga. The child had sensed the change in the air, and her large eyes were already glistening.

“Why the long face?”

“I think Hanga did something wrong. Hanga was wrong.”

“Yes. This time, you were.”

Just as a miserable wail was about to burst from her, the old man continued in a voice as soft and warm as a quilt.

“So take special care not to let this happen again. Listen to your parents. Do you understand?”

“Uh-huh… But, Grandpa.”

“Go on.”

“Will you come back?”

The old man could not suppress the quiet laugh that escaped him.

“Of course. I’m old enough to chew iron. What couldn’t I do?”

At that moment, Jang-pal snapped out of his daze.

What had he been thinking, handing an axe to an old man suffering from the infirmities of age? He must have been completely bewitched.

He had to put a stop to this at once.

“Elder, please give me back the axe. This—this is ridiculous…”

Jang-pal’s words died in his throat. His mouth fell open at the unbelievable sight unfolding before him.

Crunch. Crunch.

The axe blade was breaking apart.

Each time the old man's yellow teeth moved—teeth that looked incapable of chewing even a soft chicken bone—the blade Jang-pal carefully sharpened every day snapped off piece by piece.

"W-What is this?"

"Your daughter has a fine eye for people. She was exactly right."

A conversation from earlier flashed through Jang-pal's horrified mind.

"Why are there so many clan villages around here? Less than half a shichen ago, there was something called Hong Family Village or whatever."

"Hong Family Village? Hong Family Village should be at least three hundred li[978] from here. Are you perhaps confusing it with somewhere else?"

"Do I look like some idiot who can't even remember something that happened less than half a shichen ago?"

Only then did Jang-pal realize that none of the old man's words had been lies.

He was not an ordinary old man. Someone who could walk three hundred li[979] in half a shichen and chew iron could not possibly be ordinary.

Only one kind of person could perform such extraordinary feats.

"A martial artist…"

The old man asked Jang-pal, whose legs were trembling,

"So, where are they?"

A voice brimming with joy slipped between Jang Taebo's lips.

"I'll make you the greatest divine weapon in the world."

Ding.

The Quest mission has been completed.

"…"

Shit. If I'd known this would happen, I would've shown him sooner.

Hyuk Mujin looked dumbfounded too. No, on closer inspection, he looked horrified.

"Is all of that Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron?"

[978] Here, li is the Chinese distance unit of 500 m (0.311 mi). Three hundred li is about 150 km (93 mi).
[979] Here, li is the Chinese distance unit of 500 m (0.311 mi). Three hundred li is about 150 km (93 mi).

I scratched my chin. What did I know? The System said it was Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, so I simply took its word for it.

“Yeah, probably.”

“You can’t just say ‘probably’!”

“Tell me about it.”

To be honest, I was flustered too.

When Jang Taebo had shown no reaction after hearing that I possessed Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, I had assumed that people in the upper circles treated Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron as basic gear.

But as it turned out…

Is it like a drink made with ten percent apple flavoring?

They called it the greatest mineral under heaven, and if people only shaved off tiny pieces to attach to a blade, it must be incredibly rare.

While everyone else used weapons containing five or ten percent Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, I could have one made from a hundred percent.

That was an enormous advantage.

My gear alone would give me a head start.

“With this—with this, I can create the masterpiece of my lifetime.”

Jang Taebo trembled all over, overcome with emotion.

It was hard to believe he was the same old man who had acted indifferent and played hard to get only moments ago. Not that I was complaining, now that everything had worked out.

“Where in the world did you obtain such an enormous amount of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron?”

“That’s a secret.”

“D-Did you perhaps discover a mine containing vast deposits of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron?”

Jang Taebo’s eyes flared like high beams. He had claimed he no longer needed anything, but now…

“Tell me!”

I coldly shook my head. I did not even know where the mine was, and I could not tell him the truth anyway.

“No.”

“Please! I’m begging you!”

“W-Wait, what are you doing?”

Now he was clinging to my trouser leg. The spirit of an artisan who had devoted decades to a single path blazed in his eyes.

“Please!”

“Oh, for crying out loud!”

Just as I hurriedly pried Jang Taebo’s hands away—

“Is this the house of Grandpa Jang, who lives three houses over…? Damn it. It’s rubbing off on me already. Anyway, is this Old Man Jang’s house?”

A sharp voice pierced my eardrums.

Chapter 171

The sharp, ringing voice belonged to a squat old man.

He was shorter than most elementary schoolchildren these days and dressed in grimy clothes. But more than anything else…

He's incredibly old.

I hadn't lived all that long, but in all my years, I had never seen anyone so ancient.

Just as I was thinking that, my eyes met the old man's.

"Hey!"

"Yes?"

"When an elder asks you a question, you're supposed to answer. Is this Old Man Jang's house?"

Is that the vibe that comes with experience?

The old man looked as though he could drop dead at any moment, yet his eyes were more than lively—they practically blazed. Feeling strangely intimidated, I answered.

"It is."

Jang Taebo, who had been clutching my trouser leg, awkwardly rose to his feet.

I wondered if the old man might be one of his friends from the senior center, but the wary look on Jang Taebo's face suggested otherwise.

"Who are you?"

"Just a traveler passing through. Are you Old Man Jang?"

"That's right."

"I see. I stopped by just in case."

The old man glanced around, then added,

"Though I suppose there wasn't any need."

"…"

"…"

"Then I'll be going. Once you're finished here, stop by the house where that kid lives. The child's worried about you."

With that, the old man turned around.

What the hell was that old man's deal?

As everyone stood there bewildered by his incomprehensible words and actions, Cheongpung poked me in the side.

"Munch, munch. Benefactor. Don't you think there's something strange about him?"

"…You look stranger to me. And swallow what's in your mouth before you talk."

How long is this guy going to keep chewing those dumplings? Does he have some magic jar that keeps producing more?

At my scolding, Cheongpung gulped down what was in his mouth and muttered,

“No, but there’s something strange about him.”

“Like what?”

“I don’t know. It’s just a feeling.”

“What kind of answer is th—”

Wait.

It was just a feeling?

I froze. Cheongpung might have been an eccentric, but he was also the disciple who had inherited everything from the Sword Saint and a Peak master far above me in skill.

Could he have sensed something about that old man that I couldn’t?

He looks like an ordinary old man…

There was nothing to lose by checking. In Murim, where anything could happen, it was best to tap even a stone bridge before crossing it.

Activate Qi Sense.

Internal energy is consumed in proportion to range.

Whoosh.

A blue line visible only to me shot outward.

It passed through Cheongpung, Hyuk Mujin, and Jang Taebo, who were closest to me, before finally reaching the back of the old man as he slowly walked away.

A translucent holographic window sprang up above his snow-white hair.

Lv. 3 Jeok Cheongang

Jeok Cheongang? Now that’s a name fit for a final boss.

[980] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft). Seventy jang is about 212 meters (696 ft).

But despite his impressive name, his Level was pitifully low. The old man was unquestionably an ordinary civilian who had never learned martial arts.

"Looks like you were just barking up the wrong tree…"

My voice trailed off.

The old man's leisurely steps had stopped.

His squat body slowly turned around. Though he was more than ten jang away, the strange light in his eyes made my skin prickle.

What?

My body went rigid. My heart pounded, and my fingertips twitched.

If the old man's lips had not opened at that moment, I might have summoned a weapon from my Inventory right then and there.

"Well, now…"

The corners of the old man's wrinkled mouth twitched as he stared at me. His low voice bored into my ears.

"What an interesting fellow."

The old man, Jeok Cheongang, encountered a rather interesting situation the moment he reached his destination.

Oh-ho. Well, look at these brats.

The Supreme Peak realm was an inhuman domain where one could be called a Martial God without exaggeration. He recognized the young men's martial prowess at a glance.

One was nothing special, but the other two…

Frankly, they impressed him.

At that age, they've already broken through the wall.

The one noisily chewing dumplings in front of an elder, in particular, had already reached full maturity in the Peak realm.

Would only the Elders of the Nine Sects and One Gang[981] whom I crossed paths with briefly in the past be able to compare?

As for the other one, the tall, broad fellow…

L-Look at the insolent way that bastard's staring. Maybe I should gouge his eyes out.

The young man had a face like he had seen a walking corpse. Even so, it was obvious that he possessed martial arts far beyond what his age suggested.

No one his age could stand against him.

The rear waves of the Yangtze pushed the waves before them.

[981] The Nine Sects and One Gang is a grouping of major martial-arts organizations in Murim.

That was what they said. Jeok Cheongang suddenly realized that the new wave was quite large and fierce.

Large enough to swallow the entire Yangtze.

I suspected as much when they started making a fuss about Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron and all that… but they're even more interesting than I expected.

Jeok Cheongang could detect presences from dozens of jang away. He had been listening to their conversation from the moment he left Jang's house.

He also knew that the matter Jang had been worried about had not happened.

Far from being coerced, Old Man Jang appeared to be the one clinging to them.

Given their accomplishments and the fact that they'd even brought Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, could they be from the Nine Sects and One Gang? Well, either way, they clearly belong to a prestigious orthodox faction.

That was the extent of Jeok Cheongang's interest.

He had no reason to form a connection with those young men and no desire to reveal his identity.

He had done enough to repay the meal he had been given, so he intended to leave immediately.

"Then I'll be going. Once you're finished here, stop by the house where that kid lives. The child's worried about you."

Jeok Cheongang tossed out those final words and turned away.

He had already wasted a considerable amount of time. He intended to reach Taiyuan before the day was out and pay a visit to the Lower District Sect.

Of course, he had no intention of letting anyone discover his identity.

If I wrap a mask around my face and threaten them a little, they should spill everything.

But Jeok Cheongang's train of thought went no further.

The next moment, something unknown shot toward him from behind.

Whoosh.

He could neither see nor hear it.

He had only sensed it. A cold, unfamiliar presence pierced toward Jeok Cheongang's back.

An ambush?

No. He sensed none of the sticky, unpleasant killing intent that accompanied one.

Instead, it felt as natural as a breeze blowing from afar, which only made it more alien.

The unknown energy vanished the moment it touched Jeok Cheongang's back.

What in the world…?

He had lived for nearly a hundred years, yet this was the first time he had ever experienced anything like it.

Still bewildered, he turned around and immediately identified the culprit.

“Looks like you were just barking up the wrong tree…”

The young man’s mouth snapped shut the instant their eyes met. His gaze wavered, and his fingertips twitched.

As Jeok Cheongang stared at the culprit, the corners of his mouth slowly rose.

“Well, now…”

He stroked his chin, intrigued.

“What an interesting fellow.”

At the same time, his foot pushed off the ground.

In the next instant, the distance of more than ten jang between them vanished. Jeok Cheongang whispered into Jin Taekyung’s ear.

Inventory summon.

Just six syllables.

All I had to do was picture the spear and shout the words in my mind. But…

“What are you?”

The breath tickling the back of my neck made every hair on my body stand on end.

When did he—?

No, before that…

How?

He was definitely, definitely Level 3.

It was impossible to believe.

Jeok Cheongang looked as though he could drop dead at any moment, yet he was faster than anyone I had ever seen.

So fast that I did not even dare consider resisting him.

“Hey. When an elder asks you a question, you’re supposed to answer.”

“Y-Yes?”

“You call that an answer?”

A thin, wrinkled finger repeatedly poked me in the solar plexus. There was no force or internal energy behind it, yet it felt as though someone were stabbing me with a sword.

“I’m asking what you are.”

I swallowed hard. My mouth felt as dry as if someone had poured a handful of sand into it.

“I’m Jin Taekyung.”

“Not that crap. Which sect are you a disciple of?”

“Taiyuan—the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“The Jin Family of Taiyuan? Are you one of those demonic, heterodox sorts?”

I nearly nodded without thinking.

The old man’s eyes had flashed when he mentioned demonic, heterodox arts. If I said yes even by mistake, he looked ready to cut my life short on the spot.

“I’m with an orthodox faction.”

“Are you? Then why are you stammering?”

“I’m telling the truth.”

“The Jin Family of Taiyuan… I feel like I’ve heard of it. Or perhaps I haven’t.”

Jeok Cheongang sank deep into thought, then suddenly gave me a peculiar look.

“The more I look at you, the stranger you seem. That thing just now—it was you, wasn’t it?”

That thing just now?

His words were vague, but I immediately understood.

This old man definitely sensed Qi Sense.

How is that possible?

I had vaguely suspected as much when he reacted right away, but the realization still made my vision go dark.

Good God. A monster who can sense Qi Sense.

“Why aren’t you answering?”

I bit down hard on my lower lip.

“No.”

“How do you know what I’m talking about?”

“…”

“Hey. It was you, wasn’t it?”

“No. Anyway, it wasn’t me.”

“Oh, I like that. You’ve got some backbone. Very manly.”

Jeok Cheongang laughed heartily, then continued,

“Should I break a few bones and ask again?”

“It was me! Yes, it was me!”

“Good. Fine. Then what did you do to me?”

I hesitated.

My opponent was an old man whose instincts were every bit as sharp as his age suggested. If I lied and got caught, I would not be leaving with my body intact.

I needed to stick as closely to the truth as possible while phrasing it in a way he would find agreeable.

“You seemed like an extraordinary person, so I just…”

“A little?”

“I checked whether you had learned martial arts.”

“How?”

“Yes?”

“I asked how you did it.”

“I sent a little of my qi toward you and read yours. Something like that.”

“Ha. Is that so?”

Jeok Cheongang laughed as though amused, then clenched his fist.

“If you keep lying, I’ll break your legs. Answer me again.”

I hurriedly waved my hands.

“W-Wait. Why are you suddenly acting like this?”

“You’ve completely misjudged this old man. Do I look like some fool who can’t distinguish something like that? What I felt just now… was different. Different enough to make me think it was the dark arts.”

“What dark arts? I’m telling you, it’s real!”

This is driving me insane.

Qi Sense was certainly a cheat Skill, closer to a System function than martial arts.

Because of that, someone like Jeok Cheongang, who appeared to be a Supreme Peak master, might have sensed something alien that he had never encountered before.

The problem is, how the hell am I supposed to explain that?

“You bastard! Can’t you tell me the truth?”

Fuck this. I’m done.

I decided to lay everything out honestly.

“The truth is, I use something called the System. It’s a bit of a cheat, so it might have felt strange to you. I’m sorry.”

Jeok Cheongang remained silent for a moment.

Then he opened his mouth.

“What kind of bullshit is that?”

“…I told you exactly what happened. I figured you wouldn’t understand.”

“Have you said all you have to say?”

“There’s plenty I haven’t said. I’ve been through a lot.”

“You’ve led a turbulent life.”

“You have no idea.”

“Don’t worry. After today, your life won’t have any more twists and turns.”

“Are you planning to make it all downhill from here?”

“Why bother saying it? How about we warm you up a little before we begin?”

It happened in an instant—too fast for me, Cheongpung, Hyuk Mujin, or Jang Taebo to react.

Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh and poked me in the chest with one finger.
And then…
Fwoosh!
An overwhelming wave of heat swept through my body.

Chapter 172

Jeok Cheongang wore a smug grin.

Heh heh. Have a taste of the heat, you little punk.

His fingertip carried Scorching Yang Qi refined to its pinnacle.

Though he was using only three-tenths of his internal energy, it was still far more than a fledgling who looked barely twenty could withstand.

This ought to snap him back to his senses.

Jeok Cheongang had no particular taste for tormenting youngsters, but this one needed to be taught a lesson.

The boy had been spouting incomprehensible nonsense about some “shisudaem” or whatever for a while now, and Jeok Cheongang was sick of listening to it.

I’ve controlled my strength, so if things go well, he might even avoid an internal injury.

If things went well.

Jeok Cheongang silently added that caveat as he reached out.

Tap.

The instant his bony, wrinkled finger touched the young man’s broad chest, Extreme Yang Qi surged forward like a tidal wave. Jin Taekyung sucked in a startled breath.

“Hk!”

“How is it? Feels like you’re burning up inside, doesn’t it?”

Jeok Cheongang could not help laughing when he saw the boy’s face turn bright red. The saying that a beating was the best medicine truly was an eternal truth.

“Now, stop talking nonsense and tell me the truth—”

Whooosh! Shhk!

Jeok Cheongang could not finish his sentence. Two swords flashed in like lightning, slicing through his waist and arm.

“Did it work? It worked! Cheongpung, you did it!”

Unlike Hyuk Mujin, who was celebrating with a bewildered expression, Cheongpung merely scratched the back of his head.

Before his eyes, Jeok Cheongang’s figure scattered like mist instead of spraying blood.

“Uh… Returning to Simplicity and Shifting Form and Position… I think we picked the wrong fight.”

Jeok Cheongang was already perched on a fence some distance away, laughing heartily.

“You’ve got a decent pair of eyes.”

“I grew up seeing things like that.”

“You grew up seeing them?”

Jeok Cheongang was genuinely surprised when he realized what those words implied.

Returning to Simplicity and Shifting Form and Position were both realms accessible only to Supreme Peak masters. That meant Cheongpung had grown up around a master who stood at the same level as Jeok Cheongang.

“Who is your Master?”

“My grandfather.”

“What an obtuse brat. How would this old man know who your grandfather is?”

“My grandfather always said that any man who hides behind another man’s name ought to have his balls cut off.”

“Ha ha ha! Splendid words!”

After bursting into laughter, Jeok Cheongang studied Cheongpung for a long moment.

“Can you bear the consequences of daring to point your sword at this old man?”

Cheongpung smacked his lips, looking troubled.

“But I didn’t use Sword Energy. Couldn’t you let it slide?”

“Would it have made a difference if you had?”

“Hmm. I don’t think so.”

Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh. He did not know whose disciple the boy was, but he was certainly an interesting one.

“Then why did you interfere?”

Cheongpung pointed at Jin Taekyung, who stood frozen like a stone statue.

Hot steam rose in wisps from his entire body, which had been heated to a reddish hue.

“I owe him a little. How could I stand by while you bullied my Benefactor, Grandpa?”

“You must owe him quite a lot if you’re willing to risk your life.”

Cheongpung’s eyes widened.

“Are you going to kill me?”

Of course, Jeok Cheongang had no intention of killing anyone here. But he deliberately hardened his expression and lowered his voice.

“Of course.”

“Uh-oh. That won’t do. There are still so many things I haven’t tried.”

“This is the Murim. Should this old man take circumstances like that into account?”

Cheongpung thought it over before answering.

“I suppose not.”

Hyuk Mujin, who had been listening to their conversation with mounting anxiety, exploded.

“You can’t just accept that, you idiot!”

“Why not?”

“Because that old man—no, that gentleman—is going to kill us!”

“He isn’t wrong. Hmm, and besides…”

Cheongpung calmly added,

“We won’t know whether we live or die until we fight.”

“…Damn it. Fine, let’s do it. If we just sit here, Captain will beat us to death later anyway, so whatever.”

Jeok Cheongang rested his chin on one hand and gazed at the two young men.

They truly were interesting.

One was willing to stake his life because he owed someone a debt. The other grumbled even as he stepped into a fight whose outcome was obvious.

They possessed something that some called reckless bravado and others called chivalry.

People like this always die young.

That had been true forty years ago, and it would probably be true now.

That was why Jeok Cheongang had grown somewhat fond of the youngsters. At the very least, they possessed the courage to risk their lives for someone else.

Just as they were doing now.

“Then shall I teach you a thing or two?”

Jeok Cheongang slowly rose.

At the same moment, an aura as vast as a mountain erupted from his short frame and pressed down on everything around him.

Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin gripped their sword hilts, while Jang Taebo sank to the ground, his face deathly pale.

“You sit this one out.”

Jeok Cheongang flicked a finger.

Jang Taebo’s body floated over the fence as though an invisible hand had seized him and lifted him away.

Cheongpung muttered at the sight.

“Seizing an Object Through Empty Space…”

With a single gesture, the old man had lifted Jang Taebo, who was larger than most full-grown men.

It was proof that the old man possessed internal energy no weaker than Cheongpung’s grandfather.

Hyuk Mujin stared blankly and muttered,

“Shit. I’ve only ever seen that in novels.”

They were on entirely different levels.

At this moment, everything surrounding Jeok Cheongang was both his weapon and his shield. The corner of his wrinkled mouth rose slightly.

“Come.”

That was the signal.

Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin charged with all their strength.

The two knew each other’s martial arts intimately after countless duels. Their swords meshed perfectly as they launched a coordinated attack.

Whooosh!

Shhk-shhk!

Just as the two blades were about to pierce Jeok Cheongang’s flank and neck, he extended both hands.

His hands, now engulfed in white flame, closed around the blades.

“Do you think this will be enough?”

Grrrk.

Hyuk Mujin’s eyes widened.

His beloved sword, forged from the exceptionally hard Baekryeon Jeonggang, was bending. A moment later, it turned into molten metal and began dripping away.

“What the hell?”

He had poured everything into that strike, yet he had failed to leave so much as a scratch.

As he stared blankly at the blade, already half melted, Jeok Cheongang’s voice reached his ears.

“Your courage was admirable. Now get some rest.”

The next moment, Hyuk Mujin’s vision turned white. A palm struck him in the chest, and he crumpled helplessly to his knees.

“Mujin!”

“Don’t worry. He should have suffered only a minor internal injury. More importantly…”

Jeok Cheongang glanced at the blade caught in his other hand.

It had neither bent nor melted. Instead, it was wrapped in faint purple Sword Energy.

Jeok Cheongang dredged up a memory from long ago.

“Zaha Divine Technique. Are you a disciple of Huashan?”

Cheongpung answered with a punch.

The Crouching Tiger Fist, a fierce and powerful fist technique said to subdue tigers, slammed into Jeok Cheongang's chest.

Thud!

Jeok Cheongang's white eyebrows curved like a crescent moon.

"Well, look at you."

The blow should have been more than enough to shatter a man's chest, yet that was the extent of his reaction.

Cheongpung felt as though he were facing his grandfather, the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

He's strong. Overwhelmingly strong.

But he could not give up.

Cheongpung exhaled slowly and stamped his foot. The energy of the Zaha Divine Technique rippling through his body flared even more fiercely.

"Good. Show me everything you've got."

Jeok Cheongang grinned and loosened his grip on the blade.

Freed from its restraint, the sword unleashed the ultimate moves of the Plum Blossom Sword Technique.

Shiiiiing!

The sword tip moved fluidly, drawing plum blossoms through the air.

One became two. Two became five. Five became nine…

At last, twenty-four fully formed plum blossoms transformed into streaks of light and poured down toward Jeok Cheongang.

Even Jeok Cheongang could not help but marvel.

Huashan has produced an incredible talent.

And that brought one person to mind.

A figure who was practically synonymous with Huashan.

No—a figure revered by every swordsman under heaven.

"Mae Jonghak. What is your relationship with that friend of mine?"

The twenty-four plum blossoms wavered dangerously at the word friend.

The next moment, the Sword Energy narrowly missed Jeok Cheongang and devastated the surrounding area.

Kaboom!

Cheongpung swallowed a mouthful of the billowing dust and coughed.

"Cough, cough. You know my grandfather? Cough!"

Jeok Cheongang laughed with evident delight.

"I've met him. A very long time ago."

It had been more than forty years earlier.

The Demonic Cult's Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples had devoured half the world. As the tide of war turned against the orthodox faction, the orthodox Murim sought out even the reclusive eccentrics hidden deep within remote mountains and valleys.

That was when the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak visited Mount Jiuhua.

"Help us."

Those were his opening words.

Jeok Cheongang was surprised to receive a visit from a master who could rival him, but his answer had already been decided.

"No."

"Even with the world in danger?"

"Let's speak plainly. It's your orthodox Murim that's in danger, not the world."

Even if the ruler of the Murim changed, the world itself would remain the same. There were villains among the orthodox factions and good people within the Demonic Cult.

And Jeok Cheongang intended to remain on Mount Jiuhua forever.

Mae Jonghak sank into thought for a long while before suddenly smacking his forehead.

"Oh, now that I think about it, you're right."

"…Didn't you come here to persuade me?"

"That's that, and this is this, isn't it?"

"What kind of… If you're going to keep spouting nonsense, go home."

"Then let's settle this according to the laws of the Murim."

"Might Makes Right?"

"If I lose, I'll leave without complaint. Not only that, I'll never speak of your existence to anyone. However…"

"If you win, I have to help the orthodox Murim."

"Exactly. What do you say?"

"Draw your sword."

They fought for seven days and seven nights.

It was a battle between Huashan, which had stood as a great tree of the Murim for centuries, and the Fire Gate Clan, whose martial arts had been passed down to one successor per generation and never transmitted to outsiders.

It was a bloody struggle between two Martial Gods.

And it ended in a draw, with neither victor nor loser.

"What a pity. With martial arts like yours, why are you holed up in a mountain backwater like this?"

"Mind your own business. It's my affair. What does it have to do with you?"

"Oh. Now that I think about it, you're right."

“…Just listening to you is exhausting. What are you going to do now?”

“Honestly, I’d love to keep going, but… they crossed Gansu and Sichuan fifteen days ago. It’s a shame, but let’s leave it here this time.”

That had been fortunate for Jeok Cheongang.

If their battle had continued for even a few more days, he would have been the one to lose.

Mae Jonghak was ten years younger than him, yet he was already an astonishingly powerful master.

Without his own formidable internal energy, Jeok Cheongang would never have lasted so long.

“They may reach Anhui soon. Take care of yourself.”

“No problem. All I have to do is guard Mount Jiuhua.”

“Oh. That’s true.”

“…Please stop talking and leave.”

The Sword Saint Mae Jonghak left just like that, and the Demonic Cult’s army surged forward like a wave and swept into Anhui.

Fifteen days later, the Demonic Cultists passing through Mount Jiuhua made a grave mistake.

“Set it on fire!”

Mount Jiuhua burned, and Jeok Cheongang emerged into the world.

Not one of the thousand Demonic Cultists survived.

And people began calling him by another name.

“Then my grandfather…?”

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, merely smiled faintly instead of answering.

Chapter 173

"Then…?"

At Cheongpung's astonished expression, the Fire King Jeok Cheongang gave him a faint smile.

"Have you heard of me?"

"My grandfather mentioned you sometimes."

"Oh-ho. So that friend of mine hasn't forgotten me. What did he say?"

"He said your martial arts were strong, but your personality was… well, pretty terrible."

"…"

The truth was, Jeok Cheongang had never been particularly sociable. No, "not sociable" did not begin to cover it. He was downright awful.

He had suffered all manner of hardships as a child, leaving him with a deep-rooted distrust of people. After that, he had grown up under an eccentric Master.

So perhaps it was only natural.

"I heard you got into fights nearly every day during the Great Faction War. Apparently, you hit practically every young prodigy from the Nine Sects and One Gang at least once…"

"Ahem. Who says I hit all of them? And I was young back then. When you're young and full of energy…"

"I heard you were sixty at the time."

"Cough, cough!"

Unable to defend himself, Jeok Cheongang merely cleared his throat. Then Cheongpung added one more thing.

"But he said you were a good person once someone got to know you, so if I ever met you, I should treat you the way I treat him."

The corner of Jeok Cheongang's mouth twitched.

"Hmm. Mae Jonghak really does know me well."

Jeok Cheongang had fought in the Great Faction War for a little over a year.

It was rare for two Supreme Peak masters to fight on the same battlefield, and he had met Mae Jonghak only about ten times. Even so, they had unquestionably been close enough to call each other kindred spirits.

He did a fine job raising his grandson.

Wait a moment. Had Mae Jonghak ever married?

Jeok Cheongang quietly examined Cheongpung's face.

There was not a single feature that resembled the Mae Jonghak he remembered.

He doesn't look like a biological grandson…

Well, it did not matter.

Whether they shared blood or not, the boy was clearly his successor.

Judging by his behavior and the way he spoke, it would not be an exaggeration to say that they shared a soul rather than blood.

With a pleased smile, Jeok Cheongang spoke to Cheongpung.

“I gained a dependable grandson today. Come, give this old grandfather a formal bow.”

“What?”

Cheongpung tilted his head and asked again.

“Why?”

“…What do you mean, why?”

Caught off guard, Jeok Cheongang began to stammer.

“Didn’t Mae Jonghak tell you to treat me the way you treat him?”

“Yes.”

“You little punk, if a grandson meets his grandfather, he should give him a formal bow.”

“My grandfather doesn’t care about things like that. He said only hidebound old men obsess over empty formalities.”

“…!”

Jeok Cheongang trembled, having suddenly become a hidebound old man.

“What was this called again? I learned it recently.”

Cheongpung thought hard for a moment, then slapped his forehead.

“Oh, right. A boomer!”

“A boo… what?”

“A boomer. They say ‘boomer-brain’ means something similar.”

What? A boomer? Boomer-brain? Neither the sound nor the feel of the words was particularly pleasant.

Jeok Cheongang did not know exactly what they meant, but he understood the context well enough.

Have I been hiding in the mountains for too long?

The new waves of the Yangtze were stronger than he had imagined. Even so, he could not beat up the only grandson of his one kindred spirit…

Jeok Cheongang felt his head begin to ache and opened his mouth.

“Is that something young people are saying these days?”

“I don’t know. I only heard it for the first time recently.”

“From whom?”

“My Benefactor.”

Jeok Cheongang followed the direction Cheongpung was pointing and turned his head.

His eyes met those of a young man squinting at him.

“Hey, come here.”

Did he see me? It felt like our eyes met for a moment…

No, he didn’t. Absolutely not. I closed my eyes right away. How could he have seen me?

I trembled with my eyes shut, as if I were struggling with all my might to treat an internal injury.

Just in case, I even added a groan.

“Uuugh!”

“Hey, I said come here.”

Stay calm.

He was just making a wild guess. If I fell for it immediately, I would be Third Rate.

At times like this, a Peak master had to clench his ass and keep acting his heart out.

“Uuugh!”

“Don’t force it. I’ve seen plenty of people shit themselves doing that.”

He had a point. I relaxed slightly at Jeok Cheongang’s helpful advice.

“Huuugh!”

“Good grief, what a brat. This is the last time I’m asking. Are you coming, or should this old man come to you?”

The last time.

I could not fall for a phrase like that.

I had to hold out until the very last last.

“This old man will go, then. You’re dead today.”

“…I’ll come.”

With tears in my eyes, I opened them.

Jeok Cheongang was glaring at me, his eyes blazing like fire.

He truly looked worthy of the title Fire King.

Fuck. The Fire King.

What are you doing here, hyung[982]…?

No matter how many times I thought it over, the situation was utterly unbelievable.

[982] Hyung is a familiar Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man.

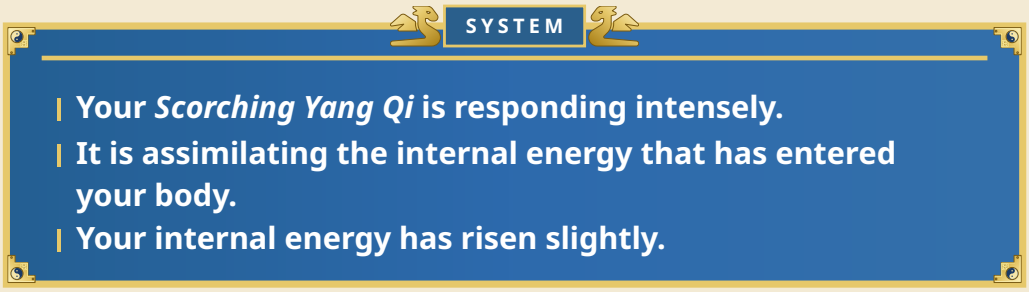
But reality did not change. That short, squat old man was the Fire King, a Supreme Peak master counted among the twenty strongest under heaven.

I had a feeling from the start.

I might have been the first person here to realize his true identity.

The moment Jeok Cheongang's internal energy surged into me, the System had delivered a telling message.

Ding.



It had happened in the blink of an eye. At first, I thought I was about to be roasted alive. But soon my stomach grew warm, as if I had just eaten a bowl of gukbap,[983] and my internal energy even increased.

What the hell is this?

At first, I was bewildered, but I figured something good was something good. The more I thought about it, though, the less I could afford to be so relaxed.

Wait. My Scorching Yang Qi came from eating the Blazing Flame Divine Pill.

Just because it was the same kind of Scorching Yang Qi, why would that make me immune to harm? I had even absorbed his internal energy.

After a brief but intense deliberation, I eventually reached a conclusion.

It was because they were of the same kind, both born from the same root.

That meant the old man belonged to the Fire Gate Clan, which passed its legacy down to a single successor in each generation. As far as I knew, the current Sect Leader was probably…

The Fire King… No way. Why would a man who had been off the radar for nearly forty years come here?

That was what I thought at the time.

They say the first of the five psychological stages cancer patients go through is denial. I was no different.

The only difference was that I reached the final stage—acceptance—in less than five minutes.

He was close friends with the Sword Saint, lived on Mount Jiuhua during the Great Faction War, and wiped out all the Demonic Cultists after they set fire to the mountain…

[983] Gukbap is a Korean dish of rice served in hot soup.

Fuck. He really is the Fire King.

The more I listened to Jeok Cheongang and Cheongpung's conversation, the more certain his identity became.

He had not explicitly declared that he was the Fire King, but anyone who had not figured it out by this point would have to be an idiot.

Once I finally reached the acceptance stage, a chill ran down my spine.

I'm fucked.

I pictured Jopil, dead with half his body blown away by my One Annihilation. I also thought of the Nameless Sword and the Flame Divine Palm martial arts manual sitting in my Inventory.

I had already gulped down the Blazing Flame Divine Pill, and it was safely stored in my dantian.

God, my stomach hurts.

Whether Jopil was that old man's disciple or not, I had a problem either way.

My thoughts in chaos, I trudged forward like an ox being led to slaughter. Jeok Cheongang raised a finger.

"I'll count to three. One."

Whoosh!

I charged forward with every ounce of strength I possessed. The Fire King looked at me as though I were the craziest bastard he had ever seen and opened his mouth.

"Hey."

"Yes!"

"You startled me! I'm not deaf, so speak softly!"

Smack!

A crisp impact left the back of my head throbbing. It was the first time I had ever been hit like that in the Murim.

Of course, I had no intention of protesting. My opponent was an irritable Supreme Peak master.

Jeok Cheongang narrowed his eyes as I kept my mouth shut.

"Well, look at you. You're much quieter than before."

"No, I'm not."

"Don't lie to this old man. You'd have better luck deceiving a ghost. Even the way you opened your eyes was different."

Cheongpung approached with a worried expression.

"Benefactor, are you all right?"

My body is fine. My soul is dying.

I answered in a half-dead voice.

"Yes. More or less…"

"More or less?"

Without so much as a turn signal, Jeok Cheongang stuck his head in and looked me up and down.

"Hmm. Now that I think about it, why are you so fine? You should have been unable to move and forced to circulate your energy for at least half an hour."

Why am I fine? Because I absorbed the Blazing Flame Divine Pill.

But I could not say that. Under his suspicious gaze, my mouth went dry.

"You're a strange one, the more I look at you. Which sect are you from?"

"I'm from the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"The Jin Family of Taiyuan… I'm sure I've heard of it somewhere."

Jeok Cheongang furrowed his brow for a moment, then exclaimed, "Ah!"

"Was it the Blade of Flowers? That's right. That fellow Jin Baekyang was from the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

Blade of Flowers Jin Baekyang.

He was the Head Elder.

I never expected that name to come up here.

Under Jeok Cheongang's demanding gaze, I licked my lips.

"That's right."

"I ran into him a few times in my travels. He was a decent fellow. He had a somewhat gloomy side, but everyone was like that back then. He was also unfailingly courteous."

All that remained to a person were their memories, especially for an old man like Jeok Cheongang, who did not have many years left to live.

But why did that memory have to be of the Head Elder?

Apparently, he remembered him quite fondly.

Then again, until recently, no one would have expected the Head Elder to do what he had done.

During the Great Faction War, his martial arts had been formidable enough to make him a leading candidate for Family Head, and he had been widely respected.

"Judging by your attainment, you carry the Jin Family of Taiyuan's blood. What is your relationship with the Blade of Flowers?"

"He's my great-uncle."

In reality, we had been locked in a relationship of killing or being killed. But I was not technically lying.

At the mention of shared blood, Jeok Cheongang's eyes softened.

"Oh-ho. Is that so?"

"Yes, sir."

"How old are you?"

“Twenty this year. I’ve just come of age.”

“You seem to have learned Scorching Yang Qi. Did the Blade of Flowers teach you?”

“…Yes.”

He had given me some instruction about two months ago at Eight Spring Gorge.

He had been so enthusiastic about it that Sword Energy had nearly split my head open.

“Your achievements are remarkable for your age. You’re far more advanced than the Blade of Flowers was in his day.”

Jeok Cheongang was even offering me compliments now.

The atmosphere had become warm and friendly overall.

Then he opened his mouth again.

“So, is he doing well?”

“Uh…”

Well, he’s doing fine in his grave, I suppose.

“His martial arts must have improved considerably by now. Should I stop by and see him while I’m here?”

“About that…”

You can visit, but you won’t be seeing his face.

The Head Elder’s grave was in one corner of the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s cemetery—in other words, the family cemetery.

The family elders had vehemently opposed it, but Jin Wikyung had pushed it through. He had felt guilty about the mistake made by his grandfather, the former Family Head.

“I suppose I should have a drink with him. It’s been a long time since we last met. Surely he won’t treat me coldly.”

I imagined Jeok Cheongang pouring liquor beside the Head Elder’s grave.

Damn it. I can’t keep this up.

I took a deep breath and opened my mouth.

“Um, there’s something I need to tell you.”

“What is it? Go ahead.”

“He passed away.”

“…What?”

“Just a couple of months ago, unfortunately.”

Jeok Cheongang was silent for a moment before muttering, “Already? He was still going strong.”

“…”

Going strong? He was over eighty.

Of course, he had possessed powerful internal energy. If he had stayed out of trouble, he might have lived another twenty years.

“What happened?”

“He fell in battle.”

“He fell in battle?”

A trace of anger appeared in Jeok Cheongang’s eyes.

“Was it the Demonic Cult bastards?”

“No. The circumstances were complicated and sensitive, so it’s difficult to explain.”

“Do you know who killed him?”

“…”

“Did you avenge him? From the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s perspective, he was the kind of bastard they could grind up and eat, bones and all, and still not be satisfied.”

Listening to him made me feel as if my bones were turning to jelly.

I lowered my head silently with a sorrowful expression. Sensing the subdued atmosphere, Jeok Cheongang stopped speaking.

Good. Perfect. Hyuk Mujin being unconscious was a stroke of genius.

If he had been awake, he would have been shooting me sidelong glances and practically shouting, This is the culprit. He killed him.

All right. As soon as I get out of here, I’m getting the hell away. Maybe I should just use Logout altogether.

Then, in the next moment, I realized something.

“Huh? Blade of Flowers Jin Baekyang—isn’t he the person you killed, Benefactor? Right?”

I had forgotten about that bastard.

Chapter 174

“Huh? Blade of Flowers Jin Baekyang—isn’t he the person you killed, Benefactor? Right?”

Only one thought crossed my mind.

I should’ve put a muzzle on that bastard ages ago.

Was he even human? No, he was an animal.

But it was already too late. Cheongpung was running wild like a pit bull off its leash.

“It’s a famous story. After a fierce battle, Benefactor drove his spear straight into the Blade of Flowers’s chest—bam! And the blood went splat!”

Please stop. That’s enough, you lunatic.

I had to shut him up, even now. I hurriedly opened my mouth, but before I could speak—

“I heard you even cursed at the Blade of Flowers. ‘Get your hands off me, you son of a bitch!’”

“…Where did you hear that?”

“Everyone I met seemed to know about it. When I told them I was close to Benefactor, lots of people came over and told me all kinds of things. The cook even packed me a ton of delicious food.”

No wonder he kept disappearing so often.

While staying with the Jin Family of Taiyuan, he must have wandered all over the place, eating plenty and listening to what people had to say.

And thanks to him, I’m fucked.

I swallowed hard and slowly turned my head.

Jeok Cheongang stood there with an utterly unreadable expression.

Jeok Cheongang’s eyebrow twitched.

“A misunderstanding?”

“Yes. Really. It truly is.”

“A misunderstanding. That’s possible. Rumors circulating through the Murim tend to get twisted and exaggerated.”

His dry voice continued.

“So you weren’t the one who killed the Blade of Flowers?”

“Uh… I was, actually. But the thing is—”

“Then there’s no need to hear any more.”

I could not finish my sentence.

Just a few steps away, Jeok Cheongang’s hands were blazing red.

Whoooosh.

I could feel it.

An overwhelming current of internal energy.

The cold shattered, and the scorching wind of a desert whipped around us. The heat forcing its way between my lips felt as though it would sear my lungs.

A memory from only a few months ago flashed through my mind.

The Flame Divine Palm?

That was it. The Flame Divine Palm.

But it was on an entirely different level from Jopil's.

It was several times stronger. Stronger, stronger, and simply stronger.

Jeok Cheongang was no longer an old man with little time left to live.

He was the Fire King incarnate.

"You defied the sacred bonds of kinship and killed the Blade of Flowers. Are you even human?"

"W-wait! There are some very profound and complicated circumstances behind that…"

That was a mistake.

Instead of babbling about circumstances, I should have blurted out that the Head Elder had betrayed the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Profound and complicated circumstances?

Shit, you have to let me explain before you decide anything.

For a moment, I had forgotten who I was dealing with.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

This was a man who had burned a thousand people to death for the simple offense of trespassing on his home and setting it on fire. Words like profound and complicated were light-years removed from him.

Whoooosh!

Damn old man…

No wonder they called him the Fire King. He was brutally straightforward and fiery as hell.

Feeling the heat of the Flame Divine Palm, I stared wide-eyed.

Is my life flashing before my eyes?

In a world slowed to a crawl, his flame-wreathed palm crept toward my chest.

If Jopil's Flame Divine Palm had been beef-bone soup, this was spicy fish stew loaded with hot green chilies.

If I took a direct hit from that, I could not guarantee I would survive.

I have to block it.

The problem was, I could not move so much as a finger.

The whole world seemed to be moving in slow motion only because my brain had registered the threat of death. Jeok Cheongang had not slowed down, and I had not gotten any faster.

Damn it.

I desperately tried to raise my hand, but it was already too late.

Jeok Cheongang's burning red palm filled my vision amid the darkness of despair.

Then—

Shiiiiing! Boom!

A streak of Sword Energy shot out of nowhere and slammed into Jeok Cheongang's hand.

Brilliant violet Sword Energy.

It was Cheongpung.

Beyond the thunderous explosion, I heard his desperate cry.

"Benefactor!"

Even Cheongpung's Sword Energy could not stop Jeok Cheongang's Flame Divine Palm. It had only slowed it for the briefest instant.

But the crossroads between life and death was always decided in that instant.

Now!

The forty-five years of internal energy coiled within my dantian stirred awake.

Scorching Yang Qi flared like wildfire and surged through countless acupoints.

Its destination was my hands.

I thrust them forward with all my strength to meet Jeok Cheongang's Flame Divine Palm.

Damn it. I don't even have time to draw a weapon.

Of all the things I could have come up with against the Flame Divine Palm, I was using my bare hands.

It was clearly insane, but it was the best insanity I could manage in this situation.

I roared from the depths of my soul.

"Cheongpung, you son of a biiiiitch!"

The instant my hands met the Flame Divine Palm—

Gooooong.

A deafening blast of splitting air erupted.

The thunderous boom seemed to split the sky.

After a brief silence, things began to change.

Fssssss.

Everything crumbled into ash and scattered through the air.

The stone wall Jang Taebo had painstakingly built ten years ago. The few trees he had planted in one corner of the yard.

All of it.

Black ash fluttered down onto the old man's white hair.

"W-what in the world…"

Jang Taebo could not stop trembling.

He had spent a long lifetime in the Murim—long enough for the mountains and rivers to have changed six times over, and then some.

He was merely a blacksmith who had never learned martial arts, but that was precisely why he had been able to meet so many people.

"I beg you. If that's what you want, I'll even give you my head!"

"Make me the finest sword under heaven."

"Are you the Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild? I was sent by the Imperial Son-in-Law."

From clueless martial artists to the leaders of renowned sects and great factions, even powerful figures from the imperial court had sought him out.

They came from every walk of life, but Jang Taebo's answer was always the same.

"If you are worthy, I will make one for you."

Jang Taebo believed that every blade had a soul.

For a blunt, rounded lump of metal to take shape, it had to endure thousands, tens of thousands, of hardships. It was bent countless times and beaten again and again. It was heated until it glowed, then cooled until it was cold.

Only once that long ordeal was over and it had finally taken shape did it gain a soul.

So it must also be my duty to choose a master worthy of the weapon.

Depending on whose hand wielded it, the weapon could become a killing blade or a life-giving blade.

Jang Taebo knew that better than anyone, which was why he never accepted a commission lightly.

One with a gentle nature. One overflowing with ambition. One determined to walk a path all his own…

No two people were alike. Countless people, each different from the next, had received weapons from him and returned to the Murim.

Some had died, while others survived.

But they all had one thing in common.

They were strong. Every last one of them.

They were masters capable of becoming the overlords of entire regions.

Strong enough to protect treasures coveted by all and use them as they saw fit.

Some had possessed martial arts that could be compared to those of the leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang[984] and the Five Great Families[985].

But…

This is different. This man is different.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

The aura and martial arts erupting from that diminutive frame were beyond human.

Jang Taebo also realized that Jeok Cheongang would never need a weapon.

His martial arts have reached the heavens.

Whether he held something in his hands no longer mattered.

This was the Supreme Peak realm he had only vaguely imagined.

"Phew."

Jang Taebo released the breath he had been holding. As the strength left his body, the object tucked inside his robe slipped to the ground.

So hard and light that it was difficult to believe it was a mineral, it gave off a faint glow even in broad daylight.

"Good grief!"

It was a treasure destined to be reborn as his final masterpiece—the greatest work of his life.

Jang Taebo hurriedly picked up the Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron and clutched it to his chest.

Then he froze.

As he came to his senses, he suddenly remembered something he had forgotten.

His client.

"W-wait! Stop! I said stop!"

Jang Taebo scrambled to his feet and rushed forward.

A young man lay naked at Jeok Cheongang's feet, every scrap of his clothing burned away. He was not moving at all.

"I-is he dead?"

Jeok Cheongang did not answer.

He merely looked back and forth between his hand and the young man, his face terrifyingly rigid.

"Say something!"

"…"

"Y-you…!"

---

[984] A collective name for nine major martial sects and one gang in Murim.

[985] A grouping of five major martial families in Murim.

Jang Taebo burst out in fury and was just about to examine Jin Taekyung when a clear voice stopped him.

“He’s not dead. He only suffered an internal injury and lost consciousness for a moment.”

The owner of the voice continued.

“Right, Grandpa Jeok?”

“…Yes.”

When Jeok Cheongang finally answered, his voice was hoarse.

Every word revealed his surprise and the complicated emotions roiling inside him.

“I never intended to kill him in the first place.”

Just as Cheongpung and Jang Taebo sighed in relief, Jeok Cheongang added one short sentence.

“Until now, that is.”

“…!”

“…!”

“Don’t worry. I’ll decide what to do after I hear the full story.”

Jeok Cheongang stared strangely at the fallen Jin Taekyung.

“I have a great many questions for this boy.”

The words sounded almost threatening, prompting Jang Taebo to step forward.

Even witnessing the Fire King’s martial prowess firsthand had not shaken the resolve hardened by his long years.

“That sounds as though you intend to torture him.”

“I have no taste for that. But if it proves necessary…”

“Do you have any idea who that young man is? You may be a master counted among the Ten Kings, but if you think you can make an enemy of the entire Shanxi Murim and emerge unscathed, you are gravely mistaken!”

Jeok Cheongang gave a short laugh.

“There were once men who swallowed half the world with an army of one hundred thousand. Do you think I feared them?”

“…!”

Jang Taebo was left speechless.

That was right. His opponent was the Fire King.

The old monster of Mount Jiuhua who had once fought alone against the Demonic Cult when it sought to rule the world.

Orthodox, unorthodox, or demonic—he belonged to none of them.

He had thrown his own weight onto the scales of war.

The reason was simple.

They had invaded his territory.

Jeok Cheongang stared at Jang Taebo with reddish eyes.

“I have one request. Please don’t ask anyone for help. I have no desire to burn down the Shanxi Murim at my age.”

He meant it.

And he possessed the power to make his words reality.

“Understood?”

“I-I’ll bear it in mind.”

“A wise decision.”

Jeok Cheongang grinned and turned away.

All the strength suddenly left Jang Taebo’s legs. As he began to fall, Cheongpung caught him and asked,

“Where are you going?”

“There’s an inn where you lot were staying, isn’t there? I’ll go ahead. Follow me.”

Cheongpung watched Jeok Cheongang’s back slowly recede and muttered plaintively,

“Whew. Grandfather was right. He really does have a strange personality.”

He said it so calmly that Jin Taekyung would have reached for a muzzle if he had heard.

Cheongpung turned to Jang Taebo and bowed deeply.

“Sorry for causing you so much trouble. We’ll be going now.”

Then he tucked Jin Taekyung under one arm and Hyuk Mujin under the other before trotting briskly away.

Jang Taebo stood there for a long while as though bewitched by a ghost.

Before long, he remembered the crucial fact that had momentarily slipped his mind.

Fire King, you goddamn old bastard.

There had to be a limit to this kind of outrageous behavior.

He had burned everything down, leaving nothing but the foundation stones.

Jang Taebo stared blankly at the ash drifting all around him, then let out a deep sigh.

“Fuck. This place is done for too.”

That was the moment his sweet retirement came to an end.

Chapter 175

In a shabby guest room, a diminutive old man silently gazed down at the young man lying on the bed.

Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Though he had yet to regain consciousness, Jin Taekyung's face looked peaceful. At a glance, he might have been sound asleep.

He took the Flame Divine Palm, and this is all he suffered?

Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue inwardly.

The technique had been executed by his own hand—a Supreme Peak martial art.

He had held back, but even so, its power was not something a young punk who had only just broken through to Peak should have been able to withstand.

There was only one possible answer, and Jeok Cheongang already knew what it was.

This boy has cultivated the same kind of Scorching Yang Qi as I have.

But not all Scorching Yang Qi was the same.

In some ways, internal energy resembled a weapon. Its essence was one, but it could take many forms.

Advanced cultivation techniques each displayed their own distinct characteristics, like Huashan's Zaha Divine Technique.

The same was true of the Fire Gate Clan, which Jeok Cheongang currently led as Sect Leader.

There's no way this boy learned the Fire Gate Divine Technique.

For hundreds of years, the Fire Gate Clan had strictly upheld its tradition of passing its teachings down to a single successor.

As the current Sect Leader, Jeok Cheongang knew better than anyone that nothing had ever leaked during that succession.

And yet, Jin Taekyung bore traces of his school…

It must have been that, after all.

The Blazing Flame Divine Pill.

No matter how he considered it, that was the only answer.

Jeok Cheongang smiled bitterly, his expression so lonely that anyone who knew him would have doubted their own eyes.

"So this is how it ended."

His aged voice echoed hollowly through the shabby guest room, then faded away.

For a long while, Jeok Cheongang's gaze seemed to pursue something that could neither be seen nor grasped. At last, it settled on Jin Taekyung's face.

His features were badly contorted, as though he were trapped in a nightmare.

“What is this old man to do with you…?”

At that moment, Jin Taekyung muttered something like a groan.

“Mmm… kimochiii.[986]”

“…”

Kimo… what?

Jeok Cheongang could not understand the word, but something about hearing it made him deeply uncomfortable.

He watched Jin Taekyung twitch over and over, murmuring “kimochi” all the while, then slowly shook his head.

What a strange fellow.

He left only after “kimochi” turned into “yamete.”[987]

Unable to endure any more, Jeok Cheongang fled the room with goose bumps prickling across his forearms.

…Is this some form of dark art after all?

His suspicions deepened.

When I opened my eyes, I saw a shabby ceiling.

A reddish oil lamp flickered nearby, and darkness had fallen beyond the window.

A sigh of relief escaped me before I knew it.

“Pheeeew.”

I was alive.

I had suffered a minor Internal Injury, but I was grateful it was no worse than that.

No, considering that my opponent had been the Fire King, it was nothing short of a miracle.

Had he really not meant to kill me?

No matter what I tried, I was no match for the Fire King. The same went for Cheongpung.

And yet, here I was, lying on a bed…

“Are you awake?”

“Gah!”

I leaped up like a startled carp.

Something crouched in a dark corner had slowly risen to its feet.

“You scared me, you crazy bastard!”

Hyuk Mujin replied gruffly.

---

[986] Kimochi is Japanese for “feeling”; in this context, it means “that feels good.”

[987] Yamete is Japanese for “stop it.”

“Why are you so surprised? It’s not as if this is your first time seeing my face.”

“Have you looked at your face? You think anyone could get used to that?”

“What’s wrong with my face? I’m handsome enough. My parents even worried about me when I was little.”

“Because they thought you’d have trouble getting through life with that face?”

“No. They were worried I’d be kidnapped because I was too pretty for a boy.”

Was he out of his mind?

With looks like his, his parents should not have worried about him being kidnapped. They should have worried he would grow up to become the kidnapper.

“…Tell them they can stop worrying.”

“I’ll tell them later.”

Hyuk Mujin shuffled toward me, then gasped and collapsed onto the floor.

“Ah, aagh! Hold on.”

“What? What’s wrong?”

His face twisted in pain.

“A cramp. I-I’ve got a cramp.”

“…You’ve really done one thing after another today. Are you sure you’re a martial artist?”

“That can happen when you sit still for too long. And whose fault is it that I was stuck in that corner?”

“How is that my fault?”

“You kept making weird noises. Gimokji, yamakdae.”

The words were carved into my soul.

They were beyond familiar. They felt like old friends. I flinched and asked,

“…I said that?”

“Yes. It gave me goose bumps, so I went outside. Then Great Hero Jeok told me to get back in here and sit quietly unless I wanted to burn to death. He said to report to him the moment you woke up.”

Hyuk Mujin continued with an aggrieved expression.

“He said it might be some kind of dark art, so I should keep my ears covered. But you wouldn’t stop. You just kept going, ‘Oh? Ahh, gimokji, gimokji…‘”

“…That’s enough, you bastard.”

This was the greatest humiliation of my life.

No wonder I had felt so electrified when I woke up. I must have been having a pretty good dream.

Just in case, I discreetly slipped a hand beneath the blanket.

Hmm. Clean. No problems.

With one problem taken care of, it was time to turn my attention to another.

In terms of importance, it was incomparably greater than the first.

My life was at stake, after all.

“Where’s that old geezer?”

There was no need to explain who I meant. Hyuk Mujin lowered his voice.

“He’s downstairs, drinking and carousing with Cheongpung.”

“He is? For how long?”

“I’m not sure. I only woke up a little while ago myself, but I asked the server, and he said they’d already been at it for more than three shichen.[988]”

I did not even need to focus my internal energy.

My hearing had grown sharper after I reached Peak, and it carried the drunken shouts and singing from downstairs straight to my ears.

Listen to them having the time of their lives.

One was an old man who attacked first and asked questions later. The other was an oblivious idiot who had barged in and caused this whole disaster.

I wanted to smash those villains’ heads in with a liquor bottle and shout, “Justice has been served!” But I held myself back.

…More precisely, I had no choice but to restrain myself.

“Phew.”

Being powerless was a sin. A sin.

As I let out a deep sigh, Hyuk Mujin cautiously spoke up.

“Captain.”

“What?”

“I think we should head downstairs soon.”

“Why the hell would I go down there?”

“Great Hero Jeok said to bring you down as soon as you regained consciousness…”

“Great Hero, my ass. How is that old man a Great Hero?”

“You’d call him Great Hero if he were standing in front of you.”

“…”

He had me there.

But obeying and going downstairs would be no different from leaping straight into a tiger’s jaws.

I began pulling on the clothes draped over the table at the speed of light.

“What are you doing?”

“Getting ready to bolt.”

“What?”

“I said I’m running away. Why? You coming?”

Hyuk Mujin grabbed my arm in alarm.

---

[988] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; three shichen is about six hours.

“Why are you running away?”

“That old geezer could lose his temper and burn me to death at any moment. If you were me, wouldn’t you run?”

“Is this about what happened earlier?”

“If by that, you mean the Head Elder?”

“Yes. If that’s what you’re worried about, Cheongpung and I already…”

I firmly cut him off.

“You must have explained everything ages ago. The misunderstanding should be cleared up by now.”

“Oh, you know?”

“Do you think I’m an idiot?”

I had passed out around noon, so at least half a day had gone by. No matter how hot-tempered Jeok Cheongang was, he must have investigated enough to learn the truth.

Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin would have done their best to clear up the misunderstanding as well.

Hyuk Mujin tilted his head.

“Then isn’t everything fine? You have no reason to run.”

Every second counted.

Pretending to rummage through my clothes, I quickly pulled an item from my Inventory and waved it at him.

“Here’s your reason.”

Flame Divine Palm

Hyuk Mujin examined the cover of the weathered martial arts manual and muttered,

“Ah, shii…”

“All right, here’s a question. What exactly is the relationship between Jopil, who possessed the Fire Gate Clan’s Flame Divine Palm manual, and Jeok Cheongang?”

“…”

“You’re starting to see it too, aren’t you? I’d bet my wrist and my entire fortune that they were master and disciple. What are you willing to bet?”

Hyuk Mujin bet nothing.

Instead, he desperately spread the wings of an imagination full of dreams and hope.

“W-wait a second. The two of them might not be master and disciple.”

“If not master and disciple, then what? Father and son? Considering they both have such shitty tempers, that actually sounds plausible too. Right?”

“Jopil might have stolen Great Hero Jeok’s belongings.”

I snorted hard enough to nearly launch a booger out of my nose.

“You think the Fire King is some harmless old man from the neighborhood? Who would dare steal from that geezer?”

The Fire King had killed a thousand Demonic Cultists because they set fire near his home.

Jopil might have been crazy, but unless he had gotten Botox injected into his liver,[989] he could not even have dreamed of doing such a thing.

After a moment’s hesitation, Hyuk Mujin nodded.

“…Fine. Let’s say Jopil was his Disciple.”

“I’m telling you, they were definitely master and disciple. And if you aren’t coming, let go of me. I’m busy.”

Hyuk Mujin ignored me and stubbornly continued.

“Even if Jopil was Great Hero Jeok’s Disciple, we were only doing our duty. Jopil was the one who attacked us and tried to kill us first.”

“Right. You and Cheongpung will be safe either way, so tell him that for me. I’ve got to get going.”

“Captain!”

“Now, Mujin. Let’s assume you’re right. Let’s say that foul-tempered old man admits his Disciple was at fault and lets the matter go. It’ll never happen, but let’s say he does.”

I peeled his hand away from my arm one finger at a time and asked,

“Then we’d still have to return everything Jopil stole, wouldn’t we?”

Hyuk Mujin nodded vigorously.

“Of course. If we kept it, we’d be asking to burn to death.”

“So what do you think would happen if we told him we couldn’t return it?”

“What? Captain, are you saying you want the Flame Divine Palm for yourself…?”

“Am I insane? Living a long and uneventful life is my philosophy. That’s why I even make my dumps thin and long on purpose!”

Under normal circumstances, he would have made a disgusted face and complained about my dirty talk. But now, he merely kept gulping dryly.

“Then what’s the problem?”

“The problem is that the Flame Divine Palm manual wasn’t the only thing Jopil had.”

I held up three fingers and began folding them down one by one.

“One, the Flame Divine Palm. Two, the Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron sword. And finally, three…”

“The Blazing Flame Divine Pill.”

[989] In Korean, the liver is associated figuratively with courage. Botox injected into it is an absurd image of someone gaining enough nerve to attempt the theft.

Hyuk Mujin's jaw had already dropped at the mention of the Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron sword. Now he looked at me uncertainly.

"…Do you mean that thing from back then? The one that massively boosts your internal energy but makes your body burst into flames?"

"Yeah. The one I was planning to give you along with the Flame Divine Palm manual a long time ago."

"Where is it now? Where's that thing?"

"Mujin."

My eyes glistening, I gazed out the window toward the north—the direction of the Mount Heng Sword Sect.

"Remember when we went to the Mount Heng Sword Sect?"

"Why are you bringing that up all of a sudden?"

"The Red Wind Band Leader was stronger than I expected. How was I supposed to beat someone who'd defeated Cheol Mubaek and even Jin Mukyung?"

"H-hold on. Then, back then…?"

"Yeah. It worked like a charm."

With the emotions of a woman three weeks pregnant who had just checked a pregnancy test, I stroked my stomach.

"I put it in here. The Blazing Flame Divine Pill."

"…"

"They say it's a secret divine elixir of the Fire Gate Clan. If I want to return it, I'll have to cut open my stomach and drain the blood."

"…"

"So stop holding me back. I'm casting off every shackle and restraint in this world and setting out to find a way to survive…"

At that moment, Hyuk Mujin moved with greater agility than ever before.

Tap-tap-tap—whoosh!

Clutching his ever-present satchel to his chest, he launched himself through the wide-open window.

In that moment, I saw a bird.

That bastard.

How dare he try to escape before me?

And he had even taken the satchel containing our silver nyang[990] and food!

"Hey, Hyuk Mujin!"

By the time I hissed the words after him, it was already too late.

Hyuk Mujin glanced back at me with the serene eyes of a man who had attained enlightenment.

---

[990] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; here it refers to silver money.

Then his body dropped straight down.

“Goddammit.”

I had to get out of there too.

I dashed to the window and was just about to throw myself outside when—

Crack! Thud!

Hyuk Mujin, who had been sprinting away for all he was worth, suddenly crumpled as though he had been shot.

The object that struck him squarely in the temple was one I knew very well.

“…A chicken bone?”

The next moment, an aged voice rose from below.

“You stupid fool. Can’t you tell a chicken from a duck?”

Step. Step.

A small shadow swayed in the light of the lantern hanging by the inn’s entrance.

A wrinkled face suddenly appeared. It looked up at me, my body draped over the window, and grinned.

“Where were you going?”

After witnessing 14,000,605 possible futures,[991] I arrived at the most appropriate answer.

“To the privy.”

“Do you want to shit blood?”

“No.”

Yeah. I knew that would not work.

[991] The number alludes to Doctor Strange viewing 14,000,605 possible futures in Avengers: Infinity War.

Chapter 176

I feel like I've gone back to high school.

Like I got caught by the school disciplinarian while trying to sneak out of evening self-study.[992] Of course, the despair I felt back then was nothing compared to this.

The person holding my ear right now wasn't a school disciplinarian.

He was the Fire King.

Crack.

"Ah! Aaaagh! It hurts! Something just made a weird noise in my ear!"

Jeok Cheongang glared at me.

"Shall I make sure you never hear another sound?"

"…"

Judging by everything he had said and done so far, he was more than capable of following through.

I clamped my mouth shut and let Jeok Cheongang lead me along by the ear.

"Sit."

"Yes, sir."

I sat on a crude wooden chair and looked around.

The old inn was dark and gloomy. The owner was nowhere to be seen, and a server who looked barely twenty sat dozing at a table near the entrance.

Damn it. There aren't even any other customers.

I must have been unconscious for longer than I thought. There were only four people on the first floor.

The dozing server, Jeok Cheongang, me—and Cheongpung, already dead drunk and sprawled face-down on the table, drooling.

It was the perfect place to die without anyone being the wiser.

No. They say that even in a tiger's den, you'll survive as long as you keep your wits about you.

Even so, I needed some kind of life insurance, just in case.

Unfortunately, the only brake capable of stopping Jeok Cheongang was currently fast asleep and snoring.

Cheongpung, you need to wake up if I'm going to survive this.

I was carefully stretching my leg beneath the table, preparing to step on Cheongpung's foot, when—

"Let him sleep."

"Huh?"

"I said leave him alone. Don't bother the boy when he's sleeping."

---

[992] Evening self-study is a supervised after-school study period common in South Korean high schools.

At this point, he might as well have been a ghost.

I hadn't made a sound or even moved noticeably, yet he knew exactly what I was doing beneath the table.

"Your answer?"

"…I'll stay still."

"You're not entirely clueless, I see. You might live a long life yet."

Jeok Cheongang muttered something that could have been either praise or an insult, then tilted the liquor bottle.

As the empty cup slowly filled, the cheap liquor's sharp scent stung my nose.

"I have something to ask you."

"I'll explain everything in detail about the Head Elder—no, my great-uncle."

"I've already heard. He committed more than enough crimes to deserve death. He was a fairly sharp fellow once, but time has ruined a lot of people…"

Jeok Cheongang downed his drink in one gulp and muttered bitterly,

"That child was like that, too."

"…"

"Where did you meet him?"

The question came out of nowhere, but I understood immediately.

The "child" Jeok Cheongang had just mentioned was Jopil.

He already knew that Jopil and I were connected. The worst possible situation had become reality.

"If you're thinking of lying, you'd better abandon the idea now. You'll end up telling the truth anyway."

Jeok Cheongang's voice sank like an abyss, sending a shiver down my spine.

There was no point in lying or making excuses anymore. Right now, he was the prosecutor, the defense attorney, and the judge who could hand down any sentence he pleased.

Damn it.

My parched mouth tasted bitter. He wasn't even releasing Scorching Yang Qi, yet I was so thirsty I could barely speak.

"Give me a drink too."

"You cheeky bastard."

Despite saying that, Jeok Cheongang readily filled my cup.

I hurriedly gulped down the strong liquor, and only then could I breathe again.

Right. It wasn't over yet. The more dangerous the situation, the more I needed to keep my wits about me if I wanted to escape it.

I took a deep breath and began.

"It was about two months ago. That's when I met Jopil."

“Jopil?”

“Yes. One Question, One Kill, Jopil. He was a fairly famous wandering martial artist.”

“Judging by his alias, he probably wasn’t famous for anything good.”

“…You could say that.”

He hadn’t just been bad. He had been practically insane.

Back then, I had seen Jopil as nothing more or less than a man obsessed with killing. He had genuinely enjoyed it.

“Is this his face?”

Jeok Cheongang pulled a sheet of paper from inside his robe.

It was so old that it had yellowed with age and was crumpled all over, but the young man’s face drawn on it was still easy to recognize.

“Is that Jopil when he was young?”

“It seems it was him after all. So that’s what became of him.”

His words sounded more like a monologue than an answer to my question.

After remaining silent for a while, Jeok Cheongang suddenly spoke again.

“More than twenty years ago, a terrible epidemic swept through Anhui Province. Countless commoners died, and even more children were left orphaned. He was one of them.”

The moment had come for Jopil’s true identity, unknown to everyone, to be revealed. Depending on what Jeok Cheongang said next, my future would be decided.

I held my breath and listened.

Jeok Cheongang continued slowly. As the clear liquor rippled in his cup, memories of those days rose vividly to the surface.

“He was a child struggling desperately to survive. Even while a dozen or so people surrounded him and trampled him, he shoved a dirt-covered dumpling into his mouth.”

“…”

“I liked the fierceness in his eyes, and I pitied him too. I gave him the name Jangcheon—Vast Sky.”

That was how Jangcheon came to live in a hut deep within Mount Jiuhua.

He was the first outsider to set foot there in the fifty long years since Jeok Cheongang had seen his Master off.

“At first, he knew nothing. It wasn’t until a year later that he realized I was a martial artist. Soon afterward, he began begging me to teach him martial arts.”

To an orphan with no one in the world, who had lived amid contempt and hunger, martial artists might as well have been beings from the heavens.

The boy wanted to become a martial artist and change his life. That was why he desperately clung to the old man who had saved him.

“Please accept me as your Disciple.”

“No.”

“Master!”

“Master? Who said I was your Master? You lack both the physique and martial talent to learn our sect’s arts.”

“I’ll do it. I’ll find a way to prove myself. Even if it kills me, I won’t disappoint you, Master!”

“…Don’t be ridiculous.”

Jeok Cheongang thought Jangcheon would not last long.

But the boy’s determination was far more tenacious than he had expected. For an entire year, Jangcheon tried to persuade him every single day. Eventually, he even went so far as to injure himself and refuse food.

Each time, Jeok Cheongang was the one left sweating bullets.

“You fool. Why would you do something like this?”

“I want to learn martial arts. Please accept me as your Disciple.”

“…I can’t.”

“Is it because I’m lacking?”

“It is an unavoidable decision if I am to continue the sect’s lineage. This will be difficult for you too.”

“No matter how difficult it is, I can endure it!”

“No. If you insist on being this stubborn, I’ll have no choice but to send you down the mountain. Is that what you want?”

In truth, Jeok Cheongang was the one who did not want them to part.

With the infirmities of old age creeping up on him, it seemed he had grown lonely for human company. A year had been more than enough time for him to grow attached to the scarred, taciturn boy who had endured far too much for his age.

But…

“Then do it. I’m destined to die anyway, aren’t I?”

“What?”

“If I can’t serve you as my Master, I’ll kill myself. No—kill me now. Kill me with the same hand that saved me.”

“You little—!”

What was so important about martial arts?

Seeing Jangcheon ready to throw away his own life for them, Jeok Cheongang felt hurt and furious.

But at the same time, another thought occurred to him.

“His martial talent and physical aptitude may have been lacking, but with tenacity like that, I thought he was bound to achieve Great Completion[993] one day.”

Jin Taekyung, who had been listening quietly, asked with an uneasy expression,

“That kind of tenacity… Is that why you accepted him as your Disciple?”

“Yes.”

Jeok Cheongang added with a sigh,

“It was a mistake.”

That was the most painful mistake he had made in all the hundred years since his birth.

“For several years, everything went smoothly. He improved so quickly that the concerns I’d had before accepting him as my Disciple seemed foolish.”

Jangcheon followed his Master’s instructions faithfully.

No—it was closer to absolute obedience.

He swung his sword like a madman all day long and devoted himself to training his stamina. Even when learning the smallest, most basic techniques, he poured his entire being into them as though he were practicing the greatest martial art under heaven.

With his Disciple training with such passion and devotion, Jeok Cheongang could not help but be deeply moved. He did everything in his power to help Jangcheon grow.

Jangcheon’s talent and physical aptitude were only slightly above average, but Jeok Cheongang gradually improved his constitution by cleansing his sinews and washing his marrow.

A Master and Disciple who trusted and relied on each other.

Remarkable achievements.

Everything seemed to be going perfectly.

“The problem came afterward.”

The old man remained old, but the boy grew into a young man.

Yet his martial arts failed to develop along with his body. Jangcheon grew furious with himself after spending years making no progress, and eventually, something happened.

“I still remember it clearly. I had more trouble sleeping than usual that night, so I was sitting on a rock when he came up from below. He’d been out of sight for several days, claiming he was in closed-door cultivation.[994]”

Jin Taekyung tilted his head.

“What do you mean, he came up from below?”

---

[993] Great Completion is a stage of mastery in martial arts training.

[994] Closed-door cultivation is a period of secluded martial arts training.

“He had gone to the village. The wind carried the musk courtesans use.”

“Oh. A pleasure house?”

“I understood. He had spent more than ten years learning nothing but martial arts, barely ever leaving the mountain. What could I say when his own Master had been of so little help and cared only for his own cultivation?”

At the time, Jeok Cheongang had been immersed in training to open his upper dantian.

Opening the upper dantian meant entering the Martial Extremity realm. It would not only raise his martial arts to another level, but also treat the infirmities of old age that were steadily eating away at him.

“But it wasn’t easy. It required lengthy preparation, time, and enlightenment.”

As a result, Master and Disciple gradually began seeing less of each other.

Jeok Cheongang believed that his Disciple, who had always worked so hard, would attain enlightenment on his own, so he focused on cultivating his upper dantian.

He noticed Jangcheon’s trips down the mountain only on the occasional days when the wind carried a mixture of unfamiliar scents.

“Then one day, a visitor came.”

“A visitor?”

“The Azure Sky Sword King. I had never seen his face before, but I recognized him immediately. He was exactly as I’d heard.”

Jin Taekyung’s jaw dropped.

“The Azure Sky Sword King? One of the Ten Kings?”

“Yes. He was also the Grand Family Head of the Namgung Family.”

“Why did he come?”

Jeok Cheongang tilted the liquor bottle without a word.

He had already emptied several bottles by himself, yet his mind only grew clearer. So too did the words the Azure Sky Sword King had spoken when he appeared without warning.

“These days, the brats in my family have been throwing a fit. There’s some vicious bastard running wild in Anhui, but they say they can’t catch him. They begged me so desperately that I had no choice but to come see you.”

Jeok Cheongang had been bewildered.

The Namgung Family’s influence in Anhui was immense.

If even their power had proven insufficient, to the point that the Azure Sky Sword King himself had to step in, then just how powerful was this bastard?

“Then why did you come to me? Are you saying the bastard is some kind of Martial God?”

“If he were a Martial God, he wouldn’t be killing only innocent women and mediocre wandering martial artists. I saw him once from a distance, but I let him go.”

“What does that—”

“A Master should correct his Disciple’s mistakes, shouldn’t he?”

Not long after the Azure Sky Sword King left, Jeok Cheongang stood absentmindedly on the rock and caught a scent carried on the wind.

It was the smell of blood.

Chapter 177

Why hadn't I known?

Perhaps it was the faith I had placed in the Disciple I'd raised as my own flesh and blood. Perhaps it was indifference. But the scent of blood had unmistakably clung to Jangcheon as he staggered up the mountain that day.

"Where have you been?"

"Ah, Master."

His eyes were flushed with drink—and something else.

"I went down to the village for a little while. I've been feeling restless lately, so I had a drink."

"Drinking. Was that all?"

"It's a little embarrassing to say. Hahaha! I'm sorry you had to see me like this."

The pungent musk courtesans used stung Jeok Cheongang's nose. But it was merely a veil meant to conceal the truth.

Beneath it, he could smell the faint scent of blood. The smell of death. The smell of a killer—a scent he had forgotten since the Great Faction War.

"You went to a pleasure house…?"

"As expected, I can't fool you, Master. Yes. This useless Disciple was troubled, so I sought the company of women."

The Disciple he had not seen in so long had become a completely different person.

The taciturn, unsmiling boy was gone. In his place stood a smooth-talking killer who concealed his murders without a trace of concern.

"But what brings you out at this late hour? Have you made any progress in your closed-door cultivation?"

"…It had been so long since I'd seen your face. I was waiting for you."

He had apparently murdered dozens of innocent commoners in horrific ways.

His Disciple had committed a crime that made heaven and earth furious. The right thing to do would have been to sever his Sinews and Meridians and cripple his dantian at once. That was what a Master should do.

But—

"I see. I'm glad to see you too, Master."

At Jangcheon's faint smile, Jeok Cheongang found himself unable to speak. He felt neither anger nor betrayal. Something simply welled up from deep inside him, choking off his words.

In the end, there was only one thing he could say.

"It's late. Go get some rest."

Jin Taekyung listened to Jeok Cheongang's story with disbelief written across his face.

“Wait. That’s it?”

“I wanted to believe in that child.”

“You already knew. You knew Jopil—or rather, Jangcheon—was lying.”

“I knew.”

“And you still let the bastard go?”

“Yes. Even so.”

The old man continued in a weary voice.

“Do you have any blood relatives?”

“Yes.”

“I have none. As far back as I can remember, I was alone. He was the same.”

Jeok Cheongang looked down at his hands. Age spots and wrinkles covered them, each one bearing the imprint of the years.

“My Master was a strict man. His training was harsh and painful, but as a child, I even liked that. I was happy simply knowing that someone cared about me and was there beside me. My Master was the only person I could rely on.”

But his time with his Master had been brief. Jeok Cheongang was left alone once more, and over the years, his loneliness slowly grew numb.

Until he met a child in the marketplace, fighting desperately to protect a single dumpling.

“I was the only person that child could rely on. Even if all under heaven pointed fingers at him, I had to believe in him.”

At some point, Jangcheon had become more than a Disciple to Jeok Cheongang.

He was his only son and his grandson. They shared no blood, but Jeok Cheongang loved him more deeply than family.

“But what that child did was too horrible. I had to make him stop. One way or another.”

Before that, however, he wanted to see his Disciple’s atrocities with his own eyes.

The fact that the Azure Sky Sword King had come in person meant that all the circumstantial and physical evidence was already in hand. But that alone was not enough.

“So I began following him in secret.”

From that day on, Jeok Cheongang followed his Disciple. Evading Jangcheon’s notice was easy, since he had yet to break through to the Peak realm.

Once, twice, ten times…

With each pursuit, the despair Jeok Cheongang had initially felt began to fade.

Like any other wastrel, Jangcheon merely visited pleasure houses, drank, and embraced women. When he returned to his hut flushed with liquor, he became a martial artist once more and diligently resumed his training.

Nothing seemed amiss.

“Then a thought occurred to me. Perhaps there had been some mistake. Perhaps the Namgung Family and the Azure Sky Sword King had misjudged him.”

Jin Taekyung stared at him incredulously.

“I think you’re the one who misjudged him, Sir Jeok.”

Jeok Cheongang laughed hollowly.

“Yes. I did. Like a fool, I desperately turned away from the truth.”

“So did you eventually see it for yourself?”

“…”

Jeok Cheongang silently raised the bottle and drank straight from it.

The ceiling looked blurry, not because the liquor was strong, but because the memory of that day had returned with perfect clarity.

Thud. Thud. Thud.

In a back alley of the red-light district, beneath the heavy darkness of night, muffled groans mingled with spurts of blood.

The back of the masked man stabbing and prodding someone’s limbs with a sharp dagger was more familiar than anything—and more foreign than ever.

“…Jangcheon.”

At the quiet call, the hand gripping the dagger abruptly froze. The masked man slowly turned, and his eyes met Jeok Cheongang’s.

At the sight of his Master after so long, the Disciple’s eyes curved into crescents.

“Ah, Master.”

“What… What are you doing?”

“What do you mean? Exactly what you see.”

Jangcheon grinned and drove the dagger down.

Thud. Thud. Thud.

The middle-aged man, his limbs bound, writhed in agony.

“Stop at once!”

“Why should I?”

“…W-What did you say?”

“It’s been a long time since I came down here, and all kinds of people are running wild. Wandering martial artists swaggering around because they know a few Third Rate martial arts, merchants with fat bulging from their bodies, and women whose only property they can sell is their own bodies. What a madhouse.”

Jangcheon flashed a white smile.

“This man is just one of them. What difference does it make if I kill one such person? He’s nothing more than a two-legged beast with no reason to live.”

Everything felt like a dream to Jeok Cheongang. The hope he had clung to while watching his Disciple for the past four months vanished like a bursting bubble.

“Why… Why would you do this?”

“Because I’m strong.”

Jangcheon continued, his voice brimming with excitement.

“Might makes right. Didn’t you teach me that, Master? Murim—no, the entire world—is like that. The weak die at the hands of the strong.”

“You killed innocent people for no better reason than that?”

“Innocent? How could you possibly know they were innocent, Master?”

“Then what terrible crimes did the people you killed commit?”

Jeok Cheongang wanted them to have deserved death.

He wanted them to have been corrupt merchants who sucked the lifeblood from others, or vicious ruffians who murdered as casually as they ate—not simple commoners who knew nothing of the world and spent their lives toiling like oxen.

But…

“How should I know?”

“…!”

“Who in this world lives without sin? They were simply unlucky. The same goes for this man who happened to catch my eye.”

The world seemed to recede before Jeok Cheongang’s eyes.

The Disciple he loved like his own flesh and blood had already crossed a river from which there was no return.

Those who reached the far bank never came back. They lived out the rest of their days as blood-soaked killing fiends.

“Jangcheon.”

“Yes, Master.”

The face of the scrawny child he had met in the marketplace more than a decade ago overlapped with that of the blood-drenched young man before him.

“What in the world made you like this?”

“What do you mean?”

“You… You weren’t this kind of child. The weak die at the hands of the strong? Have you forgotten the person you once were, struggling desperately just to survive?”

“I haven’t forgotten. That’s why I am who I am now.”

“No. You were kind and diligent…”

“Master.”

Jangcheon gently cut him off.

It was the first time the Disciple had ever interrupted or contradicted his Master. But now, even open mockery lingered at the corners of Jangcheon’s mouth.

“I remember the day I first met you as clearly as if it were yesterday. I had gone hungry for days and was wandering the marketplace when I found a dirt-covered dumpling. Even as boys no better off than I was trampled me, I kept forcing it into my mouth.”

“That’s right. You did it to survive. Why can’t you remember that you were once weak too?”

Jangcheon’s lips twisted.

“Wangpal. Hong Sochil. So U-pyeong.”

“…?”

“Three of the fifteen who tried to take my dumpling. Unfortunately, the others were already dead.”

Three names fell from his Disciple’s lips.

Their meaning was unmistakable. Those three no longer belonged to this world. And until the moment they breathed their last, they must have suffered unimaginable pain.

“They didn’t remember me, but I never forgot them for a single day. More than ten years ago, as I chewed that dirt-covered dumpling, I realized something. So this is the world. The weak are trampled, and the strong do the trampling. Then I must become strong. I must enjoy the rights of the strong.”

As Jangcheon recited the vow he had made that day in a chilling voice, Jeok Cheongang finally understood.

“You… You…”

“Yes. I never changed. Not once, from the day I first met you until now.”

His white teeth gleamed in the darkness. Jangcheon giggled.

“It was thrilling. At first, they begged me to spare them. Later, they screamed at me to kill them. But once they finally fell silent, I felt empty inside. Drinking myself senseless at a pleasure house and embracing a woman couldn’t make the feeling go away.”

He could only have been a born Slaughter Saint.

Only murder could fill that emptiness. Jangcheon would likely go on killing until the moment he drew his final breath.

“The timing was perfect. You happened to be so absorbed in your training that you neglected me, which allowed me to run wild to my heart’s content.”

Jeok Cheongang wanted to cover his ears. He wanted to cover his ears, close his eyes, and erase the memory of that day, which had been branded into his mind.

His body trembled with rage and betrayal toward the Disciple he had raised as his own kin.

But what tormented him most was the affection he still felt for that Disciple.

“Of course, I wasn’t entirely at ease either. Was it four months ago? I came back after taking care of some business and found you waiting for me. The moment I saw you acting unlike yourself, I knew I’d been found out.”

“Stop.”

“You trusted me far too completely to start following me for no reason, so someone must have tipped you off… Ah, it must have been the Namgung Family.”

“I said shut up!”

A tremendous wave of qi tore through the alley.

Confronted with a fury he had never before seen from his Master, Jangcheon’s eyes widened.

“Master?”

“You bastard! How dare you call me Master with that mouth? Do you still not understand what you’ve done?”

“Why are you acting like this? Surely you don’t intend to cast aside your only Disciple over something so trivial?”

“Trivial? Did you call this trivial?”

“Master, you’re like a father to me. I believed that even if everyone under heaven condemned my faults, you would understand. Because you’re my father.”

Father.

The word Jeok Cheongang had wanted so desperately to hear.

He gritted his teeth.

“You’re wrong.”

“Wrong?”

Jangcheon smiled faintly.

“Then why don’t you strike me dead right now? You had countless chances, both now and throughout the past four months.”

“That’s—”

“Am I wrong?”

Jeok Cheongang could not answer. Everything Jangcheon had said was true. He had deliberately looked away from the truth and tried to justify doing so.

Because no matter what it took, he had wanted to believe in his Disciple.

A long time passed before he finally spoke.

“I’ll sever your Sinews and Meridians.”

“My Sinews and Meridians. And then?”

“I’ll cripple your dantian. You’ll spend the rest of your life repenting for your crimes.”

“Facing a wall in meditation until the day I die. The very thought is horrifying.”

Despite his words, Jangcheon’s face was full of laughter.

“But did our sect’s rules change while this useless Disciple wasn’t looking? As I understand it, a case like this calls for immediate execution, no questions asked.”

“…This is my final act of mercy. Put that man down and step away at once.”

Jangcheon blinked as if he had forgotten something important.

The middle-aged man in his arms, his entire body drenched in blood, was still drawing ragged breaths.

“Ah, right. I’d forgotten about him.”

Slash.

Blood erupted in a fountain.

Jeok Cheongang stared at it with trembling eyes.

Jangcheon’s hand had moved without the slightest hesitation. The man’s throat had been cut. His body convulsed, then fell still.

“Is this your answer?”

“It’s already too late. Even if I saved him, he would spend the rest of his life crippled. Wouldn’t it be better to give him a clean death?”

“You… You’re no longer the child I knew.”

“I am exactly the child you knew, Master. You simply misunderstood me from the very beginning.”

“Enough. Your evil deeds end today.”

“Do you truly intend to cripple me and make me spend the rest of my life facing a wall?”

A faint fear showed on his Disciple’s face.

Jeok Cheongang clenched his fist until blood seeped from his palm. One move. A single move was all it would take to erase Jangcheon from this world.

But he knew he could not bring himself to do it.

Severing his Disciple’s Sinews and Meridians, crippling his martial arts, and imprisoning him was the best he could do.

“Do you regret it?”

“Regret?”

“Yes. Regret.”

It would change nothing, but Jeok Cheongang wanted to hear the answer from Jangcheon’s own lips.

Then, in the next instant, every trace of fear vanished from Jangcheon’s face.

“I was relieved.”

“What?”

“I couldn’t see or hear you, but I knew you had been watching me for the past four months. Why else do you think I did this right in front of you?”

Jangcheon’s face was reflected in Jeok Cheongang’s vacant eyes. He continued with perfect composure.

“You can’t kill me, Master. It wouldn’t matter if I killed not dozens but hundreds. Before I left, I wanted to confirm that one last time.”

“Before you leave? What do you mean?”

“There may be fathers who blame their children for their faults, but there is no father anywhere in this world who kills his own child with his own hands.”

“…!”

“Thank you, Master. Thank you for raising me as your child rather than merely your Disciple. Thank you for trying to save a child like me until the very end. Thanks to you, my one path to survival has opened.”

Jeok Cheongang stood frozen as if his breath had stopped. Before him, Jangcheon gave a deep bow filled with genuine sincerity.

When he raised his head again, a small white porcelain vial was held between his lips.

“It’s Bone-Melting Powder.”

Bone-Melting Powder was a deadly poison that dissolved flesh and bone.

Even a tiny amount would be fatal if the vial shattered inside his mouth. Not even a celestial immortal could save him.

Jeok Cheongang roared in fury.

“Jangcheon! You bastard!”

“That bow I just gave you… was my final farewell. I’m leaving now. I’ll go far away and never return.”

“You think I’ll let you leave like this?”

“Then kill me. That’s the only way.”

“…!”

“Kill me.”

Kill me.

Those were his Disciple’s final words.

Jeok Cheongang blinked. The ceiling had looked blurry for some time, and now something was running down his cheek.

“The inn is old. Rain must be leaking through.”

It was a winter night, one day before New Year’s Day.[995]

[995] Here, New Year’s Day is the first day of the traditional lunar calendar.

Chapter 178

“The inn is old. Rain’s leaking in.”

I stared up at the blameless ceiling.

“It is a little run-down.”

Of course, no rain was falling. The ink-dark sky was perfectly still.

It wasn’t the inn that was old, but Jeok Cheongang’s heart. Remembering the painful events of long ago had sprung a leak in his eyes.

I thought the old man had neither blood nor tears in him.

Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

I had never imagined that this irascible Supreme Peak master had a past like this. I also had to revise my assessment of Jopil, whom I had dismissed as merely insane.

He was even crazier than I thought.

He had thoroughly used and discarded the Master who had saved him from the brink of death. From what I’d heard, he clearly hadn’t felt a shred of guilt, even at the very end.

I was shocked that anyone could be filled with such pure malice—and relieved that Jopil no longer existed in this world.

“But he still managed to escape alive. The Namgung Family must have been keeping a close eye on him.”

The Namgung Family—a staple of martial arts novels.

They were one of the Five Great Families, an organization said to rival the Nine Sects and One Gang. I might not know the details, but hunting down and killing a single fugitive should have been nothing to them.

Unless someone had helped him.

“Could it be…?”

At my question, Jeok Cheongang calmly nodded.

“I went to the Azure Sky Sword King and asked for his help. It was the last duty I could perform.”

The Disciple had abandoned his Master and left, yet the Master had protected him to the very end.

The more I heard, the more unbelievable their Master-Disciple relationship became.

“…That’s incredible.”

“Incredible? I raised a Slaughter Saint like him as my Disciple, then let him loose upon the world because I was blinded by personal affection. It was a foolish choice.”

Jeok Cheongang continued with a self-deprecating laugh.

"The Azure Sky Sword King told me the same thing. He said I would regret it. He was right. Every moment of the past ten years has been filled with regret."

"If you could go back to that day, what would you do?"

His answer came without hesitation.

"I would save him. And I would regret it all over again. Even if I were given a hundred chances, the man I was then would make the same choice every time."

The me back then would have done the same?

That was a loaded choice of words. It also meant that the Jeok Cheongang of today was different.

Could it be…?

Perhaps those ten years had been his time to prepare.

To prepare himself to personally kill the Disciple who might still be committing atrocities somewhere in the world.

If that was the case…

A thought flashed through my mind, and I asked carefully—very carefully.

"Um…"

"Speak."

Jeok Cheongang's voice was low. His fathomless gaze seemed to see through everything, and my heart began to pound.

I swallowed, then opened my mouth.

"I believe there's something you want to ask me."

We hadn't sat down face-to-face just to reminisce about the past.

He had questions for me, and I had questions for him.

We each had things to ask and answers to give. And I wasn't the one holding the sword hilt.

"I'll answer you. Whatever you ask."

"…"

Jeok Cheongang, the one holding the sword hilt, silently ran his fingers over his empty wineglass.

The silence seemed as though it might never end. Fifteen minutes? Half an hour? Half a shichen[996]? I had no idea how much time passed.

A cold wind howled outside, but whether from tension or something else, my entire body was drenched in sweat.

At last, the long silence broke.

"…Is he dead?"

His voice was terribly hoarse. He was trying to sound calm, but the question held a jumble of emotions.

---

[996] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

When I nodded, the old man's gray eyes trembled.

"I see. So that's how it ended."

Jeok Cheongang unconsciously tried to tip back his wineglass, then noticed that it was empty and gave a hollow laugh.

"I suspected as much. I sensed traces of our sect in you."

It was because of the internal energy I had gained from the Blazing Flame Divine Pill. Just as his internal energy had led me to suspect that he was the Fire King, mine had told him the same thing.

"Did he die peacefully?"

"That…"

I pictured Jopil thrashing as blood streamed from his seven apertures.

After drawing on even his innate qi, he had fought me to the death and died with half his upper body blown away.

When I hesitated, Jeok Cheongang waved a wrinkled hand.

"Enough. It was my fault for asking a pointless question. What peaceful death is there in a battle between martial artists?"

"His suffering would have been brief."

"A man who spent his life inflicting pain on countless others received a better death than he deserved."

Despite his words, his expression was bitter.

If Jeok Cheongang had found Jopil, he would have used the finest move at his disposal.

He would have granted him the swiftest, most painless death possible.

Maybe that was why he returned to the world.

But Jeok Cheongang had failed to achieve his goal. Jopil had encountered me before his former Master could reach him, and lost his life.

How would Jeok Cheongang react—

"I owe you a debt."

"Pardon?"

"Did you not hear me? I said I owe you."

"No, I heard you. It's just…"

I was dumbfounded.

Never in my wildest dreams had I expected those words to come from him so easily.

As I blinked at him, wondering what on earth was happening, Jeok Cheongang continued.

"Someone had to stop that child. You did in my stead what I should have done ten years ago. And…"

Jeok Cheongang's lips suddenly twitched, as though he had never said anything like this to anyone before.

After a brief hesitation, he finally spoke.

"I'm sorry. I sincerely apologize to all of you for acting so rashly before."

My voice burst out before I could stop it.

"Whoa."

"Whoa?"

"Ah, it's nothing. I was so surprised that it just slipped out."

"Is it truly so astonishing for this old man to apologize?"

It seemed plenty astonishing to me. Besides, he'd looked incredibly uncomfortable saying it, so what was he complaining about?

"…Well, you see…"

I trailed off awkwardly, then saw Jeok Cheongang's face beginning to contort and quickly changed my tune.

"The renowned Fire King, Great Hero Jeok Cheongang, personally apologizing to a junior as young as me! I can only bow before your magnanimity and humility."

"…"

"…"

Just look at his face. Jekyll and Hyde were fighting it out right there.

Every muscle in Jeok Cheongang's face conveyed his fierce inner struggle over whether or not to hit me. Eventually, he sighed.

"I cannot make heads or tails of you. You may leave now."

"Yes, sir."

"And take those children with you."

Cheongpung was fast asleep with his forehead pressed against the table, while Hyuk Mujin was still sprawled facedown in the courtyard.

Before Jeok Cheongang could change his mind, I quickly gathered up the two deadweights and headed for the second floor. Then I remembered something.

Oh, right. I have to return the Flame Divine Palm martial arts manual and the sword.

I had already swallowed the Blazing Flame Divine Pill, so there was nothing I could do about that, but I still needed to return the other items.

I desperately wanted to settle everything between Jeok Cheongang and me once and for all today.

"Um, Sir Jeok. I'm sorry, but there's one more thing I need to tell you…"

I turned back, my voice as tiny as an ant, then stopped short.

Glug, glug.

Left alone, Jeok Cheongang was pouring drinks.

One glass, then another. He placed the second wineglass before the empty seat across from him and began drinking in silence.

I watched him for a moment, then suddenly thought:

He looks small.

The back of the giant known as the Fire King looked small and lonely.

I quietly turned away and climbed the stairs.

Once the presence behind him had disappeared, Jeok Cheongang muttered,

“You deserved to die.”

Jangcheon had killed dozens in Anhui alone. There was no telling how many people had fallen victim to his Disciple over the past ten years.

“You called it Might Makes Right, didn’t you? You’re the same. In the end, you died at the hands of someone stronger than you.”

No one remained strong forever, just as no one remained weak forever.

Even Jeok Cheongang, a Supreme Peak master, was weaker than someone.

Yet some people forgot that fact. Drunk on their own strength—or on blood—they strayed down the wrong path.

“What a pathetic fool.”

Jeok Cheongang drained his drink. His Disciple’s words from that day long ago seemed to echo in his ears.

I have never changed. Not once, from the day I first met you until now.

Over the past ten years, he had turned those words over in his mind countless times. That single sentence had lodged near his heart like a dagger and tormented him.

“Did you truly never change? Not even once?”

They had spent many years together. At times, Jeok Cheongang had been a strict teacher; at others, he had cared for his Disciple like a loving father.

No—he had believed that was what he had been.

But it had all been an illusion. If it had truly been otherwise, Jangcheon would have chosen a very different path.

“How could rice paper be black from the beginning?”

Being born into this world was like receiving a blank sheet of rice paper.

A person passed through countless moments between birth and death.

When death finally arrived, those moments came together to complete a single painting. The painting Jangcheon had created was… entirely ink-black.

Jeok Cheongang had watched it from the closest distance, yet he hadn’t known.

“Cheon.”

The old man stared at the seat across from him, where a wineglass had been set. One by one, phantomlike figures appeared in the empty chair.

A child hunched over as he stuffed dumplings into his mouth. A boy clutching the wooden sword his Master had made for him, his cheeks flushed bright red.

His limbs lengthened, and his gaze sharpened. Before long, a tall young man stood glaring at the old man.

Kill me.

That day, Jeok Cheongang had been unable to answer his Disciple's cutting words.

But if he ever met his Disciple again, there was something he had desperately wanted to say.

"I'm sorry. I'm so sorry."

Whoooosh.

A cold wind slipped through the door of the old inn and brushed across the wineglass.

"Benefactor!"

I awoke to a terrible racket. Cheongpung, practically bursting with excitement, was bouncing up and down.

"This is my pavilion, so why… Ah."

Right. This wasn't the Jin Family of Taiyuan. It was an inn.

At the same time, the events of the previous day flashed through my mind like a panorama. It wouldn't have been an exaggeration to say I had crossed the boundary between life and death.

Well, that aside—

"Stop jumping around. There's enough dust in here already."

"I'm allowed to jump today!"

How was anyone supposed to sleep through this?

Hyuk Mujin, who had been curled up like a shrimp in one corner of the floor, blearily opened his eyes.

"Is this… paradise?"

That bastard started talking nonsense the moment he woke up.

It was absurd, but then I remembered that yesterday, after trying to escape on his own, he had been knocked unconscious by a duck bone Jeok Cheongang flicked at him.

"You awake?"

"Captain?"

Hyuk Mujin's eyes widened when he saw me. Then he sighed.

“So this isn’t paradise.”

“…What the hell is that supposed to mean, you bastard?”

“It was a joke. A joke. I’m just glad to see you alive again.”

“Says the guy who tried to run away on his own.”

“Come on. Why do you have to put it like that?”

Grinning shamelessly, Hyuk Mujin looked around. More precisely, he looked at Cheongpung, who was running laps around the room like a train.

“What’s all this commotion so early in the morning? What good thing happened to make him run around like that?”

“No idea. He says he’s allowed to jump today.”

“He must’ve eaten something tasty.”

“…”

It was obviously bullshit, but since we were talking about Cheongpung, its credibility skyrocketed.

Giving him a doubtful look, I asked Cheongpung,

“What day is it today?”

Cheongpung, who had been circling the room and driving me crazy, stopped dead.

“Benefactor, you don’t even know that?”

“…Let’s refrain from saying things like that. It hits ten times harder coming from you.”

“It’s the first day of the new year. New Year’s Day!”

Hyuk Mujin and I nodded at the same time.

“Ah, so it’s New Year’s Day.”

“Right. It’s already New Year’s Day.”

“I thought it was something els—”

“Yeah. A whole year has already pass—”

After a brief silence, a profound realization struck us.

Ah. The Jin Family of Taiyuan.

At that moment, Wipeng’s threat from before I left the family rang vividly in my ears.

Chapter 179

It really was New Year's Day.

It had only been two days since Wipeng had given me strict instructions before I left the Jin Family of Taiyuan, yet I had completely forgotten.

Hyuk Mujin swallowed a hollow breath and spoke.

"W-What do we do?"

"What do you mean, what do we do? Even if we'd remembered, we wouldn't have made it back in time."

This was the Fire King we were talking about.

Considering the mood yesterday, if I'd told him I had family business and needed to leave, he would have sent me off with a hearty laugh.

Straight down the road to the underworld, of course.

"Great Hero Wipeng is going to kill me."

I patted the ashen-faced Hyuk Mujin on the shoulder.

"Don't worry. He can't kill me."

"Oh, me neither!"

"…"

Such was the sorrow of having no powerful backer.

Still, I had no intention of deliberately dragging my feet.

Today was the day the Jin Family of Taiyuan would rise as the undisputed ruler of Shanxi Province. The youngest son of the family couldn't afford to be late.

"Pack your things. We're leaving right now."

Not that I had much to pack. One travel bundle was everything I owned.

We were ready in no time and headed downstairs. The inn had been decked out in red for New Year's Day, and despite the early hour, it was bustling with people.

Two men stood out among the crowd.

"Oh, you're up?"

"Tsk, tsk. Young fellows shouldn't sleep so much."

"Exactly. When I was young, there were plenty of days when I couldn't even get one shichen[997] of sleep."

"One whole shichen[998]? Why, back in my day…"

The two old men raised their hands in greeting, then went right back to passing wine cups between themselves.

Their flushed faces and the wine jar beside them showed they had already been drinking heavily this early in the day.

---

[997] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[998] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Hyuk Mujin, following behind me, whispered in a small voice,

“What kind of combination is that?”

“No idea.”

One was a giant of an old man, larger than most strapping young men. The other was so small and frail that a stiff breeze might have carried him away.

The Fire King was one thing.

But when did Jang Taebo get here?

Had he come because of the commission?

In any case, the two old men—each a master in his own field—seemed to have grown quite close.

“It’s pretty chaotic in here. Can’t we just slip out?”

“Slip out, my ass. Don’t you remember getting knocked unconscious with a duck bone yesterday?”

“That was a duck bone? Damn, no wonder my skull was ringing.”

“If we pretend nothing happened and leave, he’ll crack it open.”

“I’d rather avoid that.”

“So? Want to make a run for it?”

Hyuk Mujin sighed gloomily.

“Phew. What a rotten way to start the new year.”

I couldn’t have agreed more. No one in the world would want to run into Fire King Jeok Cheongang first thing on New Year’s Day.

“Grandpas, do you have any dumplings?”

“There’s plenty of meat, too. Eat up.”

“Yaaay!”

…Except that guy.

Hyuk Mujin and I trudged forward with heavy hearts, like oxen being led to the slaughterhouse.

Cheongpung, who was shoveling food into his mouth at the speed of light, beamed and held out several plates.

“Hewe! It’s delishush! Try shome!”

“…You eat plenty.”

“Thanksh, I will!”

Someone like him was a Peak master. The sheer unfairness of reality filled me with despair for the future of the Murim.

Jang Taebo spoke up.

“So, what are you all planning to do now?”

“We’re going back to our family first. We have some business to take care of.”

“Ah, I see. You said there was going to be a gathering at the Jin Family of Taiyuan?”

At present, every move the Jin Family of Taiyuan made was a hot topic throughout Shanxi Province.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan, once treated as an old tiger past its prime, had reclaimed the throne of Shanxi Murim after many years. It was only natural that the interest and expectations surrounding them were extraordinary.

Even Jang Taebo, a homebody living in a tiny place like Jang Family Village, had heard about it.

“That’s all anyone talks about whenever people gather these days. Even ordinary people with nothing to do with the Murim are flocking there for the spectacle. That tells you everything.”

“Will that many people really come?”

“A grand feast always draws all sorts of hangers-on. Shanxi Province may be a frontier region, but this is about becoming the hegemon of an entire province. I may not be a martial artist, but I’ve seen and heard enough in my time. Just wait and see. Ah, and…”

Jang Taebo lowered his voice.

“Don’t worry about the commission.”

The commission.

His words suddenly reminded me of something I hadn’t had the chance to ask before.

“By the way, is there anything else you need?”

“What do you mean?”

“Well, there must be something.”

Even the neighborhood laundromat charged a fee for repairs. Jang Taebo was a master artisan renowned throughout the world. He might not have been as skilled as he was in his prime, but I didn’t believe his abilities had vanished over the past ten years.

His work had to command an appropriate price…

Realizing what I meant, Jang Taebo stroked his white beard.

“You mean you want to compensate me?”

“To be honest, I can’t give you as much as you might be expecting.”

“Then just give me ten thousand nyang.”

Ten thousand nyang was a hundred silver nyang. It was certainly an enormous sum, but considering his fame, it felt like nothing more than a special discount.

I nodded readily. It wasn’t my money, anyway.

“I’ll prepare it and send it to your home.”

“Ten thousand silver nyang? You’d have to tear out every last pillar holding up the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“…Ten thousand silver nyang?”

"Of course. Did my worth look that cheap to you?"

"That's a whopping million nyang."

"Not a whopping million. A mere million. You'll be getting the greatest divine weapon under heaven. What does a little money matter?"

"…"

Of course it mattered.

How much would a million nyang be worth in the real world? Hundreds of billions of won[999]? Trillions[1000]?

Jang Taebo let out a quiet laugh at my expression.

"I don't need it."

"I'm sorry, but would you consider a quick deal for ten thousand nyang—pardon?"

"I said I don't need it. What would I do with that much money? I couldn't spend it all before I died. Having an opportunity like this come my way while I'm still alive is payment enough."

Was this the spirit of a true artisan?

What a shining example, this Jang Taebo. Every blacksmith under heaven should follow his example and Taebo accordingly.

As I trembled with emotion, Hyuk Mujin cut in with an admiring look.

"Then why don't you take the ten thousand nyang for now and give it to me?"

That bastard could write an autobiography. He could call it A Hundred Ways to Get Yourself Beaten to Death.

I smacked him on the back of the head, then bowed politely to Jang Taebo.

"Then I'll leave it in your hands."

"I'm the one who should be asking a favor. I can't promise how long it will take, but I'll create something that will make the world tremble. Until then, make sure you acquire the strength and qualifications worthy of wielding it."

"I'll do my best."

"Good. Then that settles it. I'll have to place my trust in you."

Jang Taebo nodded, then paused.

"Ah. Could I ask one more favor?"

"…?"

"Build my house again. It all burned down, and I don't even have anywhere to sleep."

The home he had bought after retiring—the precious place where he had spent his golden years in peace—had vanished overnight.

---

[999] Hundreds of billions of won—roughly 100 billion to under one trillion won—would be about $71 million–$710 million, or €65 million–€650 million.

[1000] Trillions of won—roughly one trillion to under ten trillion won—would be about $710 million–$7.1 billion, or €650 million–€6.5 billion.

At the sorrow in Jang Taebo's voice, my gaze drifted to the side of its own accord.

Jeok Cheongang, who had been quietly sipping his wine while we talked, looked up.

"What are you staring at?"

There was no trace of the emotional, solemn Jeok Cheongang from last night. I subtly averted my gaze.

"…Nothing."

"If you have something to say, say it. This old man isn't so petty."

"Are you really sure?"

"Go ahead."

The moment he finished speaking, the space beneath the table began to heat up.

It wasn't as though the innkeeper were a modern man who had brought in an electric heater…

Fuck. Flame Divine Palm.

Tears welled in my eyes as I answered.

"I was just thinking that you looked a good ten years younger than usual today."

Jeok Cheongang frowned.

"What? Ten years?"

Damn it. Subtracting ten from a hundred still left ninety.

I hurriedly revised my answer.

"Twenty years…"

"Twenty years?"

"Thirty years…"

In the space of barely three seconds, Jeok Cheongang had grown thirty years younger. He nodded in satisfaction.

"I thought you were a fellow with nothing but shit in your head, but you do have some fairly plausible thoughts after all."

"…"

Hyuk Mujin looked like he had something to say, but he clamped his mouth shut.

Apparently, he had no desire to make A Hundred Ways to Get Yourself Beaten to Death his final work.

Instead, he kept poking me in the side, looking desperate to leave this place immediately.

Of course, I feel the same way.

But before we could go, there was one last thing I needed to settle.

I spoke in the most respectful tone I could manage.

"I have several items in my possession."

Jeok Cheongang, his face flushed as he tipped back his wine cup, let out a quiet laugh.

“Were you ever planning to return them?”

“Of course I did.”

“That’s right. If you don’t return them, you’ll see something ugly.”

“…”

The old man could see straight through people’s hearts like a ghost.

I forced a smile and placed the items I had already taken out on the table.

The Flame Divine Palm martial arts manual I had obtained from Jopil, and the Unnamed Sword made from Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

“As you already know, Great Hero Jeok, the Blazing Flame Divine Pill…”

“You gobbled it up.”

“Yes. That’s right.”

“But…”

A wrinkled finger tapped against the table. Jeok Cheongang continued in a dry voice.

“Where is the Treasured Jade?”

“Pardon?”

“The treasured jade. The jade.”

Treasured jade? As in some sort of treasure or gemstone?

Jeok Cheongang didn’t seem like the type to obsess over ordinary jewelry, so it had to be extremely important.

But since I hadn’t even known it existed, I could only stare at him in bewilderment.

“These are the only things I received.”

“Received? You didn’t collect them yourself?”

“No. There were circumstances. They were handed to me right after I woke up.”

“Do you suspect any of the people involved?”

Gong Yacheong and Socheon had handed Jopil’s belongings over to me. Neither of them was the sort to quietly pocket something behind everyone else’s back.

The same went for the members of the reconnaissance squad who had been there. I didn’t know what had happened, but that didn’t change my trust in them.

“They wouldn’t have. No, absolutely not.”

Jeok Cheongang studied me for a moment before speaking.

“Then it must be one of two things. Someone deceived you, or that child lost it.”

“…”

“What a nuisance. This has become troublesome.”

Jeok Cheongang had likely returned to the world not only to find his Disciple, but also to recover the Fire Gate Clan's treasures that had been scattered because of him.

The Treasured Jade seemed to be one of them.

It was a treasure that even the Fire King was willing to endure the trouble of searching for at all costs.

Damn it. I never even got to see it.

Just as a creeping sense of danger began to outweigh my curiosity about what the jade actually was, Jeok Cheongang spoke.

"It can't be helped. Keep them for now."

That casual remark brought my thoughts to a complete halt.

Wait. Did he mean…

"You want me to keep these?"

"Yes."

"Both of them?"

"All three. Have you forgotten the one in your stomach? Anything that originated from our sect must be reclaimed, one way or another."

"…!"

"I'm joking."

"Phew."

"Tsk, tsk. You're still young, but your nerve is already the size of a bean."

Bean or cannonball, I didn't care.

I wanted nothing more to do with that terrifying old man. Ever.

I took a deep breath and opened my mouth.

"I'm sorry, but I'll have to decline—"

"If you refuse, I'll reclaim them right now. All three."

"…"

"This time, I'm serious."

Once again, the space beneath the table grew scorching hot. It was Flame Divine Palm, of course.

What the fuck?

I was trying to return the items to their rightful owner. And I couldn't even do that?

Overcome with resentment and indignation, I demanded, "Why are you doing this to me?"

"Do you expect an old man like me to carry those cumbersome things around? I don't have the strength for that."

"What if someone takes them from me?"

“Then this old man will kill you.”

“What if I learn the martial art?”

“Then you’ll die even more painfully.”

What kind of bullshit situation was this?

Leaving me standing there in a daze, the Fire King rose from his seat.

Cheongpung, who was still cramming food into his mouth, looked up.

“Gwandpa, awe you leaving?”

“…You’re even worse than your grandfather. Slow down.”

After exchanging a silent glance of farewell with Jang Taebo, Jeok Cheongang turned away and tossed out one meaningful remark.

“Let’s meet again soon.”

I didn’t want to see him.

Ever.

Chapter 180

New Year's Day.

Jin Wikyung's reaction upon seeing the sunlight on the first day of the new year was short and simple.

"Fantastic."

Wolhwa, who had been tilting her teacup with graceful composure, let out a quiet laugh. She had arrived at the Jin Family of Taiyuan the previous night.

With the family currently barring all outsiders from entering, admitting her was a show of respect for their alliance.

"Are you really that happy?"

"How could I not be?"

"I suppose you have every reason to be, considering everything that's happened. Two years ago, I never imagined a day like this would come."

"That hurts to hear."

Wolhwa covered her mouth in exaggerated dismay.

"My goodness, shouldn't I be the one saying that? We've been waiting for you for so long."

"I'll keep my promise. Without fail."

"I hope so. It would be troublesome if you went back on your word a second time."

"Let's stop. I'm tired."

"That makes two of us."

The previous night had been a long one. After an intense back-and-forth, they had finally found common ground that gave each of them what they wanted.

Both sides needed the other's help if they wished to wield influence in Shanxi Murim.

Having finally obtained what she wanted, Wolhwa gave him a prim smile.

"Still, we did give you a valuable piece of information, didn't we?"

Jin Wikyung replied with a disgruntled look.

"Oh, that information? I heard our family's Datong Branch played some part in the matter as well."

"We were the first to bring you the information. We were also the ones who promptly sent a messenger eagle."

"That much… I'll admit."

Wolhwa suddenly narrowed her eyes.

"But aren't you worried?"

"About what?"

"The Heavenly Wind Band."

The news that the Heavenly Wind Band, which had been prowling around Datong, had been annihilated was certainly welcome. But it was also profoundly shocking.

One person had single-handedly wiped out hundreds of mounted bandits, including a Peak master? Unless that person was a Supreme Peak master, it would have been nearly impossible.

Wolhwa ran one long finger along her teacup.

“Who do you think it was?”

“Who knows? We’ll have to find out in time.”

Jin Wikyung suppressed a laugh. The world might be vast and full of reclusive eccentrics, but Supreme Peak masters were anything but common.

When he had first heard the news about the Heavenly Wind Band, only one name had flashed through his mind.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

It was most likely him.

Considering the relationship they had built over the years, he ought to tell Wolhwa. But the matter was far too significant to share even with the Chief Branch Leader of the Lower District Sect.

“Don’t worry too much. Our family is keeping a close eye on the situation.”

“For someone saying that, you look awfully relaxed.”

“How could I be relaxed? I merely assume that whoever annihilated the notoriously vicious Heavenly Wind Band wasn’t a master of demonic, heterodox arts.”

Wolhwa narrowed her eyes at his feigned ignorance.

But she couldn’t press him any further. If the Jin Family of Taiyuan had truly possessed ties to a Supreme Peak master, its rise to its current position would have been far easier.

“Well, in any case, you have my sincere congratulations.”

“Thank you.”

“But someone else has been awfully quiet.”

Knowing exactly whom Wolhwa meant, Jin Wikyung shook his head.

“He’s been dissatisfied since birth.”

A prickly voice asked,

“Are you talking about me?”

“Who else would I be talking about?”

Wipeng, who had been leaning diagonally against the wall of the office, opened his mouth.

“I wholeheartedly agree with my lord. It truly is a fantastic day.”

“What’s gotten into you? Whenever I say something like that, you lecture me about dignity and propriety.”

“What else am I supposed to call a fantastic day?”

His subordinate, usually as strict and fussy as an old schoolmaster, was humoring him for once. Jin Wikyung smiled in satisfaction.

“Exactly. That’s how important this occasion will be.”

“Can you hear the murmuring from far away? I hear that not only the influential martial artists of Shanxi Murim, but even commoners who heard the news have come.”

“Oh, is that true?”

“Indeed. We’ve also received a letter of congratulations from the Heavenly Sword True Person, the Sect Leader of Huashan.”

“Oh!”

“The Three Plum Blossom Elites should be arriving soon as well.”

Jin Wikyung already knew all of this, but it still felt good to hear it again.

The Nine Sects and One Gang were pillars of the Murim world, and their influence was immense. Even if only part of that great alliance was represented, it was practically equivalent to the entire orthodox faction vouching for the legitimacy of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Of course, he couldn’t deny that the Sword Saint and Cheongpung had played a significant role in that.

“And that’s not all. Isn’t Prince Shangshan, a descendant of the Son of Heaven, coming as well? This means that both the government and the Murim have acknowledged our family as the undisputed hegemon of Shanxi Province.”

“Of course! Absolutely!”

As Jin Wikyung’s spirits soared, Wipeng smiled.

“Do you know what the even better news is?”

“You’re really going all out today. What is it? Tell me already!”

The next moment, the smile at the corners of Wipeng’s mouth vanished without a trace.

“At this gathering, where countless martial artists and commoners, distinguished guests from the Nine Sects and One Gang, and even a descendant of the imperial family are coming, both Young Masters are absent.”

“…Ah.”

“I can at least understand the Second Young Master. Enlightenment doesn’t come whenever one wants it to, so secluded training is understandable. I’m a martial artist too. But!”

Wipeng continued with a fierce glare.

“The Third Young Master absolutely cannot be let off the hook. Leaving at a time like this as though none of it concerned him was bad enough, but now all word from him has stopped completely.”

Jin Wikyung quietly averted his gaze. Wolhwa, his only lifeline, merely shrugged as if she knew nothing and watched the spectacle unfold.

“He’ll come.”

Jin Wikyung opened his mouth to object, then stopped. The way Wipeng phrased it sounded strange, but it wasn’t wrong.

Wipeng ground his teeth and continued.

“Going off to make a weapon when we’re facing such a momentous occasion… I’m an idiot for trusting the Third Young Master even for a moment.”

“Now, now.”

“Am I wrong?”

“Now, hold on!”

“Why? What about it?”

Jin Wikyung flinched at Wipeng’s bulging eyes. Then salvation arrived in the form of a voice from outside the office.

“Lesser Family Head, the preparations are complete.”

“…There you have it.”

Wipeng’s lips moved as though he still had more to say, but he released a deep sigh instead. This was hardly the first time something like this had happened. They had to deal with the business at hand first.

“This time, you must give the Third Young Master a proper talking-to.”

“Of course I will.”

Jin Wikyung grinned and left the office.

Fifty martial artists radiating sharp auras stood in formation before the pavilion. Every one of them was at least a First Rate master, and they stared at their lord with unwavering composure.

An eight-cheok[1001]-tall giant, Jin Wikyung was the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. In place of the absent Family Head, he had led the family for the past two years and finally set it upon a firm foundation.

His tightly closed lips parted.

“Let’s go.”

Wipeng, Wolhwa, and the fifty martial artists followed him. As they crossed the quiet grounds of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, their numbers continued to swell.

Fifty became a hundred, a hundred became two hundred, and two hundred became three hundred…

The Jin Family of Taiyuan had suffered as though its limbs had been torn away in the previous war, but its recovery had been swift, and its growth even swifter.

[1001] A cheok is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to 30.3 cm (11.9 in). Eight cheok is about 2.42 m (7 ft 11 in).

Our family has grown stronger.

The One Pavilion, Two Halls, and Three Teams advancing alongside him were proof of that.

They were the arms, legs, waist, and torso of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, stronger and sturdier than ever before.

Remembering the countless sacrifices and efforts that had brought them to this day, Jin Wikyung felt a surge of emotion.

“Lesser Family Head.”

Before he knew it, they had reached the Gate Guard Pavilion.

The gate guards standing watch at the main entrance bowed with crisp, disciplined movements. Beyond the solid stone walls, the cheers of countless people rang out.

“Wow, this really is fantastic.”

“My lord, give the order.”

Wolhwa smiled brightly, while Wipeng wore a more solemn expression than ever.

Jin Wikyung took in their faces and drew a deep breath. The next moment, his dignified voice rang out.

“Open the gates.”

It marked the beginning of the grand banquet that would continue for the next three days—and served as the signal flare announcing that the Jin Family of Taiyuan had become the hegemon of Shanxi Murim.

The area in front of the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s gates was packed with people. There were martial artists wearing swords and blades, merchants hoping to seize an opportunity, and commoners who belonged to neither group.

Even though it was broad daylight, firecrackers celebrating the first day of the new year went off now and then.

Boom! Boom-boom!

“Waaaaah!”

While hundreds upon hundreds of people laughed and chatted in the festive atmosphere, a handful wore faces fit for a funeral.

“Damn it.”

“What kind of situation is this?”

“I ought to just—”

The five middle-aged men—the heads of the five sects collectively known as the Five Gates of Shanxi—couldn’t smooth out their crumpled expressions.

Of the five, Woo Hwangtae, chief of the Seongun Escort Bureau, was in the worst state by far, frantic with worry thanks to his worthless son.

They wouldn't even grant me an audience.

He had arrived five days earlier and requested a meeting countless times.

He had come to clean up the mess caused by his son, Woo Jintae.

But the carefully prepared letters and gifts he sent had been turned away without ever crossing the Jin Family of Taiyuan's threshold. His pride had taken a beating, but in the end, he had resorted to coming in person.

"I am Woo of the Seongun Escort Bureau."

The Seongun Escort Bureau had endured for three generations, and everyone in Shanxi Province knew its name. After all, it had flaunted the enormous fortune it had amassed through any means necessary.

Yet the gate guard's response had been indifferent.

"You can't meet him right now."

"Come now, man. What do you mean? I'm telling you, I'm the chief of the Seongun Escort Bureau!"

"Whether you're a bureau chief or a sect leader, I don't know or care. I follow orders."

…!

Had he ever suffered such humiliation in his life?

Like Woo Jintae, he had spent his entire life enjoying every advantage his family's prestige afforded him. He had suffered a few setbacks and had occasionally been ignored by those of higher status, but he could endure that much.

But to be treated this way by a mere gate guard!

Every time Woo Hwangtae thought about it, the back of his head throbbed.

Those fucking bastards. No matter how powerful they are, how dare they treat someone like this?

Even his son, who had a child of his own, had returned so badly beaten that it was difficult to tell whether he was still human or some blue-skinned beast.

Father and son had both been utterly humiliated. It was too embarrassing to complain to the other sect leaders.

"Huff… Hooo…"

As Woo Hwangtae exhaled through his flushed face, the other heads of the Five Gates of Shanxi watched him cautiously.

"Chief Woo, are you all right?"

"If you're feeling unwell, perhaps we should come back tomorrow…"

Woo Hwangtae snapped at them.

"Would you be all right, Sect Leader Song? My son was beaten like a street dog, and now we're expected to apologize on top of that. And Lord Tae, if I retreat now, what do you think the Jin Family of Taiyuan will make of it? Do you even hear yourselves?"

"…"

"…"

The two men who had spoken flinched after drawing his ire, while the other two breathed sighs of relief.

But inwardly, all four were thinking the same thing.

This damned merchant. I ought to just…

They were only tolerating him because they still needed the Seongun Escort Bureau's support.

They remembered clearly what their sons had told them.

The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi said he would make the Seongun Escort Bureau an example.

Chief Woo and that man are both formidable… Unless they're the Nine Sects and One Gang, do they really think they can swallow the whole bureau in one bite?

Given the Jin Family of Taiyuan's recent power, they might be able to.

For now, we watch.

If the balance tipped even slightly, they would have to switch sides. The four sect leaders were each waiting for the right moment, and as long as their own families survived, they were perfectly willing to keep smiling at Woo Hwangtae.

"Ha-ha, Chief Woo. Calm yourself."

"Indeed. You and we have all been wronged, haven't we? We understand how you feel."

"Let's head inside. We can't stand here watching forever."

"Here, these pills came from a renowned physician. They can calm even the fiercest temper. Let's each chew one before we go in."

"Hoo…"

Woo Hwangtae released a heated sigh and was about to toss the pill into his mouth when—

"Wow, this place is crawling with people. Absolutely crawling."

Along with the booming voice, something shoved against his arm. The pill dropped, and someone immediately stepped on it.

"…!"

That was the limit of Woo Hwangtae's patience. He glared at the culprit, his eyes blazing.

The man stood a full two heads taller than everyone around him. Between his cow-like eyes and the way he was picking his nose, he looked every inch a country bumpkin.

"You! Stop right there!"

The huge man stopped in his tracks.

"Huh? Me?"

“Yes, you bastard! If you bump into someone, you should apologize immediately!”

“Ah. There were so many people, I didn’t notice. Sorry ‘bout that.”

The man promptly bowed and turned away, but that only made Woo Hwangtae’s temper flare hotter.

His son’s humiliation. The memory of being disregarded by the gate guard for days. And now the behavior of this oversized country bumpkin.

The fuse had been lit.

“You ox-headed bastard! Stop right there!”

The giant flinched.

“What did you just say?”

“I called you an ox-headed bastard. You’re lower than an ox, you son of a bitch!”

“That’s one of the things I hate most.”

“If you hate it, what are you going to do about it?”

The giant snorted a plume of breath before opening his mouth.

“Can I hit him?”

“You bastard, I’ll kill—!”

Just as Woo Hwangtae was about to strike, a clear voice came from behind him.

“No.”

The speaker was a clean-cut young man.

Huashan’s Lone Crane, Baek Museong, had stopped his Junior Brother just before he exploded. He smiled at Woo Hwangtae.

Chapter 181

“You cause trouble whenever I take my eyes off you, even for a moment.”

After lightly scolding his Junior Brother, Baek Museong bowed his head to Woo Hwangtae.

“It seems there was a minor misunderstanding between you. I hope you’ll be generous enough to forgive him.”

His voice was as gentle as his appearance.

Woo Hwangtae was closer to a merchant than a martial artist. His martial arts were First Rate, but he could pride himself on having a Peak-level eye for people and situations, honed through years of running an Escort Bureau.

Under normal circumstances, one look at Baek Museong might have brought a certain phrase to mind.

The extraordinary hidden within the ordinary.

Unfortunately, Woo Hwangtae was not in his right mind.

Baek Museong had stepped in out of nowhere, and his clean-cut appearance made him seem like an easy mark. His polite voice carried the composure of a powerful man, but to Woo Hwangtae, it sounded merely insolent.

“What was that? You want me to generously forgive him?”

His voice seethed with rage as he raised an eyebrow.

“How dare you tell me what to do?”

“That was not my intention, but if I’ve offended you, I apologize.”

“Apologize? Hah. You little pup.”

Crack.

Once anger took hold, it naturally clouded a person’s judgment.

Woo Hwangtae clenched his fists and stepped forward, but the other Sect Leaders hurriedly tried to restrain him.

“Chief Woo, it would be best to stop here.”

“Sect Leader Song is right. Nothing good will come of making a scene.”

“Some arrogant bastards who crawled in from God knows where insult me, and you expect me to take it? Do you all look down on me too?”

“No, that’s not what we meant.”

“Then what are you trying to say?”

His tone was now only a hair short of openly speaking down to them. The Sect Leaders of the Five Gates of Shanxi frowned inwardly, but they still had to prevent an unnecessary conflict.

“We only mean that this is the wrong time and place. Have you forgotten our situation?”

“If you insist, I won’t stop you, but… there’s no need to cause a scene when we’re already in the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s bad books.”

“We understand that you’re angry, but please think of our position too. We’re all trying to survive here.”

Again. Again with the damned Jin Family of Taiyuan!

Woo Hwangtae barely swallowed the curses threatening to burst from his mouth. If not for the countless eyes and ears around him, he would have spewed every insult he knew and smashed everything in sight.

But his last shred of reason held him back.

“Nggh.”

After barely calming himself, Woo Hwangtae glared at Baek Museong, who still stood there looking perfectly composed.

“I’d like nothing more than to beat you to death with a single blow right now, but… I’ll let it pass as a country bumpkin’s mistake. Get lost before I change my mind.”

Baek Museong regarded him for a moment, then bowed his head.

“Thank you for your consideration.”

“Hmph. Lucky bastards.”

But Woo Hwangtae was the lucky one.

If Baek Museong hadn’t sent a Sound Transmission a moment earlier, he would have been hovering between life and death by now.

“Second, stop.”

Chulwoo, the second of the Three Plum Blossom Elites and known as the Defeated Flower Fist, stopped dead just as he was about to launch himself forward.

A voice no one else could hear slipped between his teeth.

“He wasn’t satisfied with going after me—he even went after you, Senior Brother.”

“It doesn’t matter.”

“It matters to me. Can’t I hit him once? Just once?”

“That sounds like you want to beat him to death.”

“…I’ll hit him gently. Just once. Really.”

“That sounds like you want to gently beat him to death. Have you forgotten Master’s strict order not to attract unnecessary attention?”

Chulwoo wrestled with himself for a moment before lowering his tightly clenched fist.

“Whew. This is driving me crazy.”

Baek Museong gave his shoulder an approving pat.

“You showed restraint. This too is training.”

“How is this training? What’s the point of learning martial arts if I can’t use them when the time comes?”

“Indiscriminate killing will only ruin you. Martial arts are meant to cultivate essence, qi, and spirit, not to kill people.”

“Every time I look at you, I get confused. Am I a disciple of Huashan or a monk from Shaolin Temple?”

“Could someone with your personality possibly become a monk? I already pity all the wooden fish[1002] you’d smash.”

Baek Museong let out a quiet laugh, and Chulwoo sighed.

He deeply respected his Senior Brother, but the man was simply too kindhearted. That was the problem.

“Those bastards should have their mouths smashed in…”

“Hey, watch your mouth!”

“All right, all right.”

Chulwoo watched Woo Hwangtae’s back as he grew smaller in the distance and smacked his lips.

I’ve memorized his face. Just let me catch him once.

Baek Museong knew exactly what his Junior Brother was thinking. He shook his head.

“Enough foolish thoughts. Find the youngest.”

“Did Eunhyang disappear again?”

“Yes. Just like you did.”

Chulwoo flinched.

“I-I went to take a leak.”

“That’s right. But why did someone who went to take a leak end up picking a fight in the middle of a crowd?”

“It happened on my way back after I’d finished. Wait, Senior Brother, do you not believe me? I haven’t washed my hands yet. Want to smell them?”

“…Never mind.”

Baek Museong rubbed his temple. He cherished his Junior Brothers more than anyone, but they were exceptionally difficult to handle.

At least Chulwoo was big enough to find quickly. Their youngest Junior Disciple, Eunhyang, was practically invisible in a crowd like this.

“Do you see anything?”

Chulwoo, who was at least two heads taller than everyone else, swept his gaze around.

“Not really. There are too many people.”

Even a Peak master’s eyes would struggle to find a small girl amid the endless, bustling mass.

[1002] A wooden fish is a hollow wooden percussion instrument struck to keep rhythm during Buddhist chanting.

The crowd was so large that merchants had even set up stalls here and there.

“By the way, was the Jin Family of Taiyuan always this big? I’d never even heard of it before we came.”

“Those in the know do. The current Sect Leader, the Shanxi Extraordinary Hero, is fairly well known, and so is the Heaven Shaking Sword, isn’t he?”

“I don’t know about the Shanxi Extraordinary Hero, but the Heaven Shaking Sword… Is that the fellow who’s supposedly one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes?”

“Don’t call him that. Watch your mouth.”

“He’s just a bookworm who goes to an academy. In my opinion, Senior Brother is much more…”

“Hey. Where did you learn that nasty habit of judging people before you’ve even met them? He is clearly a remarkable talent.”

“Well, for someone from Shanxi Province, being that good is practically a dragon rising from a ditch.”

Chulwoo answered indifferently, then suddenly frowned.

“Wasn’t there someone else besides the Heaven Shaking Sword? Some other dragon—or was it a loach?”

“A dragon? Do you mean the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?”

“Ah, right. The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi.”

“I hear he’s quite talented, though not as much as the Heaven Shaking Sword.”

“Dragon or loach, I’ve heard about him nonstop on the way here. I should at least take a look at his face.”

The corner of Baek Museong’s mouth lifted as he watched Chulwoo clench his fists.

“Do you want to spar with him?”

Chulwoo scratched the back of his head.

“Not particularly. I’d win anyway.”

“Competitive spirit is a good thing, but avoid causing trouble if you can.”

“What trouble could there be? Since we came all this way, I just want to see what he can do.”

Baek Museong studied his Second Junior Brother.

Despite what Chulwoo said, his curiosity was obvious.

After spending years cooped up on Huashan, facing the same people every day, he seemed excited to finally be out in the world.

“You’ll see him soon enough. Of course, we need to find the youngest first.”

The final words came out almost as a sigh.

The gates of the Jin Family of Taiyuan were already open, and the invited guests were streaming inside like clouds.

Baek Museong was wondering whether he would have to climb a tree when—

“Senior Brother, it’s all right if I make a little noise, isn’t it?”

“What?”

Chulwoo grinned and drew a deep breath.

The next instant, a thunderous shout erupted.

“Eun—hyang!”

Baek Museong had no time to stop him. Chulwoo’s voice was every bit as tremendous as his body.

The people around them clapped their hands over their ears and dropped to the ground, while the countless people who had been laughing and chatting abruptly fell silent.

As a hush descended over the crowd like a bucket of cold water—

“Big Brothers! I’m over here!”

Far in the distance, Chulwoo spotted a young girl eagerly jumping up and down in place. He spoke triumphantly.

“Ha-ha! Senior Brother, I found her!”

“…Yes, well done. Very well done.”

Baek Museong put a hand to his head.

Just then—

Whoosh.

Hundreds of people began murmuring as they parted like a field of reeds before the wind.

At the end of the open path stood a man like an iron tower. Chulwoo muttered without realizing it,

“Is that a man or a bear?”

“He’s a man. If not for him, the Jin Family of Taiyuan would not be what it is today.”

Baek Museong respectfully offered a cupped-fist salute to the bear-like man, Jin Wikyung.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

The scenery whipped past us. Hyuk Mujin, riding beside me, shouted over the pounding hooves.

“We were definitely slow on the way there, but we’re incredibly fast coming back. Is it because we took our time two days ago?”

“Everything happens for a reason.”

“What reason?”

“We move faster when no one tries to stuff his face while riding a horse.”

"Ah."

Cheongpung had looked gloomy the entire trip. Before we left, I had stopped him from packing a mountain of food.

"I'm hungry."

I answered coldly.

"Endure it."

A Peak master's digestion was Peak-level too. Cheongpung crapped as much as he ate, then ate as much as he crapped.

And since he ate often, he naturally had to crap often…

Damn it. This is disgusting. I'll stop there.

"How far are we?"

"We just passed the ninth village, so… We should arrive in half a shichen[1003] at the earliest, or one full shichen[1004] at the latest."

The sunlight pouring down made my eyes sting. I looked up at the sun as it slowly climbed toward the middle of the sky.

"So we'll arrive around noon?"

"Probably."

"We're late, aren't we?"

"Of course we're late. Isn't that why we're riding like hell, trying to be a little less late?"

Fair point.

Instead of answering, I spurred my horse onward. With every stride, the long bundle strapped across my back thumped against the horse's back.

Ugh, what a pain.

The bundle contained the Unnamed Sword.

I was supposed to have returned it to Jeok Cheongang, but instead, I had somehow ended up taking it back.

As long as I lived in a Murim where the law was damn far away and fists were painfully close, I had no choice.

It's not like I can put it in my inventory either.

I could at least claim I had tucked the Flame Divine Palm martial arts manual inside my clothes. But if an entire sword suddenly popped out of my pocket, there would be no explaining that away.

If I were alone, it might be different. But with other people watching, it would be the perfect way to get accused of practicing demonic, heterodox arts.

[1003] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

[1004] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

I really got myself into a mess this time.

It wasn't that I resented being saddled with a troublesome object. I simply hated the thought of having to meet Fire King Jeok Cheongang—that terrifying old man—again.

"Let's meet again soon."

Meet again, my ass.

Every time I remembered what he had said a few shichen[1005] ago, my stomach churned.

Hyuk Mujin, who had been sneaking glances at me from time to time, asked,

"Why do you look like that?"

"I was thinking about the Fire King."

"Ugh. Life's too short for anything but happy thoughts, so why imagine something that horrible?"

"If you were me, wouldn't you think about him? He said he'd be back soon."

"Speaking of which, could you give me some time off? I suddenly miss my family."

"You bastard. You're trying to save yourself."

"You never know what might happen. Before I die, I should at least see my parents' faces one more time."

"That doesn't sound like something an unfilial son who hasn't shown his face in years should say."

"I'd like to take this opportunity to become a good son."

"Nope."

I dismissed Hyuk Mujin's bullshit and looked up at the sky with a sigh.

"Even the heavens are heartless. Why did that old man have to leave this thing with me?"

"He said it was a pain to carry around."

"For such a petty reason?"

"With him, I can completely believe it."

"…"

That was surprisingly convincing.

"I could lose it before he comes back. Or I could quietly pocket it for myself."

"You, Captain?"

Hyuk Mujin laughed as if he had just heard a brilliant joke.

"If you were that kind of person, what have you been doing all this time? If you hadn't been on the verge of death, you probably would've just kept the Blazing Flame Divine Pill too."

[1005] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

“That’s…”

He had a point.

“Just hide it somewhere no one will notice. Who knows? Maybe that great Fire King will teach you a move in return.”

“Teach me, my ass. I’m sure he’d love to teach the man who killed his Disciple.”

The absurdity drew a quiet laugh from me.

The Fire Gate Clan was said to pass its arts down to a single successor and never teach outsiders. Even setting personal feelings aside, the idea that he would teach martial arts to an outsider like me was ridiculous.

“Your nonsense is only funny in moderation, you idiot.”

“Well, now that you mention it, I suppose you’re right.”

At that moment, Cheongpung—who had been drooping like a corpse and endlessly repeating that he was hungry—spoke up.

“Isn’t he trying to take you as his Disciple, Benefactor?”

“…”

“…”

“Maybe not? I think he is. Grandpa Jeok seemed to be watching you closely, Benefactor.”

“Me?”

“Captain?” Hyuk Mujin asked.

Our gazes met in midair. Hyuk Mujin looked utterly baffled. I was probably making the same face.

We both let out disbelieving laughs.

“That’s great. Congratulations in advance, Captain.”

“Yeah. Thanks.”

Me? Someone he’d known for barely a day or two?

The idea was so absurd it didn’t even qualify as a joke.

“Maybe not? Or am I right?”

As Cheongpung tilted his head over his own bizarre suggestion, Hyuk Mujin raised a finger and pointed into the distance.

“Can you see it?”

I could.

People were walking down a well-kept road. Farther ahead lay a broad expanse of land surrounded by a teeming crowd.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan.

I was back after three days away.

Chapter 182

Step. Step.

Under countless watchful eyes, two men walked toward each other. When they finally came face-to-face, they exchanged cupped-fist salutes.

“I am Jin Wikyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“I’m Baek Museong of Huashan.”

Huashan.

And Baek Museong.

Those two names alone carried tremendous weight.

Exclamations erupted from every direction, instantly shattering the silence.

“Huashan!”

“Baek Museong! It’s Huashan’s Lone Crane, Baek Museong!”

Though ordinary civilians were mixed in among them, a considerable number of those gathered here today were martial artists.

The name of Huashan and the epithet Huashan’s Lone Crane carried immense prestige.

“My heavens, why did Huashan’s Lone Crane come here?”

“Was the Jin Family of Taiyuan really this influential?”

“W-Wait. If Huashan’s Lone Crane came here, then…”

The people who had been talking over one another began scanning the area. Before long, they spotted the man and woman beside Baek Museong, and another round of exclamations broke out.

“That young man must be the Defeated Flower Fist. He’s enormous, just like I heard.”

“The Flower Sword Phoenix is here too! She’s even beautiful!”

“Whoa! It’s the Three Plum Blossom Elites!”

Chulwoo and Eunhyang looked bewildered by the unexpectedly fervent reception.

Both had accompanied their Master, the Heavenly Sword True Person, into the martial world a few times, but neither had ever received cheers like these.

“What the hell? Am I really this famous? They even know my epithet?”

“Senior Brother Chul, did you hear that? Someone just called me beautiful.”

Chulwoo’s expression turned stern.

“You heard wrong. Pay it no mind.”

“…You’re seriously annoying.”

They had trained together under the same Master since childhood and grown up like brother and sister. Jin Wikyung smiled faintly as they glared daggers at each other.

“You two seem close.”

“They’re still immature and constantly causing trouble. They have a long way to go.”

“Ha-ha. The Defeated Flower Fist and the Flower Sword Phoenix are both outstanding young prodigies. Surely that can’t be true.”

“You flatter us.”

A faint smile touched Baek Museong’s lips. Though this was their first meeting, he found himself liking Jin Wikyung.

Perhaps it was because of the man’s distinctive way of putting people at ease. Or perhaps it was his familiar bulk, which reminded Baek Museong of Chulwoo.

“Let us go inside. This is hardly the place for an important conversation.”

“I agree.”

They had already drawn attention unintentionally.

If even a single word about the Sword Saint slipped out with so many people watching, there would undoubtedly be an uproar.

“Well, then.”

Jin Wikyung dipped his head and led the way.

Baek Museong followed amid the cheers and countless stares, only to stop short.

He could no longer sense his junior disciples behind him.

What is it?

Baek Museong glanced back and saw Chulwoo standing tall as an iron tower, staring intently at something.

“Second.”

At Baek Museong’s call, Chulwoo slowly turned his head.

“Yes, Senior Brother.”

“Is something wrong?”

“No. Nothing.”

Eunhyang, who was standing beside Chulwoo, abruptly cut in.

“That’s not true. Senior Brother Chul was staring at someone just now.”

“Do you know that person?”

Chulwoo immediately shook his head. His massive frame subtly blocked Eunhyang from view.

“As if. Other than going out a couple of times with our Master, I’ve been cooped up at headquarters the whole time.”

“That is… true.”

“My stomach suddenly started hurting, so I was only looking for a privy.”

“Really?”

“Yes. So, if you don’t mind, could I stop by the privy before we go?”

“How long has it been since you last took a piss?”

Chulwoo deliberately hardened his expression.

“If you take care of the big business first, the small business gets taken care of at the same time. But you can’t take care of the big business while doing the small business.”

“…Uh, sure.”

Baek Museong felt vaguely uneasy.

Perhaps it was because his Second Junior Brother, who usually rambled on without making a lick of sense, had answered so smoothly.

“Second, are you thinking about something else—”

He could not finish.

Jin Wikyung had stopped and was looking back at them in puzzlement.

“Young Hero Baek, is something the matter?”

“Oh, no. My junior disciple said he had an urgent matter.”

“What sort of matter?”

“Well… he needs to relieve himself.”

“Oh.”

The people who had been listening closely snickered. Chulwoo scratched the back of his head awkwardly.

“I apologize.”

“Not at all. You must be exhausted after traveling all the way to our family. You should take this opportunity to rest properly.”

Baek Museong considered it for a moment, then nodded. The important conversation was between him and Jin Wikyung anyway. Better to let his junior disciples rest than have them standing beside him and yawning their heads off.

“Great Hero Jin has given you permission, so go ahead.”

“Big Bro—no, Senior Brother. Can I go too?”

“Yes. Do you dislike it?”

“Yes. I just want to stay beside Senior Brother.”

Eunhyang nodded vigorously, and Jin Wikyung smiled.

“Then that settles it. Young Hero Baek?”

“Ah, yes. Let us go.”

Baek Museong resumed walking, still looking unconvinced. Before long, however, he put the matter out of his mind.

Surely nothing could happen in such a short time.

As Chulwoo watched the group recede into the distance, a martial artist from the Jin Family of Taiyuan approached him.

“I’ll guide you to the privy.”

“What do I need a privy for?”

“Pardon?”

“We’re surrounded by mountains. I can just take a dump by the side of the road. Don’t you agree?”

The people surrounding them burst into loud laughter.

There was a common prejudice that members of the Nine Sects and One Gang[1006] would be arrogant and rude. But Chulwoo’s refreshing banter made everyone feel as if a weight had been lifted from their chests.

“Of course. That’s right.”

“Though this is the frontier, the mountain scenery around here is beautiful. Go take care of your business while enjoying the view!”

“Hey, Defeated Flower Fist! Since fate brought us together, would you like me to recommend a scenic spot?”

Chulwoo threw back his head and roared with laughter.

“Ha-ha-ha! A scenic spot? Sounds good. But I don’t want to go to the place where you took a dump. Let’s see…”

Chulwoo casually swept his gaze over the crowd, then raised a finger and pointed at one man.

“How about that Brother over there guides me?”

The middle-aged man who had been staring blankly at Chulwoo all this time jolted in surprise.

“M-Me?”

“That’s right. You.”

The middle-aged man was Woo Hwangtae, and his face turned the color of shit.

“Slow down a little. Let’s take it easy from here.”

“Why?”

“Can’t you see the horse is foaming at the mouth? And if we arrive panting and out of breath, everyone will look at us and think, Ah, that bastard was late.”

“That makes a strange amount of sense.”

We gradually eased up on the reins. As we descended the hill, the Jin Family of Taiyuan slowly came into view below.

“By the way, there sure are a lot of people.”

[1006] The Nine Sects and One Gang is a grouping of major martial-arts organizations in Murim.

"Seriously. From what I heard, they weren't supposed to invite anywhere near that many."

Even a rough count put the crowd camped out before the main gate of the Jin Family of Taiyuan well over several hundred.

Though we were still quite far away, we could even hear faint cheers.

Did an idol show up or something?

I drew on my internal energy and focused on my ears. My hearing, now several times sharper than usual, picked up every cheer from the crowd.

Hyuk Mujin quietly watched me for a moment before asking, "What's going on? Did they say an important guest arrived?"

"Huashan's Last Crane and the Plum Blossom Cutoff, apparently."

"…Those are epithets?"

"Don't ask me. That's what I heard."

We were still pretty far away, so there was a limit to what I could make out.

Still, what kind of epithets were those? Did the Plum Blossom Cutoff have some sort of grudge against Huashan?

At that moment, Cheongpung, who had been lying facedown across his horse's neck, spoke.

"Benefactor. They said Huashan's Lone Crane and the Three Plum Blossom Elites."

"Oh, really?"

"Yes. I heard them clearly."

He could hear that from this distance?

Cheongpung was the strongest martial artist among us, so he was probably right.

"I see."

While I merely nodded without much interest, Hyuk Mujin was so shocked that he nearly fell off his horse.

"H-Huashan's Lone Crane! The Three Plum Blossom Elites!"

"Are they famous?"

"Famous? That's putting it mildly! They're the direct disciples of the Heavenly Sword True Person, the Sect Leader of Huashan!"

"Is this one of those things where you'd have to be an idiot not to know them?"

"No martial artist could possibly not know them!"

"Oh, really?"

I casually pointed behind me. Cheongpung was staring wide-eyed and clapping.

"Wow, those are cool epithets. But where did they say they were from?"

"…"

"…"

"Shaolin Temple, maybe?"

Was he insane?

This was coming from the youngest Junior Brother of Huashan's Sect Leader himself.

After a long silence, Hyuk Mujin finally spoke.

"Huashan's Lone Crane. The Three Plum Blossom Elites. You really haven't heard of them?"

"I like Huashan! I like plum blossoms even more!"

"…Right."

Style was temporary, but class was forever.

It wasn't even "I like Dad, but I like Mom more." What the hell was this?

Was Huashan filed away in his head as Dad and plum blossoms as Mom?

While I pondered the workings of Cheongpung's mind, Hyuk Mujin finally collected himself and reached a conclusion.

"Anyway, they're insanely famous."

"I see."

"I see."

"…Is that really all the reaction you've got?"

"What kind of reaction were you expecting?"

"Most people would react like I did."

"So I'm supposed to be so shocked that I fall off my horse?"

Hyuk Mujin climbed back into the saddle and launched into an impassioned speech.

"That's how big a deal they are! The Heavenly Sword True Person's disciples! The future of Huashan!"

"I see. They're no joke."

I turned toward Cheongpung.

"May I ask your grandfather's full name?"

"His surname is Mae, and his given name uses the characters Jong and Hak. Mae Jonghak."

"And his epithet?"

"The Sword Saint."

"Did you hear that, Mujin?"

"Yes."

Hyuk Mujin nodded with a blank expression, then came to his senses. His eagerness to make us understand how extraordinary Huashan's Lone Crane and the Three Plum Blossom Elites were was almost palpable.

"Great Hero Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint, doesn't count. Honestly, that would be like an adult joining a children's fight."

"So what's your conclusion?"

"Huashan's Lone Crane is already a master who has surpassed the level of a young prodigy. At this rate, becoming the next Sect Leader won't be a problem. The other two members of the Three Plum Blossom Elites are objects of admiration among young martial artists too."

They really were impressive. From the way he talked about young prodigies, they still seemed to be quite young, yet the public considered them at least world-class.

"Then why am I not particularly impressed?"

"That… I'm not sure."

Hyuk Mujin thought about it carefully, then his expression suddenly went flat.

"Now that I think about it, I'm not exactly bursting with excitement either."

"Really?"

"Yes. Huashan's Lone Crane used to be my idol."

Cheongpung abruptly cut in.

"Isn't it because of Grandpa Jeok?"

"Huh?"

"Eh?"

"He's incredibly strong. And he's trying to take you as his Disciple."

The second part was complete bullshit, but the first part was right.

If the Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak, was something above the clouds that I could not even properly picture in my mind, the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was a monster that had revealed itself in the flesh.

After experiencing a monster larger than a hundred-story building, it was only natural that a monster the size of a four-story commercial building would make less of an impression.

"And…"

Cheongpung looked straight at me and continued slowly.

"You're plenty strong, Benefactor."

"…What?"

"I mean it."

Something tickled in one corner of my chest, but he was undeniably right about that too.

It wasn't that I thought I could fight Huashan's Lone Crane right now without falling behind.

I was certain I could catch up to him before long.

It had taken me only a few months to go from a Third Rate martial artist who knew nothing about martial arts to a Peak master.

I couldn't even begin to imagine how much I might grow in another year or two.

To me, Huashan's Lone Crane was a milestone along the road—not an impassable wall.

"Thanks for saying that."

Cheongpung answered with a sunny smile.

"You're welcome. Grandpa said weak martial artists without firm resolve need constant attention."

"…"

Fuck me. It had just been a pep talk.

I was wrestling with the urge to split open the crown of Cheongpung's head when —

"H-Hey, Young Hero Chul!"

"Hah, listen to this old coot calling me Young Hero Chul. Didn't you call me a cow's head earlier?"

"N-No, Great Hero Chul! I committed a grave discourtesy, -so!"[1007]

"Committed-so? -so? Cow? You just called me a cow again, didn't you?"[1008]

"Eeeeeek! Isn't that taking it too far? Do you even know how old I am?"

"Yes, Elder. Let's head up there and have a little talk."

A young man with a massive build reminiscent of Jin Wikyung was dragging a middle-aged man behind him.

Just as they were about to enter the mountainside beside the hill, the young man spotted us and stopped.

"Brother over there, do you need something?"

He means me, right?

[1007] The formal Korean sentence ending -so is pronounced the same as the Korean word for "cow."

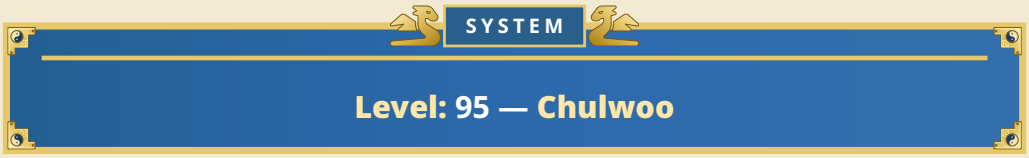
Chapter 183

A hulking man reminiscent of a Minotaur glared at me with enormous, bulging eyes.

“Brother over there, do you need something?”

He was telling me to pretend I hadn’t seen anything and move along.

It was no different from something a third-rate thug in a movie might say, but according to Qi Sense, this hulking man was neither a third-rate thug nor some inept wandering martial artist.



He’s as skilled as he looks.

In Murim terms, he was a Peak master. In modern terms, he was at least an A-rank Hunter.

If a guy like that were a thug, forget the police—the people’s cane. Even the people’s sledgehammer wouldn’t be enough.

Where did this guy come from?

For a moment, the epithets I’d just heard—Huashan’s Lone Crane and the Three Plum Blossom Elites—flashed through my mind, but that was as far as it went.

No matter how I looked at him, he seemed more like the Majang-dong[1009] Knifeman or Seocho-dong Twin Axes than a crane or a plum blossom. Those sorts of nicknames suited him much better.

When I merely stared without answering, the hulking man—Chulwoo—frowned.

“Didn’t you hear me? Are you deaf? Or mute?”

Before I could say anything, Hyuk Mujin jumped in.

“What an outrageous fellow. How dare you speak so rudely to our Young Master?”

“And pretending not to hear someone is polite?”

“Ahem!”

“What are you ahem-ing about? How important do you think you are, refusing to answer when someone speaks to you?”

“You insolent bastard! Do you need a beating to come to your senses?”

I stopped Hyuk Mujin as he reached for his sword scabbard.

“That’s enough.”

“Please don’t stop me. Someone like him needs to be taught a harsh lesson!”

“He’s stronger than you.”

[1009] Majang-dong is a Seoul neighborhood known for its livestock and meat markets.

“Ah. I don’t think this is my place to step in.”

“…”

“…”

Chulwoo opened his mouth with an incredulous expression.

“Is he your subordinate?”

“For now.”

“You must have a hard time.”

“Every day is a battle against my own patience.”

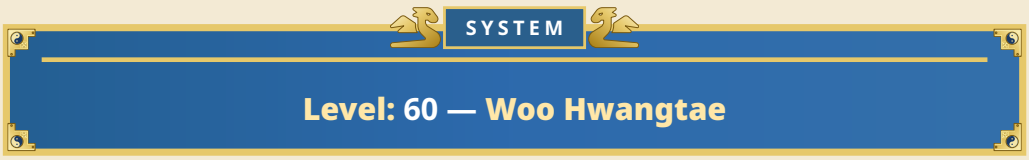
After looking our group up and down, Chulwoo clicked his tongue.

“You look like martial artists, so you’d be better off going on your way. This man wronged me badly.”

Chulwoo grabbed this man by the collar and lifted him. He was so strong that the heavyset middle-aged man shot straight into the air.

“Eeeek! H-Help me!”

Above the terrified middle-aged man’s head floated the Level window I had detected earlier with Qi Sense.



That was a name that made me crave hangover soup.[1010]

It also sounded vaguely familiar.

Woo Hwangtae, Woo Hwangtae… Where have I heard that before?

While I was thinking, Chulwoo shook Woo Hwangtae violently by the collar.

“What do you mean, help you? Don’t drag innocent people into this. Just take a few hits and get it over with.”

“G-Great Hero, please don’t do this. Let’s resolve it through conversation. Conversation.”

“Conversation?”

“Y-Yes! Conversation!”

“Conversation sounds good. Then let’s go somewhere without any people around and have a nice, intimate chat.”

He clearly meant to have a physical conversation.

Woo Hwangtae, who was being dragged away against his will, screamed,

“I-I was invited here by the Jin Family of Taiyuan! I’m supposed to have a private audience with the Lesser Family Head!”

[1010] Hwangtae is dried pollock, an ingredient in soup commonly eaten as a hangover remedy.

“So was I. And I’m a simple, crude man by nature, so I don’t particularly care whether you’re meeting the Lesser Family Head or the Family Head.”

“Eeeeeek!”

This wouldn’t do. Someone was going to die before I remembered his name.

I had no desire to get dragged into an unnecessary dispute, but simply walking past didn’t sit right with me either.

From the sound of it, he’s a fairly important guest.

The fact that he was supposed to meet privately with Jin Wikyung bothered me, as did Chulwoo’s casual disparagement of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

I smacked my lips and stepped forward.

“Excuse me.”

“All that fat and you still have to make people’s lives difficult… Did you call me?”

“Yes.”

“What do you want?”

“It’s a good day. Wouldn’t it be better to talk things out?”

“You want me to stop?”

“I’m sorry for sticking my nose where it doesn’t belong, but wouldn’t it look bad for the Jin Family of Taiyuan if its guests started fighting on a day like this?”

“Listen, Young Hero.”

Chulwoo rubbed his neck with an annoyed expression. At the same time, he dropped what little politeness remained in his speech.

“This is personal. If you get involved, you’ll only make trouble for yourself.”

“I’m already tired of this. What can you do?”

“You’re getting awfully informal.”

“Twenty.”

“Twenty? Ha. Still green. Nice and green.”

“How old are you?”

“I’m twenty-five, you young bastard.”

Good grief. I was surprised twice.

Once by the boomer attitude of a twenty-five-year-old, and again by the fact that his face belonged to a man in his mid-twenties.

Even if he had been fed protein supplements instead of breast milk as a baby, he shouldn’t have ended up like this. I asked with considerable astonishment,

"Twenty-five? Is your name Benjamin[1011] or something? You're living your life backward all by yourself."

Benjamin Chulwoo glared at me.

"What kind of bullshit is that?"

"It's not bullshit. It's a fact. Looking that old must have made life tough."

"Old? Shut up! Everyone around me says I look young!"

"Everyone around you? Number one, your mother. Number two, your father. Number three, your grandmother. Pick one of the three. Oh, let's make number four your youngest aunt."

"You beardless little brat…"

"Pull down your pants. I want to see whether you've got hair on your dick."

"You little—!"

"Woof, woof-woof! Woof-woof-woof!"

Chulwoo released Woo Hwangtae's collar. Trembling as he looked back and forth between earth and sky, he drew a deep breath.

"You… Hoo. Hoooo."

"Are you angry, Benjamin[1012]?"

"Shut that damn mouth!"

He seemed to have completely lost his temper.

I didn't mean to take it this far.

I had merely returned each insult as it came, and somehow this was where we had ended up.

Snorting like a frenzied Minotaur, Chulwoo finally managed to force the words out. With great difficulty. Tremendous difficulty.

"Y-You bastard, what the hell are you?"

"What kind of bastard do you think I am?"

"A bastard who's gone mad wanting to die."

Crack.

Bones shifted with an ugly crunch inside his fist, which was as thick as a shovel handle.

Chulwoo ground his teeth and glared at me.

"Do you even know what it means to interfere in someone else's personal gratitude and grudges in Murim?"

"I already apologized for sticking my nose where it doesn't belong. But if guests start throwing punches, what does that make the people who invited them? You ought to consider our family's position too."

"Our family?"

[1011] Benjamin refers to Benjamin Button, a fictional character who ages backward.

[1012] Benjamin refers to Benjamin Button, a fictional character who ages backward.

"Yeah. Our family."

"Are you perhaps a member of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?"

"I'm no household parasite, if that's what you mean."

"Make one more wordplay joke, and I'll put you in bed for three years."

"Watch your mouth—unless you want your family observing three years of mourning.[1013]"

Chulwoo smiled thinly. It wasn't a smile born of amusement. It was the kind of smile that appeared on its own when someone's anger had reached the top of his head.

"My Senior Brother warned me over and over… but I can't let you off. Time for you to take a few hits."

Boom!

Before he could finish speaking, an enormous roar rang out, and the ground shattered.

The two-meter-tall[1014] giant launched himself like a cannonball. The time it took him to reach the tip of my nose was no more than an instant.

"It's going to hurt."

Whoosh!

With a chilling voice, the air scattered.

No—it was crushed.

It was nothing more than a simple punch, with no form or martial principle added to it. The force contained in that fist exploded with enough momentum to shatter a thousand-geun[1015] boulder.

But…

It doesn't matter if it doesn't hit me.

Bang! B-bang!

I bent backward as if lying down. The fist tore through the air a handspan above me, compressed air exploding from its tip. A tree about ten feet away went flying as if caught in a typhoon.

Wow. This guy was serious.

I had to marvel at the sheer power.

If an ordinary First Rate master had taken that blow, it would not have ended with mere pain. Once Chulwoo lost his temper, he seemed unable to see anything else.

"Hey, hey. Take it easy. Take it easy."

"You rat-like bastard!"

[1013] Three years of mourning was a traditional period of mourning for a parent in Korean and Chinese custom.

[1014] Two meters is about 6 ft 7 in.

[1015] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

Whoosh! Whoooosh!

One punch, two punches, three. Each time I easily dodged another blow, my suspicion hardened into certainty.

I think I can win.

Even a thousand-geun[1016] boulder had to be hit before it could be shattered.

No matter how powerful an attack was, it meant nothing if it failed to connect.

Moreover, Chulwoo had only just entered the Peak realm and couldn't even project Fist Energy. If our martial insight was comparable, I had an overwhelming advantage.

Because I possessed a special power no one else had.

Stats.

Whoooosh! Bang!

After yet another wild swing, Chulwoo exploded in frustration.

"What the hell!"

"You're too worked up. Take a deep breath and relax. Then you might manage to touch a single hair on my head."

Meanwhile, I had completely regained my composure. Hyuk Mujin and Cheongpung were watching from the sidelines as if none of this concerned them, while Woo Hwangtae stared at our exchange with his mouth hanging open.

Given how things were going, Chulwoo also seemed considerably flustered.

"What the hell are you?"

"A member of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"There's no way someone like you could be in this backwater… Wait."

Chulwoo stared intently at me, then suddenly narrowed his eyes.

"Are you the Heaven Shaking Sword?"

"I'm somewhat related to him. As far as I know, we came out of the same womb."

"Then… are you the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?"

I grinned.

"Bingo."

He might not have known what bingo meant, but he understood that it meant yes and clenched his fist.

"I knew you had some skill."

"Try hitting me at least once before saying that. You said it would hurt, but this just feels refreshing."

"I'll admit it. You may not be a dragon, but you could at least qualify as an imugi.[1017]"

[1016] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

[1017] An imugi is a legendary serpent said to have the potential to become a dragon.

“Good grief, that’s a harsh assessment.”

“Your mouth has reached the realm of transcendence.”

“It’s all psychological warfare. Take a look at yourself. Your eyes are rolled back, and you keep swinging at thin air.”

“Don’t get the wrong idea. I simply had no desire to use my sect’s martial arts against a nameless small fry like you.”

“Which sect is that? The Dodong Sect?”

“You don’t need to know.”

He spat out a wad of phlegm and muttered,

“Damn it, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. That takes the fun out of it.”

Same for me.

He was obviously a disciple of a fairly well-known sect, but if we fought until one of us fell, both of us would have to deal with the backlash.

“I’m holding back because of my eldest brother.”

“I’ll let you off because of my Senior Brother.”

We spoke at nearly the same time and glared at each other.

“Oh? Look at this bastard.”

“Bastard? You little brat, how dare you speak to an adult that way!”

“Adult, my ass. Do you even know how old I am, calling yourself an adult?”

“What else is someone who’s barely twenty supposed to be but a child?”

“That’s not what I meant…!”

If I added my age in Murim to my age in the modern world, I was practically fifty. But there was no chance of getting that across to him.

I swallowed the words that were about to burst out.

“Forget it. What’s the point of talking to a guy like you? Anyway, in Murim, the strong are the adults.”

“What? Are you saying I’m weaker than you?”

“Obviously. Didn’t you feel the difference between us just now?”

“You son of a bitch! I could chew you up and still not feel satisfied!”

“Try hitting me, if you can.”

“You think I can’t?”

Just as Chulwoo raised his fist with a heavy snort, someone’s voice abruptly cut in.

“It would be best if you both stopped now.”

Wipeng descended with an elusive movement technique and swept us with a chilly gaze.

His eyes passed over Cheongpung, Hyuk Mujin, and Woo Hwangtae, who was a complete mess after being dragged around, before finally shooting toward Chulwoo and me like arrows.

“Defeated Flower Fist. Third Young Master.”

“No, Great Hero Wipeng. It’s not like that. The circumstances…”

“That’s right. I was merely…”

His voice, colder than the bitter winds and snow of the north, froze our next words solid.

“Are you both determined to bring utter shame upon your respective schools?”

Chulwoo and I quietly shut our mouths.

“How long has Defeated Flower Fist been gone?”

“Dunno. Feels like it’s been more than half an hour.”

“Why isn’t he back?”

“Maybe he’s blocked up.”

“A Daoist from Huashan?”

“Why would that matter? If he’s a Daoist from Huashan, does that mean his shit should come out smoothly too?”

“I suppose you’re right.”

Just as the theory that Chulwoo was constipated was all but confirmed, the people who spotted a party of riders coming down the hill burst into cheers.

Among them was a face no martial artist in Shanxi Province could possibly fail to recognize.

“It’s the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi!”

“The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi! He’s coming with the Defeated Flower Fist!”

“Wooaaah!”

The appearance of two young and outstanding men sent the crowd into a frenzy.

The two young prodigies whom everyone believed would become future leaders of Murim walked side by side, waving their hands.

Every time they did, cheers erupted from all directions, along with hands reaching out to touch even their clothing.

“The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi!”

“The Defeated Flower Fist!”

“Well now, they look pretty close. Were they acquainted?”

“Does that matter? Real talent recognizes real talent. There’s nothing strange about them forming a deep friendship in such a short time.”

“Now that you mention it, that makes sense. They look great together.”

While everyone watched them with warm smiles, the beaming Jin Taekyung and Chulwoo exchanged words in voices so low they were barely audible.

“I let you off earlier. You know that, right? You couldn’t even touch me.”

“Bullshit. I didn’t use even half my strength.”

“I didn’t use even a third.”

“I misspoke. I didn’t use even one-tenth.”

“My mistake too. Truth is, I didn’t use even one percent.”

“Now that I think about it, neither did I.”

“Is this guy completely insane?”

“Who are you to say that?”

Amid the thunderous cheers, a fierce exchange unfolded—one only Peak masters could hear.

Chapter 184

There could be a thousand people, not merely hundreds. Escorted by martial artists from the Jin Family of Taiyuan, we pushed our way through the enormous crowd.

This feels amazing.

I felt like a star in the Chinese-speaking world. The Korean Wave[1018] and all that.

Then again, I really was Korean, so maybe that wasn't entirely wrong.

"Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi! Look this way just once!"

"Eeeek! Young Hero Jin!"

"Waaah!"

They say even a mutt has the advantage on its home turf.

No matter how famous the Three Plum Blossom Elites were, they couldn't beat the pride of Shanxi Province—the son of Taiyuan—on his own turf.

As I beamed and waved, Chulwoo whispered to me.

"Look at the corners of your mouth. Enjoying yourself?"

"Look at the corners of yours. Are you crying?"

"You Shanxi bumpkin."

"Yeah, next mountain man."

"You little—"

"What, you—"

Just as sparks were about to fly again, a thread of Sound Transmission pierced my ear.

Third Young Master!

Wipeng was glaring at me with a fierce expression. He looked like he wanted to slap me right then and there.

He must have sent a similar Sound Transmission to Chulwoo, because the man added a curt remark with a dissatisfied expression.

"I let you off."

I answered with a derisive snort.

When the crowd's cheers first told me that Chulwoo was a fairly prominent young prodigy of Huashan, I'd been rather surprised.

But that was all.

So what if he's one of the Three Plum Blossom Elites?

I'd already seen more than enough of Huashan's martial arts, thanks to a certain someone trudging along beside me.

[1018] The Korean Wave is the spread of South Korean popular culture, including music, television, and film, beyond Korea.

“I’m hungry. I’m hungry.”

“…”

Cheongpung was a strange guy no matter how many times I saw him, but there was no denying that he was a Peak master who had mastered Huashan’s supreme secret arts.

Thanks to him, I was confident I could counter whatever martial arts Chulwoo used. The only thing Chulwoo had over me was Huashan’s backing.

Ah, no. I take that back.

Now that I thought about it, the difference in our backgrounds was pretty serious. No matter how far the Jin Family of Taiyuan had risen, the Nine Sects and One Gang were overwhelmingly powerful.

Fuck. I lose.

The Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families were essentially Murim’s version of a corporate alliance.

A bunch of already powerful conglomerates had banded together to gang up on everyone else. Who could possibly stand against that?

Fortunately, for all their talk of being the orthodox faction, they didn’t encroach on the neighborhood markets. That was why small and medium-sized companies like the Jin Family of Taiyuan still had room to climb.

Seen that way, Huashan is clearly paying close attention to this matter.

Huashan’s Lone Crane, Baek Museong.

If everything Hyuk Mujin had told me was true, Baek Museong was practically the next Sect Leader of Huashan—recognized as such by everyone, including himself.

There was one person among Huashan’s young prodigies who could be considered his only equal, though…

“Benefactor, I’m really hungry. Do you have any dumplings left?”

“No. I don’t.”

“Oh. Aaaah…”

Cheongpung was a lost cause.

Huashan’s Daoists would probably convert to Islam before that guy became the Sect Leader of Huashan.

Even I, an outsider, couldn’t help thinking, What kind of person is this? How much worse must it be for the people of Huashan?

He’s the kind of guy who’ll experience everything the world has to offer, then decide he’d like to try being Huashan’s Sect Leader too. Yeah.

As I imagined this highly plausible future, Chulwoo spoke with an irritated look.

“What, are you possessed by the ghost of someone who died craving dumplings? Please shut up and walk.”

"…?"

"…?"

"…?"

Chulwoo flinched as Wipeng, Hyuk Mujin, and I all turned to stare at him.

"W-What? Why are you suddenly looking at me like that?"

"Hey, don't tell me…"

"Young Hero Chul, you don't know?"

"Come on, surely not. You're one of the Three Plum Blossom Elites. There's no way you wouldn't know."

As our reactions came one after another, Chulwoo's ox-like eyes darted around.

"What? Why is everyone acting like this?"

Why else? Because he couldn't recognize an elder of his own sect.

In terms of seniority, Cheongpung was the Sword Saint's Disciple and the youngest Junior Brother of the Heavenly Sword True Person, Huashan's current Sect Leader.

That made him Chulwoo's master's Junior Brother—in other words, his Martial Uncle.

Actually, now that I think about it, maybe he wouldn't know.

The Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak, had raised Cheongpung while living in seclusion. Only a select few within Huashan could possibly know his face and identity.

I clicked my tongue at Chulwoo, who was standing right in front of his Martial Uncle without recognizing him.

"Tsk, tsk. It really is darkest beneath the lamp."

"What the hell are you talking about?"

"Never mind. You'll find out soon enough."

"Damn it, this is driving me insane."

As Chulwoo pounded his chest in frustration, we left the cheering crowd behind and passed through the main gate of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

At once, more than a hundred pairs of eyes turned toward us, accompanied by whispers from every direction. The atmosphere was completely different from the one outside the gate.

"That young man…"

"That's the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. He's every bit as handsome as I'd heard."

"The Defeated Flower Fist is here too. Isn't he the Heavenly Sword True Person's second Disciple?"

"Then who are the two young men beside them?"

"I couldn't tell you."

More than a hundred men and women of all ages mingled inside. Their clothes and bearing spoke of wealth and leisure.

The power players of Shanxi Province.

Some were Sect Leaders, while others were wealthy merchants. Every one of them possessed enough influence and ability to earn a formal invitation to this gathering.

At first glance, it almost looks like an aristocratic ball.

A strange feeling came over me as I walked on.

These people could be considered Shanxi Province's ruling class, yet they were merely supporting players at this gathering. Their curious, admiring gazes made something tickle in one corner of my chest.

Then it happened.

"My name is Jang Se-pal. I lead a small sect called the Hequ Sect."

"Ah, yes. Hello."

"I've long admired the reputation of the Jin Family of Taiyuan and the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi from the bottom of my heart, and…"

The middle-aged martial artist launched into a long-winded speech about how honored he was to meet me. Then people began swarming toward us like a horde of Zombies.

"Greetings. I run a small martial arts academy near Yangcheon…"

"Pardon? Oh, yes."

"Young Hero Jin, I have something important to discuss with you. Perhaps we could move somewhere else…"

"Right now? That might be difficult."

"This is my daughter. She wanted to meet the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi at least once, so I brought her along. If you happen to find her appealing…"

"Yes, yes."

"Oh! Then shall I send a matchmaker at once?"

"Wait, wait! I answered that wrong!"

What the hell was going on?

Requests for handshakes—or rather, a barrage of fist-and-palm salutes—poured in from every direction. I was on the verge of losing my mind.

If Wipeng hadn't stepped forward at just the right moment, I would have ended up accepting every favor and marriage proposal wrapped in flowery language.

"Everyone, restrain yourselves!"

The shout of a Peak master infused with internal energy made the people flinch, and we took the opportunity to escape. Chulwoo clicked his tongue as though he'd had enough.

"That was excessive. Are all the people of Shanxi like that?"

Of course not. This was a special case.

Wipeng was the only member of our group who hadn't been flustered. He spoke with his usual calm expression.

"This will happen often from now on, so you should gradually get used to it."

"I'm supposed to experience things like this often?"

"You're a direct descendant of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, after all."

"I almost got married five times just now."

"That's only natural for a promising young prodigy without a partner."

"I heard someone claim they were betrothed to me while we were still in the womb… Is that true?"

"What does it matter whether it's true or false? Look on the bright side."

My hair stood on end.

I'd spent twenty-seven years in the modern world without ever dating anyone, and now I was afraid I might suddenly end up in an arranged marriage.

In Murim, thousands of miles from home, no less.

No. I have Song-i.

Veins bulging in my neck, I shouted,

"Marriage is incredibly important! You can't just brush it aside like that! Love between a man and a woman! Pure feelings! Don't I get any of that?"

"No. You don't."

"Why?! How come?!"

Wipeng looked me up and down as if I were an insect.

"Is that something a man who's been frequenting pleasure houses since he was sixteen should say? Did you scatter your conscience along with your silver nyang[1019]?"

"…"

"Let's keep moving quietly. Our Lord is waiting."

If I'd actually been to one, at least I wouldn't have felt so wronged.

Fuck, I'd never even been to a pickup bar, let alone a pleasure house.

As I kept silent and wept tears of blood inside, Chulwoo sidled over and asked,

"Is that true?"

"What is?"

"That you've been visiting pleasure houses since you were sixteen."

"None of your business. Why are you suddenly asking?"

Chulwoo flinched and began to ramble.

"Well, how should I put it? Personal curiosity, perhaps. The curiosity of a man who has steadfastly walked only the path of a martial artist…"

[1019] A nyang is a historical Korean unit of currency. Here, "silver nyang" refers to silver money, not modern Korean won.

“You want to visit a pleasure house?”

“Ahem!”

“Finish walking the path of a martial artist. Don’t go wandering down side paths for no reason.”

I had barely finished answering with utter disdain when a voice cut in.

“Jin Taekyung is absolutely right. How long has it been since you descended from the main sect? Have you already forgotten the duty of a martial artist?”

The tone was stern, yet tinged with amusement.

The unfamiliar voice belonged to a clean-cut man. He approached with steady steps and respectfully offered a fist-and-palm salute.

But it wasn’t directed at me or Wipeng.

“Baek Museong, First-generation Disciple of Huashan, pays his respects to his Martial Uncle.”

Cheongpung remained silent for a moment before answering.

“Who are you?”

He looked to be around sixty.

The old man had a slender frame and strikingly narrow eyes.

A deeply hoarse voice rasped through his chapped lips.

“So you were utterly humiliated by some nameless nobody?”

“E-Elder, that isn’t what happened…”

The three men standing before him were sweating profusely.

They were known as the Three Hands of Zhongnan, but in the presence of an elder of their sect, they had to watch every word and every movement.

All the more so when that elder was the Roaring Fury Swordsman, a master counted among the five strongest in the Zhongnan Sect and a man notorious for his fiery temper.

“Then what happened? No matter how I listen to this, all these old ears hear is that you bastards smeared shit all over the name of the great Zhongnan Sect.”

The Three Hands of Zhongnan trembled beneath his piercing gaze.

Just as the Roaring Fury Swordsman was about to unleash his thunderous reprimand, one of the men, who had kept his mouth tightly shut the entire time, suddenly spoke.

“He wasn’t a nameless nobody.”

“What?”

Gong Ilhyuk, the man with a splint on his arm, continued.

“He said he was the Sword Saint’s Disciple.”

The revelation was so shocking that the Roaring Fury Swordsman fell speechless. After a moment, he asked in disbelief,

"…The Sword Saint?"

"Yes."

"The Sword Saint, who has lived in seclusion all these years, raised a Disciple?"

"We suspected it at first, but… it seems to be true."

"Your evidence?"

"Li Feng, a lay Disciple of Huashan, serves in the military of Shanxi Province. Judging by his reaction, there can be little doubt."

"Li Feng?"

The old man's already wrinkled brow furrowed further.

His memory wasn't sharp enough to recall some lay Disciple of Huashan.

"Is that all?"

At the lukewarm response, Gong Ilhyuk hurriedly continued.

"He has mastered Huashan's supreme secret arts to the Peak level despite being barely twenty. He displayed one martial art after another that only the main sect's direct Disciples are permitted to learn…"

After hearing the entire account of what had happened, the Roaring Fury Swordsman silently rubbed his sword scabbard.

The Sword Saint's Disciple. The Sword Saint's Disciple.

The Sword Saint had been in seclusion for decades.

No one even knew whether he was alive or dead, yet now his Disciple had suddenly appeared in Murim?

It was hard to believe, but the Roaring Fury Swordsman was already inclined to accept it.

At the very least, I should confirm it for myself.

After remaining silent for a long while, the Roaring Fury Swordsman abruptly rose from his seat. An order fell on the startled Three Hands of Zhongnan.

"Guide me."

"W-Where do you mean?"

"Could you mean the Sword Saint's Disciple…?"

Unlike the other two, who stood there flustered, Gong Ilhyuk's eyes flashed.

"As far as I know, that bastard is traveling with a scion of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"A scion of the Jin Family of Taiyuan? You mean that Jin Taekyung fellow you mentioned earlier?"

"Yes. He's half a day's journey from here."

The Roaring Fury Swordsman clicked his tongue.

“You cunning bastard. That’s why you came looking for this old man, isn’t it?”

“The name of the great Zhongnan Sect has fallen into the dirt because of these inept Disciples. Elder, aren’t you the person who cares about our sect more than anyone? I happened to hear that you were in the area on business, so…”

“Cut it out. From what you’ve told me, this Jin Taekyung fellow sounds like an incredibly arrogant bastard too.”

“That’s right. A bastard like him needs to be taught a harsh lesson.”

As if the thought had only just occurred to him, Gong Ilhyuk added,

“I hear the Jin Family of Taiyuan is holding a gathering.”

“A gathering?”

“They invited every sect in Shanxi Province so they could flaunt their power.”

“They trampled on our sect, and now they’re holding a gathering?”

Anger flared in the Roaring Fury Swordsman’s eyes.

“I’ve heard enough. Lead the way.”

“I obey, Elder.”

A smug smile spread across Gong Ilhyuk’s lips.

Chapter 185

“Baek Museong, First-generation Disciple of Huashan, pays his respects to his Martial Uncle.”

“Who are you?”

For a moment, I thought the world had stopped.

Jin Wikyung and Wolhwa, who had been walking behind Baek Museong, stopped in their tracks. Even the pretty young woman following them came to a halt.

Of course, Chulwoo had the best reaction of all.

“Senior Brother, what are you talking about? Why would our Martial Uncle be here?”

“Can’t you tell by looking?”

“Which Martial Uncle?”

“Martial Uncle Cheongpung. The man standing to your right.”

Chulwoo glanced at Cheongpung, then burst out laughing as if he’d just heard a fantastic joke.

“Ha ha ha! Senior Brother, you must be mistaken.”

“Second.”

“Enough. Wait, did you plan all this just to mess with me?”

“It’s the truth.”

“Senior Brother, I’m not that gullible. Now that I think about it, the people of the Jin Family of Taiyuan are quite the pranksters too. Did all of you really conspire just to fool me? Ha ha ha!”

“…”

What was this, some Korean-Chinese co-produced drama?

There was no way Huashan and the Jin Family of Taiyuan had joined forces to stage some hilarious hidden-camera prank just to fool this one guy.

“Ha ha ha.”

When no one—not even me—reacted, Chulwoo’s laughter gradually dwindled, then stopped altogether.

“…You’re serious?”

Baek Museong rubbed his temple as he answered.

“Yes.”

“Not a single word of it is a lie?”

“I told you, it’s true.”

Chulwoo whipped his head toward Cheongpung.

“Excuse me, Young Hero. What’s your name?”

“Cheongpung.”

Chulwoo's pupils trembled. He'd clearly remembered what he'd said to Cheongpung only moments ago.

"D-Dumpling."

"Dumpling?"

"N-Nothing. Then is this really Martial Uncle Cheongpung?"

"Without a doubt."

I almost wished I had some popcorn.

Leaving Chulwoo to slap his own cheeks over and over as if wondering whether he was dreaming, Baek Museong spoke.

"I apologize, Martial Uncle Cheongpung."

Cheongpung answered with an innocent expression.

"No, it's fine."

"You failed to recognize an elder of our sect and showed him grave disrespect. You ought to apologize a hundred times over. Is that not so?"

"Please forgive me, Martial Uncle."

Chulwoo bowed his head gloomily. Judging by his expression, he would need some time to accept that the dumpling ghost was his Martial Uncle.

Of course, Cheongpung didn't care in the slightest.

If anything, he was more curious about his relationship with these new faces.

"But who are all of you?"

"We are all Disciples of Huashan, just like Martial Uncle Cheongpung."

"Oh. But I'm just Grandpa's grandson."

The Sword Saint hadn't merely passed his martial arts on to Cheongpung as a Disciple. He had raised him as his grandson. That was why Cheongpung had only the vaguest understanding of sects and martial artists.

Yet even at that response, Baek Museong's gentle smile never faltered.

"My Master goes by the title of Heavenly Sword True Person. In terms of seniority, he is your eldest Senior Brother."

"My eldest Senior Brother?"

"Yes. Your Master—or rather, your grandfather—the Sword Saint had three Disciples before you. Have you ever heard about them?"

Cheongpung murmured uncertainly.

"I don't really know. I think Grandpa mentioned them once, but…"

"He even came to visit you with several others ten years ago."

Cheongpung thought hard, then suddenly exclaimed,

"Ah! That scary-looking old man!"

He'd just called the Sect Leader of Huashan a scary-looking old man. Regardless of everyone else's shock, Cheongpung beamed now that the mystery had been solved.

“He’s my eldest Senior Brother?”

“Precisely.”

“Ohhh. I see. I thought he was a bad person. It looked like he was trying to kick Grandpa and me out.”

“You may be unfamiliar with the circumstances of our sect, Martial Uncle. You can learn about those things little by little.”

What admirable patience.

Even if Baek Museong had slapped Cheongpung across the ear in the middle of their conversation, he probably would’ve been acquitted at the first trial. Yet his smile never faltered.

No wonder there’s a crane in his epithet.

As I was thinking that, Cheongpung turned to me with a bright smile.

“Benefactor, they say they’re my Martial Nephews!”

“Ah, yes. Congratulations.”

“Do you want to be my Martial Nephew too, Benefactor?”

“…Me?”

“Why? If you don’t want to be my Martial Nephew, I can make you my Martial Uncle.”

This crazy bastard was spouting nonsense.

Not only was that not something Cheongpung could decide on his own, but becoming Cheongpung’s Martial Uncle would make me a junior fellow Disciple of the Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak.

For all I knew, I could even order the Sect Leader of Huashan to run cigarette errands for me.

“…”

That actually sounded pretty good.

I was about to nod as if under a spell when—

“Ha ha. Young Hero Cheongpung certainly knows how to tell a joke.”

Wipeng’s mouth was smiling, but his eyes said something entirely different.

His murderous glare snapped me back to my senses.

“No, it’s fine. I’m all right.”

“Really? What a shame.”

The other two members of the Three Plum Blossom Elites stood with their mouths hanging open in disbelief, but Baek Museong merely smiled.

“You may not be able to formally enter the sect, but we can certainly welcome you as an honored guest.”

I blinked.

“Was that a formal invitation?”

“Of course. An exceptional young prodigy like Young Hero Jin is always welcome. And…”

His gentle voice continued.

“You could also keep Martial Uncle Cheongpung company on his journey back to our sect.”

Cheongpung, who had been bouncing excitedly, went still.

“Huh? Go back?”

“Yes, Martial Uncle Cheongpung.”

Baek Museong offered a deep fist-and-palm salute. When he spoke again, his voice was stern and solemn.

“It is the Sect Leader’s order. Please return to Huashan.”

Watching Cheongpung disappear into the main hall of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, Chulwoo clicked his tongue.

“What kind of man—or rather, Martial Uncle—is he?”

Even Eunhyang, who bickered with Chulwoo at every opportunity, nodded this time.

“Exactly. I didn’t know anyone could refuse our Master’s order.”

“There is one person. Grandmaster.”

“Senior Brother Chul, he doesn’t count.”

Chulwoo scratched the back of his head awkwardly.

“Well, that’s true.”

The Sect Leader’s authority was absolute. Even someone who outranked him in sect seniority couldn’t openly refuse his orders.

Challenging the Sect Leader’s authority was tantamount to tarnishing the sect’s name.

The larger the sect, the more rigidly that hierarchy was enforced.

“But to refuse him flat-out… Whew. I knew he was unusual, but he’s even more extraordinary than I expected.”

“You’ve only seen a tiny fraction of it. Earlier, I even called him Dumpling—no, never mind.”

Chulwoo shook his head, then cautiously asked,

“What are you planning to do now, Senior Brother?”

“I’m not sure.”

Baek Museong, who had been lost in thought, finally spoke.

“I didn’t expect Martial Uncle Cheongpung to refuse so stubbornly.”

“At this point, shouldn’t the Disciplinary Hall step in instead of us?”

“Why do you think so?”

“He disobeyed our Master’s order.”

Even the slightest violation of Huashan’s rules resulted in a summons from the Disciplinary Hall. If the Disciplinary Hall, which dealt with every infraction without mercy, passed judgment, Cheongpung would be treated as a serious criminal.

Seeing his Junior Brother huff indignantly, Baek Museong let out a quiet laugh.

“Martial Uncle did not violate the rules.”

“Pardon?”

“What do you mean?”

“The rules apply only to Disciples of our sect. Would a Disciple of Qingcheng Sect be punished for violating Shaolin’s rules?”

“Does that make any sense?”

“Of course it does. But Martial Uncle Cheongpung is… our Martial Uncle. He’s Grandmaster’s Disciple.”

“If only that were truly the case.”

Baek Museong added with a sigh,

“Strictly speaking, Martial Uncle Cheongpung is little different from an outsider. This happened because he never underwent the initiation ceremony.”

Everyone underwent an initiation ceremony, whether they were a main-sect Disciple or a lay Disciple. Only then did they officially become a Disciple of Huashan and have their name entered into the sect registry.

But Cheongpung was different.

“Who could have known Grandmaster would do something like that?”

Baek Museong remembered what had happened ten years ago with perfect clarity.

After the Sword Saint had lived in seclusion for many years, his Master, the Heavenly Sword True Person, had led several people in searching Huashan himself. At last, they discovered a residence where a ten-year-old boy was swinging a sword.

“It was unbelievable.”

No one knew when the boy had arrived, where he’d come from, or how he’d been raised. Yet he had already learned Huashan’s supreme secret arts.

But even the boy’s astonishing accomplishments were soon overshadowed by the Sword Saint’s even more astonishing words.

“You want me to initiate him?”

“Yes, Master. I intend to conduct the initiation ceremony and accept him as a main-sect Disciple. The order may be backward, but we cannot ignore a once-in-a-millennium genius like him—”

“Ignore him.”

"Pardon?"

"I said to continue ignoring him. When the time comes, I'll send him over myself."

"M-Master!"

"And don't come looking for him again. Not unless you want me to burn this whole place down."

"Set fire to Huashan? Are you saying we should all die together?"

"Oh. Now that you mention it, I suppose we would. Anyway, that's how it is. I'll take care of Cheongpung."

Chulwoo and Eunhyang both gaped at him.

"D-Did he really say that?"

"Are you sure you're not exaggerating?"

"I wish I were… but you both know what happened afterward."

Cheongpung, whom the Sword Saint had promised to send when the time was right, had slipped out into the world without anyone noticing, while the Sword Saint himself had vanished without a trace.

"The truth is, our Master isn't worried about Grandmaster. He's worried about Martial Uncle Cheongpung."

Cheongpung had already displayed unbelievable accomplishments ten years ago. But the world—and Murim in particular—overflowed with schemes and treachery.

It was far too dangerous for someone who wasn't a Disciple of Huashan to wander the world while possessing Huashan's secret arts.

"We must bring Martial Uncle Cheongpung back. For his sake, and for the sake of our sect. Do you understand?"

The two nodded at his resolute tone, then suddenly spoke up.

"But, Senior Brother…"

"How are we supposed to bring him back? By force?"

"That…"

Baek Museong hesitated before letting out a deep sigh.

"First, we need to bring the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi over to our side."

All three of them remembered Cheongpung's final words at the same time.

"I'm staying with my Benefactor!"

The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung.

This unexpected obstacle made Baek Museong's head throb.

What did he do for Martial Uncle to call him his Benefactor? Did he save his life or something?

[1020] Candied hawthorn skewers are a traditional snack made by coating skewered hawthorn fruit in hardened sugar.

A bond that had begun with a few candied hawthorn skewers[1020] was proving far more tenacious than expected.

The moment we entered the main hall, Wipeng demanded,

“What on earth did you do?”

“What do you mean?”

“I’m talking about Cheongpung.”

Everyone’s gaze naturally turned toward Cheongpung.

He was cramming the refreshments from the table into his mouth until his cheeks bulged.

“I didn’t really do anything.”

“Cheongpung defied the Sect Leader’s order. He said he would stay with the Third Young Master.”

“So?”

“What do you mean, ‘so’? Don’t you understand that one wrong move could strain the relationship between our family and Huashan?”

Was this like a parent blaming his top-student son’s friend when the boy’s grades dropped?

I shrugged.

“I’ll try to persuade him.”

“You must. You absolutely must persuade him.”

Wipeng’s voice rang with firm resolve. He whipped his head toward Jin Wikyung, who sat in the place of honor.

“My lord, please say something as well.”

“Very well.”

Jin Wikyung put on a solemn expression and spoke.

“My youngest. Your face has grown so haggard in just a few days. Was the journey uncomfortable? Do you have any idea how worried I was…?”

“Stop. I was insane to trust you, my lord.”

“Don’t be so hard on him. My youngest will take care of it.”

“This is driving me mad. As of today, I’m leaving the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“Ha ha ha. You certainly know how to tell a joke.”

“Did that sound like a joke?”

“Yes. It was very funny.”

“I’m not amused. I haven’t been amused since the Third Young Master failed to return by noon yesterday as promised.”

Jin Wikyung’s eyes widened.

“Oh, that reminds me, my youngest.”

“As you promised last time, please give him a thorough scolding.”

“What’s that sword strapped to your back? It looks like you had it made while you were away. Let me see it.”

Unable to contain his anger, Wipeng shot to his feet.

“I’m really leaving. It’s been awful knowing you. Let’s never meet again.”

“Ha ha ha. What’s gotten into him today? Why does he keep making me laugh?”

“Damn it. Draw your sword.”

“Taekyung, Wipeng seems eager to see your new sword. Why don’t you draw it for him?”

“Aaaaaah!”

With his eyes rolling back, Wipeng let out a shriek and placed his hand on the sword hilt.

But my next words froze him in place.

“Since the Fire King gave it to me, I think it would be best not to touch it if possible.”

“…?”

“…?”

Jin Wikyung and Wipeng blinked silently before finally managing to speak.

“F-Fire what?”

“Third Young Master, what nonsense did you just say?”

“The Fire King. Fire King. He left a sword in my care. Oh, and a martial arts manual too.”

Thunk. Clang.

In the suffocating silence, the sound of Wipeng dropping his sword rang out like thunder.

Chapter 186

Jin Wikyung and Wipeng.

The longer my story went on, the more openly their emotions showed.

Shock. Disbelief. Then shock all over again.

“Th-That’s really true?”

I’d been talking for so long that I was exhausted.

“It’s one hundred percent pure truth. Believe me.”

Wipeng, who had been sitting there in a daze, suddenly lunged at me.

“Third Young Master, if any of this is a lie, I swear one of us is going to die—and then the other one will too.”

“I told you, it’s one hundred percent true. One hundred percent!”

“No, but still…”

“Not a single speck of falsehood. One hundred fucking percent!”

“…”

Wipeng faltered, his face saying, Why do I suddenly feel so dirty?

I waved the sword and martial arts manual at him.

The last thing I could do was give him time to think it over.

“If you still don’t believe me, inspect them yourself. The Flame Divine Palm manual and a sword made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron!”

“Gasp! Put those away. Now!”

A vampire wouldn’t have reacted that strongly to a cross shoved in its face.

“What’s wrong?”

Wipeng stared at me in horror.

“You’re telling me to inspect the Flame Divine Palm manual? Are you trying to get our entire family wiped out?”

“Oh, right. There was that.”

Anyone who stole a look at the Fire King’s signature martial art would get a taste of the heat—enough to set their entire body on fire.

“Anyway, it’s all true. There are witnesses right here. Isn’t that right?”

Hyuk Mujin, who had been sitting in the corner like a corpse, cautiously raised his hand.

“Forgive me for speaking out of turn, but it is all true.”

Cheongpung, busy cramming some unidentifiable snack into his mouth, spoke with a solemn expression.

“Uh-oh-wa-uh-oh!”

“…”

I doubted that testimony would carry much weight. More importantly, how long was that bastard planning to keep eating? Was his stomach some kind of bottomless jar?

"Wipeng, it seems Taekyung is telling the truth."

At Jin Wikyung's words, Wipeng nodded, his expression complicated.

"Yes. As difficult as it is to believe… I don't see how we can doubt him."

"The Fire King. The Fire King himself…"

Jin Wikyung let out a long breath. After a moment's hesitation, he picked up the Unnamed Sword from the table.

Shing.

A pure-white blade slid free of its rough scabbard.

As Jin Wikyung studied the frost-sharp edge, he murmured, "It smells of blood."

I had almost forgotten.

Before he was the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, Jin Wikyung was a swordsman.

Without needing an Item description window like I did, he had accurately read the weapon's condition. He slid the sword back into its scabbard.

"Taekyung."

"Yes."

I straightened.

If Jin Wikyung called me Taekyung instead of my youngest, it meant he was about to say something serious.

"Do you know what these objects are?"

"Precious treasures, aren't they? The kind that would be difficult to obtain even for a thousand pieces of gold."

A Supreme Peak martial art with the power to dominate the world and a peerless sword forged from Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

The Murim martial artists I knew would risk their lives to obtain these things.

Jin Wikyung shook his head.

"Wrong."

"What?"

"These are ghostly objects. They take away a person's soul and drive them mad."

"Oh."

"Do you know the name of that ghost?"

I muttered the answer.

"Greed."

"Yes. Greed. A tenacious, dangerous creature that dwells in every human heart."

I knew.

I had experienced it myself. How could I not know?

On that day several years ago, greed had taken root in my heart, and because of it, I had lost people close to me.

“I don’t know why the Fire King entrusted such dangerous objects to you, but… everything concerning them must be kept absolutely secret. Do you understand?”

His eyes and posture were directed solely at me, but the warning was meant for everyone in the room.

Me, Hyuk Mujin, and finally Cheongpung.

As though we had made a promise, we answered at the same time.

“Yes.”

“I’ll keep that in mind, Lesser Family Head.”

“Ah-uh-ah-hae-ho, ma-ah-hae-oh.”

…

That damn mouth of his. I ought to just—

Jin Wikyung drew back the heavy curtain. Through the lattice window, he watched Jin Taekyung’s retreating figure.

Sunlight struck the rough scabbard strapped across Taekyung’s back and shattered into fragments.

“The weather is fucking beautiful.”

“Didn’t you say it was fantastic earlier?”

“That was then. They mean nearly the same thing anyway.”

“This one sounds rather different.”

“Don’t nitpick when you know perfectly well what I mean. Come to think of it, why are you still here when you said you were leaving?”

Wipeng answered wearily.

“Don’t you start nitpicking either, my lord. My thoughts are tangled enough already.”

The same could be said for both of them.

Looking as if he had aged ten years, Jin Wikyung muttered, “What in the world is going on?”

“I would like to know that myself.”

Looking back on everything that had happened to the Jin Family of Taiyuan over the past year—no, barely half a year—it was enough to make a man wonder if some demon had descended upon them.

“After everything else, now the Fire King has appeared.”

"I hear he is extraordinarily eccentric. I'm worried his wrath may fall upon our family."

"Then we'll have to turn that danger into an opportunity."

Jin Wikyung ran his fingers over his teacup. To anyone watching, he would have appeared lost in thought, but his lips were moving almost imperceptibly.

How is that matter progressing?

Recognizing the Sound Transmission, Wipeng played along naturally.

"The tea has gone cold. Shall I have them bring you another cup?"

We haven't discovered anything yet.

"It's fine. This is still drinkable."

What about the surviving remnants?

"You'll ruin your health if you keep doing that."

Most of them died during the interrogation.

"You're the only one who worries about my health."

How many remain?

"Shouldn't I at least look after you, with the Lady of the House not here?"

Three.

Jin Wikyung's fingers went still.

The news was so unexpected that, for a moment, he forgot to continue the spoken conversation.

Only three?

Wipeng sighed and nodded.

They had a far more powerful restriction placed on them than expected. I'm sorry to say this, but… my abilities aren't enough.

It isn't your fault. Our family simply lacks the necessary capabilities.

Give me your orders.

Jin Wikyung's throat went dry.

Stop the interrogations. Keep them alive by any means necessary. For now, those men are our only physical evidence.

As you command.

Jin Wikyung closed his hand around the cold teacup.

The trembling surface of the tea reflected a distorted, featureless face.

Just like them.

Dark Heaven…

He didn't know where, how, or why they had done such a thing.

He was flailing at empty air without learning a single thing.

Yet one suspicion in Jin Wikyung's mind was steadily hardening into certainty.

They are extremely dangerous. Targeting Shanxi Province was only the beginning.

The Head Elder had endured for years, biding his time. Yet the outcome was far too paltry for a grand design decades in the making.

Jin Wikyung had realized that only after the thrill of victory faded.

This was… too easy.

It had been the perfect opportunity to seize an entire province.

Yet Dark Heaven had never shown themselves, as though this alone had been enough for them.

What in the world are they after?

For now, there was no way to know.

He could only hope he had overestimated them.

"My lord?"

"Ah."

"You've been away from your seat for too long. The guests are waiting."

"…Is that so?"

At Wipeng's prompting, Jin Wikyung drained his teacup in one gulp and rose.

"Let's go."

The gathering was for the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

For now, they could allow themselves to savor the joy of victory.

Winter days were short. I had only just returned to the Jin Family of Taiyuan, but the sun was already beginning to set.

Come to think of it, I haven't trained properly in days. Not unless circulating my qi counts.

I was loosening up by practicing martial arts in the training ground attached to my pavilion when some unexpected guests arrived.

"Benefactor!"

"Benefactor!"

"…?"

What was that, an echo?

I turned toward the voices.

"I'm here!"

Cheongpung was smiling brightly, his mouth covered in a thick layer of some mysterious sauce. And then there was…

"Benefactor! It's me, Socheon!"

"It has been a while, Young Hero Jin."

"Huh?"

They were Gong Yacheong and Socheon, survivors of the Sakju Branch.

A sudden rush of happiness swept over me at the sight of those familiar faces.

It feels like someone's missing, though.

As I tilted my head, a whining voice rose from below the stone wall blocking my view.

"Me too! Soyul wants to see Uncle too!"

"Wait a moment."

Gong Yacheong bent down, scooped something up, and hoisted it onto his shoulders.

It was Soyul. The little girl beamed and waved at me.

"Uncle!"

"Oh, you've grown a lot."

"You've grown a lot too, Uncle!"

"Thanks. But I'm not an uncle."

"Anyone can tell you're an uncle!"

"…Right."

What did it matter whether I was an uncle or not?

Chuckling, I walked over to them.

"Has everyone been well?"

Gong Yacheong answered with a faint smile.

"Of course."

He still looked somewhat gaunt, but there was color in his face. He was clearly doing far better than when he had been poisoned and hovering at death's door.

The kids seem to be doing well too.

Socheon was at the age when children shot up, and he had grown another half a handspan[1021] since I'd last seen him. Soyul's cheeks were nice and plump.

And Cheongpung's stomach had swollen into a round little belly from all the food he'd eaten.

"…"

Right. Eat well and grow big.

Twenty was still a growing age, after all.

"What brings all of you here?"

Socheon answered as though he'd been waiting for me to ask.

"Martial Artist Hyuk requested it. The banquet is about to begin, but he has to report for guard duty, so he asked us to deliver the message in his place."

"Oh, the banquet."

[1021] A handspan, or ppyeom, is measured between an outstretched thumb and little finger. Its length varies by person; half a handspan is roughly 10 cm (4 in).

I vaguely remembered hearing about it earlier. There was supposed to be a grand banquet that evening.

Cheongpung, who had been licking the sauce from around his mouth, suddenly looked shocked.

“Gasp! Really?”

“…What? Didn’t you come here because you already knew?”

“No. If I’d known, I would’ve eaten less!”

Soyul also opened her eyes wide in shock. The candied treat in her hand slipped to the ground.

“No! Soyul’s full too!”

“…”

From their reactions, I could make a pretty good guess where the two of them had met.

“So, when does it start?”

“Less than half an hour from now, Benefactor.”

“Benefactor, hurry! I’ve never been to a banquet before!”

“Where is it?”

“In front of the new Grand Training Ground, Benefactor.”

“They said it’s in front of the Grand Training Ground, Benefactor!”

“Oh, there.”

I set down the practice spear in my hand and firmly secured the bundle beside me across my back.

The bundle, of course, contained the sword entrusted to me by the Fire King.

“Let’s all go.”

I started walking, only to stop short. I’d just remembered something I’d been meaning to say.

“Oh, and one more thing…”

“Please speak, Benefactor.”

“What is it, Benefactor?”

I heaved a deep sigh.

“Only one of you should call me Benefactor. It’s confusing.”

They were like a pair of parrots.

Without taking even a second to think, the two Benefactor parrots nodded.

“I’ll remember that, Benefactor.”

“Okay, Benefactor.”

“…”

No, think before you answer.

The Grand Training Ground.

True to its name, it was the largest training ground in the family, and it was packed shoulder to shoulder with people.

“What the hell? Why are there so many?”

I thought only invited guests were allowed in.

Cheongpung answered my question.

“I heard from the cook earlier that the Lesser Family Head said everyone should celebrate together on such a wonderful day, so he ordered them to let in all the people waiting outside too.”

“All of them?”

“Yes. The cook got really angry. He said the Lesser Family Head didn’t have any sense and shouldn’t run his mouth when he wasn’t going to help with the cooking.”

Soyul, happily sucking on a candied treat, chimed in.

“That’s right! He even gave Soyul a candied treat and told her not to tell anyone!”

“…Then why are you telling us?”

“Gasp!”

I shook my head and kept walking.

Before I had gone more than a few steps, a martial artist from the Jin Family approached.

“We will escort the two Young Masters to their seats.”

“I don’t mind watching from anywhere. I suppose that isn’t allowed?”

“No, Young Master. It is the Lesser Family Head’s order.”

Given the occasion, there was no helping it.

I exchanged brief farewells with Gong Yacheong and the others, then followed the martial artist to the seat prepared for me.

Mine was one of the places of honor reserved for a select few distinguished guests.

Which, of course, meant…

“Martial Uncle Cheongpung, Young Master Jin. We meet again so soon.”

The Three Plum Blossom Elites were among them.

Baek Museong had his junior disciples seated on either side of him. He greeted us with a fairly friendly expression.

“We didn’t get a proper chance to introduce ourselves earlier, did we? I’m Eunhyang.”

SYSTEM

Level: 75
Eunhyang

She was probably around the same age as my younger sister, Hayeon.
No sooner had I finished greeting her than a sullen voice cut in.
“Damn it. You’re sitting next to me?”
It was Chulwoo, a massive man whose bulk made the seat itself look cramped.
“Why? Don’t like it?”
“Would you?”
“I don’t like it either. That’s why I said it. Guess we agree on something.”
“Don’t say something so disgusting!”
“Then switch seats.”
“With whom?”
“Lots of people besides you would love to sit there. Switch with anyone standing down below.”
“You son of a bitch!”
“Did you just insult my parents? In the Jin Family of Taiyuan? Are you trying to pull a Jin-rula here?”
Chulwoo trembled with rage, but Baek Museong immediately rebuked him.
“You fool! What kind of outrageous language is that?”
“No, Senior Brother. It’s just…”
“Quiet. Young Hero Jin, I apologize on behalf of my Junior Brother. I also offer my apologies to Martial Uncle Cheongpung.”
Cheongpung, who had been hiding behind me, cautiously poked his head out.
“I’m fine, Martial Nephew.”
I smiled gently as well.
“I’m fine too. His blood is bound to run hot at that age. We should be understanding.”
“You’re five years younger than me, you little punk! What did you just say?”
“Young Hero Baek, if it isn’t too much trouble, could you switch seats with me? I’m a little afraid to sit beside him…”
“Second!”
“Whoo. Whoo-hoo.”
I dropped into the seat beside the snorting Chulwoo.
Chulwoo to my right, Cheongpung to my left.
What a spectacular arrangement.
Where is Jin Wikyung?

I looked around, but there was no sign of Jin Wikyung or Wipeng.

Then—

Boom!

The martial artists of the Jin Family surrounding the Grand Training Ground began striking their weapons.

There were more than three hundred of them. A blade-sharp aura and wave-like spirit surged from their ranks.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

Like drums pounding across a battlefield, the sound grew louder and louder until it swallowed every other noise.

And then…

BOOM!

With the loudest thunderclap yet, the human curtain split apart.

Chapter 187

Hundreds of martial artists stood there, radiating an aura as sharp as frost. Along the path they had opened, one man approached.

Step. Step.

The commoners who had come to watch, the nameless martial artists dressed in worn uniforms, and finally the powerful figures who moved Shanxi Province—

Everyone held their breath and watched that one man.

Jin Wikyung.

This is like something out of a movie.

Clad in a martial uniform embroidered with a silver wyvern, Jin Wikyung strode forward without hesitation. His commanding presence and effortless authority overwhelmed everyone present.

The silence Jin Wikyung had created was broken by his voice.

“Our family first put down roots in Taiyuan three hundred years ago.”

His shout, infused with profound internal energy, carried far and wide.

“Our beginnings were undeniably humble.”

It had been an age of chaos. Natural disasters struck one after another, and the empire that had seemed eternal lost its strength. Warlords raised their banners throughout the land and declared themselves kings, plunging the realm into war.

Blood instead of water soaked the parched earth, while grain waiting to be harvested was trampled beneath horses’ hooves.

At the end of that long war, a man who had wandered the realm stopped in the ruined capital of an old dynasty.

That was the beginning of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

“Our ancestor, Grand Patriarch Jin Muryang, took in orphans and cared for widows and the elderly. Though he raised the banner of martial strength, he never forgot humanity.”

The small seed soon sprouted. Those who gathered beneath the banner of the Jin Family of Taiyuan became its branches, its trunk, and its strong, deep roots.

The family that had begun so humbly grew into a towering tree whose reach extended across all of Shanxi Province.

“Yet even our family could not escape the rise and fall of fortune.”

Everything had slowly changed with the passage of time. After enduring one event after another, both great and small, the towering tree began to wither.

Mistaken decisions by its leaders, invasions by foreign enemies, betrayals by allies, natural disasters beyond human power to prevent…

Before long, its many branches had broken and its lush leaves had fallen.

“But!”

A thunderous shout burst forth. His voice boiled like lava.

“We survived.”

Though the branches broke and the leaves fell, the roots remained whole.

“We may have been shaken, but we were never uprooted.”

As long as the roots remained, the tree would grow again. It would regain its vitality and put forth lush new leaves as though nothing had ever happened.

Just as it was doing now.

“As the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, I swear this.”

Boom!

Hundreds of weapons struck the ground. Invisible heat rose from the martial artists of the Jin Family of Taiyuan as they dropped to one knee.

“We! The Jin Family of Taiyuan!”

It was a vow to the family’s countless members, to everyone gathered here, and to the enemies who had yet to bare their fangs.

“Three hundred years ago and three hundred years from now, we will remain here unchanged!”

Boom! Boom!

“I ask you all!”

His blazing eyes swept across the crowd. Taking in faces filled with excitement and anticipation, fear and guilt, Jin Wikyung shouted,

“Are you ready to lay a new foundation alongside our family?”

A tremendous roar erupted from the crowd, centered on the martial artists of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

“Loyalty!”

Boom, boom-boom-boom-boom-boom!

Just then, a clear voice rang out from somewhere.

“May we also join the Jin Family of Taiyuan on the path it has chosen?”

The voice had come neither from the place of honor where I sat nor from the seats reserved for distinguished guests below.

The vast crowd surrounding the Grand Training Ground parted, revealing the owner of the voice.

That’s…

Instead of a flowing court dress, she wore a comfortable martial uniform. With features mature beyond her years, she respectfully saluted Jin Wikyung with clasped fists.

“I am Lee Seowol of the Mount Heng Sword Sect. I have arrived in response to the Lesser Family Head’s summons.”

The middle-aged man who had been standing beside her like an iron tower revealed his identity in a rough voice.

“I am First Elder Cheol Mubaek. I pay my respects to the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

The martial artists of the Mount Heng Sword Sect standing behind them shouted in unison.

“We pay our respects to the Lesser Family Head!”

A stir swept through the crowd.

The Mount Heng Sword Sect had appeared when it stood on the very brink of destruction.

Its new Sect Leader was the late Blood Wolf Sword’s only daughter, while the man at her side who called himself First Elder was Cheol Mubaek, the Tiger of Mount Heng.

Yet amid everyone else’s astonishment, Jin Wikyung remained perfectly calm.

Of course he did. He was the one who had sent me to deliver their invitation for New Year’s Day.

“This is the first time I’ve met you in person, Young Lady. Did you receive the formal invitation I sent last time?”

“Yes. And in addition…”

Lee Seowol answered calmly, then raised her head and looked in my direction.

“I received a kindness I could never hope to repay.”

Every gaze that swung my way made my face prickle.

Naturally. There probably wasn’t a single person in Shanxi Province who didn’t know that Jin Mukyung and I had saved the Mount Heng Sword Sect.

After giving me a faint smile, she turned back to Jin Wikyung.

“I would like to hear your answer to the question I asked earlier.”

Lee Seowol drew a deep breath. Her eyelids trembled.

“May we… join the Jin Family of Taiyuan as well?”

Jin Wikyung answered without a moment’s hesitation.

“Of course.”

“…!”

“Now it is my turn to ask. Are you prepared to walk alongside our family?”

Thump.

Instead of answering, Lee Seowol dropped to one knee. Cheol Mubaek and the martial artists under his command did the same.

“I, Lee Seowol, second Sect Leader of the Mount Heng Sword Sect, swear before Heaven and Earth.”

The Mount Heng Sword Sect had once commanded Shanxi Murim. Now its new Sect Leader, inheritor of its orthodox lineage, knelt before Jin Wikyung.

No. She knelt before the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

“Our sect pledges its loyalty to the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

"Loyalty!"

They were few in number, but their shout was thunderous. Jin Wikyung took Lee Seowol by the shoulder and helped her to her feet.

His manner of speech had shifted naturally as well.

"I grant you permission."

On the first day of the new year, the Jin Family of Taiyuan accepted the Mount Heng Sword Sect as its vassal.

"Waaaaaaah!"

"Jin Family of Taiyuan! Jin Family of Taiyuan!"

Cheers upon cheers.

The crowd of more than a thousand people enthusiastically chanted the name of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

It really was that impressive.

First came a speech that set the listeners' blood boiling, followed by the Mount Heng Sword Sect's oath of loyalty.

What an ending.

The real banquet hadn't even begun, but everyone present must have realized it by now.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan was the hegemon of Shanxi Province, possessed of both overwhelming power and mercy.

Chulwoo, seated beside me, was no exception.

"…Whoa."

The guy who had seemed simpleminded and proud to a fault now wore an expression of genuine admiration.

The kid knows a thing or two.

It was childish, but I couldn't help puffing out my chest a little. I was a member of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, after all, and I'd contributed quite a bit to making this day possible.

"Ahem, ahem. Looks like you were moved."

"It was incredible. My heart pounded the entire time."

Chulwoo continued, his voice brimming with excitement.

"How can anyone be so beautiful?"

"Not to brag, but the Jin Family of Taiyuan has become a pretty big deal in Shanxi —what did you say?"

What had I just heard?

After some hesitation, I asked uneasily,

"You're not talking about my eldest brother, are you?"

"What?"

"You know, that sort of thing. I covet that man's muscles. I want to do bench presses with him while we strip off each other's Under Armour[1022]. Something like that…"

"What the hell are you talking about?"

Chulwoo frowned. Judging by his expression, that wasn't what he meant.

"Good. That's a relief. I thought you were gay."

"Gay? What's that?"

"Well, to put it metaphorically, I suppose it's the process by which a pair of Diglett[1023] meet and become Dugtrio[1024]."

"I can't understand a word you're saying. Explain it simply."

I came up with the simplest term possible.

"Male homosexuality."

"You little bastard…!"

Chulwoo was about to raise his fist when he stopped short. Baek Museong, his Senior Brother, was sitting right beside him.

The Huashan's Lone Crane buff was damn useful.

I grinned and asked,

"So who exactly is beautiful?"

"The woman! That woman from the Mount Heng Sword Sect!"

"Oh, Young Lady Lee Seowol?"

Strictly speaking, she was the Sect Leader, but calling her Young Lady still felt more natural.

At my familiar tone, Chulwoo's eyes lit up.

"Y-You know her?"

"We have a little history."

"What kind of history?"

A history that began with a sexual harassment scandal and ended with a marriage proposal, I suppose.

"It's a pain to explain. The whole story is pretty eventful. But don't tell me…"

I trailed off and looked at Chulwoo.

"You're interested in Young Lady Lee?"

"Interested?"

Chulwoo shot to his feet, and I felt slightly reassured.

[1022] Under Armour is an American sportswear brand.

[1023] Diglett is a small, single-headed Pokémon that emerges from the ground.

[1024] Dugtrio is a Pokémon depicted as three Diglett-like heads together.

"Right? You kept talking about your heart pounding, so I thought you were actually interested in—"

"This isn't interest! It's love."

"…"

"Three children should be about right. Two boys and one girl."

"…Sure. Keep going."

"We'll raise a yellow dog too. I heard that children who grow up with a dog develop better emotionally. We'll have a happy family."

I was about to call him an idiot when I suddenly stopped.

I feel like I've seen this scene before.

Where had I seen it?

For some reason, something about it hit a sore spot.

And why was I suddenly thinking about Song-i and Uncle Kkeokjeong back in the real world?

That's strange.

I pushed the question aside and spoke.

"Are you done?"

"I'm not done yet."

"Then let's pretend you are and listen to me. This is important."

My serious tone gave Chulwoo pause.

"Important?"

"Yeah. How old are you?"

"Twenty-five."

"Do you know how old Young Lady Lee is?"

"No."

"She's seventeen. Ah, the year just changed, so she's eighteen now."

"So?"

"What do you mean, so, you goddamn monster? Forget the seven-year age gap—she's still eating school lunches and doing late-night study sessions! She's only just choosing between humanities and sciences! What about her school grades?"

Chulwoo stared at me in bewilderment.

"What are you talking about? She's at the perfect age to marry."

"Ah, sorry. I got carried away."

As the older brother of a younger sister who was still in school, I couldn't help putting myself in her shoes. I kept forgetting this was Murim.

"Anyway, think it through. Don't let some fleeting emotion carry you away."

"No."

Chulwoo answered firmly, his expression turning dreamy.

“I knew the moment I saw her. My heart, which had lain still my entire life, finally began to beat.”

“…So you were dead for twenty-five years?”

“Dead? Yes, you’re right. Before I met her, I was little more than a corpse.”

“Can you really not die? Please die.”

“I can’t. Without her permission, I can neither die nor live.”

“…Wow. What a load of bullshit.”

Baek Museong and Eunhyang, who had been listening to our conversation, shook their heads.

“Here we go again.”

“Big Brother, didn’t you say something similar to that pretty third-generation Disciple last year?”

He’s a repeat offender?

What are you, some kind of serial confession demon?

Just as Chulwoo was about to explode at Eunhyang for exposing his embarrassing past—

“Young Master Jin.”

A lovely voice reached my ears. I turned and saw a woman climbing the stairs.

No. A girl.

Lee Seowol.

It was her.

Chapter 188

Dressed in a martial uniform, she looked more mature—and more beautiful—than the last time I'd seen her.

A faint fragrance drifted toward me as she drew closer.

Honestly, I can see why Chulwoo fell for her.

And not just Chulwoo. Half the men gathered at the Jin Family of Taiyuan were probably weighing their chances of confessing to her.

And a girl like that proposed to me.

She was still just a kid, and her proposal had been little more than an offer of political marriage, but I couldn't help feeling strange about it.

At last, she stopped in front of me and greeted me.

"It's good to see you again. Have you been well?"

"Yes. What about you, Young Lady Lee?"

The words had barely left my mouth when I realized my mistake. Her family had been killed, and her sect had nearly been annihilated. There was no way she could have been well.

"Uh…"

While I floundered, Lee Seowol answered.

"I've been well. Thanks to you, Young Master Jin."

With a light smile, she added,

"And I'll continue to be."

There was a steely resolve in her voice. It was as though the crisis that had nearly destroyed her sect, and the difficult decision to swear loyalty, had helped her grow.

I answered sincerely.

"I hope so."

Lee Seowol gave me a faint smile and nodded. That was when—

"H-Hey, Taekyung!"

"…What are you doing?"

I stared at Chulwoo in disbelief. He had thrown an arm around my shoulders, his expression and tone painfully awkward.

"You're in the way. Get your arm off me."

"H-Hahahaha! What's gotten into you? We're childhood friends. What's a little thing like this between us?"

"Weren't we sworn enemies?"

"M-My friend, your jokes have improved tremendously! Hwa-ha, hahahaha!"

"Does that sound like a joke to you?"

"Ah! By the way, who might this beautiful lady be?"

"…So that's what this was about."

The fabric of space-time cringed. Having flawlessly delivered the worst performance imaginable, Chulwoo bowed ninety degrees to Lee Seowol.

"Hello! It is an honor to meet you!"

"Ah… yes. It's an honor to meet you too."

"If I may introduce myself, I am this man's friend of ten years—"

To help the flustered Lee Seowol, I added,

"We met for the first time today."

"Although we only met today, we have already forged a bond worthy of friends of ten years—"

"We're not close at all."

"S-Since fate has brought us together, perhaps you'd care to sit beside me—"

"He's hitting on you because he thinks you're pretty. Don't fall for it."

Chulwoo ground his teeth. Lee Seowol's eyes widened.

"Oh, really?"

"Yes. Can't you tell just by looking at him?"

There was such a thing as being too oblivious. If she couldn't pick up on something this obvious, she was in trouble.

I sighed, and Lee Seowol stepped closer.

"No. I meant the other thing."

"Pardon?"

"Do you think I'm pretty, too, Young Master Jin?"

"Wait. Hold on."

Her voice was alluring, and her eyes sparkled.

What's gotten into her? Why is she acting like this?

Chulwoo watched the two of us, his gaze sinking into gloomy despair.

"Waaaaah!"

"Drink! Drink!"

The atmosphere at the Grand Training Ground was incredible, to put it mildly. The dance troupe—or rather, the dancers—brought in from Honghwaru captivated everyone with their dazzling movements, while the crowd ate, drank, and made merry.

Even the honored guests, who had looked uncomfortable at first, began to relax.

Those bastards should be on their knees with their heads to the floor, and even that wouldn't be enough.

Many of the honored guests owed the Jin Family of Taiyuan a debt, yet they had remained neutral during the recent war.

Neutral was a generous way to put it. They had backed out because they feared retaliation from the Mount Heng Sword Sect.

They must feel safe now that we've accepted the Mount Heng Sword Sect.

In front of those very people, Jin Wikyung had embraced the Mount Heng Sword Sect, the Jin Family's greatest enemy, and seated Lee Seowol in a place of honor.

It meant he had no intention of holding them accountable for what had happened.

Naturally, the atmosphere among the honored guests warmed at once. Swift oaths of loyalty followed, along with a barrage of gifts.

"Lesser Family Head, the Sangdo Sect and I wish to cast our lot with the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"Oh, how kind of you."

"This is a small gift I prepared as a token of my sincerity."

"Thank you, Sect Leader Hwang."

"Great Hero Jin, I lead the merchant guild…"

"It is a humble offering, but please accept it…"

It didn't take long for luxury goods, gold, and silver treasures to pile up like a mountain. I doubted Jin Wikyung would ever have to worry about the family budget again after today.

Once things had settled down, Jin Wikyung approached me.

"How was it?"

I gave him a thumbs-up.

"It was impressive. But is it really all right for you to come over already? It looks like some people haven't even had a chance to speak with you."

"That is precisely why they will grow anxious."

"What?"

"How do you think those who failed to speak with me today will feel?"

"I don't know. Like they've fallen far behind everyone else?"

"Correct."

Jin Wikyung took a sip of his drink and winked at me.

"The more desperate they become, the more they will offer. This is only the first day. I am looking forward to the final day even more."

"Damn."

He was going to bleed them dry.

The Sect Leaders of the Five Gates of Shanxi, who were staring this way as though someone had lit a fire under their asses, would undoubtedly be the highlight of the final day.

"But, my youngest."

Jin Wikyung lowered his voice.

“Why is the Defeated Flower Fist acting like that?”

At some point, Chulwoo had moved to the far end of the honored seats. He kept glancing our way with a gloomy expression.

He would glare at me with blazing eyes, then heave a deep sigh whenever Lee Seowol and I exchanged a few words.

“Uh, well…”

How was I supposed to explain this? Lee Seowol was sitting nearby, so I had to watch what I said.

If I’d known this would happen, I would’ve practiced Sound Transmission beforehand.

Reaching the Peak realm had made Sound Transmission available for me to acquire through practice. It hadn’t granted me the skill on the spot.

“He looks unwell. Is he hurt?”

He was probably hurting, all right. In his heart.

“I guess he’s just in a bad mood.”

I gave a vague answer. Just then, the music filling the Grand Training Ground abruptly stopped, and people began to murmur.

Who’s that now?

A young man strode confidently through the flustered dancers. After surveying his surroundings, he gave a respectful fist-and-palm salute toward the honored seats.

More precisely, toward Jin Wikyung.

“My name is Choo Dohwan of the Iron Blood Sect of Henan.”

Jin Wikyung’s eyes widened.

“Could you be Choo Dohwan, the Iron Fist?”

“It is merely an undeserved reputation.”

“I have heard much about you. But what brings a Disciple of the Iron Blood Sect here without prior notice?”

Even I had heard of the Iron Blood Sect of Henan a couple of times. It was a well-known sect.

Judging by his sect alone, he must rank among the top three honored guests here.

With everyone’s attention focused on him, Choo Dohwan revealed why he had stepped forward.

“I have come to request a duel.”

“A duel? Now?”

“Yes. I apologize for the imposition, but I ask that you grant my request.”

Of course he ought to apologize. What kind of occasion did he think this was?

Surprisingly, however, very few people frowned. Most had already had a few drinks and seemed to regard this as an exciting surprise event.

“Hmm.”

“If you refuse, I will offer a sincere apology and withdraw.”

At least he knew his manners. Baek Museong, who had been watching the exchange, added,

“I too have heard the name Choo Dohwan, the Iron Fist. They say that, as befits a Disciple of the Iron Blood Sect, he excels in fist-and-foot martial arts and is a man of upright character.”

“You could choose Baek Museong as your opponent.”

Baek Museong smiled faintly.

“My junior brothers and I would be happy to accept.”

“Are you certain?”

“Of course. On such a fine day, I can only be grateful for the chance to enliven the festivities as a guest.”

His answer carried both the composure of a powerful man and impeccable courtesy. Jin Wikyung rose from his seat.

“I accept Young Hero Choo’s request.”

“Thank you.”

But Jin Wikyung didn’t stop there.

“Furthermore, anyone who wishes to participate in the duels may step forward! The final victor will receive one hundred silver nyang[1025] and a fine weapon worthy of the prize!”

“Waaaaah!”

Cheers erupted at his generous gesture, rowing while the tide was coming in. After all, there was nothing more entertaining in the world than watching a fight.

The eyes of the young martial artists, still brimming with youthful vigor, lit up at the thought of testing themselves.

“Then, Young Hero Choo!”

Jin Wikyung drew everyone’s attention with his booming voice, then asked Choo Dohwan,

“Name your first opponent.”

“The opponent I wish to face is…”

A Disciple of the Iron Blood Sect, famous for his fist-and-foot martial arts. His epithet was the Iron Fist, for heaven’s sake.

It’s obvious.

Just as I expected, Choo Dohwan named a particular person.

“Chulwoo, the Defeated Flower Fist!”

“…Me?”

[1025] A nyang was a traditional Korean unit of currency; the prize here is stated in silver.

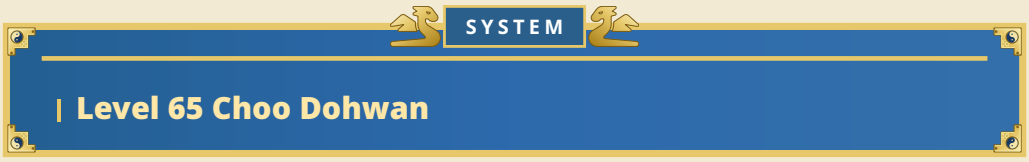
Chulwoo, who had been sitting there in a daze, rose to his full height. His gloom-soaked eyes settled on Choo Dohwan.

“Sounds good.”

“Let us determine which of us is stronger!”

I looked at the Level window floating over Choo Dohwan’s head and thought,

He’s going to get beaten to death.



And my prediction soon became reality.

Wham! Wham! Wham!

There were no forms or techniques involved. The difference between the Peak realm and First Rate was like the difference between heaven and earth, and Choo Dohwan had nothing that could bridge that gap.

Thud!

“Guh! H-How can it be this easy?”

“Are you really the Iron Fist? Why are you so soft?”

Chulwoo, meanwhile, rampaged like a monster. His martial arts were on a higher level, and he had been born with tremendous strength, size, and toughness. It took him only fifty exchanges to knock his opponent senseless.

And honestly, he seemed to have gone pretty easy on him.

“You know how to throw a punch, but it won’t work on me anyway. Give up here.”

Choo Dohwan gritted his teeth.

“No! It isn’t over until it’s over!”

“What a stubborn bastard.”

Whoosh! Crack! Thump!

Well, now it really was over.

Once Choo Dohwan lost consciousness, the waiting martial artists of the Jin Family of Taiyuan brought over a stretcher and carried him away.

“Whaaaat?”

“As expected of the Defeated Flower Fist!”

“The Iron Fist Choo Dohwan is a fairly well-known master, but even he’s no match for one of Huashan’s Three Plum Blossom Elites.”

Under the simple rules they had established, the winner had to continue accepting challenges. If no challengers remained, the winner could name an opponent.

Lee Seowol, who had somehow claimed the seat beside me, whispered,

“Do you think anyone else will challenge him?”

I snorted quietly.

“After seeing what happened to the Iron Fist? Do you really think anyone will come forward? I’ll bet my wrist that nobody does.”

Just then, a man wearing a heroic headband suddenly stepped forward and shouted,

“I am Hwang Jinsu of Hwang Family Manor! I challenge the Defeated Flower Fist!”

“…”

“…”

Ah, shit. I should’ve kept my mouth shut.

Crack! Thud!

As I wallowed in regret, Hwang Jinsu of Hwang Family Manor collapsed, scattering teeth everywhere.

A Level 25 had stepped forward. Of course that was the result.

“What about now?”

“Didn’t you just see what happened? He got it even worse than the Iron Fist. Bones can be set, but teeth are finished. Completely finished.”

“And your wrist…”

“Fine, I’ll bet it. I bet my left wrist before, so this time it’s my right. Just watch. Nobody’s coming forward now. Seriously.”

A wandering martial artist in a bamboo hat stepped forward.

“I am Gal Mo. I may be a nameless wandering martial artist, but would you care to exchange a few moves?”

“No need to ask. Come on up.”

Did that bastard smear honey on his fists or something? Why do the challengers keep coming?

After knocking down fifteen or so people in about half an hour, Chulwoo roared,

“Is there no one who can stand against me?”

Despite fighting so many duels in such a short time, he was still bursting with energy. The difference in skill was so vast that even the other martial artists now looked thoroughly daunted.

Thinking this was my chance, I spoke up.

“Nobody’s coming out now. Really, nobody. I’ll bet my wrist.”

Lee Seowol helpfully replied,

“You already bet those earlier. Both of them.”

“Then my left ankle.”

“You bet that on the fifth match.”

“Oh, then what about my right ankle?”

“You already bet that on the sixth.”

“My neck…”

“The eighth match…”

Damn it. So this was what a corpse with its eyes open looked like.

As I sat there in a daze, Lee Seowol let out a small laugh.

“…Were you planning to?”

“If you do me one favor.”

“What favor?”

Just as Lee Seowol was about to open her mouth—

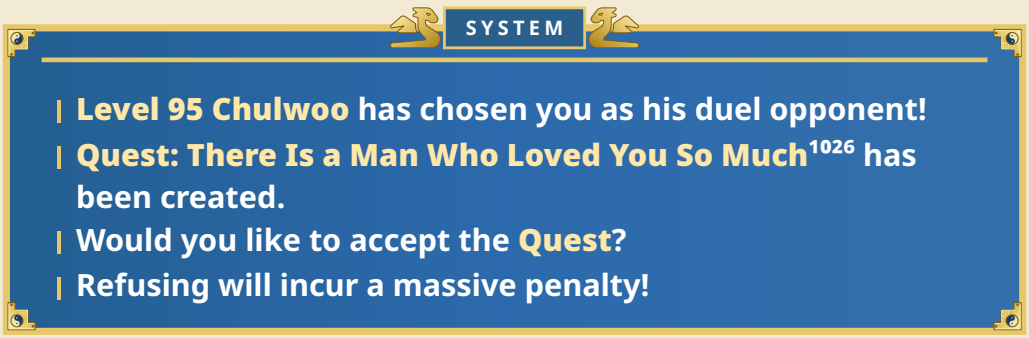
“Shan! Xi! Sleeping! Dragon!”

A tremendous shout shook the Grand Training Ground. Having defeated every challenger, Chulwoo stared at me and crooked a finger.

“Jin Taekyung, come out.”

At the same time, a System alert rang out.

Ding.



“…”

I could say this with absolute certainty: that was the most fucked-up quest title I had ever received.

[1026] The title echoes the opening line of “One Man,” a Korean ballad by Kim Jong-kook.

Chapter 189

SYSTEM

Quest
There Is a Man Who Loved You So Much
A man's burning love for a woman has manifested as jealousy and rage.
He seeks to win her love by defeating you.
Grade: Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Task: Win the duel (Incomplete)
Reward: EXP and Fame
Failure: Acquire the Title Weak Male
—Would you like to accept the Quest?
—If you refuse the Quest, the Title Weak Male will be granted.

Wow. This is bullshit.

Of course, the penalty for refusing would suck twice as much.

Not like I have a choice.

I clicked my tongue and rose from my seat, drawing everyone's attention.

"Young Master Jin!"

"Young Master Jin."

"Young Hero Jin, you don't need to go out there."

"That's right. Has Senior Brother Chul gone crazy? Why is he suddenly acting like this?"

Wolhwa, Lee Seowol, Baek Museong, and even Eunhyang, whom I'd barely exchanged a few words with, all looked at me with concern.

I was the only one who didn't think much of it.

"It's fine. We'll have a good, clean fight."

Wolhwa sighed.

"Young Master Jin, do you know who you're up against?"

"Of course. Chulwoo, the Defeated Flower Fist."

"I don't think you do. The Defeated Flower Fist is considered a prodigy even within Huashan. Think carefully about why he's called one of the Three Plum Blossom Elites."

"Probably because he's good at fighting."

"No, that's not what I… Whew. Fine. I give up. Do whatever you want."

Wolhwa was out.

Baek Museong and Eunhyang stepped forward next.

“I don’t mean to underestimate Young Hero Jin, but my Second Junior Brother is, how should I put this? He’s…”

“A mad bull. When Senior Brother Chul loses his temper, dealing with him is a real nightmare.”

“Eunhyang!”

“What? I’m not wrong.”

In short, they were saying someone like me was no match for Chulwoo.

That’s what you think.

I thought otherwise. I still didn’t know whether it was arrogance or confidence. I just…

I don’t think I’ll lose.

I was certain of it. Certain that I could defeat the man shouting at me.

“Come! Out! Right! Now!”

“I’m coming, you bastard.”

With more than a thousand people gathered around the Grand Training Ground watching me, I walked toward Chulwoo.

“We must stop the duel.”

At Baek Museong’s words, Jin Wikyung shook his head.

“My younger brother has already accepted the Defeated Flower Fist’s challenge. The duel will end after that.”

“Great Hero Jin.”

“I don’t know what happened between them, but there seems to be some bad blood. Wouldn’t this be a good opportunity for them to clear the air?”

Baek Museong sighed inwardly at Jin Wikyung’s carefree response.

Does he not understand the situation?

From what Baek Museong could see, Chulwoo was absolutely furious. He looked ready to break several of Jin Taekyung’s limbs before he stopped.

This is bad.

They had to stop this now. Baek Museong had heard more than enough rumors about the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi on the journey here, but in his eyes, Jin Taekyung was no match for his Second Junior Brother.

The names Defeated Flower Fist and Three Plum Blossom Elites had not been earned through his Master’s reputation alone.

“He could be seriously injured. Shouldn’t we intervene before something happens?”

"Who?"

"…Pardon?"

"The duel hasn't even begun yet. Nor has its outcome been decided."

Baek Museong realized he had been mistaken. Jin Wikyung understood the situation better than anyone.

They were simply operating under different assumptions.

"Great Hero Jin. Don't tell me…"

"That's right."

Jin Wikyung gave a low laugh. His gaze remained fixed on the back of his younger brother as he walked toward the dueling platform.

"That boy will win. Just as he always has."

"…"

Baek Museong was left speechless. The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi was undeniably a remarkable prodigy, but he couldn't match Chulwoo in experience, martial arts, or internal energy.

Baek Museong had watched Chulwoo since childhood. He could say that with absolute certainty.

The Lesser Family Head is wrong. The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi can't stand against my Second Junior Brother.

Baek Museong shook his head, but the water had already been spilled. If they backed down now, the prestige of both sects would be dragged through the dirt.

I'll have to intervene at the right moment.

As he watched the dueling platform with a grave expression, he overlooked one fact.

Munch, munch. Smack, smack.

Cheongpung—the man who called Jin Taekyung his Benefactor—was silently watching the situation unfold.

"Waaaaah!"

"Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi! Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi!"

"Defeated Flower Fist! Defeated Flower Fist!"

The moment I stepped onto the dueling platform, cheers erupted from every direction. The response was on a completely different level from when the previous challengers had appeared.

"Oh, so everyone knows the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. Just so you know, he's. Damn. Strong."

"Waaaaah!"

As I enthusiastically waved to the crowd, Chulwoo glared at me.

“You should wave too. There are no stars without fans. Don’t you know that?”

“Wave while you still can. You’ll spend the next three months staring at the ceiling of a medical clinic.”

“Let me ask you something. Why the fuck are you giving me shit?”

“You’re asking because you don’t know?”

I shrugged.

“Did you get rejected before you could even confess?”

“Who got rejected!”

Chulwoo shouted, his face flushed.

“If you hadn’t interfered, we’d already be living happily with three children!”

“…Isn’t that a little too fast?”

There were limits to how much you could speed things up. They hadn’t even known each other for half a shichen.[1027] How were they supposed to get married and have three children already?

What is he, a Command Center?[1028] He’ll hit a population of two hundred in no time.

As Cheongpung had said, even if a goose brought them by rocket delivery,[1029] it would take half a day. And since there were three children, they’d have to come as a bundle.

“It’s fine to spread your imagination’s wings, but leave me out of it. I don’t have anything to do with this Young Lady, so this is unfair.”

“Nonsense! I saw the way she looked at you!”

“The way she looked at me? What kind of look was it?”

“It was… It was… Urgh.”

Unable to continue, Chulwoo groaned and widened his eyes.

“I promise you this. You won’t be leaving here on your own two feet.”

“I’m a nice guy, so I’ll let you crawl out on all fours.”

“I’ll smash that insolent mouth of yours!”

With a roar, Chulwoo charged.

I swung my spear shaft at the punch flying toward me with a fierce aura.

Whoosh! Boom!

The violent impact sent me sliding backward. The force was unbelievable for a collision between flesh and steel.

At some point, a pair of dull-black gauntlets had appeared on his hands.

[1027] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

[1028] A Command Center is a base building in the strategy game StarCraft, where the population limit is 200.

[1029] Rocket Delivery is the name of a rapid-delivery service offered by the South Korean retailer Coupang.

“Those Items look pretty nice. Mind if I check them out?”

“You bastard!”

Whoosh!

He truly was a mad bull.

The only difference was that he had fists instead of horns—and those fists weren’t just swinging blindly.

“Hup!”

I held my breath and swung my spear. The paths of the gauntlets and spearhead intersected, spraying sparks.

Clang-clang-clang!

I pressured him with the spear’s advantage in reach, while Chulwoo pressured me with his natural reflexes and strength.

Whoosh!

A steel-hard leg whipped toward my waist.

He was astonishingly fast and flexible for his size. I retreated and thrust my spear toward his neck.

Bang! Krrrck!

His toes cut through empty air, while his gauntlet blocked the spearhead. Chulwoo seized the blade and grinned.

“Got you.”

Krrrck!

At the same moment, an immense force yanked the spear toward him. He had probably been aiming for this from the start.

A spearman without his spear was no better than a scarecrow with its eyes open.

Of course…

I expected this much.

I released my grip and charged at Chulwoo. The triumph on his face turned to shock.

Unable to overcome the force of his own pull, both of his hands shot overhead with the spear still clutched between them.

“You…!”

“Give me back my spear.”

Crack!

“Guh!”

Something broke. Chulwoo staggered after taking my knee to the face.

Next came his solar plexus.

Thud!

“Ghn!”

Struck in a vital spot, he dropped the spear and stumbled backward. In the meantime, I calmly retrieved it.

"You bastard!"

Chulwoo finally overcame the pain and straightened up. The moment I saw him, a quiet laugh escaped me.

"Y-You're laughing?"

"Your nose is bleeding."

"You're really dead—what? A nosebleed?"

He hurriedly wiped the bridge of his nose with the back of his hand, and his face twisted in outrage.

"How dare you injure my face?"

"It's fine. You're so ugly, no one will notice."

"That makes it worse! Won't I become even uglier now?"

"…"

What the hell was with this guy? He was surprisingly self-aware.

"Gaaaaah!"

Chulwoo let out a furious roar, his eyes flashing.

"For my Senior Brother's sake, I was going to end this without going too far… But not anymore."

"Do it properly. That's why I came out here."

"Fine. I'll fight you seriously."

As if to prove his words, a faint light shimmered around Chulwoo's gauntlets.

"Fist Energy?"

It was still incomplete, but it was unmistakably Fist Energy. A vicious smile spread across his lips.

"It's too late for regrets."

Whoosh! Slice!

Sparks flew as the spearhead was cleanly severed. Chulwoo drew upon every bit of internal energy in his body, and his fists blurred.

Swish! Swish-swish-swish!

A razor-sharp gale raged around me. Each time I swung my spear against the wind raised by his fists, another handspan[1030] was sliced away.

Though incomplete, the cutting power of his materialized qi was tremendous.

Slice! Slice! Slice!

In less than a split second, the steel spear in my hands had been reduced to a sharpened metal rod the length of my forearm.

[1030] A handspan is the distance between the tips of an outstretched thumb and little finger. It varies by person but is roughly 20 cm (8 in).

“Damn. I thought I was finally getting used to it.”

At this point, it wasn’t a spear anymore. It was a short flute. A short flute.

Grumbling, I swung the steel flute through the air.

“Man, it suddenly got so light that I can’t adjust.”

Chulwoo must have found the sight amusing, because he burst into laughter.

“Ha-ha-ha! You pathetic bastard. What are you planning to do with that?”

“None of your business.”

“Are you admitting defeat already?”

“Admitting defeat, my ass. Who says I lost?”

“What gives you such confidence after losing even your weapon? If you think my Senior Brother or your brother will save you, you’re mistaken.”

I let out a quiet laugh.

“You’d better not regret this. If you ask for a draw now, I might consider it.”

“What? A draw?”

“Yeah. On the condition that you stop hitting on this Young Lady.”

“You lunatic.”

“Then negotiations are over.”

I strode toward him, casually swinging the steel flute that could no longer be called a spear.

“Come here. Let’s fight.”

A spearman was fearlessly approaching a master of fist-and-foot martial arts—and without even a proper weapon in his hands.

The crowd surrounding the Grand Training Ground began to murmur at the sight.

Chulwoo frowned as though he were looking at some bizarre creature.

“What the hell are you?”

“Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. You know that.”

“Are you acting cocky because you have some hidden move up your sleeve?”

“Who knows?”

“You aren’t planning to use some underhanded trick, are you?”

An underhanded trick.

In a way, I supposed it was something like that.

After all, it was a method permitted only to me—one no one else could see.

Open Status Window.

Only thirty paces remained between Chulwoo and me.

The System responded.

Ding.

The Gambler effect. And the seventy points I'd gained by breaking through the wall of the Peak realm.

I stepped forward without hesitation. Twenty paces away, I could see the bewilderment on Chulwoo's face.

"Lunatic."

"I hear that a lot."

Fifteen paces.

I muttered inwardly.

Assign twenty points to Strength.

Whoosh.

An invisible wind swept through me, carrying new strength into my body. My Strength, temporarily pushed past 300, churned like an active volcano.

Assign fifty points to Agility.

A second wind blew.

The very next step felt strange, as though the foot I'd just moved belonged to someone else.

Was I always this light?

It felt as though I'd stepped into an entirely new world.

I took a deep breath.

Chulwoo, not me, was the first to close the remaining ten paces.

"Damn it, I told you to surrender! Don't blame me for what happens now!"

Whoosh!

I knew this martial art. It was called Crouching Tiger Fist because it was said to subdue tigers.

Just as its ferocious opening strike was about to slam into my chest—

Whoosh.

A third wind blew.

It began at my toes and ended at my fingertips.

"Hey, Level 95."

Swish.

I jabbed the pointed steel flute into the back of Chulwoo's neck.

By then, I was already perched on his shoulder.

"Looks like I've gotten a lot stronger."

Chapter 190

Crash!

Baek Museong's body shot upward as though it had been bounced into the air.

The chair he had been sitting in moments ago clattered loudly across the ground, but he paid it no attention. Neither did anyone else present.

"What in the…"

"What happened?"

"W-What just happened?"

They had thought it was over. Jin Taekyung had displayed far greater skill than expected, but in the end, he had lost his weapon to Chulwoo's Fist Energy.

A spearman without a spear against a Peak fist fighter. The outcome was obvious.

No—it had seemed obvious.

Until a moment ago.

"How did that happen?"

"I…"

At Lee Seowol's question, Baek Museong's lips twitched. It was still difficult to believe, but for an instant, he had lost sight of Jin Taekyung's movements.

All he had seen was a pale blur.

I feel as though I've been bewitched by a ghost.

Something impossible had happened.

After remaining silent for a moment, Baek Museong opened his mouth. His voice came out tinged with embarrassment.

"I don't know."

Another wave of shock rippled through the crowd. Eunhyang, who had observed Baek Museong more closely than anyone else, widened her eyes.

"Big Brother—no, Senior Brother."

"It's true. Don't say a word."

He had entered Huashan at the age of five, become the Disciple of the Heavenly Sword True Person, and earned the reputation of being Huashan's greatest prodigy.

Though only thirty, his standing was already equal to that of the Elders, if not greater.

Huashan's greatest prodigy… Even a passing dog would laugh.

With a bitter smile, Baek Museong turned his head. A brightly smiling figure entered his view.

Ten years ago, a single meeting with Cheongpung had taught him the truth.

Baek Museong was not Huashan's greatest prodigy.

"Martial Uncle Cheongpung."

"Go ahead, Martial Nephew."

Cheongpung answered without turning his head. His eyes remained fixed on the Grand Training Ground, gleaming with interest.

"Please tell me. How did he move?"

Under everyone's expectant gaze, Cheongpung opened his mouth.

"He was fast."

Everyone promptly deflated. Fast? That was not the simple, obvious answer they had wanted.

Baek Museong spoke in an anxious voice.

"That isn't what I meant."

"I know. But that's all there is to it."

"…What do you mean?"

"My Benefactor has learned only one footwork technique and one spear technique. They're rough but practical martial arts. Neither could be called a divine art."

Cheongpung smiled brightly.

"He was simply fast. Much faster than Martial Nephew Chulwoo."

Baek Museong was left speechless.

Jin Taekyung had learned no supreme martial art and possessed no peerless internal energy. To Baek Museong, he had been nothing more than a young prodigy from a frontier martial family with exceptional martial talent.

How can such a thing be possible?

The human body had limits. Murim martial artists were special because martial arts and internal energy allowed them to surpass those limits.

Yet Cheongpung was saying that Jin Taekyung had surpassed those limits without any particularly extraordinary martial arts.

Baek Museong blurted out a vehement denial.

"Impossible."

Cheongpung shook his head.

"It's possible for my Benefactor."

"…!"

"He read the pattern of Crouching Tiger Fist and counterattacked after only two days. If Martial Nephew Chulwoo had known that, he would have tried something else."

"Crouching Tiger Fist—in two days?"

Crouching Tiger Fist was unquestionably an advanced martial art. True to its name, it was fierce enough to subdue a tiger, and its forms were exceptionally intricate.

Even Huashan Disciples whose talent had already been recognized needed a full year merely to learn its structure and forms.

Yet Jin Taekyung had done it in only two days.

My second junior brother was bound to lose.

Baek Museong's eyelids trembled faintly.

He thought he finally understood why the young Martial Uncle before him wished to remain at Jin Taekyung's side.

There was another monster.

Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi.

He was exactly what the name implied. Though he remained hidden in the shadows of the frontier for now, it would not be long before he spread his wings and soared into the open sky.

I was far too arrogant.

Baek Museong clenched his fists. His nails dug into his skin, but the shame hurt more than the pain.

Had he become drunk on the name of Huashan?

Before the duel had even begun, he had already decided who would win and who would lose.

I'm always telling my junior disciples to be humble, yet I failed to practice it myself.

It had been a day that gave him much to reflect upon.

Baek Museong let out a quiet sigh and offered Jin Wikyung a clasped-fist salute.

"Great Hero Jin, I apologize for my earlier rudeness."

"Ah, no."

Jin Wikyung's expression was stiff as he accepted the apology.

As far as Baek Museong knew, Jin Wikyung treasured his two younger brothers like precious jewels. Baek Museong had belittled Jin Taekyung right in front of him, so naturally he would be angry.

Baek Museong continued politely.

"My Junior Brother and I have both learned a great deal. The winner appears to have been decided, so I believe we may end the duel here."

"That would be best."

Jin Wikyung nodded gravely and rose from his seat.

A murmur too quiet for anyone to hear slipped between his lips.

"…Wow. He actually did it."

Jin Wikyung had never expected him to really win.

The Grand Training Ground was as quiet as though everyone had been drenched in cold water. The commoners and martial artists alike wore expressions as if they had seen a ghost.

Though I couldn't see his face, Chulwoo was probably wearing a similar expression. The guy who had been frozen like a statue asked in a trembling voice,

"H-How?"

"By being good."

"C-Could that have been Shifting Form and Position?"

"Your hyung's[1031] pretty fast, you know. Surprised?"

"You dodged Crouching Tiger Fist that easily…"

"You were much slower than your Martial Uncle. You'd better train hard when you get back."

It was true. Compared to Cheongpung's Crouching Tiger Fist, Chulwoo's was far slower, and his movements were much broader.

I could see the entire pattern. There was no reason I couldn't evade it—especially with an Agility stat that had broken through 300.

"Destructive power only matters if your movements are fast and precise enough to hit your opponent. Got it?"

"…How dare you lecture me?"

"How dare I? Lecture you? You still haven't figured out what's going on?"

I snorted quietly and poked the back of Chulwoo's neck with the steel flute.

Its sharp edge dug into his skin, and his massive body shuddered. Oh, this was fun.

"Rest easy! Huashan's Serial Confession Man has been dealt with by the Taiyuan Jin Family's Steel Flute Murderer!"

"You bastard!"

"Ah-ah, don't move. I'd rather not draw blood."

"You're dead the moment you come down."

"Maybe. But the duel seems to be over, so try again next time."

Just then, I spotted Jin Wikyung rising from his seat.

Chulwoo would never surrender of his own accord, so it seemed Jin Wikyung intended to end the duel here.

His voice, reinforced with internal energy, rang throughout the Grand Training Ground.

"You both fought well!"

"Waaaaah!"

The crowd finally came to its senses and answered with a deafening cheer.

[1031] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male acquaintance. Taekyung uses it to refer to himself when addressing Chulwoo.

They had witnessed a duel between Peak masters with their own eyes—something difficult to see even if you were willing to pay for it. Their reaction was understandable.

"All right, that's enough. Good work."

The Quest had been much easier than expected.

The moment I pulled the steel flute away from Chulwoo's neck with a cheerful smile—

Grab!

A hand as large as a pot lid clamped around my wrist.

"Huh?"

"It isn't over yet!"

For a moment, I had forgotten what kind of man Chulwoo was.

A man blinded by love. A man who had spent twenty-five years dead inside until his heart finally began to beat. A man who could neither live nor die without Lee Seowol's permission…

In short, a madman. "Fucking bastard" was a close synonym.

There's no way a guy like that would give up so easily.

Whatever else could be said about him, he had been born with one extraordinary gift: divine strength. Even Cheongpung had to concede that much to him.

Chulwoo spoke with absolute confidence.

"Once I get my hands on someone, it's over."

Sure, I'd let my guard down, but weren't this bastard's manners absolute shit?

Ah, a man blinded by love.

I let out a heavy sigh.

"Chul-thetic, Pawoo."[1032]

"Are those your last words?"

"No. Words of wisdom."

"You spout nonsense whenever you get the chance. Give up on Young Lady Lee, and I'll let you off here."

"Did I ever tell you?"

"What?"

"Young Lady Lee proposed to me."

"You goddamn soooooon of a—!"

A scream erupted from the crowd.

Veins bulged across Chulwoo's entire body as he tried to slam me into the ground with tremendous force.

Tried to.

[1032] Taekyung mangles "Pathetic, Chulwoo" by swapping the opening sounds.

“What are you doing?”

“Hnnnnngh!”

His flushed face turned pale, then purple.

An immense force dragged at my wrist, but I didn’t budge an inch.

“Oh, you’re pretty strong.”

Between the temporary boost from the Gambler Title and the points I had just allocated, the strength now coursing through my body far surpassed human limits.

Not even Chulwoo, with his enormous frame and innate divine strength, could overpower me.

“At this level, your Strength stat must be well over 200.”

“W-What is this?”

“Bastard.”

My grinning face was reflected in his horrified eyes.

“Your hyung’s[1033] Strength alone is over 300. I was stronger than you even before I allocated those points.”

Fist Energy? It meant nothing if it couldn’t hit me. Strength, speed—I surpassed him in every respect. Even if we had kept fighting as we were, I would have won in the end.

Even so, there was a simple reason I had bothered allocating the points.

“Guys like you need a proper beating, or you’ll just start acting up again.”

“You son of a—!”

Thwack!

My fist shot out like lightning and struck him squarely in the temple. The muscular giant staggered, then collapsed limply.

Boom!

At the same moment, the sound I had been waiting for rang out.

Ding.

“Buuurp. Thanks for the meal.”

[1033] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male acquaintance. Taekyung uses it to refer to himself when addressing Chulwoo.

After a brief silence, thunderous cheers engulfed the Grand Training Ground.

At the main gate of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, some six hundred meters[1034] from the Grand Training Ground, a low-ranking martial artist who had been listening with perked ears to the resounding cheers made a fuss.

“Did you hear that?”

Someone leaning crookedly against the gate answered.

“I did.”

“They say the Third Young Master defeated the Defeated Flower Fist!”

“Yeah.”

“…Why are you reacting like that? We’re talking about the Defeated Flower Fist, one of Huashan’s Three Plum Blossom Elites!”

“I know, you idiot.”

“The Third Young Master defeated the Defeated Flower Fist! Captain, aren’t you surprised?”

“No. It doesn’t surprise me anymore.”

Hyuk Mujin, Captain of the Gatekeepers of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, yawned widely and continued.

“I’ve followed that fellow around and seen all kinds of things. Defeating the Defeated Flower Fist is the least he’d have to do before I could call him my lord.”

“Gasp! You’ve already thrown your lot in with him?”

“What do you mean, thrown my lot in?”

Hyuk Mujin snorted.

“One day, my lord said to me, ‘Listen, Martial Artist Hyuk. Become my right hand. Without you…‘”

The low-ranking martial artist cut in with a dubious look.

“Wait a second. Are we talking about the Third Young Master? That doesn’t sound like him at all.”

“Did you just interrupt me?”

“Captain, that’s not what I meant.”

“Why, you little—are you close to him? Do you know him better than I do?”

“No.”

“Listen here, kid. I’ve crossed the boundary between life and death with him! I’ve eaten with him! We’ve done everything together!”

“…Yes. Please continue.”

“You should’ve said that from the start. Anyway, back then, my lord…”

[1034] Six hundred meters is about 0.37 mi.

Hyuk Mujin had just calmed down and was about to continue when a voice interrupted him.

“This is excessively noisy for a gathering.”

“What would the likes of them know? It seems they were in such high spirits that they let every Tom, Dick, and Harry inside.”

“Tsk, tsk.”

The voices drifted from beyond the faint darkness that had settled over the area.

Hyuk Mujin clicked his tongue and asked the low-ranking martial artist,

“Weren’t all the distinguished guests on the list already here?”

“Well, everyone who said they would visit today has arrived, at least.”

“Then who’s this? Someone who heard the rumors and came over?”

“Wouldn’t that be likely?”

“First, double-check the list and stay here.”

“Yes, sir.”

Grumbling inwardly, Hyuk Mujin straightened from where he had been leaning against the gate.

Then he shouted toward the four silhouettes drawing closer.

“Halt! I am Hyuk Mujin, Captain of the Gatekeepers of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. State your identity and purpose!”

An elderly voice answered.

“Roaring Fury Swordsman.”

“Roaring Fury Swordsman, is it? What sect?”

“Zhongnan Sect.”

“Zhongnan Sect, then. I need to check the others’ faces as well, so come closer… Oh.”

Hyuk Mujin froze midway through scrawling Zhongnan Sect on the wooden tablet.

He slowly raised his head and saw a gaunt old man accompanied by three middle-aged martial artists with arrogant expressions.

“Z-Zhongnan Sect?”

The old man at the front stared at Hyuk Mujin with blazing eyes.

“Jin Taekyung and Cheongpung. Take me to those two bastards at once.”

Chapter 191

As the unconscious Chulwoo was carried away, Jin Wikyung stepped forward.

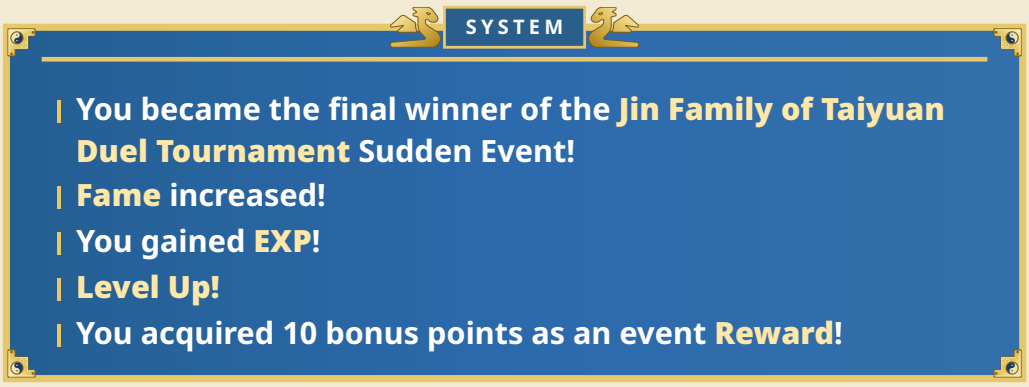
“Does anyone else wish to challenge him?”

I had literally wiped the floor with Chulwoo, who had been so overwhelmingly strong. There was no chance anyone else would step up.

When no one came forward, Jin Wikyung shouted with an expression of pure delight,

“Then the final winner of this duel tournament is the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung!”

Ding.



With that unexpected alert, the Grand Training Ground erupted into absolute madness.

“Waaaaah!”

“Long live the Jin Family of Taiyuan! Long live the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi!”

“The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi defeated the Defeated Flower Fist!”

“Kiyah-hoo!”

Who was that? Now there was a man who knew how to party.

In any case, the atmosphere in the Grand Training Ground grew hotter than anything a rock festival could offer.

A child hurled his candied fruit into the air, while a white-haired old man let out a wild cry and snapped his cane over his knee.

“Waaaaah!”

“Hiyah!”

The martial artists were even worse.

Shanxi Murim had long been treated as a backwater. I had merely defeated one Serial Confession Man, but to them, it was as good as winning a battle of pride against Shaanxi Murim.

“Lady of the House! Bring me a bottle of strong liquor!”

"That dumpling I ate twenty years ago finally went down! Order whatever you want! Everything's on me today!"

Don't call the Lady of the House. And don't order everything.

It was all coming out of the Jin Family of Taiyuan's pockets anyway, but the people drunk on Shanxi pride had completely lost their minds.

They're going wild.

Since a large portion of them were martial artists, carrying weapons was standard. I was worried that someone might get drunk on the excitement and cause trouble.

Sure enough, some lunatic suddenly shouted,

"Everyone, draw your swords!"

Clang-clang-clang!

Hundreds of weapons were drawn in a flash of reflected light.

"Wave them in order, starting from the front!"

"Waaaaah!"

Clang-clang-clang! Clang-clang-clang!

Wait, were they doing the wave here?

As I watched this cutting-edge new cheering culture unfold, I muttered in disbelief,

"This is a complete…"

"Shitshow."

I had started the sentence, but I hadn't said the second half.

An elderly voice pierced my ears with perfect clarity. I looked around, but all I could see were excited people.

Who was that?

Even amid the cacophony, the voice had sounded as though its owner were standing right beside me. Whoever he was, he was a master—and one with profound internal energy at that.

Just as several of us turned to search for the speaker—

"Ha!"

Gooooong.

Was this what the lion's roar I had read about in martial arts novels sounded like?

The ground rumbled and the air trembled. The more fainthearted commoners passed out or collapsed screaming.

"Eeeeeek!"

"Gah!"

The festive Grand Training Ground descended into chaos in an instant.

The commoners trembled, and the martial artists stood frozen. Through the crowd, scattered as though a bomb had gone off, an old man strolled leisurely into view.

"Much better."

He was tall and gaunt. His sharp gaze swept across the gathering before meeting mine.

I was standing in the middle of the duel platform, and a young man who remained perfectly fine while staring back at him was bound to stand out.

The old man looked me up and down, then spoke.

"Is it you?"

"Excuse me?"

"Cheongpung or Jin Taekyung. Which one are you?"

What the hell was going on?

Countless thoughts flashed through my mind. I made my decision in that brief instant.

"Neither."

"You're not?"

"No. You must have mistaken me for someone else."

Whatever was going on, I might as well deny everything and see what happened.

One glance told me enough. I didn't know who he was or where he had come from, but he certainly didn't seem to have any warm feelings toward me.

"Is that so?"

"I've never heard either name in my life."

The old man beckoned behind him.

"Come here."

"Yes, Elder."

Four people who had been obscured by the crowd emerged. As it happened, I had met every one of them before.

One face in particular was impossible to mistake.

Hyuk Mujin?

Wasn't he supposed to be standing guard? What was he doing over there?

Pale as a sheet, Hyuk Mujin came forward as though the three middle-aged men beside him were dragging him along. Their faces were familiar too.

What were their epithets again?

Oh, right. The Three Hands of Zhongnan.

Just as I finally remembered the extras' collective epithet, the unidentified old man spoke to the four of them.

"Find them."

Hyuk Mujin and Gong Ilhyuk, the middle-aged man with a splint on his arm, pointed at me simultaneously.

“Captain! Please save me!”

“That’s him! He’s Jin Taekyung!”

“…”

“…”

Well, I was caught.

After a brief silence, the old man asked me,

“Are you really Jin Taekyung?”

I bowed as politely as I could.

“Nice to meet you. My name is Jin Taekyung.”

“…What kind of lunatic is this?”

As the old man stared at me in disbelief, three people landed lightly with a rush of wind.

Jin Wikyung, Baek Museong, and Cheongpung.

“I am Jin Wikyung, Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. May I ask this Senior’s name?”

“Ahem. You’re the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?”

The question had been directed at the old man, but Gong Ilhyuk was the one who stepped forward.

Jin Wikyung frowned at the interruption.

“That is correct. And who might you be?”

“I am Gong Ilhyuk, one of the Three Hands of Zhongnan. I am a second-generation Disciple of the Great Zhongnan Sect, and Great Hero Gong Iljung, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord and Sect Leader, is my father’s cousin.”

He was still going on about his father’s cousin.

It made me want to slap him across the mouth with the hind leg of a boiled chicken.

Upon learning Gong Ilhyuk’s identity, Jin Wikyung muttered almost as if groaning.

“The Zhongnan Sect?”

Gong Ilhyuk was a well-connected hack who threw his weight around, but the name of the Zhongnan Sect was another matter.

The Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families were the towering powers that moved the present-day Murim.

Emboldened by the momentum, Gong Ilhyuk continued smugly,

“And this gentleman is Great Hero Song Il, an Elder of our sect.”

That old man is an Elder of the Zhongnan Sect?

I had expected him to be a master, but it seemed his status was even more impressive than I had imagined. Jin Wikyung and Baek Museong's expressions hardened.

"The Roaring Fury Swordsman…!"

"This junior of Murim, Baek Museong, pays his respects to Senior Song."

The old man—the Roaring Fury Swordsman—silently looked down at the two of them as they hurriedly paid their respects.

His voice carried the composure and arrogance of a powerful man.

"Baek Museong? Are you Huashan's Lone Crane?"

"Yes. It is an epithet far too generous for me."

"So it seems. You're inferior to your Master in his youth."

What an insufferable old bastard.

Still, I had to admit his clout was extraordinary.

Not only had the Roaring Fury Swordsman casually belittled Baek Museong, who was practically an object of admiration, in front of everyone, but he had also spoken of Huashan's Sect Leader, the Heavenly Sword True Person, as though he were some old neighborhood friend.

His seniority in Murim seemed every bit as formidable as his martial arts.

"I will continue striving."

"Hm. You certainly know how to make yourself sound good. But if the Heavenly Sword True Person sent you…"

As he watched Baek Museong bow his head without another word, the Roaring Fury Swordsman's eyes flashed.

His gaze had shifted to Cheongpung, who stood there looking blank.

"So it's you. The Sword Saint's heir."

Cheongpung asked with a puzzled expression,

"You know my grandfather?"

"Of course. How could I possibly not know him?"

Judging by the old man's expression, theirs probably hadn't been a pleasant relationship.

As the situation grew more serious, Jin Wikyung asked with a stiff face,

"May I ask what brings you here?"

"I came to collect a debt."

"A debt?"

"Yes. A debt owed for daring to mock the Great Zhongnan Sect and injure one of our Disciples."

His blade-sharp gaze shot toward Cheongpung and me.

Gong Ilhyuk stepped forward, waving his splinted arm.

“Do you see this? I suffered this injury at Prince Shangshan’s residence, where I had gone by invitation. A physician examined it and said I would need at least six months to recover.”

Cheongpung spoke with an apologetic expression.

“I hit you gently… Did it hurt that much?”

Cruel bastard. He was killing Gong Ilhyuk twice over.

Gong Ilhyuk’s face flushed red at the public humiliation.

“You bastard! You ambushed me, yet you still have the nerve to say that!”

I muttered in disbelief,

“Ambushed, my ass. You grabbed him by the collar first and got your ass handed to you.”

“Shut your mouth! When I think of how you two mocked our sect and what you did to me, I wouldn’t be satisfied even if I chewed you up and swallowed you!”

That was how a fight between children turned into a fight between adults.

Jin Wikyung and Baek Museong’s faces twisted sharply.

“Chew him up and swallow him? Did you just say that to our youngest?”

“How dare you call him a bastard! Great Hero Gong, watch your words! Though our sects may differ, there is still such a thing as seniority in Murim. How could you…”

“Heh heh heh.”

At the Roaring Fury Swordsman’s grating laughter, Jin Wikyung and Baek Museong fell silent.

“Seniority, you say. You chose your words well.”

“…”

“…”

“This old man is the Senior Brother of our sect’s Sect Leader, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord. I am of the same seniority as the Heavenly Sword True Person of Huashan, so there should be no problem.”

Bringing up seniority had been a mistake.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman’s martial arts were formidable enough, and now he was crushing them beneath the sheer weight of his seniority. Neither Jin Wikyung nor Baek Museong could contend with him. Not even Cheongpung, the Sword Saint’s Disciple, could.

“Am I wrong?”

When no one answered, the Roaring Fury Swordsman turned to Cheongpung.

“You injured a Disciple of the Zhongnan Sect. Are you prepared to face the consequences?”

This was why words were so frightening.

There was no explanation of how it had happened. Only the result remained.

Baek Museong hurriedly interjected.

“Senior, we must first establish the rights and wrongs of this matter.”

Cheongpung shrank in on himself and muttered,

“I only gave him a gentle tap.”

“Are you saying you didn’t do it?”

“That’s not what I mean. I did hit him, but I didn’t know he would be hurt that badly.”

Gong Ilhyuk seized the opening and lunged in.

“It was an obvious attempt to kill!”

“Did you hear that?”

“It really wasn’t.”

As Cheongpung fumbled for words, the Roaring Fury Swordsman continued in a cutting voice.

“I will formally lodge a complaint with Huashan over this matter, so don’t you dare think you can wriggle out of it.”

“Elder, the government and Murim do not interfere in each other’s affairs. Furthermore, the officials present at the time were favorably disposed toward them. I fear they may give false testimony.”

“You are right. I will take measures.”

It was all rigged from the start.

Baek Museong bit down hard on his lip at the unfair treatment, and the next target of their arrows was obvious.

“The Jin Family of Taiyuan will seal its gates until our sect sends someone.”

“…What did you just say?”

Jin Wikyung said what I wanted to say for me. No—everyone nearby who had heard the Roaring Fury Swordsman must have been thinking the same thing.

Seal our gates?

What kind of bullshit was that?

It was true that I had humiliated Gong Ilhyuk a little.

But that had been directed solely at Gong Ilhyuk. I could swear that I had never said anything to mock or insult the Zhongnan Sect.

And they wanted the Jin Family to seal its gates over that?

Even with the condition that it would last only until the Zhongnan Sect sent someone, the order itself was already a humiliation.

“That is unjust!”

At Jin Wikyung’s shout, the Roaring Fury Swordsman raised his eyes.

“What did you say?”

“How can you order us to seal our gates before even investigating what happened and determining who was at fault? Is this the way of the Nine Sects and One Gang —or rather, the way of the Zhongnan Sect?”

“How dare you!”

“Our family will not accept this!”

“If you refuse to accept it?”

Ssssss.

A tremendous aura rose from the Roaring Fury Swordsman’s entire body like wildfire.

It felt as though a sword were pointed directly between my brows. My skin prickled.

“If you refuse, what will you do?”

“…!”

“This is Murim. Have you forgotten?”

A surge of irritation suddenly welled up inside me.

I already knew how the world worked. I had experienced it more times than I cared to remember.

People ignored you because you had no money, looked down on you because you lacked powerful backing, and scorned you because your talent was insignificant.

It’s the same here.

Murim and the modern world were different, yet so much alike.

Those with power turned lies into truth and truth into lies.

They pressured the weak and crushed them underfoot. To people like that, it was all natural. All inevitable.

Just like the Roaring Fury Swordsman standing before me.

Drip. Drip.

Blood trickled from the fist I had clenched without realizing it.

I stared down at the drops landing one by one on the ground and exhaled a hot breath.

“Ah, fuck. This is fucking bullshit.”

No one had dared to speak, so everyone heard the profanity that burst from my mouth.

It felt as though something invisible had shattered with a sharp crack.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman asked with an expression of disbelief,

“…What did you just say?”

Swearing had been a mistake. Since I was the reason this had happened, I should have swallowed it no matter what.

That was the best way to resolve the situation smoothly.

But…

“It’s fucking bullshit. I said it’s fucking bullshit. You fucking assholes. There’s a limit to how much you can throw your weight around.”

I couldn’t take it anymore.

They could call me thoughtless or a young fool who knew nothing about the world.

I had no desire to replay all the things I had been sick of experiencing in reality here in Murim.

I apologized to Jin Wikyung.

“I’m sorry. I know I’m supposed to put up with it even when it’s fucking bullshit, but they were being so fucking shitty about it that it felt twice as fucking shitty, and I couldn’t let it slide.”

Jin Wikyung, who looked half dazed, went through an astonishing range of expressions.

His face twisted, then relaxed. After showing several different expressions in a short span of time, he finally let out a quiet laugh.

“Honestly, I thought it was fucking bullshit too.”

Those words pulled the trigger.

Flames hotter than lava poured from the Roaring Fury Swordsman’s eyes.

“You bastards… must be desperate to die.”

Shing.

As he spat the words through clenched teeth, he drew his sword. Layer upon layer of Sword Energy enveloped the snow-white blade.

It burned more fiercely than any Sword Energy I had ever seen.

The instant it pointed at me—

“If you kill that guy, you die too.”

At the clear, ringing voice that came from somewhere, the Roaring Fury Swordsman’s body abruptly froze.

Chapter 192

“Ah, fuck. This is fucking bullshit, seriously.”

…What?

Song Il thought he was dreaming.

Who was he? He was Song Il, the Roaring Fury Swordsman. Even now that his junior brother, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, had become Sect Leader, he still treated Song Il with the utmost courtesy and respect.

And yet—what the fuck? Fucking bullshit?

Did I hear that wrong?

The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung. The youngest son of the tiny Jin Family of Taiyuan.

A brat who had only just turned twenty with the new year.

He couldn’t believe that such a brat had said those words to him—a Great Zhongnan Sect Elder and one of the heroes of the Great Faction War.

No. He couldn’t accept it.

“What did you just say?”

Any hope that he had misheard was crushed the next moment by Jin Taekyung’s reply.

“It’s fucking bullshit. I said it’s fucking bullshit! You fucking assholes! There’s a limit to how much you can throw your weight around.”

“…”

After cursing up a storm, Jin Taekyung turned to Jin Wikyung.

“I’m sorry. I know I’m supposed to put up with it even when it’s fucking bullshit, but they were being so fucking shitty about it that it felt twice as fucking shitty, and I couldn’t let it slide.”

“Honestly, I thought it was fucking bullshit too.”

Those words from Jin Wikyung were the finishing touch.

The disbelief in Song Il’s eyes slowly gave way to light. A blazing light.

It was an immense fury he hadn’t felt in a very long time.

“You bastards…”

Hot breath escaped between Song Il’s teeth as he lost all reason.

“You must be desperate to die.”

Shing.

His treasured sword, which had cut down countless enemies, emerged from its scabbard. It didn’t matter whether the Jin Family of Taiyuan belonged to the orthodox faction, the unorthodox faction, or even practiced demonic, heterodox arts.

If Song Il had thought about the consequences before causing trouble, he never would have earned the title Roaring Fury Swordsman.

I'll kill every last one of you.

Song Il truly intended to kill them. As though to prove it, powerful Sword Energy surged like waves.

He had trained in the Zhongnan Sect's ultimate technique, the Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords, all his life.

Although he had not achieved Great Completion, it was more than enough to carve these insolent fools into chunks of meat with a single sword strike.

I'll kill you first.

He had already decided who would die first.

The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung. He would chew up that young brat's tongue and swallow it.

Just as Song Il was about to unleash his Sword Energy, his eyes bloodshot—

"If you kill that guy, you die too."

At the voice that came from somewhere, Song Il's body abruptly froze.

Not because of what the words meant. Because he couldn't determine where they had come from.

I can't tell? Me?

That was impossible.

But the voice that followed made it clear that this was real.

"A man your age, picking on a child like this. Tsk, tsk."

Front, back, above, below, left, right.

Song Il couldn't distinguish where the voice was coming from. Its owner was nowhere and everywhere at once.

Th-this is…

At last, Song Il realized the identity of the voice, and his body trembled.

Six-Harmonies Voice Transmission!

If Sound Transmission, the art of conveying sound through internal energy, was the exclusive province of Peak masters, Six-Harmonies Voice Transmission was a martial art permitted only to those who had reached the realm beyond it.

Supreme Peak. A great realm that only a tiny fraction of the chosen few could enter.

How could someone like that…

Why? Why was such a person interfering with him?

Song Il shouted as if having a fit.

"Who are you! I am Elder Song Il of the Great Zhongnan Sect, the Roaring Fury Swordsman! Show yourself at once!"

"'This old man'? 'Elder'? Hahahahahaha!"

Thunderous laughter rang out from every direction, backed by internal energy so vast that no one dared guess at its limits.

The commoners who had never learned martial arts fell flat on their faces, crying out to the Jade Emperor,[1035] while the martial artists trembled in awe.

“Can you not hear me!”

“Ha, hahaha! Ah, I’m laughing so hard my stomach’s going to split.”

“You insolent bastard!”

Having lost his composure to anger and fear, Song Il caught sight of Jin Taekyung.

Unlike the people staring around in shock, Jin Taekyung alone was gazing into the empty air. There was even an enigmatic smile on his lips.

Almost as though he were mocking Song Il.

That bastard!

Ssssss!

The Sword Energy that had faltered for a moment surged again. Pointing his sword at Jin Taekyung, Song Il looked around and shouted,

“Show yourself at once! Or I’ll kill this bastard!”

The laughter that had shaken heaven and earth abruptly stopped.

“What? Kill that guy?”

“I’ll count to three.”

A triumphant smile spread across Song Il’s lips.

He didn’t know where the voice’s owner was, but the troublemaker’s weakness was Jin Taekyung. The fluster in the other man’s voice was proof.

“One!”

“Heh, look at you. You’ve grown even more vicious since I last saw you.”

Since they last met?

Song Il’s mind raced. Judging by those words, they had clearly met before, but…

Wait. Could that voice be…

Song Il flinched as someone came to mind, but quickly gritted his teeth.

That was impossible. There was no way that old monster was still alive.

As though trying to shake off his fear, he shouted even louder.

“Two!”

“Phew. Fine, I understand. I’ll come out now, so wait right there! But if you touch even a single hair on him, I’ll make you pay!”

Song Il’s strength left him all at once.

His gamble had worked. The unidentified Supreme Peak master wanted Jin Taekyung alive. And he was farther away than Song Il had expected.

[1035] The Jade Emperor is the heavenly ruler in Daoist tradition.

"Fifty jang.[1036] Stay at least fifty jang away. If you come any closer, this bastard is as good as dead—"

At that exact moment—

"Three."

Song Il doubted his own eyes and ears.

Barely three jang[1037] away, Jin Taekyung calmly spoke again.

"I said three. You fucking old bastard. Are you deaf?"

"You bastard. Are you desperate to die?"

"Try killing me. If you can."

"…What?"

"You know what? If you can't kill me with one sword strike, you're next."

"…!"

"Let's see who dies."

Jin Taekyung smiled brightly and spread both arms.

"He's coming."

He was coming. Those two words sent a chill down Song Il's spine.

Song Il unconsciously took a step back.

Then—

Whoosh.

A faint rush of wind pierced his ears. A presence was rapidly closing in from behind at an unbelievable speed.

This is…

Every hair on Song Il's body stood on end. The instincts he had honed by crossing the threshold of death countless times whispered to him.

It's already too late. Fall back. Now.

But—

I am Song Il, the Roaring Fury Swordsman!

Sssshhhhh!

The Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords, which he had brought to nine-tenths mastery, erupted. His Sword Energy split into twenty-four streams and shot forward.

In the slowed world, Jin Taekyung's figure was reflected in Song Il's wide-open eyes.

Swish, swish, swish, swish, swish!

[1036] A Korean jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Fifty jang is about 151.5 m (497 ft); three jang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

[1037] A Korean jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Fifty jang is about 151.5 m (497 ft); three jang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

He narrowly evaded the twenty-four streams of Sword Energy as they closed in from every direction.

The only price he paid for evading the Roaring Fury Swordsman's strike was torn clothing and scattered drops of blood.

"This is impossible—!"

Song Il, still in shock, was given no chance to attack again.

Something firm and hot clamped around his wrist just as he tried to unleash the second form.

Clench!

"You fucking bastard… Didn't I tell you not to touch a single hair on him?"

A low voice. Two eyes blazing so fiercely that their red seemed to burn blue.

Only then did Song Il realize that he could no longer hear the wind.

And that he had touched someone he never should have touched.

"Y-you… How could you…"

"The Zhongnan brat has grown a lot. You can't even recognize an adult anymore."

The old monster who had inflicted an unforgettable humiliation upon him long ago had stepped out of his memories and now stood before him.

Song Il let out a shrill scream.

"Fire King—!"

A terrifying smile appeared on Jeok Cheongang's wrinkled lips.

"Yes. It's me."

On New Year's Day, the Fire King descended upon the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

The weight of that name pressed down upon the entire training ground.

One God, Three Saints, Ten Kings.

They were gods, stars, and kings who towered above the countless martial artists of Murim. Absolute beings who stood closest to the title of greatest under heaven.

Jeok Cheongang wore shabby clothes and had a slight frame, but his presence was that of a giant.

And the giant's eyes turned toward me.

"You crazy bastard. Are you desperate to die?"

I never thought that voice could sound so welcome. I sank to the ground on the spot.

"Whew. I almost died for real."

"You would have if this old man hadn't stepped in."

"Yes, thank you. I won't forget this kindness."

At my soulless reply, Jeok Cheongang glared at me.

“You lost your fear in half a day. Do you want to die?”

Only half a day?

Come to think of it, I had parted with Jeok Cheongang that very morning.

The first day of the new year had been so eventful that it felt as though a month had passed.

I answered in an exhausted voice.

“If you’re going to kill me, please put it off as long as possible.”

“That is the plan.”

Jeok Cheongang turned his head and added,

“First, I’ll deal with this insolent bastard.”

Insolent bastard?

How many people in the world could call the Senior Brother of the Zhongnan Sect’s Sect Leader—and an Elder at that—something like that?

“Ah, ah…”

Song Il, the Roaring Fury Swordsman, was trembling from head to toe.

Judging by the way Jeok Cheongang kept calling him a brat, they must have known each other in the past. Apparently, it hadn’t been a particularly warm relationship.

“It’s been a long time. So, did those broken bones heal properly?”

“H-how could you…”

“‘You’? Was that directed at me?”

The Fire King blinked as though he were looking at some fascinating creature, then let out a hollow laugh.

“You’ve grown a lot.”

Smack.

It was a sight money couldn’t buy.

Jeok Cheongang slapped the Roaring Fury Swordsman across the face with his wrinkled hand. His hand moved so slowly it seemed to take forever, yet the Roaring Fury Swordsman didn’t dare evade it even though he could see it coming.

“I remember when I first saw you. You were barely twenty, a young pup.”

Smack.

“You were arrogant and rude, causing all kinds of trouble while hiding behind your sect’s prestige. And now you’re an Elder of the Zhongnan Sect?”

Smack.

“Once, I saved you when you were about to die, and what you said afterward was truly something. Was it, ‘Why are you stealing someone else’s battle credit?‘”

Smack.

“If it hadn’t been for your Master’s request, I would have broken your neck instead of your leg.”

Smack, smack, smack!

The ordinary slaps carried not a trace of internal energy, yet the half-gray-haired Roaring Fury Swordsman shrank like a beaten child.

The ease and arrogance of a powerful man had vanished from his eyes, replaced by humiliation, fury, and fear.

Jeok Cheongang spat out the words with the expression of a man looking at a bug.

“You fucking moron. Did all those years go straight up your ass?”

What should I do?

I was starting to like the old man more and more.

Jin Wikyung and Hyuk Mujin were already gazing at Jeok Cheongang with love in their eyes.

“You call yourself an Elder of the Nine Sects and One Gang,[1038] yet you threaten commoners and use your power to arbitrarily order a sect to seal its gates? If your Master saw this, he would be wailing in the afterlife.”

“…”

“Who is the Sect Leader now?”

The Roaring Fury Swordsman answered in a stammering voice.

“M-my junior brother. The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord…”

“Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord? I’ve never heard that title in my life. Is that why a piece of trash like you struts around calling himself an Elder of the Zhongnan Sect?”

What audacity—to treat the Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect like some nobody.

As if having his sect insulted weren’t enough, the Roaring Fury Swordsman had suddenly been reduced to a piece of trash. His face twisted violently.

When he silently lowered his head to hide his humiliation and anger, Jeok Cheongang’s tiger-like eyes widened.

“Is your mouth just for decoration? Why aren’t you saying anything?”

“…Great Hero Jeok. I-I merely…”

“Shut your mouth!”

I made up my mind.

I was going to create a fan club.

At this very moment, the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was practically the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s idol.

Is this what it feels like to bathe in a hot spring filled with soda?

Even my white blood cells seemed to fizz with carbonation.

[1038] The Nine Sects and One Gang are a major grouping of martial-arts factions in Murim fiction.

It felt like chugging a can of beer so cold it had begun to ice over after finishing a raid on a sweltering summer day.

Wave after wave of exhilarating refreshment swept through my entire body.

Fire. King. Is. The. Best.

Of course, that was from the perspective of someone watching.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman had been publicly humiliated in front of countless commoners and martial artists alike. His body shook. Perhaps that was why the humiliation and anger he felt in that instant overcame his fear of the Fire King.

“T-this is a matter between our sect and the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“What?”

“I’m saying that this is not a matter for Great Hero Jeok to involve himself in.”

“This old man has no business involving himself?”

Jeok Cheongang studied the Roaring Fury Swordsman, who had forced out those words in a trembling voice.

His tightly clenched fist twitched as if he were deciding where to hit him so everyone would agree he had chosen the perfect spot.

Hit him! Please, just hit him once!

As though he had heard my encouragement, Jeok Cheongang raised his hand high.

Then, the next moment, his wrinkled finger pointed at me.

“Do you see that bastard?”

“…?”

What the hell? Why was I suddenly involved?

Just as confusion spread across every face, mine included, the Fire King continued.

“I entrusted the Fire Gate Clan’s sacred treasure to that boy.”

“…!”

“…!”

Silence descended upon the Grand Training Ground.

Wordless shock spread endlessly through the crowd.

Chapter 193

The Fire Gate Clan's sacred treasure.

The moment that unfamiliar phrase sprang from the Fire King's mouth, the Roaring Fury Swordsman's eyes bulged as though they were about to tear apart.

"W-what do you mean?"

"You're not even seventy, and your ears are already clogged? I'll say it one more time, so listen carefully."

Jeok Cheongang jerked his chin toward me, looking irritated.

"This old man entrusted our sect's sacred treasure to that brat. Got it?"

"…"

"…"

What do you mean, got it?

I looked around in bewilderment. Everyone, including Jin Wikyung and Baek Museong, was staring back and forth between Jeok Cheongang and me in shock.

Amid all this chaos, the only person unaffected spoke up.

"Benefactor, what's the Fire Gate Clan's sacred treasure? Show me too."

I couldn't answer Cheongpung's question.

I don't know either, you little shit.

The Fire Gate Clan's sacred treasure? What was he talking about?

I swore I had never heard or seen such an item.

The only things I had received from Jeok Cheongang were the martial arts manual for the Flame Divine Palm and a sword…

Wait.

"Could it be?"

Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue at my questioning look.

"You've been carrying it on your back this whole time and still didn't know? What a moron."

I felt as if someone had struck me in the back of the head with a hammer.

I hurriedly untied the knot holding it firmly in place. When I unwound the layers of cloth, an old, crude scabbard appeared.

The Unnamed Sword.

The very thing Jopil had stolen from his Master, only for me to take it from him.

I gripped the hilt and drew.

Shing!

With a sound that made every hair on my body stand on end, the pure-white blade slid free.

It shone in the surrounding darkness like some holy sword from legend, drawing gasps from the crowd.

So this really is… the Fire Gate Clan's sacred treasure?

Until now, I had never once questioned it.

Why Jopil had stolen it from Jeok Cheongang. Why, unlike the Flame Divine Palm or the Blazing Flame Divine Pill, it bore the strange description Unnamed Sword.

I was staring blankly at the blade when—

"T-this is impossible!"

It was the Roaring Fury Swordsman. Unlike him, overwhelmed by extreme confusion and excitement, Jeok Cheongang's expression was perfectly calm.

"What is?"

"T-that…"

"This old man entrusted the Fire Gate Clan's sacred treasure to that brat. Even with a head full of nothing but shit, surely you understand what that means."

That snapped me back to my senses.

I had been so absorbed in the sword that I had momentarily forgotten what it meant for a sect's sacred treasure to be entrusted to someone—especially the treasure of the Fire Gate Clan, whose lineage had been passed from one person to the next for hundreds of years.

At the same time, Cheongpung's words from barely half a day ago flashed through my mind.

Aren't you trying to take Benefactor as your Disciple?

At the time, I had dismissed it as ridiculous nonsense and laughed it off.

But now…

Fuck. I don't know either.

As I swallowed dryly, the Roaring Fury Swordsman pointed a finger at me.

Before he could speak, however, Jeok Cheongang's terrifying gaze locked him in place.

"This old man said he entrusted our sect's sacred treasure to him."

That was all.

But his opponent was none other than the Fire King.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman had no courage left to argue. He chewed on his lip, then suddenly glared at me.

"You bastard. You're lucky."

Why is this old man starting shit with me again?

Jeok Cheongang said nothing. Did he expect me to handle this much on my own?

I shrugged at the Roaring Fury Swordsman.

"You've got the wrong man. I'm actually really unlucky."

If I were fucking lucky, would I have met a piece of shit like you?

The situation had been a hair's breadth from exploding when Jeok Cheongang appeared, so I wasn't sure whether to call it great misfortune or great fortune.

"Anyway, it was nice meeting you. Have a safe trip home."

"You cunning bastard. Why don't you try what you did earlier?"

"What I did earlier? Oh, you mean when I said it was fucking bullshit?"

Before the Roaring Fury Swordsman could respond, I bowed my head.

"I apologize for that. I've never been able to tolerate injustice. Please forgive a slip of the tongue from a junior far beneath you. Great. Hero."

"…!"

The Roaring Fury Swordsman trembled. Blood dripped from his tightly clenched fists.

Looking at him, I saw myself from only a few minutes earlier. The difference between us was that I had refused to submit to the Roaring Fury Swordsman, while he had submitted to the Fire King.

Those who rely on power kneel before greater power. Realizing that fundamental truth of the world again was satisfying, but not entirely.

If anything, it left me bitter.

This leaves a bad taste in my mouth.

If Jeok Cheongang hadn't been here, the humiliation and fury that man now felt would have belonged to me and the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

If a few of the people here joined forces, defeating the Roaring Fury Swordsman himself wouldn't be difficult. But the Zhongnan Sect stood behind him.

I hated admitting it, but the gap between us and them was vast. For now, it was a gap we could never bridge.

For now.

I had been a perpetual F-rank Hunter, yet I had still made it this far. No one knew what the future held.

Maybe one day, the Jin Family of Taiyuan would stand shoulder to shoulder with the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families.

Okay, am I getting a little ahead of myself?

It was like the head of some rural township running for President.

I let out a quiet laugh at the thought, and the Roaring Fury Swordsman ground his teeth.

"How dare you laugh at me?"

"My face just naturally looks like it's smiling."

"Shut that mouth of yours!"

The instant his furious shout rang out, Jeok Cheongang's right foot shot forward like lightning and slammed into the Roaring Fury Swordsman's shin.

A Supreme Peak master's joint kick.

Thud!

"Guh!"

"You shut up. How dare a young bastard like you raise his voice in front of an elder?"

"What do you think you're doing?"

"Look at this bastard. I tried to end things nicely, and now you're begging for a beating?"

Wham!

"Urgh!"

Wow. That one really landed.

With an even duller impact than before, the Roaring Fury Swordsman clutched his shin and collapsed.

Even an Elder of the Great Zhongnan Sect is helpless against him.

The man was over sixty and held a lofty position, but his opponent was simply beyond comparison.

Age, martial arts, status—there was no catching up to the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, in any of them.

"Carrying on like that is a disease. You've done enough, so get the hell out of here."

"…Very well."

The Roaring Fury Swordsman glared resentfully at me as he rose, his body covered in dirt. Then Jeok Cheongang's cold voice followed.

"And I will let today's events pass, so you will never speak of this matter again. Do you understand?"

I really should start a fan club.

I had acted on impulse, but the truth was, I had been worried. If the Roaring Fury Swordsman later used the Zhongnan Sect to retaliate, the Jin Family of Taiyuan would have no way to stop him.

But with Jeok Cheongang mediating, things were different.

Though I'm not sure whether to call this mediation or a threat.

Resentment over what had happened today would remain, but at least he wouldn't be able to bring official pressure against us.

Even if he did, having the Fire King as a sturdy shield took a great deal of the pressure off.

"Why aren't you answering?"

The Roaring Fury Swordsman's face twisted horribly now that his little scheme had been seen through. Jeok Cheongang, of course, couldn't have cared less.

"Say it yourself. Right now."

"…Understood. I swear it on my name."

“What name do you have worth staking? Swear it in the name of the Zhongnan Sect.”

“Grrk… Understood.”

Only then did a satisfied smile appear on Jeok Cheongang’s lips. He chuckled and patted the Roaring Fury Swordsman on the shoulder.

“Where did a young bastard like you learn to grind his teeth like that? Maybe I should yank out every last one of them.”

“…”

“Hohoho! But this old man is getting on in years. I couldn’t possibly do such a thing in front of all these people. Hahahaha!”

I had never known that the laughter of a snow-white-haired old man could be so terrifying.

Not only the Roaring Fury Swordsman, but everyone listening flinched at once.

Jeok Cheongang, who had been laughing like a fiend, turned to me.

“You’re not blameless either. Whatever the circumstances, how could you hurl such abuse at an elder so far above you in age? Are you out of your mind?”

I immediately bowed my head. Whatever else had happened, that much was true, and I also thought it was time to settle matters with the Roaring Fury Swordsman, an Elder of the Zhongnan Sect.

“I’m sorry.”

“Even if he ate his age through his asshole, he’s over sixty. It wouldn’t be strange for him to have a grandchild your age.”

“…Ah. Yes.”

“No matter how much of a bastard he is, he’s still your elder and a great Senior of Murim. No matter how filthy and unfair it feels, you must show him the proper respect from now on.”

“Great Hero Song, I sincerely apologize.”

When I straightened from my deep bow, the Roaring Fury Swordsman’s face was flushed scarlet.

Even after receiving an apology, he probably didn’t feel as though he had gotten one.

Meanwhile, despite apologizing to someone I disliked, I felt refreshed, as though I had just circulated my qi.

Is this what comes with age?

Take a look at that verbal skill forged over a hundred years.

He wasn’t just a Supreme Peak master in martial arts. At this point, he could change his title from Fire King to Tongue King.

After completing every step of the settlement under his supervision, the Tongue King announced in a solemn voice,

"All right. Now all the uninvited guests can get the hell out. If you're hungry, have a bowl of rice before you go."

Now he was openly treating them like beggars.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman trembled with humiliation. It was a long while before he finally spoke.

"…Then we will take our leave."

"I won't see you out."

"Let's go!"

As though he had been waiting for those words, the Roaring Fury Swordsman spun around. Gong Ilhyuk and the other two members of the Three Hands of Zhongnan, their faces twisted into ugly grimaces, followed him.

Scorching gazes pursued the backs of the four men. Just before stepping through the main gate, the Roaring Fury Swordsman suddenly turned his head and stared at me.

A thread of Sound Transmission filled with killing intent reached my ears.

— I don't know what connection you have to that old man… but as long as I'm alive, I will definitely punish you and the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

It all happened in the briefest of instants.

The Fire King watched the Roaring Fury Swordsman's back melt into the darkness, his expression unreadable. Then he tossed out a single remark.

"I'll step out for a while."

"Yes? Where are you going?"

"At my age, do I need to report every time I go relieve myself?"

With that gruff reply, he disappeared with a bowlegged gait.

Once he was a good distance from the Jin Family of Taiyuan, the Roaring Fury Swordsman suddenly drew his sword and swung.

Whoooosh! Boom!

Dozens of streams of Sword Energy sliced through trees and shattered rocks. After venting his fury for quite some time, he finally turned it on the Three Hands of Zhongnan, Gong Ilhyuk included.

"You damned idiots…"

"E-Elder."

"Do you know what kind of humiliation this old man suffered because of you?"

"I-I'm sorry. Please forgive your foolish Disciples."

The Three Hands of Zhongnan froze.

Gong Ilhyuk was the most terrified of them all. If he hadn't incited the Roaring Fury Swordsman to come to the Jin Family of Taiyuan, none of this would have happened.

"E-Elder, please calm down and hear me out."

"I turned a blind eye a few times because you're related by marriage to my Junior Brother, the Sect Leader, and now it seems you've forgotten your place."

Clench!

The Roaring Fury Swordsman's gaunt hand closed around Gong Ilhyuk's throat.

"Guh… I-I'm the Sect Leader's…"

"Do you think my Junior Brother, the Sect Leader, would so much as blink if this old man punished the likes of you? You worthless piece of trash."

Gong Ilhyuk's face went deathly pale.

Then—

Thump. Thump. Thud.

His body went limp, his head lolling to one side. The other two members of the Three Hands, who had been frozen with fear, also crumpled helplessly to the ground.

"W-why did these bastards suddenly…"

The Roaring Fury Swordsman, briefly confused, turned his head. He stared intently into the darkness before speaking.

"Do you still have business here?"

"Why else would I have come looking for you?"

Along with that calm voice, a small old man emerged.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

He clicked his tongue as he looked at the fallen Three Hands of Zhongnan.

"Tsk, tsk. Seems I ended up saving those bastards without meaning to. Maybe I should have come a little later."

"Why have you come back?"

"It's been so long. It seemed a shame to let you go just like that."

The Fire King smiled faintly and added,

"There was also something I forgot."

"Something you forgot? What do you mean…"

At that moment, Jeok Cheongang's figure vanished like a phantom.

At the same time, Sword Energy erupted from the Roaring Fury Swordsman's waist.

Sh-sh-sh-sh-shk!

A dense net of Sword Energy spread across a three-jang[1039] radius, slicing through bone and flesh the instant it touched them.

But the big fish had already swum against the current and escaped the net.

“I told you earlier. Don’t touch so much as a hair on that boy’s head.”

Crack!

The sword hilt dropped from the Roaring Fury Swordsman’s hand. His wrist broken, he screamed and drove his knee upward.

“Gyaaah! You fucking old bastard!”

“When will you finally become a proper human being?”

At the same instant, a palm shrouded in pure-white flame pressed against the Roaring Fury Swordsman’s chest.

Boom!

“Guh…!”

An unavoidable palm strike.

His Body-Protecting Qi shattered, and his flesh and bones began to cook. Blood burst from his mouth as he fell to his knees, his eyelids trembling.

“Cough… F-Flame Divine Palm…”

“Raise your head and look at me.”

The old man’s voice was so cold that it made the title Fire King seem meaningless.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman barely managed to lift his head and found himself staring into a pair of eyes where blue ghostly flames flickered.

“F-Fire King.”

“That’s right. This old man is the Fire King.”

The Roaring Fury Swordsman had briefly forgotten just what kind of monster the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, truly was.

Jeok Cheongang had been active in Murim for only a single year in his entire life. Yet with a single battle, he had become a legend and carved his mark into Murim history.

He was an opponent the Roaring Fury Swordsman could never hope to resist.

Deep despair settled over the Roaring Fury Swordsman’s face.

“Are you… are you planning to kill me?”

“If killing you could put an end to everything, this old man would have done it long ago.”

“Then…”

“Remember just one thing.”

The Fire King slowly parted his lips.

[1039] Jang is a traditional unit of length, approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 ft). Three jang is about 9.09 meters (29.8 ft).

“You may kill Jin Taekyung. You may even wipe out the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and I will stand by and watch. But if that happens, I will go to the Zhongnan Sect.”

“…!”

“I will smash the Zhongnan Sect’s signboard and burn down Mount Zhongnan. If you abandon your main sect and flee, I will chase you to the ends of the earth and kill every last one of you. I will do so until the day my breath stops.”

The Roaring Fury Swordsman’s entire body trembled beneath that terrifying killing intent.

Jeok Cheongang meant every word. He was declaring that he would take on the Zhongnan Sect alone.

If such a thing happened, it was impossible to imagine how many sacrifices would be required.

“What… what am I supposed to do?”

“The choice is yours. The punishment for it belongs to this old man.”

Leaving only those words behind, Jeok Cheongang vanished without a trace.

It was a long while before the Three Hands of Zhongnan finally awoke. They jolted in alarm when they found the Roaring Fury Swordsman sitting there in a daze.

“E-Elder!”

“What happened?”

“Who in the world did this?”

A very long time passed before the Roaring Fury Swordsman finally spoke.

“We’re going back. To Zhongnan.”

His voice was steeped in terror, and the Three Hands of Zhongnan could say nothing.

Chapter 194

"Ahh, that hit the spot."

Jeok Cheongang, who had said he was stepping away for a moment to relieve himself, returned fifteen minutes later. Something felt suspicious, and I narrowed my eyes.

"Why are you looking at me like that?"

"Did you really just go relieve yourself?"

"Do you need to smell me before you'll believe me?"

"But it took you fifteen minutes. Could it be that—"

"This old man has virility to spare."

"…"

How virile did you have to be to spend fifteen minutes pissing?

At that point, it wasn't a stream. It was a fire hose.

When I stared at him in disbelief, Jeok Cheongang glared at me.

"What? You got a problem?"

"Of course not."

A problem? Me?

Considering all the help he had given me today, I could bow to him a hundred times and it still wouldn't be enough.

And then there's the other thing…

I pushed aside the thought that had suddenly occurred to me.

The Fire Gate Clan's divine artifact. The Fire King's Disciple.

I also pretended not to hear the voices that had been whispering nonstop ever since.

Disciple? That's ridiculous.

It was something I had never once considered before.

Why would a man accept as his new Disciple someone he had known for only a day—someone who had killed the Disciple he had cherished like a son?

Even if that Disciple had been a colossal son of a bitch.

As I was thinking about it, Jin Wikyung approached and respectfully cupped his hands toward Jeok Cheongang.

"I, Jin Wikyung, a junior of Murim, pay my respects to the Fire King Jeok Cheongang, whose fame resounds throughout the world."

"Are you from the Jin Family?"

Jeok Cheongang looked Jin Wikyung up and down, then nodded as if he had figured it out.

"Then you're this brat's father?"

"What?"

"Raise your son properly. The boy's young, but he's already hotheaded and causing trouble. His manners are terrible, too."

Jin Wikyung answered with the darkest expression I had ever seen on his face.

"…"

"He's my younger brother."

"Hm?"

"I'm Taekyung's eldest brother."

Jeok Cheongang's face turned serious.

"Don't joke around. I understand wanting to look young, but if you get too greedy, Heaven will punish you."

"It's the truth. I am Jin Wikyung, the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"…"

"How old are you, by any chance?"

"Now that the year has turned, I'm thirty-six."

Jeok Cheongang muttered in disbelief.

"You look forty-six."

Admittedly, his face was somewhat—quite a lot, actually—more weathered than his age suggested. Even I had mistaken him for my father at first.

At least his hair was still thick, but there was no cure for a face that had taken a 160-kilometer-per-hour[1040] fastball from time itself.

Seeing the sadness on Jin Wikyung's face, Jeok Cheongang tried to comfort him.

"It's all right. What matters in a man is his ability. You've got a pretty wife and adorable children, so what more do you need? Heh heh."

"I'm still single."

"…At thirty-six?"

In modern times, that would only be around the age when people started thinking seriously about marriage. But in Murim, where early marriage was common, thirty-six was old enough to have grandchildren.

The bachelor Jin Wikyung gave a terse answer.

"Yes."

"…"

This silence ran a little long. The Fire King furrowed his brow, relaxed it, then flared his nostrils before finally heaving a deep sigh.

"Damn it. I could really use a drink."

[1040] 160 kilometers per hour is about 99 miles per hour.

I let out a quiet laugh. It was a feast day, after all. What kind of feast would it be without alcohol? There was alcohol everywhere.

"Would you like a drink?"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes widened.

"You insolent brat. Are you making fun of this old man?"

"What?"

"Bring me the whole crock."

A mood was like a spark. Once it went out, it was difficult to rekindle.

Yet even after the uninvited guests from the Zhongnan Sect had poured cold water over everything, the spark had not died.

No—in the presence of the Fire King, it blazed even more fiercely.

"Wooooo!"

"Drink! Come on, let's drink!"

"I never thought I'd live to see the Fire King in person!"

"When the Fire King gets flustered, he goes Left Fire King, Right Fire King![1041]"

"…"

I didn't know who that was, but that bastard had nearly put out the spark just now.

At my signal, Hyuk Mujin, who had been standing by, quietly slipped away to hunt down the mood killer.

Meanwhile, Jeok Cheongang was receiving greetings from countless people.

"Great Hero Jeok! It's the honor of a lifetime to meet you!"

"Please do us the honor of visiting our sect sometime…"

"Please grant us your guidance!"

It was truly a sea of people.

The name of the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was practically synonymous with living legend.

Moreover, his whereabouts had been unknown for decades, so most people had long accepted his death as fact.

And now the Fire King, whom everyone had thought dead, had appeared—not in the Central Plains or on Mount Jiuhua, but right here at the Jin Family of Taiyuan in Shanxi Province.

Of course everyone's going to lose their minds.

[1041] This plays on jwa-wang-u-wang, a Korean expression for being flustered or acting in confusion. The joke inserts hwa ("fire") before each wang ("king").

Perhaps this was what it would be like if the legendary singer once called the Emperor of Pop came back from the dead.

Yet despite the enthusiasm of his local Shanxi fans, Michael Cheongang looked thoroughly displeased.

Jin Wikyung seemed to notice, too, and sent me a Sound Transmission.

—My youngest.

The only people who could hold a lengthy conversation with the eccentric Jeok Cheongang were Cheongpung and me. But there was no telling where Cheongpung's thoughts might wander, so in the end, I had no choice but to act as the messenger.

"Are you uncomfortable?"

"Look at the state I'm in. Wouldn't you be uncomfortable if you were me?"

Jeok Cheongang glared at the wine crock beside him. Quite a bit of time had passed, yet hardly any of it was gone.

It wasn't that he disliked alcohol. He simply hadn't had time to drink.

"Damn it. It shouldn't be this hard to have a single drink."

People kept asking him to accept them as Disciples, while Sect Leaders and merchants begged to host him as an honored guest.

One heavily pregnant woman had even asked if she could touch his nose. She wanted to receive the Fire King's qi so she could give birth to a great person, or something like that.

Was he a dol hareubang or something?[1042]

It was enough to make even the onlookers snicker. How much worse must it have been for the man at the center of it all?

Frankly, given Jeok Cheongang's personality, the fact that he had endured this much was impressive in itself.

"Why don't we move somewhere I prepared in advance? It's quiet there."

"Ugh. Forget it."

"You said you were uncomfortable."

"I said forget it. Why are you so damn talkative?"

Even while grumbling, Jeok Cheongang stubbornly refused to leave. I tilted my head.

What's going on?

We had known each other for only a short time, but I had gotten a fairly good sense of his personality.

It was obvious that he hated noisy places and found people's attention bothersome. That was probably why he had spent his entire life on Mount Jiuhua.

[1042] A dol hareubang is a stone guardian statue from Jeju Island. Folk beliefs associate touching its nose with fertility.

Then why?

I watched Jeok Cheongang carefully.

In front of him, the owner of a merchant association with considerable influence in Shanxi Province was bowing and scraping.

“Great Hero Jeok! I’ve long heard of your reputation, which shakes the entire world. When I was young, I admired you so much…”

“Get to the point.”

“I have always admired you from the bottom of my heart, so I prepared a small token of my sincerity.”

“A small token?”

“Yes. It’s something I acquired recently, but I suppose every item has its destined owner.”

The merchant took a small wooden box from inside his robe and opened the lid. Inside was a ring set with clear jade.

“It is a Poison-Averting Ring.”

“A fairly valuable item. It must have been difficult to obtain.”

The merchant waved his hands dramatically.

“Having the honor of seeing your noble face, how could price possibly matter? It only cost a thousand silver nyang.[1043] Heh heh.”

A thousand silver nyang[1044] for a single ring. It ranked among the most expensive gifts the Jin Family of Taiyuan had received so far.

Jeok Cheongang, however, merely nodded without much interest.

“Well, since you’re giving it to me, I’ll accept it gratefully. Who are you, and where are you from?”

“I’m in charge of the Yangcheon Merchant Association…”

“Yangcheon? That’s near Hebei.”

The merchant had been interrupted before he could even give his name, but he bowed as if he had received a great honor.

“Yes. We are trying to begin trading with the Hebei Peng Family, but it has not been easy.”

That was the merchant’s real purpose.

It was why he had sought out Jeok Cheongang even after offering a token of sincerity that was anything but small.

In short, he wanted Jeok Cheongang to help him establish a business relationship with the Hebei Peng Family.

“The Peng Family, huh? Who’s the Family Head these days?”

“It is Great Hero Peng Cheolyeong, the Iron Blood Saber.”

[1043] A nyang was a historical Korean currency unit; the amount here is a thousand silver nyang.

[1044] A nyang was a historical Korean currency unit; the amount here is a thousand silver nyang.

“I’ve never heard of him. Is he the Thunderbolt Saber King’s son?”

“Yes, yes. The Thunderbolt Saber King retired from the front lines and passed the position of Family Head to him.”

“This old man once had a drink with the Thunderbolt Saber King in his younger days. All right, I understand.”

That was the end of the conversation. The merchant set down the wooden box and left with a grin stretching from ear to ear.

Beneath the box lay a stack of bank drafts that had not been there moments ago.

I took advantage of the merchant’s retreat to whisper to Jeok Cheongang.

“You know the Thunderbolt Saber King?”

As his title suggested, the Thunderbolt Saber King was one of the Ten Kings, a Supreme Peak master just like Jeok Cheongang.

Jeok Cheongang took a sip of wine before answering.

“I told you. We had a drink together.”

“Wow.”

He talked about the Thunderbolt Saber King as if he were some old neighborhood friend. Every time he did something like this, I was reminded all over again of just how extraordinary Jeok Cheongang was.

When I gaped at him in admiration, Jeok Cheongang puffed out his chest.

“I flattened that bastard’s nose years ago.”

“…What?”

“I was having a drink with the Sword Saint when he barged in without a word and picked a fight. We fought, and I taught him a lesson.”

What the hell was he talking about?

“Weren’t you two friends?”

“Me? With that guy?”

Jeok Cheongang furrowed his brow.

“Why would I associate with an uncultured bastard like him? We never saw each other again after that.”

“…”

“Later, some strange rumor even started going around. They said the Peng Family’s man and I had exchanged over a hundred moves before acknowledging each other and withdrawing. The bastards from the Hebei Peng Family must have pulled some kind of trick.”

I was dumbfounded, and so was everyone around me.

The story about the Thunderbolt Saber King was absurd enough, but if it was true, the merchant’s request had just gone up in smoke.

“Th-then the Yangcheon Merchant Association won’t be able to trade with the Hebei Peng Family, will they? Mentioning Great Hero Jeok’s name will only make things worse.”

Jeok Cheongang blinked.

“The Yangcheon Merchant Association? What’s that?”

“…”

“Ah, you mean that guy from earlier? Why should I care about him?”

“But you said you’d help him trade with the Hebei Peng Family.”

“He asked me to meet him, so I met him. It’s also true that I had a drink with the Thunderbolt Saber King. Was there even a shred of falsehood in anything this old man said?”

“…”

I wasn’t sure about that, but he certainly didn’t seem to possess even a shred of conscience.

His shamelessness was so impressive that I almost respected him for it.

Fire King, are you even human?

He had more than one or two victims. Before long, the people who had believed Jeok Cheongang’s empty promises and offered him a “small token of sincerity” would realize that it had all been complete bullshit and pound the ground in despair.

At this point, this is organized fraud.

Not that any of the victims would come forward.

No one was brave enough to approach the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, and demand their gifts back.

“We would be honored if you would visit our sect sometime…”

“Hmm. I’ll stop by one day.”

Meaning after he died and found himself wandering the netherworld.

“This is my small token of sincerity…”

“I’ll accept it.”

No. He really is just taking it.

As I watched the treasures, elixirs, and bank drafts pile up like a mountain, I finally realized something.

Was this why he stayed?

It was clearly a grand plan to make one big haul in his old age.

Eventually, after dealing with dozens of suckers, Jeok Cheongang spoke.

“Hmm. This is quite a haul. Aren’t there any more?”

Jin Wikyung answered with an exhausted expression.

“Yes. It seems that everyone who was likely to come has already arrived.”

"A shame. I could have squeezed more out of them."

Just look at the greed on this old man.

Jeok Cheongang gazed at the spoils he had earned by drinking instead of sweating, then stretched his arms high above his head.

"Good grief, this is tiring."

"…"

"Why are you looking at me like that?"

I subtly averted my gaze from Jeok Cheongang's round eyes.

"It's nothing. I was just admiring you."

"From where I'm standing, that doesn't look like admiration."

"I'm serious. There's nothing wrong with having a lot of wealth."

"Is that so?"

Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh, then casually tossed out a remark.

"Then you take it."

"What?"

"I'm saying I'll give all of it to you."

"All of that?"

"It's completely useless to this old man, but it's different for you. Scatter it in the street or do whatever you want with it. I won't care, so take it."

What was going on?

I stared at Jeok Cheongang in bewilderment.

Why all of a sudden?

He had already helped me immensely. Naturally, I couldn't help wondering why he was showing such extraordinary favor to both me and the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Could it really be what I thought? Could he truly mean it?

I swallowed dryly and opened my mouth.

"Great Hero Jeok, by any chance…"

At that moment, Jeok Cheongang rose from his seat and spoke with a drunken expression.

"Ahh, I'm drunk. I'm going inside to rest. See you tomorrow."

"…"

I watched Jeok Cheongang stagger away, then turned my gaze back to the wine crock.

The moon was reflected in the crock, which he had not even emptied a quarter of.

Chapter 195

Calling the banquet held on New Year's Day a resounding success still felt like an understatement.

By embracing the Mount Heng Sword Sect, Jin Wikyung had made a bold move that won the loyalty of dozens of small and mid-sized sects. The Zhongnan Sect's intervention and the appearance of Fire King Jeok Cheongang, whom everyone had believed dead, had left them all stunned.

And…

I was one of them.

I ate, drank, and moved from place to place. Wherever I went, people's eyes followed my every move.

Half a day ago, those gazes had meant interest in the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi.

Not anymore.

The Fire King's Disciple. The heir to the Fire Gate Clan.

I heard those words everywhere. People talked endlessly about what it meant that Jeok Cheongang, the current Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan, had entrusted me with the sect's sacred treasure—and why he had protected the Jin Family of Taiyuan even at the cost of making an enemy of the Zhongnan Sect.

This already seems to be half-confirmed as fact.

To be honest, I didn't understand Jeok Cheongang's intentions either.

That was why I was here.

Everyone was still distracted, and I had managed to slip away unnoticed. This was my chance.

"Phew."

I took a deep breath.

I stood before the pavilion where Jeok Cheongang had been given lodging. Someone must have ordered everyone to stay away, because there wasn't so much as a mouse near the large building.

"Great Hero Jeok. Are you there?"

A reply came from beyond the door.

"I'm sleeping."

"I came because there's something I wanted to ask you."

"I said I'm sleeping."

"…How are you answering me if you're asleep?"

"I'm sleepwalking."

Was that an answer or a whinny?

It made no sense, but if the Fire King said that was how it was, then that was how it was. I pulled myself together and tried again.

"Um, there's something I can't stop wondering about."

"Is this old man responsible for satisfying your curiosity?"

"No, but…"

"If you know that, go wash your feet and get some sleep."

Talk about an impenetrable defense.

But I couldn't back down now.

I began creeping ever so carefully toward the firmly closed door.

"Take one more step, and you won't live to see tomorrow's sunrise."

"…How did you know?"

"To this old man, your presence is no different from a clap of thunder."

"Come on. Couldn't you let me in now? It's still winter, and it's rather chilly out here."

"Would you like this old man to warm you up with the Flame Divine Palm?"

"…"

Just hearing that made my insides feel warm.

When I shut my mouth, silence fell. After a while, Jeok Cheongang broke it with a single sentence.

"I went to Jeongyang."

"Ah."

Even an insignificant bead could hold special meaning for someone. Jeongyang was like that.

Jeongyang was merely one of the dozens of counties and towns in Shanxi Province, but Jeok Cheongang had a reason to visit a mountain path there.

Jopil.

On the day snow came pouring from the sky, a man who had lived as Jangcheon died under the name Jopil.

"I stayed for a long time at the place you told me about. Some passersby saw an old man wandering around the foot of the mountain and asked why I was there."

His subdued voice continued.

"I told them that a blood relative had died right there. That I had come because I wanted to recover whatever remained of his body."

"…"

"That was when I realized something. Even if I had met that boy before you did, I could never have killed him. I would have let him go again, only to regret it afterward."

It was difficult to imagine what expression Jeok Cheongang wore on the other side of the door.

After hesitating, I asked, “Did you find his body?”

“Nothing was left.”

Several months had already passed.

Jopil had spent his entire life walking a path of blood. The subordinates who might have recovered his body had died alongside him, so whatever remained had likely been buried by the capricious weather or devoured by hungry beasts.

“It is nothing but an old man’s selfish desire. Ugly and futile.”

Glug.

The sound of liquor filling a cup seemed unusually loud.

“I thought you said you were drunk earlier.”

“You crafty brat. Why ask when you already know?”

The candlelight flooding the pavilion outlined his silhouette.

Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh, then tossed back his drink.

“Ahh. Good.”

His voice sounded refreshed, as though that one cup had washed away his troubles.

It occurred to me that Jeok Cheongang had gone to the place where Jopil died to free himself from the regret and lingering attachment that still held him.

I deliberately brightened my voice.

“I was taught that good things should be shared.”

“I was taught from a young age that anyone who coveted what belonged to others should be burned with the Flame Divine Palm.”

“What terrifying person taught you that?”

“My Master.”

That was the Volcano Gate Clan for you. Ruthless.

They burned everyone with the Flame Divine Palm, no matter who it was.

I didn’t know the history of the Fire Gate Clan or the names of its past Sect Leaders, but looking at Jeok Cheongang, I could make a rough guess.

An old sect of thugs.

They said beans grew where beans were planted and red beans where red beans were planted.

Like master, like disciple. Jopil was the exception, of course.

Anyway, this isn’t what I came here to talk about.

I was watching the silhouette inside the pavilion while trying to read the situation when Jeok Cheongang suddenly spoke.

“From now on, the Fire Heaven Sword is yours.”

“Fire… what?”

“The Fire Heaven Sword. The sword I entrusted to you.”

I had just learned the Unnamed Sword's true name, but that wasn't the issue right now. I was so shocked that I stammered.

"B-but that's the Fire Gate Clan's sacred treasure."

"Ah, the sacred treasure."

Jeok Cheongang tipped back yet another cup of liquor before continuing.

"That was a lie."

"What?"

"It isn't a sacred treasure. One of our sect's Sect Leaders used it about a hundred years ago, and later generations inherited it from him. It's old, but it was already renowned as a divine weapon back then, so it should still be useful."

"…!"

What the hell was he talking about?

I stood there with my mouth hanging open at this shocking truth I had never expected.

"That was all a lie? You're messing with me, right?"

"Messing with you? Why would I bother with a little pup like you?"

"You said it in front of everyone! 'I entrusted that boy with the Fire Gate Clan's sacred treasure!'"

"I did. Because we were in front of everyone."

Jeok Cheongang continued in an indifferent voice.

"I had to go that far to get people talking. 'That boy must have a deep connection to the Fire King. Perhaps he is the Fire King's Disciple, since he was entrusted with the sacred treasure. If anyone touches the Jin Family of Taiyuan, that terrifying Fire King will step in.' Rumors like that will spread far and wide."

"…"

"Do you really think this old man would entrust our sect's sacred treasure to a young brat like you? Our arts are passed down to only one successor per generation, so no one else knows the truth. If I say it is a sacred treasure, then it is a sacred treasure."

"…"

"So keep the sword. That way, those Zhongnan bastards won't dare make a move."

Is this a dream?

As I stood there in shock, a System notification rang in my ears, delivering the final blow.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Information regarding the Unnamed Sword has been updated.
Item Window
Fire Heaven Sword
Type: Sword
Grade: Peak
Restriction: One who has inherited the Fire Gate Clan's legacy
Description: The beloved sword once used by the Fire Gate Clan's tenth Sect Leader. Forged from Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, it is exceptionally sharp and durable. After passing through the hands of countless owners over many years, it changed of its own accord. Only one who has inherited the Fire Gate Clan's legacy can draw out its true power.
Effect: Unknown

The updated information was exactly as Jeok Cheongang had said.

It was the beloved sword of the tenth Sect Leader. No matter how hard I looked, there wasn't a single mention of it being the Fire Gate Clan's sacred treasure.

Even the "true power" hidden within the sword could only be drawn out by someone who had inherited the Fire Gate Clan's legacy.

In other words, other than the fact that it was made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, the sword was a corpse.

I really thought it was a sacred treasure. I spent so much time worrying about what I'd do if he said he wanted to make me his Disciple…

As I stared blankly at the holographic window, Jeok Cheongang added as though he were doing me a great favor.

"Think of it as a long-term loan. If this old man forgets about it and dies, you may keep it. Ah, and hand over the Flame Divine Palm manual right now."

"Damn old man… Gasp."

I had only meant to think it, but the words slipped out of my mouth.

I clapped my mouth shut in alarm. At that very moment, the firmly closed pavilion door burst outward.

Crack!

A pair of eyes blazing with fire glared at me.

"You little pup. What did you just say?"

"I-I-I misspoke."

"Misspoke? Then this old man will make a little mistake with his hand, too."

Whoosh!

A palm glowed red-hot, radiating overwhelming heat.

I spun around without looking back. In the same instant, I pulled the Flame Divine Palm manual from my Inventory and threw it.

“Gasp! The manual! The Flame Divine Palm manual!”

If he reached out now, the manual would turn to ash.

Jeok Cheongang, startled, hastily pulled back his fist. I took advantage of the opening and ran with all my might.

“I’m sorry! I’m really sorry! Please spare me!”

“You damned bastard! Stop right there!”

His roar thundered behind me.

Jeok Cheongang watched Jin Taekyung flee as though his tail were on fire and let out a quiet laugh.

The anger that had filled his face only moments ago had vanished without a trace.

“You little fool. No matter how far you run, you are still in the palm of this old man’s hand.”

He could catch Taekyung whenever he wished.

But Jeok Cheongang merely clasped his hands behind his back and turned away.

Jin Taekyung had killed Jangcheon, the Disciple Jeok Cheongang had cherished like a son.

Yet Jeok Cheongang bore him no hatred.

If anything, Taekyung was one of the people to whom Jeok Cheongang owed a sincere apology.

Everything had begun with the wrong choice Jeok Cheongang had made ten years ago.

“He called me a damn old man.”

Despite being cursed by a little pup, Jeok Cheongang wasn’t offended.

No, if anything, he felt relieved.

“That’s right. I am a damn old man. A senile old man, too. Heh heh. Heh heh heh.”

After his Master died, no one had dared criticize or curse Jeok Cheongang to his face.

He was the Fire King, a great martial artist who had single-handedly written himself into legend.

And yet, hearing that one remark from Jin Taekyung made him feel as though something that had been blocked for a long time had suddenly burst open.

“How refreshing. Truly refreshing.”

As people grow older, they become lonelier day by day. Not because they have no one with whom to share their warmth, but because they have no one to lean on.

Jeok Cheongang could serve as someone else's support, but he had grown too old to lean on anyone himself.

"To be someone's support…"

Jeok Cheongang was a rough, sharp thorn tree. He had lived a long life and crossed paths with countless people, but he had never allowed anyone to lean on him.

There had been only one exception.

Jangcheon.

"What about you? Did you ever feel, even for a moment, that this Master was a dependable support?"

As Jeok Cheongang thought of him, his gaze clouded over. But his chest no longer hurt as much as it once had, nor did his eyes grow hot.

The dead had already returned to a handful of earth.

At the place where his Disciple had fallen in a spray of blood, Jeok Cheongang had drunk a bottle of liquor and poured out an entire crockful.

He had wept freely, shedding the tears he had been unable to shed for the past ten years and letting the grief in his heart flow out with them.

"I'm sorry. Today will be the last time I think of you."

If there was to be a next time, it would be in the next life.

He might still think of his dead Disciple from time to time. But those thoughts would no longer be regrets about the past.

They would be memories.

"This is enough. This is how it should be."

After pacing around the courtyard for a long while, Jeok Cheongang suddenly stopped.

The image of Jangcheon that had been flickering before his eyes vanished, replaced by someone he had never expected to think of.

Why him?

Open, well-defined features. A confident smile that somehow managed to be irritating.

The way he cautiously gauged Jeok Cheongang's mood, yet still took every cutting remark in stride.

Did I get angry without realizing it because he called me a damn old man?

Jeok Cheongang was frowning when—

Sizzle.

The sound of something burning filled the air, followed by a thin trail of smoke.

Realizing where the sound had come from, his eyes flew open.

"Th-the manual!"

The cover of the Flame Divine Palm manual was already half-burned.
Jeok Cheongang let out a furious roar.
“Jin Taekyung! You damned bastard!”

Chapter 196

“W-What happened here?”

A middle-aged merchant—the third generation of his family to run a textile shop in the center of Taiyuan, Shanxi Province—stood with his mouth hanging open.

“T-The silk…”

The bolts of silk that should have filled the shop had vanished without a trace. Various furnishings lay broken, and the proprietor, who should have been busy welcoming customers, was sprawled on the floor, drenched in sweat.

“Thieves! We’ve been robbed!”

The merchant’s vision went dark, and the strength drained from his legs.

He already operated several textile shops, but this was his largest store in Taiyuan, the flagship passed down from his grandfather and a symbol of his family’s legacy.

And someone had robbed it. Every last bolt of silk was gone!

I knew things had been going too well.

For the past four months, the merchant had traveled from province to province, inspecting his stores and closing a major contract.

Yet after all that time away, he had returned to find his flagship store in ruins. Unable to withstand the shock, he sank to the floor.

That was when—

“Tsk, tsk. This place is a mess, too. Honestly, martial artists…”

A middle-aged man had been clicking his tongue as he looked around the shop. When he noticed the merchant sitting on the floor, his eyes widened.

“Oh? When did you get back? I heard you had a big deal to close this time. You’re back earlier than I expected.”

But the merchant was already half out of his mind. He heard none of it except for one word that kept echoing in his ears.

“H-Here, too?”

“Huh?”

The merchant seized the middle-aged man by the collar and shook him violently.

“You said this place was a mess, too!”

“Y-Yeah, I did. But could you let go of my collar while we talk?”

“What happened? Mounted bandits? Thieves? Did a war break out and the authorities requisition everything? And what do martial artists have to do with it?”

“I said let go of me first!”

The middle-aged man finally tore himself free, then inspected his clothes with a grumble.

“Damn it. These are new.”

“If you don’t tell me right now, you’ll die and I’ll die with you.”

“All right, all right.”

“So what happened?”

The middle-aged man’s answer was simple.

“It all sold.”

“…What?”

“We weren’t robbed. It’s gone because everything sold out, my friend. So get a grip.”

The merchant stared blankly at him before finally managing to speak.

“Have you lost your mind? How does that make any sense? Who would buy more than a thousand bolts of silk?”

“Government officials, merchants, martial artists. Every last one of them came rushing in and cleaned the place out.”

“…Why?”

“Why do you think? They all want to make an impression on the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“The Jin Family of Taiyuan? The one I know?”

“Of course the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Who else? The Mount Heng Sword Sect?”

“Why are you bringing up the Mount Heng Sword Sect? Did something happen?”

“…You really haven’t heard?”

“I just got back after four months. I came straight here without even seeing my wife!”

“W-Wait! Please calm down. I’ll tell you everything.”

Not wanting his new clothes ruined, the middle-aged man gave him a quick summary of everything that had happened over the past few months.

Fifteen minutes later, after hearing the whole story from the war between the Jin Family of Taiyuan and the Mount Heng Sword Sect to the present day, the merchant muttered in a daze.

“All that happened?”

“I told you. Shanxi is in an uproar over the Fire King’s arrival. And it isn’t just Shanxi Province. The city is crawling with outsiders who came to meet him.”

The middle-aged man continued, his face flushed with excitement.

“I’ve been doing business in Taiyuan for over twenty years, but I’ve never seen a boom like this.”

“For all that, the streets didn’t look any busier than usual…”

“Do you think people would still be loitering in the streets when the sun has been high in the sky for hours? They packed up their things ages ago and ran to the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

"Good heavens. It's hard to believe."

"I even cleared out my entire stock."

"A-Already?"

"Why are you so surprised? Mine was nothing compared to yours. And I heard this next part from someone reliable…"

The middle-aged man lowered his voice to a conspiratorial whisper.

"The gathering was originally supposed to last three days, but it may be extended. The rumors are spreading fast, and the real big shots are beginning to move."

"The real big shots?"

"The Murim's prestigious major sects have started mobilizing. Seok Family Manor, said to be foremost in the merchant world, and His Highness Prince Shangshan, the City Lord, both went to the Jin Family of Taiyuan early this morning."

"Even His Highness Prince Shangshan?"

"That's why those officials who usually drag their feet are scrambling now. A member of the imperial family is coming. They have to show their faces and offer some token of sincerity, don't they?"

"Of course. And they'd better arrive before everyone else."

"What kind of place is Taiyuan? It may not rival the Central Plains, but it's unquestionably the greatest commercial city in Shanxi Province. You can buy almost anything here."

"Local procurement. I see."

"And the more people come looking for something, the scarcer it'll become. Prices will rise, too."

The merchant's eyes flashed. He had realized this would not end in a day or two.

His earlier confusion and despair had already vanished. Now mountains of silver nyang[1045] danced before his eyes.

This is an opportunity.

He could establish connections with people from the Murim, the merchant world, and the government. If he played his cards right, he might land an enormous deal.

After finishing his calculations, the merchant turned to the middle-aged man.

"I filled several warehouses just in case. I'll let you have part of the stock at a reasonable price, so tell me straight. Who should I approach?"

Having just found his chance to make a killing, the middle-aged man grinned broadly.

"First, remember three people: the Fire King, Jin Wikyung, the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung."

"…The Fire King and the Lesser Family Head, I understand. But why that good-for-nothing Jin Taekyung?"

[1045] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency. A silver nyang denotes its value in silver.

“Hey now. He’s the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi these days. Before long, he’ll become an incredible master capable of influencing the entire world.”

“What are you talking about?”

“Tsk, tsk. How can a merchant be this completely out of touch?”

The middle-aged man savored the merchant’s bewildered expression. At last, he revealed the fact he had saved for this very moment.

“The Fire King has taken the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi as his Disciple.”

“What? Is that true?”

“I told you it was. Two days ago, an Elder of the Zhongnan Sect who didn’t know about it caused a scene, then went back after getting thoroughly beaten. He even entrusted the Sleeping Dragon with his sect’s divine artifact.”

“Th-Then…”

“It wouldn’t be an exaggeration to say that half the people heading to the Jin Family of Taiyuan right now are going to make an impression on the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, not the Fire King.”

The Fire King was unquestionably one of the greatest Supreme Peak masters in the world, but he was old—very old—and had no real power base to speak of.

Jin Taekyung was different.

He was only twenty-one, possessed outstanding martial talent, and had the powerful Jin Family of Taiyuan behind him.

No, wait.

It was the other way around now. The Jin Family of Taiyuan had gained an extraordinary source of support.

They now had the renowned Fire King, as well as Jin Taekyung, who might one day grow into a Supreme Peak master comparable to his teacher.

The merchant’s face flushed with excitement.

“It’s like giving wings to a tiger.”

“So we have to climb aboard before it flies away.”

This was an opportunity worth staking his entire fortune on.

Having finally made up his mind, the merchant spoke.

“I need to meet the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi at once.”

“That’s the right answer. But right now, you’d have trouble meeting him even if you showed up carrying a fortune in gold.”

“Why?”

“I don’t know. According to the Jin Family of Taiyuan, he suddenly entered closed-door cultivation[1046].”

[1046] Closed-door cultivation is secluded martial training undertaken without visitors or other distractions.

“Closed-door cultivation[1047]? That thing martial artists do? Why now, of all times?”

The middle-aged man let out a deep sigh.

“Exactly. I hear the Heaven Shaking Sword has also shut himself away, muttering about enlightenment or something.”

“Good heavens. Isn’t there any way around this?”

“I don’t know. Things have grown too big too quickly. The Jin Family of Taiyuan is practically bursting at the seams, so it seems they’ve started being selective about whom they let in.”

“Didn’t you say you were fairly close with one of the Jin Family’s Squad Leaders? I heard you slipped him a few bribes, too.”

“He’s dead. He died in the last war.”

“Oh dear.”

With powerful figures from every sphere already on the move, it would not be easy for ordinary merchants like them to get involved.

The two men put their heads together and racked their brains until the merchant suddenly spoke.

“I do know someone over there.”

“Oh! Someone you know well?”

“I know him very well. He’s a boy my wife gave birth to.”

The middle-aged man frowned at the merchant’s answer.

They had known each other long enough to be intimately familiar with each other’s family affairs.

“You mean your eldest son?”

“That’s right. That unfilial bastard hasn’t shown his face once in years. Judging by the fact that my wife hasn’t said anything, he must still be alive somehow…”

The middle-aged man nodded, plainly disappointed.

“Well, this is as good a time as any to contact him. Who knows? He might be making a name for himself as a proper martial artist.”

The merchant let out a derisive laugh.

“The son of a textile merchant, a martial artist? As if. He’s probably waiting hand and foot on someone.”

“If that someone happens to be the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, wouldn’t that be a good thing?”

“Impossible. If it turns out to be true, then from this day forward, my family name won’t be Hyuk. It’ll be Gyeon—gyeon as in dog!”

[1047] Closed-door cultivation is secluded martial training undertaken without visitors or other distractions.

"Achoo!"

With the sound of a sneeze, my back suddenly felt cool.

Lying facedown on the bed with my upper body bare, I spoke quietly.

"Mujin, do you want to die?"

Hyuk Mujin, who had been wiping my back with a cloth soaked in cold water, answered.

"Oh, I'm sorry. My nose suddenly started itching."

"Do that one more time. It'll be the last sneeze of your life."

"…Yes, sir."

"Good. Keep wiping."

Swish. Swish.

Every pass of the cold cloth across my back sent a dull throb of pain through me.

That was only natural. My entire upper body was covered in black-and-blue bruises.

Damn it. It's been two days, and I'm still like this.

This had never happened before. Until now, I had recovered from most injuries in no time with sleep mode and by circulating my qi.

Every time I leveled up, I had poured points into Muscles and Bones and Sinews and Meridians. Ordinary blows shouldn't have been able to damage me.

But…

That's a Supreme Peak master for you.

None of it meant a damn thing against the Fire King.

He had been quiet for ages, only to suddenly chase me down and beat me senseless. He hadn't even used the Flame Divine Palm, but every punch from his bare fists had felt as though my flesh and bones were being ripped apart.

The next thing I knew, I was waking up in unimaginable pain in the Jin Family of Taiyuan's infirmary. After they moved me back to my pavilion, I spent the next two days confined to bed.

"That damn old man."

"Gasp!"

Hyuk Mujin sucked in a sharp breath.

"Captain, have you lost your mind? He'll really kill you."

"Let him. What are people outside saying?"

"Officially, we've settled on calling it closed-door cultivation[1048]. It would be rather bad if rumors spread that the Fire King beat up the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi."

"What about my eldest brother?"

[1048] Closed-door cultivation is secluded martial training undertaken without visitors or other distractions.

“Would the Lesser Family Head have any other choice? After hearing the initial report, he got extremely angry for a moment and went to see Great Hero Jeok, but…”

“He went to see him?”

“He saw the burned Flame Divine Palm manual, apologized several times, and left.”

“What did he have to apologize for? Did I set it on fire? Jeok Cheongang did that himself. And did he really have to beat me this badly over a little singeing?”

“I caught a glimpse of it, and it was more than a little singed. Almost half the cover with the title on it had burned away. The Flame Divine Palm had become just the Flame.”

“…”

“Anyway, I think we should stop talking about this. I don’t know about you, Captain, but I’m terrified. If Great Hero Jeok suddenly walks in, we’re both dead, aren’t we?”

“That’s true.”

Hyuk Mujin’s foresight was remarkable. Barely a moment after he finished speaking, the door flew open.

“Gasp!”

“Guh!”

“…You bastards. What was that reaction?”

“N-Nothing.”

The small, elderly man, Jeok Cheongang, narrowed his eyes and looked at us. Then he snorted.

“Fine. Since this old man didn’t hear anything, I’ll let it slide this once.”

Surprisingly willing to let the matter go, he jerked his chin at Hyuk Mujin.

“You, get out. You’re in the way.”

I didn’t know what he intended to do, but I had a feeling I would be better off with Hyuk Mujin in the room.

Hyuk Mujin responded to my desperate gaze—the gaze of a man who wanted to live a long life.

“Yes, sir. I’ll take my leave. Good luck!”

“Very well.”

…Son of a bitch.

Hyuk Mujin scurried out, leaving me consumed by anxiety.

There was something ominous about the way Jeok Cheongang was staring at my bare upper body.

“Wh-What is it?”

Surely not.

But Jeok Cheongang's eyes gleamed with an inexplicable heat.

"Take off your pants."

"Gasp. Wh-What do you mean?"

"Strip. Don't leave a single scrap of cloth on your body."

I desperately covered my chest. My voice trembled with shame and fear.

"B-But there's someone I like."

"…What does that have to do with anything?"

What a Western mindset!

I was screwed. There was no way out.

As I froze in place, Jeok Cheongang shouted:

"Ah, I'm going to cleanse your sinews and wash your marrow[1049], so take off your clothes and lie down already!"

"…"

You should've said so from the start.

[1049] Cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow is a martial-arts concept of improving a person's physical constitution.

Chapter 197

Cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow.

The name literally meant shedding one's hair and cleansing one's bones and muscles. It was a procedure performed only by prestigious sects with long histories.

By using internal energy to reshape the bones and muscles and purge the waste accumulated within the body, it transformed a person's constitution into one better suited to learning martial arts.

Cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow had to be performed steadily over multiple sessions. The problem was that both the requirements and the process were extremely demanding.

After hearing Jeok Cheongang's explanation, I asked, "Is it really that difficult?"

Jeok Cheongang nodded.

"You're artificially changing the body you were born with. Did you really think that would be easy and convenient? If it were, there wouldn't be anyone in this world who wasn't a master."

Fair enough.

An ordinary person had to grit their teeth and work out for months just to carve out a six-pack.

Changing your very bones, muscles, and constitution would obviously be far more difficult.

"Cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow requires three things."

He said it was incredibly difficult, but there are only three?

That thought vanished the instant Jeok Cheongang continued.

"First, an internal-energy master with at least two jiazi of internal energy."

"…Yikes."

The difficulty level was brutal right from the start.

Two jiazi amounted to a full one hundred and twenty years. How many people under heaven could possibly possess that much internal energy?

There had to be very few, and Jeok Cheongang, standing right in front of me, was one of them.

He raised two wrinkled fingers.

"Second, money."

"Why do you need money?"

"Because you need elixirs for the recipient to absorb. The practitioner must guide and circulate the qi filling the recipient's body. Every sect has its own method, but it is no exaggeration to say the process costs a thousand gold."

“It would be difficult for anyone outside the Nine Sects and One Gang[1050] or the Five Great Families.[1051]”

“Not merely difficult. Extremely difficult. Was it Baek Museong? That Huashan-something fellow seems to have undergone it.”

This was an investment in the most literal sense. Sects selected promising young talents with bright futures and performed the procedure on them.

If Baek Museong was a blue-chip stock, Huashan would certainly have considered him worth the investment.

“Then what about Cheongpung?”

“Do you think the Sword Saint would have simply stood by and watched? He must have refined the boy’s body bit by bit from a very young age.”

Damn it. I’m the only one who missed out.

I had thought the Jin Family of Taiyuan was at least a silver spoon by Murim standards. But compared to the diamond-spoon babies who underwent the procedure as casually as double-eyelid surgery,[1052] we were nothing.

“What’s the third and final requirement?”

“Endurance.”

“Huh?”

“Cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow changes the bones, muscles, and constitution one was born with. The bones and muscles twist and settle back into place, and the process inevitably causes tremendous pain.”

“How painful are we talking?”

Jeok Cheongang answered without hesitation.

“Painful enough to kill you.”

“…Painful enough to kill me?”

“People really do die.”

“Gasp.”

“In the Sichuan Tang Clan, they fill a jar with more than a thousand different venomous creatures, and then…”

The longer Jeok Cheongang talked, the more my stomach seemed to shrivel. I swallowed hard.

“T-That’s only how the Sichuan Tang Clan does it, right?”

“Of course. Our sect has its own secret method.”

“You don’t stack up more than a thousand logs, make me climb on top, and set them on fire or something…?”

[1050] The Nine Sects and One Gang are a traditional grouping of major martial-arts organizations in Murim fiction.

[1051] The Five Great Families are a grouping of prominent martial-arts families in Murim fiction.

[1052] Double-eyelid surgery creates or accentuates a crease in the upper eyelid. It is a familiar cosmetic procedure in South Korea.

"…"

"I guess not. Sorry."

"What the hell do you think our sect is?"

Jeok Cheongang glared at me with round, bulging eyes before shaking his head.

"Cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow cannot be prepared overnight. Today, this old man will merely straighten your bones and muscles with internal energy. Whether you stuff yourself with elixirs afterward is your concern."

"Ah. Okay."

Come to think of it, Jeok Cheongang had arrived empty-handed. If he had intended to perform the procedure properly, he would have brought elixirs and all the other necessities.

"Should I take off my clothes, then?"

"Ask me that one more time, and I'll strip off your skin as well."

I stripped off every piece of clothing I was wearing at the speed of light.

Jeok Cheongang's gaze roamed over my completely naked body, and a strange look entered his eyes.

"This is…"

"Yes?"

"Ah, never mind. It's nothing."

What was that? Why did the atmosphere suddenly become so ominous?

As I wondered what was wrong with the old man, I realized something and grinned.

"Come on, now. We're all friends here. Why are you acting like that?"

"…?"

"Honestly, this size is absolutely not normal. I was shocked myself when I first saw it. Do you know the Amazon? There's something called a black anaconda there. It's just—whoosh. Really enormous. Whew."

"…!"

"I understand that you're surprised, but you still can't touch it. Got it?"

Whoosh—whack!

With a short rush of wind, a tightly clenched fist slammed into my temple.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Status effect: Unconsciousness has been removed.

I came to with the System notification, stared up at the familiar ceiling, and muttered, “Damn, you could’ve just said you wouldn’t touch it. Why hit me?”

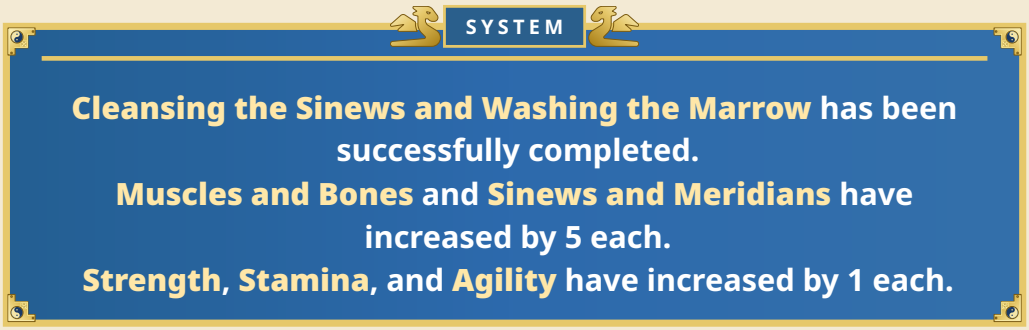
Did he really want to touch it that badly? Was he upset because I turned him down so firmly?

I rubbed my throbbing temple and sat up. Several System messages I had not yet read were floating before my eyes.

“Huh? The cleansing is already over?”

I looked around, but Jeok Cheongang was nowhere to be seen.

Apparently, he had finished the procedure in a flash and left while I was unconscious. At least, that was what the messages suggested.



“Oh…”

A weak murmur of admiration escaped me.

It was definitely good. I was undoubtedly better off than before. This was the sort of improvement that would normally require one level-up and plenty of steady training.

But…

“Is that really all?”

Form is temporary, but class is forever.

It might have been a makeshift procedure performed without proper preparation, but cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow was still cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow.

I had expected some incredible effect. Instead, I was so disappointed that I was practically bewildered.

“What the hell?”

In Murim novels, these things were practically cheat codes.

Bone Transformation and cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow were practically basic requirements for any protagonist.

Even a sickly weakling could undergo both, turn into a thug, and run rampant through the Murim.

So what was wrong with me?

“Did he just half-ass it?”

Just then, the door opened, and Hyuk Mujin cautiously poked his head inside.

"May I come in—gasp."

As I pulled on the clothes scattered across the floor, I said:

"Just so we're clear, if you get any strange ideas, I'll crack your skull. And by skull, I mean your head."

"Then why are you naked?"

"The old man worked on my body."

"Your body? With you completely naked?"

"…You're making that sound weird."

Hyuk Mujin flinched and hurriedly waved his hands.

"N-No. That's not what I meant. Great Hero Jeok looked so strange when I ran into him earlier that I came to see if something had happened."

"His expression was strange?"

"His face was completely rigid. He looked like he'd been startled by something, or maybe like he was angry."

"Really?"

"Yes. He looked so frightening that I couldn't even bring myself to speak to him."

"Why?"

"How would I know?"

I tilted my head. Had something happened all of a sudden?

Jeok Cheongang walked along, lost in thought.

People who recognized him bowed from every direction, but his mind was filled with only one person.

Jin Taekyung.

His assessment of the young man had changed several times over the past few days.

First, he had been an interesting fellow. Then he had become an infuriating bastard who burned his sect's martial arts manual. And today, the moment Jeok Cheongang saw Jin Taekyung's naked body for the first time, a new thought had occurred to him.

What a strange fellow.

Even at a glance, Jin Taekyung possessed exceptional bones and muscles. They were so remarkable that it seemed a waste for him to languish in a backwater like this.

But once Jeok Cheongang saw the body hidden beneath his clothes with his own eyes, he realized it was beyond anything he had expected.

How can a body be this perfectly balanced?

The human body grew over time, but balance was another matter.

One's everyday posture and even the smallest habits in how one dressed, ate, and lived could throw that balance off.

A swordsman who wielded his sword with his right hand would naturally have more muscle and greater strength in his right arm.

It was as natural as water flowing downhill.

But Jin Taekyung was different.

…What is this fellow?

The length and angle of every bone. The shape and form of every muscle.

Every part of him was in perfect balance.

It was as though some unknown, omnipotent being had drawn one half of Jin Taekyung on a blank sheet of paper, folded it over, and then opened it again.

Could he have undergone cleansing steadily since childhood? No. Even cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow couldn't achieve this.

In the past, Jeok Cheongang had agonized and conducted extensive research for Jangcheon, whose bones and muscles were lacking. Eventually, he had found the best possible method and performed the procedure on him.

The treatment had succeeded, but that experience had taught Jeok Cheongang one thing.

Even cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow has its limits.

The phrase perfect balance did not belong anywhere near the human body.

Even if one spent ten thousand gold instead of a thousand, minute flaws would remain. But Jin Taekyung was different.

Jeok Cheongang had kneaded and touched his unconscious body from head to toe.

He had felt the tough, elastic skin and the strength filling both the surface and the depths of his body. He had circulated his internal energy through Taekyung's body and confirmed the broad, sturdy Sinews and Meridians within.

And then he had been stunned.

How can a body like this exist?

It was perfect. He almost wondered if this was what the legendary Bone Transformation he had only heard about would look like.

Jeok Cheongang had met several Supreme Peak masters in his life, including the peerless master Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint.

But he could say this without hesitation: Of all the bones and muscles he had ever seen, Jin Taekyung's were the finest under heaven.

Could it be…

Jeok Cheongang had been staring blankly for some time when a thought flashed through his mind, making his entire body tremble.

The Murim held sayings passed down like legends from the distant past.

The Heavenly Martial Physique, said to be born through a caprice of Heaven once every several hundred—or perhaps even a thousand—years, was one of them.

The Heavenly Martial Physique? I must be out of my mind.

But the longer Jeok Cheongang examined Jin Taekyung's body, the deeper his suspicions grew and the more tangled his thoughts became.

It would not have been an exaggeration to say that there was nothing about that body in need of correction.

Once he finished the mere formality that could barely be called cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow, his concerns only deepened.

If that boy truly possesses the Heavenly Martial Physique, what would happen if he learned martial arts even greater than those he knows now and absorbed elixirs?

His thoughts continued chasing one another long after he left the pavilion.

At last, the desire coiled deep within Jeok Cheongang's heart raised its head.

"What if… I taught that boy?"

The mutter escaped him before he realized it, and Jeok Cheongang was startled.

A Disciple?

His only Disciple had betrayed their sect and was no longer of this world.

The wound from that betrayal had not even healed, and he was already thinking of taking another Disciple.

Worse, he was over a hundred years old, and the infirmities of old age had already begun to cloud his mind.

Even if I don't do it, Mae Jonghak could find a worthy talent and carry on our sect's legacy.

He had told no one, but Jeok Cheongang had planned to seek out the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak as soon as he left the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Mae Jonghak possessed martial arts counted among the strongest under heaven and had no selfish ambitions. Jeok Cheongang planned to entrust the Fire Gate Clan's succession to him.

And now, at this late hour, I entertain such an absurd thought? Jeok Cheongang, you stupid bastard. You fool.

Jeok Cheongang was sighing heavily and staring up at the sky when a voice reached him.

"Great Hero Jeok. Is something troubling you?"

The polite voice belonged to Jin Wikyung, a giant of a man.

Jeok Cheongang, who had been thinking of Jin Taekyung at that very moment, flinched.

"Uh, yes?"

It was already the third day since Jeok Cheongang had begun staying at the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Seeing him act so unlike himself, Jin Wikyung asked cautiously, “Is there perhaps something making you uncomfortable…?”

“N-No. It’s nothing.”

“Then I’m relieved.”

Jeok Cheongang waved a hand while gazing toward a distant mountain.

“There’s nothing wrong with this old man. I’m perfectly fine, so go about your business.”

“Um, did you perhaps have something you wished to say to me?”

“I said I don’t.”

“Are you certain?”

“I said I am! Stop worrying about it and be on your way.”

“…Great Hero Jeok?”

“Ah, what is it?”

When Jeok Cheongang finally exploded, Jin Wikyung hesitated before speaking.

“Great Hero Jeok, you are standing directly in front of my office.”

“…”

“Would you care to come in for a cup of tea and a conversation?”

After a brief silence, Jeok Cheongang cleared his throat.

“Ahem. Give me liquor instead of tea.”

Whatever his mind might have said, Jeok Cheongang’s feet had been honest.

Chapter 198

An awkward atmosphere hung inside the office.

Jin Wikyung and Jeok Cheongang stole glances at each other as they sipped their tea and liquor.

Great Hero Jeok came here in person. What could this be about?

Has he been possessed by a ghost? Of all places, why did he have to come here?

But even silence had its limits.

After draining several cups in quick succession, Jeok Cheongang finally spoke. Since he was already here, he might as well clear up his questions about Jin Taekyung before leaving.

“I just came from seeing that fellow.”

“Ah, you mean Taekyung.”

Jin Wikyung immediately understood and carefully gauged his mood.

He had already heard the whole story. Jeok Cheongang had helped the Jin Family of Taiyuan because of the emotional debt he carried toward his dead Disciple.

But he was worried that the anger caused by the martial arts manual incident two days ago might not have faded yet.

“Is this perhaps about the martial arts manual?”

“This old man has already erased that from his memory. No matter how precious a manual may be, people are more important. Don’t you agree?”

“…”

“What? What’s with that expression?”

“Oh, it’s nothing.”

After beating him into a pulp, he’s talking about how people are more important now?

Jin Wikyung swallowed the words hovering at the tip of his tongue.

“In any case, I thought I might have hit him a little too hard, so I went to treat his body by cleansing his sinews and washing his marrow.”

“C-Cleansing his sinews and washing his marrow? You mean the cleansing I know of?”

Jeok Cheongang nodded at Jin Wikyung’s wide-eyed stare.

“Is there another kind?”

“N-No. I was simply too surprised.”

“Surprised?”

“How could I not be? Someone as extraordinary as Great Hero Jeok performed cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow on my younger brother. This is a tremendous blessing for our family.”

As Jeok Cheongang gazed at Jin Wikyung's delighted face, he realized something.

"I see. I suppose you might not have known."

"Pardon?"

You can only see as much as you know. Even Jeok Cheongang, one of the most renowned Supreme Peak masters in the world, had never imagined that Jin Taekyung's bones and muscles could be that exceptional.

How, then, could Jin Wikyung have known?

Perhaps it was fortunate that I found out now.

Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue softly before speaking.

"The effect of cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow was minimal."

"What do you mean? How could cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow have no effect?"

"That isn't what I mean. It would be more accurate to say that Jin Taekyung doesn't need it. It's too early to make a definite judgment, but…"

Jeok Cheongang added in a low voice:

"I suspect he may possess the Heavenly Martial Physique."

"!"

For a brief moment, shock flashed across Jin Wikyung's face.

But a moment later, he nodded calmly, prompting Jeok Cheongang to ask, "Did you already know?"

"I didn't. Things simply make sense now."

"Understand what?"

"Taekyung's astonishingly rapid progress in martial arts. If he possesses the Heavenly Martial Physique—if it truly is that Heavenly Martial Physique—then everything can be explained."

"Astonishingly rapid?"

Jeok Cheongang narrowed his brow and continued.

"That fellow has certainly accomplished a great deal for someone his age, but not enough to call it astonishing. If anything, compared to the legends of the Heavenly Martial Physique, his progress seems lacking."

His voice rang with certainty.

And for good reason. In his youth, Jeok Cheongang had been every bit as accomplished as Jin Taekyung—more so, if anything.

The Supreme Peak masters who now dominated the Murim had displayed their genius from childhood. Compared to them, Jin Taekyung's current realm was nothing out of the ordinary.

"The Heavenly Martial Physique is exactly what its name implies: bones and muscles bestowed by Heaven. Once every several hundred years—perhaps even once every thousand—a whim of Heaven causes a god to dwell within the body of a mere human. But the boy is only…”

“At the beginning of the Peak realm.”

“Exactly. The world is vast, and talented people are everywhere. Cheongpung alone is proof of that.”

Everything Jeok Cheongang said was true.

The people sheltered by the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families were not the only ones who existed.

There were undoubtedly young talents whose names had not yet reached the Central Plains, as well as people who had buried themselves in the countryside while training in martial arts.

If someone scoured every corner of the world, they would likely uncover several Supreme Peak masters approaching the level of the One God, the Three Saints, and the Ten Kings.

“That is why this old man cannot be certain. The boy is undoubtedly exceptional, but… this is not enough. Perhaps the legend is only a legend. Or perhaps his martial talent is inferior to his physique.”

“How interesting.”

“What is?”

“I thought the exact opposite.”

Jin Wikyung smiled faintly at Jeok Cheongang’s questioning expression.

“My younger brother’s martial talent is the greatest under heaven. No, it would not be an exaggeration to call it the greatest in all history.”

“W-What did you say?”

Jeok Cheongang barely managed to suppress the curse rising in his throat.

Even he, a living legend in all but name, did not dare claim to be the greatest beneath Heaven. And this man was calling his younger brother the greatest in all history?

Still, the confidence and conviction in Jin Wikyung’s voice compelled Jeok Cheongang to ask, “What makes you think that?”

Jin Wikyung silently held up three fingers.

“Three months.”

“…”

“That is how long Taekyung has been learning martial arts.”

“!”

“It’s also how long it took a Third Rate wastrel who frequented pleasure houses to become a Peak master.”

For an instant, Jeok Cheongang’s vision went white. Lightning flashed through his mind, and his heart pounded violently.

Three months to rise from Third Rate to Peak.

Absurd.

Utterly impossible.

But…

It is possible. If he possesses the Heavenly Martial Physique.

Jeok Cheongang was a Supreme Peak master.

Yet even he—powerful enough to kill a thousand people alone—was merely an old man whose body was withering beneath the force of time.

The Heavenly Martial Physique, however, was a being born of Heaven's choice and whim.

How could a mere human presume to guess Heaven's intentions?

Is this what lies beyond Heaven?

Jeok Cheongang slowly rose and approached the window. When he pushed open the tightly shut panes, an endless blue sky stretched before him.

As the cold wind rushed inside, he suddenly wondered:

Why had Heaven chosen Jin Taekyung?

And why had it brought the two of them together?

Who are you? Is there really someone there?

No answer came.

Jeok Cheongang stared in silence at the wisps of cloud drifting through the clear, tranquil sky. After a long while, he finally spoke.

"I think we need more liquor. What do you say?"

Jin Wikyung answered with a smile.

"Excellent. I was getting tired of tea myself."

The next day, Hyuk Mujin came to me with unexpected news.

"They want you to attend the banquet."

"Me?"

"Who else would they mean?"

I answered without a moment's thought.

"I don't want to."

Sitting around taking up space would only make me restless.

People would gawk at me like I was a monkey in a zoo, and my biggest fan, Prince Shangshan, would probably ask for an autograph.

I would much rather hole up in my pavilion, circulate my qi, and think about martial arts. That sounded a hundred times better.

"Just tell them I can't go."

“It was the Lesser Family Head’s order.”

“Even better. My brother won’t make a fuss, will he? Besides, wouldn’t people find it strange if my closed-door training ended after only three days?”

“Just tell them you gained some insight. If you say that’s what happened, who’s going to argue?”

“…”

He had a point.

I narrowed my eyes at Hyuk Mujin, who seemed to be getting more logical by the day.

“I’m still a patient.”

“You’ve already recovered. When I saw you this morning, nearly all your bruises were gone.”

Just as Hyuk Mujin said, most of the bruises that had covered my upper body had already disappeared.

Judging by that, cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow really had done something.

Of course, gaining more stats would have been far more useful from my perspective.

Hyuk Mujin scratched the back of his head as though this was giving him a headache.

“Why don’t you just go?”

“Tell them I’m still in pain. Who’s going to argue when I’m the one saying it hurts?”

“Great Hero Jeok.”

“Huh?”

“He said you should have recovered by now, so don’t even think about pulling anything. Otherwise, he’ll come here and drag you out himself.”

“Damn it. That old man is still at the banquet hall?”

“He drank with the Lesser Family Head all night, then showed up a moment ago completely wasted.”

I let out a deep sigh.

Jeok Cheongang had said he would remain at the Jin Family of Taiyuan only until this gathering ended.

According to the original schedule, he should have left yesterday. But more and more people had arrived, including several heavyweights, and the gathering had been extended. Naturally, so had his stay.

“Shit. Fine, let’s go. Let’s go.”

“Good choice. If you refused, I was going to be the one who died.”

I followed Hyuk Mujin, who was grinning foolishly, toward the banquet hall.

It was still crowded enough to make a marketplace look deserted, but perhaps because they had finally begun controlling admission, there were far fewer people than on the first day.

“We had no choice. More people kept coming every day. With that many eating and drinking from morning to night, the expense was one thing, but we simply ran out of room.”

“You should’ve turned more of them away. It still looks packed.”

“If we turn away any more, people will curse us. Everyone left is at least the head of a small martial arts academy.”

“So you’re preserving their pride?”

“Something like that. We even gave each person a gift when we sent away the people who had been here on the first day.”

They’re even managing grassroots opinion?

Whether it was all part of some careful calculation or simply an act of genuine kindness, Jin Wikyung was undeniably capable.

He was different from the other martial artists who put their pride and martial arts first. Could he be what you would call a bureaucrat-style martial artist?

Without such an excellent CEO at its head, the Jin Family of Taiyuan probably could never have risen to its current position.

“Hey, our youngest! My beloved little brother, you’ve come!”

“…”

Yes, he would have been perfect if not for things like this.

His face was bright red from all the liquor he had drunk. As Jin Wikyung bellowed from the seat of honor, laughter erupted throughout the hall.

He really went all out. He really did.

Jin Wikyung was a Peak master. He could have purged the alcohol with his internal energy, so the fact that he was this drunk meant he had never intended to sober himself up.

Jeok Cheongang, seated beside him, was in much the same state.

“I summoned you ages ago. Why are you only showing up now?”

“…I came right away.”

“Right away, my ass. You dragged your feet saying you wouldn’t come, then hurried over the moment you heard this old man was here.”

“…”

“No matter how far you run, you’re still in the palm of my hand. Stop spouting nonsense and sit down.”

The old man really was frighteningly perceptive.

I exchanged nods with the familiar faces in the hall, including Baek Museong and Lee Seowol, then cautiously made my way forward.

The instant I sat down beside Jeok Cheongang, a liquor cup the size of a rice bowl appeared in front of me.

“Drink.”

“Oh. Yes.”

I filled the bowl to the brim and drained it in one go. As I wiped my mouth with my sleeve, Jeok Cheongang thrust the liquor bottle toward me again.

“One more.”

“Yes.”

I drained another bowl.

“More.”

“…Again?”

“What did you say?”

“No. The liquor just tastes so good, that’s all.”

Something about this feels ominous.

In the end, I emptied an entire jar by myself in less than fifteen minutes. Only then did the corners of Jeok Cheongang’s mouth curl upward in satisfaction.

“That’s more like it. You need to drink at least this much.”

“…”

Why did this remind me of a story I had once seen online about a university freshman welcome party?

The difference was that the person forcing me to drink wasn’t some senior from a fossilized class year.[1053]

It was the Fire King.

This is brutal right from the start.

Still, I had cleared the first hurdle.

I was taking a moment to catch my breath while the thoroughly drunk Jeok Cheongang went to relieve himself when someone suddenly spoke to me.

“May I pour you a drink?”

The speaker was a solidly built, middle-aged man.

He had stern eyes and tightly pressed lips. He looked at me with an unreadable expression before continuing:

“I am Ak Bulgun of the Shandong Yue Family.”

The Shandong Yue Family?

I had heard the name several times, both in novels and since arriving in the Murim.

I bowed awkwardly.

[1053] In Korean university slang, a “fossil” is a student from a much older entering class who is still around campus.

“Ah, I’m—”

“I already know. Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. Though when I heard about you from the cadets last year, you didn’t have that nickname yet.”

“…Cadets?”

What was this man talking about?

Ak Bulgun smiled faintly at my bewilderment.

“Have you heard of Heaven’s Gate Temple? I serve as a spear Instructor there.”

“Oh.”

“I don’t know whether you’re aware, but your second brother is rather famous at the academy. Naturally, stories about you found their way there as well.”

I let out a quiet laugh.

Until three months ago, I had been called the disgrace of my family. I didn’t need to hear the stories to know exactly what they had been.

“I doubt they were very flattering.”

“Rumors in the martial world are not to be trusted. You yourself are proof of that.”

“Who knows?”

I answered vaguely and drank the liquor he poured for me.

“But what brings you here?”

“I came to attend to some business, but then I received word from the academy. One of our cadets said he was visiting his family for a short while, only to stop responding entirely. They ordered me to bring him back.”

“Jin Mukyung—I mean, my second brother.”

“That’s right. I hear he is undergoing closed-door training?”

When I nodded, Ak Bulgun stroked his beard.

“That’s troublesome. He’ll have to leave within seven days at the latest, no matter what. Did he give you any indication before entering seclusion?”

“No. He’s the sort who won’t stop until he’s satisfied.”

“I know. I have taught him myself.”

He sighed softly, then abruptly asked, “What about you?”

“Me?”

“Why not become a cadet at Heaven’s Gate Temple while you have the opportunity? Ah, if the rumor that you are studying under the Fire King is true, then pretend you never heard me.”

Heaven’s Gate Temple, out of nowhere.

I hadn’t expected that.

Heaven’s Gate Temple was practically a gateway to success, filled with talented people from across the world whose abilities had already been recognized, exceptional instructors, and countless opportunities.

I had heard that if a cadet met certain conditions, they could even learn advanced martial arts, as Jin Mukyung had.

If I stay at the Jin Family of Taiyuan, there's a limit to how far I can grow.

The incident with the Roaring Fury Swordsman had taught me that. No matter what I obtained, without the strength to protect it, I would only end up at someone else's mercy.

I needed a turning point if I wanted to become stronger, and Heaven's Gate Temple offered both safety and opportunity.

Unless I really am the Fire King's Disciple, this is the best option available to me right now.

When I did not answer immediately, Ak Bulgun continued.

"The admission period has already passed, but I can grant you special permission."

"Special permission?"

"You are an exceptional talent."

Ak Bulgun's rough palm came to rest on my shoulder.

"What do you say? Will you become a cadet at Heaven's Gate Temple? Someone like you would be welcomed with open arms by the higher-ups."

"I…"

Just as I opened my mouth, a voice cut through the air.

"Take your hand off."

"!"

A wave of scorching heat burst over us, carrying alcohol fumes so overpowering that my vision swam.

Yet there was not a trace of drunkenness in Jeok Cheongang's voice.

"I said take your hand off what's mine."

Chapter 199

"Take your hand off what's mine."

At Jeok Cheongang's words, the air grew heavy. A moment later, Ak Bulgun slowly removed his hand from my shoulder.

"Great Hero Jeok, I merely—"

A sharp voice cut him off.

"Who taught you to go around touching what belongs to someone else?"

Belongs to someone else?

Treating a person like an object was bad enough, but why was I the object in question? It wasn't as if I were Jeok Cheongang's Disciple or grandson.

I had been seriously considering Heaven's Gate Temple as a promising option. I hadn't expected him to come along and dump chili powder all over it.

What's gotten into this old man?

Unlike me, Ak Bulgun remained calm.

"I apologize for offending you, but I merely wished to offer Young Hero Jin an opportunity."

"An opportunity, my ass. You can dress it up however you like, but you're still trying to spirit him away behind my back. Did you think this old man wouldn't see through your filthy intentions?"

"Spirit him away? Certainly not."

"Then what?"

Even under Jeok Cheongang's fierce glare, Ak Bulgun continued without wavering.

"I came here not as a member of the Shandong Yue Family, but as an Instructor of Heaven's Gate Temple. In conveying the wishes of the academy's higher-ups, how could I allow personal feelings to influence me?"

"So those so-called higher-ups gave you those orders without even knowing what sort of relationship this boy and I have?"

"If I may be so bold, could I ask what exactly that relationship is?"

"What?"

Jeok Cheongang glared at Ak Bulgun, his face stiff.

"This old man entrusted that boy with our sect's divine artifact."

"I am well aware. I have heard all about it."

"Then you must know what that means. Are you mocking this old man?"

"How could I dare harbor such an intention? It is simply…"

Ak Bulgun looked back and forth between Jeok Cheongang and me.

"You do not appear to be master and Disciple at all, so I cautiously conveyed the offer."

"…"

"…"

We both flinched.

I didn't know how warm and affectionate the average master-Disciple relationship was supposed to be, but a Disciple probably didn't address his master as "Great Hero."

And Jeok Cheongang's treatment of me hadn't exactly suggested otherwise.

Damn, he's sharp.

We had been far too careless. When I glanced aside, I saw Jeok Cheongang chewing on his lip. Ak Bulgun's gaze deepened at our reaction.

"Young Hero Jin also hesitated when he heard the offer. Had he truly been your Disciple, he would have rejected it without a second thought."

Everything he said was true, so there was no way to argue.

Why would the Disciple of the Fire King—one of the handful of Supreme Peak masters beneath Heaven—ever enter Heaven's Gate Temple?

It would be like ignoring a lump of gold to pick up a pretty pebble.

Looks like the truth is coming out anyway.

The three of us weren't the only ones at the table of honor. Everyone else was looking away, but their ears were pricked.

Once word of today's conversation spread, my sturdy shield of being the Fire King's Disciple would vanish. And after that?

Every bastard under the sun will come crawling out.

Until recently, the Jin Family of Taiyuan had been little more than a fleshless skeleton.

But things were different now. We had put on a fair amount of meat, and the wolves would soon start prowling around us.

They would watch one another until the time was right, then pounce.

The Fire King was already over a hundred years old. His death would be the starting signal for those bastards to sink their teeth into us.

And the Zhongnan Sect will obviously be first in line.

I had to grow stronger before then. To do that, Heaven's Gate Temple was a hundred times better than the empty title of the Fire King's Disciple, an illusion that would disappear before long.

All right. I'm going to Heaven's Gate Temple.

Having made up my mind, I turned to Ak Bulgun.

"Actually, I…"

I have no relationship with Great Hero Jeok. We just happen to share a slight connection. I desperately want to enter Heaven's Gate Temple, so would someone like me qualify for a scholarship? Or perhaps the Shanxi Province rural special-admissions track?[1054]

All the words poised to pour out of me like a waterfall were dammed by a single sentence from Jeok Cheongang.

“He is my Disciple.”

“Great Hero Jeok and I have no relationship at all… Pardon?”

What the hell was he talking about?

I whipped around to stare at Jeok Cheongang.

What did he just say?

Ignoring my bewildered gaze, Jeok Cheongang continued as calmly as ever.

“I intended to keep him hidden until he was ready, but it seems that will no longer be possible. Everyone appears to have plenty to say on the matter, so I might as well settle it once and for all.”

“No, wait—”

The voice I had barely managed to force out was swallowed by Jeok Cheongang’s shout, charged with internal energy.

“I proclaim this to the Murim beneath Heaven!”

A terrifying wave of energy shook the ground and pressed down upon the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s estate. Every other sound vanished, and hundreds of pairs of eyes turned toward us.

It had happened before I even had a chance to stop it.

Veins bulged on Jeok Cheongang’s liver-spotted neck.

“I, Jeok Cheongang, eighteenth Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan, hereby accept Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan as my Disciple and name him heir to our sect’s orthodox lineage!”

A brief silence followed. Then those who understood his words erupted into thunderous exclamations and cheers.

It was the moment when everyone’s lingering suspicions became fact—and one old man’s perfect bullshit became reality.

And I…

“I have committed a grave discourtesy. I apologize to you as well, Young Hero Jin. I will convey the news properly to Heaven’s Gate Temple. No one would dare interfere with Great Hero Jeok’s Disciple, so even the Temple Master will surely abandon the idea.”

Every path into Heaven’s Gate Temple—or to becoming anyone else’s Disciple—had just been slammed shut.

Ak Bulgun chuckled at my devastated expression.

“Look at you. Why the long face on such a joyous day?”

[1054] This refers to a Korean special-admissions category for applicants from rural areas.

"…"

Because I knew perfectly well that there wasn't even a one-percent chance Jeok Cheongang would actually take me as his Disciple.

I had gained absolutely nothing, yet my entire future had been blocked off. My clenched fists trembled.

Damn old man.

I could already see my bleak future unfolding before me. He wouldn't teach me a single martial art, but he would torment me, beat me up, and send me on every petty errand imaginable.

At best, I would become an Inventory for storing his belongings.

I'm screwed.

Congratulations poured in from all around the table of honor, but I didn't hear a word of them.

Jeok Cheongang spread his arms wide, wearing a thoroughly fake smile.

"Come. Let your master give you a hug, my dear Dis. ci. ple."

"…"

"Oh, look at this rascal. Shy because everyone's watching, are you? Ho ho ho."

Laughing heartily, Jeok Cheongang secretly crooked a finger.

At that moment, an irresistible force unlike anything I had ever felt seized my ankle.

One step. Two steps.

My feet began moving toward him against my will.

…Seizing an Object Through Empty Space?

Was this really happening?

The tiny old man finally pulled me into a tight embrace and moved his lips.

"Hey. Smile."

"…Yes."

"Put your arm around my shoulders. Get those corners of your mouth up to your ears."

Fuck it. Whatever happens, happens.

With our arms around each other's shoulders, we beamed like a loving master and Disciple. Instead of camera flashes, thunderous cheers rained down around us.

And that day, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao received a hyper-rare, limited-edition autograph:

Fire King & Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi.

Late that night, darkness lay thick over the estate.

Standing behind a secluded wall on the Jin Family of Taiyuan's grounds, I finally spoke.

"Why are you doing this to me?"

The small silhouette gave no answer.

"Protecting the Jin Family of Taiyuan? Fine. I'm grateful for that. I'm grateful that you drove those Zhongnan bastards away, too. But!"

"…"

"You're blocking my future! This has gotten so out of hand that I can't enter Heaven's Gate Temple anymore, and I can't take anyone else as my master either! Do you know why?"

Jeok Cheongang, who had been silently drinking straight from a liquor bottle, answered.

"Because no matter how foolhardy someone might be, they would never approach this old man's Disciple."

"Yes, exactly! Great Hero Jeok, you've completely blocked every path ahead of me!"

"I see."

"That's not the point! You're more than smart enough to know better, so why are you doing this? I have to make a living, too!"

Glug. Glug. Buuurp.

Jeok Cheongang drained the bottle to the last drop, let out a tremendous belch, and stared at me.

"You know better yourself, so why are you acting this way?"

"Pardon?"

The liquor bottle in his hand suddenly struck the wall.

Whoosh—BOOM!

Ordinarily, the bottle should have shattered with a sharp crash.

Instead, the wall exploded with a deafening roar.

The round liquor bottle was already rippling with tangible internal energy.

"Have you forgotten who this old man is? Why, you little—are you trying to die?"

"Gasp!"

"Even a full prostration wouldn't be enough, and you dare raise your voice? You wet-behind-the-ears little bastard, I ought to…"

"W-Wait! Calm down! Please calm down!"

"Calm down? Would you like to lie nice and still in a grave until your bones turn to dust?"

"…"

I had briefly forgotten.

The old man in front of me might have looked like the head honcho at a nursing home, but he was a notorious thug in the Murim.

Then I remembered that what he extorted from people wasn't money, but their lives. The blood in my veins seemed to turn cold.

I hit the wrong nerve.

The night was already dark, but now my vision went black as well.

Then Jeok Cheongang, who had been staring at me, abruptly spoke.

"Do you hate it that much?"

"Pardon?"

"Is taking this old man as your master truly so unbearable?"

"…"

What the hell was he talking about when he had no intention of making me his Disciple?

I had plenty to say, but keeping my mouth shut was clearly the better way to extend my lifespan.

Unfortunately, Jeok Cheongang had no intention of letting me stand there in silence, avoiding his gaze.

"Tell me."

"W-What?"

"Judging by your expression, you have plenty on your mind. Tell me what you're thinking."

"I don't have anything like that."

"You don't?"

BOOM!

What remained of the wall crumbled into dust and scattered.

I stared blankly at it, then hurriedly opened my mouth.

"Now that I think about it, I do."

"You just said you didn't."

"I didn't, but it turns out I did."

"Fine. Tell me."

I had blurted it out in a panic, but now that I actually had to speak, my heart shriveled. I fidgeted with my fingers and cleared my throat.

"Well, the thing is, it's a little…"

"Speak frankly. I want your honest answer, without a single lie."

"Really?"

"No matter what you say, I won't touch a hair on your head. I swear it by the gods of Heaven and Earth."

"You don't believe in the gods of Heaven and Earth."

"…"

"…"

I must have hit the nail on the head.

Jeok Cheongang glared at me with a terrifying expression before finally forcing the words out.

"I started believing today. I don't know what damned bastard is up there in the heavens, but I saw something with my own eyes, so now I have no choice."

"…?"

I had no idea what he had seen, but he sounded sincere.

Only after making him stake the honor of his sect and his own name as well did I cautiously begin.

"First of all, your personality is a little…"

"A little?"

"Nasty, isn't it?"

"…"

"Actually, it's very nasty."

He looked incredulous, but the liquor bottle in his hand remained still. Emboldened, I continued.

"And you've got a nasty habit of hitting people."

"…"

"You remember what happened a few days ago, right? I know I was partly at fault, but does it make any sense to launch a Flame Divine Palm at me without warning?"

"…Go on."

"I'm not opposed to a reasonable amount of discipline, but that means a flick on the forehead or a few strokes with a switch. What kind of Disciple wants to train while getting hit with the Flame Divine Palm? That isn't the rod of love. It's the rod of death. The rod of death. One wrong hit and I'll die, I'm telling you."

Once I started, everything came pouring out as if a dam had burst.

Beginning with my first encounter with Jeok Cheongang, I aired every complaint I had accumulated since. The longer I went on, the stiffer his face became.

Still, this feels pretty damn good.

A quarter of an hour later, when my stormy confession finally ended, Jeok Cheongang asked in a subdued voice,

"Are you finished?"

"There's still one important thing left."

"That… phew."

Contrary to my expectations, the liquor bottle didn't come flying. Jeok Cheongang merely heaved several deep sighs.

"Say it."

"My biggest complaint is what I mentioned earlier. Why did you publicly declare me your Disciple when you aren't even going to teach me martial arts?"

"Is that the problem?"

"Of course it is! If I'm going to teach myself, entering Heaven's Gate Temple would be a hundred times better."

"Learning from this old man is a thousand times better than entering Heaven's Gate Temple."

"…"

Did he think I didn't know that?

I stared at him in disbelief. Then a thought suddenly flashed through my mind.

"Great Hero Jeok, could it be…?"

Jeok Cheongang replied curtly.

"What?"

"Never mind. I just had a ridiculous thought."

"Say it."

"No, there's no point. Let's just forget it."

"Say it if you don't want to die."

Oh. Then I had to say it. If I didn't want to die, I absolutely had to say it.

I gave a dry laugh.

"I wondered if perhaps you were actually thinking of taking me as a real Disciple, or something like that. It's nonsense, so you don't have to answer. Hahaha."

"…"

"Hahaha."

"…"

"Great Hero Jeok?"

Jeok Cheongang remained silent for a long while despite my calling him, then tossed out a single sentence.

"Would that be a problem?"

"What would?"

"I asked if there was something wrong with this old man being your master."

"…Pardon?"

What the hell was with this atmosphere?

Chapter 200

“I asked if there was something wrong with this old man being your master.”

“Pardon?”

What the hell was he talking about? Taken out of context, that line could put a romance-drama male lead to shame.

I covered my vital areas and slowly backed away.

“What?”

“N-Nothing. But what do you mean?”

“Forget it. Pretend you never heard me.”

Jeok Cheongang’s expression was an odd mix of inexplicable hope, irritation, and disappointment. He stared at me for a moment, then abruptly said, “You possess the Heavenly Martial Physique.”

“Heavenly Martial what?”

Jeok Cheongang frowned at my reaction.

“You don’t know about the Heavenly Martial Physique? Are you making fun of this old man?”

“I’ve never heard of it in my life.”

“…Heaven truly is heartless. How could it give such a thing to someone like you?”

He looked like he genuinely wanted to hit me.

Jeok Cheongang trembled as he clutched his liquor bottle, then let out a sigh.

“Then do you know anything about the Nine Yin Severed Meridians?”

“Oh, the Nine Yin Severed Meridians. I know about that.”

I had seen it plenty of times before. Did I have it right?

I rummaged through my old memories and pulled out a few keywords related to the Nine Yin Severed Meridians.

“An unusual constitution. Sickly. Smart. Dies young.”

“…”

“Am I wrong?”

“You have the gist of it. It is a type of severed-meridian condition in which powerful innate yin energy blocks the meridians and soon leads to death.”

“Then what about the Heavenly Martial Physique?”

Unease began creeping into my chest. The fact that he had brought up the Nine Yin Severed Meridians as an example only made it worse.

What if it lets me learn martial arts quickly, but there’s something wrong with my body that makes me die young? That would be a disaster.

Jeok Cheongang spoke with a solemn expression.

"The Heavenly Martial Physique is a martial constitution bestowed by Heaven, one that might appear only once every several hundred years."

A constitution bestowed by Heaven? It sounded incredible just hearing about it.

Which only made me more nervous. The Nine Yin Severed Meridians were practically a double-edged sword that traded genius-level intelligence for a short lifespan.

I stared tensely at Jeok Cheongang's mouth.

"And?"

"What do you mean, 'and'?"

"When am I going to die?"

"Why would you die?"

"I think I've been having headaches and feeling nauseous lately. My bones and joints ache even now."

Doctor Choi Tae—no, Jeok Cheongang—gave me a short and concise diagnosis.

"That's because this old man beat you."

"Oh."

"You didn't seriously think the Heavenly Martial Physique makes you die young like the Nine Yin Severed Meridians, did you?"

"Ahem."

"What kind of lunatic are you?"

Jeok Cheongang shook his head in disbelief.

"The Heavenly Martial Physique is as different from a severed-meridian condition like the Nine Yin Severed Meridians as Heaven is from Earth. Do you think it's called a gift from Heaven for no reason? You were blessed by heavenly fortune from the moment you were born with that body."

"Me?"

"I heard from the Lesser Family Head that you have only been seriously learning martial arts for three months. Do you truly believe your achievements so far were possible through effort alone?"

"Not really."

"You are where you are because you possess a constitution that allows you to make any martial art your own faster than anyone else."

Jeok Cheongang was only half right.

I didn't bother correcting him because what had supplemented my efforts wasn't an innate constitution. It was the System.

If I really possessed the Heavenly Martial Physique, I wouldn't have remained Third Rate until I turned twenty.

A promising tree showed its potential from the moment it sprouted.

If the real Jin Taekyung—the previous owner of this body—had been born with such heavenly fortune, he would surely have distinguished himself long ago.

This body doesn't possess the Heavenly Martial Physique.

I looked down at my hands. The size and length of my arms and hands, the shape of my muscles, and the strength hidden within them.

Everything was perfectly balanced, without the slightest deviation.

The System.

The points I gained from leveling up and training were converted into stats, and the System distributed those stats evenly.

Every tiny, delicate gear inside my body meshed perfectly with the rest.

Since it isn't innate, it isn't exactly the Heavenly Martial Physique… But at this point, could I call it an acquired Heavenly Martial Physique?

Jeok Cheongang had seen my body with his own eyes, so it wasn't strange that he had mistaken it for one.

And from my perspective, it was better to let him keep making that mistake.

It had taken only three months for a Third Rate wastrel who did nothing but drink to become a Peak master.

Without the Heavenly Martial Physique as an explanation, it wouldn't have been strange for people to suspect me of practicing demonic martial arts.

Either way, this worked out nicely.

The fact that even a Supreme Peak master like Jeok Cheongang could mistake my constitution for the Heavenly Martial Physique proved beyond doubt that my bones and muscles were exceptional.

And since I had none of the side effects associated with the Nine Yin Severed Meridians, this was an absolute win.

Is the road ahead finally lined with flowers?

When I thought about everything I had suffered until now, tears welled in my eyes.

I was lost in emotion when I sensed someone staring at me and turned my head.

Jeok Cheongang flinched when our eyes met, then abruptly looked up at the sky.

"T-The moon is bright."

I followed his gaze and mumbled:

"There are thick clouds covering it."

"…"

"Did you have something to say?"

"Ahem."

After repeatedly clearing his throat, Jeok Cheongang cautiously spoke.

"As you know, this old man owes you a debt."

"So?"

“I want to settle that debt properly before I leave this place. Is there anything you want from this old man?”

Honestly, nothing in particular came to mind.

If I had to name one thing, it would be for him to take back what he had said earlier.

But there was no chance Jeok Cheongang would do that. His pride wouldn’t allow it. I had to come up with a reasonable request that he could actually grant.

I scratched my head.

“Well, I haven’t really thought about it in detail, so I’m not sure.”

“Then think about it in detail.”

“Oh, I’ll tell you later if anything comes to mind. You’ll be staying for a few more days before you leave anyway.”

But Jeok Cheongang was firm.

“Right now.”

“Pardon?”

“I said tell me right now. There’s hardly anything to think about, is there?”

As he pressed me for an answer, Jeok Cheongang added in a mumble, “F-For example, perhaps you want to learn martial arts from this old man. Or you want to learn martial arts from this old man. Or you want to learn martial arts from this old man. Something like that.”

“…”

“It was only an example. Pay it no mind.”

“…”

“Ahem. Is there phlegm stuck in my throat? Ahem!”

I watched him for a moment before speaking.

“Great Hero Jeok. I’m only asking just in case.”

“Ahem! Ahem!”

“Do you want to take me as your Disciple?”

Jeok Cheongang froze in the middle of his violent coughing fit. His pupils shook as though caught in an earthquake.

“W-What are you talking about?”

“You heard me.”

“H-How absurd. You think this old man wants to take you as his Disciple?”

“…”

Yes. That’s exactly what it looks like.

At first, I had wondered if I was imagining things, but by this point, anyone who still didn’t get it would have to be a fucking idiot.

When I merely stared at him without saying anything, Jeok Cheongang was the one who grew flustered.

“You little bastard! What is that insolent look in your eyes?”

“I’m just looking at you. Don’t worry about it.”

“You seem to be laboring under a grave misconception, but you’re entirely wrong.”

“Right. Sure.”

“Do you think I would choose the heir to our sect, with its long and venerable history, so easily?”

“You chose one pretty easily earlier. And you said it in front of all those people, so you can’t take it back now.”

“Th-That… I can simply take another Disciple.”

“You said it was a single-successor, no-outside-transmission tradition, didn’t you? Either way, everyone in the world will think I’m the heir to the Fire Gate Clan.”

Struck right at the heart of the matter, Jeok Cheongang shrieked, “There isn’t a single reason for me to take you as my Disciple!”

“I possess the Heavenly Martial Physique.”

“Gasp.”

“It took me about three months to go from Third Rate to Peak. I wonder how long it’ll take me to reach Supreme Peak.”

“Y-You bastard. Do you think it’s that easy? Do you think Supreme Peak is some mutt’s name?”

“It was easy for me.”

“…”

How many times had I come within an inch of death?

It had been brutally difficult and painful, but from this point onward, it was going to be easy. No matter what.

While Jeok Cheongang struggled to find words, I muttered as though talking to myself.

“Actually, Supreme Peak might be difficult.”

“O-Of course it is.”

“Maybe by thirty?”

Jeok Cheongang’s mouth fell open.

“Th-Thirty? Supreme Peak?”

“Did I give myself too long? I deliberately padded it because it sounded difficult.”

I sighed and glanced sideways at him.

“Still, you must have been much faster than me, Great Hero Jeok. You’re powerful enough to rank among the Ten Kings, after all. And you had the Fire Gate Clan’s martial arts, too. Wow, I’m jealous. If I learned high-level martial arts like those, I’d become strong in no time.”

"!"

Jeok Cheongang stared at me with trembling eyes. I could easily imagine what was playing out in his head.

What would happen if the Heavenly Martial Physique met the Fire Gate Clan's supreme martial arts?

I had already displayed unbelievable achievements in only three months. It was possible that an unprecedented monster, unlike anything seen in history, would be born.

I'm almost there.

His pride kept him from saying the words aloud, so I drove in the final nail.

"Actually, this won't do. I'm thinking of visiting Huashan once this gathering ends."

"H-Huashan? Why would you go there?"

"Because of Great Hero Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint. I hear the two of you are quite close. If I explain my circumstances properly, I might be able to become his Disciple without letting word get out…"

"No!"

The shout burst from him before he could stop it. Jeok Cheongang flinched and swallowed dryly.

"If you are perhaps considering it…"

"Pardon? I can't hear you. You're speaking too quietly."

"Whew."

Jeok Cheongang steadied his breathing and tried again.

"If you're interested, this old man could personally oversee your martial arts training."

I widened my eyes in feigned surprise.

"Are you serious?"

"Of course. A debt must be repaid, mustn't it?"

Perhaps he had belatedly decided that he needed to maintain his dignity. His voice was more stern than it had been until now.

It's already too late for that, old man.

Barely holding back a laugh, I replied, "What you've already done is more than enough."

"It is this old man's principle to repay a debt tenfold, even twentyfold."

"I see."

"Exactly."

"But aren't you leaving in a few days anyway? You seem very busy."

"It can be postponed. I plan to leave once you have achieved a certain level of progress."

"Ah, so you're the type who sees things through once you start."

“It is simply my nature.”

“What if I fail to reach the level you want, Great Hero Jeok?”

Jeok Cheongang deliberately hardened his expression.

“Now listen here, you little bastard! Why are you already assuming you’ll fail?”

“I’m sorry. I just don’t know how many years it might take.”

“Did you already forget what sort of person I said I was?”

“The kind who sees things through once you start?”

“Once a martial artist draws his sword, he should see it through—even if he has to cut down a mountain.”

“Wow, that’s impressive. As expected of you, Great Hero Jeok!”

I gave him a thumbs-up, then asked in a suggestive tone, “But at this point, doesn’t that make us master and Disciple?”

“!”

After a brief silence, Jeok Cheongang shook his head vigorously.

“Master and Disciple? What nonsense! I am merely repaying a debt.”

“Ah, I see. I misunderstood your intentions, Great Hero Jeok. Please accept my sincere apologies.”

“…Ahem.”

Jeok Cheongang coughed uncomfortably before continuing.

“But I think we need to change the way you address me.”

“The way I address you?”

“Although we are not, well, truly master and Disciple, people are watching. Shouldn’t we at least keep up appearances?”

“That’s true.”

The way I address him? What should I call him?

After a moment’s thought, one word slipped from my mouth.

“Then should I call you Master from now on?”

“…”

“Master?”

“H-Huh?”

Jeok Cheongang came to his senses as though he had just woken up and stared at me with a complicated, subtle gaze.

“Yes. That would be good.”

“Yes. Then when it’s just the two of us…”

“Old Master. Call me that.”

“Understood, Old Master.”

I bowed deeply to him.

The Supreme Peak master whose fame resounded throughout the world, Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

It was the moment my subtle relationship with him began.

After sending Jin Taekyung away, Jeok Cheongang leaned back against an old wall.

The voice he had just heard echoed endlessly through his mind.

Master.

It had been ten years.

Ten years since anyone had called him Master.

Jin Taekyung's build, face, and personality were all different, yet the sight of him reminded Jeok Cheongang of his dead Disciple.

As Jeok Cheongang quietly sank into thought, a faint smile suddenly appeared at the corner of his wrinkled mouth.

Not bad.

He had never imagined things would turn out this way, but he did not dislike it.

No, he even found himself looking forward to what lay ahead, filled with an inexplicable sense of cheer.

"Not bad. Not bad at all."

Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh and looked up at the sky.

At some point, the dark clouds had parted, revealing a bright moon.

Chapter 201

"It's been hard to catch sight of you lately."

"Tell me about it. These days, I can't tell whether I'm a bodyguard or a chief steward."

Jin Wikyung laughed quietly at Wipeng's complaint.

"Bear with it for a few more days. More importantly, how did those matters we discussed turn out?"

"Everything is proceeding smoothly. The Sect Leaders we brought into the fold are obedient, and the local authorities and merchant world are actively cooperating."

If the Jin Family of Taiyuan was a ship sailing with a favorable wind, Jin Wikyung was its seasoned captain.

Starting with securing the loyalty of the smaller and mid-sized sects on the first day of the gathering, he had handled one major issue after another.

The Fire King kept the Murim side in line, while Prince Shangshan, a member of the imperial family, did the same with the authorities. As a result, there had been no trouble at all.

As for the merchant world, that went without saying.

Merchants were more sensitive to profit than anyone. Once they smelled money, it was only natural for them to come running.

After quickly organizing his thoughts, Jin Wikyung asked Wipeng, "What about the budget? How much do you think we'll have left?"

"We're short."

"What?"

The corners of Wipeng's mouth rose at Jin Wikyung's startled expression.

"I mean we're short on warehouses to store all the wealth."

"…Phew."

"Two warehouses were already full two days ago. Everything that has come in since then is being stored in empty pavilions."

Jin Wikyung released a sigh of relief and gave a quiet laugh.

"What a windfall."

"Great Hero Jeok's announcement yesterday was decisive. It finally convinced those who had remained uncertain until the very end."

"They're the real heavyweights."

"Indeed."

The wider a person's connections, the more likely they were to get pricked by thorns.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan was clearly a goose laying golden eggs, but there were also powerful sects and great families—including the Zhongnan Sect—with which it had an uneasy relationship because of the Fire King.

"That must be why Seok Family Manor suddenly requested a private meeting after remaining quiet all this time."

Seok Family Manor was a giant that held tremendous sway over the merchant world.

The fact that they had finally stepped forward proved how certain they were of the Jin Family of Taiyuan's potential.

"Weighing their options is what they do best. Since they came late, they'll make up for it with a generous gift."

"They'd better. Show them in."

"Yes, my lord."

Not long after Wipeng left, a plump middle-aged man entered the office.

"Oh, my! Lesser Family Head! How long has it been?"

"It's been a long time, Chief Ha."

The middle-aged man was an Outer Steward of Seok Family Manor. Though he was only one of five, he wielded immense authority.

Jin Wikyung smiled gently at the man as he repeatedly wiped away his sweat.

"It's been three years since we last met. How is your Lord?"

"He's as hale and hearty as a young man in his prime. As it happens, he heard the wonderful news and wishes to meet you. As you know, Lesser Family Head, he wasn't feeling well the last time…"

"Yes, I remember. Quite clearly."

Jin Wikyung vividly remembered that day three years ago.

He had waited a full fifteen days before being granted a private audience, only to leave Seok Family Manor as though he had been chased out without ever seeing the Lord's face.

Finding the sedan chair of a high-ranking official outside Seok Family Manor's main gate had been a coincidence.

That was what he had chosen to believe.

That's how the Murim works.

But now their positions had changed.

The past three years had been short but eventful, and the arrogant Outer Steward who had once treated him like a beggar had somehow become a humble merchant.

So he does know how to speak politely. That's a first.

With a strange sense of amusement, Jin Wikyung listened attentively to Chief Ha.

He readily accepted Seok Family Manor's proposal to enter the Shanxi merchant world in earnest with the cooperation of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Naturally, the details would need to be reviewed, but Seok Family Manor's offer was extraordinarily generous.

"You've made a better offer than I expected. Generous enough to make me wonder whether this is really all right."

Chief Ha rubbed his hands together and laughed.

"I'm a merchant to the bone. I never conduct business at a loss."

There were different levels among merchants.

A Third Rate merchant exchanged goods. A Second Rate merchant purchased goods that could leave him a profit. A First Rate merchant bought the future.

Seok Family Manor was one of the greatest merchant houses in the world. They were aiming not for an immediate profit, but for returns dozens of times greater in the years to come.

You won't make that much off us. Our family will never dance to your tune.

In stark contrast to his thoughts, Jin Wikyung smiled broadly.

Life was not so easy that one could say whatever one wished and reveal every honest feeling. That was especially true when dealing with a cunning merchant.

"I'll arrange a place for you to stay. We can discuss the finer details then."

"Thank you, Lesser Family Head."

Chief Ha was about to rise from his seat when he stopped.

"Um…"

"Is there something else?"

"This is a difficult request, but might I be allowed to meet Great Hero Jeok?"

Being an Outer Steward of Seok Family Manor was a position of considerable authority, but the Fire King was an exception. Since arriving at the Jin Family of Taiyuan, Jeok Cheongang had not granted a private audience to a single honored guest.

Chief Ha continued wiping away his sweat.

"It has proved extraordinarily difficult. I tried visiting him myself, and I even sent a subordinate to discreetly request a meeting, but…"

"Oh, dear. Great Hero Jeok probably didn't take that well."

"Indeed. My man came back nearly crippled. That is why I have shamelessly come to ask you for this favor, Lesser Family Head."

Suppressing his laughter, Jin Wikyung replied, "I'm not sure. It might be possible after the gathering ends, but the next few days will be difficult."

"I noticed he hasn't been seen since yesterday. May I ask why?"

"He must be instructing my second younger brother."

"Ah, I see. My apologies for intruding."

Once Chief Ha had left the office, Jin Wikyung could no longer hold back his laughter.

The exhaustion weighing on his body and mind after several days of hosting the gathering seemed to lift all at once. In a cheerful voice, he called for his most trusted subordinate.

“Wipeng. Who’s next?”

It was early morning, before the sun had even risen.

The person who woke me was neither Hyuk Mujin nor Cheongpung.

Splash!

“Gah!”

The first thing I saw after opening my eyes to the cold-water ambush was Jeok Cheongang, glaring at me with his eyes wide open.

“W-What are you doing?”

“You slept like the dead until this hour. Are you out of your mind?”

“I only slept for two shichen.[1055] How is that sleeping like the dead?”

Jeok Cheongang launched into a lecture as I stared at him in disbelief.

“In four hours, you bastard, this old man could swing a weapon a thousand more times. And where did you learn the disrespect of not even paying your morning respects to your Master?”

“…Master?”

Jeok Cheongang flinched and stammered for a moment.

“W-We need to look that way to other people, don’t we?”

“…”

“To avoid suspicion, we need to act like a real master! Like a real Disciple! That’s the bare minimum!”

“Ah, yes.”

So the pioneer of method acting in the Murim was right here.

At my lukewarm response, Jeok Cheongang’s face turned bright red.

“Regardless, I won’t stand for you loafing around like this. Come with me. Now.”

“Where?”

“There’s a place this old man has picked out.”

I assumed he had found a secluded training ground, but Jeok Cheongang led me out of the Jin Family estate altogether and into a nearby mountain.

[1055] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[1056] One meter is approximately 3.28 ft.

Trees with trunks easily several meters[1056] around grew thickly in every direction, and the ground was firm.

"This will do."

Jeok Cheongang stopped in a wide clearing and set the pack slung across his back on a tree stump.

"What's that?"

"Never mind that. It's something we'll use later."

"Later?"

"Yes. Things that will make you writhe with pleasure."

"…"

Why was I suddenly thinking of whips, candlesticks, and masks?

As I cast an anxious sidelong glance at the pack, Jeok Cheongang spoke sternly.

"Stop sticking your nose where it doesn't belong and take out your spear."

"Ah, yes."

I'd had the good sense to bring several spears, and I planted them in the ground.

The reason Jeok Cheongang had come to find me so early was obvious.

Training.

Though he tried hard not to show it, Jeok Cheongang wanted to take me as his Disciple.

He kept stubbornly denying it because he still wasn't certain himself.

He's already made one painful mistake.

The wound Jopil had left in Jeok Cheongang's heart had not yet healed.

That was why he would surely keep watching and weighing whether he could accept someone like me as his Disciple before making his decision.

Even if he doesn't pass down the Fire Gate Clan's supreme martial arts right away, he'll still do his best to teach me.

This was guidance from a Supreme Peak master.

A single word of advice from someone who had gone farther down this path than I had was worth more than a thousand pieces of gold.

I lifted a well-balanced iron spear and swallowed.

"What do I do now?"

"Come at me."

"Pardon?"

"I said come at me. Use all your strength."

A smile spread across Jeok Cheongang's wrinkled lips.

"Thirty minutes. If you can make this old man retreat even one step, you win."

Ding.

Failure: ???

Make him retreat one step?

At first glance, it seemed easy, but there was a reason it was a Peak-Grade Quest.

Especially when the opponent was Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

I looked away from the Quest window and found Jeok Cheongang waiting with a relaxed expression.

“All right. Begin.”

Beep.

SYSTEM

29:59

The moment the time-limit window appeared in the air, I kicked off the ground and charged toward him.

Whoosh!

Whoosh!

The spearhead tore through the air. Compressed air burst outward, sending the old man’s white hair flying.

Jeok Cheongang dodged Jin Taekyung’s first thrust and thought,

What is this kid?

Fast.

And the spear carried enough force to shatter a boulder.

Even Jeok Cheongang, who had already examined Jin Taekyung’s body once, had not anticipated such speed and strength.

Whirl—whoosh! Boom!

Second strike, third, fourth…

He stabbed, slashed, and swept upward.

Every time Jeok Cheongang evaded the shower of spearheads pouring down like torrential rain, his astonishment grew like a snowball.

He's seasoned. As if he were born on a battlefield.

He was only twenty-one. Yet the trajectories and movements traced by his spearhead were no worse than those of any famous master in the martial world.

No. If anything, they were better.

Having encountered countless martial artists during the Great Faction War, Jeok Cheongang had learned one thing well.

A true martial artist is forged through countless real battles.

The Nine Sects and One Gang.

The Five Great Families.

They were unquestionably great powers that held sway over the world, but only a small number of their members had ever survived at the brink of death.

That was why the Demonic Cult, which had grown through conquest and the principle of Might Makes Right, had managed to swallow half the Central Plains.

How many disciples of prestigious great sects had died at the beginning of the war?

But this kid is different.

There was nothing hollow in his opening stance, and not a trace of hesitation.

The spearhead relentlessly seeking every vital point on his body and those cold, hardened eyes were badges worn only by those who had fought countless real battles and seen blood.

Shriek—whoosh!

The spinning spearhead vibrated.

Humm. Humm. Humm.

It sounded like hundreds of bees beating their wings, and the spearhead shooting toward him was sharper than a venomous stinger.

He's only been practicing martial arts for three months? This kid?

Judging by his movements alone, it looked more like three years.

No, thirty.

Jeok Cheongang knew nothing of the seven years Jin Taekyung had spent steeped in battle. He could only marvel.

…What an incredible kid.

Jeok Cheongang himself had spent his entire life obsessed with martial arts.

Yet even for someone who had achieved a great realm, what Jin Taekyung was displaying now was incomprehensible.

The greatest martial talent in history, was it?

Remembering Jin Wikyung's words, Jeok Cheongang's figure trembled with joy and awe.

Yes. You were right.

Overcome by the lingering emotion, he slowly closed his eyes.

Whoosh!

A streak of light shot toward his chest.

Jeok Cheongang's eyes snapped half-open. At the same time, his wrinkled hand seized the spearhead.

Crack!

His hands blazed with red flames, crushing and melting the spearhead.

Molten metal dripped onto the ground hardened by the cold wind.

"…Wow, shit. Isn't that cheating?"

Jin Taekyung muttered in disbelief.

Jeok Cheongang grinned at him.

"We're just getting started."

Chapter 202

Half an hour. A full thirty minutes.

Even if my opponent was the Fire King, I'd thought that if I put everything I had into it, I could make him retreat a little—just a little.

At least, I had until a moment ago.

How does that make any sense?

I backed away, appalled.

He had caught a spearhead spinning with internal energy in his bare hand. That made about as much sense as sticking your hand into a grinder.

But when that hand belonged to Fire King Jeok Cheongang, things were different.

Drip. Hiss.

Steam rose as molten metal struck the ground. Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue at the sight.

"Maybe it melted so quickly because it was scrap iron. You must have come into plenty of money this time, so tell them to use better iron."

"H-How did you do that?"

"You can do it too."

"Me?"

"Of course. Once you possess at least two jiazi's worth of internal energy[1057] and master our sect's martial arts to their utmost limits."

"…"

"Easy, right?"

As if.

When I stared at him in disbelief, Jeok Cheongang opened his mouth and let out a huge yawn.

"Taking it easy, aren't you? If I were you, I'd spend that time swinging my spear one more time."

"I was just about to."

I glanced at the time limit floating in the air and pulled out another spear.

Sixteen minutes remained. Nearly half the time had already passed.

I only need to make him retreat one step. Just one step…

But that was easier said than done.

I glared at Jeok Cheongang, who still stood leisurely in the same spot, and drew a deep breath.

"Huuup—"

Whoosh!

[1057] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; two jiazi are 120 years.

I kicked off the ground and charged. One long stride erased the distance between us, and I thrust out my spear.

Screeeech!

The corners of Jeok Cheongang's mouth rose as he watched me.

"I believe I said we were just getting started."

Boom!

He stamped his foot once.

The effect was terrifying.

The ground shook as though an earthquake had struck, and a flock of birds perched on the bare branches took flight.

In the slowed-down world, Jeok Cheongang's hand blurred for an instant and struck away dozens of stones floating in the air.

Straight toward me.

Shishishishik!

Dozens of stones, each propelled by internal energy. Every one of them was as deadly as a concealed weapon.

They must have carried even greater destructive power than the Head Elder's finger-flicking technique I had faced in the past.

But…

I've grown stronger too.

Humm. Humm. Humm.

My spear let out a deep hum.

I felt a unity with it on an entirely different level from when I had still been First Rate.

The Jin Family's Spear Technique, which had already reached Great Completion, and my footwork technique had merged into perfect harmony.

The insight I had gained from crossing the wall of the Peak realm flowed through them, revealing spear paths I could never have imagined before.

And then there were my increased stats.

I can do this.

Crack.

The spear shaft buckled beneath my crushing grip.

Then, in the next instant—

Whoooosh!

The power compressed like a spring exploded outward. Wind burst from the spearhead's arc as I swung it sideways with all my strength.

It was internal energy unleashed—and a storm of my own making.

Pssshhh.

Fine dust scattered in every direction, the last remnants of the stones caught in the spear's path.

"Well, look at you."

The obstacle was gone. Now it was time to hit him.

I charged at Jeok Cheongang, whose expression was equal parts disbelief and delight.

Whoosh! Shishishishik!

The spearhead, brimming with internal energy, tore through the air.

Jeok Cheongang dipped lightly at the waist to evade it. At the same time, heat surged from his right hand.

Whoom!

Blazing flames shot toward me—a mass of condensed Scorching Yang Qi.

I gritted my teeth and swung the spear shaft.

Clang! Krrrra-boom!

A deafening roar erupted, and tremendous force and heat engulfed my entire body. Jeok Cheongang burst into laughter at the sight of me standing there, charred black from head to toe.

"What kind of idiot tries to knock that away?"

"…Hah. I almost had it."

"Don't make me laugh. If this old man had used his full strength, you would have died just now."

I answered sullenly.

"I knocked it away because I thought I could."

"And that's why you look like that?"

"…I didn't know this would happen."

"I'll give you credit for staying on your feet—and for actually blocking it."

"But weren't you only supposed to defend?"

"Who told you that?"

Damn. Come to think of it, he hadn't.

I ripped off my half-charred shirt and tossed it aside.

"For someone bearing the mighty title of Fire King, aren't you using a little too much force against a kid young enough to be your grandson?"

"You're still wet behind the ears, yet you swing a spear at an old man old enough to be your great-grandfather? And you call yourself the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?"

"You're a Supreme Peak master, Old Master!"

"You possess the Heavenly Martial Physique."

"Do you seriously call that mal?"

"If it isn't mal—words—then is it a foal?"[1058]

"…"

"What? Why are you looking at me like that?"

Grind.

My hand tightened around the spear. I let out a hot breath.

"Hoo. Now I'm going to do this properly."

Jeok Cheongang dug inside his ear with his pinky.

"Hm? What was that? I can't hear a weakling who got turned into charcoal with one hit."

"…"

God, I hated this.

When he'd been tearing apart the Roaring Fury Swordsman, his banter had been the most satisfying thing in the world. Now that I was on the receiving end, it made my stomach turn.

"What are you going to do if I really make you retreat even one step?"

"It would be faster for the Heavenly Demon to become the Abbot of Shaolin."

"Grrk."

"You should only have enough time left to drink a glass of cold water. Do you think you can make this old man retreat before then? Not a chance."

Jeok Cheongang was telling the truth. Barely three minutes remained.

Judging by how our fight had gone so far, failing the Quest was practically a foregone conclusion.

But I still had one trump card I hadn't shown him.

I continued the conversation as naturally as I could.

"You're really going to regret saying that."

"What do I have to regret? I only wanted to see how skilled you were in the first place. Still, you show some promise, so if you continue to work hard…"

"That's a shame."

"Hm?"

I heaved a deliberate sigh at the puzzled Jeok Cheongang, pretending to be genuinely disappointed.

"If you didn't attack at all and only defended, I could succeed easily… But I suppose that wasn't one of the conditions."

"If this old man only defended, you could make me retreat?"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes flashed. Competitive pride, perhaps, or curiosity.

I couldn't tell exactly what emotion lay in his gaze, but one thing was certain: he had taken the bait halfway.

[1058] Mal means "words," but can also mean "horse," setting up Jeok Cheongang's reply about a foal.

I waved a hand as though I hadn't noticed.

"No. Forget you heard that. If I succeeded, wouldn't it damage your reputation?"

That sealed it.

"…Look at this brat."

Jeok Cheongang's cheek twitched, his expression difficult to describe. Finally, he nodded.

"I can see straight through your little scheme, but fine. Go ahead and try."

"You mean it?"

"Haven't you heard that the Fire King's word is worth a thousand pieces of gold? Once this old man says something, he always keeps his word."

"…Ah. Yes."

He'd even changed the first word and plagiarized the proverb.

Either way, I'd achieved what I wanted. I discarded the half-charred spear and pulled out my third one.

This one will probably be single-use too.

But if that was the price of completing a Peak-Grade Quest, it was absurdly cheap.

Jeok Cheongang narrowed his eyes as I adjusted my stance.

"You aren't planning to use poison or some underhanded trick, are you?"

"Come on. Of course not."

I grinned and added,

"A man settles things with one big blow."

Gooooong.

The spear shaft trembled after swallowing forty-five years of internal energy.

Kraaaaaash!

A massive boulder went flying, and a tree as thick as a man was torn up by the roots.

Jeok Cheongang stood tall at the center of the clearing, which looked as though a storm had just swept through it.

He had been driven back exactly five steps.

"You—you…"

Looking half-dazed, Jeok Cheongang stared back and forth between me and the devastated surroundings.

The beautiful wilderness from moments ago had become a grotesque landscape of broken and uprooted trees and displaced boulders.

All of it was the result of a single thrust—One Annihilation.

"W-What in the world did you do?"

“Well, I’m not sure. I didn’t expect it to be this powerful either.”

It was the first time I’d used One Annihilation since reaching the Peak realm.

I’d expected its destructive power to have increased now that my internal energy had grown by leaps and bounds, but I hadn’t imagined anything like this.

Jeok Cheongang shouted at my uncertain answer.

“You think that makes any sense?”

“That’s what I’m saying. Wow, this is seriously insa—”

The world spun before my eyes, and my legs buckled.

I had poured out every last shred of strength and internal energy without leaving so much as a speck behind.

A wrinkled hand caught me as I staggered. The gaze of the man looking down at me was impossibly complex.

“I’ll hear the whole story later. Rest for now.”

As he spoke, powerful energy flowed into me through my back. It had to be internal energy that Jeok Cheongang was channeling into me.

I’d expected it to be scorching, like swallowing the sun, but his internal energy was warm and vast.

Its gentle warmth brought on an irresistible wave of drowsiness.

“O-Old Master.”

“Don’t resist. Let yourself go.”

“…Right?”

“Hm?”

“I really won, right?”

“…!”

Jeok Cheongang’s eyelids trembled. At last, he answered in a hoarse voice.

“Yes. This old man lost.”

“Heh heh heh.”

A laugh escaped me before I could stop it.

Even though the fight had been subject to countless restrictions, I was filled with joy at having made Jeok Cheongang—a master counted among the greatest under heaven—retreat.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest One Step Back was completed successfully!
Quest reward…

The fading sound of the System notification was the last thing I heard before falling into a deep sleep.

That boy. He certainly sleeps well.

Jeok Cheongang stared silently at the dead-asleep Jin Taekyung for a long while.

His strong, open features made him look like an innocent boy, yet also like a young man who had already weathered the world once over.

What a strange boy. What a strange boy indeed.

The longer Jeok Cheongang watched him, the stronger that impression became.

He had thought he'd already peeled away one layer of the boy's shell, only to discover even harder, more dazzling scales hidden beneath it.

A Hidden Dragon.

This young man, sleeping so peacefully that he was even snoring, was a dragon that had yet to obtain its dragon pearl.[1059]

That only made Jeok Cheongang more curious. How far would Jin Taekyung go? Would he live long enough to see the boy's true limits?

Especially that final strike…

Jeok Cheongang looked around once more and let out a hollow laugh.

Could this really be the work of a young prodigy who had only just passed twenty?

He was certain that even the Sword Saint of years past had not been capable of this much.

The Martial God. Perhaps he could have done it.

A martial artist born human, yet called a god. The one person who had ever inspired awe in Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

What had he been like in his youth—the man revered not merely as the greatest under heaven, but as the greatest of all time?

As Jeok Cheongang imagined Jin Taekyung as he was now alongside the Martial God in his youth, a quiet laugh escaped him.

For this old man to entertain such a thought… The boy's talent must truly be great enough to compare with the Martial God's.

Jeok Cheongang gazed deeply at Jin Taekyung, then rose to his feet.

By now, a desire was rapidly taking root within him—the desire to place a dragon pearl[1060] in the hands of this young Hidden Dragon.

Fly freely above the clouds. Become a Heavenly Dragon capable of covering the world with rain and wind.

Grrrrrk.

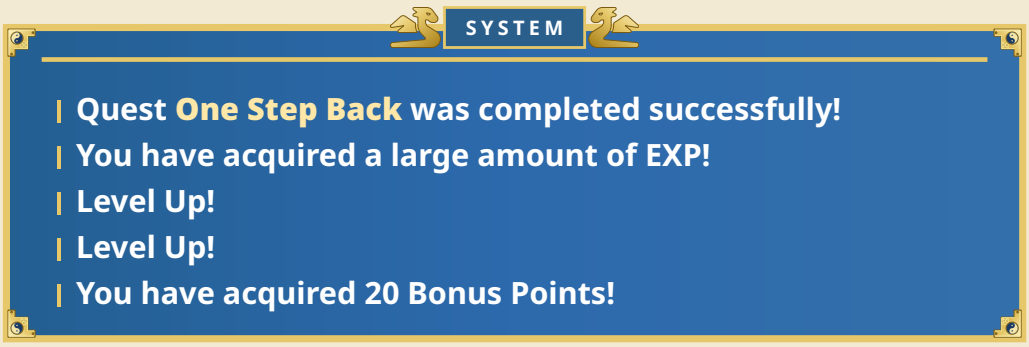
At the snore that came instead of an answer, Jeok Cheongang burst into hearty laughter.

Chapter 203

I read through the System message floating before my eyes.

It was the Quest reward notification I hadn't gotten a chance to check before passing out.



That's insanely generous.

Two level-ups, plus bonus points. All told, a single Quest had given me the equivalent of roughly four levels.

Maybe the reward was bigger than expected because of who my opponent had been.

Close window.

Shhk.

The translucent holographic window disappeared, revealing Jeok Cheongang walking toward me.

He held the satchel he had brought with him.

"Are you awake?"

"Ah, yes. Just woke up."

"How does your body feel?"

"Light as a feather."

Jeok Cheongang looked me up and down, then nodded.

"I suppose young men really do recover quickly. We can move straight on to the next step."

"Ah, the next step. Sounds good."

"I knew you'd say that. This old man prepared something perfect for you. Let's see…"

"Old Master."

"Hm?"

"I mean, that's all well and good, but…"

I gave him an awkward smile.

"Could you release my acupoints before we start?"

I meant that literally.

I had no idea what had happened, but my entire body had been frozen stiff ever since I opened my eyes.

Jeok Cheongang had struck my Paralysis Acupoint while I was asleep.

As things stood, the most I could do was speak.

“I’m sure you meant well, but we should probably get started on the next round of training… Heh heh.”

“Ah, yes. Training.”

Jeok Cheongang rummaged through the satchel.

“This is the next round of training.”

“Getting my acupoints sealed is training?”

Or was releasing them supposed to be the training?

While I was trying to figure that out, Jeok Cheongang pulled something from the satchel.

“Here it is. I forgot I’d stuffed it all the way at the bottom.”

“…Isn’t that a rope?”

“That’s right.”

He slung the sturdy rope over his shoulder, strode over, and hoisted me into the air.

“W-Wait. What are you doing?”

“You’ll find out soon enough.”

He carried me toward a massive boulder.

It had been lodged deep in the earth for who knew how long and was so large that several grown men with their arms outstretched couldn’t have encircled it.

“Hmm. This should do.”

Jeok Cheongang muttered under his breath and brought the edge of his hand down on the boulder.

Shhk. Shhk.

The red Force around his hand sliced the enormous boulder apart like cheesecake. After only a few cuts, he had transformed it into a five-star stone bed.

“This should be just right.”

“W-Wait a second. You’re not planning to tie me to this thing, are you?”

“Tie you? I’m securing you.”

“…”

How was that any different from calling shit feces?

At any rate, I was beginning to tremble.

Actually, the Paralysis Acupoint had been suspicious enough from the beginning. So was the satchel Jeok Cheongang had been rummaging through this whole time.

He’s not actually going to pull out a whip and a mask, is he?

While my pupils quaked, Jeok Cheongang began securing me to the boulder with the rope.

He wound it around various parts of my body, tied it tight, then smiled in satisfaction.

“This should keep you from falling off.”

“Phew.”

“What was that sigh of relief for?”

“I’m relieved it isn’t a tortoise-shell knot.[1061]”

“A tortoise-shell knot? What’s that?”

“…A type of restraint technique.”

“Restraint? Something they use in the military, I take it.”

“…”

Mostly Japanese guys use it.

Well, whatever.

I was now tied down with my arms and legs spread wide.

Both wrists, both ankles, my chest, stomach, and legs. It really did look as though he was trying to secure me rather than restrain me.

Then again, he already struck my Paralysis Acupoint. There’s no need to tie me up that tightly.

But what the hell was he planning to do?

As my eyes darted around, Jeok Cheongang finally opened the satchel.

At that very moment—

Whoosh!

“Gasp.”

An indescribable fragrance burst from it.

A crisp, refreshing sensation entered through my nose and spread throughout my body, strong enough to cure a chronic case of rhinitis on the spot.

My eyes widened as I stared at the objects inside.

“These are…”

Three roots lay neatly arranged within the satchel.

Jeok Cheongang picked up the reddish roots and laid them across his palm.

“Elixirs.”

“Whoa. Where did you find something this valuable?”

“I searched the storehouse. It was packed to the rafters with useless junk, so finding them was a damn nuisance.”

[1061] A tortoise-shell knot is a decorative rope-binding pattern associated with Japanese bondage.

Mountains of silk, gold, silver, and jewels were nothing but worthless clutter in his eyes.

But he was a martial artist to his very bones. Elixirs or martial arts manuals that could improve his martial arts were another matter entirely.

"To be honest, these elixirs aren't especially potent. If all you wanted was more internal energy, a hundred-year-old He Shou Wu[1062] or snow ginseng would be far better."

"Then why…"

"You're wondering why I bothered bringing these?"

"Yes."

"Because only these can provide pure Scorching Yang Qi. Swallowing every elixir you can find might increase the amount of your internal energy, but its power would suffer."

"Oh."

I thought I understood what he meant.

Put simply, it was a matter of fuel. You could pile on all the firewood you wanted, but oil was what made a fire explode.

What he held wasn't firewood. It was oil that would further strengthen the Scorching Yang Qi already inside me.

Still, I'm touched.

I hadn't expected Jeok Cheongang to go this far for me.

For a man as cantankerous as him to endure the hassle of personally selecting and bringing me elixirs filled with Scorching Yang Qi could only mean that he truly intended to teach me the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts.

And I'm not even officially his Disciple yet.

A man with a warm heart and warm internal energy.

That was the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

When he met my heated gaze, he flinched and took a step back.

"W-What's with that stare?"

"Nothing. You just seem like a really good person, Old Master."

"…!"

"You brought those for me to eat, right?"

Jeok Cheongang hesitated before answering.

"…They merely caught my eye, so I brought them along."

"I see."

"This old man kept the better ones for himself."

"Yes. Heh heh."

[1062] He Shou Wu is a medicinal herb used in traditional Chinese medicine.

"Stop laughing!"

Jeok Cheongang barked, then hastily changed the subject.

"A-Anyway, this old man will now use these elixirs to open your acupoints."

I had been thinking of teasing him a little more, but what he'd just said sounded serious. My ears perked up before I knew it.

"You're going to open my acupoints?"

"You heard me. When this old man examined your body before, your muscles and bones were exceptional, just as one would expect of the Heavenly Martial Physique, but you had a considerable amount of turbid qi inside you."

"Oh."

"I heard that until recently, you spent your life drowning in wine and women. Even the finest sword will lose its edge if neglected for too long. The Heavenly Martial Physique is no exception."

I couldn't deny it.

The Jin Family's Cultivation Technique was extremely stable, but it lacked power and efficiency when circulating internal energy.

I circulated my qi whenever I had the chance, but the traces left by twenty years of slacking off had yet to disappear.

"Then…"

"This old man will use the elixirs and my internal energy to burn every last bit of turbid qi from your body. For you, it should be far more effective than cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow.[1063]"

"That's welcome news."

"I doubt you'll find it quite so welcome."

"What?"

"You'll find out soon enough."

Before I could say anything else, he sealed my Mute Acupoint. My tongue went rigid, trapping a silent cry inside my mouth.

What the hell is this?

Now I really was a corpse with its eyes open.

Jeok Cheongang grinned down at me as I lay frozen like a plaster statue.

"First, let's get those elixirs into you."

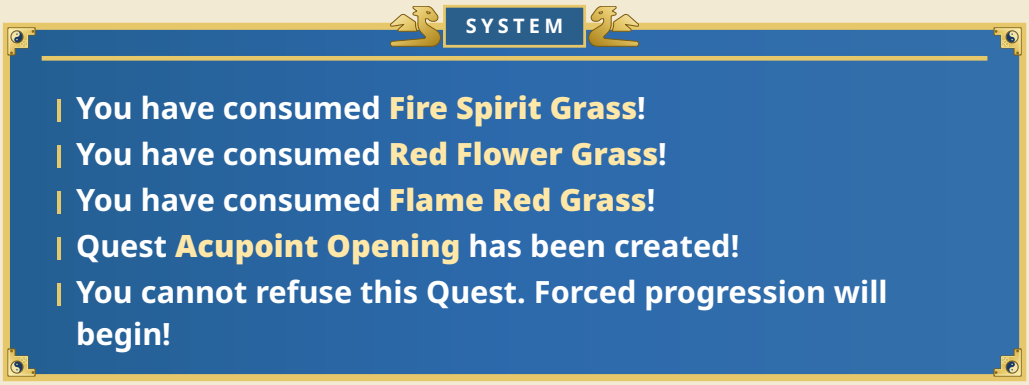
His wrinkled fingers pried open my jaw and slipped all three roots into my mouth.

For a moment, the taste of dirt and a crisp coolness filled my mouth. Then the hard roots melted the instant they touched my tongue and flowed down my throat into my stomach.

The next moment—

[1063] "Cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow" refers to a martial technique intended to improve the body's constitution.

Ding.



Gah!

System notifications rang out one after another as tremendous heat swept through my body.

Only then did I understand what Jeok Cheongang had meant.

It fucking hurts!

With my acupoints sealed, I couldn't scream or thrash around. All I could do was stare wide-eyed.

Just as I hurriedly tried to draw up my internal energy, Jeok Cheongang rolled up his worn sleeves.

"All right, then. Shall we begin in earnest?"

"...!"

"Bear with it, no matter how much it hurts. Pain is temporary, but martial arts last a lifetime."

Tap. Tap-tap-tap-tap!

His fingers blurred as they jabbed and tapped all over my body.

Each impact scattered my internal energy, allowing the unfamiliar energy of the elixirs to race through me. Trapped in the boiling heat, I screamed without a sound.

AAAAAAAAARGH!

Unlike Jin Taekyung's bloodshot eyes, strained by unbearable pain, Jeok Cheongang's gleamed with fervor.

It's proceeding smoothly. No, explosively.

Was this the Heavenly Martial Physique at work?

The speed at which the internal energy spread was astonishing. The more than thirty years of energy contained within the elixirs ran wild through every minor meridian in Jin Taekyung's body.

Jin Taekyung tried to raise his own internal energy and suppress it, but that was not what Jeok Cheongang wanted.

He can tame it later. For now, it must be allowed to run wild.

A tamed fighting bull sometimes forgot how to charge.

The newly infused energy of thirty years had to break through everything in its path without restriction.

The attempt was dangerous enough that a single mistake could cause qi deviation. Even Jeok Cheongang, a Supreme Peak master, swallowed dryly as his fingers continued to move.

Gyeonjeong, Amun, Bongan, Ip-dong…

Tap. Tap-tap!

Following his guidance, hundreds of acupoints opened and closed over and over. Before long, black sweat poured from Jin Taekyung's entire body, accompanied by a musty odor.

The stench was vile enough to make even someone with an iron stomach gag, but the corners of Jeok Cheongang's mouth twitched with delight.

It worked!

This was proof that a tremendous amount of turbid qi was being expelled.

As if to confirm his conclusion, the sweat gradually lightened and the stench slowly faded.

Before long, the sweat became clear, and a pleasant body scent wafted through the air. Astonishment filled Jeok Cheongang's eyes.

Already?

It was fast. Far too fast.

The process he had expected to take at least three shichen[1064] was already nearing completion in less than one.

Even more astonishing was the fact that the energy of the elixirs had barely diminished.

Ordinarily, a considerable amount of energy would be lost in the process of purging the turbid qi and circulating what remained.

Jin Taekyung was different.

As expected of the Heavenly Martial Physique… It truly lives up to its name.

At this rate, he could remove all the turbid qi and still gain the full thirty years of internal energy.

Yet instead of satisfaction, greed and indecision filled Jeok Cheongang's eyes.

What if we push further?

The Conception Vessel and the Governor Vessel—the mountain known collectively as the Conception and Governor Vessels.

[1064] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

It was a realm most martial artists of the Murim could not reach even after devoting their entire lives to training.

Breaking through it required both enormous internal energy and enlightenment, but it might be possible now.

The Heavenly Martial Physique. And my help.

Even so, attempting to open the Conception and Governor Vessels at once was dangerous.

Leaving everything else aside, Jeok Cheongang's greatest concern was whether Jin Taekyung could withstand the pain.

What should I do?

After agonizing over it again and again, Jeok Cheongang finally spoke.

"I think you can open the Conception and Governor Vessels."

"…!"

Jin Taekyung's bloodshot eyes trembled as he endured the pain. Unable to answer, he could only listen as Jeok Cheongang continued.

"But you'll have to accept the risks that come with it. The pain will likely be beyond anything you've experienced so far. A single mistake could cost you your life."

"…"

"The choice is yours. If you trust this old man and wish to leave it in my hands, blink twice."

The next moment, Jin Taekyung blinked without hesitation.

Two blinks, without the slightest trace of doubt.

Seeing the unwavering trust in his eyes, Jeok Cheongang felt something warm rise within his chest.

Has this brat truly trusted me that deeply?

Suppressing the swell of emotion, he forced the corners of his mouth upward.

"All right. Let's give it a try."

At the same time, an immense torrent of internal energy flowed from his fingertips into Jin Taekyung's body.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Information for Quest Acupoint Opening has changed!
Quest Conception and Governor Vessels has been created! The difficulty and rewards have been adjusted to reflect the updated information!

As I listened to the System notification, one thought crossed my mind.

No, fuck…

I was sure I'd only blinked once.

Chapter 204

Whooosh!

A tremendous surge of internal energy began racing along the path.

Opening the Conception Vessel required passing through a pathway of twenty-four acupoints, beginning with the Huiyin Acupoint.

The problem was that the Huiyin Acupoint happened to be located in a rather important part of the body.

No. No!

A forced opening?!

No scream escaped my lips. The internal energy transformed into a raging bull and slammed into the Huiyin Acupoint.

Boom!

…!

It was a sensation only someone who had experienced it could understand. My vision went white as though I'd arrived in heaven, and all my senses faded away.

The faces of those dearest to me flashed before my eyes one after another.

Mom. Hayeon. And among them, the unfamiliar face of a newborn baby.

Y-You're…

Waaaaah!

A baby's cry echoed through my head like an auditory hallucination.

Only then did I realize who it was.

Oh, my baby!

Jin Taekyung Junior, whom I had yet to meet.

The child I might now never meet at all.

The baby's innocent eyes seemed to ask me:

"Daddy, can't I come out?"

The next moment, my vision returned—and unimaginable pain shot straight up from my lower body.

Kyaaaaaaah!

As I screamed from the depths of my soul, an urgent voice lashed my ears.

"Get a hold of yourself! If you can't endure this pain, you'll die!"

…!

Death? Me? And in such a disgraceful way?

My mind snapped back into focus as if someone had dumped cold water over my head.

The pain stabbing into my lower abdomen like a knife hadn't lessened, but I summoned superhuman endurance.

I can't die like this!

I had survived countless bloody battles. Even when I'd suffered injuries severe enough to threaten my life, I'd gritted my teeth and held on.

This was only this much—no, it wasn't only this much, but still, I wasn't so impatient that I'd let my life end over something like this.

Hng!

As I endured with everything I had, the tremendous surge of internal energy tore through the twenty-four acupoints without pause.

And finally…

Boom!

It crashed into the gate known as the Conception Vessel.

Pain nearly as intense as what I'd felt at the Huiyin Acupoint surged through me like a wave.

The difference was that this collision didn't end with a single blow.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

Once, twice, three times. Thunderous booms and vibrations rang out inside my body like thunder from the heavens.

Only then did I understand why Jeok Cheongang had pressed my Paralysis Acupoint and Mute Acupoint. And why he had secured me with ropes on top of that.

Gnnngh!

My entire body trembled despite my sealed acupoints. Faced with pain beyond anything it could bear, my body was reacting on its own.

Pop.

The tiny blood vessels in my wide-open eyes burst.

Through my blood-red vision, I saw Jeok Cheongang roaring.

"Endure it! This is the last one!"

The last one? Really?

Whether it was true or not didn't matter. His words gave me strength.

Just a little more. More!

I drew up the internal energy lying dormant in my dantian.

Forty-five years of internal energy raced through the wide-open acupoint pathways, where all the turbid qi and obstacles had been removed, and surged upward in one burst.

Then it joined the elixir's energy, which was already pounding against the Conception Vessel, and Jeok Cheongang's internal energy.

The three energies merged into a single battering ram and struck the gate with greater force and sharpness than ever before.

Bang! Kwoooong!

That blow put an end to it.

The long struggle was over.

The tightly sealed Conception Vessel crumbled, and the energies poured through like a conquering army.

For an instant, dizzying pain swept through me. Then pleasure and exhilarating clarity several times more intense than that pain flooded my entire body.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You have successfully opened the Conception Vessel!
The handling of qi has become much freer!
Your speed of circulating and accumulating internal energy has increased dramatically!
You have achieved the Conception Vessel Opening Achievement!
As a reward...

Ah... Ahhh!

My body trembled, no longer from pain but from sheer joy.

This was different. Everything I'd known until now had been no more than a drop in the ocean.

The difference was as vast as the gulf between First Rate and Peak.

How can it change this much?

I'd suffered unimaginable pain, but an achievement like this was worth it. No—I had to endure it.

As I marveled at the transformation, Jeok Cheongang beamed at me.

"You did very well!"

Seeing how genuinely delighted he was made something stir deep in my chest.

I couldn't believe he had gone so far to help me. If my acupoints hadn't been sealed, I would have dropped to the ground and given Jeok Cheongang a deep bow.

Jeok Cheongang, you really...

Just as my eyes began to grow moist, he spoke.

"We can open the Governor Vessel the same way."

"..."

Oh, fuck.

I forgot about that.

He wants me to do this all over again?

No. I'm not doing it! At least let me rest for a while first!

Jeok Cheongang chuckled as I blinked desperately.

“You’re beside yourself with eagerness to begin at once. I was going to let you rest for a while, but… Very well. Let’s ride this momentum and open both the Conception and Governor Vessels!”

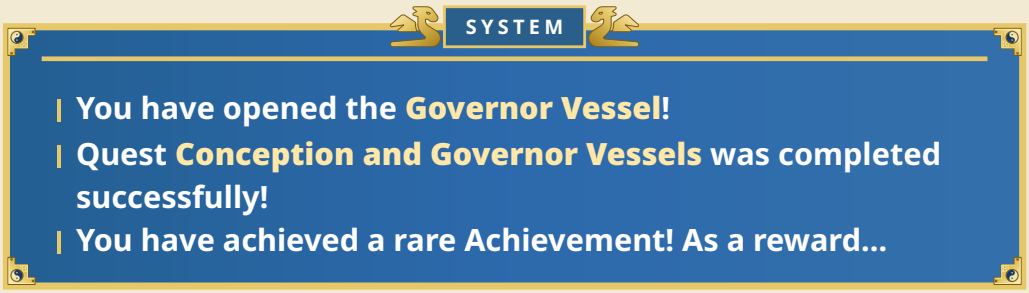
…!

“Here we go!”

And so, the express train to hell departed once more.

One shichen later,[1065] I faintly heard a System notification through the haze clouding my mind.

Ding.



.

.

Whatever. Fuck this.

To hell with rare Achievements and everything else. I couldn’t take any more.

Having exhausted every last shred of mental strength, I plunged headfirst into endless darkness.

The moment Jeok Cheongang loosened the ropes, Jin Taekyung’s collapsing body fell into his careful embrace.

The sweat Taekyung had shed while enduring the pain and the turbid qi expelled from his body earlier combined into a terrible stench, but Jeok Cheongang didn’t care.

They were the traces left by a martial artist striving to reach a higher realm.

Jeok Cheongang gazed down at the unconscious Jin Taekyung with eyes deeper and gentler than ever.

The more I learn about him, the more remarkable he becomes.

At first, Jeok Cheongang had wondered one thing.

Why him, of all people?

[1065] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

In his eyes, Jin Taekyung had been neither white nor black. He was gray—the same ordinary gray found everywhere in the world.

He wasn't exactly burning with a sense of justice, but neither was he evil.

Nor was he particularly devoted to training in martial arts.

From the moment Jeok Cheongang arrived at the Jin Family of Taiyuan, he'd heard about Jin Taekyung until his ears ached.

He hadn't even needed to ask. Everyone around him was always talking about the boy.

His martial arts were Third Rate, while his drinking, womanizing, and gambling were First Rate. Unlike his two gifted older brothers, he had been called a disgrace to the family.

Upon learning that, Jeok Cheongang had resented the heavens, if only for a moment.

Why did you give the Heavenly Martial Physique to someone like him?

A fine sword ought to belong to a swordsman, not a farmer.

Yet the Jin Taekyung of the rumors was no different from a farmer holding a fine sword. Worse, he didn't even possess a farmer's diligence.

The only pursuits he approached diligently were drinking, womanizing, and gambling. What more was there to say?

But…

I was wrong.

Looking back, Jeok Cheongang realized that everything he had thought was merely an old man's stubborn prejudice and contradiction.

He was no immortal sage. How could he divide someone he'd only just met into black or white? And what did it matter if Taekyung was gray?

A human heart. As long as he keeps hold of that, it is enough.

Judging by everything Jeok Cheongang had seen so far, Jin Taekyung was a decent young man.

Humans were imperfect beings to begin with. Trying to divide them into perfect white and black was absurd.

Perhaps gray was merely another name for a good person.

And on top of that, he possesses remarkable mental strength.

What good was being born with a fine physique? Opening the Conception and Governor Vessels was so difficult and agonizing that the process could only be called hellish.

Yet Jin Taekyung had done it—and done it splendidly.

It must have been unbearably difficult and painful. Even so, he had endured through sheer determination to become stronger.

Jin Taekyung possessed a mental strength as firm as his physique.

The Heavenly Martial Physique chose its master well.

A satisfied smile appeared around Jeok Cheongang's mouth. After gazing at Jin Taekyung for a long while, he muttered:

"Perhaps… it may happen much sooner than I thought."

As soon as he finished speaking, Jeok Cheongang's wrinkled fingers began to tremble.

Even for him, the process had consumed a considerable amount of internal energy and mental strength. Before his mind could fully register the toll, his aging body had already made it clear.

"Not yet, you bastard. Hold out for just a few more years."

Jeok Cheongang muttered bitterly and lifted Jin Taekyung into his arms.

They had crossed a great mountain. Now it was time to rest.

For the young man and the old man alike.

It was around noon when Ak Bulgun, a spear instructor at Heaven's Gate Temple, arrived at Jin Wikyung's office.

When he opened the door and entered, Jin Wikyung, who had been scribbling something across a bamboo slip, brightened and rose from his seat.

"Sir Ak, welcome. Thank you for accepting my invitation despite how busy you must be."

"It only makes sense for the man with more time on his hands to make the trip. Please don't concern yourself with it."

The Shandong Yue Family was renowned throughout the Murim as a prestigious family of spear masters.

Yet despite being a direct descendant of such an illustrious family, Ak Bulgun was a straightforward man with little patience for empty formalities.

That personality showed plainly when he got straight to the point without even pausing for a sip of tea.

"Why did you summon me? Could it be…"

Jin Wikyung smiled faintly.

"Unfortunately, this isn't about Mukyung."

"I see."

Ak Bulgun nodded, then added bluntly,

"Lesser Family Head, please understand that Heaven's Gate Temple enforces its rules strictly."

Heaven's Gate Temple was both a treasure trove of outstanding talent and a gateway to advancement.

Anyone with sufficient talent could become a cadet regardless of their background. Its members consequently ranged from disciples of small sects in remote regions to the disciples and scions of prestigious major sects.

Despite bringing together people from such disparate backgrounds, Heaven's Gate Temple had avoided serious conflict by enforcing the same strict rules upon every cadet.

"If he fails to return by the appointed date, he may be expelled. Even the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes are no exception."

"I did go to see him myself, but…"

"Did he refuse?"

"Yes."

After much deliberation, Jin Wikyung had gone to see him, but Jin Mukyung hadn't even shown his face.

According to Childeuk, the martial artist stationed at the training hall, Mukyung hadn't stepped outside once since entering.

He subsisted on fasting pills and refused to let anyone approach him. At least, when he heard that Jin Wikyung had come, he sent back a brief answer:

"I won't return until I achieve Great Completion."

Ak Bulgun let out a short laugh after hearing Jin Wikyung's explanation.

Having taught Jin Mukyung several times before, he knew the young genius's personality well.

"That sounds like him."

"It's unfortunate, but I don't think even I can overcome my little brother's stubbornness."

"The Temple Master will be just as disappointed as you are, Lesser Family Head."

Everyone had their own path to follow. Ak Bulgun nodded matter-of-factly and continued.

"I don't believe I've heard why you asked to see me."

"Ah, I wanted to deliver a message to you."

"A message?"

Instead of answering, Jin Wikyung drew a small bamboo tube from inside his robe and handed it over.

Ak Bulgun examined the characters engraved into the blue bamboo tube and murmured,

"Heaven's Gate Temple?"

"It arrived half a shichen ago.[1066] I thought it best to bring you here so I could hand it over personally."

[1066] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

“Please excuse me for a moment.”

After asking permission, Ak Bulgun silently read through the message.

He checked it twice, then a third time, before raising his head and staring at Jin Wikyung.

“Lesser Family Head.”

“…?”

“I’m going to need your help.”

Chapter 205

How long had I been unconscious?

My body felt as light as a feather, and my mind was clear. It felt as though I'd only slept for a moment, yet the world had changed a great deal while I was out.

What's going on?

The room held only simple furniture and a few decorations. The faint scent of fresh timber lingered in the recently built room.

It was a familiar sight, one I'd seen countless times before. Yet it had never felt so strange.

This is…

I looked around, my eyes trembling.

I could feel qi saturating the air, and everything around me was so bright that it was as if someone had implanted night-vision goggles in my eyes.

Even the moon beyond the latticed window seemed bizarre.

Why was the moon out when it was this bright? Wasn't that actually the sun?

I sat there in a daze for a long while, as though bewitched, before finally realizing the truth.

"Oh."

This world—the Murim—was exactly as I remembered it. Nothing had changed except me.

A small voice slipped from my lips before I realized it.

"The Conception and Governor Vessels…"

When a blocked tunnel is opened, light pours in.

Anyone accustomed to the darkness inside would naturally find that light strange. That was exactly how I felt now.

Only after removing the enormous obstacle known as the Conception and Governor Vessels could I finally see a light I'd never known existed.

"You're awake."

The owner of the sudden voice stood leaning against the doorway.

There wasn't even a lamp in the room, yet I could make out every age spot and wrinkle covering his face.

"Old Master."

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, answered as if he'd been waiting for me.

"Yeah."

"You're really old."

For a moment, he was struck speechless. I added one more thing.

"And strong. Stronger than anyone I've ever seen."

This wasn't an attempt to take back what I'd just said, nor was it empty flattery. I meant it with one hundred percent sincerity.

Now that I had opened the Conception and Governor Vessels, I could glimpse, however faintly, the terrifying martial arts hidden within that small frame.

"Ahem. You're stating the obvious."

Jeok Cheongang cleared his throat in embarrassment and changed the subject.

"So, how do you feel?"

"Fantastic."

There was no need to read a System message or circulate my internal energy to examine my body. I could feel it the moment I opened my eyes.

The corners of his mouth twitched at my immediate answer.

"Of course you do. Do you have any idea how much trouble this old man went through—no, I handled it with ease, but it's still not something just anyone could do. Indeed."

"…"

"I'm telling the truth!"

"I didn't say anything."

"That look on your face is disrespectful! That look!"

That was because his intentions were painfully obvious.

His martial arts might be unfathomable, but his personality was completely transparent.

Violent and impossibly eccentric, yet surprisingly easy to understand—that was how I saw Jeok Cheongang.

"I have ptosis, so people often misunderstand my expression."

I put on an utterly shameless face and denied everything. Jeok Cheongang began to snort.

"Why is everyone here like this? That so-called Lesser Family Head keeps neglecting major family business to come by and see you, and those physicians are all quacks who do nothing but gossip about whether you're going to live or die."

"Wait. Die? Did someone get seriously hurt?"

"Who else would it be?"

At his meaningful stare, I asked with a sinking feeling:

"Are you talking about me?"

"That's right. The whole place was in an uproar for the past seven days and nights. If I'd known this would happen, I would've shoved you under a rock until you came to your senses."

I didn't even hear the rest. I blinked at him in a daze.

"I was unconscious for seven whole days and nights?"

"Not seven whole days and nights. Only seven. I thought you'd be lying there for at least a month, but the Heavenly Martial Physique truly is remarkable."

"This isn't some kind of side effect, is it?"

"Listen to the insolence in this brat's voice. I went through all that trouble to open your Conception and Governor Vessels, and what do I get? 'Side effect'?"

"You just said you handled it with ease."

Jeok Cheongang froze, then shouted:

"That's beside the point! Even after you take a shit, you still have to wipe your ass. I removed all the turbid qi that had been piling up inside your body, layer upon layer. Obviously, you'd need time to adjust to your new body!"

"…"

He was so worked up that the analogy was a little strange, but I understood what he meant.

Some kind of optimization process, maybe?

Come to think of it, it would be strange for someone on the verge of death to leap to his feet just because his Conception and Governor Vessels had been opened. Even after leveling up, mental fatigue could still build up and knock a person unconscious.

Even so, an entire week?

"Then the gathering must be over."

"The gathering—or half a gathering—ended three days ago."

Still visibly sulking, Jeok Cheongang continued:

"That fellow Ak Bulgun is still here."

I tilted my head at the unexpected name.

Ak Bulgun, an instructor at Heaven's Gate Temple, had originally come to the Jin Family of Taiyuan to take Jin Mukyung back.

Could he really be planning to wait until Jin Mukyung finished his seclusion?

"Why is Sir Ak still here?"

"Ask him yourself."

"Come on. I was wrong, so stop being angry and tell me."

Jeok Cheongang replied curtly:

"Do I look that petty to you? I mean he's on his way here, so you can hear it directly from him."

"Oh."

Sure enough, he was right. Not long afterward, approaching footsteps announced the arrival of two people.

"My youngest!"

Jin Wikyung's voice trembled with emotion when he saw that I had awakened after seven days and nights. Behind him came Ak Bulgun's blunt voice.

“It seems Great Hero Jeok is here as well. I have something important to discuss with you. Would that be all right?”

Jeok Cheongang answered firmly:

“No. Get out.”

“It concerns Jin Taekyung’s plans as well.”

“…Damn it.”

Jeok Cheongang muttered a quiet curse and perched on a chair.

As his appearance suggested, Ak Bulgun was not much of an orator. After listening to his entire dry explanation, I spoke.

“So you’re inviting us to that… Star… Star-Array…”

What was it called again? His explanation had been so boring that I could barely remember what I’d heard.

When I faltered, Jeok Cheongang supplied the name.

“The Star-Array Grand Banquet.”

“Ah, right. The Star-Array Grand Banquet.”

“It is a grand event where martial artists from across the world gather in one place to vie for supremacy and reinforce their bonds. It is held once every two or three years, and this year’s Star-Array Grand Banquet will take place in Henan.”

At Ak Bulgun’s additional explanation, Jeok Cheongang gave a derisive laugh.

“Reinforce the bonds of the Murim, my ass. It’s a place where powerful people cheer each other on, flatter one another, and build connections.”

Talk about a mercilessly blunt assessment.

Ak Bulgun gave a small nod without offering any real objection. It seemed Jeok Cheongang wasn’t wrong.

Jeok Cheongang continued in a cutting tone:

“It was the same forty years ago. The Demonic Cult had barely been driven out, and already they were fighting over their interests… I saw more than enough ugliness.”

I could more or less picture what it had been like.

A time of chaos was also a time of opportunity. The greedy and powerful never let an opportunity pass them by.

It might even have been partly related to why Jeok Cheongang had gone into seclusion on Mount Jiuhua again.

Still, it sounds like an enormous event.

Jeok Cheongang narrowed his eyes at my curious stare.

“What are you looking at?”

“It’s nothing. I was just wondering why someone who hates crowds and anything troublesome would go to a place like that.”

“I was asked to.”

“…?”

Was Jeok Cheongang really the sort of person to comply simply because someone asked him to?

The question vanished as soon as I heard the title of the person who had asked.

“The Martial God.”

“Oh.”

The Martial God, whom I’d only ever heard about.

They said there were Ten Kings on earth, Three Saints in the heavens, and one god above them all.

If the request had come from that Martial God, even Jeok Cheongang probably couldn’t have refused easily.

“He was the one who created the Star-Array Grand Banquet and asked this old man to attend. That was the first and last time the One God, Three Saints, and Ten Kings gathered in one place.”

As though recalling those days, Jeok Cheongang tapped the armrest of his chair with a distant look in his eyes. Then he suddenly turned to Ak Bulgun.

“How is he doing?”

“He has not shown himself for many years. There are even disturbing rumors circulating…”

“You’re worried the Martial God might be dead? Ha. There are far too many idiots with nothing but shit in their heads.”

Jeok Cheongang let out a hollow laugh, then turned back to me.

“So, what do you think?”

“Hmm.”

“Even if it is a feast for the powerful, there is no denying that the Star-Array Grand Banquet is a gathering of martial artists from across the world. Anyone can display their abilities to the fullest, regardless of their background.”

“I’m not sure.”

I scratched the back of my head, unable to answer easily.

The Star-Array Grand Banquet. A gathering where martial artists from across the world assembled to reinforce their bonds and vie for supremacy.

It was a chance to face outstanding masters and make a name for myself throughout the Central Plains.

But…

Was that really so important?

Ever since coming to the Murim, I'd found myself wondering about that from time to time.

Why did I practice martial arts? Why did I keep training even after becoming strong enough to protect my own life and the people precious to me?

After thinking about it for a long time, I'd finally found the answer not long ago.

Because it's fun.

Just as I'd told Cheongpung, I liked martial arts. They were fun.

Even if I gained more money and fame than I could possibly imagine, I would never stop training.

I was already addicted to martial arts. I'd discovered just how thrilling and satisfying it was to become stronger.

"Young Hero Jin."

Ak Bulgun's quiet voice broke through my thoughts. It was time to answer.

I took a deep breath and opened my mouth.

"I…"

The expressions of all three men changed strangely when they heard my answer.

The three men left.

Alone in the room, I thought back to my final exchange with Jeok Cheongang.

You want to become stronger. Is that your answer?

Yes.

Does that mean you'll attend the Star-Array Grand Banquet?

It doesn't matter where I go, as long as I can become stronger than I am now.

You're still young, and you're already strong enough. If you attend the Star-Array Grand Banquet, you could etch your name into the Murim and gain wealth and fame. Aren't you tempted by those things?

I am. By martial arts. By a higher realm.

…!

Jeok Cheongang had stared at me with trembling eyes for a long while before leaving me with a single command.

Come to my quarters at dawn.

Remembering his final words, I sat down on the bed.

My field of vision was as bright as midday, and I could hear the footsteps and breathing of people outside the pavilion as clearly as if they were right beside me.

You're already strong enough.

Jeok Cheongang himself had said those words before leaving. The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, had acknowledged me.

But there was something else I wanted to hear.

You're stronger than anyone.

Back when I was an F-rank Hunter, my wish had been to become an E-rank Hunter. When I first set foot in the Murim, my goal had been to surpass Hyuk Mujin.

As time passed, I grew stronger, and my dreams grew more ambitious.

Some people might call that greed. But greed and dreams were different.

I had a dream now. The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was the guide who could lead me toward it.

I'm looking forward to morning.

There were roughly three shichen[1067] left until dawn.

It looked like tonight would be a long one—for both me and Jeok Cheongang.

Especially for me. It'll be a night longer than I can even imagine.

I lay flat on my back.

It was time to leave behind everything that had happened in the Murim and return.

Logout.

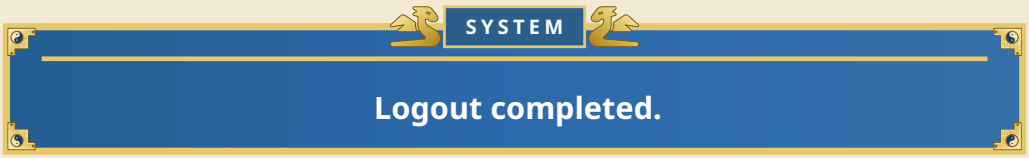
Ding.

With the cheerful System notification, my eyes slowly closed.

[1067] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

Chapter 206

Ding.



I hadn't opened my eyes, but I knew.

The moment the System notification sounded, everything around me changed.

Instead of a fur-covered bed and a hard wooden pillow, I felt the soft cushions of a sofa beneath me. Water bubbled nearby, and a familiar smell hit my nose.

Th-This is…

Ramen. And not just any ramen—ramen cooked to perfection!

The instant I realized what it was, my stomach began churning violently. After more than a month in the Murim, it was desperate for seasoning.

"I'm hungry!"

The cry came straight from my soul. My eyes snapped open, and a familiar face popped out from the brightly lit kitchen.

Sparse stubble. Greasy, matted hair. Jinho wiped his steam-fogged glasses and beamed at me.

"Oh, my beloved little brother Taekyung. Did you sleep well?"

His revoltingly sweet tone was nothing like his usual voice, but the smell of ramen had already driven me out of my mind.

"Ramen!"

"Jesus, what's gotten into you?"

"Kimchi[1068]!"

"You were really out cold. I was going to shake you awake, but…"

"Cold rice! At least five bowls!"

"…Uh, all right. I was about to bring it over anyway."

A short while later, I stared at the pot filled to the brim with noodles and broth and murmured in bliss.

"This is insane…"

"Lift the top layer of noodles a little. There's a soft-boiled egg underneath."

"Gasp."

Just as he'd said, when I carefully lifted the noodles, a perfectly intact soft-boiled egg appeared beneath them.

[1068] Kimchi is a Korean side dish of fermented vegetables, commonly napa cabbage, seasoned with chili and other ingredients.

As I sucked in a breath, Jinho held out two small side dishes.

“Here. Kimchi[1069] and pickled radish. The rice is plain white rice I took out an hour ago. Once you finish the noodles and drink a few mouthfuls of broth, drop in the cold rice and…”

“Are you…”

“Hm?”

“Are you God?”

Jinho placed an exam-prep book beneath the pot and answered solemnly.

“Genesis, chapter one, verse one. Thus spoke Seong Jinho: ‘If you do not eat now, the broth shall grow cold, and the noodles shall become hopelessly soggy.‘”

“Ah… Ahhh…”

“Little lamb, why dost thou flap thy gums with ramen before thee? Lick the pot clean and leave not a single drop of broth behind.”

I’d been nonreligious my entire life.

Not anymore.

I gazed reverently up at Jinho and raised my chopsticks.

“Amen.”

“Ramen.”

Today, I wouldn’t have minded dying with my nose buried in ramen broth.

I buried my head over the huge pot and moved my chopsticks without pause. Because the distance between my mouth and the chopsticks was so short, the noodles kept disappearing into me.

Slurp! Slurp! Slurrrrrp!

Springy noodles. Spicy broth. When I broke open the soft-boiled egg, the bliss and regret were so overwhelming that a single tear rolled down my cheek.

It’s delicious. So delicious.

I love seasoning. It’s the best.

Drunk on that artificial flavor found only in the modern world, I kept inhaling food.

By the time I came to my senses, there was nothing in front of me but an empty pot and bowls. Even the bowl that had held a heaping mound of cold rice was spotless.

“Buuurp.”

“You’ve got to be kidding me.”

Jinho stared at me in horror as I rubbed my stomach and let out a tremendous belch.

[1069] Kimchi is a Korean side dish of fermented vegetables, commonly napa cabbage, seasoned with chili and other ingredients.

“You ate seven packets of ramen and five bowls of rice by yourself in ten minutes? Are you even human?”

“Carbonation! Cola!”

“…C-Calm down. I’ll get some.”

Only after draining three 1.5-liter[1070] bottles of cola in a row did I finally return to something resembling sanity.

“Whew. That hit the spot. I’m full.”

“That’s strange. Why am I hungry?”

“Bear with it. You would’ve done the same if you were me.”

I answered absently and collapsed back against the sofa behind me.

What kind of monster hide had they said this was made from? Whatever it was, it felt incredible.

“Man, this is comfortable.”

If this had been my goshiwon[1071] room, there wouldn’t even have been space for a sofa.

Jinho would have had to cook the ramen in the communal lounge instead of a kitchen, or bring in a portable burner.

“Moving here really was the right choice.”

Jinho scraped the bottom of the pot with a spoon as he answered.

“Yeah. It’s a nice place.”

“Right? Mom and Hayeon are going to love it when they see… it.”

A realization flashed through my mind like lightning.

I stared blankly around the room, my mouth hanging open. The space and furniture were nothing like what I’d had in the goshiwon[1072].

And one particular person had blended seamlessly into both the space and the situation.

“I’m still hungry. Should I make some Jjapagetti[1073]?”

“…”

“I’m not giving you any this time. If you want some, say so now.”

I barely managed to squeeze out my voice.

“…You.”

“Hm?”

“Why the hell are you here, you bastard!”

My roar shattered the dark dawn and shook the residential neighborhood of Ilsan.

[1070] 1.5 liters is about 0.40 US gallons per bottle.

[1071] A goshiwon is a very small, inexpensive rented room, often used by students and exam candidates.

[1072] A goshiwon is a very small, inexpensive rented room, often used by students and exam candidates.

[1073] Jjapagetti is a Korean brand of instant noodles flavored like black-bean-sauce noodles.

After hearing the whole story, I could only ask in disbelief.

“You were inside the capsule?”

Jinho knelt politely with both arms raised above his head and looked away.

“Yeah. I held my breath and stayed perfectly still.”

No wonder the mover had struggled so much.

Even I hadn’t noticed anything unusual. My Strength had grown several times over since I’d first found and moved the capsule, and my Qi Sense hadn’t been nearly as sharp back then as it was now.

And there was one more thing.

No, for fuck’s sake. Who would’ve imagined that?

No matter how expensive or sophisticated an alarm system was, it couldn’t detect an intruder when the power was off.

It had never even occurred to me that someone might be hiding inside the capsule.

“Whew. What happened to the place you were going to get? Didn’t you say you were moving in with a friend?”

“Y-You know Kim Jong-su, right? My college classmate. You had drinks with us once a couple of years ago.”

His face was hazy in my memory, but I did remember that.

Hadn’t he been a fairly successful used-car dealer at the time? If he hadn’t bought us beef that day, I probably would’ve forgotten him completely.

“That’s the friend you were going to live with?”

“Yeah. Though he’s not my friend anymore.”

“Hyung[1074], did he…?”

“Five million won[1075] for the deposit. That bastard took it and ran.”

Why did bad premonitions always come true?

I rubbed my throbbing forehead.

“How did that happen?”

“Well, my exam is coming up soon, so he said he’d handle all the details…”

I raised a hand to stop him before he could continue.

I didn’t need to hear the rest. It was a clichéd trick, but it kept working for a reason.

“You just handed him the money without checking anything?”

“I’d known him for over ten years. How was I supposed to know he’d do that over a few million won[1076]?”

[1074] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend.

[1075] Five million won is about $3,600 or €3,200.

[1076] A few million won is roughly two to five million won, or about $1,400–$3,600 or €1,300–€3,200.

"But those few million won[1077] were your entire fortune, weren't they?"

"…"

If he'd gone so far as to sneak in here inside the capsule, he clearly didn't even have enough left to pay this month's goshiwon[1078] rent.

Was he from Jeju Island or something?

A special A-grade black cow.[1079]

There wasn't a bigger black cow—a bigger sucker—anywhere.

At the look in my eyes, Jinho hung his head.

"I was only going to impose on you for a couple of months, until I could scrape some money together."

"You should've just told me."

"I agonized over it, but I couldn't bring myself to say anything. I'm your hyung.[1080] I can't burden my little brother."

"…"

What the hell did this man consider a burden?

"I'm sorry. I really am."

His voice turned mournful as he lowered his arms. His eyes were already glistening.

"Taekyung…"

"Jinho hyung[1081]…"

I continued in a sympathetic voice.

"Who told you to lower your arms?"

"Hm?"

"Put them back up before I beat you."

"…Yes, sir."

Jinho hurriedly raised his arms again, and a sigh escaped me.

The whole ridiculous situation had come out of nowhere, but at the same time, it left me feeling heavyhearted.

You should've told me sooner.

Maybe I couldn't have done much for him in the past, but now I had more than enough means to help. No, even back then, I would've supported him in every way I could.

After all the time we've spent together.

[1077] A few million won is roughly two to five million won, or about $1,400–$3,600 or €1,300–€3,200.

[1078] A goshiwon is a very small, inexpensive rented room, often used by students and exam candidates.

[1079] "Black cow" is Korean slang for a sucker; Jeju Island is also known for its native black cattle.

[1080] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend.

[1081] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend.

We weren't related by blood, but he was as good as a real brother to me. That was who Jinho was.

I'd even considered asking him to live with me for a while because I felt uneasy about leaving him on his own.

I was planning to tell Mom and Hayeon after the college entrance exam anyway, so there's still some time, but…

I looked around the house, deep in thought. It looked different from the home in my childhood memories, but it was still the house my family had finally reclaimed.

A house that still held traces of my father, whose voice had faded in my memory.

At last, I made up my mind and opened my mouth.

"This house won't work, hyung[1082]. I know you'll be disappointed, but try to understand."

Jinho forced a bright expression and shook his head.

"Why would I be disappointed? This is all my fault."

"What about your stuff? Have you unpacked?"

"Not yet. It's only a few books and some clothes, so there isn't much. I'll just leave with you when you go to work."

Come to think of it, it had been bright outside for a while. It was already eight o'clock. Between the traffic and the distance from Ilsan to Bucheon, I was cutting it pretty close.

"I think we'll have to leave separately. Get your things ready."

"Okay."

"And clean the new place from top to bottom before I get off work."

"…Huh?"

"Don't get the wrong idea. I'm not talking about this house. Give me a second."

I pulled out my phone and searched through my messages.

At last, I found the address I wanted in my chat with Team Leader Choi, whom I'd saved as "Designer-Brand Junkie."

"Ah, here it is. I just sent the address to your phone. Find your own way there."

"Wait. What address?"

"An officetel.[1083]"

"Huh?"

"The Guild offered to provide me with a place. I turned it down last time because accepting it felt like too much, but I might as well take them up on it now."

A quiet laugh escaped me when I saw Jinho's eyes widen.

"Why are you so surprised? I'm doing pretty well these days."

"…!"

[1082] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend.

[1083] An officetel is a Korean building or unit designed for use as both an office and a residence.

“This house needs remodeling anyway, so let’s live there together. It’ll make my commute easier too.”

“Ta-Taekyung.”

I turned away, pretending not to hear the tremor in Jinho’s voice.

I had no desire to deal with an embarrassing scene first thing in the morning. Nor did I particularly want to be thanked by the man who had comforted me through the hardest period of my life.

It’s fine.

Yeah. This was enough.

It was mid-September. The worst of the heat had passed, but the morning commute hadn’t changed.

The taxi driver honked at the occasional inconsiderate driver cutting into traffic on the congested road, then turned up the radio.

> An F-rank Gate has appeared in Uldae-ri, Jangheung-myeon, Yangju City, and an immediate evacuation order has been issued. With nearby Hunters and military units cooperating to suppress it quickly, the confirmed number of casualties currently stands at six…

“Goddamn it. As if the traffic wasn’t bad enough, now those monster bastards are raising hell too.”

After delivering the colorful curse, he glanced at me in the passenger seat.

“You’re a Hunter too, right?”

“For now.”

At this point, I wasn’t entirely sure whether I was a Hunter or a Murim warrior.

Officially, at least in the modern world, I was a C-rank Hunter with Peace Guild.

The taxi driver grinned at my answer.

“I knew it. You can tell a Hunter at a glance.”

“I suppose so.”

It was like the difference between a herbivore and a carnivore.

There were exceptions, but everyone gave off a certain air. Someone my size carrying a large case had to be one of two things:

A musician who liked working out, or a Hunter.

You can tell at a glance.

It wasn’t anything particularly remarkable, especially for a taxi driver who met countless passengers every day.

But this middle-aged man's mouth never stopped moving.

"Hey, can I ask you something?"

"Sure."

"It feels like Gates have been opening more often lately. Can't anything be done about that?"

"…What?"

"I mean, how are ordinary people like me supposed to live without worrying? A Gate could open in my apartment parking lot the moment I wake up in the morning. What's the point of working my butt off taking fares when safe-zone land costs a fortune?"

I stared at him incredulously.

"That's true, but why are you asking me?"

"I know. I'm just frustrated, that's all. Frustrated."

"…So am I."

I was a Hunter, not a prophet.

How was I supposed to predict something even Nostradamus couldn't?

No one could predict when a Gate would form. The only reason they could suppress them quickly was because they had spent astronomical sums installing magical-power measuring devices all over the place.

Just like the breaking news now coming over the radio.

> Breaking news. The F-rank Gate reported earlier in Yangju City has been stabilized. Hunters and military forces have exterminated a total of fifty-eight goblins and are conducting a search for any remaining monsters…

"Every time you turn around, it's Gates and monsters. I'm sick to death of it."

Beep.

The taxi driver switched off the radio with an irritated jab.

An uncomfortable silence settled over the car, but I was more than happy to spend the rest of the trip in peace.

I wonder what Mom and Hayeon are doing right now.

I was gazing out the window, lost in thought, when it happened.

Honk! Hoooonk!

A faint blare pierced my ears, followed by a jumble of overlapping noises. I hurriedly rolled down the window.

What is that? Was there an accident?

The taxi driver stared at me in confusion.

"Why are you opening the window when I've got the air conditioner on—"

"Wait. Just give me a second."

My serious tone silenced him. I drew up my internal energy.

My hearing and vision, already far beyond the limits of an ordinary human, swept across the congested road.

“Huh?”

Far in the distance, a black dot shot into the air.

It began to fall in an arc, and I realized what it was.

“…A car?”

It had been crushed into a ball, but I could still see it clearly.

The crumpled hood. The twisted scrap metal.

The shower of glass spilling from it as it hurtled toward us.

And exactly where it was going to land.

Whoooooosh!

Oh, shit.

Why here of all places?

Chapter 207

Whoooosh.

An unidentified black sphere plummeted with a terrifying roar, tearing through the air.

As its shadow fell across the taxi, the driver, Mr. Park, knew he was going to die.

So this is how it ends.

The faces of his daughter, who had started high school that year, and his beloved wife flashed before his eyes. They had planned to go out for seolleongtang after work. Who knew that would be foreshadowing?[1084]

And today wasn't even lucky.

He didn't wonder what the thing was. Finding out wouldn't change the fact that he was about to die.

All he could do was sit frozen like a statue and stare helplessly as death drew closer by the second.

Whoooom!

It was time to depart for the afterlife.

The sphere's shadow swallowed the driver's seat. Mr. Park squeezed his eyes shut and finally screamed.

"Gaaaaaaaaah!"

Boom! Craaash!

Sheet metal crumpled like paper, and shards of glass flew in every direction. Then, in the next instant—

"Whoa, my eardrums almost burst. You've got quite a set of lungs on you."

"Gaaah… Huh?"

A voice pierced his ears.

Mr. Park stopped screaming and blinked.

"Huh? Huhhh?"

He couldn't tell whether he was dreaming or awake.

He had definitely been sitting in the driver's seat a second ago—no, half a second ago—but now he was sitting on the shoulder of the road roughly five meters[1085] away.

"W-What the hell…"

Mr. Park stared blankly at his taxi, now crushed flat, then looked up.

His savior was standing there—the man who had snatched him from the jaws of death.

[1084] Seolleongtang is a Korean ox-bone soup. The meal alludes to A Lucky Day, a Korean short story in which a rickshaw puller buys seolleongtang for his sick wife, only to return home and find her dead.

[1085] Five meters is about 16 ft.

“Y-You’re the passenger?”

The sturdily built young man, Jin Taekyung, did not answer. He was frowning at something in the distance.

“Sir.”

Mr. Park’s heart pounded. He already understood it instinctively. Something terrible was happening, and if he wanted to survive, he had to do exactly as this Hunter said.

“Run back the way we came. Don’t look back. Just keep running.”

“Y-Yes, sir!”

“And don’t forget to warn everyone else.”

“W-Warn them about what?”

Jin Taekyung pointed ahead.

Bright morning sunlight poured from the clear sky, but darkness was gathering where his finger pointed.

He spoke calmly to Mr. Park, whose mouth hung open in shock.

“A Gate has opened.”

At that moment, a bloodcurdling roar erupted from the far end of the road.

—Gwooooooar!

The monster’s roar was more effective than any loudspeaker.

The moment people realized what was happening, panic swept through them. They abandoned their cars and ran.

“A Gate! A Gate has appeared!”

“Run!”

“Seokjun! Honey!”

The gridlocked road descended into chaos in an instant.

Piercing screams and frantic shouts rang out from every direction.

I avoided the people sprinting back the way they had come and raced forward across the roofs of the cars. A System notification rang in my ears.

Ding.

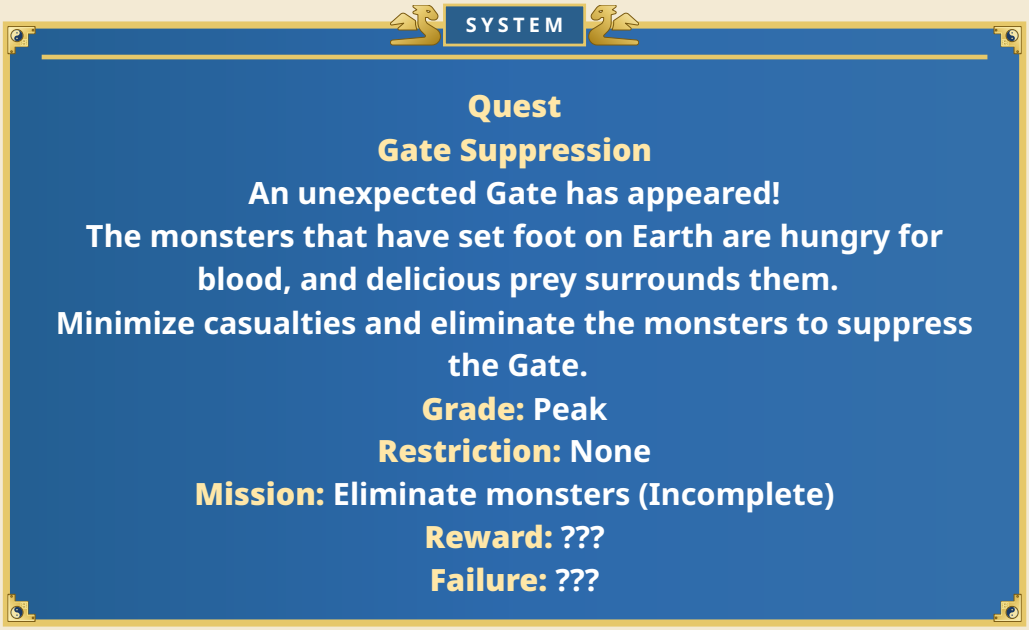
SYSTEM

A sudden Quest, Gate Suppression, has been created.
You cannot refuse the Quest.
The Quest has been forcibly accepted!

Now it isn’t even giving me a choice.

Couldn’t it at least ask first?

I clicked my tongue and opened the Quest window. A translucent holographic panel popped into the air.



This was a goddamn disaster.

Of all places, a Gate had appeared on a road jammed with morning commuters—not at sea or in the mountains.

Worse, the monsters weren’t small fry like goblins or Orcs.

—Gwooooooooar!

Boom! Krrr-boom!

They were larger than cargo trucks, with fangs bigger and sharper than industrial saw blades. Every swing of their dark iron clubs smashed concrete and cars to pieces.

In both strength and appearance, they were monsters in every sense of the word.

I never thought I’d run into creatures I’d only seen in monster encyclopedias on my way to work.

I muttered under my breath.

“Ogres…”

They were classified as B-rank monsters, but their strength and destructive instincts went far beyond that.

During the early days of the Great Cataclysm, it had been ogres who served as the vanguard of the monster legions and destroyed countless cities.

That must be why they’re considered top-tier even among B-rank monsters.

And now they had appeared right here.

The Gate had yet to open fully, so there were only five or six of them. Even that was an enormous threat.

I have to stop them before the casualties get any worse.

I wasn't the only one who thought so. Eight hundred meters[1086] ahead, I saw about twenty figures charging toward the ogres as they swung their weapons in every direction.

"Stop them!"

Clang-clang-clang!

Gleaming armor, shields, and all manner of weapons.

They were Hunters.

B-rank Hunter Hwang Cheol Soo broke out in a cold sweat.

A Gate… appeared?

What were the odds of a Gate appearing? He didn't know the exact figure, but he had heard they were lower than the odds of most natural disasters.

After the death of Demon King Asmodeus brought the Great Cataclysm to an end, the dozens of Gates that had once formed around the world each day became far less frequent. Leading scholars rushed to publish papers about the change.

Humanity's Victory: The End of Gates.

The Connection Between Demon King Asmodeus and the Gates.

Complete Peace Within Ten Years.

But they had all been wrong.

Gates had once appeared only once or twice every year or two, yet this was already the fourth to form in the country this year.

Worse, that fourth Gate had opened at the tollgate Hwang Cheol Soo was responsible for.

And it's a B-rank Gate.

That alone was horrifying enough, but the creatures emerging from it were ogres, classified as top-tier even among B-rank monsters.

Boom! Thud-thud-thud!

"Guh!"

"Healer!"

"Archers, keep firing! Tanks, draw their attention!"

Thud-thud-thud!

The tollgate team—two B-rank Hunters and fifteen C-rank Hunters—was being driven back helplessly.

After only two or three blows from an ogre's iron club, tower shields shattered and the tanks went flying one after another.

[1086] Eight hundred meters is about 0.5 mi.

What am I looking at?

Hwang Cheol Soo was only thirty.

He possessed neither combat instincts nor leadership ability. He was merely a public-service Hunter whose high rank had secured him a comfortable job and a generous pension.

What do I do? How am I supposed to handle this…?

As Hwang Cheol Soo stood frozen like a plaster statue, the assistant team leader shouted at him.

“Team Leader! Pull yourself together! We have to hold out until support arrives, no matter what it takes!”

“Y-Yeah. Right. We only have to last five more minutes.”

“We can take them once the special forces regiment and the nearby Hunters arrive. So—”

Wham! Boom!

Hwang Cheol Soo stared blankly as the assistant team leader was hurled into a refrigerated truck. A huge chunk of concrete had flown out of nowhere and struck him.

“Healer!”

The instant Hwang Cheol Soo shouted, he realized something.

The team had only two healers, and the assistant team leader had been the last one still standing.

Of the seventeen team members, Hwang Cheol Soo included, fewer than half remained on their feet.

“W-What the hell…”

Only one minute had passed since the battle began.

But the outcome had already been decided.

The gap between top-tier B-rank monsters and Hunters who had been lulled into peace while playing mobile games at a tollgate was simply overwhelming.

And their ordeal wasn’t over yet.

“Team Leader!”

“The Gate! Look at the Gate!”

Grkkk, grkkk—

At the team members’ shouts, the rift in the air began to widen.

Magical power churned within the pitch-black darkness as it spewed out enormous bodies.

—Gwoooooar!

—Kraaaagh!

Boom! Boom! Boom!

The ogres landed with savage bellows, and groans of despair rose from all around.

“Fuck…”

“A-Ah…”

The Hunters had been overwhelmingly outmatched even with nearly three times the numbers.

Now that the number of ogres had risen to ten, despair settled heavily over them.

“T-Team Leader…”

“W-What do we do now?”

“…”

Hwang Cheol Soo swallowed dryly.

The difference in strength was overwhelming. The outcome was no longer in question.

Only one thought filled his mind.

Can I survive?

He wasn’t the only one wondering that. Everyone there shared the same question.

And they were waiting for their commander to give them the answer they wanted.

“Team Leader!”

“I-I…”

Before he could finish speaking, Hwang Cheol Soo’s feet were already edging backward.

He had once sworn to become humanity’s shield and protect the people from the threat of monsters.

But he had no intention of dying like a dog here.

Even with reinforcements, we can’t kill those things.

That left only one option.

“B-Based on the commander’s judgment, we’ll make a strategic retreat…”

The moment Hwang Cheol Soo began speaking in a trembling voice—

Whoooooosh! Boom!

A streak of light shot past.

It flew over the heads of the Hunters slowly backing away, punched straight through its target, and blew it apart.

Splash.

What fell from the air in scattered droplets wasn’t rain, but blood. Chunks of rotten-smelling flesh followed, pelting down like hail.

“…Huh?”

Boom.

As someone let out a dazed murmur, the ogre’s enormous body toppled like a rotten old tree.

—Gwo?

“What the…?”

Humans and monsters alike stared blankly at the surreal sight.

Then—

“Whoa. What’s with that firepower?”

The cheerful voice was completely out of place.

Hwang Cheol Soo whirled around to find its owner, and goose bumps ran down his skin.

“Gasp.”

He hadn’t sensed the slightest trace of the newcomer’s presence. Even now, while staring directly at him, he still couldn’t.

But the figure standing tall atop a tour bus was neither a ghost nor a monster.

His eyes curved like half-moons between his roughly tousled black-brown hair.

“Hello.”

“W-Who are you?”

“Just someone on his way to work.”

“P-Pardon?”

“Uh, may I skip the formalities and get straight to the point?”

That was exactly what Hwang Cheol Soo wanted. The ogres had already recovered from their brief confusion and were approaching, dragging their iron clubs across the ground.

The Hunters nodded frantically. The young man, Jin Taekyung, grinned.

“If you’re not going to fight, all of you go stay tucked away in a corner.”

“…”

“Oh, and if I catch you stealing EXP, you’re dead.”

EXP? Stealing?

Before they could even figure out what he meant, the spear in Jin Taekyung’s hand turned into light and shot forward.

Whooooooosh!

Shriiiing! Crunch!

The spearhead punched through a thick jaw.

It tore through hide, flesh, tongue, and palate in succession before jutting out through the top of the ogre’s skull.

Iron clubs came hurtling in from both sides.

Whoooosh!

The air split with a terrifying shriek.

But I was already gone.

I slipped in close against one ogre's body, pulled a dagger from my Inventory, and drove it precisely into its Huiyin Acupoint.[1087]

Stab!

—Gwooooooooooooooooar!

"Congratulations on opening your Conception Vessel."

There was a world of difference between having a pathway forced open and opening one up.

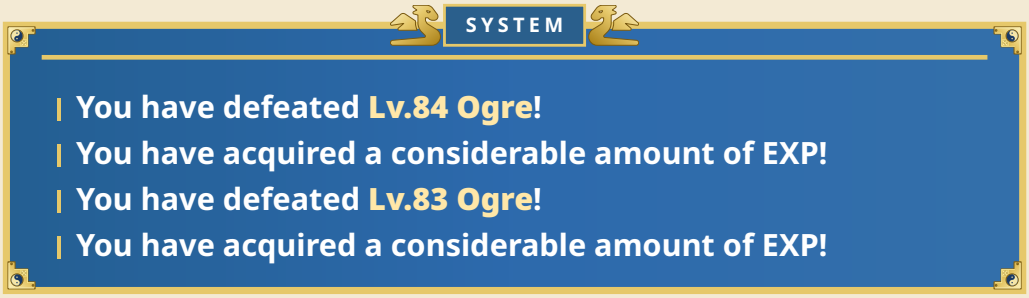
The ogre dropped to its knees with a howl that came from the depths of its soul.

Before it had time to feel any more pain, I slashed its throat with the dagger.

Squelch!

Monster blood and screams filled the air, while a succession of sweet sounds tickled my ears.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



Buuuuurp.

Man, I'm stuffed.

[1087] The Huiyin Acupoint is located in the perineum, between the genitals and anus. It is the starting point of the Conception Vessel in traditional acupuncture.

Chapter 208

Ranging unchecked in every direction.

That was me now. Wherever I looked, whatever came within reach, I cut, stabbed, and smashed my way through it. Every flash of my spearhead sent blood spraying and split flesh from bone.

I moved freely among the enormous ogres with nothing to stop me.

Srrk! Krrrunch!

—Gwooooooar!

With a death rattle, the three-meter-tall[1088] hulk dropped to its knees.

The Gate continued spewing out ogres, but they posed no problem for me. When two came out, I killed three. When three came out, I killed four.

This is easy. Almost ridiculously so.

The last time I had assigned points was during my duel with Chulwoo.

But opening my Conception and Governor Vessels had pushed my control and explosive power over my internal energy—as well as my senses—to an entirely new level.

Even when the ogres' iron clubs came crashing down from every direction with tremendous force, they looked unbelievably slow.

To me, the ogres were nothing but idiots who had no idea how to use their own strength.

Whoooosh! Thud!

—Grrrgh…

Another ogre—I'd lost count by now—dropped to its knees with a wet, blood-choked rattle.

Its furry hand reached for the spearhead piercing straight through its Adam's apple, then went limp and fell away.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You have defeated Lv.85 Ogre!
You have acquired a considerable amount of EXP!
Level Up!

"Oh."

I'd leveled up already.

Clearing them out by myself was raking in EXP at an insane rate.

[1088] Three meters is about 9.8 ft.

Is it because every last one of these bastards is higher-level than me?

My current Level was somewhere in the mid-to-high seventies, putting the ogres anywhere from five to ten Levels above me.

And since I was slicing through them like slabs of pork shoulder at a butcher shop, it was only natural that my Level would rise quickly.

The EXP was far more generous than I'd expected.

No, wait.

A thought flashed through my mind.

Eyes shining, I stared at the Gate as it churned and spat out another ogre.

This place was practically…

The hottest restaurant in town.

The Gate kept spitting out EXP—or rather, monsters—and I kept killing them. If that cycle continued…

So this is where the conveyor-belt sushi place was hiding.

The EXP from the ogres was sweeter than tuna belly.

My mouth curled into a grin at the thought of chewing up every ogre that came out and digesting them into points.

That was when it happened.

Vroooom. Rat-a-tat-tat-tat!

—Hold! Hold!

—Drop!

Three or four combat helicopters flew in on a blast of wind and circled overhead. Around twenty Hunters dropped from them like bolts of lightning.

Shu-shu-shu-shu!

They were falling from a height of more than twenty meters.[1089] From that high up, even Hunters equipped with magical Equipment were bound to strain their knees on landing.

But these newcomers weren't the incompetent amateurs who had been here before I arrived.

"Feather Fall."

At the mage's incantation, a ripple of mana passed through the air.

The bodies plunging rapidly toward the ground began to slow. The ogres about to swing their iron clubs hesitated when their timing was thrown off, and then the second spell activated.

"Grease!"

—Gwo?

Boom! Crash!

[1089] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

The four remaining ogres lost their balance. Some staggered, while others collapsed to the ground.

"Now!"

At the shout, the spell slowing the Hunters' descent was released, and the melee fighters shot forward like streaks of light.

The ogres let out low growls as they sensed their imminent deaths.

That was when—

Clang! Clang-clang!

"…Huh?"

The Hunters who had been about to plunge their weapons into the ogres' chests stared at me in disbelief.

What the hell did this bastard just do?

Is he insane?

That was exactly what their faces said.

I had knocked aside every one of their attacks with a single swing. In my most reasonable voice, I said, "Come on. Let's show a little professional courtesy."

"…"

These bastards were trying to steal mobs I already had dead to rights.

"That really happened?"

At the captain's question, the Hunter Team Leader nodded.

"Yes. I've been on the support team for two years, and I've never seen anyone like him."

"He sounds interesting."

"Interesting? He's a complete psycho."

"Perhaps."

The captain slowly surveyed the area.

The tollgate had collapsed so completely that its original shape was unrecognizable, and monster blood lay splattered across the half-destroyed road.

There were overturned and wrecked cars as well, but not many.

"How many casualties?"

Soldiers and Hunters had different statuses, but both were registered with the government as members of military support teams.

The Hunter Team Leader promptly answered his superior's question.

"So far, four dead and five severely injured. We'll know more once we finish checking."

"Four dead and five severely injured."

The captain calmly repeated the figures, then continued.

“This is already the second Gate occurrence today.”

“Tell me about it. An F-rank Gate erupted near Yangju City about an hour ago. I don’t know if something serious is going on.”

The captain clicked his tongue.

“Hey, Team Leader Jeong.”

“Yes, sir.”

“An F-rank Gate that appeared in the town center, or a B-rank Gate that appeared in the middle of a road packed with commuters. Which one looks more serious?”

“Well…”

“But the F-rank Gate caused more casualties. Ten dead and more than twenty severely injured.”

“What? That can’t be right. The breaking news said…”

“They downplayed it. Covered it up. You’ve been doing this for two years. You should know how things work around here by now.”

The captain let out a deep sigh.

“As far as we’re concerned, a hundred bows wouldn’t be enough to thank him. He’s a civilian hero who single-handedly prevented a catastrophe.”

“That’s true. He does seem a little crazy, though.”

“Team Leader Jeong.”

“Ah, no, that’s not what I meant. I mean he’s insanely strong and crazy. He killed more than ten ogres by himself, so he must be an A-rank Hunter or something.”

“Either way, watch what you say. There are plenty of ears around.”

“They’re all our people. What ears could there be—ah.”

Team Leader Jeong followed the captain’s gaze and immediately scowled.

A skinny, middle-aged man carrying an expensive camera was approaching with an excited spring in his step.

“Captain Yoo! Team Leader Jeong! Where have you two been hiding? I’ve been looking everywhere.”

The Hunter Team Leader replied with open displeasure.

“Hiding from you, Reporter Kim.”

“Oh, come on. Why are you so prickly today, Team Leader Jeong? I’m part of the support team too.”

“You’re only part of the team at times like this, huh? The rest of the time, you’re a military correspondent. You’re usually drowning in a hangover, and now you’re beside yourself just because you landed a scoop.”

The reporter flinched, and the captain stepped in.

"That's enough. And Reporter Kim, please be more mindful in the future. This is an accident scene. Running around by yourself in high spirits because you found a scoop doesn't look good."

"…Ahem. I'll be more careful from now on."

Even as he answered, anticipation gleamed in the reporter's eyes.

A Gate occurrence was nothing short of a natural disaster. In some ways, it was even worse.

If a typhoon was going to strike the Korean Peninsula, people could at least predict when and how it would arrive and which areas might be damaged. There was no predicting where or when a Gate would form.

Two Gates in one day was already unprecedented, and one of them was even B-rank.

A tollgate security team helplessly overrun, followed by the heroic arrival of an unknown Hunter who prevented a rush-hour catastrophe!

It was a great story.

The reporter had already sketched the whole article out in his head, and he was itching to get started.

"So where's our hero? He's an A-rank Hunter, right? What's his name? A fresh new face would sell better for a story like this."

"A new face? Give me a break."

The Hunter Team Leader pointed behind the reporter.

"He's over there. Your new face."

"Where? I don't see him."

No matter how much he looked around, there was no sign of a hero clad in gleaming armor.

All he could see were military personnel busily cleaning up the accident scene.

The reporter's eyes swept across the area before suddenly stopping.

"There, Team Leader Jeong. Is that him? In front of the ogre corpse…"

"The man in the sweatpants? Yes, that's him."

Swish. Srrk, srrk.

Squatting as if he were making a huge batch of kimchi,[1090] the young man deftly separated the fat, meat, and hide from the corpse. The reporter muttered,

"…Now that's a new face."

"Fresh, right? Isn't that the picture you wanted?"

"The ogre meat certainly looks fresh."

"He's been at it for a while. The staff offered to do it for him, but he won't let them touch anything. Says it's all his."

[1090] Making kimchi in large batches, known as kimjang, is traditionally a communal household activity in Korea.

Even funnier, his butchering technique was unbelievably good. The two employees assigned to process the corpses kept sneaking glances at his hands and copying his movements.

"Is he really an A-rank Hunter?"

"Who knows? He must be if he can wipe out ogres by himself, but the longer I look at him, the less convinced I am."

"Team Leader Jeong asked him, but he said they could talk once he finished butchering."

The three men exchanged looks filled with equal parts belief and doubt.

That was when—

"Whew. Finished."

The A-rank Hunter, who had cut the notoriously tough ogre meat into pieces like mackerel, straightened his back and stood up.

The reporter took in his sweatpants, baggy at the knees, and his three-striped slides, then muttered,

"Why does a guy who makes that much money live like this?"

Was this some kind of humblebrag?

It was absurd, yet the longer the reporter looked, the more novel the whole thing seemed. After all, nothing mattered more in the media than character.

A down-to-earth A-rank Hunter with a fierce sense of justice. This will make a great story. He's handsome, too, with bold, clean-cut features.

Yes, this was much better than some polished model-student image.

The reporter grinned and raised his camera.

He wanted a natural shot with no staging whatsoever.

That's an ogre for you. Not a single part goes to waste.

I looked over the neatly separated by-products with a satisfied smile.

Ogres were practically symbols of strength, which made them popular among men.

There were plenty of customers, but because ogres were classified among the highest tier of B-rank monsters, the supply was limited.

Good thing I only went for their vital spots.

I was humming as I sorted the by-products when—

Click.

"…Huh?"

I turned toward the mechanical sound that had come out of nowhere.

A middle-aged man repeatedly pressing his camera shutter smiled amiably at me.

"Oh dear, did I startle you?"

What the hell is with this guy?

I stared at him incredulously. "Most people are surprised when someone takes their picture without permission. You expect me to be happy about it?"

"You might be once you're in tomorrow's newspaper."

"The newspaper?"

"Ah, I haven't introduced myself yet. Here, let's start with my business card."

I accepted the military-camouflage business card and read it aloud.

"Military correspondent."

"You know the Capital Defense Command, right? I'm the military correspondent assigned to Support Team 25."

"Ah, yes."

"And the two gentlemen coming up behind me are from the support team as well."

The reporter smiled and gave me a thumbs-up as two men approached from behind him.

One wore a Special Forces uniform and the other wore armor. They were, well, dressed like your stereotypical soldier and Hunter.

"Nice to meet you. I'm Captain Yoo Sijin, Team Leader of Support Team 25."

"Ah, yes."

For some reason, that sounded like a name the sun might regret.[1091]

I tilted my head and exchanged introductions with the two men.

The perfunctory introductions and praise for my heroic deed had barely ended when the military correspondent, who had been staring at me with fervent eyes, spoke up.

"You said you're Hunter Jin Taekyung, correct?"

"Yes. Why?"

"Given the field I cover, I know nearly every A-rank Hunter. But…"

Ah, I had a pretty good idea what he was trying to say.

It was something I would have to deal with sooner or later.

I answered readily, "I'm not A-rank."

"What?"

"And I'm not S-rank either, of course."

"…"

Question marks seemed to appear on all three faces at once. I couldn't help chuckling.

This is fun.

[1091] Captain Yoo Si-jin is the name of the male lead in the Korean drama Descendants of the Sun.

After being knocked around this way and that in another world, I hide my strength in reality.

That would make a decent novel title.

When I merely smiled without answering, the reporter spoke in a faltering voice.

“Th-Then perhaps you’re B-rank?”

“No. I’m C-rank.”

“…C-rank? You mean C-rank, not C-cup?”

“Yes.”

What kind of bullshit is C-cup? And why the hell is he looking at my chest?

I ignored their waves of disbelief and continued, “I was on my way to the Guild when a Gate happened to open…”

“Th-Then what?”

I couldn’t answer the reporter’s urgent question.

I had just remembered something I’d momentarily forgotten.

“…By any chance, what time is it?”

Damn it. I’m late.

Chapter 209

Ten in the morning.

Im Kkeokjeong, a D-rank Hunter with the Peace Guild, arrived at work after a blissful vacation and stopped dead, his mouth hanging open.

“Whoa. What is this?”

His reaction was understandable.

Before his vacation—just one week ago—the Guild House had looked like a run-down neighborhood corner store on the verge of collapse.

But now, right before his eyes, stood a sign made of gleaming marble and luxurious lettering.

“Wow. They really went all out on the remodeling.”

As Kkeokjeong admired the exterior, a familiar voice came from somewhere.

“Why are you standing outside instead of coming in?”

Startled, he looked around. But there wasn’t so much as an ordinary security camera or intercom in sight, so he cautiously spoke up.

“Te-Team Leader Choi? Is that you?”

“Yes. It’s me.”

“What is this? How are you talking to me?”

The reply came without a moment’s hesitation, as though he had been waiting for that exact question.

“It’s nothing special. We commissioned Vercheni, a venerable Italian family of artisans, to custom-make it for us. It incorporates message, observation, and alarm magic…”

“Ah, no. You don’t have to explain all that.”

“Oh. Then simply open the mahogany door, which is covered in the hide of a fire-resistant salamander, and come inside…”

“I’m coming in! I said I’m coming in!”

“…Yes.”

Click.

The locked door slid open along with the strangely dejected reply.

The interior of the Guild House had changed just as dramatically as the exterior. Three people were waiting for Kkeokjeong inside.

“Welcome back.”

“Hunter Im.”

“Uncle, you’re here?”

There was Team Leader Choi, the true power behind the Peace Guild; Butler Kim, its nominal Guild Master; and Song Song, the guild’s sole female member.

The three of them were seated around a round table. As they greeted him in turn, Im Kkeokjeong let out a good-natured laugh.

"Maybe it's because it's been a while, but it's good to see you all. Did everyone get plenty of rest over the vacation?"

The moment he finished speaking, the expressions of all three changed strangely.

After a brief silence, Song Song spoke.

"I got some rest. There were so many bugs at home that they kept bothering me, though."

"Bugs?"

"Yes. Didn't you have any bugs at your place, Uncle?"

Kkeokjeong tilted his head.

Come to think of it, his wife had complained about something similar a few times during their vacation.

"Nothing much, just a fly or two. She said they kept coming in no matter how many she caught, so I left them alone, and then they quieted down. They hardly flew around, either."

"Oh, really?"

"Yeah. I've never seen such well-behaved flies."

Song Song shuddered uneasily.

"There were so many of them that I felt too creeped out to shower. It was like the bugs were watching me."

"The bugs? Hahaha! Miss Song, you sure know how to joke around."

"…"

Im Kkeokjeong threw his head back and laughed. He failed to notice the other three exchanging meaningful looks and words he could not hear.

Hunter Im doesn't seem to know.

Looks like he didn't notice.

Wow. How can this guy be so oblivious?

Unlike the other three, who had spent their entire vacation under surveillance by Familiars sent by the Sangdong Guild, Kkeokjeong had enjoyed a truly blissful break without knowing a thing.

It wasn't that he hadn't been watched. He had been watched; he simply didn't know it.

Ignorance truly was bliss.

"Those fucking perverts. If I catch them later, I'm going to rip their balls off."

Song Song's muttering would have sent chills down the spines of the Sangdong Guild's mages if they had heard it.

Kkeokjeong abruptly stopped laughing.

"Huh? What did you just say? Perverts?"

“No. I just said the bugs were disgusting.”

“Is it still bad? I know someone who works in that line of business. Want me to ask them about it?”

Song Song gave a quiet laugh at his genuine concern, then pressed her lips together and pointed at the two people sitting beside her.

“They’re all gone now. Those two took care of it. Especially Butler Kim.”

“Really? Kim hyung[1092]—I mean, Guild Master. I guess you know a thing or two about that kind of work.”

Butler Kim answered with an awkward smile.

“Not really. It just so happens that a junior of mine works in that field.”

“Ah, pest control?”

“…Yes. Something like that.”

In a way, monsters were merely enormous pests, so that wasn’t entirely wrong.

Im Kkeokjeong, who had effectively turned one of Bucheon’s leading Hunter Guilds into Cesco,[1093] continued in all seriousness.

“Your junior must be pretty good at his job.”

“Oh, he is.”

He was so good at beating them down that he was one of the war heroes of the Great Cataclysm.

Of course, to Butler Kim, Sangdong Guild Master Im Chunsoo was merely one of the trainees he had once worked like a dog.

“Let’s leave it at that. More importantly…”

Team Leader Choi had been grimacing for some time as he struggled to hold back his laughter. He quickly changed the subject.

There happened to be one person who made for a much more suitable topic.

“Why isn’t Jin Taekyung here?”

While they had been chatting and laughing, their scheduled start time had long since passed.

Only now realizing Jin Taekyung’s absence, Im Kkeokjeong nervously stroked his beard.

“What’s going on? Taekyung’s never done this before. When it comes to diligence, he’s the best person I know.”

“I’m well aware of that.”

Team Leader Choi nodded.

He had already investigated Taekyung’s past thoroughly. Judging by the several years documented in the report and everything he had personally witnessed since, Taekyung’s diligence and tenacity were genuine.

[1092] Hyung is how a man addresses an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[1093] Cesco is a Korean pest-control company.

The raid starts in two hours…

Had something happened?

Team Leader Choi was still considering the possibilities as he picked up his phone when Song Song, who had been quiet for a while, suddenly spoke.

“Taurus—I mean, Jin Taekyung.”

“…”

“He’s right there.”

Her pale, slender finger pointed over Team Leader Choi’s shoulder.

The next moment, the guild members naturally turned in the direction she indicated, and their mouths fell open.

A familiar face filled the eighty-inch television screen mounted on the wall of the Guild House.

“…Huh.”

“Taekyung! Isn’t that Taekyung?”

“I-I believe that is indeed Hunter Jin Taekyung.”

Even the perpetually composed Butler Kim was so flustered that he stammered.

By then, however, the guild members’ attention had already been seized by the caption beneath Taekyung’s face.

Jin Taekyung (Wonmi-gu, Bucheon. C-rank Hunter)

Live: Tollgate Hero

“Tollgate Hero? What’s that supposed to mean? Why can’t we hear anything?”

“It’s muted! The TV’s on mute! Turn the sound on, quick!”

Only after someone hurriedly fiddled with the television did the blocked sound begin to spill out.

Fwoosh-fwoosh-fwoosh-fwoosh! Rat-a-tat-a-tat!

Along with some incomprehensible noise, Jin Taekyung’s voice continued.

“…And that’s how it happened.”

“I see. Then could you give us a few final words about how you feel?”

“Uh, first of all, I love my family very much, and I’m incredibly grateful to all the members of the Peace Guild. And to the person I like…”

“Yes! I see.”

“W-Wait a second.”

“That’s all the time we have. Viewers, this has been our interview with Jin Taekyung, the Tollgate Hero!”

After one last shot of the reporter’s beaming face, the screen switched to a cosmetics commercial.

Im Kkeokjeong shouted, “What the hell was that? I couldn’t hear anything!”

“Hold on. I’ll search for it right now. Tollgate Hero, Tollgate Hero… Holy crap.”

“Song-i. What is it?”

Song Song had frozen, her eyes wide. Without a word, she held out her phone.

The main page of the web portal was displayed on the screen. The three syllables of Jin Taekyung’s name were plastered across it.

“Jin Taekyung is number one on the real-time search rankings.”

The Guild House fell silent as though someone had dumped ice water over everyone inside.

No one knew what to say about this completely unexpected turn of events.

Then—

Fwoosh-fwoosh-fwoosh-fwoosh! Rat-a-tat-a-tat!

“Whoa.”

“No way.”

It was the same sound they had heard during Jin Taekyung’s interview only a few dozen seconds earlier.

Everyone whipped around to look at the television, only to sigh when they saw the cosmetics commercial was still playing.

But only for a moment.

“Wait. Then why can we still hear it?”

Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim were the first to realize where the noise was coming from. They shouted together.

“Outside!”

“It’s outside! It isn’t the television!”

Crash!

The words had barely left their mouths when everyone sprang to their feet.

“Whoa, what is this?”

“Is this the right place?”

“Yeah, this is the Peace Guild. I heard they remodeled, but it looks incredible.”

“Would it be possible to interview the other guild members as well?”

“No. You cut my interview short earlier.”

“Hunter, about earlier…”

The speaker spell relayed the conversation with perfect clarity.

With the other guild members watching, Team Leader Choi steadied his breathing and brought the message-magic Equipment to his mouth.

“Jin Taekyung. It’s me.”

“Whoa, what the hell? Sound Transmission? Is that you, Team Leader Choi?”

“Yes.”

“What was that? How did you do it?”

Team Leader Choi opened his mouth without hesitation.

It was an instinct etched deep into his bones.

“It’s nothing special. We commissioned Vercheni, a venerable Italian family of artisans, to custom-make it for us…”

Kkeokjeong muttered a string of vicious curses under his breath.

I went to sleep and woke up a star.

I had never imagined I would experience that saying for real in my lifetime.

Especially not in real time like this.

“Hey, registered sibling.[1094] I just saw something I can’t believe.”

“Registered sibling? You want to die?”

“No, that’s not the point right now.”

Hayeon’s voice over the phone was filled with shock and disbelief.

“Oppa,[1095] your name is on Naver’s real-time search rankings…”

I could easily guess what she was about to say.

I had already received dozens of calls with similar questions over the past few hours.

I cut Hayeon off before she could continue.

“Number one on the real-time search rankings. Yeah, that’s me. It really is.”

“…Seriously? The Seoul Outer Ring Expressway Tollgate Hero? That’s you?”

“Don’t call me that. I’m dying of embarrassment.”

“Wow. I guess it really is you. The second I tapped your name, your profile picture popped up under ‘Person in the News.‘ Even after seeing it, I still thought there was no way.”

Even I hadn’t expected it to cause such a huge stir.

Only a few hours had passed, but searching my name online already brought up dozens of clickbait articles.

“What on earth happened? I read the articles, and it sounded insane. You’re not hurt, are you?”

“I didn’t even get a scratch, and it’d take too long to tell you the whole story. What about Mom? Has she heard the news about me?”

“Not yet. But if she finds out you fought monsters like that, she’ll faint.”

Hayeon wasn’t exaggerating.

What kind of creature was an ogre?

[1094] “Registered sibling” is a joking way to refer to a sibling as someone connected by the family register, rather than by affection.

[1095] Oppa is how a woman addresses an older brother or an older man with whom she is close.

Even someone who knew nothing about monsters could search a few times and learn that they were every bit as powerful as their grotesque appearance suggested.

I could already picture how Mom would react when she heard her son had fought such monsters.

“Damn. You’re right.”

“Ugh, I don’t even know anymore. Get home before everything blows up and at least show her your face.”

“Okay. I’ll stop by after the interview.”

“Interview? Are you doing one right now?”

“Yeah.”

“Where? For a women’s magazine or something?”

“The KPS Nine O’Clock News Desk. I’m waiting for my turn.”

“…Holy crap.”

Just as I was about to answer Hayeon, a television-station producer weighed down with Equipment urgently waved at me.

“This is live, so I have to go. See you at home later.”

“Uh-huh? O-Okay…”

I hung up and headed toward a news studio I had only ever seen on television.

Recording Equipment filled the place, and the station staff were all watching me. My mouth went dry, and my legs began to shake.

I’d rather fight a hundred ogres.

Each second felt like an eternity, but at last, the signal I had been waiting for came.

“We’re going live. Stand by… cue!”

Chapter 210

Sometimes, a carelessly tossed spark can grow into a massive blaze.

A day passed, then two, then three… and after about a week, that tiny spark had spread into a forest fire—with me standing at its center.

Daily newspapers, weekly papers, current-affairs magazines, lifestyle magazines, and more.

The newspapers and magazines piled high on the table all had one thing in common: my face and name were plastered across them.

Even looking at them was enough to make me feel overwhelmed by the sheer volume.

Why are there so many?

How many interviews had I given over the past week?

Every media outlet hungry for an exclusive had seized the opportunity and unleashed a flood of articles.

Reporters had staked out the Guild House and my home, while my personal information, past activities, and photographs circulated across the internet.

Jesus. These people are fucking insane.

I had thought I was somewhat used to fame after becoming fairly well-known in Murim, but compared to this, that had been nothing.

Korea had long been an internet powerhouse, and even those respectable, gray-haired people in their fifties had histories as keyboard warriors.

The saying that you could meet the entire country just by visiting a few major online communities wasn’t baseless nonsense.

“Why is everyone so interested in other people’s business?”

[1096] Hyung is how a Korean man addresses an older brother or an older male friend.

[1097] Bibimbap is a Korean dish of rice mixed with vegetables and other toppings, often served with chili paste.

At my mutter, Jinho hyung[1096] shrugged while eating bibimbap[1097] from a large metal bowl.

"It's a good thing. You're famous for doing something good."

"I don't know about that. There are all kinds of lunatics out there."

"Ah, right. What happened with your family…"

Jinho quietly shut his mouth when he saw my expression. I hadn't looked in a mirror, but I was sure I looked downright murderous.

Of all the people they could've messed with, they went after my family?

The world really was a big place, and it was full of lunatics.

After I appeared on the KPS Nine O'Clock News, the public response exploded, and reporters hungry for a fresh scoop combed through everything connected to me with a fine-tooth comb.

The problem was that my family's personal information had been exposed in the process.

"You know Hayeon called a few days ago, right? Reporters kept following her whenever she went out, so she ordered delivery—and the delivery guy turned out to be a reporter in disguise."

"Yeah, that bastard really was a hack. I'd heard stories about reporters like that, but I never imagined they'd actually go that far."

"Some of them even hired Familiar mages."

If that wasn't hack journalism and paparazzi behavior, I didn't know what was.

I saw red when I first heard about it, but before I could personally go after the reporter and the media outlet, netizens rose up like wildfire.

Several massive online communities, each claiming more than a million registered members, were still blazing away with hack reporters as their firewood.

> ㄴ Top Comment: LOL, these fucking hack reporters are crossing the line again. How many people survived because of Taekyung the Lord,[1098] and they're pulling this shit? I'm embarrassed for them.
>
> ㄴ They would've done the same thing even if their own families had been there. They're just fucking crazy.
>
> ㄴ What company is it? Post the article link.
>
> ㄴ Hailey News. Reporter B.H.Y. The original's been deleted, but it's already too late, LOL.
>
> ㄴ Let's turn it into Hell News.
>
> ㄴ It already is. The site's been shut down.

[1098] "Taekyung the Lord" uses an online nickname convention that playfully elevates someone to an admired figure.

> ㄴ Top Comment: I heard another media outlet used wiretapping magic and even hired a Familiar mage. What happened to them?
>
> ㄴ Everyone involved is having a reunion in the holding cells. Their lives are probably over.
>
> ㄴ The commenter above doesn't know Hell Joseon.[1099] The ones who gave the orders will get suspended sentences at worst, LOL.
>
> ㄴ Nope. A national petition went up about it, and it passed three million signatures yesterday. The Blue House is supposedly preparing legislation. Looks like they're going to overhaul the whole system this time.
>
> ㄴ We'll have to wait and see, but I really hope they do.
>
> ㄴ They'll probably clean house while they're at it. Blinded by their hunger for an exclusive, they messed with someone they never should have touched.
>
> ㄴ Me. A man in his twenties. Everyone my age. Loves Jin Taekyung.

The response left me more bewildered than anything else. I was happy, but it also felt like a burden.

I really only did what anyone should have done.

It had been an accident no one could have predicted.

The news kept calling me a hero who had prevented a major disaster, but every now and then, I found myself wondering whether there might have been one fewer casualty if I had been just a little faster.

"What's with that expression?"

"Huh? Nothing."

"Someone with nothing wrong doesn't pick at his food like that."

"I've already eaten three bowls."

"You normally eat at least five."

"…That's true."

"Hey, Taekyung. I'm not really qualified to give you advice, but let me say one thing."

It had been a while since I'd heard Jinho sound so serious. He set down his spoon, still smeared with red pepper paste, and continued slowly.

"Don't try to be a hero."

"…"

"You're not a god. How can you save everyone? Even gods can't do that."

He was right.

[1099] "Hell Joseon" is an online term criticizing the harshness and unfairness of life in Korea.

I wasn't denying the existence or power of a god, but that didn't mean I could reconcile myself to it, either.

The only things I knew for certain were that hundreds of millions of people had died during the Great Cataclysm, that my father had died in an accident, and that my family had lived a poor, desperate life.

"What was your dream again?"

"To let my family live without envying anyone else. To protect the people I care about."

"Sum it up in one word."

A quiet laugh escaped me.

Instead of landlord, the word I'd parroted day in and day out, something unexpected came to mind.

The greatest under heaven… no, the greatest of all time?

I briefly lost myself in thought, then hurriedly answered when I saw Jinho's puzzled expression.

"Hmm. A strong Hunter landlord?"

"Exactly. That's enough. You've practically achieved your dream already, so don't torment yourself with pointless greed and guilt."

"Pointless greed…"

"Let me ask you one thing. Taekyung, did you fight those monsters because you wanted all this?"

"Absolutely not."

"Then that's enough."

Jinho grinned and picked up his spoon again.

"Just enjoy it. Think of it as a reward for all the hardship you've endured and the good you've done. Wouldn't that make things easier?"

A reward.

I had already received plenty of rewards through the System, but the reward Jinho was talking about meant something completely different.

It wasn't something material or some kind of power. It was an emotional reward.

He was telling me to find some contentment and room to breathe.

Contentment and room to breathe.

The words felt unfamiliar as I repeated them silently.

Back when I was an F-rank Hunter, I fought monsters for money. Now, I was working even harder to become stronger.

The more I thought about it, the more I realized what a greedy bastard I was.

"Hyung.[1100]"

[1100] Hyung is how a Korean man addresses an older brother or an older male friend.

“Yeah? What is it?”

“Nothing. Just… thanks.”

Jinho froze with a heaping spoonful of bibimbap[1101] halfway to his mouth.

“Really?”

“I mean it.”

“Then lend me a hundred thousand won.[1102]”

“Don’t start talking about money just because things got awkward.”

“I mean it, too.”

“…”

What the hell was with this guy?

As I stared at him in disbelief, the phone on the table buzzed, and a text message appeared.

> Team Leader Choi
>
> Team Leader Choi
>
> I’ve arrived. Come down to the underground parking garage right away.

Just as his message said, Team Leader Choi was waiting for me in the underground parking garage.

The problem was that he wasn’t alone.

“I’m from Oh My God News! Could you say a few words about the current situation?”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung, I’m Reporter Hong from Housewives’ Daily. You were voted the number-one ideal man among married women in their forties this week…”

“This is Vivid Current-Affairs Talk! What do you think about the comment in Parliament regarding the size of your arms?”

“Where are you going right now? What did you eat?”

More than twenty people thrust cameras and microphones at me. It was utter chaos.

While I let out a deep sigh, Team Leader Choi calmly pushed back the enemy forces.

“Please step aside.”

“Just a moment. It’ll only take a second.”

[1101] Bibimbap is a Korean dish of rice mixed with vegetables and other toppings, often served with chili paste.

[1102] One hundred thousand Korean won is about $71 or €65 at the project rates.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung is a member of the Peace Guild. Please submit interview requests through the Guild’s official website.”

When had they even made an official website?

They had posted a massive recruitment notice for new Guild members not long ago, too. It seemed they intended to make the most of this opportunity.

But despite Team Leader Choi’s efforts to stop them, the reporters clung to us stubbornly. Apparently, not getting a single interview over the past few days had eaten away at them.

“You’re the Team Leader of the Peace Guild, right? We weren’t asking you, so move!”

“Yeah, get out of the way! Your website is garbage, too. How long are we supposed to wait after submitting an inquiry before we get an interview?”

“It’s just one word. Why are you acting so precious?”

“Are you looking down on us because we’re a tiny second-rate media outlet?”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung is my team member, and I am currently the Guild’s spokesperson, so I have every right to intervene. The website is functioning normally, I have never played hard to get, and I ignored you because you failed to follow the proper procedure.”

Team Leader Choi answered without so much as blinking as he smoothly pushed the reporters and cameramen aside.

He looked slender, but an incredible amount of strength was packed into that body. He was only using one arm, yet the people blocking our path were pushed back one after another.

“Whoa!”

“Hey, he’s using force now?”

“A Hunter! The Hunter is beating people up!”

Go on, make a whole fucking scene…

I swallowed the words that had risen to my throat.

Just by looking at them, I could tell the reporters in front of us were low quality.

Team Leader Choi had arranged dozens of interviews over the past week as the Guild’s spokesperson. If he was filtering these people out, it didn’t take a taste test to tell whether they were soybean paste or shit.

Why are their questions such garbage in the first place?

They weren’t worth answering. Anything I said would obviously be twisted maliciously before publication.

“We’re coming through.”

Team Leader Choi ignored them and continued clearing a path.

“Whoops!”

Crack!

A camera slipped from someone’s hand, struck the parking-garage floor, and shattered.

The problem was that the entire sequence felt blatantly deliberate.

“My camera! Oh, no!”

His voice was full of anguish, but his eyes gleamed as if he had finally caught us.

Team Leader Choi stared at the cameraman’s terrible acting, then bent down and reached for the broken device.

The cameraman irritably slapped his arm away.

“Don’t touch it! Everything you did was recorded, so you’d better be ready—”

Smack! Crack.

Everyone’s eyes dropped to the floor.

The wristwatch that had fallen from Team Leader Choi’s wrist rolled across the parking-garage floor.

More than ten watch hands. Jewels set densely across its surface. And a face cracked like a spiderweb.

“…”

“…”

Gulp.

The sound of the cameraman swallowing echoed through the parking garage.

Then Team Leader Choi’s quiet voice pierced everyone’s ears.

“The Universe-302, the final masterpiece personally crafted in his later years by Peter Philip, Switzerland’s greatest watchmaker. How tragic that this beautiful pinnacle of automatic mechanical watchmaking, which survived even the Great Cataclysm, should be destroyed so senselessly.”

“…”

Team Leader Choi picked up the watch—Universe, School Bus, or whatever it was—with sorrowful eyes and delivered the final blow.

“I’m suing you.”

At Choi Moses’s miracle, the crowd parted in two.

Vroom.

The luxury sedan glided smoothly over the asphalt.

Team Leader Choi glanced at the rearview mirror and spoke.

“They aren’t following us anymore.”

“…I wouldn’t follow us, either. How much is that watch worth?”

“More than you can imagine. Assuming it’s genuine, of course.”

“Oh, it’s an imitation? No wonder. I thought it was strange that you’d throw away such a valuable luxury watch so easily.”

“You noticed?”

“It would’ve been even stranger if a wristwatch came loose that easily.”

“I only scared them a little. I wore it in case something like this happened. It was a good choice.”

Wasn’t this guy basically Zhuge Liang?[1103]

As I admired Team Leader Choi’s clever trick, something suddenly darted in front of the sedan just as we were leaving the officetel[1104] neighborhood.

“Team Leader Choi!”

Screeeeeech!

Team Leader Choi hit the brakes half a beat before I shouted. Staring through the windshield at the person in front of us, he muttered,

“He doesn’t look like a reporter.”

I agreed.

An ordinary person could not wear such a relaxed smile in a situation like this.

And…

Even without activating Qi Sense, I could feel the considerable energy coiled within the man smiling at us.

A Hunter. A pretty high-level one, too.

The uninvited guest, a man in his early thirties wearing a suit, tapped on the window.

“Let’s talk.”

[1103] Zhuge Liang was a Chinese statesman and strategist renowned for his cleverness.

[1104] An officetel is a Korean building containing units used as offices or residences.

Chapter 211

I stared at the man who had suddenly stepped in front of the car.

He's definitely a Hunter, but…

The reason I found myself thinking that despite sensing his extraordinary energy was his flashy appearance.

From his intricately patterned semi-formal suit to the designer labels covering him from head to toe, everything about him screamed luxury.

Then there was his smooth, taut, blemish-free skin and teeth so white they looked almost unnatural.

No matter how I looked at him, he seemed more like a celebrity than a Hunter.

Maybe that was why he looked strangely familiar.

He's even more over the top than Team Leader Choi.

They both liked luxury brands, but the man in front of us took it a little too far.

The huge sunglasses he was wearing on such a gloomy day certainly didn't help.

"Can't you hear me? Is this thing under a noise spell or something?"

At the man's mutter, Team Leader Choi lowered the window.

"What can I do for you?"

"Oh, you can hear me. Then why didn't you answer?"

"We're short on time. If you have nothing else to say, please step aside."

"You must be pretty busy."

"Yes. Very."

The man studied Team Leader Choi's calm response with an odd look, then turned to me.

"You're Jin Taekyung, right? You're even better-looking in person than you are on-screen. No wonder the women's online communities went wild."

"Whoa, really…? Wait, who are you?"

"As you've probably guessed, I'm not a reporter trying to get an interview. I run a Guild in Incheon."

"Oh."

I could more or less guess what he wanted without asking.

Another recruitment offer, probably.

I was used to it by now.

Ever since I became famous, Guild after Guild had approached me.

Taking down a group of ogres single-handedly had proven my ability, and all the media exposure had given me plenty of publicity.

To them, I was a highly desirable "product" in more ways than one.

"Here. My business card."

By now, I had become a master at turning people down.

I accepted the card and put on the most natural smile I could manage.

“I’m sorry, but I’m not considering changing Guilds at the moment.”

“Really?”

“Yes. I’m quite satisfied with my current Guild. They were also the first to reach out to me.”

At my immediate answer, a faint smile flickered across Team Leader Choi’s lips in the rearview mirror.

The man looked back and forth between Team Leader Choi and me, then rubbed his chin.

“That’s a shame.”

“I’ll get in touch another time.”

“Still, there’s no harm in having a cup of coffee together, right? I’m a fan.”

“Pardon?”

“Thirty minutes. No, fifteen should be enough. I’m a busy man myself, so I can’t come by often.”

What the hell was this guy talking about?

Making a recruitment offer in front of Team Leader Choi was already incredibly rude, but now he was simply doing whatever he pleased.

He’s crossing the line.

That was the look I was giving the man as I wondered how to deal with him when —

“That’s strange. Did I misread the interview?”

“…?”

“You said it in Weekly Hunters. You said I was your favorite Hunter.”

I blinked.

Only then did I realize who he was—and why he had seemed so familiar.

“C-Could you be…?”

The man grinned at my reaction.

“That hurts. I went to the trouble of giving you my business card, and you didn’t even look at it properly.”

I hurriedly lowered my gaze to the card.

The metal business card gleamed gold as though it had been plated, and clear letters were engraved across its surface.

> Star Guild CEO Won Myunghoon

“W-Whoa!”

Seeing me splutter like Mute Samryong,[1105] the man—no, the A-rank Hunter Won Myunghoon—reached through the half-open window and offered me his hand.

"Nice to meet you, Taekyung."

Won Myunghoon.

He was thirty-nine years old, and his birthday was April 1. He stood 185 centimeters[1106] tall, weighed eighty kilograms,[1107] and had a well-proportioned physique.

While preparing for the physical education college entrance exams, he awakened as an A-rank Hunter on his twentieth birthday. With his exceptional ability and good looks, he earned a reputation as a man who had it all.

"Do you think that's all? He has an amazing personality, too. He donates often, and there are countless heartwarming stories about him. He even runs a scholarship foundation…"

Team Leader Choi, who had been listening to my endless stream of information, asked with an incredulous expression,

"How do you know all that? Why have you memorized his physical stats and even his birthday?"

"I told you. He's my favorite Hunter."

It was something I said at least once in every interview.

The people I respected most were my parents. My favorite Hunter was Won Myunghoon.

"…Even so. At this point, isn't it practically love?"

"What a horrifying thing to say. He's more like a role model. The Won Myunghoon Syndrome. Haven't you heard of it?"

"I haven't."

"Oh, dear…"

"What's with that pitying look?"

Because I feel sorry for you for not knowing how cool Won Myunghoon is.

Things were very different now, but up through my school days, Won Myunghoon's influence had been tremendous.

Being an A-rank Hunter was impressive enough, but he also had incredible star power. Whenever you turned on the television, his face was there.

Back then, he had been the very definition of an all-around entertainer.

"Movies, dramas, commercials. He could sing, too, so he even released albums."

[1105] Mute Samryong is the title character of a Korean short story.

[1106] 185 centimeters is about 6 ft 1 in.

[1107] Eighty kilograms is about 176 lb.

“You mean he was a singer as well? A Hunter?”

“Team Leader, you’d recognize the songs if you heard them. Go, Coward, I Don’t Know Hunters, Escape… He had tons of hits. He even demolished Japan’s Unicorn chart.”

He had been the role model of countless aspiring Hunters and one of the few male singers welcomed at military morale-boosting performances.

I hummed a few lines as a demonstration, and Team Leader Choi showed a flicker of recognition.

“Oh, I think I’ve heard I Don’t Know Hunters before.”

“Right? It’s still on the popular karaoke charts. Anyway, that’s how famous Myunghoon hyung[1108] is. There’s even a saying that any Korean man who doesn’t know Won Myunghoon is either a spy or a monster.”

“Is living abroad for a long time really enough to get me called a monster?”

“Who called you a monster? You’re overreacting.”

“Hoo.”

Team Leader Choi shook his head, then suddenly looked puzzled.

“But even taking all that into account, the name Won Myunghoon feels strangely unfamiliar.”

“When did you return to Korea, Team Leader?”

“Three years ago.”

“Ah, then you might not know about that incident. It was pretty shocking, so everyone in the media keeps quiet about it.”

“An incident?”

“Yes. Though I suppose it has already been eight years. What happened was…”

Just then, Won Myunghoon, who had briefly stepped away to use the restroom, came walking toward us from a distance, waving.

“Team Leader, Myunghoon hyung[1109] is calling me. I’ll get going.”

“…Go ahead. I have about thirty minutes to spare anyway, so I’ll look at some clothes in the department store nearby.”

“Yes, yes.”

I answered vaguely and ran toward Won Myunghoon.

He let out a quiet laugh at the sight of me. His smile looked so youthful that it was hard to believe he would turn forty in just a few months.

“What about your Team Leader?”

[1108] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend with whom he is close.

[1109] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend with whom he is close.

"He went to take care of something. More importantly, hyung,[1110] you can speak casually with me."

"Hyung?[1111] The age gap between us is too large for that."

"Oh, come on. These days, twelve years practically makes us the same age."

"Should I, then?"

"Yes."

"Haha. I'm glad to have a good younger brother like you, Taekyung."

"…!"

I trembled with emotion.

Good heavens. Won Myunghoon and I were now hyung[1112] and dongsaeng.[1113]

If Jinho hyung,[1114] who had once even managed Won Myunghoon's fan café, found out about this, he would cling to my trouser leg and refuse to let go. He would insist that the three of us swear a Peach Garden Oath[1115] together.

Not a chance.

A pleased smile spread across my face.

Drunk on happiness, I followed Won Myunghoon into a nearby café. A male part-time employee in his early twenties was reading a book behind the counter. He looked up with a mechanical customer-service smile.

"Welcome. May I take your or—"

A brief silence followed.

Then a breathy gasp escaped his lips.

Of course.

He was a hardcore Won Myunghoon fanboy, too. I nudged Won Myunghoon in the side with my elbow and whispered,

"As expected of you, Myunghoon hyung.[1116] You're still incredibly popular."

"Haha, this is embarrassing. It's been a while since I gave anyone an autograph."

Won Myunghoon laughed awkwardly.

Feeling proud for no reason, I puffed out my chest.

That was when—

"Jin Taekyung? You're Jin Taekyung, right?"

"…Huh?"

"From the Outer Ring Road a little while ago! The B-rank Gate!"

"I-I am, yes."

"Wow. That's fucking awesome."

Muttering in amazement, the employee hurriedly pulled out a piece of paper and a pen and held them toward me.

"Could you give me your autograph?"

What on earth was going on?

Not Myunghoon hyung[1117]… me?

I turned around in bewilderment and found myself looking at Won Myunghoon's face.

His gaze was cold, his expression stiff.

It was a side of him I had never seen anywhere before. But the next moment, it vanished like a mirage beneath his warm voice.

"What are you waiting for? You should give him your autograph."

"Pardon? Oh, yes."

The café lights must have been too bright. I must have seen wrong.

With a strange sense of déjà vu, I took the pen.

"What should I write?"

The employee answered eagerly.

"Please write, 'Hye-gyeong, I hope you and Jinwoo have a beautiful relationship.'"

"…"

Oh, for fuck's sake.

The initial awkwardness soon faded, and the moment I sat down, I spent more than twenty minutes enthusiastically showing off my fanboy devotion.

"As you know, hyung,[1118] there aren't that many A-rank Hunters who use spears."

"Hmm. That's true. Quite a few people started with spears, then switched to swords later."

Although spears looked easy to use, they were actually very tricky weapons.

Their reach gave you an advantage, but the problem was that you couldn't always maintain that advantage.

[1117] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend with whom he is close.

[1118] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend with whom he is close.

Spears worked well enough in low- and mid-level Gates, but high-level Gates were full of dangers no one could anticipate.

There had even been a time when I considered using a one-handed sword and shield.

“But you stuck with the spear all the way. You even wrote your own manual.”

“That was a long time ago. It must have been… ten years by now.”

“Yes. Exactly ten years ago. I was in my first year of high school, and you were already a ranker.”

Just as there were differences in skill among Peak masters, there were differences among A-rank Hunters.

Of the roughly one hundred thousand Hunters in Korea, the hundred strongest were known as rankers.

“I referred to that manual a lot later, when I was at the training center.”

“Really? I don’t know if it was actually helpful.”

“Of course it was. It helped me a ton.”

“If that’s true, then I’m glad.”

Of course, the manual had only worked up through low-level Gates.

That went without saying in the Murim, where martial arts had developed to a level the modern world couldn’t begin to compare with.

But it helped me a lot back then.

The easiest way to explain it was that the manual had been written at the level of a novice.

You couldn’t teach an ant how a tiger moved.

After I finished praising him from every possible angle, Won Myunghoon tilted his lukewarm coffee cup.

“That’s all in the past.”

“You’re still in your prime and actively working.”

“No. It’s been a long time since I lost my ranker status, and people have mostly forgotten about me.”

“…Hmm.”

Was this because of that incident?

It was unfortunate, but I couldn’t deny it completely. Over the past eight years, countless star Hunters had emerged who could match or surpass Won Myunghoon, and the public had cheered for brighter lights.

“It wasn’t until last year that I finally thought about starting again. As it happened, I also took over a Guild from an acquaintance who was about to retire.”

“The Star Guild?”

I had discreetly searched for it earlier.

Star Guild was the name Won Myunghoon had given it after taking over. Before that, it had been a sizable, established Guild that ranked among the top three in Incheon.

"Yeah. A few lines appeared in the news, but that was the end of it. Did you know about it?"

"Last year… I'm sorry. I was a little busy back then."

It wasn't just then. For the past several years, I had repeated the same routine day after day.

Raids, goshiwon,[1119] raids.

At the end of the day, I went home to sleep and eat, then headed back out to fight monsters.

Even if I had heard the news, I would have forgotten it soon enough. To me, Won Myunghoon was already a fond memory, not someone who belonged to the present.

"There's no reason to apologize."

Won Myunghoon smiled bitterly and continued.

"It's not like I'm the only flash in the pan. I suppose that was simply the limit of what I could achieve."

A flash in the pan.

It might have been true because his active career had been so short, but in another sense, it was wrong.

A star?

Even if he had appeared in a few movies, dramas, and commercials and released some albums, Won Myunghoon was first and foremost a Hunter.

He had beaten the incredibly low odds of awakening, and thanks to that, he had seized tremendous wealth and fame.

Even though he had gone through an unfortunate incident…

Maybe this is him returning to his original self.

Despite my lingering unease, I nodded.

It wasn't that my thought was wrong. It was simply different. I had no desire to bring it up and make the atmosphere uncomfortable.

"I see."

"Then I heard about you. You were incredible. It felt like I was looking at my old self."

"M-Me?"

"Yeah. I searched for and read your interviews. I was happy and grateful to hear that you were such an enthusiastic fan of mine. Thanks to you, I even received offers to appear on television from several places."

[1119] A goshiwon is a Korean boarding house offering small, inexpensive rooms.

“Oh.”

Had my interview actually helped Won Myunghoon?

I was scratching my chin with an awkward smile when—

A hand clamped around mine.

“Taekyung. Can I make you an offer?”

“…Hyung?[1120]”

Won Myunghoon gripped my hand tightly and spoke with a serious expression.

“Transfer to our Guild. I’ll take responsibility for you, Taekyung. I’ll turn you into a star Hunter.”

[1120] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend with whom he is close.

Chapter 212

“Transfer to our Guild. I’ll take responsibility for you, Taekyung. I’ll turn you into a star Hunter.”

I blinked.

“A star… Hunter?”

“Yeah. A star Hunter.”

Won Myunghoon continued with absolute confidence.

“Times have changed. People go crazy for Hunters. They envy us for the abilities they don’t have. You know that too, don’t you, Taekyung?”

“That’s true.”

“Do you know what the kids around me wanted to be when I was in elementary school? President. Astronaut. But these days? Children and adults alike all want to be Hunters.”

Wealth and fame.

Those were the two words most people associated with being a Hunter.

Even now, decades after the Great Cataclysm ended, they don’t want to think about the fact that hundreds of Hunters still die in Gates every year.

“You have everything the public wants. Good looks, buzz, and a fresh character unlike anything they’ve seen before.”

Won Myunghoon’s face flushed with excitement. His heated voice continued.

“But how long will that last? The public gets excited quickly and loses interest even faster.”

“Hyung.[1121]”

“If you let this opportunity pass, you won’t even become a flash-in-the-pan star, Taekyung. Fortunately, it isn’t too late yet. If you start getting professional management now, appear on television, and work on your image…”

“Wait, wait. Hyung.[1122]”

“Huh? Oh. Right.”

Won Myunghoon fell silent, and I scratched my chin.

I hadn’t expected the conversation to go in this direction, but I might as well make things clear while I had the chance.

“You said you weren’t going to try to recruit me. You told Team Leader Choi that, too.”

“I did. But Taekyung, this is a really good opportunity.”

“Uh, I’m sorry, but I have no intention of changing Guilds.”

[1121] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or older male friend.

[1122] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or older male friend.

Won Myunghoon opened and closed his mouth as if he was about to say something, then nodded.

“Right. That’s understandable at your age. Then let’s forget about changing Guilds. How about signing with an entertainment agency instead? It’s pretty common these days.”

“An entertainment agency?”

“Yeah. I happen to own a major stake in one.”

Holding contracts with two Guilds was illegal, but there was nothing wrong with engaging in other kinds of work.

Just as he’d said, it was no longer unusual for high-ranking Hunters to sign with entertainment or management agencies.

But I answered without hesitation.

“No, I don’t need an agency either.”

“What?”

“I’m satisfied with what I have now.”

“…You’re satisfied?”

“Yes.”

Won Myunghoon frowned.

“Taekyung. You don’t seem to understand what I’m saying.”

“You’re saying I won’t become a star if I let this opportunity pass, right? That’s fine. I didn’t do any of this because I wanted to be one.”

“I know. I know, but think it over one more time. Just one regular television show and a few major commercials could bring in billions of won[1123]—even tens of billions of won.[1124] Can’t you tell just by looking at me?”

Won Myunghoon spread both arms wide. From head to toe, he was dressed in luxury brands whose names and prices I couldn’t even begin to guess.

I suddenly remembered an Internet article I had seen in the past.

> A-Rank Hunter Won Myunghoon Purchases Building Worth Tens of Billions of Won[1125] in Cheongdam-dong

The man from that article—the man I had admired and envied endlessly—was standing right in front of me.

[1123] “Billions of won” here refers to roughly 2–9 billion won, or about $1.4–6.4 million and €1.3–5.8 million.

[1124] “Tens of billions of won” here refers to roughly 20–90 billion won, or about $14–64 million and €13–58 million.

[1125] “Tens of billions of won” here refers to roughly 20–90 billion won, or about $14–64 million and €13–58 million.

"I saw your interview. You've been pretty busy. Isn't it time you enjoyed life a little? I heard your dream was to own a building."

"That's true."

It had changed a little, but it was still one of the goals I wanted to achieve.

When I nodded readily, Won Myunghoon flashed me a grin.

"Then signing with an entertainment agency would be much faster than focusing on Guild work. You wouldn't have to fight monsters in dangerous Gates, either. All you'd have to do is spend a few hours working in a nice, cool studio. Though full makeup can feel a little stifling. Ha-ha."

"Oh, really?"

"Of course. You just need to get used to smiling brightly and delivering your lines in front of a camera."

"Then I'd probably prefer Gates. I'm more the physical type, and I don't like feeling stifled."

"…What?"

"I also swear a lot in everyday life. It wouldn't pass broadcast standards. Even if I attracted attention for no reason, my family would just suffer like they are now."

"T-Taekyung."

I continued speaking as I watched his obvious bewilderment.

"And as for owning a building, I can become a building owner without doing television or commercials. It'll take some time, but still."

"What are you talking about? A-rank Hunters make a lot of money, sure, but do you have any idea how expensive land in Gangnam is?"

"Gangnam?"

"Yeah. Do you even know the current price per pyeong[1126] there—?"

I blinked blankly, then let out a quiet laugh.

"Why Gangnam? I can just buy a building near my house."

"Huh?"

"A three-story neighborhood commercial building would still make me a building owner. I've never even considered Gangnam."

"…A neighborhood commercial building?"

"Yes. It'd be close, so it would be easy to visit, and the rent would come in like clockwork. If Mom says she's bored after quitting her job, I could set her up with a little snack bar[1127] or something."

"A snack bar?"

The more I said, the more Won Myunghoon's expression twisted. Had I said something wrong?

[1126] A pyeong is a Korean unit of area equal to 3.31 m^2 (35.6 ft^2).

[1127] The Korean term refers to a casual eatery serving inexpensive snacks and light meals.

"Hyung?[1128]"

"…"

"Myunghoon hyung.[1129] Are you all right?"

Won Myunghoon's lips moved soundlessly before he let out a trembling breath.

"Taekyung."

"Yes, hyung.[1130]"

"Can you—can you really be satisfied with that?"

"You saw my interview. Until a few months ago, I was an F-rank Hunter. Now I make dozens of times more without having to work myself to death like I did back then. What's the problem?"

I had no debt, and I had gotten my house back.

Public attention? Fame? I'd already had more than enough of both in the Murim and the modern world.

More than anything, I'd learned just how exhausting and unpleasant the spotlight could be in real life.

I'd also realized what kind of life would make my family and me happier.

"So this is enough for me. Team Leader Choi already showed me a huge pile of commercial offers. There were too many, so I'm planning to pick a few, film them, and then focus on the Guild again."

I could make plenty of money without entering the entertainment industry.

Won Myunghoon remained silent for a long time after I finished speaking. Finally, his lips parted.

"I see. I understand."

"You're not offended because I turned you down, are you?"

"…Of course not."

Just then, the phone on the table vibrated. I didn't even need to check who was calling. It was Team Leader Choi.

I looked at the time and realized that we had gone well past the thirty minutes we'd agreed on.

"Hyung,[1131] I think I should get going."

"Already? You must be busy."

"The Association contacted me and asked me to get my rank reassessed today. I got your number today, so I'll contact you again soon."

"Then I'll see you next time. It was nice meeting you."

[1128] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or older male friend.

“Let’s go to a coin karaoke room[1132] next time. I’ll practice your song before then.”

“A coin karaoke room?[1133] Sounds good.”

Just thinking about hearing him perform the original version of Coward, my signature song, live already made my heart race. Maybe I should ask Jinho hyung[1134] to come along, too.

“Then I’ll be going. Don’t forget your promise.”

Won Myunghoon nodded with a faint smile as I left the café.

The black sedan parked by the roadside honked.

“Sir, may I clear your cup?”

Won Myunghoon didn’t answer the part-time worker’s question. He stared silently at the empty coffee cup before abruptly speaking.

“Do you perhaps not know who I am?”

“Pardon?”

“Won Myunghoon. Haven’t you heard of me?”

“Of course I have. You released a few famous songs, didn’t you?”

The part-time worker gave an awkward smile and continued.

“Actually, I just looked you up. You’re much more famous than I thought. I only saw you on television a few times when I was young, so I didn’t remember you very well…”

“You looked me up.”

His voice was as dry as sand.

The smile slowly vanished from the part-time worker’s face.

After nervously watching him for a moment, the worker quietly returned to the counter. Some time later, a familiar melody began playing throughout the café, and the corner of Won Myunghoon’s mouth twisted.

It was his own song, released ten years ago.

All of it had become a relic of the past.

“Who does that bastard think he’s mocking…?”

His low voice was buried beneath the music. Won Myunghoon rose from his seat.

His thoughts were consumed by a single person.

Jin Taekyung—a dayfly Hunter who, until only a few months ago, had scraped by going from one F-rank Gate to another.

[1132] A coin karaoke room lets customers pay to sing individual songs rather than rent a room by the hour.

[1133] A coin karaoke room lets customers pay to sing individual songs rather than rent a room by the hour.

[1134] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or older male friend.

But now he was someone who received the public's attention and affection.

"A coin karaoke room,[1135] my ass… Some lucky bastard gets one flash of fame and forgets his place."

Muttering under his breath, Won Myunghoon put on his sunglasses.

His expensive, flashy outfit drew the eyes of people passing on the street, but not one of them recognized him.

"Congratulations, Mr. Jin Taekyung."

The Bucheon Hunter Association president, a middle-aged man with hair more than half gray, handed me a card with a genial smile.

About half the size of my palm, the card gleamed silver from edge to edge.

Platinum.

The card was made of actual platinum, and everyone dreamed of possessing one, even if only in their sleep.

It means I've gained that much wealth and fame.

But perhaps because I'd fully expected this, I felt surprisingly calm as I accepted the card from the Association president amid the barrage of flashes from countless cameras.

I'm a Peak master. Becoming an A-rank Hunter is no big deal.

Still, I felt pretty good.

I grinned and waved at the cameras, and the Association president asked in a robotic tone,

"So, Mr. Jin Taekyung. How do you feel right now?"

Obviously, I feel fantastic.

I was just about to answer when—

Ding.

> System - You have earned the A-Rank Hunter achievement. - Achievement Reward granted. - Level Up! - You have gained 20 Bonus Points! - Fame increases greatly!

"Oh, fuck."

"…!"

"…!"

"…Ah."

[1135] A coin karaoke room lets customers pay to sing individual songs rather than rent a room by the hour.

Right. There are cameras here.

The Association president froze, his face stricken. The broadcasting staff looked as though they couldn't believe their ears. Team Leader Choi lowered his head with the hollow expression of a man overcome by post-nut clarity.

I'm fucked.

This had to be one of the worst broadcast disasters in history.

Feeling my throat grow painfully dry, I whispered to the Association president,

"They'll edit that out, right? You have to make sure they do."

"Edit it out? Mr. Jin Taekyung, are you out of your mind?"

The Association president's voice sank ominously low. He looked ready to grab me by the collar on the spot.

"Edit my ass. This is live. What do you call it? An iTube live stream."

"What?"

"Can't you see the monitors in front of us? More than fifty thousand people are watching right now."

"…"

Shit. He's right.

There had been so many people and machines around that I hadn't noticed, but now I saw five or six monitors set up below the podium, each displaying the Association president and me.

The chat beside the video looked ready to explode from the sheer volume of messages.

"Uh, what do we do?"

"What do you mean, what do we do? Apologize immediately!"

The Association president snapped at me, his face bright red. Just then, the camera director at the very front mouthed something.

"The reaction is good?"

"Huh?"

"What?"

What is that supposed to mean?

I looked at the chaotic chat window. Dozens—no, hundreds—of messages had scrolled past in only a few seconds, but my extraordinary dynamic vision caught every little detail.

It was a complete mess, but one thing was clear.

The broadcast disaster I’d caused by accident was a massive hit.

Chapter 213

"Netizens have some serious firepower. Everyone's going crazy over the press conference."

Team Leader Choi's relaxed voice came from behind me.

Ssshhhwing!

At the same time, razor-sharp claws slashed through the air. I simply leaned my head back to dodge them and muttered,

"Tell me about it. I thought I'd caused a broadcast disaster, but somehow it all worked out."

"On top of that, everyone's praising you for going straight to a Gate as soon as the press conference ended."

"Isn't it normal for a Hunter to go on a raid?"

"That's why image is so important. You know the saying, don't you? Take a shit, and you'll become famous."

"...I don't think that's quite it."

Shhhk! Crack!

I knocked aside and shattered every claw aimed at my head, shoulders, and chest.

The creature staggered back with a pained howl. Just as I was about to close in, Team Leader Choi asked,

"Would you like to take one next time?"

"Take what?"

"A shit."

"I'll pass."

I answered firmly and swung my spear shaft.

Wham!

Something crunched, and the creature charging in from the side slammed straight into the ground.

It stood two meters tall[1136]—a massive, gray-furred, bipedal wolf with nothing left above its shoulders. I had blown its head off through sheer strength alone.

A System notification rang out at the same time.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You have defeated Lv. 73 Lycanthrope!

You have gained EXP!

[1136] Two meters is about 6 ft 7 in.

The lycanthropes that had watched their fellow die let out a chorus of growls and howls.

- Grrrrr.
- Awooooo.

Their long, vertically slit yellow pupils trembled.

Seeing them hesitate, Team Leader Choi remarked as though he had just realized something.

“This is the first time I’ve seen lycanthropes look so docile.”

“They’re good at controlling their anger. Maybe being half-human means they picked up that trait too.”

Hotheads who claimed to have anger-management issues always followed the same pattern.

They acted like Lü Bu[1137] around anyone weaker than them, but the moment they found themselves in front of some muscular tough guys, they became the politest people in the world.

And once they lose the momentum, it’s over.

Slash!

I flicked the sticky blood off my spearhead and beckoned to the creatures with one finger.

“Come on, you sons of bitches.”

- Whiiine.

Their ears had folded halfway back, and their tails were tucked between their legs.

The moment a wolf became a dog, the fight was as good as over.

“You little bastards are cute.”

As I walked toward them with a grin, Team Leader Choi said,

“If possible, please handle them cleanly.”

“Why?”

“So we can take some proof shots. We’re going to post them on the Peace Guild’s official social-media account.”

“…”

“Too much pixelation would be a shame. People prefer things uncensored.”

Ah. He had a point.

- Awooooooooo!

As expected, the boss was different from the rest.

[1137] Lü Bu was a Chinese military general famed for his prowess in battle.

Its roar was packed with ferocity and killing intent. Its body was far larger than those of the other lycanthropes, and silver fur covered it from head to toe.

Every inch of it radiated the presence of a boss monster.

“Wow. You’re impressive.”

As I admired it, I made a decision.

I would give this one special treatment.

“One Annihilation.”

Krrrunch. Thud.

The monster’s massive body, a gaping hole torn through its chest, toppled like a rotting old tree.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You have defeated Lv. 83 Silver-Mane Lycanthrope!
You have perfectly cleared the B-Rank Gate, The Lycanthrope’s Black Forest!
You have gained a substantial amount of EXP!
The exit has opened because you defeated the boss monster.

Kiiiiing.

Once the conditions were met, a Gate exit appeared in the center of the clearing. But I still had something left to do.

“All right. Time for the fun part—cleanup.”

The sight of the corpses scattered everywhere filled me with satisfaction.

I was heading toward them with the heart of a farmer bringing in the harvest when Team Leader Choi spoke.

“About Won Myunghoon.”

“Yes?”

I turned at the sudden sound of his voice behind me.

He sat on a flat rock, his entire body protected by a shield spell, staring at a custom-built phone.

There was something odd about his expression.

“Myunghoon hyung[1138]?”

“Yes. What happened to Mr. Won Myunghoon eight years ago?”

I had no idea why he was suddenly curious.

[1138] Hyung is a Korean term a younger man uses to address an older brother or an older man close to him.

I had been a student back then, but I was such a huge fan that I knew the whole story by heart. Explaining all of it would take forever, though.

“Look it up. Everything comes up if you search Sonamu Wiki.[1139]”

“People say you should stay off Sonamu Wiki.[1140]”

“…They have a point.”

“Just give me a brief explanation. Of all the people around me, you seem to know the most about Mr. Won Myunghoon.”

“Well, if you put it that way…”

I began talking as I skinned a lycanthrope with my dagger.

“Eight years ago, Myunghoon hyung’s[1141] career was on the decline. Every movie, drama, and album he released bombed, and then allegations of tax evasion were piled on top of that.”

“That isn’t particularly unusual.”

“No. That industry is always full of scandals.”

“I skimmed through the articles. It seems he was cleared of the tax-evasion allegations.”

“Yes. That ended without any real trouble.”

But that wasn’t the end of it.

Once mud had been splashed onto his clean image, all kinds of speculative articles and rumor sheets about Won Myunghoon began circulating online.

In the end, Won Myunghoon—already past his prime and going through a difficult time—decided to step away from the public eye.

“He said he’d spent too long looking elsewhere and would devote himself to his duties as a Hunter for a while.”

“And then that incident happened?”

“Oh, you read that article?”

“I just did.”

Team Leader Choi held out his phone. The screen, about the size of an adult’s palm, displayed a headline from eight years ago in bold type.

> Myeongdong Station Mutated Gate Catastrophe, Around 30 Dead Including A-Rank Hunter Do Minsu… Surviving Won Myunghoon: “Minsu, I’m Sorry.”

[1139] Sonamu means “pine tree” in Korean. Sonamu Wiki alludes to Namu Wiki, a Korean collaborative encyclopedia.

[1140] Sonamu means “pine tree” in Korean. Sonamu Wiki alludes to Namu Wiki, a Korean collaborative encyclopedia.

[1141] Hyung is a Korean term a younger man uses to address an older brother or an older man close to him.

The incident had caused a massive uproar and dominated the news at the time.

“Who is Do Minsu?”

“An A-rank star Hunter who was extremely close to Myunghoon hyung.[1142] His popularity was soaring, but he died after joining him on a cooperative raid as a social outing.”

No one had expected anything like that to happen when they set out for a B-rank Gate in such a lighthearted mood, as though they were going on a picnic.

Especially not with two A-rank Hunters participating.

The domestic media boiled over like a cauldron on hot coals, then quickly went cold.

“It took several years for him to stand trial over that incident and be cleared of the charges.”

After the long legal fight, all that remained was a reputation covered in filth and the public’s indifference.

He appeared on television a few times afterward, but that was all. Unable to make a comeback, he quietly retired from the entertainment industry.

Though I don’t think he’s given up yet.

If he had let go of all his lingering attachments, he wouldn’t have offered to recruit me and promised to turn me into a star Hunter.

In any case, after listening to the whole story, Team Leader Choi gave a small nod.

“I see.”

“But why are you suddenly asking about that?”

“Won Myunghoon’s name is number one in the real-time search rankings. There are already dozens of related articles.”

“Oh, really?”

“And Jin Taekyung is right alongside him at number one.”

“What?”

What was going on? Could two people be tied for first in the real-time search rankings?

As I tilted my head, Team Leader Choi held out his phone again.

A fresh article posted ten minutes earlier filled the screen.

> Jin Taekyung & Won Myunghoon: Successful Fanboy Transferring to Star Guild?
>
> A New Star Hunter Is About to Be Born

After a brief silence, I tore my eyes away from the screen.

[1142] Hyung is a Korean term a younger man uses to address an older brother or an older man close to him.

Team Leader Choi asked,

“Are you transferring?”

No, what the hell was he talking about?

Hyung,[1143] I’ll see you again soon.

I hadn’t expected those words, spoken only a few hours ago when I parted ways with Won Myunghoon, to come true so quickly.

Of course, the place where we met again wasn’t a coin karaoke room[1144] but the Peace Guild House.

“I’m sorry.”

Won Myunghoon had read the article in the middle of work and rushed over immediately. He bowed politely to every Guild member, including me, then explained in a flustered voice,

“I was surprised too. Someone must have seen us meeting and put out a speculative article… I’ve already filed a complaint with the media outlet and arranged for an immediate statement to be released.”

Team Leader Choi, who had been staring at Won Myunghoon, spoke.

“I saw the article saying the story was baseless a few minutes ago. You work quickly.”

“False information needs to be corrected as soon as possible.”

“False information?”

Team Leader Choi’s long fingers tapped the phone screen.

“But it isn’t entirely baseless, is it? Jin Taekyung told me that you offered to recruit him. In a café with other people around, no less.”

“That…”

“Team Leader Choi, let me explain it again.”

I stepped in for the hesitant Won Myunghoon.

Considering the situation, I had no choice but to reveal the conversation we’d had at the café, and I was already feeling a little guilty about it.

“What happened was—”

But before I could continue, Won Myunghoon’s firm voice cut me off.

“It’s true. I offered to recruit him, and Taekyung turned me down. This all happened because of my own selfishness, so I sincerely apologize.”

“Hmm.”

Who was Won Myunghoon, anyway?

[1143] Hyung is a Korean term a younger man uses to address an older brother or an older man close to him.

[1144] A coin karaoke room is a small karaoke booth where customers pay per song.

Won Myunghoon wasn't just an accomplished Hunter. He was a celebrity who had once stood at the very height of popularity.

When someone like him frankly admitted his mistake, accepted responsibility, and bowed with perfect courtesy, there wasn't much left for anyone to say.

It wasn't as though he had seriously violated professional courtesy.

Hunters were professionals, plain and simple. As long as the regulations allowed it, they were free to transfer to another Guild or leave one whenever they wanted.

The dozens of recruitment offers I had received before Won Myunghoon's were no different.

The only difference was that I had arranged a separate meeting with him because I was a fan.

And the subsequent articles about my transfer had already been proven baseless.

Thanks to the swift action from both sides, the situation was already dying down.

Team Leader Choi, who had been deep in thought, finally spoke.

"All right. Let's put this matter to rest."

Won Myunghoon's face brightened.

"I'm relieved to hear you say that. Thank you."

"Not at all. I have no intention of turning a minor incident into something bigger than it is. Besides, our side shares some of the blame."

Im Kkeokjeong, who had been watching the situation carefully, cut in with a good-natured grin.

"Yeah, yeah. Now that's good to see. That's how people should live—understanding each other."

Butler Kim and Song Song nodded in agreement.

The atmosphere inside the Guild House, which had been strangely uncomfortable only ten minutes earlier, had turned warm and friendly.

I'm glad this worked out better than expected.

Soon, Won Myunghoon had a cup of coffee in front of him. Wearing an amiable smile, he chatted about one thing after another.

"Taekyung is incredibly devoted to the Peace Guild. I wanted him so badly that I tried to lure him away, but he wouldn't budge."

"Haha! This guy's always been unbeatable when it comes to loyalty."

"You're all such wonderful people that I suppose he didn't want to leave. Now that I've met you in person, I understand why Taekyung turned me down without a second thought."

"Wow. Mr. Won, you really know how to tell people what they want to hear. When I watched you on television, I thought it was all scripted."

"That earned me plenty of accusations that I was an obnoxious bastard."

It was in the middle of this friendly conversation that Won Myunghoon casually made another proposal.

“What are your schedules like tomorrow? I was wondering if we could go on a raid together.”

“Tomorrow?”

“A raid?”

Everyone reacted differently, but their eyes all turned toward one person.

Team Leader Choi.

On paper, Butler Kim was the Guild Master. But Won Myunghoon had also realized that Team Leader Choi was the real power in the Guild.

“What do you think, Team Leader? This would be a good opportunity to clear up the suspicions raised by the rumor sheets, and it could also be a valuable experience for the Guild members.”

“I’m not sure.”

Maybe it was because I’d grown used to Team Leader Choi by now.

I could sense something subtly uneasy in his expression.

But his hesitation vanished at Won Myunghoon’s next words.

“It’s an A-rank Gate. Fortunately, our Guild obtained permission to raid it this week. It seems like a shame to let the opportunity go to waste.”

“An A-rank Gate?”

“Yes. We’ll also guarantee you the rights to anything that comes out of the Gate.”

Gate qualification reviews were strict.

As a Guild that had only just begun recruiting members, the Peace Guild would need a considerable amount of time before it could enter an A-rank Gate.

“An A-rank Gate…”

Team Leader Choi murmured under his breath, then finally nodded.

Chapter 214

Once the details of the joint raid had been finalized, Won Myunghoon rose from his seat.

“Then I’ll be going.”

“Hyung,[1145] you’re leaving already?”

“It would’ve been nice to have a drink together.”

At Jin Taekyung and Im Kkeokjeong’s regretful tones, Won Myunghoon gave them a genial smile.

“I still have work to do. I am the Guild Master, after all. I can’t cause a mess and then be the only one off having fun.”

“Ah, right.”

After he put it that way, no one could press him to stay.

Telling the others there was no need to walk him out, Won Myunghoon left the Peace Guild House. He strolled away leisurely as he pulled out his phone.

After a few rings, someone answered.

“Yes, CEO.”

“The arrangements are done. We’re holding the joint raid tomorrow at two in the afternoon.”

“That was quick.”

“The bait’s too good. When would people like them ever get a chance to enter an A-rank Gate?”

“Haha. That’s true.”

“We’re only bringing one team from our Guild. You’ve told the guys to keep their mouths shut, right?”

“Don’t you trust me? I handpicked only the ones who know how to follow orders.”

“That’s why you’re Team Leader 1. I’ll be back right away, so choose the list of people participating tomorrow and have it ready.”

“Yes, sir. What about the Peace Guild?”

“This place?”

Won Myunghoon gave a short laugh and continued.

“I came by just in case, but it’s a complete mess. A hodgepodge. They’re a bunch of nobodies without even a proper hierarchy. How impressive could a Guild with only five members possibly be?”

“Even without Jin Taekyung, they still have three B-rank Hunters.”

[1145] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male friend.

“That’s all they are. The old man they’ve seated as Guild Master looks like a figurehead. The Team Leader and the woman used to be with the Ares Guild, but they’re nothing worth worrying about. The other one is only D-rank.”

“D-rank? That should make tomorrow’s job easy.”

“Easy?”

The amusement vanished from Won Myunghoon’s voice, leaving it ice-cold.

The sudden change in atmosphere seemed to make the person on the other end flinch. He hurriedly added,

“CEO, that’s not what I meant.”

“Team Leader 1—no, Jonghun.”

“…Yes.”

“Let’s stay sharp. Why do you think I’m personally running Gates at my age? Am I wrong?”

“I’m sorry.”

“All right. If you understand, do better from now on. Watch what you say.”

“Understood, CEO.”

“Good. See you later.”

After ending the call, Won Myunghoon took out his lip gloss and applied it.

He was only a few months shy of forty.

He spent hundreds of millions of won[1146] every year maintaining his appearance, but there was no hiding the passage of time.

“It’s been a while since I was in the spotlight. Maybe I should stop by the salon today.”

Muttering too quietly for anyone to hear, he climbed into the sports car parked by the roadside.

The thought of facing those disgusting monsters again after so long put him in a foul mood. But when he imagined the flower-strewn path awaiting him afterward, he began humming to himself.

The next morning, Jinho hyung[1147] sat across from me at the table, unable to tear his eyes away from his phone.

“You haven’t even eaten. What are you looking at so intently?”

“Articles about you.”

“Again?”

“What do you mean, again? I could read these all day.”

[1146] Hundreds of millions of Korean won is roughly 100–900 million won, or about $71,000–$640,000 and €65,000–€580,000.

[1147] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male friend.

Anyone watching him would've thought the articles were about Jinho, not me.

These days, checking the online reaction and reporting it to me had become part of his daily routine. He was practically my manager.

"People like you. There are tons of articles about Won Myunghoon, too."

"Of course there are."

"You two look good together. So heartwarming… I wish Lord Fuck would swear at me, and so on."

"…"

"There's even a guy asking to be tied up and beaten."

The world really was a big place, and it was full of lunatics.

Dumbfounded, I searched for myself. The internet was overflowing with articles about me, while every online community imaginable was packed with nicknames and edited images.

There was even a post summarizing my exploits sitting prominently on the best-posts board.

A Summary of Lord Fuck's Exploits So Far.txt

> Hi. I'm an unemployed guy in my thirties.
>
> I was thinking hard about what useless thing to do today when I became curious about Lord Fuck. Most people who know anything about him probably already know all this, but I figured there might be some people who don't, so I wrote it up.
>
> I couldn't be bothered to move my fingers much, so here's the short version.
>
> 1. Awakened as F-rank at twenty. Spent seven years getting run even harder than a brand-new private, then reawakened.
> 2. But the Hunter Association played its trap card, so he was measured as C-rank at the time. The accepted scholarly consensus is that the Hunter Association is full of idiots.
> 3. The bewildered Lord Fuck was snared by an unknown Guild called the Peace Guild.
> 4. A B-rank Gate erupted while he was going to work in a tracksuit, dragging along slippers. He chewed through the ogres by himself and saved hundreds of people.
> 5. His life turned around. On the day he received his A-rank Hunter ID, he made that remark in front of fifty thousand people. Acquired the title "Lord Fuck."

> That's about it. I didn't write anything about his family because I might get sued.
>
> A few media outlets have already been taken down. An unemployed thirtysomething like me would be nothing by comparison. If a complaint lands, I'll get a Mom's Touch across the back, so cut me some slack.[1148]
>
> I ate doenjang jjigae[1149] for breakfast, scratched my balls, and scribbled this together.

Only one thought came to mind after I finished reading.

It's way too short.

If I wrote down everything I'd experienced traveling between the modern world and Murim, even a hundred pages wouldn't be enough.

Well, they're ordinary people who don't know anything. I suppose this is only natural.

I scrolled through the comments packed beneath the post.

Of course, I couldn't read all several hundred of them, so I picked out a few of the best comments.

> ㄴ (Best comment) Fuck. I love him.
>
> ㄴ I saw Lord Fuck live, and he swears even more colorfully than my grandma. Did he go to some kind of swearing academy?
>
> ㄴ But it sounds natural. You can't hate him.
>
> ㄴ We've had innocent, good-natured A-rank Hunters appear on TV before, but none of them were ever this down-to-earth. Lol.
>
> ㄴ Yeah, that's why people like him. From the stories he told in the interview about his F-rank days, it sounds like he went through hell. Maybe that's why.
>
> ㄴ Personally, I liked that he went straight to a raid after leaving the Association. It felt like he cared more about a Hunter's true duty than money.
>
> ㄴ Agreed.

> ㄴ (Best comment) So what happened to him transferring to the Star Guild? Honestly, I'd rather he just transfer.
>
> ㄴ Completely false. He kept sucking up to Won Myunghoon in every interview, so he went to meet him once, and the story got twisted.

[1148] Mom's Touch is a Korean fast-food chain. The name is used here as a pun on a mother smacking someone across the back.

[1149] Doenjang jjigae is a Korean stew made with fermented soybean paste.

> ㄴ Sucking…?
>
> ㄴ There's my material for today.
>
> ㄴ Lord Fuck will do it for free.
>
> ㄴ There are so many crazy bastards here.

> ㄴ (Best comment) Lord Fuck already has a permanent free pass from criticism, and now Won Myunghoon's suddenly getting carried by the scruff of his neck.
>
> ㄴ Seriously. I'd forgotten Won Myunghoon's name. I vaguely remember seeing an article a few years ago saying he was cleared in that case.
>
> ㄴ Wasn't he popular? Why did he disappear?
>
> ㄴ He was. He was at his peak for his entire career, but the problem was that his career was way too short. By today's standards, his persona was too predictable, and his acting wasn't anything special… He only got famous because one of his songs became a hit, and he had tons of fans who were just into his face. Plenty of people still suck up to Won Myunghoon. Jin Taekyung included.
>
> ㄴ Sucking…?
>
> ㄴ This is the same guy from the comment above. Anyway, apparently the Peace Guild and Star Guild are doing a joint raid today. I'm looking forward to it.

The overall reaction from netizens was favorable.

Apparently, appearing on the news once or twice and doing a few magazine interviews had left quite a good impression.

The public opinion of Myunghoon hyung[1150] isn't too bad, either.

Was it nostalgia?

Although an unpleasant incident had gradually pushed him out of the public eye, plenty of people still remembered Won Myunghoon.

Jinho, sitting across from me, was one of them.

"Don't forget to get Won Myunghoon's autograph, okay?"

"Got it. I'm going to get a callus in my ear."

I gave Jinho, who was as giddy as a teenage girl, a halfhearted answer and rose from my seat.

We'd eaten breakfast late, so it was already past ten. We needed to leave soon if we wanted to finish the final checks before the raid.

"Damn it. If I were a Hunter, I'd get to raid with Won Myunghoon too."

[1150] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male friend.

Jinho muttered wistfully, envy written all over his face.

To be honest, I was a little nervous myself.

An A-rank Gate with Myunghoon hyung.[1151]

Part of it was that I would be entering an A-rank Gate for the first time, but the thought of raiding alongside one of my old idols also filled me with anticipation.

I never thought I'd live to see a day like this.

My heart pounding with excitement, I left the house.

If mid- and low-level Gates were grains of sand, an A-rank Gate was a massive boulder.

Even in Korea, a country famous for having so many Gates despite its small territory, A-rank Gates were rare. Competition for the right to raid them was fierce.

For the Peace Guild, which still had only five official members, this was unquestionably an opportunity that would normally be almost impossible to obtain.

And yet…

Why is everyone so relaxed?

Even I, who considered myself the strongest person here, had to swallow nervously. But Team Leader Choi, Butler Kim, and Song-i looked as calm as if they were heading to the neighborhood supermarket.

"Did they change this to a B-rank Gate without telling me?"

Team Leader Choi answered in his usual calm voice.

"It is an A-rank Gate."

"Then why are you all so composed? Did everyone secretly take Cheongsimhwan?[1152]"

"Song-i and I have been to plenty of them. Back when we were with the Ares Guild."

"Ah. Right."

Ares was the greatest Guild in Korea—no, in Asia—and a major Guild recognized throughout the world.

Its strength was one thing, but every last member was part of the elite. There was no reason they couldn't handle an A-rank Gate.

"And as for Butler Kim…"

At Team Leader Choi's words, Butler Kim smiled.

"I saw more than enough of them during the Great Cataclysm."

[1151] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male friend.

[1152] Cheongsimhwan is a traditional herbal medicine taken to calm the mind and body.

"…"

"Back when I was active, monster armies marched down the highways, and flocks of Drakes flew through the sky. Things like that."

What the hell? That was terrifying.

As expected of someone from the Great Cataclysm generation. His level of experience was on an entirely different scale.

Butler Kim was publicly known as a B-rank Hunter, but he was powerful enough to put Im Chunsoo—an A-rank Hunter and the Guild Master of Sangdong Guild—through PT drills.

What on earth is someone like him doing here?

Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim's true identities and relationship remained a mystery.

They knew I was curious yet still refused to tell me. They must have their reasons.

That aside…

I turned my gaze toward the last Guild member.

The one person I'd been most worried about.

Contrary to my expectations, Im Kkeokjeong was leaning back against the car seat with a calm expression.

"Are you all right?"

"Of course I'm all right—urrrgh!"

"…"

Fine, my ass. You're nervous as hell.

Perhaps he knew it himself, because he quickly pulled out the black plastic bag he had brought in advance and buried his face in it.

After finishing a bout of retching, Im Kkeokjeong muttered with a deathly pale face,

"I'm fine. Really."

Im Kkeokjeong might have been fine, but I wasn't. The very act of letting a D-rank Hunter enter an A-rank Gate was a dangerously reckless decision.

"Uh, I'm only saying this just in case…"

As soon as I cautiously began speaking, Im Kkeokjeong shook his head.

"No. The Guild Master and Team Leader gave me permission, too. I can't keep imposing on everyone forever. I need to gain some experience."

"Hmm."

"Taekyung, I have a wife and children to think about. I'm well past the age where I'd make a decision out of pride or childish bravado. Even if something happens…"

"Ah, I understand. That's enough."

I hurriedly cut him off before he could say anything more ominous.

He must have been worrying a lot lately because his rank was so much lower than those of the other Guild members, but he had taken it far too far.

"We're going in safely and coming out safely. The Star Guild is sending two A-rank Hunters too. And Myunghoon hyung[1153] used to be a ranker."

Between the two Guilds, there were four A-rank Hunters and more than ten B-rank Hunters. They had more than enough strength to cover for Kkeokjeong.

Team Leader Choi nodded as well.

"Nothing will go wrong."

He was a cautious man. If he had decided to let Im Kkeokjeong participate, it was because he was confident it would be safe.

"Yeah. It will."

A faint smile appeared on Im Kkeokjeong's lips.

Just then, tall buildings began rising into view beyond the car windows.

It looked like an entire village—no, a small city.

Its residents and guards were soldiers carrying firearms and Hunters decked out in expensive equipment.

"Wow."

Unlike me, who let out an exclamation, Team Leader Choi frowned.

"This place…"

After surveying the scene outside, he turned toward the driver of the limousine bus Won Myunghoon had sent especially for us.

"I think you may have brought us to the wrong place."

"What? That can't be."

The driver's eyes widened as though he had no idea what Team Leader Choi meant.

"The A-rank Gate, Black Wyvern's Nest. This is the right place. I entered it into the GPS and came straight here."

"Black Wyvern's Nest? There must have been some mistake. Won Myunghoon said…"

"Who's Won Myunghoon? I work for the bus company, so I don't know him. I came exactly where I was told to go."

Team Leader Choi and the driver's voices buzzed in my ears.

Suddenly, my stomach began to churn, and a sharp pain throbbed through my head.

Amid the confusion, a roar I'd heard three years ago tore through my mind.

Kyaaaaaaar!

Eyes stained pitch-black and a tongue like a blade.

[1153] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male friend.

The wingbeats that had brought down the cave and the claws that had torn my teammates apart flashed vividly before my eyes, blurring my vision.

The Black Wyvern.

I never thought we’d meet again like this.

Chapter 215

Wyvern.

One of the high-tier monsters classified as dragonkin, along with drakes.

Its body was larger than an airplane's, its hide was tough, and its intelligence was high enough for it to use magic.

It possessed enough power to be called a small dragon without exaggeration.

The creature I had encountered three years ago was something that could not—and should not—have emerged from an E-Rank Gate.

Kyaaaaaaar!

I opened my eyes at the monster's roar, echoing in the distance.

Instead of a dark, humid cave, I saw a clear sky and the familiar faces of my Guild members.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung, are you all right?"

"Taekyung."

Their voices were full of concern. I forced my rigid expression to relax.

"Yes. My stomach felt a little queasy. I guess I got motion sickness."

"Motion sickness? You?"

Motion sickness in a Peak master—or rather, an A-Rank Hunter. Even I knew it was a pathetic excuse.

Even Song-i, who had been keeping her distance from me lately, looked concerned as she asked, "Would you like me to cast a healing spell?"

"No, I'm fine."

I gave her a feeble smile like the protagonist of The Last Leaf[1154] and added, "Just having you beside me is healing enough, Song-i."

"…Ah. Yes."

Im Kkeokjeong leaned close and whispered in my ear, "You bastard. How the hell did you come up with a line like that?"

"Was it bad?"

"No, it was insane. The moment I heard it, electricity shot through my whole body."

Was it really that effective?

My mind had been completely blank, so I'd just blurted out the first thing that came to me.

But judging by Song-i, who had frozen like someone struck by lightning, it did seem to have worked.

[1154] The Last Leaf is a short story by O. Henry about a gravely ill woman who believes she will die when the last leaf falls from a vine.

Why does it feel like I landed a critical hit?

Meanwhile, the throbbing in my temples and the nausea in my stomach had both subsided.

Just as I was taking a deep breath, the door of the limousine bus we had been riding in opened, and someone appeared.

“Everyone’s here. But…”

Won Myunghoon trailed off at the tense atmosphere inside the bus, then turned to Team Leader Choi.

“Did something happen?”

“Yes. Something serious enough that we need to talk.”

Team Leader Choi answered firmly, then turned toward me.

“You too, Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“The Star Guild got here ages ago. Where’s the Peace Guild?”

“Wait, isn’t that Jin Taekyung?”

“It is. Won Myunghoon’s beside him, so it’s definitely him.”

“Take pictures quickly. Get ready to interview him in a little while.”

Team Leader Choi, Won Myunghoon, and I moved toward a secluded corner.

The reporters and Hunters who had flocked here after hearing the news stared so intently that I could feel their gazes burning into my face.

Once their persistent attention finally drifted away, Team Leader Choi spoke with a grim expression.

“Why was the location suddenly changed?”

“Changed? What do you mean?”

“Wasn’t Manticore’s Jungle supposed to be today’s raid location?”

“What? That can’t be right. Do you have the contract with you?”

“Here. It’s stated clearly.”

Won Myunghoon hurriedly examined the contract Team Leader Choi handed him. His face twisted violently.

“That bastard, the leader of Team One.”

Judging by his reaction, there seemed to have been a mistake somewhere along the way.

After muttering several curses—unusual for him—Won Myunghoon spoke with an awkward expression.

“I’m sorry. One of our employees made a serious mistake. I don’t know what to say.”

“A mistake. I see.”

Team Leader Choi continued in a dry voice.

“I think it would be best to call off today’s raid.”

“What?”

“This isn’t just any Gate. It’s an A-Rank Gate. Entering without perfect preparation could lead to an accident. And…”

Team Leader Choi trailed off for a moment, his gaze flicking toward me.

He had already investigated my past.

He knew I was the sole survivor of the Sangdong Station Mutated Gate incident three years ago. He also knew I was still suffering from the aftereffects.

“Wyverns are still too much for our Guild members. We appreciate the offer, but I think it would be best for both sides if we withdrew here.”

“Team Leader!”

Despite Won Myunghoon’s flustered cry, Team Leader Choi’s attitude remained as sharp as a blade.

“Wyverns are out of the question. At least for now.”

“…”

That was when I abruptly spoke up after watching the situation in silence.

“Let’s do it. The raid.”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“Plenty of articles have already gone up online, and all these reporters are here. If we call it off now, won’t people start talking?”

I stared past Team Leader Choi and Won Myunghoon, who stood side by side.

Reporters with cameras hanging from their necks were already watching us carefully as they edged closer.

They’ve got one hell of a nose for a story.

They had clearly sensed the tension and were coming over to investigate.

Before Team Leader Choi could say anything, I quickly cut him off.

“It’s not that I particularly care about the articles. It’s just that I’m all right now.”

“Are you sure?”

“Yes.”

Half of that was true. The other half was a lie.

I still wasn’t fine. For the past three years, I had relived the same nightmare over and over, remembering the creature’s roar and my teammates’ screams.

Then I would wake drenched in cold sweat, pretend nothing had happened, and go through another day just like all the others.

But not anymore.

“I can do this. I’m not the same person I was back then.”

I was no longer the utterly powerless F-Rank Hunter I had been. I was a Peak master and an A-Rank Hunter—someone who could stand tall anywhere and call himself strong.

“So it’s fine. No, I want to do it.”

Team Leader Choi stared at me for a long moment, then let out a deep sigh.

“All right. Let’s do it.”

A short while later, we stood before a doorway of ominously rippling mana.

Rolling cameras and incessant flashes captured the members of both Guilds as we began our joint raid.

“Phew.”

I took a deep breath and stepped forward.

Sticky mana coiled around my body as the familiar System notification appeared.

Ding.

> System - You have entered A-Rank Gate, The Black Wyvern’s Nest. - Upon clearing the Gate, you will receive a Reward commensurate with your performance.

Ssshhh.

When I opened my eyes again, everything around me had changed.

“Huff. Huuuff.”

Im Kkeokjeong, clad in heavy full plate armor, panted raggedly.

An hour had passed since we entered the Gate, and sweat was already pouring down his forehead like rain.

He wasn’t the only one. Most of the more than twenty members of the Star and Peace Guilds trudged along with sweat streaming from their bodies.

Hardly surprising.

I clicked my tongue and looked around.

Beneath the blazing sun, a jungle of trees dozens of meters[1155] tall and bizarre-looking plants stretched endlessly into the distance.

The sight alone was suffocating, and air hotter and more humid than a steam sauna completed the picture.

A primeval forest.

It looked exactly like something out of a dinosaur documentary.

The weather aside, the scenery itself was spectacular.

[1155] Dozens of meters means at least about 20 m (66 ft).

"Wow."

As I let out an involuntary exclamation, someone came over and tapped me on the shoulder.

"Pretty relaxed, aren't you?"

"Oh, Myunghoon hyung.[1156] Weren't you up front?"

Our formation had Won Myunghoon in the lead, me in the middle, and Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim bringing up the rear.

Won Myunghoon flashed his white teeth in a grin.

"You have to check behind you sometimes. Everyone else is struggling, but then I spotted some carefree bastard sightseeing by himself, so I came over."

"What if a wyvern suddenly jumps out?"

"We're still in the jungle zone, so we'll only run into minor monsters here. Wyverns nest on cliffs and mountain peaks. We're nowhere near them yet."

"Seriously?"

"It'll take at least half a day to encounter a wyvern, or a full day if we're unlucky. Enjoy the scenery while you can."

I had known higher-level Gates were larger, but I hadn't expected anything on this scale. I shook my head in disbelief.

"This place is incredible. No wonder they give you raid access for a full week."

"That's how long these raids take. Once you've been through a few A-Rank Gates like this, you'll be sick of them too."

"I don't know about that."

I probably wouldn't.

To me, a Gate had long since stopped being a grueling, tedious workplace. It was a place where I could grow even stronger.

"I'm having fun."

"…Well, I suppose that's possible."

Won Myunghoon gave me an odd look, then handed me something.

"Here. Hold on to this."

"What is it?"

It was a necklace set with a blue jewel. Before I could inspect the Item, Won Myunghoon continued.

"It has a cold spell enchanted into it, so put it on. You're an A-Rank, so you'll be fine for now, but the heat will start draining your Stamina later. You're one of our main combat assets. You need to conserve your strength."

"You don't have to give me something like this, hyung.[1157]"

[1156] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man he is close to.

[1157] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man he is close to.

“I’m not giving it to you. I’m lending it to you, so take good care of it and return it later.”

Even at a glance, it looked incredibly expensive.

I hesitated, but Won Myunghoon kept urging me, so I had no choice but to put it on.

Ding.

> System - You have equipped Yeti’s Necklace. - A wind from the snowy plains flows from the necklace.

At the same time as the System notification, a chill cold enough to send shivers down my spine wrapped around my entire body.

“It works well.”

“It looks good on you. Keep it on from now on. I need to go deploy the scouting team.”

Won Myunghoon smiled with satisfaction and strode away. The moment his back disappeared from view, I took off the necklace.

I told him I’m really fine.

Won Myunghoon might have taken my words for modesty, but I’d only been stating a fact.

When I opened my Conception and Governor Vessels in the Murim, I had gained something far better than Yeti’s Necklace.

Unaffected by Cold and Heat.

That was why I hadn’t shed a single drop of sweat. It wouldn’t matter if one hour became ten.

This level of heat couldn’t affect me at all.

It would be far better to give the necklace to someone who actually needed it.

“Uncle.”

“Huff, huff. What?”

Im Kkeokjeong, who had been walking a few steps ahead, turned around. Sweat poured from his head as if someone had installed a sprinkler on top of it.

“Why are you sweating so much? Are you all right?”

“…Do I look all right?”

“No.”

“Then don’t talk to me. I’m dying here.”

“You should’ve worn something cooler. Team Leader Choi has plenty of magical Equipment.”

“I thought we were going to fight a Manticore, so I went all in on defense. At this rate, they’ll be holding my funeral.”

“We can’t have that. You have a wife and children.”

I laughed quietly and put the necklace around his neck myself. Im Kkeokjeong’s eyes widened as the cool wind of the snowy plains washed over him.

“Huh? What’s this?”

“A present. Not that I’m giving it to you, of course. I’m only lending it to you while we’re traveling.”

“Whew. I don’t know what this is, but I can finally breathe again.”

Life returned to his exhausted face. Just as Im Kkeokjeong beamed at me—

—Peeeeep!

A piercing shriek rang out from somewhere.

The birds hiding in the dense forest burst into flight, and branches and leaves came crashing down over everyone’s heads like a torrential downpour.

But no one, including me, paid them any attention.

—Kyaaaaaaak!

A bloodcurdling cry rang out as an enormous shadow engulfed all twenty-odd people.

I looked up and spotted a dark shape circling impossibly high overhead.

“Wyvern…”

Won Myunghoon had been wrong.

Not half a day. Not a full day.

After only one hour—

It had appeared.

Chapter 216

The moment I saw the Wyvern circling overhead, only one thought came to mind.

It's small.

It stretched over twenty meters[1158] from head to tail, with a massive body and wings, but it didn't intimidate me in the slightest.

Maybe it was because of the one I'd encountered three years ago.

Is it because I've gotten stronger? No. That thing was much bigger and stronger.

That one had been pitch-black all over. By contrast, the Wyvern circling overhead now had a bright green body.

At the head of the group, Won Myunghoon announced its identity in a powerful voice.

"It's a Green Wyvern! It's a relatively weak specimen, so everyone stay calm!"

A man in his early thirties drove a tower shield into the ground and shouted,

"Form up!"

At the command of Star Guild's second A-Rank Hunter and Team Leader 1, the tanks rushed forward and formed a wall of shields.

"Taekyung, watch yourself!"

Im Kkeokjeong hurriedly called out a warning, then joined the wall of tanks with a spirited yell.

Boom! Boom-boom-boom!

The first row, then the second. Big, beautiful tower shields overlapped in layers, forming a curved defensive barrier.

The mages and healers standing by began chanting their spells.

"Let the wind dwell within you. Haste!"

"Power that shatters stone. Strength!"

"Vitality to the weary flesh. Healing!"

Bright motes of light spread outward like dandelion seeds.

At the same time, a System notification rang out.

Ding.

> System - Your physical abilities have temporarily increased due to the effects of magic. - Agility has increased by 10! - Strength has increased by 10! - Fatigue has been restored!

There was a reason people said mages and healers had iron rice bowls.[1159]

[1158] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

[1159] "Iron rice bowl" is a Korean expression for a secure, dependable job.

The so-called three-drug combo of buff spells was far more effective than I had expected.

Is it because they're all B-Rank?

Every Hunter gathered here was talented enough to be welcomed wherever they went.

But the Green Wyvern circling overhead, watching for an opening, was no easy opponent either.

It was an A-Rank monster, after all.

"Kyaaaaaaak!"

With an earsplitting shriek, it opened its enormous jaws.

The next moment, green slime visible even from a distance poured down like torrential rain.

"It's poison!"

"Scatter!"

Some people ducked behind the tanks' shield wall, while others threw themselves toward nearby cover.

I was one of the latter. The moment I took shelter behind a boulder the size of a house, green rain blanketed everything within a radius of about thirty meters.[1160]

Thut-thut-thut. Ssssss!

Poison. Acidic poison, at that.

The moment it touched the rock, holes riddled its surface, and an indescribable stench stabbed at my nose.

So even a weak Wyvern is still a Wyvern.

A tiger cub was still a tiger.

The Green Wyvern might have been relatively weak for its kind, but it spewed its poison with frightening speed, and the acid was incredibly potent. Any middling or low-rank Hunters would have melted along with their Equipment.

"Team Leader 1. Casualty report."

"None."

Most of the people gathered here were B-Rank Hunters.

Even Im Kkeokjeong, the only real weak link, was a veteran with twenty years of experience.

Team Leader Choi's top-tier Equipment made up for his lacking physical abilities, so no one had suffered any harm.

"As it should be."

Won Myunghoon nodded in satisfaction, but the Green Wyvern was thoroughly enraged.

[1160] Thirty meters is about 98 ft.

“Kyaaak! Kyaaaaaaak!”

It glared at us through vertically slit pupils, then suddenly folded its wings.

Its massive body, which had been cruising leisurely through the sky, tilted toward the ground and began a steep dive.

Whoooooosh!

The sight of the Wyvern plunging from several hundred meters[1161] up brought a crashing airplane to mind.

We could at least block its acidic poison with our shields, but if that thing hit us, we were done for.

Terrified by a situation he had never faced before, Im Kkeokjeong screamed,

“Honey! Jinwoo! Sowon!”

At this rate, he’d start calling out his father’s cousin next.

Unlike Kkeokjeong, however, the Star Guild members remained calm.

Won Myunghoon even flashed me a broad grin.

“Taekyung, want hyung[1162] to show you something cool?”

“…Now?”

“Yeah.”

Wouldn’t it be better to order everyone to scatter?

There were still several dozen seconds before impact, but how could he be this relaxed?

“Watch carefully. It’ll help you.”

After tossing out those words, Won Myunghoon shifted his spear into a reverse grip.

“Hup.”

Veins bulged across his dense muscles, and an immense amount of mana surged into his spear like a rising tide.

At the same time, a faint line of light appeared along the spearhead.

Ssssss.

It was Spear Energy—a powerful concentration of mana known as Aura in the modern world.

“Kyaaaaaau!”

Perhaps it sensed that power. The Green Wyvern roared and twisted its body, aiming directly for Won Myunghoon and me.

And then—

Thud! Boom!

[1161] Several hundred meters is several hundred yards; 300 m is about 980 ft.

[1162] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

Won Myunghoon kicked off the ground and charged forward. One step, two, and finally three.

The Green Wyvern, no more than a black speck moments ago, was now only a few meters[1163] above us. Its green eyes, each as large as a basketball, flashed, and its rough-scaled jaws opened wide.

Just as its sharp teeth were about to descend upon its small prey—

“Hah!”

With a powerful shout, light shot from Won Myunghoon’s hand.

Whooooooosh! Crunch!

The Aura-wreathed spear pierced straight through the Green Wyvern’s neck. Red blood and green acidic poison sprayed out like a fountain.

Ssssss!

Its pupils contracted to pinpoints as its flesh burned, and its body, dozens of meters[1164] long, thrashed wildly.

“Kiiiik! Kiiiiiik!”

Boom! Crash-crash!

Rocks and trees shattered and went flying without distinction.

The Green Wyvern’s wings quivered as it writhed in pain.

Only a few seconds later, its rigidly raised tail dropped limply to the ground.

“Kiiiuuu…”

With its dying cry, the light vanished from its savage eyes.

Then, as if to prove its death, a System notification rang out.

Ding.

> System - You have defeated Lv. 97 Green Wyvern! - No EXP has been awarded because you made no contribution!

Of course. The credit belonged to one person alone.

I dismissed the holographic window and saw Won Myunghoon pulling his spear from the Green Wyvern’s corpse.

“As expected of our Guild Master!”

“A ranker really is on another level. That Aura was incredible!”

“What ranker? That was a long time ago.”

Won Myunghoon grinned at the cheers ringing out from every direction and walked over to me.

“Did you get a good look?”

[1163] A few meters is roughly 7–13 ft.

[1164] Each 10 m is about 33 ft, so dozens of meters span tens or hundreds of feet.

“Uh, yes.”

“That was your first time seeing Aura in person, right?”

“Um… that’s right.”

“Haha. You must’ve been surprised if you’re stammering that badly.”

A gravelly voice suddenly cut in.

“Who wouldn’t be?”

It was Team Leader 1, Star Guild’s second-in-command and the main tank of today’s raid team.

He looked like a weasel. Tapping me lightly on the arm, he continued with a shameless grin.

“When I first saw it, I wondered how something like that could even exist. People don’t say you need to wield Aura to be a true A-Rank Hunter for nothing.”

Won Myunghoon made a show of frowning.

“Quit buttering me up, punk. You’re embarrassing me.”

“Come on, how am I buttering you up? You really are that good. It’s not like I’m making it up. Don’t you agree, Hunter Jin Taekyung?”

“Uh… yes.”

“See? I’m not the only one who thinks so.”

I licked my dry lips, unsure what to say. Fortunately, Won Myunghoon spoke before the mood could turn awkward.

“You’re all right except for all the sucking up. Enough flattery. Have the guys clean this up and inspect the Equipment again.”

“Understood, Guild Master. Loyalty!”

After giving an exaggerated salute, Team Leader 1 turned away.

“That guy’s always been like that. He’s flighty and careless enough to send the wrong contract…”

Won Myunghoon’s voice trailed off as he watched Team Leader 1 walk away.

“But, Taekyung.”

“Yes?”

“Are you all right? What’s with that expression you’ve had this whole time?”

“…It’s nothing. I was just a little surprised.”

“Was it the Wyvern? Well, this is your first A-Rank Gate, so that’s understandable. You’ll get used to it.”

“…”

I swallowed the words that had risen to my throat. I finally understood how the barber who saw the king’s donkey ears must have felt.[1165]

[1165] In a traditional tale, a barber discovers that the king has donkey ears but is forbidden to reveal the secret.

That wasn't what surprised me.

Trying not to show how confused and frustrated I was, I looked at Won Myunghoon.

He was tall and long-limbed, with a youthful face that made it hard to believe he was nearly forty.

But the real reason I had admired him wasn't his handsome appearance or his catchy hit songs.

An A-Rank Hunter. A master of the spear. And a ranker.

For as long as I could remember, my idol hadn't been the celebrity Won Myunghoon, but the Hunter Won Myunghoon.

He was why I had chosen the spear when I became a Hunter. I had read and reread the spear manual he wrote during his ranker days until it fell apart.

But…

Why is he so weak?

The reason I had stood still from beginning to end was simple.

I wanted to witness Won Myunghoon fight with my own eyes.

What I saw went beyond anything I could have imagined—in an entirely different sense.

His movements are slow as hell, everything he does is needlessly flashy, and he can't even use Aura properly.

Watching him had nearly given me a stroke.

Had Won Myunghoon always been this weak? Or had his skills declined?

My head was full of questions, but if I had to sum up my thoughts in a single line, it would be this:

What the fuck is this?

It was unfair. There was no particular reason for me to feel wronged, but somehow I felt spectacularly cheated!

It was like reserving a full-course meal at a seven-star hotel only to be served braised boneless pollock and beef bibim sauce.[1166]

This isn't what I had in mind. It really isn't.

Oblivious to my feelings, Won Myunghoon still wore a relaxed, confident smile.

"By the way, where's the necklace? I don't see it."

Was the necklace really the issue right now?

Overcome by an inexplicable sense of emptiness, I answered carelessly.

"…I put it in my pants pocket."

"Why?"

"Just because. It was getting in the way. Why?"

[1166] Bibim means "mixed"; bibim sauce is a seasoned sauce used to mix with food, commonly rice.

“No reason. It doesn’t matter as long as you keep it safe.”

Won Myunghoon’s gaze flicked toward my lower body. After confirming the bulge in the pocket of my tight leather pants, he added,

“Whatever you do, don’t lose it. Got it?”

“Yes.”

There was no way I could lose it. No—if I ever did, I’d have no reason to go on living.

My stuff is precious.

It really was a good thing that my body in the Murim and my body in reality were the same.

Thinking of the black anaconda coiled inside my pants lifted my gloomy mood a little.

While the Hunters dismantled the Green Wyvern and cleaned up the area, Won Myunghoon and Team Leader 1 moved to a secluded spot.

“That necklace works well.”

Team Leader 1 grinned.

“It wasn’t easy to get. Even magical scans can’t detect it.”

“Yeah, you did well, but…”

Won Myunghoon suddenly furrowed his brow and continued.

“It’s more effective than I expected. We haven’t even left the jungle yet, and a Wyvern has already appeared.”

“Couldn’t it just be a coincidence? It’s not that rare.”

“It was a coincidence eight years ago, too.”

“…What choice do we have? You can’t predict what’ll happen next inside a Gate.”

“That’s why I hate Gates. With people, you can more or less figure out what the bastard is thinking. But with this fucked-up place, you can’t.”

Won Myunghoon answered in a low voice and looked around.

Everywhere he looked, there was nothing but grass, trees, and strange insects. He wanted to return to the forest of skyscrapers as soon as possible.

“Let’s get started soon. Something bigger and stronger than a Green Wyvern needs to show up.”

“So the surviving witnesses can testify?”

“You’re one smart bastard. I tell you one thing, and you figure out ten.”

A smile formed on Won Myunghoon’s lips.

Chapter 217

Bean sprout soup might not look like much, but it contains more ingredients than you'd think.

In that sense, The Black Wyvern's Nest was like bean sprout soup.

This vast A-Rank Gate was home to more than just Wyverns. All kinds of monsters lived here, like the ingredients that went into bean sprout soup.

—Kweeeek!

At the faint sound of a pig squealing in the distance, I muttered, "…Does bean sprout soup have pork in it?"

Won Myunghoon, who was walking beside me, turned his head.

"Hm? Why are you suddenly talking about pork?"

"It's nothing. I thought there might be a monster nearby."

"A monster?"

Won Myunghoon stopped and listened for a moment.

"I don't hear anything."

"Uh, well…"

How was I supposed to explain this? As I pondered what to say, Won Myunghoon smiled.

"Haha, you must be tense. Don't get scared just because this is an A-Rank Gate. Relax."

"I definitely heard something…"

"You must have imagined it. If there'd been a sound like that, I would've noticed it first."

Faced with his confident tone and smile, I kept my mouth shut.

Won Myunghoon was a famous star, but his reputation as a Hunter was considerable too.

Being a ranker meant placing among the top one hundred out of the tens of thousands of Hunters in Korea.

Compared to him, I was still just a rookie who had only recently begun to stand out.

On the surface, anyway.

There probably wasn't anyone else in the entire world with as many secrets as I had.

But people saw only what was in front of them and heard only what they wanted to hear.

I swallowed the words that had risen to my throat and nodded.

"I guess I imagined it."

"That happens. It's good to stay alert, but don't worry too much. We're using detection magic as we go, anyway."

"…"

I stared at Won Myunghoon as he gave my shoulder a knowing pat.

Watching him had left me with a complicated feeling for a while now. How should I put it?

Was this really all there was to him?

A few hours earlier, while watching Won Myunghoon fight the Green Wyvern, I had realized two things.

First, Wyverns weren't as strong as I'd expected. And second—

Neither is Myunghoon hyung[1167].

He was strong. There was no doubt about that. He could wield Aura, and he had once been skilled enough to become a ranker.

By Murim standards, you could reasonably call him a Peak master.

But that was as far as it went. No—if what Won Myunghoon had shown was the full extent of his ability, he was actually inferior to a Peak master from the Murim.

He doesn't know how to use his strength properly.

Was it because the environments were different?

Unlike the modern world, the Murim was a brutal place where people had to survive with nothing but a weapon in their hands.

In a world where the sword was closer than the law, martial arts had inevitably been developed to the extreme.

Modern Hunters, on the other hand, focus on raids. And they have magic.

Martial artists constantly honed themselves within the vast discipline of martial arts, while Hunters divided up their roles and pursued maximum efficiency within them.

Neither approach was inherently right or wrong, but one thing was certain.

When it comes to individual combat ability, Hunters are no match for martial artists.

If what he had shown so far was everything he could do, Won Myunghoon was no exception.

The fact that he could wield Aura made no difference.

I really have grown stronger.

It had only been a few months.

Yet I had grown enough to judge an A-Rank Hunter who had been my idol for years.

I'm happy about it, but it's bittersweet too.

I was still gazing at Won Myunghoon with mixed feelings when—

[1167] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older man he is close to.

—Kweeeek!

—Chweek!

The second set of cries was louder and clearer than the first.

Won Myunghoon finally noticed them too. He turned his head and began searching for their source.

“Where the hell did that come from…?”

I pulled the spear from my back and answered, “Five o’clock. About thirty jang[1168] away—or rather, a hundred meters[1169].”

“Huh?”

“There are quite a few of them. You should start preparing for the raid.”

“G-Get ready?”

“Yes. Sounds like forty or fifty.”

“What are you—”

Won Myunghoon couldn’t finish.

We had spotted a group of more than forty Orcs approaching through the dense undergrowth.

“Forty-seven. Should I take care of them?”

“…”

“Hyung[1170]?”

At my call, Won Myunghoon jolted as if waking from sleep.

“Uh, huh?”

“Should I take care of them?”

“…By yourself?”

“Yes. I haven’t warmed up yet.”

“R-right. Do whatever you want.”

“If any of them try to run, please deal with them.”

I finished speaking, swung the spear shaft around a few times, and walked toward them.

It was an ordinary iron spear of the sort you could find anywhere, without a single magical enchantment.

If I use enchanted Equipment for no reason, I’ll have trouble adapting in the Murim.

Magic was astonishingly convenient and useful.

It might help me right away, but in the long run, relying on it would do more harm than good.

[1168] Jang is a traditional Korean unit of length, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Thirty jang is about 90.9 m (298 ft).

[1169] A hundred meters is about 328 ft.

[1170] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older man he is close to.

I needed to improve my fundamental skills instead of depending on Equipment if I wanted to handle any crisis that came my way.

If I take down all of them, maybe I'll level up once.

With that happy thought, I kicked off the ground. The wind split around me, whipping through my hair.

Whoooosh!

Whoosh! Slice! Thud-thud-thud!

The spearhead sliced cleanly through an Orc's throat.

Before its knees even touched the ground, the head of the Orc beside it exploded.

Then another. Two more. Three after that…

Every time a silver streak carved through the air, blood and death followed.

He tore through their ranks unhindered.

"…Wow."

Team Leader 1 let out an involuntary gasp, then hurriedly closed his mouth. Won Myunghoon was glaring at him with murder in his eyes.

"Uh, Guild Master. I didn't mean—"

"You bastard. Is this really the time to stand around enjoying the show?"

"I'm sorry. It just slipped out…"

Team Leader 1 cautiously studied Won Myunghoon's expression before continuing.

"No, but he really is good, isn't he?"

"…What do you mean, good?"

"Just look at how he moves. He's no ordinary A-Rank rookie."

"…"

"He doesn't seem to be wearing a single piece of magical Equipment, either. You have to give him credit just for having the guts to charge fifty Orcs alone. If someone told me to do that… honestly, I wouldn't be confident."

Won Myunghoon licked his lips, his face tight with irritation.

He couldn't deny anything Team Leader 1 had said. Every last word of it was true.

The longer he watched Jin Taekyung, the more bewildered he became.

What the hell is that guy?

Orcs might be treated like punching bags in fantasy novels, but they were by no means easy monsters.

There were many different species of Orcs and dozens of confirmed tribes. Judging by the crude armor these ones wore, they were B-Rank Orc Warriors.

And yet Jin Taekyung was overwhelming them.

He's taking on fifty Orc Warriors alone? A brat who only just awakened as an A-Rank?

Won Myunghoon had already investigated him thoroughly.

Jin Taekyung had been a bottom-tier Hunter branded as defective, someone who had started as an F-Rank and was certain to die as an F-Rank.

How could a man who had spent his time fighting goblins in tiny F-Rank Gates do this?

"Guild Master. Guild Master?"

Won Myunghoon snapped out of his thoughts and answered dryly.

"What?"

"Didn't you hear me? I've been asking whether you noticed anything suspicious. You've been beside him this whole time."

"Suspicious?"

"Yes. It's strange. That Jin Taekyung bastard definitely has something going on."

"…"

After a brief silence, Won Myunghoon gave Team Leader 1 a quick account of what had just happened.

"He knew the Orcs were coming?"

"Keep your voice down. We're not the only ones here."

Team Leader 1 glanced behind him. After checking the Peace Guild members watching the battle with peaceful expressions, as if they had come out for a picnic, he whispered in a voice barely louder than an ant.

"My God. How did that bastard know? Do you have any idea?"

"It must have been detection magic. It had to be detection magic."

"What if it wasn't detection magic?"

"What?"

Team Leader 1 swallowed hard.

"Guild Master, what if—and this really is just a one-in-a-million possibility…"

"Shut your mouth. I'm not listening to that bullshit."

"W-we can't rule it out."

A dangerous light flashed in Won Myunghoon's eyes.

"Fuck… Are you saying that bastard Jin Taekyung is stronger than me? Is that what you're trying to say?"

Overwhelmed by his murderous aura, Team Leader 1 hastily lowered his head.

But Won Myunghoon's low growl continued to bore into his ears.

[1171] Go-Stop is a Korean card game played with flower cards.

"You think I learned Aura by playing Go-Stop[1171]? I took in a bastard who had nothing and raised him, and now you think I'm a joke? Does the title of ranker look like a fucking joke to you?"

"N-no, sir."

At least get your facts straight. When we first met, you and I were about the same. And you only became a ranker because of the fame you built in the entertainment industry and all that lobbying.

Team Leader 1 swallowed the words threatening to spill out.

They had been together for well over ten years. Too much had happened between them to turn back now.

Sensing his resentment, Won Myunghoon glared at him like a venomous snake.

"Our Jonghun's all grown up."

Calling him by name rather than title meant something very different.

Several Star Guild members sensed the tension and moved around the two men with practiced ease, blocking them from outsiders' view.

"Hey, Kim Jonghun."

Tap, tap.

Won Myunghoon lightly patted Team Leader 1's cheek and muttered in a voice drier than sand, "Get a grip. If you make a mistake here, we're all fucked."

"…Yes, sir."

"Send a few agile guys to find the boss monster. If that doesn't work, drag over a few Wyverns that look strong enough."

"Understood."

The moment Team Leader 1 answered with a cowed expression, cheers erupted from somewhere.

A middle-aged man with a bandit's beard was jumping up and down like a live fish.

"Taekyung! You bastard! You magnificent bastard!"

The battle was finally over.

It had taken only about fifteen minutes to wipe out nearly fifty B-Rank Orc Warriors.

Amid the dozens of corpses strewn across the ground, a handsome young man with bold features grinned.

"Ah, now I'm finally warmed up. Myunghoon hyung[1172], I did well, right?"

"…!"

Won Myunghoon hurriedly turned away to hide the hideous scowl that had twisted his face.

[1172] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older man he is close to.

Goddammit…!

Every time he looked at Jin Taekyung, his head burned and his stomach churned.

The bastard had only attracted the media's attention through sheer luck. He had been handed such a golden opportunity, yet he neither knew how to use his fame nor had any intention of doing so.

To Won Myunghoon, it was all an act—and the source of his disgust.

You're going to spend your whole life running Gates until you drop dead, yet you don't even know your place and still have the nerve to reject my offer?

If Jin Taekyung had wanted to become a star Hunter under another major entertainment agency, Won Myunghoon wouldn't have been this angry.

But Taekyung had rejected him without the slightest hesitation. He had chosen the Peace Guild, little more than a mom-and-pop operation.

Fucking idiot.

He would regret it.

Won Myunghoon muttered those words inwardly and signaled Team Leader 1 with his eyes.

"Great job! Great job, you bastard!"

Thump! Thump!

Im Kkeokjeong snorted excitedly as he pounded me on the shoulder.

"Wow! Fifty Orc Warriors! You really are the greatest Hunter!"

"Calm down."

"Your movement, your spearmanship, your soul… Just what I'd expect from an A-Rank Hunter. You turned this Gate upside down!"

"…"

Why was "soul" in there? And what exactly had I turned upside down?

Unlike me, who was dumbfounded, Im Kkeokjeong showed no sign of calming down.

"I knew you'd become someone like this. Ahem."

"…You aren't crying, are you?"

Unable to continue, Im Kkeokjeong's lips trembled, and he turned his head away.

"Who's crying? I just… I was remembering the old days."

"Uncle."

"Do you remember that time two years ago when we were ambushed in an E-Rank Gate?"

"When…? Oh, right."

“Yeah. That bastard of a Team Leader was the first to run, and I thought we were all going to die. But you stayed at the rear until the very end and protected the wounded.”

“Was Uncle one of them?”

Im Kkeokjeong nodded, his face full of emotion.

As far as I remembered, I had saved about seven people that day. It wasn’t until now that I learned Im Kkeokjeong had been one of them.

Was that why he recommended me to Team Leader Choi?

“You still remember that?”

“I might forget a wrong done to me, but I’ll never forget a debt for as long as I live.”

“Forget it. It’s all in the past.”

“Anyway, I’m glad to see you doing so well, Taekyung. No matter how hard I try, I’ll never be more than a D-Rank Hunter… but just remember that I’ll always be rooting for you.”

I knew.

It wasn’t just Im Kkeokjeong. The other Guild members had always cared about me too.

I guess I’m lucky when it comes to people.

I looked warmly at the Guild members.

First was Team Leader Choi, our main source of funding.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“Yes, Team Leader.”

“You truly are remarkable.”

“It was nothing.”

“Your discerning eye is remarkable.”

“…?”

“That look in your eyes just now must mean you recognized this Frozen Eye around my neck.”

Team Leader Choi smiled proudly and pulled off the necklace.

When did he even put that on? I’d never seen it before today.

“Russia’s foremost jewelry maker, Vladimir Stalin, designed it…”

“…”

Fuck. Give me back my touching moment.

I was sighing at his maddening consistency when—

“Hm?”

Team Leader Choi suddenly froze and pointed at Im Kkeokjeong’s neck.

“Is that perhaps Yeti’s Necklace?”

Startled by his greedy stare, Im Kkeokjeong nodded.

“Huh? Uh, yeah.”

“That’s an item that rarely even appears on secondhand markets… Where did you get it?”

“T-this?”

He looked ready to rip off the necklace along with Im Kkeokjeong’s neck.

Sensing a threat to his life, the middle-aged man hurriedly took it off and handed it to me.

“It’s not mine. Taekyung lent it to me.”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung did?”

I nodded.

“I lent it to him. I borrowed it from Myunghoon hyung[1173], though.”

“I see. If you don’t mind, may I examine it for a moment?”

“Well, I don’t see any harm in looking.”

Just as I was about to hand him Yeti’s Necklace, curiosity struck me.

Is this thing really that expensive?

Come to think of it, I haven’t even had it appraised yet.

It wasn’t particularly useful to me, but there was no harm in finding out exactly what it did.

Without giving it much thought, I muttered inwardly.

Item Appraisal.

Ding.

[1173] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older man he is close to.

Chapter 218

"This is…"

After examining Yeti's Necklace for a long moment, Team Leader Choi's eyelids began to tremble.

"I'm angry."

He rarely showed his emotions this openly.

Im Kkeokjeong, who had been squatting quietly, asked with intense curiosity,

"Team Leader Choi, what's wrong? Is there a problem?"

"There is. A very serious problem."

Team Leader Choi bit down hard on his lip and continued.

"The supply of this beautiful product is far too limited. That is the greatest problem of all—one that deserves condemnation from people around the world."

"…Ah."

"Just look at it. The artistry of this icicle design! The magical properties that preserve the very chill of the snowy plains!"

Like a North Korean TV announcer passionately praising the Supreme Leader—no, the necklace—Team Leader Choi whipped his head toward me.

"What do you think, Mr. Jin Taekyung?"

"Me?"

Where should I start? How should I put it? What was I even supposed to say?

My hesitation was brief. A voice came from my mouth, calm and gentle enough to surprise even me.

"I'm angry too."

"…"

"What's wrong?"

"No, it's nothing."

Team Leader Choi gave me a strange look before continuing.

"You just seem a little… unfamiliar somehow."

"Do I?"

I rubbed my chin. The stubble beginning to poke through felt rough against my fingers. Even the sensation felt unfamiliar, almost like touching someone else's skin.

"Is it because I haven't shaved?"

"Mr. Jin Taekyung, could it be…"

Just as Team Leader Choi was about to say something, Won Myunghoon approached with a genial smile.

"Wow, that was incredible. Taekyung, you really can fight."

"…You think so?"

"Your spearmanship was completely different from the manual I wrote. Did you learn it at the training center?"

"No. I just picked up a few things here and there."

"Here and there? That was way beyond anything you could pick up casually. At this rate, you might catch up to me in a few years. Haha."

I silently raised the corners of my mouth.

When nobody joined in, his laughter slowly died away. It should have been awkward, but Won Myunghoon changed the subject without missing a beat.

The entire sequence was polished and seamless, like a scene from a TV drama.

"So, what were you doing?"

His mouth was asking the question, but his eyes were already busy taking stock of the situation. His gaze flicked across Yeti's Necklace in Team Leader Choi's hand.

"We were looking at the necklace you lent me. Team Leader Choi is really interested in this kind of thing."

"Team Leader Choi is? Well, I suppose that makes sense. He did seem like the type."

If Won Myunghoon wrapped himself from head to toe in flashy luxury brands, Team Leader Choi was the exact opposite.

Everything he wore was still expensive, but how should I put it? Refined and understated. Either way, anyone who saw how he normally dressed could tell he had an eye for such things.

But Won Myunghoon's attention lay elsewhere.

"So, what did you think after seeing it in person?"

"It's much better in person. If you ever decide to sell it, please contact me."

"I'm afraid that won't happen. I treasure it a great deal."

Something he treasures…

I mulled over his words, then abruptly spoke.

"It must be important."

"Of course. Very important."

"I see."

I held Yeti's Necklace out to Won Myunghoon.

"I'll give it back now."

"Hm?"

"You said it was important to you, hyung.[1174] And judging by what Team Leader Choi said, it sounds extremely expensive too."

"…"

[1174] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

"Aren't you going to take it?"

The necklace swayed in my hand with a metallic clatter.

A brief silence passed. Won Myunghoon gazed at me, and a faint smile appeared on his lips.

"Taekyung."

"Yes."

"Your hyung[1175] values the bonds between people more than material things."

"The bonds between people."

"That's right. The same goes for the Guild members who came with us today. They stayed by my side through the hardest time of my life."

"You mean eight years ago?"

"…Well, yes. Anyway, what I'm trying to say is, don't worry about it too much. What's so precious about a necklace like that? Right?"

Won Myunghoon patted my shoulder with his broad palm. Unlike mine, his palm was soft, and his fingernails were long.

A thought suddenly occurred to me.

Maybe this person standing in front of me isn't the person I knew.

"Actually, the necklace is a gift."

"A gift?"

"Yeah. A gift from your hyung[1176] to you."

Every time Won Myunghoon leaned closer, the strong scent of his cologne washed over me.

"So don't give it to anyone else. Got it?"

"…"

"Taekyung?"

I put the necklace around my neck as I answered.

"Yes. I won't let anyone else touch it."

Ding.

> System - You have equipped Yeti's Necklace. - The wind of the snowfield flows from the necklace.

As the wind of the snowfield wrapped around my entire body, I recalled the Item Window I had seen just five minutes earlier.

[1175] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

Item Window
Yeti's Necklace
Type: Accessory
Grade: Peak
Restriction: None
Description: A necklace that only an exceptionally skilled Yeti warrior may possess. In truth, however, it is a shackle proving that its wearer was once enslaved by the dragonkin and raised as livestock for food. Anyone who possesses this item becomes a target of dragonkin monsters, regardless of species.
Effect: Wind of the Snowfield effect activated.

So I'm a target.

It was hardly a pleasant word.

In more ways than one.

Time passed slowly inside the Gate.

After half a day of travel, we finally left the jungle and entered the wasteland. Yet the only monsters we had encountered so far were the Green Wyvern that had appeared at the beginning, the pack of Orcs I had dealt with, and the Trolls the others were fighting now.

—Gwoooor!

The Troll stood about a head taller than an adult man and had an abnormally large head.

Trolls were monsters with extraordinary regenerative abilities. That was also why they cropped up everywhere as the main ingredient in healing potions.

They could regrow severed arms and legs in a matter of seconds, which naturally made them difficult opponents.

But the Star Guild members were seasoned veterans in their own right.

"The head! Aim for the head!"

"Fire magic!"

Sshhk! Fwoooosh!

In the early days of the Great Cataclysm, Trolls had earned a fearsome reputation as immortal monsters, but their weaknesses had soon been exposed.

The head and the heart. And magic on top of that.

Unless it was an undead monster, death after the cessation of breathing was only natural.

Trolls possessed enough terrifying regenerative power to restore even their heads and hearts, but that didn't make them truly immortal.

Freeze them with ice or sear them with flames before they could regenerate, and there was little they could do.

"Damage dealers, get in there and carve it up!"

"Mages, stand by!"

Sshh-shh-shhk! Thwack!

—Graaaar!

The Troll toppled backward after losing an arm and a leg.

A moment later, the keen axe blade of a halberd cleaved through the thick fat and muscle of its neck.

Thud! Sshhk!

The Troll's body flailed, now empty above the shoulders. Soon, new flesh began to writhe and swell across the cut surface.

In a little over a minute, it would have a new neck.

Of course, the Star Guild members had no intention of waiting that long.

"Burn it!"

Fwoooosh! Ssssss!

Bone-chilling cold and skin-scorching flames struck the body.

Unable to regenerate, the Troll shuddered violently once, then fell still.

"Unit Three clear!"

"Help over here! This one's regenerating!"

With three Hunters assigned to each Troll, the battle ended quickly.

Amid the stench of burning flesh and fat, Won Myunghoon watched from a dozen or so meters[1177] away and muttered under his breath.

His voice was so quiet that nobody could make it out over the noise of battle, but to me, it sounded as clear as if he were speaking right beside me.

"Idiots had to stink up the place. I told them to freeze them whenever possible."

"Hah."

I barely managed to suppress the hollow laugh trying to escape.

Someone once said that life was a tragedy up close and a comedy from a distance.

But a battle against monsters was a tragedy no matter where you watched it from.

When you could lose your life in an instant, the smell of burning Troll flesh was nothing.

[1177] A dozen or so meters is roughly 39 ft.

It's a hundred times better than lying behind a folding screen, smelling your own funeral incense.

But to Won Myunghoon, it was someone else's problem.

He was frowning and cursing under his breath when he suddenly sensed my gaze and turned toward me.

"Oh, Taekyung."

His voice was warm, and his forehead had smoothed out as if nothing had happened.

Everything about him was natural.

That only made it feel even more unnatural.

"What is it? Do you have something to say?"

For some reason, it sounded like he was really asking, Did you hear everything I said?

I kept my face blank and answered casually.

"Yes."

"Really? What is it?"

"I feel a little nauseous. I was fine at first, but… I've felt strange ever since we entered the Gate. I even tried healing magic, but it didn't help much."

"Ah. That."

Won Myunghoon let out a quiet laugh.

"It's because this is your first A-Rank Gate. The amount of magical power distributed inside a Gate is on an entirely different level."

"Oh, I see."

"Beginners are all like that. I'm used to it by now."

I let out an exclamation as if I were hearing this for the first time, even though I already knew everything.

"So I'll get used to it next time too, right?"

"Next time?"

The corners of Won Myunghoon's mouth twitched before he nodded.

"That's right. You'll be much more used to it next time."

"I hope I can come with you again then, hyung.[1178]"

"Well, I don't know when I'll have time. My schedule is packed."

"You don't even have time for raids?"

"You may not know this yet, Taekyung, but Guild Masters like me are always busy. We have to coordinate the entire Guild."

"Ah."

[1178] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

"It's the difference between a musician and a conductor. You know what a maestro is, right?"

As Won Myunghoon mimed waving a conductor's baton, I abruptly asked, "Then did you go to the department store for a Guild-related meeting?"

"Hm?"

"I saw an article about it online. What was the headline again? Ah, I remember."

Won Myunghoon suddenly lost his words. Watching him, I continued clearly,

"Something like Rising Star Hunter Won Myunghoon Sweeps Up Luxury Goods."

"Was there an article like that?"

"It was on a Hunter community site for a little while. It got deleted after five minutes."

"R-really? Are you sure you didn't misread it?"

"Yes. There's a Rice Weevil[1179] who doesn't study these days and does nothing but scour the Internet. He lets me know the moment an article appears."

A deep dimple formed in Won Myunghoon's handsome face. But this wasn't the bright smile I remembered seeing on television.

"That can't be right."

"Isn't it?"

"Of course not. I do like shopping, but I'm not that bad. At most, I might go once a month."

"I heard pictures were uploaded too."

"…"

"You know Dispass, right? The site that specializes in digging up dirt on celebrities. They even interviewed someone from the department store. Apparently, you're a VVIP who visits five times a week."

"…"

Won Myunghoon licked his dry lips. The dimple had vanished without a trace.

"Taekyung. You don't actually believe that, do you?"

"Come on, it must be a rumor sheet. You're busy coordinating the Guild schedule, hyung.[1180] Maestro."

"…Yes, Maestro."

I vigorously mimed waving a conductor's baton while Won Myunghoon stared at me with dry eyes.

That was when—

"Hyung![1181] No, CEO!"

[1179] "Rice weevil" (ssalbeolle) is Korean slang for a freeloader who eats without contributing anything.

[1180] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[1181] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

The shout rang out across the endless wasteland of dirt, sand, and winding rocky hills. It had come from Star Guild's Team Leader 1.

He had gone scouting in search of the Wyvern that had been nowhere in sight, and now he was back.

But unlike when he had set out at a leisurely pace, he was sprinting toward us like a madman, his face deathly pale.

"What happened? Where are the others?"

At Won Myunghoon's question, Team Leader 1 stammered.

"Th-that, th-that…"

I didn't need to hear the rest.

Seven people had left, but only one had returned. The drops of blood splashed across his face and armor turned my guess into certainty.

"You bastard. Spit it out!"

Team Leader 1 flinched at the thunderous roar.

"We found the Wyvern. We found it."

"The Wyvern? How many?"

"O-one."

"What? One?"

An A-Rank Hunter and six B-Rank Hunters made a formation more than capable of dealing with a single Wyvern.

And yet six people had died, while one had fled back alone.

"Is that supposed to be an explanation? Are you messing with me?"

"They're all dead. We approached while using concealment magic, but… it noticed us."

"What kind of bullshit is that? How could a Wyvern see through concealment magic?"

Click. Clack-clack.

His teeth chattering from fear, Team Leader 1 finally forced out a single word.

"A-A Named Monster."

"…"

"It's definitely a Named Monster. This place… it's a Mutated Gate."

An A-Rank Mutated Gate.

And a Named Monster.

There was no one among us who didn't understand what those two words meant.

Amid the suffocating silence, someone muttered in a voice barely loud enough to hear.

"Fuck…"

Chapter 219

From the early days of the Great Cataclysm to the present, humanity had drawn on countless experiences of death and destruction to classify monsters and establish a hierarchy among them.

Accordingly, the Grade of each Gate was determined by the Grade of the monsters inhabiting it.

However…

There are exceptions to every rule.

Mutated Gates were one such exception. They existed outside the boundaries humanity had established. They were, in every sense of the word, mutations.

Gates were already an enigma to humanity, and now another variable had entered the equation.

The worst kind.

A D-Rank monster could appear in an F-Rank Gate. A B-Rank monster could appear in a D-Rank Gate.

That alone was the stuff of nightmares, but an even greater problem remained.

Rare Monsters.

As if running into an unexpected higher-level monster wasn't bad enough, every one of those creatures possessed strength that surpassed that of other monsters of the same Grade.

That was when the term Rare Monster was first coined.

Before long, someone raised another question.

Then what about the Rare Monsters that appear in A-Rank Mutated Gates? Aren't they too strong to be considered the same Grade?

For Hunters, A-Rank was the highest level attainable through a single awakening.

Those acknowledged as particularly strong even among A-Rank Hunters received the prestigious Title of ranker.

The same issue applied to monsters. After endless debate within the relevant academic circles, a new term was born.

Named Monster.

True monstrosities that had transcended the limits of A-Rank.

Team Leader 1, the only one to return alive, had said that such a Named Monster was here.

Right where we stood, in the Wyvern's Nest.

"Bullshit!"

Won Myunghoon seized Team Leader 1 by the collar with a furious shout.

"A Named Monster? There's no way something like that could be here."

“I-I’m telling the truth. I saw it clearly with my own eyes.”

Team Leader 1 continued in a trembling voice.

“It was several times larger than an ordinary Wyvern. I could hardly believe it even while I was looking right at it.”

“Shut up!”

But the terror the Named Monster had instilled in Team Leader 1 was beyond anything I could have imagined.

The title of A-Rank Hunter seemed wasted on him. He was as terrified as a seven-year-old child.

“That thing is on a completely different level from any Wyvern we’ve faced before. We need to run. Right now.”

“Kim Jonghun, you son of a…”

Grind.

Won Myunghoon ground his teeth, but that was all he did.

He might have fallen short of my expectations in every possible way, but he was still an A-Rank Hunter who had once risen to the ranks of the rankers. There was no way he didn’t understand what everyone else here already knew.

Won Myunghoon was berating Team Leader 1 merely to hide his own fear.

There must have been signs that this was a Mutated Gate.

I knew them well. I had experienced them myself three years ago.

Strangely few monsters. And far more Magic Gems than the number of defeated monsters should have yielded.

I hadn’t known about the latter. The Star Guild was responsible for handling the spoils, and although this was a joint raid, Won Myunghoon was still the commander with final say over everything.

And that commander just shit the bed.

This was no minor error in judgment.

The creature stalking us somewhere in the wasteland wasn’t an ordinary Wyvern. It was a Named Monster.

“Fucking hell…”

As Won Myunghoon spat out the curse, Team Leader Choi spoke.

“Calm down. Our priority right now should be to withdraw immediately.”

“Calm down? Do I look like I can calm down in a situation like this?”

“I’m telling you to compose yourself and face reality.”

Team Leader Choi continued in the same measured voice.

“Fortunately, it isn’t too late. If we turn back and retrace our route as quickly as possible, we can reach the jungle within an hour. But if we encounter that thing out here in the wasteland…”

“You think I don’t know that? Stop meddling.”

The cheerful, courteous gentleman was gone. Team Leader Choi's gaze cooled at Won Myunghoon's irritable response.

"That's unfortunate. I didn't expect you to take it that way."

"Unfortunate? Just because we're cooperating, you seem to think we're really equals or something… Fuck, there's no point in talking. Anyway, stop telling me what to do. I'm already in a shitty mood."

They said a crisis revealed a person's true nature.

If that was true, this was all there was to Won Myunghoon. The bitter part was knowing I had once idolized someone like him.

Won Myunghoon turned to the Guild members, his face tense with anxiety.

"Take only the Magic Gems. We're heading back to the Gate entrance as fast as possible."

There were two ways out of a Gate: the entrance we had used to come in, and the exit that opened once the boss monster was killed.

Under the circumstances, the former was obviously the right choice.

"Yes, sir."

The preparations were completed quickly. The only problem was Team Leader 1, who remained deathly pale.

"What's wrong with that guy?"

Butler Kim, who had stayed one step behind me and kept quiet the entire time, answered my mutter.

"He's been exposed to a monster's Fear."

"An A-Rank Hunter?"

"The opponent is a Named Monster."

"Oh."

"And a Grade is merely a measure of strength. It has nothing to do with how strong someone's mental fortitude is."

Even so, an A-Rank Hunter had succumbed to Fear.

That left two possibilities. Either Team Leader 1 was weak-willed to begin with, or the Named Monster was simply that powerful.

Personally, I'd prefer the former.

With that thought, I approached Team Leader 1. I only meant to help him up, but he recoiled as if he'd been burned.

"It's okay. I'm not trying to hurt you. You know me, right?"

"J-Jin Taekyung."

"You're still lucid, at least. Now pull yourself together and get up. Unless you'd rather keep sitting there until you become its prey."

"Gah!"

Sometimes it was better to stoke someone's fear than inspire courage.

The word prey sent Team Leader 1 shooting to his feet. He glanced around anxiously.

“Th-that thing…?”

“It isn’t here. More importantly, how did you make it back alive?”

I had wanted to ask him that for a while. No one else had thought to once the words Named Monster came out.

Team Leader 1 chewed on his lip.

“I had no choice.”

“…I see.”

He had run away. He had abandoned his team members.

But I didn’t condemn him. Not because I understood, but because I didn’t think I had the right.

Someone else can curse him out, but not me.

Whether he knew what I was thinking or not, Team Leader 1 began rambling incoherently.

“We were approaching carefully, but it saw us. Then it spread its wings—its black wings—wide…”

“Black wings?”

“Y-yes. It was black all over, from its head to the tip of its tail.”

A memory suddenly surfaced.

The screams that had filled the cave. Those enormous wings.

The Wyvern I had encountered back then had also been entirely black.

“A Black Wyvern.”

“No, it was different. It was several times larger and stronger than the Black Wyverns we’ve seen so far. That thing… it’s a real monster.”

Then it couldn’t have been the same creature I’d encountered three years ago.

After the Sangdong Station Mutated Gate incident, I had been subjected to countless investigations. The team dispatched to investigate the truth behind the incident had concluded that the creature didn’t fall far outside the normal range for a Black Wyvern.

Then where is it now?

Monsters inside Gates respawned at regular intervals. By the time the investigators arrived, it had already disappeared.

Whenever I drank, I sometimes found myself wondering.

Where is it now? Did another Hunter kill it? If it’s still alive, will I ever get the chance to take revenge?

Now it’s possible.

As long as we were both alive, the day would eventually come when we met again.

I had left it with an indelible memory, and it had done the same to me.

But apparently, that day wasn’t today.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“Taekyung!”

The Guild members had finished preparing and were waiting for me. I had just started toward the formation when—

“One eye.”

The single word that suddenly came from Team Leader 1’s mouth made my body freeze.

I slowly turned around. Team Leader 1 pointed to one of his own eyes with a trembling hand.

“What did you just say?”

“That’s right. One of its eyes was ruined. Like something had stabbed it…”

“…!”

A current ran down my spine. My mind went blank, and my fist clenched on its own.

Three years ago, I had charged at that creature prepared to die.

I had gathered every last ounce of strength and unleashed One Annihilation—no, Stab with All My Strength. The spearhead had buried itself squarely in its eye.

That had been my final act of defiance, and the only mark I’d managed to leave on it.

It’s that bastard.

I didn’t stop to wonder how an ordinary Black Wyvern had become a Named Monster.

Every hair standing on end across my skin bore witness, and my pounding heart served as both prosecutor and judge.

Everything that made me who I was cried out with one voice.

The unidentified Named Monster Team Leader 1 had described was the very creature that had left me with an indelible nightmare three years ago.

We finally meet again.

I didn’t know what to call this feeling.

Fear? Joy?

My whole body trembled with an emotion I couldn’t name.

My senses were drawn tighter and sharper than ever when the thick scent of blood drifted into them.

—Kyaaaaaaaah!

I raised my head at the roar echoing from the distance.

On the horizon of the wasteland beneath the setting sun, a pair of pitch-black wings was flying toward us.

Goddammit. Goddammit. Goddammit!

The same curses kept replaying endlessly in Won Myunghoon's mind.

His plan was as good as ruined. Now he even had to worry about getting out alive.

A Named Monster.

This was as serious as the situation eight years ago—no, it was even worse.

Won Myunghoon had hurried the Guild members through their preparations and was just about to order them to move out when—

"It's coming."

The low voice piercing his ears made his heart plummet.

All the more so because it belonged to Jin Taekyung.

"W-what do you mean?"

"Prepare for battle. Or run for your life."

"I'm asking what the hell you mean!"

"What else could I mean?"

There was something unfamiliar about Jin Taekyung's dark, steady gaze.

The man before Won Myunghoon now was neither his rabid fan nor the foolish kid in his twenties who had grinned at him like an idiot.

What is this feeling?

As Won Myunghoon flinched, a dry voice slipped between Jin Taekyung's lips.

"Take everyone with you. I still have the necklace."

"…What?"

What the hell was this bastard talking about?

As Won Myunghoon stared at him in confusion, one corner of Jin Taekyung's mouth curled upward.

"Why are you so surprised? Did you think I wouldn't know?"

"You—you bastard."

"Myunghoon hyung[1182]. No, Mr. Won Myunghoon."

Won Myunghoon froze. Not from humiliation, but from the crushing pressure bearing down on him.

A pressure unlike anything he had felt from Jin Taekyung before was pouring off him.

"Whatever you did or planned to do, I'll let everything up to this point slide. But…"

Beneath the tangled hair falling over his face, his darkened eyes gleamed.

"Never bare your teeth at me again."

"…!"

[1182] Hyung is a familiar Korean form of address used by a man for an older man.

“I’m done. Get lost.”

Won Myunghoon’s lips moved, but no words came out.

He stared at Jin Taekyung with an unreadable look, then spun around.

He could feel the Peace Guild members’ gazes boring into the back of his head. Only now had they realized something had been going on.

Fucking idiots. How dare they…

But it didn’t matter.

Jin Taekyung and those ragtag Guild members would all be dead soon anyway.

A short while later, as Won Myunghoon and the Star Guild members ran with all their might, a roar echoed from far away.

Chapter 220

Won Myunghoon left. Remembering how he had ground his teeth at my attitude yet hadn't dared attack drew a quiet laugh from me.

If he had, I would've made him regret it.

He was a hyena of a man.

Show him weakness, and he bared his teeth. Show him strength, and he hid them.

Judging by everything I had seen of him, his nature probably had something to do with the incident eight years ago as well.

Consider yourself lucky.

No matter how much a hyena leaped or crawled, it was still a beast.

If it knew when to tuck its tail, all I had to do was scare it off.

I had neither reason nor desire to bloody my hands before it actually sank its teeth into my shoulder—especially when I was about to face a real monster.

—Kyaaaaaaaah!

The black dot drew closer.

A rage-filled roar echoed from the far edge of the horizon.

Just as I had recognized it, it had recognized me.

Yes. You remember me too.

That was enough. I was about to face a half-mad Named Monster, but I felt neither fear nor excitement.

Only one thing bothered me, like a thorn caught in my throat.

"Why didn't you leave?"

Team Leader Choi stared at me with his arms loosely folded.

Instead of answering, he asked a question of his own.

"Who are you asking?"

"All of you."

I swept my gaze around. Four people stood against the endless wasteland, with rocks and trees scattered here and there behind them.

Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim. Im Kkeokjeong and Song Song.

Not one of them had left.

"You all know that thing coming toward us is a Named Monster, right?"

"We're all well aware."

"Then this should be simple. It's dangerous, so leave while you still can."

"Where would we retreat to?"

"Where else? Back to the exit we came through."

"The Star Guild isn't exactly an ideal group to flee with—especially after making an enemy of their Guild Master."

I don't see it that way.

No one knew it yet, but Butler Kim was an A-Rank mage—and one who had lived through the unprecedented war known as the Great Cataclysm.

The Star Guild might have had the advantage in numbers, but even without me, the others wouldn't be outmatched if they fought Won Myunghoon's Guild right now.

"That's a convenient excuse."

Team Leader Choi stared at me as I smiled.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"No."

I cut him off before he could begin, but Team Leader Choi wasn't the sort to back down quietly.

"Since you've left me stuck here with nowhere to go, I think I've earned the right to ask a few questions."

Damn. He has a point.

I answered reluctantly.

"Fine…but keep it short."

"That monster coming toward us—is it connected to what happened three years ago?"

I hesitated, then nodded.

"You have no intention of retreating."

"…"

My silence was answer enough.

Team Leader Choi let out a low sigh.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung, you're facing a Named Monster."

"That's news to me. All I see is something I need to kill."

"You need to think about this rationally."

"Do I look that unstable right now?"

"That…"

Team Leader Choi fell silent.

I was calmer than I had ever been. My heart might have been hammering like mad, but my mind was running through countless ways to deal with the creature.

"Team Leader Choi."

"…?"

"I've told you my motto in life a few times before, haven't I?"

Im Kkeokjeong, who had been watching in silence, answered for him.

"Thin and long."

"You remember too, Uncle?"

“You were a strange kid. Most young men dream big at least once…but you never did.”

“I’ve never been fond of a turbulent life.”

This time, Butler Kim answered with a smile.

“For someone who feels that way, you seem to have come quite far.”

“That’s why I changed it.”

“Big and long. Is that right?”

“Yes. It’s already too late for me to live small. Since things have turned out this way, I’m going to live as big and as long as I can.”

“Good. If you wish, perhaps…”

I knew what he was about to say.

I quietly shook my head. Butler Kim had a far more important task to handle.

“I’m fine. Protect the others.”

“Understood. Even without being asked, I’ll do what must be done to the best of my ability.”

At Butler Kim’s clear-cut answer, Song Song asked with an incredulous expression,

“You’re going to let him fight a Named Monster alone? Are you all out of your minds? One wrong move and we’ll all die. Every last one of us!”

“Then why haven’t you left, Miss Song?”

“…Good question. Why am I still here?”

I watched her sink into thought, then spoke.

“Miss Song.”

“No.”

“Absolutely not.”

“Hunter Jin Taekyung. Please.”

What was with these reactions?

I had barely gotten her name out, yet Song Song, Team Leader Choi, and Butler Kim had all shut me down without hesitation.

“Taekyung, go for it.”

At least Kkeokjeong hyung[1183] was on my side.

I looked at the other three with an aggrieved expression.

“I haven’t even said anything yet.”

Song Song answered,

“That’s why I’m saying no.”

“How do you know what I was going to say?”

“Hmm. A confession?”

[1183] Hyung is a term a man uses to address an older man with whom he is close; it means “older brother.”

My head went numb for a moment.

The back of my skull throbbed as though someone had hit it with a hammer.

“Wait. How did you know?”

“Good grief. How could I not know?”

“W-was it that obvious?”

“Yes. Painfully.”

“Then…”

She shook her head without hesitation.

“I’m sorry. I’m not the sort of person who changes her attitude at the drop of a hat just because someone has money or fame.”

“Oh.”

“To be honest, you’re quite a catch, Mr. Taekyung. But when I like someone, I’m the type to reel him in all at once. I can’t keep a whole pond stocked with men.”

After letting everything out in one breath, she blinked.

“Oh. I wasn’t too harsh on someone who’s about to fight a Named Monster, was I?”

I had been opening and closing my mouth like a goldfish, but a quiet laugh soon escaped me.

“Why are you laughing?”

“No reason. I was just thinking how refreshingly straightforward you are.”

She narrowed her eyes at my answer.

“Hold on. Why are you suddenly speaking casually?”

“You said you’re twenty-seven, right? We’re the same age. We can at least be friends, can’t we?”

“Hmm. There’s no such thing as friendship between a man and a woman.”

“We can worry about that if the time comes.”

When Song Song still hesitated, I added,

“We’re guildmates, after all.”

“…When you put it that way, I can’t exactly refuse.”

I grinned at her.

In the end, I had been rejected cleanly, but I didn’t regret it in the slightest. If anything, I felt strangely calm.

If someone saw me like this and asked whether I had really liked Song Song, the answer was yes. There was no question about that.

But even I couldn’t say for certain what I felt now.

I had simply said what I had kept buried in my heart for so long, and regardless of her answer, I felt relieved.

Maybe that was enough for now.

"Let's have some soju[1184] when this is over."

"My family motto says boys and girls over seven shouldn't sit together."

"I meant all of us."

"…Oh. Right."

I turned away with a light step.

At that moment, I sensed an enormous flow of mana behind me. I didn't need to look to know that Butler Kim was layering magical barriers around the others.

I'm counting on you.

It meant the battle was close at hand. Sure enough, the creature that had been no more than a tiny dot was now close enough for even an ordinary person to see clearly.

"Bastard, you've gotten big."

Its body was easily over fifty meters[1185] long, and its wings were larger still.

Black scales covered every inch of it, gleaming in the light of the setting sun.

It had grown at least two or three times larger than when I had last seen it three years ago.

Was that even possible?

I had never heard of anything like it.

But there was no mistaking the creature. Its clouded eye was proof.

Its remaining eye, stained crimson, stared directly at me.

—Kraaaaaaaah!

Whoooosh!

A single roar sent a tremendous gust crashing over the wasteland. Dirt and pebbles flew into the air, filling it with a thick cloud of dust.

When the curtain of dust settled, a massive silhouette stood atop a nearby hill.

It's huge.

And strong.

With my senses stretched wide, I could feel its rage and power.

It was a monster that had broken free of the bounds of A-Rank.

It possessed the majesty befitting a Named Monster.

"So we finally meet."

Now that I stood face-to-face with it, my chest trembled. Three years ago, I had lost my comrades, and it had lost one eye.

It had been a long, bitter grudge.

Now it was time to end it.

I tightened my grip on the cold spear shaft and slowly walked toward the creature.

[1184] Soju is a Korean distilled alcoholic drink.

[1185] Fifty meters is about 164 ft.

“Long time no see. Remember me?”

Wyverns were unquestionably advanced creatures.

It had been cunning and cruel even then. Now that it had become a Named Monster, it naturally possessed even greater strength and Intelligence.

—Grrrrr…

“Looks like you do. So, how’s the eye?”

A crimson flame blazed in its remaining eye. I let out a quiet laugh as the scales across its body bristled.

“You fucking bastard. Who the hell do you think you’re hissing at?”

—Grrrk!

One step.

Then another.

My heart pounded while my mind spun at full speed. Hundreds of ways to carve apart its body and snuff out its life unfolded before my eyes.

“There were some names I wanted you to hear if I ever saw you again. Open your ears and listen carefully.”

Step.

Step.

As the distance between us narrowed, something hot surged from my lower abdomen.

It was like a small sun—the Scorching Yang Qi that had surpassed one jiazi[1186], and the rage that had built and built until it became something solid.

“Kim Hyunsu.”

The face of a straight-laced kid in horn-rimmed glasses appeared before my eyes.

He had been a Hunter for only four months. He was the first to die. One sweep of the creature’s tail had crushed his entire body.

He had been clumsy, but he never lacked enthusiasm. Whenever he had a spare moment, he would come find me with another question.

Deputy Team Leader. How do I do this?

Deputy Team Leader. I don’t understand this part.

Deputy Team Leader…

Sometimes, I thought about him.

I wondered whether he might have survived if I had explained things more thoroughly, if I hadn’t been annoyed by the kid who came to me with dozens of questions every day.

But regret always came too late. Kim Hyunsu had remained twenty forever, and his parents had wailed throughout the funeral for the only son they had lost.

[1186] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle, used here to measure accumulated internal energy.

Maybe they still are, even three years later.

There were nine more people like him.

Every one of them had a family and dreams of their own.

“Lee Hyerim. Song Donghyeok, Park Sangho, Kim Haneung, Park Gwanghyeon…”

With every name, I took another step. With every step, memories of that person shimmered before me like heat haze.

That was why my vision blurred.

At least, that was what I chose to believe.

After ten steps, only one name remained.

“…And Hong Cheonsu.”

The round face of a man in his thirties flashed before my eyes.

When I first met him, I was a rookie Hunter barely twenty years old, while he was a ten-year veteran.

After he saved me from being surrounded and nearly killed by goblins, I started calling him hyung[1187].

One perfectly ordinary day, I had suddenly asked him,

Why are you always so good to me?

He had answered,

It kept eating at me, seeing a kid like you struggle. My youngest sibling is about your age.

It wasn’t until the day of his funeral that I learned he had grown up in an orphanage and didn’t have a single relative.

The absurdity of it made me laugh.

In the end, though, I cried.

Because I remembered his final words.

You cocky bastard. Taekyung, go on ahead.

That was how he—Cheonsu hyung[1188]—died.

Leaving behind a wonderful spouse and three children.

And now, at this very moment, I stood before the creature. I glared into its enormous red eye and opened my mouth.

“Listen carefully, you fucking lizard bastard.”

I had survived countless crises to say these words.

After three years and ninety-two days, I was finally ready to tear off those wings and drive my spear into its heart.

“This time, I’m not going anywhere.”

[1187] Hyung is a term a man uses to address an older man with whom he is close; it means “older brother.”

[1188] Hyung is a term a man uses to address an older man with whom he is close; it means “older brother.”

Internal energy erupted from my dantian and surged through every limb and bone in my body.

The Scorching Yang Qi raced unchecked toward the cold spearhead. The internal energy flowed in an unbroken stream, tangling like a skein of thread before transforming into something new.

Crackle, crackle, crackle!

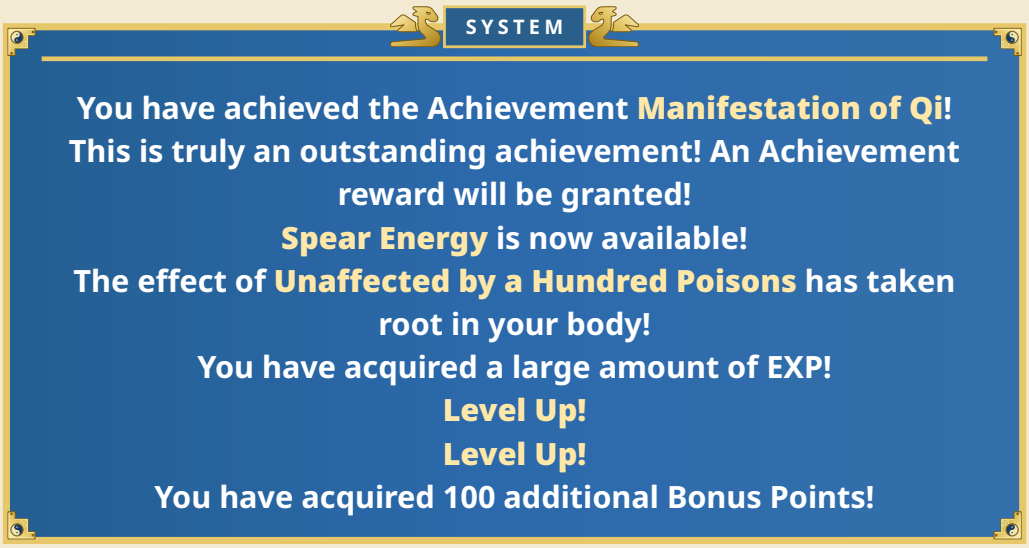
Aura. Spear Energy.

It didn’t matter what I called it. I leveled the blue-burning spearhead at the creature.

“You’re…dead today.”

Chapter 221

Ding.



The System notifications echoed in my ears like a ringing bell. But my gaze remained fixed solely on the spear.

Ssssss.

Blue flames flickered over the spearhead. A thrilling shiver raced up my spine.

I did it.

Today, I had taken one step toward a higher realm and conquered one of the peaks of the perilous mountain known as martial arts.

At the same time, I knew one thing for certain.

I can kill it.

No more thoughts or words were needed. All that remained was to act and make those long years of waiting a reality.

But I wasn't the only one who had been waiting for this touching reunion.

Its lone eye bulging wide, the creature let out a furious roar.

—Kraaaaaaaah!

No, it was closer to a thunderclap than a roar.

Goooooooom—

Tremendous wind pressure poured from a maw large enough to swallow a car whole and bore down on the ground. The compressed air burst around me, and it felt as though a thousand-geun boulder were crushing my shoulders.[1189]

Air Breath.

One branch of a unique ability granted only to dragonkin.

[1189] A geun is a traditional Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). A thousand geun is 600 kg (about 1,300 lb).

Since a Named Monster was using it, even a capable Hunter would have had their eardrums burst and been forced to their knees.

But not me.

Crack. Grrrk.

I silently pressed forward against the crushing pressure.

With every step, my ankles sank into the ground and the pressure grew stronger, but it couldn't stop me.

The creature might have surpassed the limits of an ordinary monster, but I wasn't afraid.

Because so have I.

At least in terms of physical ability, I could already be called superhuman.

Strength, speed, stamina—when it came to everything that determined the outcome of a battle, I stood one step ahead of a Peak master at my level, or an A-Rank Hunter.

"Ahh, that's refreshing."

I raised my head with a grin.

Atop its skyscraper-sized torso, the red eye of the creature blasting out Air Breath wavered when it saw my smile.

"What was that? A fan set to high?"

—Kraaaaaaaah!

"Turn it off! You're blowing yellow dust everywhere, you bastard!"[1190]

As I shouted, I swung the spear toward the sky with all my strength.

Whooooooosh!

The blue flame of qi carved a semicircle through the air, burning through it. In that instant, the pressure crushing my body vanished, and I became as light as a feather.

Now!

Boom!

With a single stomp, I shot forward like an arrow.

The confused creature twisted its head and unleashed another Air Breath, but it couldn't keep up with my speed.

Whoosh! Rat-a-tat-tat!

Clad in nothing but light leather armor and carrying a single spear, I streaked across the battlefield like lightning. In the blink of an eye, I was right in front of it.

—Grrrrrk?

The startled creature spread its folded wings wide. But by then, I had already leaped with all my strength.

[1190] Yellow dust is windborne dust from the deserts of East Asia that can reach Korea.

Boom!

With a powerful tremor, I soared into the air. Through my hair streaming in the wind, I saw the creature's knee beneath its flashing black scales.

The exact spot known as the cruciate ligament.

"You're exempt from military service, you bastard!"[1191]

With that shout, I drove my spear in with all my strength.

Thrust! Shrrrk!

The Wyvern's hide and scales, said to withstand ordinary magic and weapons alike, split open in an instant.

A sharp, satisfying jolt traveled through my fingertips, like harpooning a fish.

It went in!

The blue-burning Spear Energy cut through and shattered everything in its path.

Once the spearhead opened a gap, the rest was easy. Like hammering in a nail, I slammed my fist against the butt of the two-meter spear and drove it deep into the creature's knee.[1192]

Boom! Fwoooosh!

Dark blood erupted like a fountain. Just as the creature spread its wings to take flight, it dropped to one knee with a scream.

—Graaaaaaaah!

But I didn't stop there. I stepped onto the end of the spear lodged in its knee and used its spring to launch myself upward.

As I shot several more meters into the air, a dagger appeared in my hand.[1193]

If I don't have one, I can just take one out.

I had countless weapons stored in my Inventory, both in Murim and in the real world.

They had cost me a fortune, but if it meant killing this creature, I wouldn't mind spending ten times as much.

Thrust!

I suddenly remembered training in the Wall Lizard Technique back in Murim. The cliff I had scaled then was even higher, and there had hardly been anything to use as a foothold.

And whenever I thought I'd made some progress, a certain lunatic would start dropping rocks on me.

Compared to that, this was nothing.

I drove my dagger into the creature's enormous body again and again, climbing higher and higher.

[1191] South Korea requires military service from most men; a serious knee injury can qualify someone for an exemption.

[1192] Two meters is about 6.6 ft.

[1193] One meter is about 3.3 ft, so several meters is several yards.

Thrust, thrust! Thrust-thrust-thrust!

Against Spear Energy, neither hide harder than plate armor nor scales capable of deflecting low-level magic were of any use.

Imagine something the size of your palm crawling up your body and hammering nails into you over and over.

That was exactly what the creature was going through.

—Kraaaaaaah!

Unable to endure the relentless pain, it writhed and roared. It was trying to shake me off, but it was one step too late.

By then, I was already savoring the sensation of floating through the air.

Open Inventory. Equip spear.

The next instant, a solid spear shaft filled my empty hand.

The Scorching Yang Qi that had surpassed one jiazi when I opened my Conception and Governor Vessels surged toward the spearhead like an ebbing tide.[1194]

Whooooooosh. Ssssss!

Blue flames enveloped the spearhead without leaving the slightest gap.

Flickering in the darkness, they were the tail of a meteor.

And I was the meteor itself.

“Where do you think you’re going?”

With that quiet murmur, I became one with the spear and plunged downward. My target was its wing, which served as both foreleg and arm.

Blinded by pain for a moment, the creature had no way to stop the meteor.

Fwoosh! Shraaaaaak!

Scorching Yang Qi blazed like a miniature sun, slicing through hide and scales and burning the flesh beneath. The wing, more than ten meters from top to bottom, split in two along the path of the spearhead.[1195]

—Krrrk…!

It was probably the worst pain the creature had ever experienced. The red eye of a beast that had spent its entire life as a predator flew wide.

—Kraaaaaaaaaah!

I landed lightly on the ground and regarded it with a cold, steady gaze.

Its fifty-meter bulk writhed within the billowing cloud of dust.[1196]

“Does it hurt?”

—Kwak! Kraaaaaah!

“That little?”

Compared to what it had done three years ago, this was nothing.

[1194] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; here it describes an amount of cultivated internal energy.

[1195] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

[1196] Fifty meters is about 164 ft.

A single flap of its wings had shattered entire bodies. Heads clutched in its claws had vanished without a trace. Those swallowed by its enormous maw hadn't even left corpses behind.

That was when I first learned how much blood and how many organs the human body contained.

How brutally a person could die.

"You bastard. I wouldn't be satisfied even if I chewed you to death."

An eye for an eye. A tooth for a tooth.

It would die here today, by my hand. And it would die horribly—exactly as I had imagined countless times before.

"This is just the beginning. Quit whining and get up."

Whoooosh.

The wind stirred by my swinging spear swept away the dust.

Covered in blood and dirt, the creature glared at me as it panted heavily.

—Krrrk.

Dozens of blades were embedded throughout its body, and blood poured from its open wounds like waterfalls.

Of the wings that symbolized the Wyvern, only one remained.

It was still enormous and imposing, but there was no longer any trace of the dignity befitting a dragonkin offshoot and a Named Monster.

—Grrrrr…

Its eye, brimming with resentment and killing intent, glared at me.

The emotions conveyed by that gaze were unlike anything I had ever known from a monster.

"Watch how you look at me, or I'll pluck that eye out first."

I tossed out the words and began walking toward it.

That was when it happened.

—Hu. man.

"…!"

A single word made me doubt my own ears.

My feet froze. The corner of my eye twitched involuntarily.

What did I just hear?

But I hadn't misheard it. The creature's maw shifted, and a clearer pronunciation emerged.

—Do. you. want. to. kill. me?

A monster was speaking.

That very monster.

A groan slipped through my parted lips.

“This is impossible…”

—It’s. dif.fer.ent. from. be.fore.

The instant it finished speaking, its red eye turned completely bloodred.

And then…

—Heal.

Sssssss.

Magical power began gathering around the creature.

Carus the One-Eyed.

That was the Black Wyvern’s name.

Before earning that name, he had survived countless crises. He had fought not only monsters, but humans as well.

He had fought hundreds of battles where victory meant claiming prey and defeat meant becoming prey.

That day in the past had been no different.

Not until one human took his eye.

How dare he? How dare a human lower than a bug do this to me!

Carus was furious. At the same time, he made a vow.

He would kill the human who had taken his eye. Even if he never found him, he would kill other humans again and again.

Then one day, after endless battle and slaughter, he realized that he had grown to an enormous size and gained tremendous strength.

Why? Did fighting humans make me stronger?

Before long, Carus understood. It wasn’t his battles with humans that had made him stronger, but devouring other monsters.

Each time he did, something inside his body grew more powerful.

What did the humans call it again? Ah, right.

Magic Gems.

Once he understood the source of his strength, Carus began hunting Magic Gems.

He devoured other monsters, and instead of feasting on human flesh, he studied the magic equipment they carried.

So this is how those human bastards use Magic Gems.

The more Magic Gems he absorbed, the higher his Intelligence rose and the stronger he became.

As a Wyvern, a lesser branch of the dragonkin, Carus had possessed remarkable Intelligence to begin with. At last, he set foot in an entirely new realm.

Magic, huh? Should I learn it?

Carus built a new nest in a nameless wasteland. He killed everything that might get in his way and immersed himself in the study of magic.

Then he noticed the humans invading his territory.

I haven't even finished digesting the Magic Gems I ate earlier...

Knowing that he was still incomplete, Carus decided to be patient.

Even when several humans recklessly approached his nest, he tried to ignore them.

Until he caught that bastard's scent.

My eye! It's the human who took my eye!

Carus saw red and immediately raced across the wasteland.

Using one of the humans he had deliberately allowed to escape as a guide, he finally came face-to-face with that bastard.

I'll kill him! I'll chew him up, bones and all!

But that bastard was strong. Even Carus, who had absorbed hundreds of Magic Gems, was pushed back helplessly.

Yet he still had one card left to play.

—Heal.

Sssssss.

His wounds closed, and the bleeding stopped. He couldn't completely restore his torn wing, but this was enough.

—I'll. kill. you. hu.man.

Jin Taekyung, his face filled with shock, clenched his teeth.

Having already experienced Jin Taekyung's speed firsthand, Carus cast another spell without hesitation.

—Sloooow!

A faint trace of dragon blood flowed through Carus's veins.

Five Slow spells stacked atop one another and enveloped Jin Taekyung's body.

—Kehahahaha!

Carus burst into laughter as he watched Jin Taekyung move as slowly as possible.

That was when Jin Taekyung spoke.

"One hundred points to Agility."

—...?

Whoosh.

Carus blinked.

A spearhead wreathed in blue flames filled his enormous eye.

"What are you looking at, you fucking bastard?"

Crunch!

Chapter 222

Ssssss.

Blue flames flickered over the spearhead.

They were a concentration of immense qi—powerful enough to pierce even the Wyvern's steel-like hide and scales.

There was no way they would fail to penetrate its eye, the Wyvern's only real weakness.

"What are you looking at, you fucking bastard?"

Without the slightest hesitation, I drove my spear into its enormous eye.

Crunch! Ssssss!

Hide? Scales?

Nothing could stop the spearhead.

Blood gushed out as the Scorching Yang Qi burned through its retina. Its vertically slit pupil dilated, and its maw stretched so wide it looked ready to tear apart.

"Graaaaaaaah!"

It was a howl from the depths of its soul.

An inhuman shriek I had never heard before burst from its mouth, which was stretched wide enough to split.

That nearly blew out my eardrums.

Even after raising my internal energy to protect my hearing, my ears were still ringing.

Leaving the spear embedded in its eye, I landed lightly on the ground and watched the creature writhe.

Boom! Kwoooooom!

It thrashed wildly, swinging its one intact wing and tail in every direction. Then it suddenly jerked its head up.

"Grrrrr."

The head of the house-sized monster.

Black blood poured from the eye, which had been half crushed.

It was a horrifying sight—enough to make even a fairly gutsy person step backward. But as I watched, I felt refreshed, as if someone had opened a hole in my chest.

"You're one dumb son of a bitch. You still haven't learned your lesson after what happened three years ago?"

Even if it had lost both eyes, it still had other senses.

Its head trembled with pain as it turned directly toward me.

"Hu. man."

"Why, Wyvern?"

"How. did. you. even?"

I grinned at the disbelief in its voice.

It was almost a shame the bastard couldn't see my smile.

"If you wish hard enough, the whole universe will help you. Something like that."[1197]

"My. ma. gic. was. per. fect!"

"Oh, I'll give you that. You caught me by surprise."

What kind of monster was a Wyvern?

It had a body and wings as large as a building, a hide tough enough to deflect most attacks, and even the ability to use Breath.

It was terrifying enough on pure physical ability alone. I had never dreamed it might know magic too.

Or that one measly Slow spell would cut my Agility by fifty.

According to the System notification, its magic had been amplified several times over by the dragonkin trait.

But I still had one trump card left.

"I've saved up quite a few points. Saving is a habit of mine."

Back when I was a rookie in Murim, I had raised my stats with every point I earned.

I had been weak then, and my situation was so precarious that there was no telling what might happen the next day.

But as I grew stronger, I realized something.

These points could be a weapon too.

Just as martial artists concealed their ultimate techniques until the very end.

"What. kind. of. orc. shit. is. that?"

"What do you think? It means your magic won't do a damn thing to me."

I leisurely opened my Inventory and pulled out a new spear. When I tapped the spearhead with my fingernail, a clear ring echoed through the air.

The blind creature jerked at the sound.

"What. are. you. plan. ning?"

"You already know. Why ask?"

Step. Step.

With every step I took toward it, its tightly hunched body flinched.

"We have an outstanding debt to settle. With three years of interest."

[1197] A reference to a saying associated with former South Korean president Park Geun-hye about the universe helping those who wish for something earnestly.

There was no room for compromise. This fight would end only when one of us died.

And I wasn't the one dying here today.

"I'm going to kill you."

"Kraaaaaah!"

But the creature wasn't about to take it lying down.

It had lost one wing and both eyes to me, but it was still a Named Monster. It had enough strength left for one final struggle.

"Heal!"

Sssssss.

Black mana once again enveloped its enormous body. The bleeding stopped at once, and new flesh began to fill the wounds. It was far faster than any healing magic I had ever seen.

And it wasn't finished.

"Dark. Bin. ding!"

Shrrrrrrk!

Thorny vines erupted without warning from the dusty wasteland and wrapped tightly around my entire body.

At the same time, a System notification sounded.

Beep!

SYSTEM

Lv.??? Carus has used Binding Magic!
Due to the dragonkin trait, the magic is enhanced!
Strength temporarily decreased by 10!
Stamina temporarily decreased by 10!
Agility temporarily decreased by 10!

The thorny vines crept upward from my ankles, coiling around my legs, waist, arms, and finally my neck.

Sawtoothed thorns pierced my thin leather armor and dug into my skin.

Beep.

SYSTEM

Paralysis Poison has entered your body!
Nerve Poison has entered your body!
Status abnormality: Poisoned!

"...Huh. What the hell is this?"

“Grrrrr.”

The creature—or rather, Carus—laughed triumphantly. Its mangled eye was already beginning to return to its original form.

“You. let. your. guard. down. hu. man!”

“Let my guard down?”

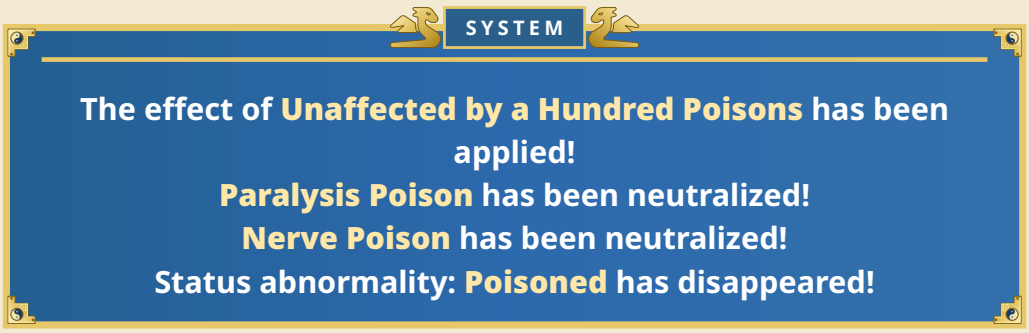
I thought for a moment, then nodded.

“Yeah. I did let my guard down.”

“…Why. are. you. so. calm?”

“When someone acts calm in a situation like this, it usually means one of two things. Either they’re bluffing their ass off, or…”

Ding.



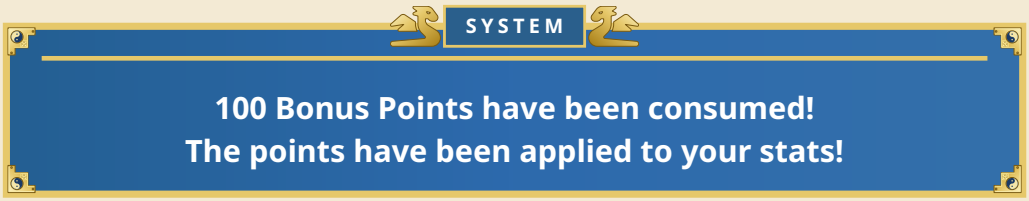
“Or they have a good reason not to worry.”

The instant I finished speaking, I stepped forward.

The thorny vines, each as thick as my thigh, tightened around my entire body, but they couldn’t stop me.

“While I’m at it, I’ll splurge on a bonus. Fifty Strength. Fifty Stamina.”

Ding.



Crack. Crrrunch.

I tore and shattered the vines with overwhelming power and Strength.

Carus’s magic had been greatly amplified by the dragonkin trait, but the magic itself wasn’t particularly advanced.

“Slow magic, binding magic. What’s next?”

Its eye had already almost completely healed.

When Carus saw me emerge from the vines unharmed, its maw fell open.

“You…you!”

I brushed the pieces of vine from my arm.

"Don't you have any other spells? You were so confident, I thought you'd at least know how to factor, but it turns out you've only mastered addition and subtraction."

"How. did. you?"

"My own magic."

"Your. own. ma. gic?"

"Yeah. Magic."

I shifted the iron spear in my hand into a reverse grip.

That was all the preparation I needed. This spear was my magic, and the creature would never be able to stop it.

"Huuup."

I drew a deep breath. Every muscle in my body meshed together like tiny gears, and the world slowed.

I leaned back and snapped my arm forward, casting a spell I hadn't quite memorized.

"Burst, sesame."[1198]

Whoosh! Fwooooooosh!

Against the red sunset staining the horizon, a blue flash plunged into the creature's eye, which was dyed an even deeper shade of blood.

Burning. Shattering. Bursting.

Crack!

"Graa…aaaaaaah!"

I walked toward it as its agonized scream tore through the air. With every step, familiar faces flashed before my eyes.

Faces I would probably remember until the day I died.

Ever since that day three years ago, shackles had weighed down my ankles.

Anger. Guilt. The desire for revenge. Emotions piled one atop another, layer upon layer.

Their weight had been crushing. So heavy I couldn't take a single step forward.

But now…

At some point, I had grown strong enough to bear that weight.

At long last, I could offer some comfort to the spirits of those who had died before me.

Yes. Finally.

Just as I murmured those words silently in my heart, mana rippled around the creature writhing in pain.

[1198] A variation on "Open Sesame," the command that opens the cave in Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves.

“Kraaaah! Slow! Dark Binding! Magic Arrow!”

Three spells erupted in rapid succession.

I kicked off the ground and charged forward. The instant I shot beyond Slow’s area of effect like a streak of light, thorny vines and dozens of mana arrows rose to block my path.

Sssshing! Shrrrk!

Everything was sliced apart along the arc of blue flame. Sensing that its attack had failed, the creature beat its one remaining wing.

It was such an enormous target that I didn’t even need to aim. Another flash shot from my hand.

Swooooooosh! Thud!

“Kyaaaaaaah!”

Whoooosh!

A shrill scream rang out. Then its spike-covered tail came hurtling toward me with a terrifying roar as it tore through the air.

Boom!

But I had already leaped half a beat ahead of it.

The rocks scattered across the wasteland like reefs rising from the sea shattered into powder.

Open Inventory. Equip.

As I descended, I swung my spear.

Shraaaak.

The severed tail rolled through the dust with black blood spilling from it.

“Kraaaaah!”

Shrrk. Shrrk. Shrrk.

It was like perfectly meshing gears.

I blocked, dodged, and cut through every attack the creature unleashed in its desperate struggle.

Then I realized that no more attacks were coming and stopped.

“Krrk. Grrrk.”

Two severed wings. A severed tail. Two eyes that could no longer function.

The creature lay submerged in a vast pool of blood, ragged breaths rasping from its maw as though each one might be its last.

I watched it for a while before opening my mouth.

“Do you want to live?”

“…”

“Then use your healing magic. I’ll wait.”

“Will. you…save. me?”

“No. It just feels like a waste to send you off like this.”

“…!”

“Hold out ten more times. I’ll kill you after that.”

The creature’s body trembled. Its gaping eye, pouring dark-red blood like a waterfall, turned toward me.

“You. are. cruel. hu. man.”

“Compared to what you did, this is nothing.”

“I. only. did. what. I. had. to. do.”

“I know.”

Humans killed monsters, and monsters killed humans.

The two sides had been killing each other for decades. It was both history and an inescapable cycle. And…

“I’m no different.”

Completing my revenge—that was what I had to do now.

After a brief silence, a resigned whisper escaped its maw.

“…Kill. me.”

The strength slowly drained from its twitching body.

I aimed my spear between its blood-caked eyes and whispered softly.

“Thank you.”

For staying alive until now.

And for dying by my hand.

With those barely audible words, I drove the spear forward.

Shnk.

The Scorching Yang Qi flowing from the spearhead as it gently pierced through the center of its brow rampaged like a wild beast, devouring and burning everything in its path.

A skull harder than steel. Flesh. Brain matter. Everything else.

Ding.

System notifications washed over me like waves. I released the scorching-hot spear shaft and thought,

I did it. Finally.

What more was there to say?

The shouts of other people brought me back to myself as I stood there in a daze.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung!”

“Taekyung!”

Team Leader Choi. Butler Kim. Im Kkeokjeong. Song Song.

The guildmates I had met through new bonds.

My people.

As I watched them race toward me, I let out a weary laugh.

Chapter 223

A thrill.

That was what everyone who had witnessed the battle felt.

They had known for some time that Jin Taekyung was extraordinarily skilled. They had also known that what they had seen so far wasn't the full extent of his abilities.

But who knew he was this strong?

Team Leader Choi—or rather, Choi Minwoo—swallowed dryly.

Though it had only been a few months, no one had observed Jin Taekyung more closely than he had.

Yet at that moment, Choi Minwoo realized that every judgment he had made about Jin Taekyung had been wrong.

What… exactly is this man?

Everything he had seen until now had been no more than the tip of the iceberg.

A few months ago, when they had first met at a Hunter staffing agency, Taekyung had volunteered to work as a porter for a few hundred thousand won[1199] a day.

Now, he had hunted a Named Monster alone.

And utterly overwhelmed it.

Puhk!

The spearhead infused with Aura pierced the monster between the eyes.

It was the moment an immensely powerful Named Monster died at the hands of a single person.

It was also the moment a new legend was born.

"Young Master."

"…Ah."

Choi Minwoo had been dazed for a moment, but Butler Kim's call finally brought him back to his senses.

When he looked around, everyone had a similar expression.

Shock. And more shock.

Trembling with an indescribable thrill, they rushed toward Jin Taekyung as if by prior agreement.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung!"

"Taekyung!"

Jin Taekyung smiled at them. It was a relieved smile, as if he had finally cast off even the slightest trace of regret.

[1199] A few hundred thousand Korean won—roughly 200,000–500,000 won—is about $140–$360 or €130–€320.

Choi Minwoo let out a hollow laugh.

“You can smile at a time like this?”

“I don’t know. I can’t think of anything else to do.”

“Then shout, at least. We’re the only ones here anyway.”

“Something like, ‘I killed a Named Monster!‘?”

“Yes. Now it’s finally starting to feel real.”

Choi Minwoo stared at Jin Taekyung as he scratched the back of his head, then abruptly held out his hand.

A sentence he had momentarily forgotten had come back to him.

Something he had wanted to say if—just if—Taekyung won.

“Thank you for all your hard work.”

“…”

“You’ve truly been through so much.”

For an instant, Jin Taekyung’s eyelids trembled.

An indescribable emotion flickered through his clear, deep-black eyes. Then he firmly clasped Choi Minwoo’s hand.

“Thank you. All of you.”

For a while, I couldn’t come to my senses amid the barrage of questions and congratulations flying at me from every direction.

“So that was already thirty years ago. The Great Cataclysm was still in full swing at the time…”

“Ah, yes.”

Butler Kim, who rarely showed much emotion, excitedly rattled off one incident after another from the Great Cataclysm.

“My goodness. This isn’t a dream, is it? No, it isn’t, right?”

“Uh, no.”

Song Song stared at me as if she still couldn’t tell whether she was dreaming or awake.

“Sniff. Taekyung! You bastard! Sniff, sob!”

“…Why are you crying again, Uncle?”

“Because I’m proud of you, you punk. I’m proud. Sniff!”

Im Kkeokjeong burst into tears as if his own child had made it back alive.

With all that going on, I didn’t have a chance to check the backlog of System messages.

In the end, Team Leader Choi was the one who brought order to the chaos.

“All right, everyone, calm down. Let’s deal with the cleanup first.”

“That’s a good idea, but…”

I cautiously asked the most important question.

“How are we supposed to clean this up?”

“…Oh. Well, you see…”

Even Team Leader Choi, who was never at a loss in any situation, looked flustered.

Cleaning up after a raid was routine, and the work was generally the same every time.

Check and treat the casualties, then sort through and collect the byproducts. If there was anything else, it was usually just inspecting the Equipment.

But this time was different.

This bastard’s torso alone is over fifty meters[1200] long.

And that was only counting its length. Its enormous girth, wings, tail, and everything else were separate problems.

Just thinking about how to deal with it was giving me a headache.

But we can’t just leave it here.

Processing the byproducts meant separating the hide, bones, and flesh.

The Carus I had brought down was a Named Monster, so its rarity and the difficulty of processing it were beyond imagination.

Fuck, what are we supposed to do with the scales?

They weren’t fish scales we could scrape off with a kitchen knife.

Aside from me, someone would have to be at least as capable as Butler Kim or Team Leader Choi to handle the job. Of course, there was one possible solution.

There was one method left.

It was both extremely easy and extremely difficult.

Inventory.

Based on everything I had experienced so far, the Inventory’s capacity was practically infinite. Besides, this was a monster’s corpse, not a living creature.

It was worth a try.

The problem comes afterward.

I could already picture everyone’s reaction if I put Carus’s corpse into my Inventory.

Even if I came clean to the guild members, suspicions would arise unless I intended to keep the byproducts forever.

Reporters are camped out at the Gate entrance, so how did he secretly carry all of it outside? Things like that.

If that happened, it might not be long before the entire country learned my secret.

[1200] Fifty meters is about 164 ft.

The front pages of the daily newspapers and every news headline would be decorated with my name.

> Breaking News: A-Rank Hunter Jin Taekyung Revealed to Be a System User

> Interview with Jin Taekyung: “Martial Arts Were the Easiest Part”

> Hunter Association: “Jin Taekyung’s Hunter License Must Be Revoked”

> Jin Taekyung Blasts Hunter Association: “Fuck, if You Don’t Like It, Use the System Yourselves”

> NASA Official Statement: “We Will Capture Him at All Costs and Subject Him to Experiments”

“…”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung? Is something wrong?”

“No. Just thinking about it made me dizzy.”

“Pardon?”

That could never be allowed to happen. Absolutely not.

In the end, after everyone put their heads together, we settled on one solution.

Team Leader Choi announced the verdict with the solemnity of a judge.

“Let’s bring in outside personnel.”

Gates weren’t immutable spaces, unchanging as evergreen trees.

After a certain amount of time, their destroyed environments and monsters were restored. This phenomenon was called Regen, and the time it took for a Gate to undergo Regen varied according to its Grade.

“As far as I know, A-Rank Gates usually undergo Regen once a week. Today is only the first day, so we have plenty of time.”

We would bring in outside personnel as quickly as possible to speed up the work. For now, it was the most reasonable and feasible option.

There was, however, one small problem with the plan.

“The exit Gate hasn’t opened.”

That was exactly what had happened.

Now that we had beaten the Named Monster to death, the exit should have opened. Yet even after several dozen minutes, it still showed no sign of appearing.

Im Kkeokjeong also looked around anxiously.

“Yeah, why hasn’t it opened? Is the Gate broken?”

“…”

What a horrifying thing to say.

As if Login Murim wasn’t enough, now there was Login Gate? If that was what this was, I’d rather bite my tongue and die.

Just as an ominous feeling began creeping over me, Butler Kim spoke.

“It appears the boss monster is still alive.”

“Alive? The boss monster?”

I pointed at Carus’s corpse, which lay facedown in a pool of blood, but Butler Kim shook his head.

“Named Monsters and boss monsters are different. To put it simply…the former is an uninvited guest, while the latter is the original homeowner.”

“The homeowner?”

“Yes. This may be easier to understand. If an armed intruder broke into your home, Hunter Jin Taekyung, what would you do?”

“I’d beat him until he begged me to kill him.”

“…I forgot. I meant if you were an ordinary person.”

“Oh. Then I’d run. If I thought I’d die before I could escape, I’d fight back.”

“The boss monster was no different. A powerful foe it could never hope to defeat appeared, so it fled in fear.”

The inside of a Gate was ultimately a world ruled by the law of the jungle.

The strong reigned, and the weak were trampled.

It might have been different for monsters that lived in tribes, but Wyverns were known to be solitary and ferocious. Carus wouldn’t have stopped after giving the boss monster a few knocks on the head and evicting it.

From the boss monster’s perspective, running away had been a fairly wise decision.

Unfortunately, that just made things more troublesome for us.

There was no way the thing had fled for its life only to hang around nearby grooming its claws.

It would have hidden as far away and as secretly as possible. And with only five people, searching this vast wasteland was impossible.

“Then…”

“We’ll have to go back to the entrance we came through.”

It was the obvious conclusion, and the right person for the job had already been decided.

Without giving it much thought, I shot my hand into the air.

“I’ll go.”

Team Leader Choi asked with concern in his eyes.

“You, Mr. Jin?”

“That seems like the fastest option. Doesn’t it?”

“That’s true, but you must be exhausted after the battle.”

I just leveled up, damn it. Let me go.

I swallowed the words that had risen to my throat and answered instead.

“I’m still full of energy. If you’re worried, I can have someone cast healing magic on me before I leave.”

“As you know, it’s a considerable distance to the entrance.”

“As you know, I’m pretty fast.”

It had taken us quite a while to reach this place the first time, but it would be different if I went alone. I wouldn’t have to stay on guard against monsters or match the pace of a group.

If I ran at full speed, I could reach the Gate entrance within an hour or two.

“Hmm. In that case, I’ll leave it to you. You and Butler Kim can go together.”

“Butler Kim, too?”

Butler Kim stroked his impressively full beard as he answered.

“We need to bring in outside personnel.”

Processing the byproducts of a Named Monster required Hunters who were at least B-Rank, if not A-Rank.

“I know a few people. If I go personally, they’ll probably drop everything and come running.”

“…”

That sounded about right.

I still couldn’t forget the sight of the Sangdong Guild Master doing PT exercises[1201] while loudly repeating orders.

It was something I could hardly believe even after seeing it.

Knowing Butler Kim’s spectacular track record, I could only nod. We needed him if we wanted to bring in outside personnel.

“So it’ll just be Butler Kim and me?”

“Yes.”

Butler Kim nodded and stepped behind me.

“All right. I’m ready.”

“Pardon?”

“Would you bend over a little?”

“…Why do you need me to bend over?”

No, what exactly was he ready for? Why did I need to bend over?

[1201] In South Korea, PT exercises are group calisthenics commonly associated with military training.

A terrible suspicion crossed my mind.

“You don’t mean…soap?”

“Please carry me on your back.”

“Oh. Sure.”

Thank goodness. He wasn’t a centaur.

I let out a sigh of relief and willingly offered my back to Butler Kim.

Thud-thud-thud-thud-thud!

With Butler Kim on my back, I raced forward without slowing down.

We ran into a pack of Orcs wandering through the wasteland, but that was the only interruption.

“Fire Rain.”

The magic of an A-Rank mage.

One-third of the Orcs died beneath the downpour of fire, and the rest scattered in every direction.

I felt like a mobile turret.

This isn’t bad.

Just as I was thinking about how much more efficient raids would be if I did them this way, we crossed the barren wasteland and spotted a dense jungle ahead.

“You’re astonishingly fast. We’ve already reached the jungle.”

“I’m going to slow down from here. With all this vegetation, we could get lost.”

“I’ll follow your lead, Hunter Jin Taekyung.”

The jungle was nothing but trees and undergrowth, making it a maze where one could easily lose their way.

We slowed down and continued along our bearings.

That was when it happened.

“…Huh.”

I suddenly stopped, letting out a hollow laugh.

Puzzled by my abrupt halt, Butler Kim asked,

“What is it?”

“It’s nothing. Just…”

How was I supposed to explain this?

At last, I found the right word and added softly,

“There are hyenas.”

“Hyenas?”

“Yes.”

Stupid, persistent hyenas that kept baring their teeth even after I had let them go once.

I crooked my finger toward the dense undergrowth in the distance.

“Come out, you fucking bastards.”

Rustle.

The undergrowth shook, and the hyenas emerged one by one.

But my eyes were fixed on only one person.

“Would you look at this insolent bastard.”

The leader of the hyenas bared his teeth and growled.

Chapter 224

A few hours earlier, Won Myunghoon's shout brought the dozen or so Star Guild members racing back toward the Gate entrance to a halt.

"Wait. Everyone, stop!"

Every eye turned toward him.

The terrifying Named Monster could appear behind them at any moment, yet Won Myunghoon had been lost in thought. At last, he opened his mouth.

"Scout."

"Yes, Guild Master."

The Guild member assigned to scouting answered immediately.

He was fast on his feet and skilled with a bow. Thanks to the good luck of drawing lots, he had barely escaped death, unlike his other comrades.

"Report our current location."

"According to the coordinates, we're at 175, 37, 990."

"Fuck the coordinates. How far are we from the Gate entrance?"

"At our current pace, approximately seven minutes."

"Not far, then. This is the only route to the Gate entrance, right?"

"…Yes. It is, but…"

The scout trailed off with an uneasy expression.

The other Guild members sensed something was wrong and exchanged glances. Then a single sentence turned their unease into reality.

"We'll set up a cordon here."

"What?"

"You mean a cordon? In this situation?"

"Guild Master, that's—"

Normally, the Guild members would have obeyed without complaint, but this time they protested. Won Myunghoon's eyes turned cold.

"Shut up and follow my orders. I have my reasons."

"Even so, this isn't right! We're dealing with a Named Monster—urk!"

Won Myunghoon seized the throat of the Guild member who had raised his voice the loudest and growled.

"You're disobeying the Guild Master's orders inside a Gate? Are you that desperate to die, you son of a bitch…?"

It happened in the blink of an eye.

The atmosphere froze. Everyone present knew Won Myunghoon's words weren't aimed at just one man.

They had watched him for years. They knew he was more than capable of carrying out his threat.

“I—I’m sorry.”

“This is your last chance. There won’t be another.”

Thud.

Won Myunghoon turned away from the Guild member, who collapsed to the ground with a white face, and swept his sharp gaze across the area.

“Fucking idiots.”

Even in the face of his unfiltered abuse, a dozen pairs of eyes remained fixed on the ground.

They had spent years dealing with Won Myunghoon. This was nothing new.

They had to be even more careful around him inside a Gate. He was an A-Rank Hunter—a powerhouse none of them could defeat even if they attacked him together.

“Do your brains not work? Do I look stupid enough to take on a Named Monster?”

The bowed heads slowly began to rise.

“Then…”

“We’ll deal with those losers.”

“You mean the Peace Guild?”

“By now, they should all be dead.”

While fleeing in a panic, they had heard the monster’s roar. Just hearing it had weakened their knees and sent chills down their spines. It was terror itself.

They hadn’t even seen what the creature looked like, and that was precisely why they were still alive.

How could five people possibly fight something like that? They must all be dead by now.

Every one of them shared that opinion.

Everyone except Won Myunghoon.

“What if even one of them survives and escapes?”

“Th—that…”

“No way.”

They hadn’t considered that possibility.

Under normal circumstances, they might have. But fear of the Named Monster and their desperate will to survive had paralyzed their minds.

Won Myunghoon addressed the hesitant Guild members in a firm voice.

“If even one of those losers gets out of the Gate alive, every last one of us is finished.”

“…”

“An A-Rank Hunter who’s been soaking up the media spotlight dies, and then one of the surviving Peace Guild members starts talking about us? I don’t need to explain what happens next, do I?”

The media’s attention—no, the entire country’s—would turn toward them.

Investigators would get involved. The press and broadcast media would treat it as a major story, churning out new reports day after day.

Even if the survivor couldn’t provide definitive testimony or physical evidence, the contempt and condemnation directed at them would never disappear.

They might even have to leave the country. They would be reduced to people who needed a visa just to visit their parents’ graves.

The thought alone was horrifying.

“Sometimes, what people believe matters more than the truth. You all learned that eight years ago, didn’t you?”

“Guild Master!”

“That’s—!”

The Star Guild members erupted in agitation.

It was an unspoken taboo, yet Won Myunghoon himself had brought it up.

Wasn’t he the one who had planned everything and recruited them in the first place?

At the Guild members’ hardened gazes, Won Myunghoon let out a quiet laugh.

“Eyes down, you fucking bastards. Before I rip them all out.”

“…!”

“You joined because you wanted to. Is there a single bastard here who didn’t take my money? You used it to buy houses and cars, drink and chase women, then got married and had kids. Now you’re all living comfortably, pretending to be good fathers and devoted husbands. Aren’t you?”

Won Myunghoon irritably ran a hand through his hair. Whenever his gleaming eyes swept over them, they trembled.

They wanted to deny it, but every word out of his mouth was true.

They had already crossed a river from which there was no return, and Won Myunghoon was the one who had ferried them to the other side.

The ferryman had already hidden the boat. Without his permission, they could never return to the opposite bank.

Not while they still drew breath.

“I won’t waste any more time talking. Hide and form a cordon. When I give the signal, be ready to kill anyone.”

Won Myunghoon’s voice, thick with killing intent, might as well have been a verdict handed down by the Supreme Court.

Realizing there would be no appeal, the Guild members scattered and began forming the cordon.

“Fucking idiots. It’s already been eight years…”

As Won Myunghoon spat the words through clenched teeth, one of the Guild members cautiously approached him.

“Guild Master.”

“What?”

“Team Leader 1, sir—I mean, what should we do with Team Leader 1?”

“Kim Jonghun? Where the hell is that bastard?”

“We moved him over there for now.”

Won Myunghoon turned his head in the direction the Guild member pointed and let out a hollow laugh.

Only a few meters[1202] away, Kim Jonghun was pale and clacking his teeth together. He looked like a man possessed.

“Pathetic bastard. I was the idiot for keeping something like that around and calling him an A-Rank Hunter.”

Won Myunghoon clicked his tongue softly and waved a hand.

“Handle it quietly.”

“What? I—I can’t!”

“What the hell does that mean?”

“I mean I won’t commit murder.”

“What? What the hell is going through that lunatic head of yours—wait.”

Won Myunghoon had been about to smack the Guild member when he suddenly stopped.

He had only meant for them to keep Jonghun quiet with Silence magic or whatever else was necessary.

But did they really need to?

Come to think of it, no one knows more about my secrets than he does.

He had used Jonghun as his right-hand man for a full ten years. The man had a certain low cunning, and his skills as a Hunter were excellent.

Even when that incident had occurred eight years ago, Won Myunghoon had believed that Team Leader 1, if no one else, would never betray him.

If he opened his mouth, he wouldn’t have gotten off unscathed either.

It wasn’t a matter of trust, but mutual interests.

The scale of their greed might differ, but in a sense, the two of them were cut from the same cloth.

But…

[1202] A few meters is roughly 2–5 m, or about 7–16 ft.

He's useless now.

Won Myunghoon had seen plenty of people exposed to the Fear of high-level monsters.

Their symptoms varied, but they all had one thing in common.

Junk.

Once fear had been branded into their souls, they could never return to the way they had been.

Some went mad and were locked away in special wards. Even those who managed to recover could consider their lives as Hunters over.

He knows more about my secrets than anyone, and he's the one who personally acquired Yeti's Necklace.

On top of that, his credentials as an A-Rank Hunter were now worth no more than the paper they were printed on.

Won Myunghoon deliberated only briefly, then reached his decision even faster.

"Tie him up. I have a use for him."

"What?"

"When that Named Monster comes, don't you think we'll need at least one piece of prey to throw to it?"

"…!"

"It works out well in more ways than one. Since Jin Taekyung is dead, we need to throw in an A-Rank Hunter from our side to make the story convincing."

Won Myunghoon patted the frozen Guild member on the shoulder as he passed, then concealed himself in the nearby undergrowth.

Come on. Anyone. Come.

He didn't have to wait long.

When he saw two people emerge through the undergrowth several dozen meters[1203] away, the corners of his mouth lifted.

The old Guild Master and Jin Taekyung. Are the others all dead?

Jin Taekyung was covered in blood from head to toe, with an old mage carried on his back.

No matter how Won Myunghoon looked at them, they resembled nothing so much as wounded survivors of a lost battle.

This should be easy.

Jin Taekyung in particular—Won Myunghoon wanted to kill that bastard with his own hands.

He had just finished preparing to signal the Guild members when—

"Come out, you fucking bastards."

[1203] Several dozen meters is roughly 30–70 m, or about 100–230 ft.

Jin Taekyung crooked a finger directly toward the undergrowth where Won Myunghoon was hiding.

The smile at Won Myunghoon's lips vanished without a trace.

"Would you look at this insolent bastard."

Seeing Won Myunghoon's twisted face, I couldn't help but laugh under my breath.

How should I put it? I felt like I'd just seen how low a human being could sink.

"You're laughing?"

Apparently, my reaction made him even angrier. He licked his dry lips and exhaled a hot breath.

"You bastard…do you not understand what kind of situation you're in?"

"I understand perfectly."

"And someone who understands the situation is grinning?"

"Choose your words carefully. Hearing you say that makes me want to split your head open."

"…What?"

"You should've stopped when I called you Mr. Won Myunghoon. Won Myunghoon, you fucking bastard."

The hyenas' faces went blank.

Won Myunghoon's lips remained tightly sealed for a long moment before finally opening.

"Have you lost your mind?"

"I'm as sane as ever. Aren't I, Butler Kim?"

Still on my back and watching the situation unfold, Butler Kim answered.

"Entirely normal. Never losing one's composure, no matter the situation, is one of the basic qualities a Hunter should possess."

"What about that bastard?"

"If this had happened during the Great Cataclysm, we wouldn't have found so much as his corpse. Those were somewhat rougher times."

"That's what he says."

Bang!

A single punch shattered a tree thick enough for a man to wrap both arms around.

Won Myunghoon's face flushed bright red as he glared at Butler Kim and me.

"You fucking bastards!"

"What a rude bastard. There's nothing he won't say to an elder, is there? Right?"

Butler Kim answered calmly.

“The young man does seem somewhat lacking in manners. But isn’t this a good world we live in? We should give him a chance.”

“Is that so?”

“Life is a series of choices. And from what I can see, you appear to have already made yours.”

“You’re a ghost.”

“I don’t particularly care for that word. I am somewhat advanced in age, after all.”

“Sorry. I didn’t mean anything by it.”

“I’ll get down first. One, two, three.”

Crack.

As Butler Kim hopped down from my back, the sound of a bone slipping out of place came from his knee.

“Oh dear, are you all right?”

“My knee has been troubling me. Heal.”

When the glow faded, he tapped his knee a few times and smiled.

“I’m fine now.”

“Wow.”

Magic really was incredibly convenient.

After letting out that exclamation, I turned my head toward the knife-like gazes stabbing in from every direction.

A dozen or so Star Guild members, including Won Myunghoon, were glaring at us as if they wanted to tear us apart and kill us.

“What the fuck are you trying to do?”

“What else? I helped him down. I thought he might get shaken around too much during the fight.”

“Fight?”

“What? Didn’t you come here to fight me?”

“Of course not.”

Won Myunghoon added with a savage laugh,

“We came to kill every last one of you.”

“Oh… You sound exactly like a villain in a web novel.”

I was fairly impressed.

At the same time, the last of my hesitation faded, and my mind became clear.

Right. I just had to do it.

“Thanks for saying that. My headache’s completely gone. Maybe you’re not a son of a bitch after all—maybe you’re Dogvorin.”[1204]

[1204] Gevorin is a Korean painkiller. Taekyung swaps its first syllable for the Korean word for “dog” to make a pun.

“You bastard!”

“Maybe not. Then let’s go?”

“…What?”

Whoosh!

I suddenly found myself wondering what expression Won Myunghoon was wearing.

But then I realized it didn’t matter.

Whatever expression he had worn until now, the one he was about to make had already been decided.

“Bear with the pain. No crying.”

Crack!

As he hurriedly turned and swung his arm, I caught it and twisted it.

The bone snapped in an instant. His grip went limp, and the spear slipped from his hand.

His smooth, unlined face twisted like a demon’s as a scream burst from his throat.

“Gyaaaaaaaaaah!”

“Didn’t I tell you?”

I continued in a calm voice.

“Never bare your teeth at me again.”

At the same time, I drove my tightly clenched fist into his maw.

Crunch!

Chapter 225

Crack!

With a grisly crunch, white teeth shot into the air.

He had taken such meticulous care of them that they gleamed even in the darkness. Not that it mattered anymore.

“Puh-haaaack!”

Thud!

Won Myunghoon flew several meters[1205] before slamming his back into a tree and coughing.

The teeth left in his mouth tumbled out with the blood. When he finally raised his head, his face was twisted in shock.

“H-How could this…”

It had all happened in the blink of an eye.

And it wasn’t only Won Myunghoon. Every Star Guild member stared at me in disbelief.

“What do you mean, how? I’m stronger than you. That’s how.”

“T-That can’t be.”

“Yeah. It can.”

I gave him a breezy answer and took a single step forward. Won Myunghoon began to tremble.

“Don’t come any closer!”

“Did I come looking for you? You’re the ones who were waiting for me.”

It was already too late to turn back. I intended to make sure they understood exactly what happened when they bared their teeth at me.

Perhaps sensing the danger, Won Myunghoon shrieked as if having a fit.

“What are you waiting for, you bastards?”

“G-Guild Master.”

“There are only two of them! If we back down now, every last one of us is going to die!”

The hesitant Star Guild members raised their weapons at his command. Won Myunghoon gritted the few teeth he had left.

“I’ll handle this bastard. Get the old man first!”

I stopped.

“What did you just say?”

“Why? Did I hit a nerve?”

Won Myunghoon snorted and glared at me with blazing eyes.

[1205] Several meters is roughly 10–20 ft.

“Jin Taekyung, you bastard. I don’t know what kind of bullshit trick you pulled, but it ends here.”

“Bullshit trick?”

“Don’t play dumb. You obviously found some high-performance acceleration Equipment somewhere and put it on…”

“Oh, that’s what you meant?”

My eyes widened in surprise.

Won Myunghoon’s imagination was impressive. He had somehow managed to rationalize his defeat.

“That’s a pretty original theory. But isn’t the hostage routine a little cliché by comparison?”

“It may be cliché, but the important thing is that it always works.”

“I don’t know about that…”

I let my voice trail off.

While Won Myunghoon and I exchanged those few words, the Star Guild members charged toward Butler Kim with their tanks leading the way.

“I think things might be a little different this time.”

“What?”

The moment Won Myunghoon questioned me, Butler Kim—who had been massaging his lower back—drove his long staff into the ground.

It was a light movement. Yet the power flowing from the tip of his staff shook the earth.

Then his deep voice rang out, like the final switch on a bomb.

“Turn it upside down. Earthquake.”

Rumble!

The primeval forest convulsed.

Cracks split the solid ground. Dirt and rocks shot into the air, exposing the trunks of trees that had sunk their roots deep into the earth. Flocks of nameless birds took flight.

—Screeeech!

They were the only ones able to escape the earthquake.

Unfortunately for the Star Guild members, they had no wings. The cracked and shattered ground surged up like triangular waves and swallowed them whole.

“Everyone, get out of the—urk!”

“Gyaaaaaaah!”

Rooooar!

Once the waves had swept past, only scattered groans and screams drifted through the forest.

The Star Guild members lay crushed beneath an enormous weight of earth and rubble, barely managing to keep their heads exposed as they gasped for breath.

The man who had incapacitated around a dozen veteran B-Rank Hunters with a single spell could not have looked more at ease.

“Young men these days have no respect for their Senior. Stop struggling and close your eyes, all of you—unless you want to be buried alive.”

His voice was chilling, unlike anything I had ever heard from him before.

Only then did the Star Guild members realize the true extent of Butler Kim’s abilities. Their faces went pale, and they lowered their heads.

Well, except for one person.

“An A-Rank mage…!”

A-Rank Hunters were rare, but A-Rank mages and healers were rarer still. The Star Guild members had probably never expected Butler Kim—who always kept his hands folded behind his back and laughed amiably—to be an A-Rank mage.

I grinned at the trembling Won Myunghoon.

“The hostage situation failed. What are you going to do now?”

“…”

“That’s why I told you not to bare your teeth.”

Won Myunghoon had been standing there blankly, as if his soul had left his body. At last, he managed to speak.

“What are you? What are all of you?”

“You already know. We’re the Peace Guild. We’d like to live up to our name, but no one around us seems willing to cooperate.”

Won Myunghoon bit his lip.

He could never have imagined that one bad decision would lead to this.

But it was already too late to turn back. A cornered hyena had only two choices left.

Run. Or submit.

Won Myunghoon chose the latter.

Clang!

The spear slipped from his hand and rolled across the ground.

“…I surrender.”

“You surrender?”

I walked toward him. When I kicked the fallen spear far away, he lowered his head in resignation.

“Just like that?”

“…”

Even with me standing right in front of him, he didn’t move. I addressed him as he stood there silently with his head bowed.

“Once we get out, you’re looking at life in prison at the very least. You know how serious a crime this is inside a Gate, don’t you?”

After a moment’s hesitation, Won Myunghoon spoke.

“Because it’s better than dying.”

“Better than dying… Yeah, that’s true.”

As long as he survived, there would still be a chance. Death, on the other hand, meant a complete end. Whatever lay beyond it was something he would only discover afterward.

People with a lot to lose tended to fear death. Won Myunghoon was no exception.

“Raise your head.”

“…All right.”

I stared into his eyes.

An unknowable light swirled within those twin pupils, dark as the abyss.

Fear of the future awaiting him. Anxiety over death.

And then…

Thump!

“Taekyung. Please.”

“…”

“Just once. Give me one last chance. Killing someone like me will only leave a bad taste in your mouth.”

“It’ll leave a bad taste, but you won’t be punished. If you’re threatened with murder in a Gate, self-defense is recognized. You know that too.”

“B-But still.”

Won Myunghoon swallowed hard.

“If you kill me, it’s murder. That doesn’t change the fact that you’ll become a murderer.”

Murderer.

The word rolling around on the tip of my tongue left a foul taste.

I looked down at Won Myunghoon, kneeling before me and begging for his life in a servile voice, then spoke.

“I’ll trust you.”

“Taekyung!”

“But do me a favor. Don’t betray that trust.”

I tossed him a rope and told him to bind himself. The moment I turned away—

“Ha-ha-ha! You stupid bastard!”

A triumphant shout rang out, and killing intent flared behind me.

I turned my head. Won Myunghoon was already right on top of me, an Aura-infused dagger clutched in his hand.

“Die!”

Whoosh! Slash!

A brief rush of displaced air—and a fountain of blood sprayed upward. The triumphant joy lighting Won Myunghoon’s face gave way to bewilderment.

“…Huh?”

Thud.

A moment later, something fell to the ground.

It was Won Myunghoon’s wrist, cleanly severed and still clutching the dagger whose Aura had vanished.

“You needed to be at least twice that fast.”

I flicked the blood from the dagger in my hand. In that split second, I had drawn a weapon from my Inventory, and the fight had ended just as quickly.

A brief silence followed, though it felt like an eternity.

Then Won Myunghoon’s mouth slowly fell open, and a horrific scream burst from it.

“Gyaaaaaaaaaah!”

As I watched him writhe in agony, my heart remained as still and peaceful as a lake.

I felt no betrayal at having trusted someone I should never have trusted. Not even the slightest regret.

Because…

“Thanks. You did exactly what I trusted you to do.”

I had never trusted Won Myunghoon in the first place.

Not since I received Yeti’s Necklace. Not since the moment he ignored my warning and bared his teeth at me again.

“You were always exactly this kind of man.”

“Urgh, gyaaaaah!”

“If I leave you alive, you’ll bare your teeth at me again someday. Like a thorn stuck in my throat, you’ll find some way to come back as long as you survive.”

Slice. Slice.

My dagger severed the tendons in his calf. Blood spattered, and his knee buckled. Just as I pressed the razor-sharp blade against his throat—

“Hunter Jin Taekyung!”

Several dozen meters[1206] away, Butler Kim was watching me with concern in his eyes.

“There is no need to go that far.”

“You’re right. That’s why I let him go once.”

[1206] Several dozen meters is roughly 100–200 ft.

“But killing a monster and murdering a person are different. I would rather do it myself—”

I answered calmly.

“I know.”

“…Pardon?”

“I know that perfectly well.”

How many people had I killed by now? Dozens? No, a hundred?

The world I had lived in had never been forgiving. In Gates, I had to kill monsters. In the Murim, I had to kill people.

I was no lofty junzi.[1207] I was a Hunter and a martial artist with a family and people I had to protect. If surviving and becoming stronger meant getting blood on my hands, I would do it willingly.

To me, there was little difference between a monster and Won Myunghoon.

Because he’s an enemy.

Whoever the enemy might be, if they could someday bring harm to me or my people, the right thing to do was eliminate the threat at its source.

“So don’t stop me.”

“…!”

Butler Kim had fought his way through countless battlefields himself.

That brief exchange must have been enough for him to understand what kind of person I was—and what I had decided to do.

He regarded me with a grave look, then gave a small nod.

“Urgh. P-Please, spare me…”

“Spare you?”

I looked down at the groaning Won Myunghoon.

He had once been the idol I looked up to as a child—the man who shone brighter than anyone among countless stars.

But now I would seal those old memories inside a time capsule and bury them deep underground.

I whispered quietly.

“If you were going to kill someone, you should’ve been prepared to die.”

“Ta-Taekyung. Please…”

Slice!

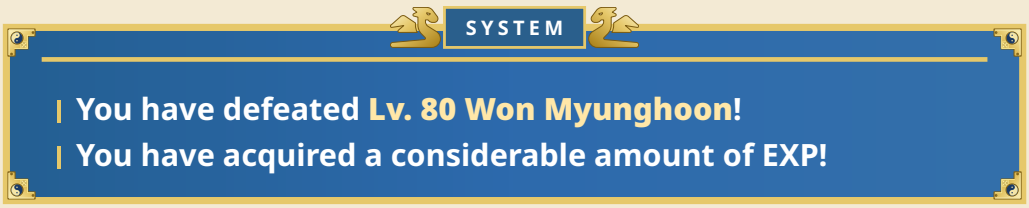
The dagger cut deep into his throat. Won Myunghoon’s eyes bulged as he stared up at me pleadingly.

He tried to cover the wound with his one remaining hand, but he could stop neither the blood nor his life from pouring out.

[1207] Junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright gentleman.

Grrrgh. Thud.

The moment his body collapsed with a wet, rattling gurgle—



The System announced the enemy's death.

"Let's go."

Butler Kim nodded as he watched me with a strange look in his eyes.

"We have more baggage to take with us now."

He waved his staff, and the Star Guild members buried beneath the earth floated gently into the air.

As I watched magical ropes being summoned and binding them tightly together like strings of dried fish, I suddenly spoke.

"Wait a moment, Butler Kim."

"…?"

"We need to add one more person."

A short while later, I followed my Qi Sense and found a gagged man.

For some reason, he had been bound tightly to a tree. And I recognized his face.

"The Star Guild's Team One Leader?"

Most of the reporters who had flocked to cover the joint raid by the Peace Guild and the Star Guild—or rather, Jin Taekyung and Won Myunghoon's raid—had left long ago.

But there were always exceptions. One was a young man in thick, horn-rimmed glasses, eating ramen.[1208]

"Being the youngest is miserable. Just miserable."

His colleague snickered and picked up a piece of instant kimchi.[1209]

"You've only been here two months, and you already have plenty to say."

"Come on, Senior. You haven't been here that long either."

"Hey. Back in my day, I kept my mouth shut and worked. If they told me to stay, I stayed. If they told me to do something, I did it."

"But isn't this a bit much? How can they make us wait around for days just to cover one Hunter?"

[1208] Korean ramen, or ramyeon, is typically instant noodles.

[1209] Kimchi is a Korean dish of salted, fermented vegetables, commonly cabbage.

"You haven't changed since college. If you don't like it, stick around long enough to build up some seniority."

The young man stared glumly into his cup ramen,[1210] where beads of oil floated across the surface.

"It's an A-Rank Gate. It'll take at least three days for them to come out…"

"Three days? We should count ourselves lucky if they don't stay the whole week."

"A week?"

"It's an A-Rank Gate. Once they're inside, they might as well get everything they can out of it."

"…Ugh."

The young man shuddered as if the mere thought gave him goose bumps.

Seeing groups of other junior reporters in the same miserable situation eating nearby only made him feel worse.

"I wish they'd come out soon."

"They definitely won't be out today. Like you said, even if they're quick, it'll still take three days. Get some sleep. Want to hit a sauna together? Maybe play some billiards?"

"Billiards?"

"Yeah. There's plenty to do around here. The local businesses just rip you off."

"Then maybe one game of billiards…"

Tempted by his Senior's offer, the young reporter had just begun to rise when—

Whoooooosh.

The enormous door looming before them—the Gate—gave off a strange sound.

The mana that had lain as still as the surface of a lake began to swirl, and urgent shouts erupted from every direction.

"The Gate! The Gate is opening!"

"Already? What the hell?"

"The cameras! Get them over here, now!"

The area fell into chaos in an instant. The reporters who had been idly passing the time shot to their feet and crowded in front of the Gate.

The young reporter and his Senior were no exception. They claimed a spot at the front faster than anyone else, their minds reeling.

"What's going on? Why are they coming out already?"

"How should I know? Set up the equipment!"

Cameras began rolling, and flashes burst without pause.

The reporters had sensed that something had happened, and their prediction proved exactly right.

[1210] Korean ramen, or ramyeon, is typically instant noodles.

Whoosh!
Around a dozen people burst from the swirling vortex of mana.
Everyone who saw them stared with their mouths hanging open.
“…W-What happened?”

Chapter 226

Click, click!

A barrage of camera flashes blinded me. You'd think I would have gotten used to it by now, but apparently I really was a caterpillar that had to eat pine needles.[1211]

"Mr. Jin Taekyung! Did you clear the Gate?"

"If not, why did you come out so quickly?"

Questions rained down from the reporters. If the Gate security guards hadn't been there, they looked ready to jam their microphones into my mouth already.

But the initial frenzy soon died down, and confused voices rose to fill the void.

"But… why is Jin Taekyung covered in blood like that?"

"The numbers don't add up, either. The people behind him are Star Guild members."

"They're even tied up."

"Where's Won Myunghoon? I don't see him, either!"

I could more or less imagine how we looked on camera.

There was me, drenched in the blood of monsters and Won Myunghoon. A dozen or so Star Guild members tied together in a line. And Butler Kim holding the rope as though he were walking a dog.

I can't blame them for reacting like that.

I licked my dry lips, then shook my head at Butler Kim as he started to step forward on my behalf.

He had tried to stop me, and I had refused. This had happened because of my choice, so it was only right that I deal with the aftermath myself.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung! What happened?"

"Please, just give us one comment!"

The confused murmuring didn't last long. The moment the reporters caught the scent of a scoop, they went wild.

I calmly watched the frenzied press corps before asking the young reporter at the front a question. He wore thick, horn-rimmed glasses.

"Who do you work for?"

The young man flinched.

"Pardon? M-Me?"

"Yes. You."

"Uh, well, I…"

[1211] A Korean saying that a caterpillar should eat pine needles means a person should stick to what suits them.

He had been shouting the loudest from the front, but apparently hadn’t expected anything like this to happen.

After a brief panic, he finally managed to answer.

“H-HunterTV.”

“Oh. Them.”

HunterTV was a channel that focused on Hunter-related issues and information.

It was a cable channel, but it was also a major broadcaster whose ratings surpassed those of terrestrial networks.

Since it was connected to what I was about to say, both the reporter and I were lucky.

“I’ll take your questions.”

“Pardon?”

“There are too many microphones. I’d rather focus on one.”

“So… an exclusive?”

“Call it whatever you want. Shall we begin?”

He looked like a greenhorn, but a reporter was still a reporter.

The bewilderment vanished from his face, and his eyes gleamed behind his glasses.

“How about broadcasting it live?”

“Live?”

“Yes. Like at the Association last time. We can stream it in real time.”

A live stream.

After a moment’s thought, I nodded.

“Let’s do that.”

iTube was the number-one video-sharing website.

Countless channels, belonging to everyone from individuals to major organizations, were registered on the platform. Among them, HunterTV was a massive channel with several million subscribers in Korea alone.

At the same moment, the phones of HunterTV subscribers going about their daily lives all buzzed with the same notification.

Bzzzz.

[HunterTV has started a live stream.]

[“Jin Taekyung Exclusive Live Broadcast.”]

The view count hit 100,000 in no time.

The sudden influx of viewers had left the screen black, but the chat was already blazing like a furnace packed with firewood.

> ㄴ What is this? Why is there suddenly an exclusive Jin Taekyung live broadcast?
> ㄴ No idea. Feels like it hasn't even been a day since Lord Fuck entered the Gate.
> ㄴ It's an A-Rank Gate. He's already out?
> ㄴ This buffering is absolute garbage.
> ㄴ Now I want some Butter Rings.[1212]
> ㄴ Oh, the picture's up.
> ㄴ Everyone shut up and welcome Lord Fuck with the proper reverence.

Pop.

The brief but seemingly endless buffering finally ended, and the video began to play.

The moment the viewers saw the enormous Gate and the young man standing before it, their fingers flew across their screens.

> ㄴ It's Lord Fuck!
> ㄴ Oh my god, fuck.
> ㄴ Please insult me!
> ㄴ Smack my ass, too!
> ㄴ Cut it out, you lunatics.

Jin Taekyung's popularity was through the roof.

He had saved countless lives by suppressing a B-Rank Gate. His approachable, down-to-earth demeanor, unexpected from an A-Rank Hunter, and even the bizarre spectacle of him accidentally swearing during an official press conference had kept him at the center of attention day after day.

But the excitement didn't last long. The viewers soon noticed that something was wrong.

> ㄴ Why does he look like that?
> ㄴ Did Lord Fuck get hurt? He's covered in blood.
> ㄴ Half the people are missing, too. And the ones there are tied up;;
> ㄴ What the hell is this? Something happened.
> ㄴ What's HunterTV doing? If you started a broadcast, at least ask some questions.

[1212] Butter Rings are Korean butter cookies. Their Korean name, beoteoring, sounds like beopeoring, the Korean pronunciation of "buffering."

Perhaps mindful of the chaos in the chat, the HunterTV reporter finally spoke.

“I’ll get straight to the point. What happened inside the Gate?”

“It would take too long to explain everything from beginning to end… Is it all right if I summarize?”

“Please do.”

Vrrrrr.

The camera zoomed in until Jin Taekyung’s face filled the screen.

His face was smeared with blood and dust, but his eyes shone calmly. Then a composed voice flowed between his parted lips.

“There was a Named Monster.”

“…!”

“It was a Mutated Gate.”

In an instant, the noise at the scene vanished as though someone had pressed the mute button.

The chat froze for a moment, then began racing upward.

> ㄴ ??
>
> ㄴ ???
>
> ㄴ Wait, why is there a Named Monster here;;;
>
> ㄴ They must all be dead. No wonder so many people are missing;;
>
> ㄴ Is Won Myunghoon dead, too? I haven’t seen him since earlier;
>
> ㄴ Holy shit…

A major incident.

The same words flashed through everyone’s minds.

Even the reporter holding the microphone out to Jin Taekyung forgot his job and stood there with his mouth hanging open.

A Named Monster.

Everyone knew the kind of destruction one could cause.

Five years earlier, a Named Monster that appeared in Central and South America had possessed enough power to destroy a small city by itself.

Although it had finally been defeated after several days of fighting, the damage had been enormous.

Hundreds of Hunters had died, along with ten times as many civilians.

The incident had drawn the attention of the entire world. There wasn’t a reporter or viewer who hadn’t heard of it.

> ㄴ If it really was a Named Monster, surviving was a miracle;

> ㄴ No. Wait a second.
> ㄴ Then that means there's still a Named Monster inside the Gate;;;
> ㄴ So what? It's inside the Gate. Isn't it fine?
> ㄴ Did this bastard just get here from Mars? You idiot, don't you know what happens when the mana level exceeds a Gate's capacity? The monsters come pouring out.
> ㄴ That catastrophe in Central and South America a few years ago happened because the mana level exceeded the limit and the Gate opened;;
> ㄴ The Black Wyvern's Nest? Does anyone know where that is?
> ㄴ Holy shit;; Get the reporters out of there first.

The reporters who had been staring back and forth between Jin Taekyung and the chat as if hypnotized suddenly snapped out of it.

"A Named Monster!"

"Hey, get out of here right now! Grab the cameras!"

No scoop was worth more than their lives.

Just as the reporters, sensing the threat of death, began wading into chaos, someone who had been watching the entire situation finally spoke.

"Ah, I already took down the raid monster, so you don't have to worry too much."

His clear voice rang in everyone's ears.

The reporters who had been trying to flee in a panic and the viewers staring at their phone screens while swallowing nervously both wondered if they had heard correctly.

"Pardon?"

"…What did you say?"

> ㄴ ????
> ㄴ I think I heard that wrong.
> ㄴ What did Lord Fuck just say?
> ㄴ He says he killed a Named Monster…?
> ㄴ Who did?
> ㄴ Lord Fuck.
> ㄴ What did he kill?
> ㄴ A Named Monster.
> ㄴ Can he even do that?
> ㄴ I don't know…

The camera, which had been shaking as though caught in an earthquake, steadied and refocused. Dozens of cameras turned toward the young man's perfectly calm face.

The reporter in horn-rimmed glasses asked Jin Taekyung in a trembling voice,

"C-Could you say that one more time?"

"It's just as I said."

"Then you really killed the Named Monster…"

"Yes. I killed it."

He killed it? A Named Monster?

Everyone's jaws dropped at the unbelievable words that had come from Jin Taekyung's mouth. One reporter finally recovered enough to blurt out a question.

"T-Then did the others die in the process?"

"Seven people died. The rest are safe…"

His voice trailed off. After thinking for a moment, he continued in the same unwavering tone.

"Oh, I should add Won Myunghoon to the death toll. That makes eight."

"W-Won Myunghoon? Why did he…"

"Uh, well…"

Jin Taekyung hesitated briefly before adding,

"I got him."

"…Pardon?"

"Ah, not got. I killed—no, that sounds strange, too. Give me a moment."

Before the aftershock of the Named Monster bomb had even faded, a second bomb went off.

The dozens of reporters at the scene and the 100,000 viewers watching the screen were left half dazed.

What the hell is he talking about?

At the exact moment the same thought crossed everyone's mind, Jin Taekyung finally found what he considered the most appropriate expression.

"This is probably the best way to put it. I 'disposed of him.'"

"…"

"…"

At the end of the heavy silence, a single new line appeared in the frozen chat.

> ㄴ Did this guy just come back from sorting recyclables at home?

Everything moved swiftly from there. The emergency investigation team dug into the truth of the incident with speed and precision.

Countless eyes were on the case. If they missed even a single detail, they might receive a lifetime's worth of abuse.

"Handle this properly. Miss even one thing and you're finished—finished!"

"This has already been reported all the way to the Blue House.[1213] If we slip up, we're all going over the cliff together."

Both the government and the Hunter Association's leadership were on edge.

Contrary to their fears, however, it didn't take long for the whole truth to come to light.

"Holy shit… He killed this thing by himself?"

"He actually killed it."

The investigators were stunned when they confirmed that the enormous Named Monster lay gruesomely dead.

By then, every Star Guild member who had participated in the raid was tied to a cold metal chair in an interrogation room.

"I don't know anything."

"Look, Hunter. The truth will come out soon enough. Why make this difficult?"

"I'm telling you, I don't know anything."

"Ha, you bastard… You'd spill everything with one mental spell, but you still have to be annoying."

"Did you just swear at me? You think being a prosecutor means you can do whatever you want? And don't you know mental magic is illegal?"

Their lives were on the line. They couldn't give up the comfortable lives they had enjoyed as B-Rank Hunters and rot in prison for the rest of their days.

The prosecutors were racking their brains over the Star Guild members' stubborn denials when an unexpected savior appeared.

"I-I'll tell you everything."

Kim Jonghun, Team 1 Leader of the Star Guild, was still mentally shaken when he confessed to everything that had happened.

It was a perfect testimony. On top of that, an anonymous informant had sent a USB drive and a note.

> The Hapsburphon family, a long-established German family of equipment makers, has produced rare and highly practical items. One of their representative products is the PSV-96K camera, which cannot be detected by > any detection magic and functions normally even in Gates with unstable mana…

[1213] The Blue House was the South Korean presidential office.

The prosecutor in charge stared incredulously at the note before asking the investigator,

“What is this supposed to mean?”

“They filmed the entire raid. There’s footage on the USB. Open it and you’ll see. That bastard Won Myunghoon was a real piece of shit.”

“Filming is illegal, isn’t it?”

“It is.”

“It was the Peace Guild, right?”

“Wouldn’t you say so?”

“…”

“Let that much slide. Every Guild with enough clout does it. They didn’t leak it to civilians, and thanks to them, we secured conclusive physical evidence. We both benefit from this…”

Bang!

An employee burst through the door and thrust out his phone.

“H-Have you seen this?”

The number-one real-time search term was boldly displayed across the screen:

“Won Myunghoon Raid Footage Leaked.”

As the ugly side of a former star people remembered fondly was revealed, the internet boiled like a cauldron over hot coals.

> └ What a fucking bastard.
>
> └ My head is ringing. Is this really true? It’s not staged, is it?
>
> └ Good riddance. Taekyung was right to kill him.
>
> └ Still, it was clearly murder. Did he really have to kill Won Myunghoon…?
>
> └ Myunghoon, is that you?
>
> └ Does Wi-Fi reach hell?
>
> └ Did Yama[1214] turn on his hotspot for you?
>
> └ You’re calling this murder? Have you never heard of self-defense?

Only two days had passed since the incident. Yet the backlash was fiercer than anything people could remember.

Each time another long-buried suspicion about Won Myunghoon came to light, public fury boiled over anew.

[1214] Yama is a ruler of the underworld in Buddhist tradition.

And after every wave of still-smoldering rage had swept through, the discussion always ended with the same question.

> └ So what is Jin Taekyung doing?
> └ At this hour? Probably sleeping.
> └ Probably sorting recyclables.

Chapter 227

“Thank you for all your hard work.”

A man in a rumpled suit held out his hand.

His skin was dry and his eyes were sunken. Apparently, the investigator hadn’t been exaggerating when he said the man hadn’t been home in a week.

“You’re the one who worked hard, Prosecutor. Me? Not really.”

I shook hands with the prosecutor in charge and looked around.

The spacious room had a soft bed, a sofa, and even a state-of-the-art wall-mounted TV.

When I was first summoned by the prosecutors’ office, I had imagined a cold, dark interrogation room. Instead, they had put me up in a hotel suite.

“I didn’t expect to be treated this well.”

“The higher-ups are very interested in this case. Would you mind if I sat down for a moment?”

“Oh, sure.”

“Thank you.”

The prosecutor answered wearily and collapsed onto the sofa.

“There was some debate, to be honest. We had quite an argument over whether your actions constituted self-defense or excessive force.”

That part had been bothering me, too.

I had killed Won Myunghoon when I could have subdued him. It went beyond the bounds of self-defense.

Of course, even if I went back a week, I would make the same choice.

“So I assume the issue was resolved in my favor?”

“Of course. Do you think I would’ve come alone otherwise? I would’ve brought Hunters from the Ministry of Justice.”

The prosecutor spoke jokingly, but then his eyes fell on the morning paper lying on the table.

The Black Wyvern’s carcass filled nearly the entire front page. He eyed it and smacked his lips.

“Though even if I had brought them, they probably wouldn’t have been much help.”

“I’m a model citizen. The kind who could live just fine without laws.”

“There was a movie called Law Abiding Citizen. The protagonist killed a prosecutor and even a judge.”

“…”

What was this? Was he asking me to hit him?

The prosecutor let out a quiet laugh at my expression and stood.

“I should get going. I have an incredible backlog of work.”

“I’m glad I could lend a hand.”

“You didn’t lend a hand. You created the work. Once we started digging, every lead pulled up another, like sweet-potato vines.”

I had suspected that Won Myunghoon had plenty of skeletons in his closet.

But once the investigation began in earnest, so much filth came pouring out of his past that I found myself wondering what kind of bastard he had been.

Among his countless crimes were several cases similar to what had happened a week ago.

The incident eight years ago was no different.

Won Myunghoon had been a monster created by the media.

When his brief burst of popularity faded and the spotlight moved on, he tried to stir up scandals himself to draw the public’s attention back to him.

But in the process, the most popular star Hunter of the time died. Under suspicion from the Association and uneasy scrutiny from the public, Won Myunghoon quietly faded from memory.

“He covered up everything thoroughly. With money, with power, and sometimes by making people disappear in what looked like Gate accidents.”

Naturally, there had also been extensive lobbying to minimize the incidents.

In the end, the political and business figures connected to him had to appear before the cameras in wheelchairs and masks.

Along with their favorite line:

I will cooperate fully with the investigation.

Whether the investigation would be conducted properly, or whether they would cooperate in good faith, remained to be seen. But one thing was certain.

The prosecutor spoke with conviction.

“At least half of them are going down.”

The wildfire was already spreading out of control. Putting it out would take more than uprooting a weed or two.

Won Myunghoon’s death had only been the beginning.

“I hope that’s what happens.”

“It has to. It will.”

He offered what sounded like a farewell and reached for the doorknob. Then he paused and turned around.

“I’ve been so busy that I forgot to say this.”

“…?”

His previously straight back bent in a deep bow.

“Thank you. All of this is thanks to you, Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

I'm a simple man. I killed the raid monster because I had a grudge to settle, and I killed Won Myunghoon because he was my enemy.

But the world called me a hero who had prevented a major catastrophe and brought justice.

It was a little burdensome, but…

Well, this isn't so bad either.

I smiled and nodded. A faint smile crossed the prosecutor's exhausted face.

I followed the investigator I had gotten to know over the past week down to the basement.

"You don't need to worry. Security is airtight."

Just as he had said, there wasn't a reporter—or even a camera—in sight in the underground parking lot.

Instead, some familiar faces were waiting for me.

"Son!"

"Oppa!"[1215]

Two people rushed at me with shrieks, and I hugged them both.

No, let me correct that. I hugged Mom and pushed Hayeon away with my palm.

"Son! Are you all right? You're not hurt anywhere?"

"I'm fine. Just a few scratches."

Looking as if she'd just had ten years scared off her life, Mom ran her hands over my entire body. Then she sucked in a breath.

"S-Scratches? Where? You're hurt?"

"No, I misspoke."

"You said you got scratched!"

"I said I wanted some of your saengchae muchim.[1216] The words just came out wrong."

"Taekyung, you're lying again, aren't you? You fought a terrifying monster like that. How could you not have a single injury?"

"It was big, but it was a gentle kid."

"Son, are you going to keep playing word games? Mom is being serious, so hurry up and take off your clothes."

"…How am I supposed to do that here? This is driving me crazy."

I had the reflexes to dodge bullets, but somehow I couldn't evade Mom's hands.

[1215] Oppa is a Korean term a girl or woman uses to address an older brother or an older man she is close to.

[1216] Saengchae muchim is a seasoned raw-vegetable dish. Saengchae sounds similar to the Korean word for "scratch."

Had she learned a grappling technique or something?

As I struggled helplessly, my household-register mate with the other set of chromosomes asked with a shocked expression,

"…Why did I get pushed away?"

"You really have to ask?"

"I'm asking because I don't know."

"Then you deserve a hit."

Flick!

"Ow! Mom! Oppa[1217] hit me!"

"Can't either of you behave?"

Hayeon clutched her forehead with a wounded expression while Mom shouted at us.

In the middle of the chaos, I noticed someone watching us with a smile.

"Don't just stand there smiling. Please stop them."

"Isn't this proof that your family is close? I'm actually jealous."

His legs were long and straight, like a model's. He looked as though he had just stepped out of a magazine shoot as he gripped my shoulder firmly.

"You've been through a lot, Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"You too, Team Leader Choi."

But where was everyone else?

Team Leader Choi noticed me looking around and spoke.

"They all wanted to come, but I stopped them. There are too many eyes watching us."

"Oh."

"Reporters are camped out everywhere. I'll take you home first. We can talk on the way."

An underground parking lot wasn't exactly the best place to catch up. Especially not with a prosecutor's investigator watching us.

We climbed into a high-end sedan with heavily tinted windows. The car purred pleasantly as it wound through the forest of skyscrapers.

"A great deal happened while you were being questioned, though I assume you know most of it."

"I saw it all on TV. I turned off my phone because I was getting so many calls."

Network TV, cable, radio.

These days, wherever I turned, I heard my name and Won Myunghoon's.

Politics, the economy, the Hunter industry—the whole country was in an uproar.

[1217] Oppa is a Korean term a girl or woman uses to address an older brother or an older man she is close to.

I've heard it so much I'm sick of it.

Even the national anthem got tiring after the second verse.

Team Leader Choi glanced at my expression and smiled.

"There's one important thing I should tell you."

"It's not about what we're having for dinner, is it?"

"No. It's related to what happened."

"Team Leader, please. I'm begging you."

"It concerns the processing of the Named Monster's byproducts."

"Please tell me. I'm begging you."

"…"

I sat up straight in the passenger seat and gazed at Team Leader Choi with sparkling eyes.

Mom and Hayeon, sitting in the back, perked up their ears as well.

"Byproducts? Are they really that important?"

"Mom, what are you, someone from the Korean Empire?[1218] Of course they're incredibly important!"

"Oh, please. Mom knows that much. I just don't have any idea how important…"

Plenty of products made from monster byproducts had been commercialized, but they were still luxuries reserved for the wealthy.

To Mom, who had spent her entire life tightening her belt, they might as well have belonged to another world.

As Mom trailed off, Team Leader Choi explained in a gentle voice.

"It depends on the monster. But in the case of the Named Monster Mr. Jin Taekyung killed, its value is astronomical."

"R-Really? I only saw it in photographs, but it did look terrifying."

"As you saw, it was an extremely powerful monster. That's why it was valued at three hundred billion won.[1219]"

"Oh, I see."

A brief silence followed Mom's answer.

There wasn't even the sound of breathing. In the complete silence, I blinked without a word, then barely managed to speak.

"How much?"

"Three hundred billion won.[1220]"

Team Leader Choi added in the same calm tone,

"Oh, that's the auction's starting price."

"T-The starting price?"

[1218] The Korean Empire existed from 1897 to 1910; Taekyung is teasing Mom for sounding out of touch.

[1219] Three hundred billion won is about $210 million or €190 million.

[1220] Three hundred billion won is about $210 million or €190 million.

"Yes. The processing was completed three days ago, and Christie's has already…"

"Wait. Who's Christie?"

Hayeon stared at me in disbelief.

"What do you mean, who's Christie? You don't know Christie's?"

What an idiot. And he's my brother.

That was exactly what her expression said.

I racked my brain to preserve my authority as her older brother, but the only thing the name Christie brought to mind was a beautiful blonde woman.

"A-American billionaire's daughter?"

"…"

"O-Or someone from Hong Kong? European royalty? A Hollywood actress…"

Team Leader Choi came to my rescue as I broke into a cold sweat.

"It's a famous auction house. Along with Sotheby's, it competes for the top position in the industry."

"Oh."

Maybe I had heard of it. Or maybe I hadn't.

I had spent my childhood doing nothing but exercising and my adulthood working like an ox. How was I supposed to know about things like that?

Team Leader Choi, who was knowledgeable about such matters, continued smoothly.

"Christie's approached us first. They offered to charge a much lower commission than Sotheby's if we entrusted the auction to them."

"S-So?"

"Christie's appraisers assessed the value of the byproducts. At present, the starting price is three hundred billion won.[1221] Since the decision requires your consent, we've put off finalizing it."

Was this really happening?

I sat there dazed with my mouth hanging open, then smacked Hayeon on the forehead as she poked her head between the driver's and passenger's seats.

Smack!

"Ow!"

"It's real."

"Why did you hit me?"

"Because I'm precious."

Only after hearing her scream did it finally sink in.

Before long, I would be an incredibly wealthy man.

[1221] Three hundred billion won is about $210 million or €190 million.

"S-Son, what does this mean? Three hundred billion won?[1222]"

"Calm down. It's not all mine."

I didn't know how high the final bid would go, but the Hunter industry had clear rules for dividing the proceeds. Raids were team efforts, after all.

Even if I had killed it entirely by myself, the same principle applied.

But Team Leader Choi's next words left me stunned.

"It's your share, Mr. Jin Taekyung. Every last won."

"…Pardon?"

"The others all agreed. So I hope you won't say anything more about it."

"They all agreed?"

They could each have received anywhere from several billion won[1223] at the low end to tens of billions of won[1224] at the high end.

For an ordinary person, it would have been an irresistible temptation—and clearly their right to claim.

As I stared at him in shock, Team Leader Choi smoothly turned the steering wheel and replied,

"Neither I nor the others are shameless enough to take money for standing around and watching. We have at least that much conscience and conviction."

"You really didn't have to go that far…"

"It wasn't something that required any consideration. You've shown us enough consideration already, so think about what you want to do with the money."

Team Leader Choi's firm words left me speechless.

Three hundred billion won.[1225] Christie's auction.

The words swirled through my head, leaving my thoughts in chaos. Mom and Hayeon had been frozen like statues for a while now, so they were probably even worse off.

This is surreal.

I rubbed my stiff face with one palm.

An unimaginable fortune would soon come rolling into my hands. What should I do with it?

One fantasy led to another. A private jet, a luxury yacht, bundles of cash stacked like mountains, a leopard wearing a collar…

Before long, every one of those fantasies faded like fog.

Only then did my head clear. I finally knew what I should do with the money, and I could see the world around me clearly again.

[1222] Three hundred billion won is about $210 million or €190 million.

[1223] Several billion won is roughly 2–9 billion won, or about $1.4–6.4 million or €1.3–5.8 million.

[1224] Tens of billions of won is roughly 10–90 billion won, or about $7.1–64 million or €6.5–58 million.

[1225] Three hundred billion won is about $210 million or €190 million.

“Team Leader Choi.”
“Yes?”
“May I ask you for a favor?”
The corner of Team Leader Choi’s mouth lifted slightly.
“Anything.”

Chapter 228

Time flew.

One issue followed another, each bigger than the last, while new truths and suspicions continued surfacing everywhere.

A week passed in the blink of an eye. Then a new article took over the portal sites.

[GojoseonTV] Christie's Auction Held in Secret. Winner: Qatar's Prince Cheonsur. Final Bid: Approximately 500 Billion Won![1226]

The short article included only a single photograph, but its impact was enormous.

Behind the broadly grinning Middle Eastern prince in a turban loomed a gigantic carcass.

> ㄴ Top Comment: Isn't that the thing Lord Fuck caught? That Named Monster?
>
> ㄴ Yeah;;; I've seen it so many times I can recognize it just from the hide pattern. But some lunatic actually paid 500 billion[1227] for that thing.
>
> ㄴ The Middle Eastern prince's sheer class blew me away, and Lord Fuck making 500 billion[1228] in one shot made me shit myself.
>
> ㄴ Son, what did you shit? You haven't been looking at anything strange, have you? Mom trusts her son. Love you~

Most people were envious or impressed, but some viewed the news less kindly.

> ㄴ Top Comment: Jin Taekyung stirred up all kinds of trouble, refused to give a single interview, then sold the monster behind everyone's backs. Am I the only one bothered by this?
>
> ㄴ Personally, I really don't like him. Killing Won Myunghoon on his own authority was excessive force, if you look at it one way. But the prosecutors' office only questioned him as a witness and then quietly let the matter fade away. It feels like they're giving him special treatment because he's famous.
>
> ㄴ Same. Upvoted.

There was a saying that when your cousin bought land, your stomach hurt.

If even the success of friends and relatives could make someone jealous, then a celebrity they knew only through the media stood no chance.

Not long after the article went up, a bloody battle broke out among the netizens.

[1226] 500 billion won is about $360 million or €320 million.

[1227] 500 billion won is about $360 million or €320 million.

[1228] 500 billion won is about $360 million or €320 million.

> ㄴ Top Comment: Are the bastards commenting above the Three Stooges?
>
> ㄴ I'm more shocked that garbage has over a thousand upvotes lol. Why are there so many bastards who can't stand seeing someone else succeed?
>
> ㄴ Exactly. What trouble did he supposedly cause? Did the Dodong Sect[1229] punch a hole through their brains? How many people are alive thanks to Lord Fuck by now?
>
> ㄴ Jin Taekyung… Well, look at this rotten son of a—… As a public figure… what a wicked man, filling only his own pockets… Never forget that the entire nation is watching @~!
>
> ㄴ "Self-interest," lol. The only interest here is the deposits building up in your parents' bodies; what's coming out of my mouth is pure profanity.
>
> ㄴ What are you talking about, public figure? He was a hyung[1230] who was wearing sweatpants and boiling ramen in the corner of his room until a month ago. And that way of talking is disgusting.
>
> ㄴ You young whippersnappers… Such sharp tongues you have~!!!
>
> ㄴ Dentures confiscated for one month.
>
> ㄴ Hearing aid confiscated for two months.
>
> ㄴ Banned from the senior center for three months.

Even as people everywhere had their dentures and hearing aids confiscated and were banned from the senior center, the fighting didn't stop.

Despite the fierce backlash, Jin Taekyung's critics stubbornly continued making their case.

> ㄴ You little brats… hehe. You've put knives on your fingertips… You ignorant, rotten bastards~~!! Ignoring you… is the answer! @!~~
>
> ㄴ Cane confiscated.
>
> ㄴ I don't use a cane… you bastard
>
> ㄴ Wheelchair confiscated.
>
> ㄴ You nameless lowlifes… How dare you come here spouting that commie nonsense…!!!!!
>
> ㄴ Park Hyeongseok. I gave you my name. Happy now?
>
> ㄴ Young Hyeongseok, go back to your mommy, drink some more milk, and study harder`!!
>
> ㄴ You go drink some more.
>
> ㄴ You goddamn lowborn son of a bitch.

[1229] The Dodong Sect is a fabricated martial arts sect Taekyung claimed to belong to.

[1230] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man he is close to.

It was a bloodbath.

In a single day, the article reached one million views and racked up tens of thousands of comments.

As the two sides traded barbed comments and snarled at each other, another article went up.

[HunterTV Exclusive] Jin Taekyung Donates Hundreds of Billions[1231] to Gate Victims and Establishes Support Foundation

Hunter Jin Taekyung has drawn attention by donating hundreds of billions of won[1232] and establishing a support foundation for Gate victims under the name of the Peace Guild.

The necessary procedures had been set in motion even before the Christie's auction began…

> ㄴ Top Comment: Everyone who called him a public figure and accused him of lining his own pockets, assemble. Heads to the floor.
>
> ㄴ Tsk, tsk… Nothing has even been properly revealed yet, and you're already running your filthy mouths… Open your eyes to the truth…!
>
> ㄴ LOL. Hey, are you crying?
>
> ㄴ LMAOOOOOO
>
> ㄴ But seriously;;; What the hell is with him giving away hundreds of billions[1233]? Honestly, that's even more amazing than the satisfaction of seeing all those bastards who were maliciously stirring things up get shut down.
>
> ㄴ Agreed. What the hell is Lord Fuck? Is it just easy for someone at his level to make money, so he decided to go big?
>
> ㄴ I don't think that's it. He just doesn't seem greedy for money. Either way, I'm genuinely impressed.
>
> ㄴ Height, looks, character, money. He has everything. Isn't that cheating?
>
> ㄴ P3C, P3C…
>
> ㄴ What does P3C mean?
>
> ㄴ Please have a three-centimeter[1234] dick.
>
> ㄴ Oh.

[1231] "Hundreds of billions" refers to won. Roughly 100–900 billion won is about $71 million–$640 million or €65 million–€580 million.

[1232] "Hundreds of billions" refers to won. Roughly 100–900 billion won is about $71 million–$640 million or €65 million–€580 million.

[1233] "Hundreds of billions" refers to won. Roughly 100–900 billion won is about $71 million–$640 million or €65 million–€580 million.

[1234] Three centimeters is about 1.2 in.

The battle ended in defeat for the trolls, and public opinion once again filled with admiration for Jin Taekyung.

He had already prevented two major catastrophes and possessed the strength to defeat a Named Monster single-handedly. Now he had shown the generosity to donate hundreds of billions of won[1235] as well.

His image as an unassuming hero and a truly big-hearted man was now firmly cemented.

—Let me update you on the progress of the foundation…

“Team Leader Choi.”

I cut off Team Leader Choi’s voice over the phone in a trembling voice.

“That’s enough. Please don’t say any more.”

—…If it pains you that much to part with the money, should I cancel the foundation?

“No. Absolutely not!”

—Then why are you acting like this?

“It still hurts.”

—Pardon?

“It hurts to give it up, but it needs to be done. Please keep going.”

—Is it like looking at a rice cake in a painting?

“No, it’s a rice cake in my hand. I’m starving to death and barely stopping myself from eating it.”

The secret Christie’s auction attended by wealthy people from around the world had ended not long ago.

Exactly twenty-four hours later, an endless string of zeros appeared in my bank account.

Five hundred billion.[1236]

To be exact, after every fee had been deducted, it came to roughly 530 billion won.[1237]

The unit wasn’t hundreds or thousands. It was eok—hundreds of millions.[1238]

It was literally an eok-inducing sum, and I nearly cried out myself.

How much money was this, exactly?

[1235] “Hundreds of billions” refers to won. Roughly 100–900 billion won is about $71 million–$640 million or €65 million–€580 million.

[1236] 500 billion won is about $360 million or €320 million.

[1237] 530 billion won is about $380 million or €340 million.

[1238] Eok is a Korean number unit meaning one hundred million. In the following sentence, it also evokes a gasp of shock.

It was an astronomical amount—enough to change my life, no, enough to let me and my descendants live in luxury for generations.

But I had already decided where the money should go and how it could be used in the most proper and worthwhile way.

“So please keep going. I’m leaving it all in your hands, Team Leader Choi.”

—Understood. We’ll begin with the people on the list you gave us last time.

“Please take good care of them.”

The families of the teammates whose lives had stopped on that day three years ago would be the foundation’s first recipients.

The money couldn’t fill the empty spaces left by their lost family members, but it could help them pursue their dreams without having to worry about anything.

—Next are the veterans of the Great Cataclysm and single-parent families. Is that correct?

“Yes. Please proceed that way.”

After exchanging a few more words, I ended the call.

When I left the room, I found Mom and Hayeon sitting at the kitchen table eating fruit.

The moment I approached, a fork with a piece of apple speared on it suddenly appeared in front of me.

“Son, have some apple. It’s sweet.”

“Uh, okay.”

Crunch.

The sweet flesh broke apart in my mouth. I quietly ate the fruit while listening to the two of them talk.

Friends, studying, someone who lived nearby, dramas…

Sometimes I laughed quietly. Other times I nodded along.

Then, without warning, I spoke.

“Everyone’s okay, right?”

“Hm? What do you mean, son?”

“What?”

“I mean… with everything that happened. Anything at all.”

Hayeon cocked her head.

“Are you trying to talk about the money?”

“…”

“I knew it. Mom, didn’t I tell you yesterday? I said this guy would definitely be like this.”

Mom smacked Hayeon’s twig-thin forearm.

“You! How can you call your brother, who’s eight years older than you, ‘this guy’?”

"Ow! That hurts. Stop hitting me."

Hayeon grumbled, folded her arms, and leaned back in her chair.

"Excuse me."

"…Excuse me?"

"What would you rather I call you? My family-register roommate?"

She was my one and only little sister, eight years younger than me. Normally, I would have flicked her forehead for the fun of it, but somehow, today wasn't the time.

Hayeon looked at me and let out a deep sigh.

"Oppa."[1239]

"Hm?"

"What does Mom say more than anything else?"

I wondered. What was it?

I didn't have to think long. I heard it whenever I came home—or at least once every few days over the phone.

"Be careful?"

"Right. You know it well."

She poked the apple and held the fork out to me.

"Eat. Eat, and be careful."

"…"

"What good would hundreds of billions[1240] do us? Forget not being able to spend it all. We obviously wouldn't even know how to spend it properly."

I mechanically chewed the apple in my mouth. It was sweet, and it stung like fire—enough to make the tip of my nose tingle.

When did she grow up so much?

This had been a difficult choice for me.

The truth was, I wasn't particularly good or righteous.

I was just an ordinary older brother who wanted to give his only sister everything she asked for, and an ordinary son who wanted his mother, after all the years she had struggled alone, to finally live in comfort.

And hundreds of billions of won[1241] was more than enough to make every fantasy I had ever imagined a reality.

With this much money…

I had agonized over it. Even after making my decision, I kept agonizing.

[1239] Oppa is a Korean term a woman uses for her older brother or an older man she is close to.

[1240] "Hundreds of billions" refers to won. Roughly 100–900 billion won is about $71 million–$640 million or €65 million–€580 million.

[1241] "Hundreds of billions" refers to won. Roughly 100–900 billion won is about $71 million–$640 million or €65 million–€580 million.

But all of it had been pointless.

People praised me as both a hero and a big-hearted man, but they were wrong.

My sister, eight years younger than me, had a far bigger heart than I did.

She had inherited all of Mom's best qualities. Even her eyes curved into the same crescents when she smiled.

"Son, as I always say…"

"No parent in the world could spend money their child earned by shedding blood. Yes, I know."

"Good. You know it well."

"But you'll have to start spending some now. I plan to earn a lot more."

"Then buy me a massage chair."

"A massage chair?"

"Yeah. I wondered what I'd want first if my son became successful and offered me a present, but that was the only thing I could think of."

I laughed along with Mom.

My heart felt lighter, as though I had finally set down a heavy burden I had carried for a long time.

"Then let's go look at one together tomorrow. We can look at furniture while we're at it."

"Furniture?"

"Come to think of it, the furniture in our house is pretty old, too. Mom, when someone offers you something like this, you're supposed to accept it."

I wondered what expression she would make when she learned that the furniture was for the house we would soon be moving into.

Even more so when she discovered it was the place where the three of us had lived back when we were a family of four.

I'd love to go there right now, but…

I wanted to save that pleasure for tomorrow—or rather, for what came next.

Realizing the time had finally come, I rose from my seat.

"Where are you going?"

"Son, there's still plenty of fruit left."

I smiled broadly at the two disappointed faces and answered,

"It's okay. I think I'll take a nap."

This time, I was going to sleep for a very long time.

Whoooosh.

The winter wind blew, the season already drawing to an end. Darkness had long since swallowed the world outside, while the brightly lit pavilion glowed against the night.

The old man watching the wavering flames suddenly spoke.

“Who’s there?”

A clear voice answered moments later.

“It’s me.”

“…Is that you?”

At first, he hadn’t been able to tell.

In the span of only one or two shichen,[1242] the young man’s footsteps had grown as light as his voice.

Has he gained some kind of insight?

Before, the old man had been able to sense his presence from fifty paces away. This time, he hadn’t noticed him until he came within thirty.

He wasn’t sure whether to call that impressive or bizarre.

Though a smile tugged at the corner of his mouth, his voice was gruff.

“Did I not tell you to come at daybreak?”

“I couldn’t wait. I already know my answer, so why waste time?”

“Tsk, tsk. What kind of martial artist has so little patience?”

“You said it yourself, Old Master. Sleep is a luxury for a martial artist. Spend that time training instead. Am I wrong?”

“Hah! You little rascal.”

He was right. That was how a martial artist should behave—and how a Disciple should treat his master’s words as golden law.

The old man couldn’t hold back any longer and let out a hearty laugh. When he waved his gaunt hand, a gentle blast of heat swept through the pavilion and flung open the door.

Jin Taekyung stood outside, wearing an easy, open smile.

“Old Master. Please teach me martial arts.”

Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King, smiled with delight.

“All right. I’ll teach you everything I know.”

[1242] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Chapter 229

"…You're leaving? For an entire year?"

"Yes."

"So you finally decided?"

When I nodded, an indescribably complicated look crossed Jin Wikyung's face. Joy, disappointment, pride…

After a long silence, he bowed deeply to Jeok Cheongang.

"Please take good care of our youngest—no, of Taekyung, Great Hero Jeok."

"I heard you, so get up. He may be lacking, as you said, but this old man will guide him properly. Stop worrying. Ahem!"

"…"

When did he say that? He asked you to take good care of me. I don't remember him saying I was lacking.

But there was no reasoning with Jeok Cheongang.

He composed his twitching lips and spoke again.

"Daylight has broken, so I intend to leave at once."

"What? You mean today?"

"Obviously. Once a man makes up his mind, he must act without hesitation."

Jin Wikyung's expression grew even gloomier. He looked back and forth between Jeok Cheongang and me, his face clouded over, then let out a deep sigh.

"Understood. I'll have your travel bags packed immediately."

"What do we need travel bags for? This is training, not a tour of the martial world."

"Where are you headed?"

"Anhui. It won't take long on foot."

A sudden sense of foreboding made me ask, "How far is it?"

Jin Wikyung answered, "At least a month."

"What?"

"And that's on horseback."

Has this old man gone senile?

Jeok Cheongang saw my expression and barked, "That's only for those slowpokes! At this old man's pace, it won't even take a month and a half!"

"…"

No, damn it. By that logic, a jet would be even faster. So why are we walking?

I quickly grabbed Jin Wikyung's hand.

"Pack my bags nice and full, please."

"You little—!"

"Otherwise, I'm not going."

"What did you say?"

"I'm from a rich family. I have no intention of wandering around begging for food. Since we're going anyway, we might as well travel in comfort."

Why go out of my way to suffer when I had money? If I could travel comfortably, that was all that mattered.

I had already left behind a soft bed and logged in. I didn't want to take things that far.

And besides…

"There are places I need to stop by before we leave."

"Gnnngh."

As Jeok Cheongang groaned, Jin Wikyung added, "I also have something important to discuss with you."

"With me?"

"Yes. It won't take long."

"If you intend to waste my time with some trivial matter, forget it."

Jin Wikyung firmly shook his head.

"It's important enough that you need to know, Great Hero Jeok."

What could it be?

Even I hadn't seen him look this serious in a long time.

Jeok Cheongang studied Jin Wikyung in silence, then clicked his tongue.

"Half a shichen.[1243] No longer."

"That will be enough."

This time, he turned to me.

"The same goes for you."

"Yes, sir."

That was more than enough time for me as well.

Afraid he might change his mind, I answered at once and left the study so the two of them could speak in private.

Clear sunlight and a pleasant breeze greeted me outside. It was hard to call this winter weather anymore.

"Ah, what a beautiful day."

Finding my next destination was easy.

I looked up at the blue sky, then set off toward the distant cliff.

Whoooosh.

[1243] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

An iron sword cleaved through the air with a heavy rush.

Once, then again, every motion flawless down to the last inch.

How long had it been since he had begun each day with ten thousand strikes?

The young man gripping the sword's hilt did not know.

He was inside a cave where no light could enter, and he had long since lost all sense of time.

Swish!

The tip of his sword wavered.

The deviation was minute, but to the young man, it was an unforgivable mistake.

By the rule he had set for himself, every mistake meant another hundred strikes.

Again.

The young man silently swung his sword.

It was a brutal physical regimen that had to be completed with raw strength and stamina alone, without using any internal energy.

An ordinary martial artist would have collapsed from exhaustion long ago.

But this young man, Jin Mukyung, was different.

I'll do it perfectly. No matter how many attempts it takes. No matter how many years.

He had first picked up a sword at the age of five. He loved the whisper of wind against his ears whenever he swung it and the feeling of being drenched in sweat.

More than twenty years passed that way.

At some point, people began calling him by another name.

"Peak at twenty? If that isn't genius, what is?"

"Are you the Heaven Shaking Sword?"

He had trained simply because he loved martial arts and enjoyed becoming stronger. Yet people called him the pride of his family and a martial arts genius.

There had been times when he took pride in the martial name he had earned.

But then he realized it was all hollow fame—an empty name with nothing behind it.

Cheongpung.

Swish!

The instant the name entered his mind, his sword tip twitched.

Another hundred strikes.

He closed his eyes and forced his breathing under control, but his disturbed heart refused to settle.

Before he knew it, Jin Mukyung was remembering the day he had first met Cheongpung.

He's strong.

That was his first thought upon seeing the boy.

Cheongpung had a clear, boyish face and an unremarkable build, with a single iron sword hanging carelessly from his waist. His demeanor and posture could not have looked more careless, yet Mukyung had known at once.

And his intuition had soon proved correct.

It had been the most crushing defeat of his life.

The memory of dropping to his knees after some three hundred exchanges made his teeth clench and his grip tighten around the hilt.

Swish! Swish-swish!

Every ripple in his heart revealed itself through his sword.

His stable stance collapsed, and his movements—once as precise as if measured with a ruler—became disordered.

One hundred extra strikes. Two hundred. Three hundred…

Just as his mistakes began to snowball, a familiar voice came from beyond the iron door sealing the training hall.

“Why does it sound so murderous in there?”

“…!”

Jin Mukyung, who had been swinging his sword as though possessed, froze in place.

“Is that you?”

“Why ask when you already know? You’ll hurt my feelings.”

There was no mistaking him.

Only one person in the Taiyuan Jin Family could speak to Jin Mukyung with such insolence.

Thinking of his younger brother beyond the iron door, Mukyung asked, “How long have you been there?”

“About fifteen minutes?”

“…I see.”

Despite the casual answer, Mukyung’s face darkened.

He had allowed himself to be swept up in his emotions and failed to notice Taekyung’s presence.

“Go away. I’m training.”

“Training, my ass. More like taking out your anger.”

“What?”

“I can hear how furious you are. Whatever you do in that state, it won’t be training.”

Jin Mukyung’s eyes trembled faintly.

He was astonished that Taekyung had seen straight through his condition despite the iron door between them and the distance of more than ten jang.[1244]

This guy… Has he improved again already?

His rate of growth was truly terrifying.

Before Mukyung's surprise could fade, Jin Taekyung continued.

"I'm leaving."

"You're leaving?"

"Yeah. I decided to learn martial arts from the Fire King—or rather, the Old Master."

"…!"

Mukyung had heard that the Fire King had come to visit the family.

In the past, he would have rushed out of the training hall at once, bowed until his forehead struck the ground, and begged the Fire King to teach him even a single move.

But he had restrained himself.

More than anyone, he knew that this was a process he had to understand for himself.

But why would he teach that boy…? No. There are more than enough reasons.

The man beyond that iron door was the true monster, the one who deserved to be called a genius. The Fire King could hardly have failed to recognize his worth.

Once Mukyung had accepted that, he asked, "Have you become his Disciple?"

"Not exactly. I'm sort of a Disciple, but not a Disciple, while also being kind of a Disciple. Something like that."

"…What the fuck are you talking about?"

"Don't bother trying to understand. Is this the first time something like this has happened?"

"That's true."

"Yeah. Just let it go."

A brief silence followed.

Then, as if by agreement, they both chuckled.

Even they had to admit the conversation had taken an absurd turn.

"Did you come here just to tell me that? Were you hoping for a send-off?"

"A send-off? I know better than to expect one."

"Then what?"

"One year left."

Taekyung's calm voice continued.

The Star-Array Grand Banquet.

[1244] A jang is a traditional Korean length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten jang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

The Star-Array Grand Banquet.

Jin Mukyung repeated the words like a groan.

A banquet hall for the countless stars adorning the Nine Provinces and Eight Wastes,[1245] the Four Seas and Five Lakes.[1246]

That was the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

“Why are you telling me?”

“I’m going to attend. Cheongpung and I both are.”

“…What are you trying to say?”

“That’s for you to think about on your own. Oof.”

There came the sound of Taekyung rising, followed by his final words.

“I’m off. See you later.”

Step. Step.

His footsteps gradually receded, then vanished altogether.

Silence settled over the training hall.

Jin Mukyung stared blankly at the iron door beyond which the other’s presence had vanished.

The Star-Array Grand Banquet.

He was no fool.

He knew exactly why Jin Taekyung had come to the training hall and why he had brought up the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

“One year…”

Jin Mukyung murmured under his breath and tightened his grip on the sword.

Before he knew it, his turbulent heart had calmed, and the wavering tip of his sword had stilled.

“Safe travels. I’ll see you then.”

Murmuring the farewell he had failed to give his younger brother before his long journey, Jin Mukyung swung his sword like lightning.

Whoooosh.

A perfect strike, without the slightest deviation.

After leaving the training hall, I headed straight for the study.

What awaited me there was an empty chair and a message from one of the guards.

“He told me to wait at the main gate?”

“Yes. Those were his exact words.”

[1245] The Nine Provinces and Eight Wastes is a literary expression for the whole world, from its inhabited regions to its distant reaches.

[1246] The Four Seas and Five Lakes is a traditional expression for the lands and waterways of the world.

Did something happen?

Setting the question aside, I made my way to the main gate. Before long, I found several familiar faces waiting for me.

“Captain!”

“Benefactor!”

“You’re finally here, Young Master Jin?”

Hyuk Mujin, Cheongpung, and Wolhwa.

And they weren’t alone.

Over the shoulders of the three who had approached me first, I could see the others as well.

Lee Seowol, awkwardly waving one hand, and the Three Plum Blossom Elites, standing there with expressions that seemed to say they had no idea where they were or who they were.

“How did you all know to come?”

Wolhwa smiled sweetly.

“Because we’re the Lower District Sect.”

“…Did you plant a spy?”

“Oh my, a spy? Why would we need one when we have such an excellent informant right there?”

I followed her pointing finger and found Hyuk Mujin proudly holding out a heavy travel bag.

“The Lesser Family Head ordered me to pack your luggage, Captain!”

“…Oh. So you’re the culprit.”

“Pardon?”

“Nothing. Good job.”

I had hoped to leave as quietly as possible, but nothing ever went according to plan.

The moment I accepted the travel bag with a sigh, Cheongpung grabbed me by the collar and clung to me.

“Benefactor! I want to go with you! I want to become Grandpa Jeok’s Disciple!”

“Then go get permission.”

“From whom?”

“Who do you think? Great Hero Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint.”

“I already did! He said I could go!”

Baek Museong muttered with the face of a man who had grown weary of life.

“He’s been missing for over a month. How in the world did you get his permission…?”

That man really is living life on the hardest difficulty.

After finally prying Cheongpung off me, I asked Baek Museong, “What are you planning to do now?”

“Either escort Martial Uncle Cheongpung back to the main sect or search the entire Central Plains for Grandmaster’s trail. I suppose it will be one or the other.”

“Yikes.”

Baek Museong burst into hearty laughter at my reaction.

“Haha! What in life is ever easy? I intend to leave as soon as a message arrives from the main sect.”

Now that’s mental fortitude.

I even felt a little respect for him.

After finishing my conversation with Baek Museong, I turned my head.

Beside the petite Eunhyang, a giant nearly two meters[1247] tall flinched.

“Hey.”

“…Wh-what?”

“I’m just saying we should forget what happened and try to get along.”

I smiled brightly and held out my hand.

The giant—Chulwoo of the Defeated Flower Fist—hesitated before taking it.

“Th-then this means we’ve made up…”

Crack.

“Gah!”

“What a baby. Don’t let it show. Smile.”

With the sound of bones shifting out of place, Chulwoo’s hand—despite the man being twice my size—crumpled as if caught in a hydraulic press.

I tightened my grip and whispered in his ear.

“Don’t hit on her. You know what I mean, right?”

“I-I understand!”

“Good. Keep it that way for the rest of your life.”

When I released his hand, Chulwoo sucked in a breath and hurriedly backed away.

Watching him, Eunhyang, the youngest of the Three Plum Blossom Elites, could only marvel.

“…I never knew there was someone stronger than Senior Brother Chul. The world truly is vast.”

Then again, it could be small, too.

No matter how enormous this continent was, the people destined to meet would find each other eventually.

I would probably see them again someday.

“If fate brings us together again, I’ll see you then.”

[1247] Two meters is about 6 ft 7 in.

"It was nice meeting you, too."

I gave Eunhyang a slight nod and turned away.

One person remained.

"…"

"…"

An awkward silence hung between Lee Seowol and me.

I didn't think things had been this awkward at first. I had no idea why Lee Seowol seemed harder to face every time I saw her.

Is it because of the proposal?

Even if it was for a political marriage, a proposal was still a proposal.

After squirming in discomfort, I finally managed to speak.

"Um, Sect Leader Lee."

"Please call me Young Lady."

"Ah, yes. Then, Young Lady Lee."

"Yes. Go ahead."

I looked at Lee Seowol's slightly lowered eyelids and brought out the words I had prepared.

"May peace prevail throughout your household."

"…"

"May your business prosper, too, and, well… Anyway, I hope everything you do goes well."

Great. Nailed it. What better blessing could there be for the leader of an entire sect?

I smiled in satisfaction and was about to study Lee Seowol's reaction when a sharp voice rang out from the distance.

"What are you grinning like a fool for?"

A short old man appeared in the distance.

With Jin Wikyung and Wipeng flanking him, he seized me by the nape before I had a chance to say anything.

"We have a long road ahead. Hurry up and follow me."

"W-wait a second."

Whoooosh!

But it was already too late.

Everyone's faces rapidly receded into the distance.

Jin Wikyung waved a handkerchief, his eyes red, and shouted, "My youngest! Come back safe and sound!"

…That only makes me more nervous!

Chapter 230

Luoyang, the thousand-year-old capital.

This historic city, whose legacy stretched back thousands of years, was one of the foremost centers of commerce, literature, and art under heaven.

Even in vast Henan Province, Luoyang was unrivaled in size. Wherever one went in the city, crowds filled the streets.

The same was true of a small inn on Luoyang's outskirts.

"Two bowls of huimian noodles![1248]"

"Yes, yes! Coming right up!"

"Three more bottles of baijiu![1249]"

"Right away!"

Merchants who had just completed a long journey clinked cups in broad daylight. A group of scholars held a heated debate nearby, alongside shabby singers who looked down on their luck.

And of course, there was one group found wherever people gathered.

Martial artists.

Crash!

The inn's door exploded into splinters, and five or six swordsmen poured inside.

The one-eyed man leading them shouted without hesitation.

"Get them!"

His shout was directed toward a secluded corner of the inn.

A group of fierce-looking men had been guzzling strong liquor straight from a large jar. They overturned their table and leaped to their feet.

"Damn it, the Dongcheon Sect?"

"Kill them!"

Clang! Clang-clang!

With a deafening cacophony, more than a dozen martial artists drew their weapons and clashed.

Blades tangled and sprang apart, throwing sparks into the air. Tables split, and everything on them went flying in all directions.

"R-run!"

"It's the Dongcheon Sect! The dark-path men are fighting!"

The Murim was not made up solely of righteous heroes.

[1248] Huimian is a Henan noodle dish made with broad, hand-pulled noodles served in broth.

[1249] Baijiu is a strong Chinese distilled liquor.

The orthodox faction, the unorthodox faction, and dark-path figures coexisted, while thousands of li away[1250] stood the Demonic Cult, said to be filled with fiends and monsters.

Among them, the Dongcheon Sect was a dark-path faction that ruled Luoyang's nights.

"…I'm ruined!"

The innkeeper, who had been cheerfully taking orders moments ago, collapsed onto the floor.

The Dongcheon Sect was no common gang of ruffians. Despite being a dark-path faction, it had more than fifty years of deeply rooted history and strong connections within the government.

If he dared report this incident, they would beat him to a pulp.

Please, just don't let anyone die.

The innkeeper's desperate wish crumbled the very next moment.

Slash!

"Grrrk."

With a chilling sound, one of the men clutched his throat and fell.

He was one of the dark-path swordsmen who had recently gotten into a minor dispute with the Dongcheon Sect.

"Gungsu!"

"You goddamn bastards!"

Driven mad by their comrade's death, the swordsmen charged at the enemy, swinging their weapons.

But in a fight between evenly matched dark-path swordsmen, nothing mattered more than numbers.

"One of them's down!"

"Finish off the rest!"

The Dongcheon Sect's swordsmen were experienced and ruthless. They exploited every opening, stabbing and slashing without mercy. Blood sprayed each time their blades flashed.

Swish-swish-swish! Thud!

"Gaaaaah!"

"Guh!"

"P-please, spare me!"

The one-eyed man burst into laughter at the last survivor's plea. He was a lower-ranking officer of the Dongcheon Sect.

"What? Spare you?"

[1250] This uses the Chinese li, a unit of distance equal to about 500 m (0.311 mi).

“Please, just this once. If you let me go, I’ll never—”

“You should’ve known who you were dealing with.”

Thunk!

A dagger shot from his sleeve and buried itself in the last swordsman’s forehead.

“Gueugh.”

Thump!

With a grotesque groan, the corpse toppled backward like a rotten old tree.

“You’ve got no pride at all. And you call yourself a dark-path man.”

The one-eyed man retrieved the dagger from the corpse’s forehead and crooked a finger at his underlings.

“Clean this up.”

“Yes, sir!”

With a vigorous reply, the swordsmen gathered the bodies and piled them together. The once-peaceful inn had long since become a sea of blood.

Step. Step. Tap.

The one-eyed man blocked the wrecked entrance and swept his gaze over the terrified innkeeper and guests.

“Some of you know who I am, and some of you don’t. So I’ll trouble myself to tell you again.”

In the suffocating silence, everyone froze beneath the cold, murderous gleam in his eyes.

His harsh voice sounded as though he had swallowed iron filings.

“I am Heukgeol, the lone beast of the mighty Dongcheon Gang—”

Smack! Boom!

Everyone inside the inn blinked, stunned by what had happened so suddenly.

Heukgeol, the lone beast of the Dongcheon Gang who had been blocking the entrance like Mount Tai,[1251] was nowhere to be seen. In his place stood a short old man.

“You son of a bitch. Why are you blocking the entrance?”

“…”

An unseen tremor swept through the inn.

Only then did the guests notice Heukgeol embedded in one of the walls. Their eyes widened.

Gasp!

A martial artist!

He’s a master. An incredibly powerful one!

[1251] Mount Tai is a mountain in China traditionally associated with great size and weight.

While everyone was still reeling in shock, a young man who had entered behind the old man spoke with an incredulous expression.

“Still, was it really necessary to beat him like that? What if he dies?”

“Who cares whether some dark-path piece of garbage lives or dies?”

The old man answered gruffly and jerked his chin toward the inn, which had become a sea of blood.

More precisely, he pointed at the Dongcheon Sect’s swordsmen, who were gathering the corpses and severed limbs.

They stared at the old man with vacant expressions.

“Look. Can’t you see? That’s the kind of people they are. There’s nothing in their heads, so whenever they meet, all they can do is swing swords at each other.”

“Wow. They really deserve to die.”

“Right?”

“Yes. Shall we eat now?”

“Order the drinks first. I’ve inhaled so much dust that my throat’s scratchy.”

“Got it.”

The young man answered brightly and hurried over to the innkeeper.

“You have rooms, right?”

“Y-yes?”

The innkeeper, only half-conscious, answered automatically.

“Of course, sir.”

“Then give us the best room you have, and three bottles of baijiu.[1252] As for the food…”

The old man, who had already claimed a table, shouted from behind the young man.

“Crisp-roasted duck and huimian![1253] You have to eat huimian[1254] when you come to Luoyang.”

“Sir, you heard him, right?”

“Yes, sir.”

“How much will that be altogether?”

Such was the power of habit.

The innkeeper instinctively calculated the entire bill and was just about to name the price when—

“You crazy bastard!”

“Fuck! Get him!”

They were not called dark-path figures for nothing.

[1252] Baijiu is a strong Chinese distilled liquor.

[1253] Huimian is a Henan noodle dish made with broad, hand-pulled noodles served in broth.

[1254] Huimian is a Henan noodle dish made with broad, hand-pulled noodles served in broth.

They lived mayfly lives, born in the back alleys and destined to die in them.

Armed with their innate simplicity and ferocity, the Dongcheon Sect's low-ranking swordsmen rolled their eyes back and charged at the young man.

"Die!"

The bald man at the front let out a thunderous shout and swung a crude, broad-bladed saber.

The blade, red with rust, came down toward the crown of the young man's head.

Or rather, it was about to.

Whoosh! Crunch!

With a chilling sound, the bald man crumpled. His jaw had been shattered, and he was already unconscious.

The saber slipped from his limp hand.

Clunk. Clatter.

"I thought hair was the only thing you were missing. Turns out you've got no skill either."

The young man muttered without much interest and turned back to the innkeeper.

"So, how much was it?"

"…"

"…"

The atmosphere inside the inn, already frozen solid, somehow froze even harder.

As countless people watched with bulging eyes, the young man paid the bill and even collected his change.

He was walking toward the old man's table when he suddenly stopped.

"Hey."

The Dongcheon Sect's swordsmen, frozen like statues beneath his gaze, flinched.

"Yes, sir?"

"Were you talking to us?"

The young man nodded.

"Yeah. What are you going to do?"

"W-what do you mean?"

"That thing in your hand. If you're going to swing it, hurry up and swing. Otherwise, put it away. It's ugly."

Shk-shk-shk!

The swordsmen sheathed their weapons with lightning speed.

"Now collect the bodies and your friends. Move."

"Yes, sir! Moving!"

"Clean up the mess you made while you're at it."

Repeating the order like men desperate to stay alive, the swordsmen moved in perfect unison.

They gathered up the corpses and the bald man, then pulled the one-eyed man out of the wall. Afterward, they swallowed nervously and waited for their next order.

“Why are you standing there gawking? Get the hell out.”

“Th-thank you!”

That was precisely what they had been praying to hear.

Afraid they might be stopped, they hurried out of the inn. The young man’s next words shot after them like an arrow.

“If I see your faces one more time, you’re dead. Remember that.”

“Yes, sir!”

“Yeah, take care.”

A suffocating silence filled the inn.

As the young man walked toward the old man’s table beneath everyone’s horrified gazes, he suddenly drew a sharp breath.

Gasp!

Had the Dongcheon Sect attacked again?

The people who had been watching his every move jumped and looked around.

But the young man’s gaze was fixed on only one thing: the roast duck that had appeared on the table.

“H-how could you?”

His eyes bulged, his pupils trembling as though an earthquake had struck.

After a brief silence, the young man shouted,

“How could you eat both legs by yourself?!”

“…”

Seven days and nights.

That was how long it had taken us to get from Taiyuan to Luoyang.

Even riding at full speed, the journey would normally have taken ten days. There was no point explaining what it had been like to cover that distance in only seven.

The important thing was that I hadn’t complained even once.

But still…

“This isn’t right!”

I was genuinely furious.

He had eaten both legs! And this was my first proper meal in an entire week!

He had even left me with only one wing.

“Even dark-path bastards don’t do this!”

I kept shoving whatever food I could grab into my mouth as I vented my outrage. Across from me, Jeok Cheongang looked utterly dumbfounded.

"Look at this ill-mannered brat. You dare shout at this old man over something so trivial? What was that? Dark-path bastards?"

"Am I wrong? Even the Demonic Cult Leader would eat only one duck leg."

"You little—"

Whoosh!

A gentle heat began to rise from Jeok Cheongang's palm when a gruff voice suddenly cut in.

"Hey, let me ask you something."

A hulking man entered the inn with heavy footsteps. His face was covered in scars.

Behind him came dozens of dark-path swordsmen with equally menacing faces.

His face alone is rated 18+.

The one-eyed man Jeok Cheongang had dealt with earlier had looked vicious enough, but compared to this giant, he could have passed for a model prisoner.

Is looking the part half the job around here?

Well, at least it made them easy to identify.

Jeok Cheongang didn't even bother looking at them, so I answered in his place.

"Yeah, that's us."

"I heard some very interesting news, but…"

Confusion flickered across the giant's face.

"What?"

"I haven't even asked yet."

"It's obvious. The interesting news you heard was that some old man and a fresh-faced young guy showed up and beat a bunch of your lackeys half to death. Something like that, right?"

"…"

"Yeah, I know. Come on in. And bring all the friends you brought along just in case. You can attack together."

This outcome had been entirely predictable.

Maybe the men I'd let go had called them, or maybe someone among the onlookers had informed their gang. It didn't really matter.

I can just beat them down as they come.

The difference in strength was overwhelming.

Against men at this level, the result would be the same whether ten or a hundred of them came rushing in. There was no need to kill them. I could brush them aside like flies.

"Not coming? Then I'll come to you."

“You little bastard!”

Still, the man who had come this time had some instincts.

Perhaps sensing something ominous, the giant edged backward and waved his hand.

“Get him!”

Schliing.

Dozens of weapons had just begun to emerge from their sheaths when—

“Amitabha.[1255] C-could we pass through for a moment?”

[1255] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, spoken here as a Buddhist invocation.

Chapter 231

"Amitabha.[1256] E-excuse me, but may I pass through for a moment?"

The timid voice belonged to a young monk in shabby robes.

Clutching a large strand of prayer beads in one hand, he bowed repeatedly as he squeezed between the dark-path swordsmen.

"Pardon me, then. Amitabha, Amitabha…"

"Hey. Look at this guy."

"Huh?"

The swordsmen stared in bewilderment at the monk who had appeared out of nowhere and begun fearlessly pushing through their ranks.

Several of them quickly came to their senses and tried to block him, only to be shoved helplessly aside.

"W-what the hell?"

"Damn. How is he so strong…?"

Skrrt! Thump!

No matter who challenged him, the result was the same. No one could stop him.

That was when I realized just how much muscle was hidden beneath the monk's old, baggy robes.

Thick forearms. Bulging veins. At first glance, he seemed to have an average build, but underneath those robes, he was packed with dense, combat-ready muscle.

Damn, look at those muscles. That's insane.

At that point, he looked like he should be wearing Under Armour instead of a monk's robe.

While I marveled in silence, the monk finally made it through the dozens of dark-path swordsmen and wiped the sweat from his brow.

His face was taut with nerves.

"Phew…"

The hulking man wasn't about to let that pass. His face had turned bright red, and his eyebrows kept twitching.

As he looked back and forth between the monk and me, apparently unsure which one of us to deal with first, I waved at him.

"Hey, take your time. I'll wait."

"…How considerate of you."

Grind.

Gritting his teeth at me, the hulking man stepped in front of the monk.

"Who are you supposed to be?"

[1256] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, spoken here as a Buddhist invocation.

“This poor monk is…”

“Never mind.”

His sharp gaze swept over the monk from head to toe.

“You’re a monk?”

“Of course.”

“You don’t even have a precept seal on your forehead.”

A drop of sweat ran down the monk’s brow.

“My training has not yet progressed far enough for me to receive them.”

“Training, huh? What’s your Dharma name?”

“I have yet to receive one of those as well.”

“So you’re a monk with neither precept seals nor a Dharma name…”

The hulking man muttered under his breath, then let out a short laugh and turned to his subordinates.

“Just going by the packaging, he looks exactly like one of us. Don’t you think?”

“Yes, sir!”

“He looks like he’d be good at the job. We should take him in as our youngest.”

“Right?”

The hulking man roared with laughter, then abruptly went stone-faced and glared at the monk.

“Where did you come from?”

“…I’m afraid I don’t understand.”

“I know all about you, you bastard. I asked where you came from. The Poison Dragon Sect? Or the Black Blood Sect?”

“T-the Poison Dragon Sect? The Black Blood Sect? This poor monk comes from Shaolin.”

“What? Shaolin? Shaolin Temple on Mount Song?”

“Yes.”

Shaolin Temple?

Now this was getting interesting.

Even Jeok Cheongang, who had been ignoring everything happening behind him, turned to watch.

“Old Master, he says he’s from Shaolin Temple.”

“Be quiet. I’m deciding how to deal with an ill-mannered brat like you.”

“…”

That wasn’t good news.

My expression probably looked a lot like the monk’s right about now.

His face had fallen as he stared at the hulking man, who burst into thunderous laughter.

“Ha-ha-ha-ha! Shaolin Temple? You’re claiming to be from Shaolin Temple?”

“B-benefactor, why are you laughing?”

“Benefactor, my ass. Who the fuck is this mangy stray, crawling out of nowhere and spouting bullshit to my face?”

Boom!

The hulking man’s fist shattered the solid wall.

Unlike his subordinates, who were Second or Third Rate at best, he possessed enough martial prowess to pass himself off as a Peak master wherever he went.

Though he had only barely entered the realm.

“You little bastard… You think our Dongcheon Sect is a joke? Do I look that stupid to you?”

“Benefactor, you seem agitated. Please calm yourself. Settle your heart.”

“Settle my ass!”

Boom!

What remained of the wall crumbled to the floor.

The innkeeper watching from the back probably felt his heart crumble along with it.

“You don’t have the precept seals that should be carved into your forehead, you don’t have a Dharma name, and you look like the perfect dark-path thug, but you expect me to believe you’re a monk? You little shit. Why don’t you just tell me the Abbot of Shaolin is your master?”

“Gasp! How did you know?”

The young monk’s eyes widened.

That was the last straw for the hulking man.

“You son of a—!”

Whoosh!

A mace covered in sharp steel spikes hurtled toward the monk. It traced a clean, practiced arc worthy of an experienced First Rate master.

With a startled gasp, the monk raised the prayer beads in his hand.

Screams erupted from the crowd watching outside the inn.

“Eek!”

“Look out!”

But what they feared never happened.

Clang!

With a sharp metallic ring, something came raining down.

Astonishingly, the small, pointed objects raining down were the steel spikes that had covered the mace.

“…Huh?”

The hulking man stared at his mace in confusion.
Then the young monk shouted in a terrified voice,
“Benefactor, you started this!”
“W-wait!”
But the situation had already taken an unexpected turn.
Rattle-rattle-rattle!
The absurdly large prayer beads wrapped around the monk’s entire arm.
The beads threaded between his fingers gleamed with a strangely familiar sheen.
Wait. Could those be…
Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron?
The realization flashed through my mind just as a horrifying sound rang out.
Crack! Crunch!
A single punch shattered the mace and drove straight into the hulking man’s side.
“Guh!”
His mouth fell open from the pain, and blood poured from between his lips.
“W-wait!”
The hulking man cried out desperately, but his plea never reached his opponent.
Already white as a sheet, the young monk squeezed his eyes shut and shouted,
“Amitabha!”
Thud!
“Namu!”[1257]
Crack!
“Avalokiteshvara!”[1258]
Crunch!
“Amitabha, Amitabha, Amitabhaaa!”
Bam-bam-bam-bam-bam!
He hit him, broke him, then struck the places he had already hit again.
Every time the gleaming prayer beads shot forward, blood sprayed through the air.
Watching the scene, I muttered like I was groaning in pain.
“Oh, shit…”
That was the strongest reaction I could muster.
I had expected the monk to win from the moment he appeared, but I had never imagined he would be this insane.
“T-that…”
Jeok Cheongang had shot to his feet at some point. His mouth hung open.

[1257] Namu means “homage to” and begins a Buddhist invocation.
[1258] Avalokiteshvara is a bodhisattva associated with compassion.

“The Arhat Fist!”[1259]

“Arhat? As in Shaolin’s Hundred and Eight Arhats?”

“Y-yes. That is definitely Shaolin martial arts.”

“…That is?”

I looked back.

The young monk’s eyes had half rolled back in his head as he delivered the finishing blow to the fallen man.

“Gate, gate, paragateeek!”[1260]

Bam-bam-bam!

The scene was covered in brutal violence and blood. I wiped the blood from my cheek and barely managed to speak.

“…Old Master.”

“Speak.”

“Is that really Shaolin martial arts?”

“…Technically.”

“Then why can’t I feel even a trace of the Buddha’s compassion or anything like that?”

After a brief pause, Jeok Cheongang gave a short answer.

“At least he didn’t kill him.”

“…”

At this point, killing him seemed like it might actually be kinder.

But I swallowed the words before they could escape.

Clink, clink.

The prayer beads swung and rattled with every step.

A blood-drenched robe and a pair of unsteady eyes drew closer.

“Um, excuse me.”

“Yes?”

“Forgive me, but may I ask your name, Benefactor?”

“W-why?”

My voice trembled despite myself.

The young murderer—no, the young monk—edged closer with timid steps.

“Could you perhaps be a member of the Jin family…?”

“I’m sorry. You have me confused with someone else.”

“That is Jin Taekyung.”

When Jeok Cheongang cut in, I immediately changed my answer.

[1259] An arhat is a person who has attained enlightenment in Buddhism. The Hundred and Eight Arhats are associated with Shaolin martial tradition.

[1260] “Gate, gate, paragate” is part of the Buddhist Heart Sutra’s closing mantra, commonly rendered “gone, gone, gone beyond.”

"That's right. I was only joking. I didn't offend you, did I?"

"Amitabha. Of course not."

Fortunately, he didn't seem upset.

Unlike me, who kept glancing uneasily at the prayer beads, he wore a joyful smile around his mouth.

If not for the drop of blood splattered beneath his chin, I might have thought, So this is what the smile of a Buddha looks like.

"But why were you looking for me?"

"This poor monk was ordered to bring the Master of Morning Star."

The master of what?

Before I could ask again, Jeok Cheongang abruptly spoke.

"Do you know Hong Dao?"

"Yes. He is my master."

"…Hah. That damned monk is as uncanny as ever. He can still see a thousand li[1261] without leaving his seat."

"Then you must be the Fire King, Great Hero Jeok Cheongang."

"Did your master tell you that too?"

The young monk silently bowed his head, and Jeok Cheongang let out a short laugh.

"No need for a lengthy explanation, then. Take us to Hong Dao."

"Yes."

As Yama[1262] disguised as a monk led the way, the crowd parted like the Red Sea.

Taking advantage of the renewed commotion, I asked Jeok Cheongang in a low voice,

"Old Master, who is Hong Dao?"

"The Abbot of Shaolin."

That alone was surprising, but Jeok Cheongang wasn't finished.

"In the Murim, they call him the Dharma King."

"…"

Unnamed.

That was the Dharma name of the young monk who introduced himself as the Disciple of Dharma King Hong Dao.

Though, technically, it could hardly be called a Dharma name.

[1261] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 meters (0.311 miles); a thousand li is about 500 kilometers (310 miles).

[1262] Yama is a Buddhist lord of the underworld.

It literally meant he had no name.

“He hasn’t changed a bit, even in his old age. What kind of Dharma name is that to give a Disciple?”

Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue, and Unnamed smiled sheepishly.

“My master gave it to me, so it is both my name and my Dharma name.”

“From what this old man can tell, you don’t seem to have been formally accepted as his Disciple. Do you have no regrets about that?”

“Is it not all Heaven’s will?”

Unnamed pointed toward the sky with a bright smile.

Jeok Cheongang shook his head.

“Even when choosing a Disciple, he really… How should I put this?”

After a moment’s hesitation, he continued,

“He chose an unusual one.”

“Hehe. Amitabha. Thank you.”

“…”

“…”

Don’t laugh. That wasn’t a compliment. And stop saying Amitabha.

Even now, whenever I closed my eyes, I could vividly see Unnamed drenched in blood.

When he smiled, he looked like a living Buddha. But the moment he slipped those prayer beads between his fingers, everything within ten meters[1263] turned into a living hell.

This bastard is the scariest one here.

From what I had heard during the half day we’d traveled together, he was so naturally introverted that once he snapped, he couldn’t control himself.

Jeok Cheongang tilted his head a few times before giving a vague nod, but I had a different opinion.

I even knew his exact diagnosis.

Anger-management disorder.

The man was a walking time bomb.

That was why I had been trying to stay behind Unnamed whenever possible.

A Peak master with anger-management disorder could strangle me with those Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron prayer beads.

Getting strangled with prayer beads… No. Absolutely not.

Fortunately, the journey from Luoyang to Mount Song didn’t take long.

The two were close to each other, and the roads were well maintained thanks to the many pilgrims who visited Shaolin Temple.

[1263] Ten meters is about 33 feet.

As we reached the foot of Mount Song, wooden buildings began to appear in the distance.

“Are we there?”

Jeok Cheongang shook his head.

“Not yet. We still have to climb halfway up Shaoshi Peak. Visitors without a specific purpose are only permitted to stay at the Guest Reception Hall.”

“You know this place well. Have you been here often?”

“I’ve stopped by often.”

“Oh.”

Well, the Abbot of Shaolin was his friend. I supposed it was only natural for him to know that much.

Jeok Cheongang dismounted and began climbing Shaoshi Peak. After a while, he abruptly spoke.

“You haven’t given up that lazy habit, I see. Do you still sleep five shichen[1264] a day?”

The next moment, an unexpected answer came from a broad, flat rock far above us.

It was a presence only a master of Jeok Cheongang’s caliber could have sensed.

“Hmm. Five shichen[1265]. There was a time when I could sleep that long.”

The voice resembled the tolling of a bell in an ancient temple.

It was quiet yet weighty, with a deep resonance.

“Being the Abbot of Shaolin is a grave responsibility. I can no longer sleep as much as I used to.”

“Is that so?”

“Of course. It is a sense of responsibility that a carefree Fire Gate Sect Leader like you could never understand.”

Jeok Cheongang and Hong Dao spoke as casually as if they had seen each other only yesterday.

“So how many shichen[1266] do you sleep?”

“Hmm. Well, you see…”

Whoosh.

A black silhouette slowly descended from the broad, flat rock several dozen meters[1267] above us.

Very slowly, stepping on empty air as though it were solid ground, Dharma King Hong Dao landed and smiled like a child.

[1264] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.
[1265] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.
[1266] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.
[1267] Several dozen meters is roughly 100–200 feet.

"Only about four shichen[1268]."

"You lazy bastard."

A smile tugged at the corners of Fire King Jeok Cheongang's mouth.

[1268] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

Chapter 232

Unlike the short Jeok Cheongang, Dharma King Hong Dao was a remarkably tall old man.

His eyes sparkled with mischief, and his steps were full of vigor as he climbed the mountain path.

Where are we going, anyway?

It was only natural to wonder. He had abandoned the well-maintained road and was deliberately taking paths hardly anyone ever used.

After walking for some time, Hong Dao finally stopped.

“Humble guests have come to this precious place. I know it may be a burden, but don’t stand on ceremony. Come in.”

Jeok Cheongang stared at the so-called precious place before speaking.

“Did you get kicked out of Shaolin Temple or something?”

“Hm? Why?”

“You really have to ask? What happened to your residence?”

Just as Jeok Cheongang had said, the place was surrounded by thick weeds and trees. It looked far too shabby to be the residence of the Abbot of Shaolin Temple, the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim.[1269]

“Be honest. You got fired as Abbot of Shaolin, didn’t you?”

Seriously, what was he, a convenience-store part-timer?

Dumbfounded by Jeok Cheongang’s words, I asked, “Can an Abbot even be fired?”

“What a narrow-minded fool. Rebels can depose an emperor, so why couldn’t they do the same to an Abbot of Shaolin?”

“…”

When he put it that way, I had nothing to say.

Besides, I used to beat monsters for a living in the modern world. In a world with Demon Kings and Gates, I supposed even the Abbot of Shaolin could be a temporary employee.

Hong Dao, who had been listening to our exchange, chuckled.

“Wherever I am becomes the Abbot’s quarters. We don’t bother with such formalities at Shaolin. Isn’t that right, Disciple?”

Unnamed answered, “He is currently staying here despite the Discipline Hall’s pleas for him to return.”

“…”

Like friend, like friend. This old man was no pushover either.

[1269] “Mount Tai and Northern Dipper” is a traditional honorific for a preeminent authority; Mount Tai is a mountain in China, and the Northern Dipper is a group of stars.

Hong Dao, however, only laughed heartily as he pulled out some kind of staff from inside his robes and waved it around.

"What can they do? They're the ones who forced the position of Abbot on someone who said he didn't want it."

It was a ridiculously short staff. Its surface, polished by countless hands, gleamed as though it had been oiled, and a faint green light shimmered across it.

And there's some strange-looking stone set into it.

Its shape somewhat resembled the staffs used by mages.

But there was something different about Hong Dao's green staff. Beyond the marks left by time, it possessed a unique energy all its own.

What is that?

My question was answered the next moment.

"The Green Jade Buddha Staff. To think they entrusted a thousand-year-old sacred treasure of Shaolin, one bearing such immense authority, to a dirty monk like this. They must all be blind."

Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue.

"Shaolin is really going downhill."

"It's still doing much better than the Fire Gate Clan, which has all of one Disciple."

"What did you say?"

"Your fiery temper hasn't changed. I hope you're reborn as a good and calm person in your next life."

"My next life? Why are you killing me off when I'm still perfectly healthy?"

"Oh, my. A corpse is talking. Amitabha.[1270]"

"Hong Dao, you dirty monk!"

I watched the two of them bicker as they entered the Buddha hall, then turned around.

Unnamed was looking at me with a faint smile.

"They both seem pleased to see an old friend after so long."

"…I can't imagine how they ever became friends."

The eccentric Abbot of Shaolin and the foul-tempered Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan.

Their personalities might be a decent match, but they still didn't seem like the sort of pair who would become friends. Besides, hadn't Jeok Cheongang killed countless people, despite Buddhism's prohibition against taking life?

Unnamed thought over my dubious remark, then suddenly smacked his gleaming forehead.

"Ah, I remember now."

[1270] Amitabha is an invocation of the Buddha of Infinite Light.

“You startled me. I thought you were about to use Solar Fist… But what did you remember?”

“How they became friends. During the Great Faction War, my master was secretly drinking and eating meat. Benefactor Jeok caught him, and they became drinking buddies afterward.”

“What?”

For a moment, I wondered if I had misheard him.

“He was drinking and eating meat?”

“Yes.”

“Wasn’t he already the Abbot of Shaolin back then?”

“That is correct.”

“Oh, so the monks here eat meat. Well, I suppose they need to bulk up while training in martial arts, so that makes sense…”

“That is not the case. Buddhism forbids taking life. Livestock are no exception.”

“…?”

“…?”

Where had this conversation gone wrong?

I stared blankly at Unnamed for a while, unable to say anything more.

Then I looked at the muscles writhing beneath his loose robes and became certain.

This bastard eats meat too.

Just look at those muscles. There was no way he had built a physique like that on temple vegetable bibimbap[1271] alone.

He would have to roast an entire pig whenever he got bored, and even his bibimbap[1272] would have to be beef-tartare bibimbap.[1273]

Shaolin Temple? More like the Temple of Wine Pools and Meat Forests.[1274]

Whoever said you couldn’t predict even an inch ahead in the Murim had been absolutely right.

Shaking my head, I followed the others into the Buddha hall.

The interior of the Buddha hall was small and old, but it had an elegant, antique charm.

The floor was spotless, and Buddha statues of every size stood throughout the hall.

[1271] Bibimbap is a Korean dish of rice mixed with vegetables and other toppings.

[1272] Bibimbap is a Korean dish of rice mixed with vegetables and other toppings.

[1273] Bibimbap is a Korean dish of rice mixed with vegetables and other toppings.

[1274] “Wine pools and meat forests” is an image of lavish indulgence. The Korean phrase also plays on the word for a temple’s abbot.

Unnamed stepped away for a while, leaving Jeok Cheongang, Hong Dao, and me seated across from one another, emptying our teacups. The tea, brewed from some unknown herb, was bitter and astringent.

“This is no way to treat an honored guest. What is this?”

“What do you think? Tea leaves I grew myself.”

“Tea leaves? You?”

“I’m old enough to know better, so I decided it was time to give up ‘grain tea’[1275] as well. That was decades ago.”

“…”

For someone who had supposedly given it up, he seemed to have drunk enough alcohol to last a lifetime.

I couldn’t bring myself to say it aloud and merely tipped my cup back. Jeok Cheongang, on the other hand, gaped at him.

“Are you sick? Do you have some terminal disease?”

“A terminal disease… Perhaps I do, perhaps I don’t. I’m not sure myself.”

His answer was calm, but Jeok Cheongang’s face stiffened.

“Does that mean…?”

“We’ll discuss that later.”

Hong Dao lightly waved a hand to cut him off, then turned and stared intently at me.

“Now, then… Are you the Master of Morning Star?”

The Master of Morning Star.

I had first heard the phrase from Unnamed only half a day ago.

I assumed rumors about a Morning Star appearing in the Murim had spread through the usual gossip.

The rumor has already reached this far?

The name Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi was gaining popularity by the day, but I hadn’t expected even the Abbot of Shaolin to recognize me.

Having suddenly gone world-class, I smiled awkwardly.

“That’s too much praise. I’m not quite at that level yet.”

“You’re more obtuse than you look.”

“Excuse me?”

“Did I not call you the Master of Morning Star?”

Yes, but what does that mean?

Seeing my bewildered expression, Hong Dao smiled faintly.

“Benefactor, do you know what a Morning Star is?”

[1275] “Grain tea” is a euphemism for alcoholic drink made from grain.

"Uh, well… Don't people usually call those who distinguish themselves Morning Stars?"

"And?"

"…A star?"

"Exactly."

Hong Dao nodded and continued in a calm voice.

"I have observed the heavens for a very long time. Perhaps the effort was not entirely futile, for I eventually learned to see and read the heavenly patterns to some extent."

"The heavenly patterns…"

The events of the past half day suddenly flashed through my mind.

Unnamed had come looking for us on his master's orders, and the moment he saw me, he had called me the Master of Morning Star.

And what had Jeok Cheongang said? Ah, right.

What an uncanny dirty monk. He can still see a thousand ri[1276] without leaving his seat.

He hadn't guided us here using information gathered from other people. He had read the heavenly patterns.

If that's true, he's far beyond some fake fortune-teller.

Calling it prophecy wouldn't even be an exaggeration.

I sensed something unusual from Hong Dao and swallowed hard.

"So?"

"A Morning Star is like a firework. It shines brightly in the night sky, then fades with time. But this one was different."

Hong Dao pointed through the open doors of the Buddha hall, toward the distant north where Shanxi Province lay.

"One day, a new Morning Star rose in the north. Its light has yet to fade. No, it grows brighter with each passing day."

"…"

"People often compare humans to stars. I believe that Morning Star is you."

Whenever someone is born or dies after accomplishing something great, people rejoice or lament.

A new star has risen. Or a great star has fallen.

But the Morning Star that appeared this time is supposed to be me?

Hong Dao clearly meant it as something good.

Still, I wasn't sure what to make of it.

[1276] This uses the Korean ri, approximately 393 m (0.244 mi). A thousand ri is about 393 km (244 mi).

Just as I scratched the back of my head with a perplexed expression, one of Hong Dao's words pierced my ears.

"That was four months ago."

"…!"

My entire body tingled as though I had been struck by electricity.

My mouth went dry, and my heart pounded. One thought spun endlessly through my mind.

Four months ago?

If it was then…

That was around the time I had first awakened in the Murim.

Hong Dao smiled warmly at me as I swallowed dryly.

"You seem to have something in mind."

"N-no. Nothing at all."

Jeok Cheongang, who had been listening silently, cut in with a disgusted look.

"It's written all over your face, you idiot."

"I-it really isn't."

"Oh? Shall I rip out that tongue of yours?"

"W-why are you doing this to me?"

Damn it. My tongue wouldn't stop tripping over itself.

Hong Dao burst into laughter as I slowly edged my bottom away from Jeok Cheongang to avoid his sharp gaze.

"It seems the benefactor is in urgent need of the privy. You may leave."

"Go on—if you want me to shove you into the latrine."

I looked back and forth between the two of them, then bolted for the door.

Behind me, I heard Hong Dao's booming laughter and Jeok Cheongang's shouts.

"Ha! Ha-ha-ha!"

"What an ill-mannered brat. How dare he run off while his master is speaking…"

Hong Dao looked at the grumbling Jeok Cheongang.

"Is he the Disciple you recently took in?"

Jeok Cheongang flinched and hurriedly cleared his throat.

"Ahem. Kheh-hem! He isn't my Disciple. He begged and pleaded for me to teach him a thing or two, so I'm merely looking after him for a while. Yes. That's all."

"Is that so?"

"I told you it is!"

"If that's the case, why are you shouting? You'll anger the Buddhas."

"Hah. Listen to the way this dirty monk talks."

Ignoring Jeok Cheongang's reaction, Hong Dao drained his teacup in one gulp and grimaced.

"Ugh, bitter. Hurry and finish yours."

"Finish this crap? Why would I drink something so bitter?"

"How can I pour the liquor if your cup isn't empty?"

"What?"

"I've been saving something for a day like this."

With a sly smile thoroughly unbecoming of a monk, Hong Dao rose and approached the row of Buddha statues.

He effortlessly lifted aside the largest statue, fumbled behind it, and pulled out a small earthenware jar.

"Snake liquor aged for thirty years."

"Snake liquor?"

"The Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake. Have you heard of it?"

"The Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake!"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes lit up.

He hurriedly opened the tightly sealed jar. Sure enough, the snake inside was larger than a python, with a horn protruding from its triangular head.

A poisonous aura strong enough to make his nose tingle poured from the jar. Jeok Cheongang stared in amazement.

"Isn't this thing lethally venomous? Where did you catch it?"

Hong Dao gazed off toward the distant mountains.

"While I was out for a walk."

"…You must have searched the whole mountain with the intention of making snake liquor from the start. There are limits to being a dirty monk. Now you're killing things just to have a drink?"

"If you don't want any, never mind. I'll drink it myself."

"Now, now."

Jeok Cheongang gave Hong Dao a pointed glare, then muttered, "Still, this thing's venom must be no joke…"

"Indeed. A single drop of venom squeezed from a Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake can kill a hundred cows."

"It's been in there for thirty years. At this point, that's not liquor. It's poison."

"We only broke the seal for a moment, and already this much poisonous energy has spread through the air. What more is there to say?"

"Something this strong would kill even a decent master, wouldn't it?"

"It would be madness to drink it. We absolutely shouldn't."

Their gazes met in midair.

Then they spoke almost simultaneously.

“Then we have to drink it.”

“Of course. Absolutely.”

“Surely it won’t kill us.”

“Drink. We’re drinking it no matter what. I read the heavenly patterns, and today isn’t the day we die.”

Both men were over a hundred years old, yet neither could escape the simple recklessness etched deep into every man’s bones.

Before long, they were passing the jar back and forth and guzzling the liquor as though possessed.

Half a shichen[1277] later, early darkness had settled over the mountain, and the jar was empty.

“Ooh, that venomous tingle on the tip of the tongue gives it an incredible kick. Thanks to my Scorching Yang Qi, the poison can’t even touch me.”

Jeok Cheongang licked up the very last drop while Hong Dao glared at him.

Though both men numbered among the Ten Kings, a slight difference in skill still existed.

Hong Dao had lost out in the grappling technique they used to wrestle the jar away from each other, so he had not managed to drink even half of what it contained.

“An old brute with nothing but strength. No wonder you’ve lived so long.”

“Were you hoping I’d die?”

“I at least expected you to clutch your stomach and roll around.”

Pleasantly drunk, Jeok Cheongang burst into laughter.

“That’s what the heavenly patterns said, isn’t it? What can you do when Heaven has decided your lifespan?”

“The heavenly patterns…”

Hong Dao murmured the words, then casually added, “That was a lie.”

“Hm? What do you mean?”

“Exactly what I said. I’ve been slowly going blind for the past thirty years.”

“W-wait. Are you saying you can no longer read the heavenly patterns?”

Hong Dao nodded silently, and Jeok Cheongang’s heart sank.

“How did it happen? Is it because of your age?”

“At first, I thought so too. But I was mistaken. I gave up the liquor I loved so much and secluded myself in the wilderness to calm my mind, yet nothing changed.”

“Then…”

“It isn’t because this old man’s faculties have grown dull.”

Hong Dao sighed and raised his head.

[1277] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Though the ceiling of the Buddha hall blocked his view, the old monk's profound gaze seemed to pierce straight through it.

"The heavenly patterns are becoming distorted. Drawing closer, and moving faster."

"…!"

"Then, amid all that, a Morning Star rose. Even in those chaotic heavens, its light was unmistakably clear."

Jeok Cheongang's eyelids trembled.

"And?"

Hong Dao considered the question for a long moment, then shook his head.

"That is all I can say. Though the heavenly patterns are in turmoil, they still retain their form, and the great trees rooted throughout the realm will not be easily shaken. However…"

An inscrutable light entered Hong Dao's eyes.

The words that followed carried the wisdom of a sage—of the current Abbot of Shaolin, the sect hailed for a thousand years as the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim,[1278] and of a man deeply versed in the study of the heavens.

"An unknown calamity is approaching. Dark clouds will roll in from somewhere, covering the sun and swallowing the stars."

A sky steeped in darkness, without a single ray of light.

Imagining it, Jeok Cheongang let one word slip out like a groan.

"Dark Heaven?"

"Dark Heaven. Yes, it will become just as you said—"

Jeok Cheongang hastily cut him off.

"No, that's not what I meant. I remembered something Jin Wikyung, the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, told me."

"Jin Wikyung? I don't know who that is, but are you saying he predicted this situation as well?"

"More accurately, it appeared before them. I saw it with my own eyes."

Jeok Cheongang gave Hong Dao a detailed account of what had happened seven days and nights earlier, just before he left the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

He told him about the surviving remnants of the Head Elder's faction, who were still alive despite the restrictions placed on them, and about everything that had happened up to that point. He also told him about the mysterious pill called the Temporary Strength Pill that he had taken from Pung Yang, the Red Wind Band Leader.

[1278] "Mount Tai and Northern Dipper" is a traditional honorific for a preeminent authority; Mount Tai is a mountain in China, and the Northern Dipper is a group of stars.

Jin Wikyung had passed all those facts to Jeok Cheongang, and Jeok Cheongang now passed them to Hong Dao.

“It was astonishing. The restrictions placed on them were so complex that even I couldn’t easily break them, and the effects of that Temporary Strength Pill were bizarrely powerful.”

“To think such a thing happened…”

“The hidden force that manipulated the Blade of Flowers from the shadows for decades. They are Dark Heaven.”

“Ngh…”

When the story ended, Hong Dao let out a low groan and sank into thought.

A long time passed before he finally spoke.

“Leave immediately.”

“…!”

“It seems the time has come for each of us to do what we must. I will devote all my strength to preparing for this calamity, and you…”

Jeok Cheongang gazed deeply at his old friend and finished the sentence.

“You must stay beside the Morning Star. So it doesn’t fade easily.”

Jeok Cheongang knew his task did not end there. He had to protect that light while helping it shine even brighter.

Having realized their respective duties, neither man hesitated any longer.

“I’ll be going.”

“I won’t see you off. We’ll save the rest of our reunion for another time.”

Their separation had been long, and their reunion short.

Jeok Cheongang smiled at Hong Dao one last time, then strode out of the Buddha hall without hesitation.

Remembering the words he had not managed to finish saying.

It was a short meeting, but I enjoyed it.

Late that night, the young man and the old man left Shaoshi Peak on Mount Song.

They continued walking until the sun rose and set once more.

Chapter 233

The middle-aged man gazed down at the crystal-clear blade.

Blade-sharp features and tightly pressed lips stared back at him. Strands of white had begun to appear here and there in his reflected hair.

After a while, he suddenly spoke.

“You’ve had a long wait.”

His low but powerful voice echoed through the spacious room. Yet no one stood anywhere within sight.

The answer came from the ceiling above his head.

“It is my duty.”

The whisper belonged to the person known as the Hidden Thread. There had been a Hidden Thread in the previous generation, and the generation before that. The position had existed for hundreds of years, ever since the family was founded.

Sworn to absolute loyalty toward one person alone—the Family Head—they were, true to their name, threads hidden from sight.

The countless pieces of information that flowed along those threads could be quietly forgotten—or turned into weapons with which to strangle someone.

“Do you have any new information?”

“Yes. Heaven-grade.”

“Heaven-grade.”

The middle-aged man ran a finger along the blade.

Every report the Hidden Thread delivered was confidential, but they were divided by importance into Heaven, Earth, and Human grades.

Heaven-grade was the highest of them all.

Even for a man who had led his family for nearly twenty years, such reports were exceedingly rare.

“It has been a while. Is this the first since the Huangshan Sect?”

The Huangshan Sect was a prestigious sect with a long history. Yet now, its name was slowly fading from the memories of the people.

Survival of the fittest.

The Murim was a merciless world that did not look back at those who had been weeded out. The middle-aged man had weeded out the Huangshan Sect and feasted on their corpses.

“There should still be a long time left before they reopen their gates.”

“The Huangshan Sect has already collapsed. Even if it reopened its gates, it could never recover.”

“Then?”

“The Mountain Lord has returned.”

The fingers caressing the blade abruptly stopped.

“…Is that true?”

“Without a doubt.”

The Mountain Lord—the master of the mountain.

Some might wonder what sort of nonsense that was. There were countless mountains under heaven, so what sense did it make to speak of their owner?

But here in Anhui Province, the title Mountain Lord referred to only one man.

“Fire King Jeok Cheongang…”

An unparalleled master who had faced a thousand martial artists alone.

Mount Jiuhua was his domain and the sacred ground of the Fire Gate Clan, whose legacy stretched back hundreds of years.

On the day the Demonic Cultists set fire to Mount Jiuhua, an old man who had been aging like any other became the Fire King.

The people of Anhui Province, who had protected their precious home thanks to him, began calling him the Mountain Lord out of respect.

“When and where did the report come from?”

“He passed through the North Gate two shichen[1279] ago.”

“His destination?”

“Mount Jiuhua.”

“I see.”

The middle-aged man nodded slightly, then sensed something odd.

Since becoming Family Head, he had received countless reports from the Hidden Thread and asked for his assessments, but the man had never once spoken with such certainty.

This time was different.

Sensing his lord’s question, the Hidden Thread spoke first.

“He was accompanied by his Disciple. Going to his sect is only natural.”

“His Disciple?”

The middle-aged man frowned. The Fire Gate Clan passed its teachings from one master to a single Disciple. The Fire King could have only one.

Though it had happened nearly twenty years ago, he clearly remembered everything concerning the Fire King.

“Did he come back for that vicious bastard?”

“It is not the man you are thinking of. According to confirmed reports, he died three months ago.”

“And the Fire King found a new Disciple?”

[1279] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

"Yes."

The Hidden Thread's flat voice continued.

"Jin Taekyung. He turned twenty-one this year and belongs to the direct line of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"Both the name and the family are unfamiliar to me."

"He shares a bloodline with the Blade of Flowers, who distinguished himself during the Great Faction War, and the Heaven Shaking Sword, who has recently risen to prominence as one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes."

"Ah, that Jin Family."

"Yes."

Fortunately, the two names given by the Hidden Thread were familiar enough to the middle-aged man.

"Hmm. So that is how it is."

He sank into thought, forgetting even the Hidden Thread's presence.

Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Fire King Jeok Cheongang's new Disciple. No matter how much he considered it, the name remained unfamiliar.

But now he would have to become accustomed to it.

The Fire King chose a descendant of a frontier martial family.

He would never have accepted a man already past twenty as his new Disciple without good reason.

It must be one of two things. Either he has some leverage over the Fire King, or his martial talent is so extraordinary that his age and background are irrelevant.

The longer he considered it, the clearer the answer became.

A considerable amount of time had passed by the time he spoke again.

"Set every Lesser Thread in motion."

The Lesser Threads were the countless informants serving beneath the Hidden Thread.

They gathered information from all across the realm, which flowed through the Hidden Thread before reaching the middle-aged man.

"Every one of them?"

For the first time, a faint trace of surprise entered the Hidden Thread's voice.

The order meant focusing most of the family's intelligence network on a single person.

But his surprise lasted only a moment. Remembering his duty, the Hidden Thread quickly answered.

"Forgive my insolence."

"It doesn't matter. I'll give you a month. Use whatever means necessary and learn everything there is to know about that Disciple."

"As you command."

"You'll be busy for a while."

The Hidden Thread grasped the meaning behind those words, and his presence vanished as though it had been wiped clean.

His concealment technique had reached the very limits of the Peak realm. He would spend the next fortnight without a moment to breathe.

I can't sit idle either.

The middle-aged man slowly rose.

Unlike his father, who had been a martial artist to the bone, he had been born to lead.

He had guided the family since his days as Lesser Family Head, cementing its position as a dominant power. Authority radiated from his entire bearing.

Step. Step. Step.

He crossed the spacious room in long strides and threw open the doors. The dozen or so guards surrounding the pavilion dropped to one knee in greeting.

"We greet the Family Head!"

The middle-aged man nodded slightly. Every one of them was an outstanding Peak swordsman and a blood relative who shared his lineage.

They were a vast clan united beneath the surname Namgung—a great tree rooted deep in the Murim.

"Gather the clan. The weather is fine, so we should all share a drink."

"As you command!"

The middle-aged man, Namgung Ryong, raised his head toward the sky.

The boundless azure heaven stretched above him, not a single cloud in sight.

I spoke with the most solemn expression I could muster.

"I have a wish I've cherished for a long time."

Jeok Cheongang answered in an equally grave voice.

"This old man has a wish as well."

"If it wouldn't be too rude, may I go first?"

"That would be extremely rude."

"Then I'll be rude just this once."

"Want to have an accident in your pants? Should I make you piss and shit yourself for the rest of your life, not just this once?"

"…Ah."

My mother would have been devastated if she had seen this.

I could have cried at how unfair it was, but I held back my tears and tried again.

"Please hear me out just once."

“Fine. I know exactly what you’re after, but I’ll hear you out once.”

I swallowed dryly and stated my wish.

“Could we stop at an inn just once?”

“That’s your wish?”

“Yes.”

“Then this old man will tell you his.”

Jeok Cheongang glared at me with terrifying eyes.

“Shut your mouth and follow me.”

“…Why?”

“Didn’t you say you wanted to train? We’re on our way to train, so what are you whining about?”

“When did I say I didn’t want to? I’m going to be stuck in the mountains for the next six months. All I’m asking is that we eat our fill and wash up once—just once—before that!”

My shout echoed through the darkened mountains.

That was right. We were standing at the foot of Mount Jiuhua in Anhui Province.

“It took seven days and nights to get from Shanxi Province to Henan, then another seven days and nights to get from Henan to Anhui. I haven’t even slept properly.”

At least before we reached Henan, he had let me sleep for a shichen[1280] at a time. After we left Hong Dao’s residence, however, he had shown me absolutely no mercy.

We ran and ran, chewing jerky without even stopping for meals.

“I wanted to eat Shaolin Temple’s wild-vegetable bibimbap[1281]!”

During the fifteen-day forced march, the only proper meal I’d had was at the inn in Luoyang.

“And even then, you ate all the drumsticks! You left me one wing and nothing but dry breast meat!”

I had barely gotten to tear off a few pieces of meat when some sword-wielding dark-path figures showed up and ruined everything. Then the Under Armour monk appeared and took me to Shaolin Temple.

“I kept asking you to stop at an inn. What did you say? That we were almost there. That we could rest when we arrived!”

“And here we are. Mount Jiuhua.”

Jeok Cheongang dug into his ear with a grimy pinky nail, then blew the earwax away.

“Go up and rest. Once we’re there, you can eat your fill, wash, and sleep.”

[1280] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

[1281] Bibimbap is a Korean dish of rice mixed with vegetables and other toppings.

"Eating my fill just means jerky and fasting pills. Forget hot water—I'll get nothing but a nonstop forest bath. And you won't even let me sleep for half a shichen[1282] a day!"

"Hahaha!"

Jeok Cheongang laughed heartily, then stopped dead. At the same time, a chilling energy seeped from his entire body.

"This is why I don't like youngsters with sharp instincts."

"…!"

Big Brother Ed…

Wait, no.

Goose bumps raced down my spine.

His voice came out cold as ice.

"Yes, you guessed correctly. I intend to let you sleep for half a shichen[1283] a day and work you like a dog."

"Gasp!"

"I'll use fasting pills to squeeze every last drop of fat from your body. Then, for six months straight, I'll put you through the most extreme training humanly imaginable, without missing a single day."

"Y-you devil."

"Did you just call this old man a demon? I suppose I'll have to make your training even harder."

"N-no. This is a scam."

"Why don't you understand that by the time you realize that, it's already too late?"

"Wait. I need to visit the privy for a moment."

As I slowly backed away, the Fire King extended a wrinkled palm toward me.

"You came of your own free will, but leaving isn't up to you."

Whoosh!

An overwhelming force I had never felt before became ropes that bound my entire body.

Neither my near-superhuman physical abilities nor my nearly one jiazi[1284] of internal energy could do a thing.

I tried to resist somehow, but it was already too late. Following the movement of his hand, my body floated into the air.

"Seizing an Object Through Empty Space?"

"If you recognize it, hurry over."

Whoosh!

[1282] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

[1283] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

[1284] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

The next moment, I shot toward Jeok Cheongang faster than an arrow. At the same time, one of his wrinkled fingers brushed a spot on my neck.

A sharp sting was followed by an ominous sound in my ear.

Beep!

SYSTEM

You have been struck by Pressure-Point Strike!
Your Sleep Acupoint has been struck. You cannot resist sleep!
5 seconds, 4 seconds, 3 seconds, 2 seconds...

Drowsiness swept over me with the System's countdown.

As my consciousness blurred, Jeok Cheongang's voice slowly receded into the distance.

"Today, I'll make a special exception and let you sleep for two shichen[1285]."

"..."

Well, fuck. How very generous.

I couldn't force the words from the tip of my tongue before sleep claimed me.

Snore. Snore.

"That young bastard is absurdly strong."

Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue as he looked down at the peacefully sleeping Jin Taekyung.

Seizing an Object Through Empty Space and Pressure-Point Strike were not omnipotent. The amount of force they required varied depending on the opponent.

It was a good thing he had known what kind of person this young man was. If he had been caught off guard and his technique had been countered, he would have been utterly humiliated.

"It feels like only yesterday that I met him in Shanxi, yet he has already come this far... What a strange fellow."

Just as Jeok Cheongang let out a weary sigh, his vision suddenly blurred and the strength drained from his legs.

"Gasp!"

Thud.

He barely managed to regain his senses before grabbing hold of a nearby tree.

[1285] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

His heart pounded, and his mind snapped fully awake as though someone had dumped cold water over him in his sleep.

“Th-this…”

Had he expended too much strength at once? Or had his aged body failed to withstand the arduous journey?

Jeok Cheongang bit his lip. Although his prime as a martial artist had passed, he was still a Supreme Peak master who had reached the pinnacle of martial arts.

It wasn’t his body that had grown old. It was something else.

I must hurry. I don’t have much time.

Perhaps that was why his old friend Hong Dao had told him to leave immediately.

After steadying himself, Jeok Cheongang slung Jin Taekyung over his back. Though he was more than a hundred years old, the young man’s massive frame felt as light as a feather.

“Not yet. It can’t happen yet.”

He muttered in a voice that had suddenly grown much older, then set off.

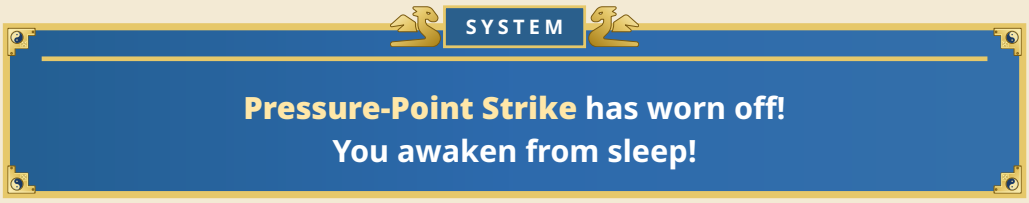
More than ten jang[1286] vanished beneath each step, and the scenery flashed past.

Before long, thick fog rolled in and erased every trace of him.

[1286] A jang is a traditional Korean length of ten ja, approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

Chapter 234

Ding.



I opened my eyes as the System notifications appeared.

The first things I saw were the waves of branches rippling far below in the night wind and the stars scattered across the pitch-black sky. Cold, hard rock pressed against my back.

I'm outside.

I'd expected as much. Even a preschooler could have guessed that Jeok Cheongang wouldn't lay me down on a soft duck-down bed.

Besides, my body was sturdy enough to sleep anywhere.

Then why does my body feel so heavy?

Had I been pushing myself too hard lately?

System or not, apparently I was still human after all.

Maybe it was the fifteen-day forced march. My body felt as heavy as if I had an iron ball hanging from it…

Clank.

"Huh?"

Clank?

I turned toward the sound.

Manacles had been fastened tightly around my wrists and ankles, with chains connecting each of them to an iron ball.

"…They really are iron balls."

What the hell was this?

My brain stopped working for a few seconds. Who was I? Where was I?

And why were these ridiculous things locked onto my limbs?

The answer came quickly. It was an easier question than one plus one.

"Fire King!"

The shout burst from me like a thunderclap.

Smack!

"Ah!"

"What an insolent little bastard."

Jeok Cheongang, who had nailed me in the back of the head with a pebble, ambled toward me with his feet splayed.

"How dare you throw around my epithet in my presence? Am I your friend?"

I sprang to my feet after rolling across the rock in pain.

Clank.

"What is this?"

"That? An iron ball."

"I wasn't asking because I didn't know what it was."

"Then why ask when you already know?"

"…"

"From now on, these will be your arms and legs. They are training tools passed down through the Fire Gate Clan for generations, so treat them like your own children."

I was a virgin bachelor who had never even been in a relationship, let alone married, and he was talking about children?

Dumbfounded, I grabbed one of the chains attached to the iron balls and pulled.

Rattle.

I heard metal scraping and felt the tremendous weight behind it.

They were heavy enough that even a decent First Rate martial artist wouldn't be able to remain standing while wearing them.

"These are training tools passed down through the clan for generations?"

"Did this old man not just say so?"

"How much do they weigh?"

"Not much. About two hundred geun?"[1287]

"…"

"Oh, and that isn't their combined weight. Each one weighs two hundred geun."[1288]

Two hundred geun came to 120 kilograms even by modern standards.[1289]

With such monstrous things fastened to all four of my limbs, the total weight was…

About five hundred kilograms.[1290] Half a ton.

I thought for a moment, then opened my mouth.

"Have you gone senile?"

[1287] A geun is a traditional Korean unit of weight equal to about 600 g (1.32 lb). Two hundred geun is about 120 kg (265 lb).

[1288] A geun is a traditional Korean unit of weight equal to about 600 g (1.32 lb). Two hundred geun is about 120 kg (265 lb).

[1289] A geun is a traditional Korean unit of weight equal to about 600 g (1.32 lb). Two hundred geun is about 120 kg (265 lb).

[1290] The four iron balls weigh about 500 kg (1,100 lb) in total.

"…You really will say anything, won't you?"

I'd said it knowing I would probably get hit, but for some reason, that was the extent of Jeok Cheongang's reaction.

He stared at me with a complicated expression for a moment before continuing.

"Regardless, you'll live with those iron balls chained to you from now on. During training, of course, but also while sleeping and eating."

"Hmm."

"It's all part of your training."

"You're serious?"

"If you don't believe me, quit. I won't bother seeing you off."

Jeok Cheongang turned away without hesitation, and I hurriedly called after him.

"W-wait!"

"What? I thought you didn't want to do it."

"I haven't even answered yet. You can't just walk away."

"So what's your answer?"

"Well…"

Damn it. This is a serious internal conflict.

But once the initial shock of seeing the iron balls wore off, my mind gradually settled.

It's not impossible.

I had made it this far after narrowly escaping death dozens of times.

The world wasn't easy. To receive a reward, you had to pay a corresponding price. That was true in the Murim and in the modern world.

Everyone—not just me—lived through an endless series of Quests.

And…

If this were enough to make me turn back, I never would've come this far.

Compared to the fruit I would harvest in the future, this was a bargain.

Having made my decision, I met Jeok Cheongang's gaze.

"Fine. I'll do it."

"I can't hear you."

"I said I'll do it!"

"Ha-ha-ha! Good!"

A smile spread across Jeok Cheongang's wrinkled lips.

What a sly old man.

He had acted as if he didn't care either way, but I had known all along that deep down, he wanted me too.

"So what do I start with?"

"You want to begin right away?"

“They say to strike while the iron is hot. If I’m doing this anyway, I might as well start now.”

“You do have a bold streak. But first, you need to eat.”

“What? Why all of a sudden?”

“Do you think training means starving yourself? You need something in your stomach before you can accomplish anything worthwhile.”

I caught the object Jeok Cheongang pulled from inside his robe and tossed to me.

Under the faint moonlight, I peeled away the damp Korean paper to reveal a fasting pill[1291] with a reddish cast.

“You should’ve given me jerky instead.”

“Stop complaining and eat it. That isn’t an ordinary fasting pill.[1292] It was made using a secret Fire Gate Clan method.”

“What does it do?”

“It’s superior in every respect, but…”

“This stuff makes my stomach feel so bloated. Just looking at it kills my appetite now.”

“Wow. My mouth’s watering just looking at it.”

“…”

“I’ll enjoy the meal!”

If it was good for virility, I had to eat it. Even if I had no immediate use for it, I still had to eat it.

Thinking of the future, I chewed the fasting pill[1293] thoroughly and swallowed it.

Jeok Cheongang watched me intently before asking, “Finished?”

“Yes, Old Master.”

“Well? Feel anything?”

“I’m not sure. I think my sperm count may have gone up a little…”

Jeok Cheongang frowned at my answer and muttered, “Strange. Has it been sitting around so long that the medicine lost its potency?”

“Huh?”

What the hell was he talking about?

The moment I blurted out the question—

Ding.

Strength decreases by 100!
Stamina decreases by 100!
You cannot use internal energy!

"...Huh?"

It happened without warning.

The instant the System notification appeared, strength drained from my arms and legs, and my breathing grew short.

Finally, the internal energy flowing steadily through the minor meridians throughout my body descended into my dantian. Then it became completely immobile, as though something had bound it in place.

"Guh!"

Thud!

With all my strength gone at once, my body, which had somehow been supporting the iron balls, sagged.

The half-ton weight[1294] pressing down on my entire body made my knees buckle.

"What the hell is this?"

"Heh-heh. The medicine is finally taking effect."

I stared at Jeok Cheongang, who was letting out a sinister laugh, with my jaw hanging open.

"What the hell did you do, you crazy old man?"

"What did you call me? A crazy old man?"

"Gasp. No, that's not what I meant."

"Let's see... Yes, that should do nicely for your first training exercise."

As soon as he finished speaking, he extended a wrinkled palm toward me.

An immense flow of qi filled the air. The fierce wind abruptly changed direction and began swirling around him.

A flash of insight struck me.

There's a cliff below this, isn't there?

I hurriedly glanced back. The view below the rock was dizzying.

If I fell from here with these insane iron balls attached to me...

"W-wait!"

[1294] The four iron balls weigh about 500 kg (1,100 lb) in total.

“Wait for what? Weren’t you the one who said we should strike while the iron was hot?”

“But that was—!”

“Too late.”

Fwoosh!

Compressed air exploded from Jeok Cheongang’s palm. The blast of fist wind, powerful enough to uproot rocks and trees, became a giant’s fist and slammed into me.

Against that powerful wind, even several hundred kilograms of iron balls[1295] were useless.

Boom!

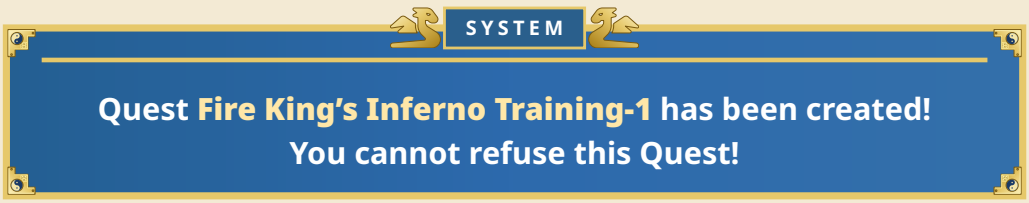
Ah, shit.

The next moment, the ground vanished beneath my feet, and I was flung into the air.

Through my upside-down vision, I saw Jeok Cheongang waving at me with a broad grin.

“You have one shichen[1296] to make it back up. If you’re even fifteen minutes late, you fail.”

Ding.



“This is fucking bullsh—!”

Before I could finish speaking, gravity bore down on my entire body.

As I plummeted like a streak of light, there was only one thing I could say.

“Aaaaaaaaaaah!”

My terrified scream shook Mount Jiuhua, submerged in darkness.

Splash—

Far below the sheer cliff, Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh at the sound of water echoing up from below.

A memory from his youth had suddenly come to mind.

“Master! Save me!”

[1295] The four iron balls weigh about 500 kg (1,100 lb) in total.

[1296] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

"I'm counting to three. Let go. Three."

"Please! If I fall from here, your Disciple will die!"

"Two."

"Master!"

"One."

His Master had been merciless—harsh enough to seem excessive toward a child who still had baby fuzz on his face.

But without such harsh instruction, neither the Fire Gate Clan of today nor Fire King Jeok Cheongang would exist.

I'll put you through exactly what I endured… No, I'll push you even harder.

Jin Taekyung didn't know it, but Jeok Cheongang did.

They did not have much time.

There was no time to teach him everything gradually, one step at a time.

The heavenly patterns[1297] Hong Dao had foreseen told him as much, as did Jeok Cheongang's current condition.

Hold out until then. This old man will do his best as well.

Jeok Cheongang gazed down the mountain for some time, his eyes unfathomably deep. Then he suddenly muttered, "…Perhaps I shouldn't have put the iron balls on him."

He had never imagined that the object meant to restrain criminals of the Fire Gate Clan would be used for something like this.

"Hngh. Hnnnngh!"

Grrrnk. Grrrnnngh.

With every step I took, the ground that had only just begun to thaw sank beneath me. Deep trenches formed in my wake.

But I was used to it by now. Sweat poured off me as I continued up the steep mountain path.

"Huff, huff."

Ding.

[1297] Heavenly patterns refers to celestial patterns studied for signs of major changes and omens.

But my most important internal energy was restricted, my physical stats had each dropped by 100, and the tremendous weight had been added on top of that. I had no way to endure it.

To top it all off, the time limit was only one shichen.[1298]

Shit. Mount Jiuhua isn't some little hill behind the neighborhood.

It was so grueling that I had even considered breaking the chains connecting the iron balls.

That was before I learned they were made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

They used this stuff for chains? Were they insane?

In the end, I had no choice but to keep going through sheer stubbornness and grit.

One day, two days, three days, four days…

And finally, today—ten days later.

The sound startled Jeok Cheongang, who had been nodding off against a rock. He jolted awake.

“W-what happened?”

Damn old man. He was always going on about how martial artists shouldn’t waste time sleeping, yet he slept like a baby while I was going through hell?

Grinding my teeth, I walked toward him.

“Can’t you tell by looking? I climbed Mount Jiuhua within one shichen.[1299] I succeeded!”

“Huh? Why are you climbing Mount Jiuhua?”

“What?”

Jeok Cheongang blinked, then hastily shook his head.

“Ah, no. You did pretty well.”

“And?”

“It seems you’re ready for the next stage. I’ve already made the preparations, so take care of it yourself.”

I turned my head toward where his finger was pointing.

Propped against a massive rock was a vest—a huge, incredibly thick vest made of iron.

My fingertips began to tremble despite myself.

“…Is this what I think it is?”

“What were you thinking?”

“That I’m supposed to put this on and repeat exactly what I’ve been doing until now.”

“You rascal. What a joke.”

“Right? Wow, you scared the hell out of me.”

“Ha-ha. What an adorable imagination you have.”

Jeok Cheongang chuckled with the amiable smile of a kindly neighborhood grandfather, then continued.

“If you’ve managed one thing, you should accomplish at least two the next time. Come to think of it, one shichen[1300] was far too generous.”

“What?”

“I’ll give you half a shichen.[1301] Hurry up, pick it up, put it on, and get back here.”

Chapter 235

The training Jeok Cheongang put me through was simple.

Take a horse stance beneath the waterfall. Do push-ups. Go fetch me some bird eggs because I feel like eating them…

That much was fine. The problem was the conditions tacked onto every exercise.

“Six shichen[1302] in a horse stance.”

“You’re joking, right?”

“Does it sound like I’m joking?”

Whoosh!

The waterfall plunged hundreds of jang[1303]. Even with my exceptional physique, a single shichen beneath it left my entire body aching as though it had been smashed apart and my vision swimming.

And he wanted me to stay there for six shichen. In a horse stance, no less.

“Old Master, this is a bit much. If I stay under there for six shichen, I’ll actually die.”

“Have you tried it?”

“Huh?”

“Try it before you say that. If you don’t like it, go back to your family.”

It took me ten full days to complete the Quest.

As a side effect, I briefly lost consciousness. When I opened my eyes again, the iron balls had grown heavier.

“An additional hundred geun[1304]. From now on, we’re increasing it to twelve shichen.”

“…”

For a moment, I considered using Logout.

But I had to finish the training. It might have looked foolish to others, but it was a rule I had set for myself when I began.

If I go back, my body and mind will grow lax.

Whoosh!

The pressure of the waterfall was terrifying. With my internal energy and physical abilities restricted, I had to endure with nothing but my body and sheer willpower.

When I finally completed the waterfall training, I was left with legs harder than steel—and an unexpected System notification.

The training continued without pause. I wasn't given any time to rest.

I got one shichen of blissful sleep each day. Everything else was part of my training.

"Next are push-ups."

"That's too easy. Wait. How many?"

"Ten thousand. Put the iron balls on your back."

"..."

It was the most hellish push-up routine in the world. But I gritted my teeth and did it.

On the day I completed every kind of push-up Jeok Cheongang wanted, the year's first sprouts were pushing up from the ground.

"The weather has grown warm. I feel like having a swallow's nest dish[1305] for once, so go fetch one."

"Aren't swallows migratory birds? They won't arrive until it gets warmer."

"What would an ignorant brat like you know? This old man has lived on Mount Jiuhua his entire life. By now, a few impatient swallows should be starting to build their nests."

"Whew. Where am I supposed to look for them?"

"Cliffs."

That Quest took the longest. I had to find a swallow's nest without even knowing where one might be.

By then, I was combing every cliff on Mount Jiuhua while laden with iron balls whose combined weight had long since surpassed a thousand geun[1306].

At last, I found a newly completed swallow's nest and brought it to Jeok Cheongang.

"Here it is. A swallow's nest."

His long silence was followed by a single muttered sentence that was more than enough to snap the last thread of my patience.

[1305] Edible bird's nest is an East Asian delicacy traditionally made with nests built by swiftlets.

[1306] A geun is a traditional Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb).

"...It really exists."

"You fucking old bastard!"

My eyes rolled back, and I lunged at Jeok Cheongang. He beat me within an inch of my life.

When I came to again, the iron balls had grown heavier. That was only natural.

"If you're awake, get moving."

"Is this a new training routine?"

"It is. In a sense."

Jeok Cheongang thrust an insane schedule in front of me.

It included every single thing I had done so far, without exception.

"Three round trips up and down Mount Jiuhua in the morning, ten thousand one-armed push-ups on each side at noon. Climb the cliffs, then hold a horse stance beneath the waterfall... Human, are you insane?"

"Another five hundred geun[1307] if you don't like it."

"I've actually wanted to spend every day like this for a long time. I'll be right back."

"Good."

From then on, I did whatever he told me.

I wondered if it was even possible, but once I tried it, it turned out to be possible.

A day passes quickly when your body is exhausted. The more intense the training became, the faster time flew.

The frozen ground thawed, and fresh sprouts emerged.

Two months passed, but my daily routine remained unchanged. The only differences were that the training had become more brutal and the iron balls had grown heavier.

Rustle.

Flowers and grass that had already grown tall brushed against my calves.

High on a peak of Mount Jiuhua, now awash in color, Jeok Cheongang groggily opened his eyes. He had been asleep with his back against a tree.

"Is that you?"

"Who else would come looking for you besides me?"

"I thought you were the Grim Reaper."

"I think even the Grim Reaper would run away in fear."

Jeok Cheongang let out a short laugh at my wisecrack.

"You grow more flattering by the day."

[1307] A geun is a traditional Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb).

“Yes, and you’ve been sleeping more by the day, Old Master.”

Just as I said, Jeok Cheongang had been sleeping much more often lately. Given his age, perhaps it was only natural.

“I was training.”

“Ah. In your dreams?”

“I was merely resting my eyes.”

“You were snoring.”

“…Ahem. More importantly, what are you doing here instead of training?”

“I’m finished.”

“Already?”

Jeok Cheongang’s eyes widened slightly.

“I wasn’t slacking off, so don’t give me that suspicious look.”

“Who said anything? Fine. Shut your mouth and work on your fists and feet.”

“Yes, sir.”

I promptly took up a stance in a nearby clearing.

Unlike with the spear, I was practically a beginner when it came to fists and feet, so I was still working on the fundamentals.

“You know what you’re supposed to do, right?”

“Yes, yes.”

Ding.

I began with the simplest straight punch.

Each movement came with the insane requirement of a thousand repetitions, but compared to everything I had already done, it was easy.

The fact that I think this is easy means I’m going insane too.

I let out a deep sigh and began throwing punches.

Whoosh! Bam!

The wind split around my fists, and compressed air burst outward.

In the past, I had simply relied on strength, speed, and internal energy. Now I could execute each movement precisely and control the amount of force behind it.

Clatter!

How long had I listened to the chains connected to my wrists sway and rattle? I kept driving my fists into an imaginary point without pause until I heard a System notification in my ear.

Ding.

“Old Master. I’m finished.”

“…”

“Old Master.”

“Uh… huh?”

He snapped awake and looked up at me.

“What is it?”

“I finished the fist-and-foot training.”

“What did you finish?”

“The fist-and-foot training. Fists and feet!”

“What are you talking about?”

“You told me to do it about a shichen ago.”

Jeok Cheongang furrowed his brow.

“What kind of nonsense are you spouting?”

Jeok Cheongang was about to erupt in anger when he suddenly closed his mouth.

For an instant, unknowable emotions passed across his wrinkled face. After a long silence, he finally spoke.

“You’re a perceptive one. If you’ve figured it out, go practice your fists and feet some more.”

Ding. A notification appeared, telling me that another Quest had been created, but I didn’t move an inch.

I stared at Jeok Cheongang for a long moment before suddenly opening my mouth.

“Old Master. I just want to ask you something.”

Jeok Cheongang’s shrewd gray eyes trembled.

The suspicion that had crossed my mind—Could it be?—hardened into certainty.

“Are you feeling unwell?”

It wasn’t an easy subject to bring up, so I had phrased it indirectly. But there was no doubt he understood what I meant.

After a suffocating silence, a sigh-like word escaped Jeok Cheongang’s lips.

“…Follow me. There is somewhere we need to go together.”

Dementia.

Even in the modern world, with all its advances in magical medicine, dementia remained impossible to cure completely.

Its progression could only be slowed. Everyone was equal before the curse of time.

Why didn’t I realize it?

Thinking back, there had definitely been warning signs. He had been sleeping more with each passing day, and I had noticed bouts of forgetfulness like the one just now several times before.

Even so, I hadn’t been particularly suspicious because he wasn’t an ordinary old man.

Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

I had never imagined that a Supreme Peak master whose martial arts had reached the heavens could suffer from the infirmities of old age.

Perhaps it was a truth that even Jeok Cheongang himself wanted to deny.

“The history of our sect stretches back hundreds of years.”

Jeok Cheongang’s voice echoed through the cave.

It was as hot and humid as a steam sauna inside, and the heat intensified the deeper we went.

I had already been staying on Mount Jiuhua for more than two months, but I had never once visited this place.

“Our founding ancestor was the greatest under heaven of his era. However, his forthright nature earned him many enemies.”

His calm voice continued like flowing water.

He told me the history of the Fire Gate Clan from its founding to the present day.

From the first Sect Leader to Jeok Cheongang’s master, the seventeenth Sect Leader.

Some had ventured into the Murim and made their names known throughout the world. Others had spent their entire lives secluded in the countryside, quietly raising their successors.

Countless sects had disappeared over the past several hundred years, but the Fire Gate Clan had preserved its lineage.

“Even that became uncertain in this old man’s generation. It is all due to my lack of virtue.”

After about half an hour, we finally stopped walking.

By then, my entire body was drenched in sweat from the heat radiating beyond a moss-covered stone gate.

“This place is…”

“The Fire Gate Cavern. This is where our sect began, and where its legacy continues.”

Jeok Cheongang gazed at the stone gate with a nostalgic expression before placing his palm against its surface.

The instant the Scorching Yang Qi flowing from his fingertips touched the gate, an intricately engraved sun emblem began to glow. The firmly sealed stone door slowly slid open.

“…Whoa.”

I stared into the Fire Gate Cavern, entranced.

The space was several times larger than the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s training hall. Seventeen urns stood around a blue-white flame.

It wasn’t difficult to guess what they contained.

The former Sect Leaders of the Fire Gate Clan.

They were probably funeral urns holding their remains. As if confirming my guess, Jeok Cheongang immediately prostrated himself before them.

“Your unworthy Disciple, Jeok Cheongang, pays his respects to the Sect Ancestors.”

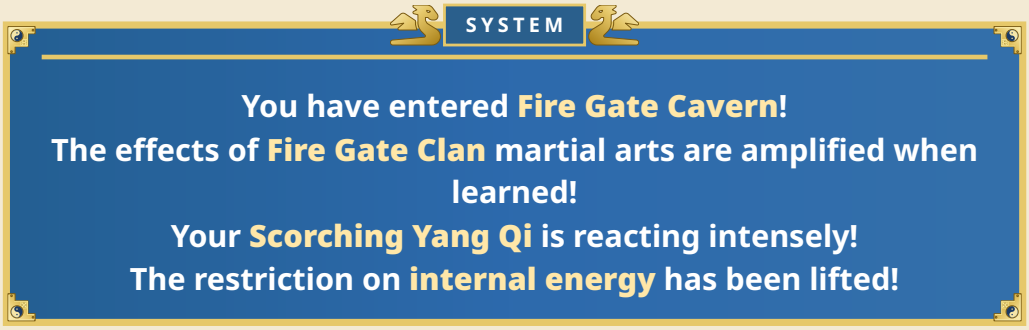
He rose and beckoned to me.

“Come in.”

“Ah, yes. Excuse me.”

The instant I carefully stepped into the Fire Gate Cavern, a System notification pierced my ears.

Ding.



Hummm.

The internal energy in my dantian, awakened from its long slumber, spread through my limbs and body.

Seeing my astonishment, Jeok Cheongang spoke as though he had expected this.

“Your internal energy comes from the Blazing Flame Divine Pill. It is only natural that it would react to the Fire Gate Cavern.”

It found its roots. Is that it?

It was a strange feeling. My internal energy surged like a living creature, and my heart pounded along with it. Though this was my first time setting foot here, the place felt strangely familiar.

“Sit.”

We sat facing each other with the flame between us.

Beyond the blue-white fire, Jeok Cheongang’s face looked noticeably older.

“I will pass on our sect’s martial arts to you.”

“…!”

“What? Did you think I would suddenly tell you to become my Disciple?”

“To be honest… yes, I did.”

“A master and Disciple are not bound together out of necessity or coercion. Besides, this old man already suffers from the infirmities of old age. Learning from me will place you in great danger as well.”

Everything Jeok Cheongang said was perfectly reasonable.

If he became confused about the formula of an internal cultivation technique, if he forgot even a single word, I would cross an irreversible river.

The river of qi deviation—or death.

“Can you learn martial arts from someone like me?”

I took a deep breath.

Only after turning it over from every angle did I finally reach a single conclusion.

“I will.”

"I'll say it again…"

"I trust you, Old Master. That's enough."

For a moment, Jeok Cheongang was speechless as indescribable emotions crossed his face.

Then a smile spread across his wrinkled lips.

"Then we are alike in that regard."

One-person succession, passed only to the worthy.

For hundreds of years, the Fire Gate Clan's legacy had been entrusted to a single talented individual who could be trusted not to use it for evil.

The fact that Jeok Cheongang had brought me here, to the Fire Gate Cavern, meant that he already trusted me.

Fire King Jeok Cheongang trusts me. He chose me. He intends to pass everything the Fire Gate Clan has to me.

My heart swelled at the thought. As though it had sensed my emotions, the blue-white flame surged violently.

Ding.

Along with the System notification, Jeok Cheongang reached out his hand. As Seizing an Object Through Empty Space took effect, the lid of a dark metal box that had risen from the flames opened.

I read the title of the old book floating toward me.

"Fire Gate Divine Technique…"

I knew instinctively that this martial art was the foundation of the Fire Gate Clan—practically its entire legacy.

Jeok Cheongang had risen to his feet and now stood directly behind me.

"We'll begin at once, so sit cross-legged and close your eyes. From now on, circulate your energy according to the formula I teach you."

I followed his instructions and closed my eyes. In the darkness, the blue-white flame seemed to flicker before me.

At last, Jeok Cheongang's voice pierced my ears.

"What about your fist-and-foot training?"

"…Huh?"

"Did you finish your training and start slacking off? Wait, fuck, that startled me. This is the Fire Gate Cavern. What the hell is this?"

"…!"

Oh, fuck. Dementia…

After that day, the two people who had caused such a commotion on Mount Jiuhua for some time vanished without a trace.

While they were gone, the trees sprouted green leaves, the flowers bloomed in full, and the swallows built their nests along the cliffs.

From green, to autumn foliage, and then to white snow.

Until Mount Jiuhua changed its clothes three times.

Chapter 236

The man gazed at the Four Treasures of the Study, neatly arranged before him.

The brush was made from sable fur, the inkstone from bluish jade, and the ink and paper were tribute goods said to be used by the royal family of Haedong,[1308] ten thousand li[1309] away.

Every piece was of the finest quality, beyond the means of anyone but the wealthiest.

“Excellent. Simply excellent.”

A satisfied smile spread across his face. The man was famous for his frugality, and the Four Treasures of the Study were the one luxury he allowed himself.

“Well, then. Shall we begin?”

Just as he began happily grinding his ink, the door opened and someone strode toward him without hesitation.

“Anyone who saw you would think you were a Hanlin Academician.[1310]”

The uninvited guest was a martial artist covered in dust.

He had narrow, sharply slanted eyes and a well-worn sword at his waist. At the sight of him, the man made a show of hardening his expression.

“A Hanlin Academician?[1311] I’d rather you call me a master painter.”

“You still paint?”

“It’s my only pleasure.”

“Unfortunately, you don’t exactly look the part. Would you care to learn some martial arts from me?”

“I must respectfully decline. This is as far as my abilities as a martial artist will ever take me.”

“What a shame. You lack the qualities a martial artist ought to possess.”

“It doesn’t matter. I have a subordinate who’s astonishingly good with a sword. Why else would his epithet be Ghost Sword?”

At the man’s sly response, the uninvited guest’s expression slowly relaxed.

A moment later, as if by prior agreement, they both let out quiet laughs.

“My lord, you haven’t changed.”

“Neither have you, Wipeng.”

They had not seen each other in four whole months, making the reunion all the more welcome.

[1308] Haedong is a traditional name for Korea.

[1309] A Chinese li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

[1310] A Hanlin Academician was a scholar appointed to an imperial Chinese court.

[1311] A Hanlin Academician was a scholar appointed to an imperial Chinese court.

Jin Wikyung, the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, smiled broadly as he clapped Wipeng on the shoulder.

"What brings you here without any warning? The messenger pigeon said you wouldn't arrive until noon tomorrow."

"The Jin Dragon Squad can manage perfectly well without me."

The Jin Dragon Squad was currently the Jin Family of Taiyuan's foremost fighting force.

It had been established only a year ago, but every member possessed impressive martial skills, and their loyalty to the family was even greater.

The fact that Wipeng, Jin Wikyung's trusted subordinate, served as its Commander spoke volumes about the squad's standing.

"You didn't slip away on your own without telling anyone, did you? You are the Commander."

"Of course not. I left that Hyuk fellow in charge. He'll manage just fine."

"The acting Deputy Commander?"

"Yes."

"This was his first mission, wasn't it? What did you think after watching him?"

Wipeng's eyebrow twitched.

He had thought he was getting used to Hyuk Mujin, but merely thinking about the man made his head ache.

Still, merit was merit, and personal feelings were personal. He answered with a sigh.

"He's useful enough. Aside from the fact that he never stops running his mouth."

"I already had some idea, but he sounds even more cheerful than I expected."

"He's so goddamn cheerful it's a problem."

"What about everything else?"

"…If you teach him one thing at a time, he learns quickly."

"If you're saying that, he must possess considerable martial talent."

A year earlier, Hyuk Mujin had been granted the honor of joining the Jin Dragon Squad in recognition of his service.

Naturally, Jin Taekyung's influence had also played a part in that decision.

That fellow is better than he looks. Try training him.

Jin Wikyung had always had a soft spot for his younger brothers.

Thinking Taekyung might be right, he had placed Hyuk Mujin in the Jin Dragon Squad and assigned Wipeng to train him. Sure enough, the young man's skills improved by the day.

His cheeky, easygoing nature helped him get along well with the other members, and there was no question about his loyalty.

"Ha-ha-ha! As expected of our youngest—he has an eye for people."

Jin Wikyung laughed heartily. At some point, a bottle of liquor had appeared in his hand.

He filled a cup to the brim, handed it over, and spoke.

“In any case, you’ve worked hard. So, is everything in Northern Gaoyuan settled now?”

“Yes. There shouldn’t be any trouble for at least the next ten years.”

The stabilization of Northern Gaoyuan.

That was why Wipeng had been away from the Jin Family of Taiyuan for the past four months.

Jin Wikyung believed that to become the true hegemon of Shanxi Province, he first needed to subjugate Gaoyuan’s mounted bandits. After months of secret and meticulous preparation, he had unleashed his sharpest weapon against them.

The sword known as Ghost Sword Wipeng.

“We attacked from seven directions, and they collapsed without putting up any meaningful resistance.”

The Murim of Shanxi—particularly the sects and merchant groups in the northern region, which had suffered the worst damage—welcomed the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s bold decision and actively cooperated.

The so-called Seven-Route Army was formed with Wipeng and the Jin Dragon Squad at its forefront. With the merchants’ full support, they were equipped with quality weapons and warhorses.

Powerful reinforcements also joined the campaign.

“The Lower District Sect was frightening. I was reminded once again of how terrifying information can be.”

Having received a considerable share of the northern region’s interests immediately after the war, the Lower District Sect had welcomed Jin Wikyung’s decision with open arms.

Like the seasoned information merchants they were, they monitored the mounted bandits’ every move while spreading false information and laying traps.

Their thoroughness left even Jin Wikyung impressed.

“Everything in this world is put to different use depending on who wields it. The truly frightening one is Wolhwa. She isn’t meant to remain confined to Shanxi Province.”

“Is that so?”

“Can’t you tell from the results? Her true weapon isn’t her beauty. It’s her strategic mind.”

Two thousand.

That was the number of mounted bandits killed or captured in Northern Gaoyuan in that single day.

Seven battles broke out in seven different locations. After claiming seven victories, the army advanced without hesitation.

“After that, we killed or captured every mounted bandit we came across.”

Hundreds of crows wheeled through the sky, while perhaps ten times as many corpses lay scattered across the ground below.

By the time the Seven-Route Army’s horses finally came to a halt, five major mounted-bandit groups had been annihilated and more than ten others had surrendered.

“We had effectively achieved our objective by then.”

“I believe there’s more to the story.”

“Ah. You mean the nomads?”

“Exactly.”

Thanks to their swift, mobile strikes, the Seven-Route Army had suffered few casualties. But the successive battles had left them thoroughly exhausted.

That was when thousands of nomads appeared amid a massive cloud of dust.

“To be honest, even I felt dizzy when I saw them.”

There were thousands of them, and every single one was a master of mounted combat.

No matter how seasoned a Peak master Wipeng was, he had no way to turn the tide of battle alone.

“That was when the incident I reported earlier in my missive occurred.”

“You mean the ones who called themselves khans?”

The great nomadic empire that had once ruled even the Central Plains had long since faded into distant history. But the conquerors’ bloodline had not died out, and neither had the title of khan.

“There were two of them. They came forward first and introduced themselves…”

“Temur and Chinggen, descendants of the Great Khan and members of the Golden Clan.[1312]”

“Exactly.”

Wipeng nodded.

The young chieftains of the steppe had each arrived with two thousand riders. They were neither aggressive nor arrogant.

Instead, they cautiously attempted to converse in halting Korean.

“Is there anyone among you from the Jin Family of Taiyuan?”

The battle everyone had expected never took place.

All because of the name of the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

[1312] The Golden Clan is a traditional name for the ruling lineage descended from the khans.

“The rumor had already reached Gaoyuan. They knew about the relationship between Great Hero Jeok and the Third Young Master, and said they had no wish to become our enemies.”

“That is precisely what puzzles me. It seems rather suspicious that they would back down merely because of the Fire King’s reputation.”

“Ah, that? It didn’t sit right with me either, so I beat the truth out of the mounted-bandit prisoners.”

Wipeng grinned as he continued.

“They’d already been taught a harsh lesson last winter. Great Hero Jeok killed two notorious mounted-bandit leaders from Gaoyuan—Black Sand and the Human Butcher—with a single palm strike. Temur and Chinggen were both there.”

“They were frightened.”

“On the other hand, it benefited them as well. Once the leaders were dead, the mounted-bandit remnants fell into chaos. Temur and Chinggen absorbed them and grew as powerful as they are now.”

Temur and Chinggen had been lucky.

Black Sand and the Human Butcher had died in the same place, and not long afterward, even the Heavenly Wind Band had been annihilated by Jeok Cheongang. A power vacuum had formed.

After swallowing up the mounted-bandit remnants and gathering the scattered nomads, the two men had risen to become powers in Gaoyuan in the span of only a year.

“They said they wanted to remain on friendly terms from now on. They even loaded us down with furs and plundered gold and silver.”

“What? Ha-ha-ha!”

Jin Wikyung burst into delighted laughter.

The outcome could not have been better.

The campaign had further strengthened the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s fame and standing in the Shanxi Murim while also winning the support of its affiliated sects and the common people.

“You’ve worked hard. Much of the credit belongs to you.”

“I don’t know about that, but I do know my cup is empty.”

“Ha-ha! Then let’s drink until we’re both thoroughly drunk tonight.”

The two men traded cups and stories.

So much had happened over the past year that they had no shortage of things to discuss.

“Oh, right. What happened to the Seongun Escort Bureau?”

“We finished dealing with it completely right after you left. Though I suppose we should call it the Jin Family Escort Bureau now.”

Woo Hwangtae, chief of the Seongun Escort Bureau, had fled with his family, taking only a paltry sum with them. It had been discovered that they had bribed several officials and secretly diverted military supplies.

Prince Shangshan, Zhu Bao, an ardent admirer of Jin Taekyung, had of course provided considerable help during the process.

“Our cooperation with the other sects is progressing smoothly as well. An escort caravan traveling through Mount Song to Hefei is already under way.”

“Mount Song and Hefei…?”

“Shaolin and Namgung. It was too good an offer to refuse.”

Shaolin, the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim, and the Namgung Family, counted among the foremost of the Five Great Families.

Both were such enormous powers that Jin Wikyung would have been satisfied merely to establish trade with them. Instead, they had approached him first—and offered extremely generous terms at that.

“Great Hero Jeok’s presence has been a tremendous help to our family.”

Jin Wikyung merely smiled at Wipeng’s remark.

He firmly believed that in the Murim, at least, no favor came without a price.

Their goodwill contained the price of two people.

One was the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

The other was the value of Jin Taekyung, a Sleeping Dragon.

Come to think of it, it’s already been a year since our youngest left.

It had been a year filled with countless hardships and events.

Once the ground thawed, the Star-Array Grand Banquet would be held in Henan. The brothers would meet again there.

Are you staying safe?

Jin Wikyung raised his cup, thinking of his thoughtless youngest brother, who had not contacted him even once. Just then, Wipeng spoke.

“By the way, what were you planning to paint this time?”

“I wonder.”

“You were grinding ink without even deciding what to paint?”

“It happens from time to time. I often spend one or two shichen[1313] grinding ink, only to put everything away again.”

“Huh. Are you truly trying to become a master painter now?”

“Put that thought aside for now. But once this painting is complete, I think I’d be happy to be called a master painter.”

“Didn’t you just say you hadn’t decided what to paint?”

[1313] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

“It’s merely that I can’t quite picture what it will look like. I decided on the title long ago.”

“Then what is this magnificent work called?”

Jin Wikyung answered with a smile.

“The Sleeping Dragon Enters Service.”

He was a young man in shabby clothes.

His long, loose hair reached his shoulder blades, and thick stubble covered his chin and upper lip.

The crowning touch was the iron balls dangling from all four limbs, making him look like a convict in a forced-labor camp.

Yet one thing about him was different.

His eyes.

The young man stared into the blue-white flame with a gaze of unfathomable depth, then muttered,

“Ah. This would be the perfect place to grill some meat.”

The next instant—

Fwoosh! Smack!

With a savage crack of displaced air, a wrinkled palm slammed into the back of the young man’s head.

“What an insolent brat! How dare you even think of grilling meat over our sect’s sacred flame!”

The old man was beside himself with rage, but the young man merely grumbled.

“Ah, why not? It should be fine if I just stick it in for a second and pull it right back out.”

“What did you say?”

“You’ve never heard of kiln-roasted pork belly? It’s insanely good.”

“You—you’re dead today!”

Smack! Crash!

On an early spring day, as the earth thawed and fresh shoots poked their heads aboveground, peaceful Mount Jiuhua began to grow noisy.

Chapter 237

Jeok Cheongang roared at the top of his lungs.

“You’re a disgrace to our sect!”

“No, I’m not.”

“What do you mean, you’re not? In all the hundreds of years of the Fire Gate Clan’s history, there has never been a bastard who wanted to grill meat over the sacred flame!”

“That’s not what I meant.”

“What?”

“I’m not an official Disciple yet. So I can’t be a disgrace to the Fire Gate Clan.”

“…!”

His face turned bright red, as though it might burst at any moment.

Before he could shout even louder, I quickly slung my pack over my shoulder.

“If there’s nothing else to pack, let’s get out of here.”

“Y-you little…”

Jeok Cheongang’s fist trembled, but after a moment, he let out a deep sigh.

This was hardly the first time something like this had happened over the past year. Even the famously short-tempered Fire King had reached the point where he simply took it in stride.

Ah, I’m so proud.

I had actually managed to beat the Fire King at something. Somehow, it felt like I had accomplished something incredible.

After glaring at my foolish grin, he turned toward the seventeen ancestral urns and bowed deeply.

“Your unworthy Disciple, Jeok Cheongang, will take his leave. Until then, please remain in good health.”

“Shouldn’t you wish them Buddhahood?”

“…And here, I swear that I will turn that bastard into a proper human being.”

Having firmly renewed his resolve before the seventeen former Sect Leaders, Jeok Cheongang rose to his feet.

“Come. Let’s go, you beast.”

“Wait a moment.”

I slowly looked around the enormous cavern.

This was where I had spent the past year. There had been times when the pain was enough to make me think I would die, and there had been happy moments too. Sometimes, I had been so sick of the place that I wanted to smash through the stone gate and run outside that very instant.

But when had it happened?

Little by little, everything had become familiar, and the happy days had begun to outnumber the painful ones.

Even the tremendous heat pouring from the blue-white flame now felt as warm and cozy as home.

“What are you thinking about so intently?”

“Just…”

What was I supposed to call this feeling?

After a moment’s thought, the words slipped out.

“I was thinking meat would taste really good grilled over that.”

“You little bastaaard!”

Dodging Jeok Cheongang as he flew into a rage, I placed my hand against the stone gate. As I channeled the internal energy from my dantian into it, the tightly sealed door slowly slid open.

SYSTEM

Scorching Sun Divine Arts internal energy detected.
You may freely enter and exit Fire Gate Cavern!

Take care.

Thanks for everything over the past year.

And…

Your unworthy Disciple, Jin Taekyung, will take his leave.

I raced out of the wide-open cavern like the wind. The iron balls dangling from my limbs whipped around like pinwheels.

Mount Jiuhua had been famous since ancient times for its spiritual energy.

With auspicious energy filling the entire mountain, it was only natural for spiritual herbs such as ginseng and He Shou Wu[1314] to grow there. To herbalists, the mountain was no different from a gold mine.

“Just you wait. Today, I’m finding one.”

At the foot of Mount Jiuhua, a middle-aged herbalist with the surname Hong pulled the strings of his straw sandals tight.

He had traveled all the way from Sichuan in hopes of striking it rich, only to spend more than fifteen days coming up empty-handed.

[1314] He Shou Wu is a plant used in traditional Chinese medicine, also known as fo-ti.

"Damn it. What happened to all the spiritual herbs? It's like every last one has vanished…"

The herbalists who had come with him had already given up and gone home. They had searched everywhere from the foot of Mount Jiuhua to halfway up the mountain without finding a single ginseng root.

There might have been a chance farther up, but something more terrifying than any wild beast lived there.

The Fire King.

Even martial artists who killed people as casually as they ate meals trembled at the mere mention of his name.

Hong had once heard that the Fire King had single-handedly torn apart and killed a thousand vicious fiends of the terrifying Demonic Cult.

When he had asked how such a thing was possible, he had been told that the Fire King was a three-headed, six-armed monster.

But they said it's safe as long as I don't go past the midpoint. Don't be scared, Hong. You have eight mouths to feed.

To cover the cost of coming this far, his wife had even been forced to sell the silver ring she had received as a wedding gift. How could he face her if he went home empty-handed?

Smack! Smack!

The herbalist slapped his cheeks to steel his resolve, then began climbing the mountain.

Less than two shichen later,[1315] he encountered the strangest sight he had ever seen.

"So what is samgyeopsal?"

"You don't know pork belly? Is it called something else here?"

"No, you impudent brat. Just where are you from that you keep going on about what things are called?"

"I'm from Korea! Do you know kimchi?"[1316]

"…You grow more insane by the day. Is there something wrong with your Fire Gate Divine Technique?"

A wild-haired freak and a tiny old man were walking down the mountain path, having an incomprehensible conversation.

The pair looked strange enough already, but as they drew closer, the herbalist heard a series of thunderous noises and his eyes widened.

Clank. Rattle. Boom! Rattle-rattle. Boom!

W-what in the world is that?

[1315] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; two shichen are approximately four hours.

[1316] Kimchi is a Korean dish of fermented vegetables, often napa cabbage.

The source of the heavy noises was the iron balls chained to the freak's limbs.

The smaller ones were as large as a child's head, while the larger ones were big enough to fit inside a basket.

With dozens of such vicious objects dangling from his body, the herbalist had no choice but to be shocked.

What am I looking at?

The herbalist stared blankly at the sight, then suddenly jolted.

Two pairs of eyes had drawn close enough to stare directly into his face.

Up close, the freak had a thick beard, while the old man's face was covered in blotches and more wrinkles than he could count.

"Gyaaaah!"

As the herbalist nearly suffered a fit, the tiny old man addressed him.

"Hey."

"Y-yes?"

"Where are you headed?"

"I-I'm going to dig up medicinal herbs."

The herbalist barely managed to squeeze out the words.

He didn't know why, but instinct told him that something terrible would happen if he failed to answer.

The old man looked him up and down, then clicked his tongue.

"You've wasted your time. Don't put yourself through all that for nothing. Go home."

"W-wasted my time?"

Despite his terror, the herbalist instantly snapped to attention.

Go home? If he returned empty-handed now, he would have wasted nearly two months of his life.

With the heavy load on his shoulders, that was absolutely unacceptable.

This old man is no ordinary person.

It wasn't just his unusual appearance. Even his manner of speaking made it sound as though he could see through all the affairs of the world.

The thought flashed through the herbalist's mind like lightning, and he collapsed to his knees.

"Please help me just this once!"

"Good heavens, what's gotten into you? What could this old man possibly do to help?"

"No! You're the Mountain Spirit! You already know everything, don't you?"

Bafflement spread across the old man's face.

"…What spirit?"

"Mountain Spiriiit!"

The freak beside him clutched his stomach and burst out laughing.

"Puhahaha! He thinks you're a Mountain Spirit. Old Master, wasn't it three months ago that you forgot the formula while circulating your qi and nearly became a ghost?"

Wham! Craaack!

The freak was still roaring with laughter when a single punch from the old man sent him flying dozens of jang[1317] away, where he crashed into the ground.

The herbalist's faith only deepened.

The Mountain Spirit subdued the evil spirit!

It was only natural to trust the white-haired old man more than the ragged freak. The herbalist pleaded once more.

"Mountain Spirit! Please help me just this once!"

"Mountain Spirit, my ass. And there's nothing this old man can do for you. I already pulled them all up, so what do you expect me to do?"

"P-pulled them up? Who pulled up all the spiritual herbs on Mount Jiuhua?"

"Now you're finally making sense."

"W-who would do such a thing…?"

The old man clasped his hands behind his back and gazed toward the distant mountain.

"My, what fine weather."

"…"

"What are you staring at? Whoever pulls them up first gets to keep them."

Despair crossed the herbalist's face. Only then did he realize that the old man before him was no immortal.

"Then are you an herbalist too, Elder?"

"Hm? Well, I was for a few days. Digging up medicinal herbs is rather difficult."

"You tear people's heads off easily enough."

The evil spirit—or rather, the freak—had returned and casually joined the conversation while dusting off his clothes.

His manner and tone were so nonchalant that the massive trees snapped apart behind him might as well not have existed.

"My ancestors always said there was no point feeding spiritual herbs to a Disciple. They were absolutely right."

"Buuurp."

"You son of a—!"

[1317] A jang is a traditional length unit of approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

A dreadful pressure poured from the old man's clenched fist. At last, the herbalist realized what the two men were.

"M-m-martial artists!"

"Now that you understand, give up and go home. And be careful not to spread unnecessary rumors."

The freak also offered his advice with a serious expression.

"Whatever you do, don't go any farther up. They say a monster named Fire King Jeok Cheongang lives there. If he catches you, he'll chew you up, tear you apart, savor you, and enjoy you while you're still alive—then kill you."

"…!"

"…!"

It was horrifying even to imagine. The herbalist shuddered as he pictured his own gruesome death.

Judging by the old man's similar reaction, this Fire King Jeok Cheongang had to be exactly what Hong had heard: a three-headed, six-armed monster.

"Understood? Make sure you remember what I told you."

"Y-yes, I understand."

That was the only answer the herbalist could give.

Someone had already beaten him to the herbs, and the two men before him were martial artists. If he made a nuisance of himself, he might lose his head.

His shoulders sagged as he stepped aside to let them pass.

"Oh, wait. Sir, if this is good enough, would you like it?"

Swish.

The freak rummaged through his pack and suddenly held out a ginseng root about three finger joints long.

Startled by the unexpected kindness, the herbalist asked in a trembling voice,

"W-why are you giving this to me?"

"If you go home like this, you'll have nothing to show for it. Judging by your age, you probably have a family to support too. Where did you come from?"

"S-Sichuan Province."

"Sichuan Province is fun, isn't it? I used to play it all the time during evening self-study.[1318]"

"Pardon?"

"Never mind. Anyway, you came a long way, so use this to help cover your travel expenses."

The old man, who had been silently watching, clicked his tongue.

[1318] In Korean, "Sichuan Province" (Sacheonseong) is also the name of a tile-matching game.

"You little fool. You give him something worth only a few coins, then act like you've made some grand gesture. If a man is going to be generous, he should give generously."

"Come on, that's all I have left. What else am I supposed to do?"

"You call that ginseng? At least exchange it for silver."

"How?"

"People determine the value of an object."

"Oh. I hadn't thought of that."

What kind of bizarre conversation was this?

As the herbalist looked back and forth between them, feeling as though he had been bewitched, the freak suddenly shouted at the top of his lungs.

"Anyone want to buy some ginseng?"

It was still early dawn. As the cold wind blew, the trees shuddered.

Then several dozen men appeared on the mountain path below, marching in orderly rows.

Blue martial uniforms and sword sheaths hung from their waists. At a glance, it was obvious that every one of them was a highly trained martial artist.

"Guh!"

The herbalist's mouth fell open, but the other two remained perfectly calm. The freak gently waved the ginseng root worth three silver nyang.[1319]

"I'll sell it for a hundred silver nyang.[1320]"

What a highway robber.

The herbalist swallowed the words that had risen to his throat. Just then, the middle-aged man at the head of the group spoke.

"I'll buy it."

"…!"

The shocks were not over. The old man let out a long yawn and casually added,

"Three hundred silver nyang.[1321] You're the richest man in Anhui, so you can afford that much."

The middle-aged man bowed deeply.

"That is a small price to pay for offending the Fire King. I'll buy it."

The freak grinned.

"Then may I ask the winning bidder's name?"

"Namgung Ryong."

The middle-aged man raised his head. The authority possessed only by a leader flashed in his deep-set eyes.

[1319] A silver nyang is a traditional unit of silver currency.
[1320] A silver nyang is a traditional unit of silver currency.
[1321] A silver nyang is a traditional unit of silver currency.

“I am the Family Head of the Namgung Family.”

Chapter 238

The Namgung Family.

It was one of the Five Great Families that ruled the Murim alongside the Nine Sects and One Gang.

Their blood relatives alone numbered over a hundred, and once the martial artists under their command were included, their numbers reached into the thousands.

Perhaps that was why the sheer scale of their estate put the Jin Family of Taiyuan to shame.

“Wow.”

How many times larger was it? Five times? Ten?

As if to demonstrate the family’s wealth and authority, the guest room we had been shown was both spacious and lavish.

Jeok Cheongang watched me gape in admiration as though I were pathetic.

“Is this your first time visiting the Namgung Family?”

“…Of course it is.”

“Ah, right.”

It wasn’t as though the Namgung Family were some neighborhood convenience store.

Normally, I would have made at least one more sarcastic remark, but not today.

I knew that Jeok Cheongang and the Namgung Family were not on particularly friendly terms.

All because that bastard Jopil left a pile of shit behind.

When a student did something wrong, the school called his parents.

The Namgung Family was indisputably a great power of the Murim and the hegemon of Anhui. They could hardly have avoided becoming entangled with Jeok Cheongang after he took as his Disciple a murderer who had brutally slain dozens of commoners within the province.

Then again, that’s probably why he came along without complaint.

Remembering something I had heard at an inn in Shanxi Province, I asked, “He was the Azure Sky Sword King, right? The person who came looking for you back then.”

“That’s right. He was the one who first informed me of what had happened, and he was also the one who later granted my request. I owe him a great debt.”

On the day Jeok Cheongang had been unable to bring himself to kill Jopil and let him go, if the Namgung Family had intervened, Jopil would never have made it out of Anhui alive.

The person Jeok Cheongang had gone to see at the time was the Grand Family Head of the Namgung Family, the Azure Sky Sword King.

"What kind of person is he?"

"I have only met him twice, but… the Sword King I know is truly a man obsessed with swords."

"Oh. A sword nut."

"A sword nut?"

"It means someone who's crazy about swords. It's a compliment, so let it go."

"There's no trusting anything you say."

Pretty sharp.

Jeok Cheongang gave me a suspicious glare, then continued.

"In any case, there is no doubt that he is an unpredictable man. He wanted a duel with this old man in exchange for sparing Jangcheon."

"A duel?"

"Can you guess what kind of man he is now?"

"Yeah, I'm getting a pretty clear picture."

A horrific series of murders had taken place in Anhui, yet the Grand Family Head of the Namgung Family—the hegemon of the province—had let the culprit go.

Setting aside the injustice suffered by the victims, it could not have been a welcome outcome for the Namgung Family either.

People would whisper that one of the Five Great Families was incompetent.

He really is a sword nut.

They said Supreme Peak masters trained endlessly for even the slightest scrap of enlightenment.

I had yet to meet the Azure Sky Sword King, but I suspected he was that kind of person.

That aside…

"Who won the duel?"

"The day after his duel with this old man, the Azure Sky Sword King entered seclusion."

"Oh."

"The difference was half a form."

In other words, Jeok Cheongang had won by the narrowest of margins.

Even fights between Third Rate martial artists could be decided by the smallest detail. What, then, of a battle between Supreme Peak masters? The outcome would be decided by a difference as thin as a single strand of silk.

"It happened more than twenty years ago, so he must be even stronger now. He was formidable even then, but I can no longer guarantee victory with any confidence."

I stared at Jeok Cheongang's solemn expression.

Even a man with such earth-shaking martial arts was only human.

I had realized that several times during the year we spent together in Fire Gate Cavern, and it had brought us closer.

The infirmities of old age.

A curse wrought by time that even a Supreme Peak master could not overcome.

Fortunately, a stroke of heavenly luck had eased his symptoms. But it had only slowed the wheel already in motion. It could not stop it completely.

Guessing how Jeok Cheongang felt, I put on my brightest expression.

“Come on, don’t worry too much. We didn’t come here to fight. We were simply invited to the Sword King’s birthday celebration.”

“Do you truly think that?”

“Hm?”

“Didn’t this old man tell you? He is obsessed with swords.”

“…!”

A thought flashed through my mind.

People obsessed with something paid no attention to the world around them. They immersed themselves in it—literally, madly—solely to satisfy their desires.

Alcohol, gambling, drugs… martial arts were no different.

It had been none other than the Azure Sky Sword King who released Jopil so that he could spar with Jeok Cheongang.

“Now that I think about it, the timing is awfully convenient.”

“He must have been waiting.”

“So his birthday is just an excuse?”

“The Azure Sky Sword King is the sort of man who could change his birthday hundreds of times. I suspect the only day that truly matters to him is the day he draws his last breath. That is when he will have no choice but to put down his sword.”

“…”

What the hell? That was terrifying.

The bastard wasn’t just a sword nut. He was completely insane.

I was rubbing the goose bumps from my arms when a delicate woman’s voice came from outside the door.

“The Family Head wishes to meet Young Hero Jin.”

Clank, boom. Clank, boom.

The chains clashed, and the iron balls gouged deep into the ground, leaving long tracks behind them.

I glanced back and saw that the entire route I had taken was marked by a line.

Is this Hansel and Gretel?

If the siblings in the fairy tale had possessed something like this, they would never have gotten lost.

Even if they had, there would have been no need to worry. I imagined Hansel strangling the witch with a Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron chain while Gretel smashed her in the back of the head with an iron ball, then shook my head.

"Ugh, no. That's not it."

"Young Hero Jin?"

The maid was looking at me as though I were insane. I waved my hand.

"No, it's nothing. Let's keep going."

"No, that's not what I meant…"

"Yes?"

"I-I beg your pardon, but those things you have with you are rather…"

"Ah."

The maid was pointing at my iron balls.

Apparently, I had done quite a number on someone else's courtyard.

Several sturdy servants had gathered by then, filling in the marks I had left with dirt while wearing gloomy expressions.

"I'm sorry. I'll just carry them, then."

Clank.

I gathered the chains together and lifted the iron balls.

I had weighed them faithfully during the first few months, but after that, I gave up. Whenever they got heavier, I simply assumed more weight had been added and left it at that.

They must weigh a hell of a lot by now.

In any case, there was no way I could cross the grounds of the Namgung Family like that without attracting attention.

To everyone else, I probably looked like a fruit seller hauling several dozen watermelons.

Every step brought more murmurs to my ears.

"Who is that guy? Have you heard anything?"

"No idea. With those iron balls chained to him, he looks like a prisoner."

"Can you really say he's chained to them?"

"…I suppose not."

"No one could possibly carry that many iron balls of that size. They must be weapons plated with iron."

"What on earth is he? Judging by his appearance, he's a beggar among beggars. At that level, he'd be an Elder even in the Beggars' Sect."

"He doesn't have any knots,[1322] so I don't think that's it…"

As I listened to the Namgung martial artists quietly debate among themselves, one thought crossed my mind.

You fucking bastards.

A beggar among beggars? An Elder of the Beggars' Sect?

That year in Fire Gate Cavern had been a literal hell of scorching heat.

If a sauna was dangerous to pregnant women and the elderly, Fire Gate Cavern was simply dangerous to human beings.

My sweat had formed puddles, and every breath had felt as though my lungs were burning away.

I'd even deliberately endured it without using Logout.

After going so long without washing, the habit had become so ingrained that I could no longer tell whether I smelled or whether insects were crawling over my body.

I should've washed as soon as we arrived.

If we had gone to the inn first, I could have soaked in hot water, but everything had gone wrong when we came straight to the Namgung Family.

Jeok Cheongang had been speaking so seriously about the Azure Sky Sword King. I couldn't exactly have told him I was going to scrub off some grime first.

"You bastards try it yourselves… It's not like you're going to scrub my back."

The maid's steps quickened after I muttered that. It was definitely my imagination.

A short while later, I arrived at a pavilion surrounded by tight security.

The Namgung Family's guards, each with the two characters for Azure Heaven embroidered across his chest, blocked my path.

"Are you Young Hero Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?"

I concealed my surprise and nodded.

There were ten guards. They ranged in age from their twenties to their forties, and every last one of them was a Peak master.

Good heavens. They were using ten Peak masters merely to guard a pavilion.

Is this why they're counted among the Five Great Families?

For the first time, I could truly feel the power and status of the Namgung Family.

Perhaps he noticed my reaction, because the youngest-looking guard let out a quiet laugh.

"Disarm yourself."

I suppressed my surprise and answered, "Disarm myself? I don't have any weapons on me."

"Then what do you call the things in your hands?"

[1322] In wuxia fiction, knots on a Beggars' Sect member's bags can indicate rank.

“Oh.”

Right. I had these.

If even a ballpoint pen could kill someone, the iron balls I was carrying certainly qualified as weapons.

To me, they were merely heavy clothes I had to wear, but other people saw them differently.

The problem was…

“I’m sorry, but I’m still training. I can’t just take them off whenever I want.”

“Training?”

“Yes.”

It wasn’t a lie. I had grown so accustomed to them that I saw no particular reason to remove the iron balls.

But the young guard looked thoroughly displeased.

“It can’t be helped. Rules are rules.”

“Well, then I can’t help it either.”

Clank.

I deliberately raised my hands and feet one after another.

Shackles were fastened tightly around all four limbs, and unusually gleaming chains connected them to the iron balls.

“These can’t be removed without a key.”

“Who has the key?”

“Of course, the Ol—no, my Master has it.”

“Your Master would be…”

A year had passed since Jeok Cheongang had publicly declared me his Disciple.

Even a servant would know that much. There was no way a Peak master could be unaware of it.

No matter how vast the continent was, the Fire King Jeok Cheongang was one of only a handful of Supreme Peak masters under heaven, and his every move attracted attention.

“Hmm.”

The young guard furrowed his brow as he looked back and forth between me and the iron balls. Then he abruptly said, “We’ll have to cut them off.”

“What?”

No, what the hell had he just said?

Even when I gave him an incredulous look, the young guard remained perfectly confident.

“The Namgung Family has its own rules. Great Hero Jeok will understand.”

“…Uh, I don’t think he will.”

Something Jeok Cheongang had always said in Fire Gate Cavern suddenly came to mind.

“This old man entered the Fire Gate Clan at the age of nine. Say a hundred people began learning martial arts at that age… This old man is the only one who grew as strong as I am now. So how do you think I came this far?”

“How?”

“I shoved aside bastards from the unorthodox factions, sent dark-path figures packing, and killed every bastard who set fires like a Demonic Cultist. In that spirit, add a hundred geun[1323] to the iron balls.”

It was a history written in blood and violence.

Even the Roaring Fury Swordsman, the Senior Brother of the Zhongnan Sect’s Sect Leader, had been beaten black and blue. I could only imagine what would happen to this young guard.

I offered him my most sincere advice.

“Do that and you’ll die. Seriously, you’ll be in real trouble.”

“…What did you say?”

“I mean, you won’t die by my hand.”

“How dare you—!”

The young guard shouted angrily and placed his hand on his sword hilt.

That was when a deep, resonant voice infused with internal energy reached everyone’s ears.

“Enough. Let him in.”

It was Namgung Ryong, Family Head of the Namgung Family.

[1323] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). A hundred geun is 60 kg (about 132 lb).

Chapter 239

Namgung Ryong was a sharp-featured middle-aged man.

As befitted the Family Head of the venerable martial household known as the Namgung Family, his dignified bearing radiated authority. His lips were pressed into a firm line, revealing something of his stern disposition.

In fact, despite traveling with him all the way from Mount Jiuhua to Hefei, I had heard him say fewer than ten words.

“Would you wait a moment? I have one important matter left to attend to.”

As the Family Head of the Namgung Family, he must have had a considerable workload.

I was used to that from watching Jin Wikyung, so I nodded without complaint.

“Ah, yes.”

Crunch!

Oh, right. I forgot about the iron balls.

The chair had shattered beneath me, unable to bear their weight. Still sitting amid the wreckage, I glanced at Namgung Ryong.

“Oops, what happened here? You should make your chairs a little sturdier…”

“It was made of ebony imported from Nanman.[1324] The wood is harder than steel.”

“…”

“Just stand.”

A short while later, Namgung Ryong set down the bamboo slips he had been carefully examining and spoke.

“I invited you here as a guest, yet I have treated you poorly. You have my apology.”

“No, it’s fine. You may have been busy.”

“I also owe you an apology for my son’s discourtesy.”

“What do you mean…?”

“I believe I heard some commotion.”

I suddenly remembered the young guard who had aggressively demanded that I disarm myself.

I wondered why the youngest one was acting so cocky…

“He’s your son?”

“He’s my only child, so I doted on him. Perhaps because of that, he still has many shortcomings.”

Yeah, he definitely has shortcomings.

Thinking of the bastard’s sour expression, I nodded.

[1324] Nanman is a historical Chinese term—often translated as “Southern Barbarians”—for peoples and territories south of the traditional Chinese heartland.

“…”

“Was there something else you wanted to say?”

“Ahem. No, nothing.”

“People around him kept filling his head with talk of his talent for martial arts. You’ve heard the title Sword Dragon, haven’t you?”

“The Sword Dragon?”

“So you have heard of him. Well, it would be impossible not to…”

“I’ve never heard of him before.”

“Oh.”

“That’s a cool title, though.”

“Is it…?”

A dark shadow passed over Namgung Ryong’s face.

“He is well known throughout the martial world as one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.”

“Oh, so he’s one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes. My second elder brother is one of them too.”

“I heard the two of them got into quite a fight as soon as they entered Heaven’s Gate Temple.”

“Good grief. They were young—very young. If they had just enrolled, they would’ve been twenty. That’s the age when people act like that.”

“…”

“It’s all right. People that age grow up by beating each other black and blue. But why did you call me here…?”

This man was definitely more of a doting fool than he looked.

Momentarily at a loss after my swift interruption, Namgung Ryong finally spoke.

“It concerns Great Hero Jeok.”

“That old—no, my Master?”

“That’s right.”

He nodded gravely before continuing.

“I’ll be direct. I want you to dissuade Great Hero Jeok.”

My relaxed posture stiffened on its own. I ran a hand over the beard that had grown thick over the past year and asked,

“Is this about his duel with the Azure Sky Sword King… Great Hero Namgung Cheon?”

“That’s right. Do you know what happened between Great Hero Jeok and my father more than twenty years ago?”

"I know roughly what happened. I also know that my Master won."

"It was by the narrowest of margins. The battle was balanced on a knife's edge. Either of them could have won."

Namgung Ryong sighed.

"My father must have been deeply resentful of that defeat. For several years afterward, he devoted himself to secluded training, stewing over it."

Defeat always cut deep.

And if the person in question was one of the greatest masters in the world—someone who loved martial arts enough to be called sword-crazed—the sense of loss would only be that much greater.

If his own son is talking about it like this, he must've been really pissed.

This would be a fight between Supreme Peak masters. Its intensity went without saying, and if things went too far, blood could easily be spilled.

If they had planned to calmly exchange a few moves, laugh good-naturedly, and withdraw, Namgung Ryong would have had no reason to bring this up.

The problem was…

"I'm not confident I can persuade my Master, either. No, I can't persuade him."

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was not the sort of man who would back down merely because someone tried to stop him.

The year I had spent in Fire Gate Cavern had taught me many things. Not only about martial arts, but also about the man beside me.

Jeok Cheongang was not a difficult man to read.

"He'd rather die than back down."

"You misunderstand me. I'm not saying you should do your best to stop them. I'm saying you must stop them."

Namgung Ryong stared at me.

"Do you know what will happen if something happens to either of them during this duel?"

"I can make a rough guess."

The Fire King and the Sword King. Both were giants who ruled over the martial world.

If the worst happened, the aftermath would be like a meteor crashing into the shore of a quiet lake.

"Then you shouldn't have brought us to the Namgung Family."

"That…"

"I know. You had no choice. But if even the Family Head can't persuade his father, what could I possibly do?"

I shook my head. Whatever else I said here would be pointless.

"I'll at least try talking to him."

“I’ll do my best as well. I should go see my father immediately.”

“I’m not sure that’ll do you any good…”

“What do you mean?”

“Nothing. Then I’ll be going.”

I gave the puzzled Namgung Ryong a polite bow and turned away.

As soon as I left the pavilion, I found the young guard—or rather, the Lesser Family Head of the Namgung Family, Sword Dragon Namgung Ok—waiting for me with his eyes blazing.

“You bastard!”

“Oh, what now? We’ve never even met before, so why do you keep calling me a bastard?”

“I heard everything from outside. How dare you treat my father with such disrespect? Do you think the great Namgung Family is a joke?”

“What disrespect? I showed him the utmost courtesy, just as I do my Master.”

“What kind of bullshit are you spouting?”

“I’m serious. If you’re that curious, ask my Master. Anyway, I’m leaving.”

I was about to drag the iron balls past Namgung Ok when—

“How dare you!”

Shing! Click!

It happened in an instant.

The blade, radiating a chilling sharpness, had not even been drawn halfway before it disappeared back into its scabbard.

Namgung Ok stared at my hand pressing down on his sword hilt.

“H-how did you…?”

“That isn’t something you should draw and swing around so casually. Keep doing that and you’ll get yourself killed.”

“…!”

“Act like a gentleman, young man.”

Pat, pat.

I patted the shoulder of the man who had gone rigid as a stone statue, then approached the wide-eyed maidservant.

“Excuse me.”

“Y-yes?”

“Is there a mountain nearby where not many people go?”

“Why would you want to…?”

“No particular reason.”

I glanced at the clear sky and continued.

“I thought I’d get some air.”

I shook off the maidservant, who insisted on accompanying me, and began climbing the mountain path.

It was the height of spring. The mountain was green, and the sky was blue.

I walked past drifting scraps of cloud and birds chattering from the branches. After some time, I entered a broad clearing and suddenly stopped.

“You can come out now.”

Nothing changed. Leaves rippled in the breeze, sparrows chirped as they ceaselessly turned their heads, and unknown wildflowers stood in full bloom.

Yet an incongruous presence towered amid the natural scenery.

Then a voice wormed its way into my ears.

“Not bad. Not bad at all.”

He was a remarkably tall old man. The fingers stroking the beard that reached his chest were knobby, and a fierce light shone from the eyes set deep in their sockets.

I clasped my hands before the old man, who looked remarkably similar to Namgung Ryong.

“It is an honor to meet the Azure Sky Sword King, Great Hero Namgung Cheon.”

The Azure Sky Sword King Namgung Cheon—the Grand Family Head of the Namgung Family and one of the Ten Kings—studied me before abruptly speaking.

“You must have had a reason for calling this old man all the way out here.”

“What do you mean…?”

“Great Hero Jeok took a sly little bastard as his Disciple in his later years. I know exactly what you’re scheming, so there’s no need to play dumb.”

“Ah, I’m sorry if I offended you.”

I scratched the back of my head and grinned. It was embarrassing to have him cut straight to the point, but it also made things easier.

“Did I make it a little… too obvious?”

I had first noticed his presence in the Family Head’s Hall.

Namgung Ryong had failed to sense him, but I had not. The Azure Sky Sword King was the reason I had come up the mountain under the pretense of getting some fresh air.

An unspoken invitation and acceptance had passed between us.

“Hah.”

A breathy sound escaped the Azure Sky Sword King’s lips. His expression seemed to ask what sort of brat he was dealing with.

“You’re an audacious one. Or perhaps you simply have no fear?”

“My Master says I’m just arrogant.”

“Yes, I believe that is the right word. Arrogant… It has been so long since anyone struck me that way that I had forgotten the feeling.”

“Of course. Who would dare act arrogantly toward the Azure Sky Sword King?”

“No one has for decades. Not until you appeared today.”

His fierce eyes fixed on me. That alone made my body hair stand on end and drew every sense taut.

“Speak. Why did you call this old man here?”

I took a deep breath. Then, without hesitation, I dropped to the ground and prostrated myself before the Azure Sky Sword King.

Clatter!

The chains collided, spewing a cacophonous rattle.

“What are you doing?”

“Please reconsider your duel with my Master.”

“Reconsider? Why should this old man do that?”

“I cannot tell you the reason.”

“…What?”

I had no idea what expression the Azure Sky Sword King was making.

But judging by the prickling at the back of my head, as if a blade were stabbing into it, he was clearly debating whether to kill me.

It does sound insane.

He had spent twenty years training for today’s duel.

And now some young brat who looked young enough to be his grandson had suddenly appeared and asked him to cancel it. On top of that, I was telling him I could not explain why.

But the die had already been cast. Pressing my face into the fresh earth, I spoke again.

“I’m sorry. But I cannot tell you the reason.”

“Tell me.”

“I cannot tell you.”

“You bastard!”

Whoooosh!

A tremendous wave of qi swept through the surroundings. Trees snapped, and flowers that had only just borne fruit were ripped out by the roots.

“This is the last time I’ll ask.”

My answer was already decided.

“I cannot tell you.”

As I repeated the same answer like a parrot, tangible killing intent pressed down on my entire body.

After a brief silence, the Azure Sky Sword King spoke.

“Get up.”

Crumble.

Clumps of dirt fell from me as I rose. The Azure Sky Sword King’s voice was as dry as desert sand.

“I waited twenty years.”

“Then please wait one more year.”

I continued calmly.

“I cannot tell you the exact reason, but my Master is not in good condition right now. You didn’t wait twenty years just to claim a victory like that, did you?”

“A victory like that…?”

The Azure Sky Sword King muttered the words under his breath and let out a hollow laugh.

“Great Hero Jeok trained his Disciple well.”

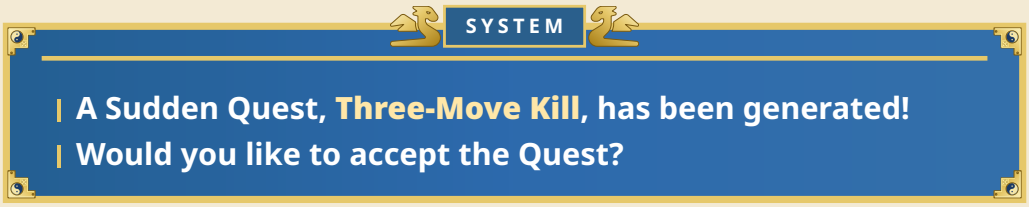
“He’ll be glad to hear that.”

“But you have the look of someone destined to die young. To survive in the martial world, one must possess at least a minimum of courtesy.”

“Are you saying…?”

“Three moves. If you can withstand three moves from this old man, I will grant your request.”

Ding.



I looked into his eyes, which boiled like lava.

These were three moves from none other than the Azure Sky Sword King. Three strikes capable of cleaving mountains and splitting rivers would rain down upon me.

I opened my parched lips.

“I’ll do it.”

Ding.

As the System notification announced that the Quest had been accepted, anger flared in the Azure Sky Sword King’s eyes.

“Your recklessness will be the death of you.”

“Maybe. Maybe not. But before that…”

I grinned and raised my arms.

Clank.

Dozens of iron balls swayed with the chains.

“May I take these off?”

“Go ahead. The outcome will not change.”

As the old man stared at me with cold, unyielding eyes, the majesty of an emperor who could force all under heaven to kneel surged from his entire body.

The blue sky overhead began to churn.

“Emperor’s Sword Form. Can you stop it?”

Craaack! Clang!

I tore apart the steel shackles that had bound my limbs for more than a year as easily as sheets of paper.

The instant the chains and iron balls fell to the ground—

Whoosh!

A flash of light burst from the Azure Sky Sword King’s waist.

Chapter 240

Smoke streamed from the old man's seven orifices.[1325]

It was Scorching Yang Qi, so dense it was visible to the naked eye, endlessly coiling around his small frame as it circulated through him.

And then, soon after—

Sssssss.

Five rings rose one after another above the crown of the cross-legged old man.

Some were blue and red, others black and white.

When the final yellow ring took shape, the five vivid rings, one in each of the five directional colors, were complete.

Five Qi Returning to Origin.

Jeok Cheongang, the small-framed old man who had just displayed the dream realm sought by every martial artist in Murim, suddenly opened his eyes.

"Come in."

The door opened the moment the words left his mouth.

A young man dressed in rags strode inside as though he owned the place and looked around.

"Weren't you circulating your qi?"

"Some bastard kept pacing outside the door. How was this old man supposed to concentrate with him distracting me?"

"Fair point. Ah, I should've just come in and watched the Olympics."

"It wasn't the Olympics or whatever you called it. It was Five Qi Returning to Origin."

"What does it matter? As long as you got the meaning across."

Jeok Cheongang silently regarded the young man, Jin Taekyung.

"Where have you been?"

"You know where. I went to see Great Hero Namgung Ryong, the Family Head."

"Family Head Namgung. Right. You did."

After muttering under his breath, Jeok Cheongang asked, "What did he say?"

"Oh, that."

Jin Taekyung stretched before continuing.

"The banquet's been canceled."

"The banquet was canceled? What does that mean?"

"Well, apparently the Azure Sky Sword King entered seclusion."

"Seclusion?"

[1325] The seven orifices are the two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, and mouth.

"They say he suddenly gained some minor insight or something. Anyway, that's how it turned out."

"Enlightenment…"

Jeok Cheongang gave a small nod.

"That's quite a coincidence."

Jin Taekyung stopped twisting his overgrown beard around one finger.

"What is?"

"The Azure Sky Sword King waited more than twenty years for today. Yet of all days, this happened today. How could it not be a coincidence?"

"…Maybe he got a little nervous when it was finally time to fight you?"

"Who knows?"

"Come on, it's obvious. Don't you think you're overthinking it?"

"You think so?"

"Yes. Absolutely."

Jeok Cheongang stared in silence as Jin Taekyung nodded vigorously.

"W-why?"

"Nothing."

"There's no such thing as 'nothing'!"

"Do I need your permission just to look at your face?"

"Have you never heard of image rights?"

"No. Shut your mouth before I use Flying Over Grass[1326] to stomp on your head."

"Yes, sir."

But the silence did not last long. Jin Taekyung glanced at the old man, gauging his mood, then spoke again.

"Old Master."

"What?"

"This whole thing worked out okay, right?"

"There is nothing to call 'working out.' The date has merely been postponed for a little while."

"But we bought some time."

"Did you think this old man would lose?"

Jin Taekyung hurriedly waved his hands.

"That's not what I meant. Given the situation, even if you won, it wouldn't really count as a victory."

Even if I won, it wouldn't really count as a victory…

Jeok Cheongang repeated the words silently.

[1326] Flying Over Grass is a lightness-skill feat of crossing grass without touching the ground.

They were true. Had the duel taken place, he would have paid a heavy price regardless of the outcome.

The Azure Sky Sword King was an opponent he would have to face with everything he had.

If Jeok Cheongang suffered an Internal Injury in a fierce duel against him, the essence, qi, and spirit he had barely managed to bring into balance would collapse.

“Old Master?”

Jeok Cheongang raised his head from his thoughts. Jin Taekyung was looking at him with concern.

“Why did you call me?”

“No reason. Do I need permission even to call you once?”

“What a tiresome brat.”

Normally, Jeok Cheongang would have rapped him on the head, but today, he decided to let it slide.

He let out a quiet chuckle and rose from his seat.

“Let’s go.”

“Where?”

“Henan.”

The Star-Array Grand Banquet.

Even now, the most renowned masters of Murim would be gathering in Henan one after another.

Having let all four seasons pass them by, the two of them had taken quite a detour.

“The Namgung Family has no reason to keep us here, and we have no reason to remain. Leaving is only natural.”

“Leaving sounds good, but can’t we soak in some hot water first? I’ve got so much dirt caked onto me that my body feels heavy.”

“You should have brought that up much earlier, you brat. Don’t start pretending to care about cleanliness now. Go get us some travel money. We may be uninvited guests, but they should at least give us that much.”

“Wow. Now you’re even telling me to shake people down.”

“Why, you—!”

“I’m going. I’m going.”

Jin Taekyung grumbled as he left the pavilion.

He did not know that Jeok Cheongang was silently watching him.

Watching the shackles that had been hastily forced shut by sheer strength.

Watching the cleanly severed ends of his sleeves.

The old man watched until the young man’s back had receded into the distance, then muttered,

"…That brat. Going and doing something I never told him to."

His seasoned gray eyes swept toward a small mountain in the distance.

A faint cloud of dust was dispersing above the ridge covered in blue-green light.

The bright sun slipped behind the mountain, and darkness descended.

The Azure Sky Sword King, Namgung Cheon, stood motionless as the mountain wind whispered through the trees. Then he abruptly spoke.

"Who was that boy?"

Namgung Ryong, the Family Head of the Namgung Family, was standing quietly behind the Azure Sky Sword King. He answered,

"His name is Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan in Shanxi."

"The Jin Family of Taiyuan?"

"Yes."

"So a Hidden Dragon was crouching in the borderlands."

"And the Fire King took that very Hidden Dragon under his wing."

"You're wrong."

The Azure Sky Sword King shook his head.

"The Fire King is the dragon pearl.[1327] It wasn't that he took the Hidden Dragon into his embrace. He became the dragon pearl himself."

"…!"

Namgung Ryong could not hide his astonishment. Though father and son had never been close, he knew what kind of man his father was.

One of the things he knew was that his father was a man of few words who was exceedingly stingy with his judgments of others.

Yet the words Hidden Dragon had come from his lips.

He had even said that the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, whose name shook all under heaven, had become the dragon pearl himself.

The man who never once praised even his own grandson…

A pang of hurt mingled with Namgung Ryong's curiosity.

"Is he truly that extraordinary?"

The Azure Sky Sword King did not answer the cautious question. Instead, he abruptly asked one of his own.

"How far have you mastered the Emperor's Sword Form?"

"…I have yet to break through the barrier of three-tenths mastery."

"When I was your age, I had mastered seven-tenths of the Emperor's Sword Form. I believe that was around the time the world began calling me the Sword King."

[1327] In Chinese lore, a dragon pearl is a precious orb associated with dragons.

“I apologize.”

Shame filled Namgung Ryong’s reply, but the Azure Sky Sword King paid it no mind.

He had not said it to rebuke his son, who was already sixty years old.

“More than twenty years ago, when my mastery of martial arts reached eight-tenths, a question suddenly occurred to me. I wanted to test my sword.”

“…”

Namgung Ryong silently lowered his head. He knew well what had happened afterward.

The clash between the Fire King and the Sword King.

The winner of that earth-shaking battle between two Supreme Peak masters had been the Fire King.

“During my secluded training, I faced countless towering walls. I struck and hammered at them without end, until at last, one of those walls collapsed.”

“Then…!”

“I have only just broken through a single wall. I have not yet achieved Great Completion.”

“Congratulations!”

Namgung Ryong performed a full bow before his father, trembling with excitement.

The Emperor’s Sword Form was the beginning and end of the dozens of secret arts possessed by the Namgung Family.

In the family’s entire history, only the founding Family Head had ever achieved Great Completion of the Emperor’s Sword Form.

True to his greatness as a martial artist, the Azure Sky Sword King had become the first in roughly a century to reach nine-tenths mastery of the Emperor’s Sword Form.

“Congratulations, is it?”

But the Azure Sky Sword King’s expression remained calm. No—he even looked hollow.

“Then let me ask you one thing. Can you withstand three moves of the Emperor’s Sword Form this old man unleashes?”

“How could I possibly dare… Surely?”

The Azure Sky Sword King quietly nodded.

Namgung Ryong’s eyes widened like lanterns.

It was unthinkable—something that neither should nor could have happened.

Yet his father had confirmed it.

That young man had withstood the Emperor’s Sword Form wielded by none other than the Azure Sky Sword King himself.

Even Namgung Ryong, who rarely lost his composure, spoke with a trembling voice.

"B-but he is only twenty-two."

"Yes, twenty-two. He possesses the Heavenly Martial Physique and has the Fire King Jeok Cheongang as his Master."

The Azure Sky Sword King raised his head and stared into the dark night sky.

For many long years, from the moment he first entered the world, he had lived under the name Namgung. He had carried the two characters Azure Sky in his heart and learned a sword that resembled the azure heavens.

But today, he had met a dragon soaring into the sky.

I thought one move would be enough.

He had put two-tenths of his power behind his sword, intending to teach the young man some manners.

Then three-tenths.

Then six-tenths.

And yet…

"Three moves. That's it, right? Thanks for going easy on me."

The young man had slung the iron balls over his shoulder and left.

All that remained in his wake were hundreds of trees and boulders carved apart by stroke after stroke, along with the mournful cries of birds that had suddenly lost their homes.

A Hidden Dragon. A Hidden Dragon.

The Azure Sky Sword King repeated those words in his mind, then spoke.

"Have they left?"

Namgung Ryong, who had only just gathered his wits, answered, "Yes. They left five shichen[1328] ago."

"Where did they say they were going?"

"Henan. They said they would attend the Star-Array Grand Banquet being held there in one month."

"The Star-Array Grand Banquet?"

The Azure Sky Sword King let out a hollow laugh.

"Make it clear to your son that he is not to show his face at this Star-Array Grand Banquet."

[1328] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; five shichen is about ten hours.

Black Mountain Stronghold was a bandit organization based along one of the major routes connecting Henan and Anhui.

Its leader, Heuk Jongpil, was an illiterate former butcher, but he was also a natural-born plunderer and a master who had honed his axe techniques to the Peak realm.

Thanks to that, he commanded more than three hundred underlings and lorded over them like a king.

Not that the Green Forest Alliance didn't bleed me dry.

No matter how capable Heuk Jongpil was, he was no match for the Green Forest Alliance.

The only reason he had managed to build Black Mountain Stronghold into what it was today was that he paid four-tenths of his monthly profits to the Green Forest Alliance in exchange for various forms of assistance.

For instance, the valuable intelligence delivered by the subordinate who had just entered.

"Boss, a letter arrived from the Green Forest Alliance headquarters! Here—"

Whack!

"You bastard! Don't you know we're all illiterate? Read it aloud!"

"It has information about the goods the Geumwa Merchant Group is transporting and the route they're taking. They say it should arrive within two days."

"What are you waiting for?"

"Yes?"

"Call everyone!"

The Star-Array Grand Banquet was an important event for martial artists and bandits alike.

Heuk Jongpil gathered all three hundred of his underlings and set up an ambush along the route the Geumwa Merchant Group would take.

Just one big haul. Let us land one.

If they managed to get their hands on even a single top-grade cat's-eye stone, they would still have a fortune left over after paying tribute to the Green Forest Alliance.

Feeding and arming more than three hundred able-bodied men was no small task.

"They should be here by now… Why haven't the scouts come back?"

"Who knows? We sent them out a shichen[1329] ago, but there hasn't been any word."

"Ugh. Trying to run a bandit operation with idiots like these is hard on the body. Hard on the body."

[1329] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; five shichen is about ten hours.

The next instant, Heuk Jongpil froze mid-grumble.

With a trembling hand, he pointed toward something approaching through the darkness at incredible speed.

"…Hey. What is that?"

"I-I'm not sure either."

Whoooosh!

Two silhouettes—one large and one small.

A long trail of red qi lingered behind them like the tail of a meteor shower.

Are they ghosts?

Heuk Jongpil was crouching in the grass, watching the sight, when it happened.

The two silhouettes racing along the mountain road at an unbelievable speed abruptly stopped.

A moment later, low voices drifted over.

"Why stick your nose into this?"

"It bugs me. They seem to be with those two who were skulking around earlier."

"We're going to be late at this rate, you brat."

"No matter how late we are, whoever sees the trash first should clean it up."

"Where did you learn to talk back every single time this old man says something?"

"Bastards like that always set fire to mountains."

"You little shit! Go break all four of their limbs."

"Yes, sir."

Heuk Jongpil had been listening intently to their conversation.

His eyes flew wide.

"W-we're fucking screwed! Everybody—!"

But his cry went no further.

Whoosh!

A brief rush of wind.

Then someone's enormous hand settled companionably around his shoulder.

"Everybody, what?"

Chapter 241

The Star-Array Grand Banquet.

With the most renowned masters in the world gathering in one place to pit their martial arts against one another, the name could not have been more fitting: a banquet of stars.

An old man with deep wrinkles around his eyes packed tobacco into a long-stemmed tobacco pipe as he spoke.

“It could also be called a festival of victory.”

They were in a large inn in southern Henan Province.

From among the people crowding around the old man, someone asked, “Why is that?”

“Why else? If the Central Plains Murim had lost, would there have been a Star-Array Grand Banquet? The Demonic Cult would have ruled the world by now, and they would be holding the Demonic Grand Banquet instead.”

“Ah, that is true.”

“But because we won, the Star-Array Grand Banquet can be held, and the great sects from across the world can gather in one place to renew their shared resolve. Speaking of which…”

The old man fumbled inside his robes, then waved his pipe.

“Does anyone have a light?”

The middle-aged man beside him quickly pulled out a flint and lit it for him.

Crack, crackle! Ssssss.

As the dry tobacco burned, the old man puffed on the stem. After blowing out several streams of smoke, he leaned back leisurely in his chair.

“If there is anything you’re curious about, ask away. This old man will tell you everything he knows.”

The people watching him with shining eyes began raising their hands all at once.

“Me! May I ask first?”

“Great Hero Song, then perhaps…”

“Hey, didn’t you hear me say I was going first?”

“I didn’t hear shit, you unorthodox-faction bastard!”

Wham! Crash!

Fists flew in an instant, and a table broke apart. The onlookers cheered at the sudden fight.

The guests who had kept their distance from the start shook their heads.

“Tsk, tsk. Martial artists.”

“Just let them be. It’s not as if this is the first time we’ve seen it.”

"That's the problem. There's never a quiet moment. With the Star-Array Grand Banquet right around the corner, every kind of bastard is flocking to Henan."

"Our trading run is over anyway. We might as well watch the show and enjoy the benefits."

The two merchants continued chatting quietly.

Dressed in fine blue silk robes, they were passing cups of liquor between them when a voice suddenly cut in.

"Is that Yeoahong[1330]?"

"Hm?"

The merchants stared at the owner of the voice in bewilderment.

A young man had somehow approached their table without either of them noticing. His nostrils flared as he stared intently at the cups in their hands.

"Isn't that Yeoahong? It looks like it…"

"It—it is. Yeoahong."

"I knew it."

As though he had achieved some great enlightenment, the young man slapped his knee and dragged over an empty chair.

"But the color looks a little weak. How much did you pay for this bottle?"

His movements were so smooth and natural that the merchants could only stare blankly at each other.

"H-how much was it?"

"T-two silver nyang."

The young man sighed.

"What a shame."

"What do you mean, a shame?"

"This has been mixed with water. Can't you tell at a glance? Looks like the owner played a little trick on you."

What?

The merchants' eyes flashed.

Was Yeoahong normally that expensive?

Two silver nyang was enough to buy two seom[1331] of rice and drink strong liquor like water for several months. Mixing water into it was nothing short of outrageous.

"I'm going to—"

One of the merchants was about to spring to his feet, but his companion stopped him.

[1330] Yeoahong, literally "Daughter's Red," is a traditional Chinese rice wine.

[1331] A seom is a traditional Korean measure of grain volume, approximately 180 liters or 48 US gallons. Two seom is about 360 liters or 95 US gallons.

“Forget it. Nothing good will come from making a fuss. Besides, aren’t we doing the same thing—making a little extra while we can?”

“Ugh.”

The merchant groaned and sat back down.

Meanwhile, the young man was filling his cup to the brim with Yeoahong and gulping it down.

Gulp, gulp, clack!

“Ahh. That’s good.”

The merchants stared at him dumbfounded. Only after a moment did they finally come to their senses.

“What do you think you’re doing?”

“That’s our liquor…”

“My throat was a little dry, so I tried a cup. Is there a problem?”

His answer was so shameless that the two men were left speechless. They only managed to speak after the young man had emptied his third cup.

“Have we met before?”

“Of course.”

“When? Where?”

“Today, here.”

…

“They say even brushing sleeves with someone creates a connection. Starting today, let’s be friends.”

“Friends?”

The merchants glared at the young man in disbelief.

He was slender and had an approachable expression. He looked no older than his mid-twenties—just a ridiculously young brat.

What the hell does he mean, friends?

They were about to give him a proper tongue-lashing when they noticed the iron sword tucked into his waistband.

A martial artist!

People had always said there was only a fine line between a rogue and a martial artist.

With their merchant guards nowhere nearby, they would unquestionably be the ones to suffer if a dispute broke out.

The merchants swallowed the reprimand that had been about to leave their mouths.

“Listen, Young Brother.”

“Young Brother? I like that form of address.”

“R-really? That’s good, then.”

There was something strangely relaxed about the young man’s grin. Forced smiles appeared on the merchants’ faces.

“Are you a martial artist too, Young Brother?”

“Hmm. I have learned some trifling tricks people call martial arts.”

What? He learned ‘trifling tricks’ called martial arts?

The brat’s already drunk on his own swagger.

The merchants cursed him inwardly before speaking.

“You must be a future pillar of the martial world. If you don’t mind, may I ask which sect you are a Disciple of?”

“Does that matter between friends?”

The young man deftly dodged the question, so one of the merchants revealed their own identity.

“We are merchants belonging to the Geumwa Merchant Group.”

“The Geumwa Merchant Group?”

“It is nothing to boast about, but we are one of the top three merchant groups in Zhejiang Province. We came a long way to deliver supplies for the Star-Array Grand Banquet being held three days from now.”

The other merchant, who had been nodding beside him, eagerly chimed in.

“We even brought a hundred merchant-group guards.”

“Warriors as brave as tigers.”

We aren’t alone. Get lost before you get taught a lesson.

The words carried an unspoken threat, but the young man paid no attention.

More precisely, he was so absorbed in his own thoughts that he let their words go in one ear and out the other.

“The Geumwa Merchant Group… I definitely heard that name this morning.”

The young man thought for a moment, then exclaimed, “Ah!”

“Isn’t that the group that captured hundreds of bandits?”

“That’s right.”

The merchant had answered with his chest puffed out, but he added in a mumble, “To be precise, we didn’t capture them. We picked them up.”

“Picked them up? What does that mean?”

When the young man showed interest, the merchants lowered their voices as much as possible.

What they had encountered before meeting this young brat was far more troubling.

“Well, there were a bunch of bandits lying in the alley the merchant group was passing through, all with broken legs and groaning. As it turned out, they were from Black Mountain Stronghold, which is notorious in the area.”

“Their leader, the Red-Killing Axe Heuk Jongpil, had been turned into a headless corpse.”

“Oh?”

The young man rubbed his smooth, hairless chin.

“So what did you do?”

“What else could we do? We couldn’t exactly kill them all, but leaving them there would have been like throwing silver nyang onto the road. So we tied them all together in a line.”

In the end, the Geumwa Merchant Group handed the remnants of Black Mountain Stronghold over to the authorities and collected an enormous bounty. The rumor spread quickly.

“People have been saying all kinds of things. That they angered a hidden master, that a war broke out between bandit strongholds…”

“It probably was a hidden master. How many people can kill a Peak master like the Red-Killing Axe in One Strike?”

The young man listened quietly, then asked with keen interest, “A Peak master, killed in One Strike?”

The two merchants nodded together.

“That’s right. You’re a martial artist too, so you must know how remarkable that is.”

“What was it again? The underlings said whoever it was had chunks of iron dangling all over them. It was so late at night that they couldn’t make out the person’s face. They just saw a flash, and then the Red-Killing Axe fell.”

“Hmm.”

The young man fell silent for a moment, as though considering something. Then he suddenly spoke.

“That hidden master must be much younger than you think.”

“Good heavens. Do you have some idea who he might be?”

“More or less. Probably dressed in rags, with hair all over the place.”

“Oh! Who is it? Who is that master?”

“But I don’t know the name.”

…

“Well, I suppose I can get to know him little by little from now on. Thanks for the drink.”

It happened in an instant.

After casually tossing out that final remark, the young man rose from his seat and disappeared into the bustling crowd.

A moment later, the inn’s door closed with a tinkling bell.

“What was that?”

“Did he really leave? After gulping down all that Yeoahong?”

“He called us friends. Damn it.”

The two merchants were staring blankly at each other when someone spoke to them.

“Excuse me, gentlemen.”

“What is it?”

A broad-shouldered waiter held out a wooden tablet with an impassive expression.

There were scars across his face, enough to make one suspect that he moonlighted as a dark-path knife fighter.

No, with a face like that, it was practically certain.

“The gentleman who just left didn’t pay his bill. From what I just heard, it seems you two are friends.”

“Huh?”

“Two roast ducks and five bottles of Yeoahong. The total comes to ten silver nyang and twenty nyang in iron coins.”

“…!”

The merchants’ mouths fell open as though they had been struck squarely in the back of the head.

What the fucking hell?

He drank five bottles of Yeoahong?

But what could they do? If you could tell ten things from one, then the waiter’s face made it clear that this establishment was managed by a dark-path faction.

The merchants were rummaging through their coin purses with miserable expressions when—

“I’ll pay.”

Clink.

A silk pouch flew from somewhere and landed on the table.

The people inside the inn had fallen silent. Through the crowd, which had split cleanly down the middle, an old man came limping forward.

Tap, tap.

The sound of his wooden prosthetic leg striking the floor pierced everyone’s ears.

“Twenty silver nyang. Use it to pay the bill and get me a quiet room.”

The waiter looked back and forth between the silk pouch and the old man, then bowed politely. He already knew who the man was.

“Yes, Great Hero Song.”

“Well, that settles one matter.”

The old man wrapped his rough hands around the merchants’ shoulders.

His grip was so powerful that it was impossible to believe he was a man in his seventies. He seized the two men and hauled them to their feet.

“Now, the two of you and I are going to have a little talk. About that friend who just left.”

“Why—why are you doing this?”

“We have absolutely nothing to do with him!”

The old man smiled broadly at the two merchants, who were almost whimpering. But he could not hide the gravity in his deep-set eyes.

“Heh heh. Isn’t that something for this old man to decide?”

At the words of Song Ho, the Thousand-Faced Fox, the merchants drew a sharp breath.

As if to announce that the Star-Array Grand Banquet was only three days away, the streets and inns throughout Henan Province were packed with people.

The problem was that, thanks to that, there was not a single room left for me.

“We have no rooms.”

I had already been turned away from more than twenty inns.

With nowhere else to go and no reason left to hold back, I glared at the waiter and asked, “You’re sure there really isn’t one?”

“I told you, there isn’t.”

“I have money.”

I pulled out a grimy silver nyang and held it up. It was my entire fortune and my last hope.

If I hadn’t secretly hidden it away in advance, I wouldn’t even have this.

Jeok Cheongang had run off with my entire coin purse.

Damn old man.

At the very first inn we entered, Jeok Cheongang had been showered with salt[1332] by the waiter. After agonizing over whether to set the waiter or the inn on fire, he had come up with a peaceful and spectacular solution.

The Abbot of Shaolin card.

I’m going to Shaolin.

Wow. That option was available? Was dementia the driving force that turned you into a genius?

Shall I use that driving force to snap your neck?

I shouldn’t have run my mouth. Anyway, that’s great. Let’s hurry there, scrub the dirt off with hot water, and eat some Shaolin wild-greens bibimbap.

[1332] Throwing salt at an unwanted visitor is a Korean custom intended to drive away bad luck.

I'm going alone.

What?

A year ago, you ran your mouth about going to the Star-Array Grand Banquet, and this old man suffered for it despite having no reason to. The preliminary competition will be held in Kaifeng anyway, so don't let me see your face until then.

No way! How is that fair?

Oh, and hand over your coin purse.

Why do you need my coin purse?

The Fire King has his dignity to consider. Do you expect me to arrive looking like a beggar and eat and bathe for free? I should at least make a small donation.

Oh, and if you come looking for Shaolin, I'll kill you. Understood?

He wasn't the Fire King. He was a highway robber. A highway robber.

After watching my coin purse get stolen right out from under my nose, I stood there blankly for a long while before wandering aimlessly in search of a place to sleep.

And this was the last inn anywhere nearby.

"This is real silver. Want to bite it and see?"

The heavily built waiter scowled.

"…Didn't you just pull that out of your underwear?"

"I was hiding it."

I quickly rubbed the silver nyang with my sleeve before holding it out again.

"Want to bite it?"

"Get the hell out of here, you beggar bastard!"

Fucking bastard…

I considered punching him in the face, but turned away weakly.

Nearby, several children were huddled together playing jacks with small stones.

"Kids, do any of your families rent out rooms?"

The chubby-cheeked children shook their heads.

"N-no."

"My family does, but it's already full."

"Oh, I see. All right."

"And my mom said not to bring in beggar bastards like youuu."

…

Listen to the way that little brat talks.

I wanted to storm into his house and yell at his parents to teach him some proper manners, but I held myself back.

Where do I go now?

I was slowly wandering the streets, wondering whether I should go wash myself in a nearby stream, when someone called out.

“Young Hero!”

At first, I didn’t realize they were calling me. Given my current appearance, it was far too absurd to think that someone would address me as a Young Hero.

My clothes were no better than rags, and my hair was a tangled mess. At that moment, I was a perfect specimen of a beggar.

At least I had avoided looking like a prisoner by winding the chains around my body and covering the iron balls with cloth.

But who would call someone like me a Young Hero?

“Me?”

When I turned around, I saw a young man with an approachable expression smiling brightly.

“That’s right. You.”

Chapter 242

He was a young man with an approachable expression.

He looked to be in his mid-to-late twenties at most, with a strangely friendly smile playing on his lips.

“Whew. Why are you walking so fast?”

“Do I know you?”

“No.”

“Then why?”

“They say even brushing sleeves with someone creates a connection, don’t they?”

“We haven’t even brushed sleeves.”

“But we’ve exchanged words, so that counts. Let’s be friends.”

“…”

It was one of two things. He was either crazy or a crazy social butterfly.

I took my time looking him over. Beneath his loose robe, I spotted well-developed muscles and the hilt of a sword jutting from his waist.

At the same time, I sensed the qi lying dormant within him.

A Peak master?

I had no idea how old he actually was, but his attainment was fairly impressive.

No, at this level, it could even be called remarkable. Reaching the Peak realm in your twenties was no easy feat.

But how should I put it? The qi I sensed from the young man seemed to amount to exactly that and nothing more.

If I had to put it into words…

An ordinary Peak master?

The Peak realm was already an incredible level, so why did he feel ordinary?

Because I was surrounded by too many monsters.

Getting hit with the insane three-hit combo of Jin Mukyung, Cheongpung, and the Fire King was bound to leave side effects like this.

In any case, I had more or less figured him out. I spoke politely to the young man.

“Don’t mind me. Go on your way.”

“Good heavens, isn’t that awfully cold between friends?”

“If we’re friends, can I drop the formal speech?”

“Haha. Of course!”

“Then fuck off, asshole.”

“…”

I left him behind and started walking. After standing frozen for a moment, he hurried after me in quick little steps.

“That was the first time anyone has ever insulted me. I was stunned for a moment. Yes, this is what true friendship is!”

“Just go while I’m still asking nicely.”

“What’s your name?”

“Michael Johnson.”

“That’s an unusual name.”

“…You believe that?”

“Jang Sam? Or Yu Pil? Are you perhaps a Disciple of one of the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families?”

“Why do you care?”

“Because I’m interested, of course. I heard you killed the Red-Killing Axe with One Strike.”

I stopped dead at the unfamiliar epithet.

“Who?”

“The Stronghold Lord of Black Mountain Stronghold. Was that your doing?”

I recalled the hairy bandit chief I had dealt with on the way here. There had been so many bandits that I had taken him out first to intimidate the rest.

I had thought he was unusually strong for a bandit. Apparently, he had been somewhat famous.

“But how did you find out?”

“I heard it from the Geumwa Merchant Group’s merchants at the inn earlier. They said the surviving bandits claimed it was the work of a strange man carrying iron balls and chains.”

The young man beamed as he pointed to the iron balls strapped to my back.

I had covered them with cloth to disguise them as luggage, since I did not want to invite any strange misunderstandings. But apparently, I could not fool the eyes of a Peak master.

“And then you happened to walk by. My curiosity got the better of me, so I came straight after you.”

“Hmm.”

“So, what’s your name?”

Should I tell him or not?

After a moment’s thought, I opened my mouth. I was beginning to grow curious about which sect this eccentric young man belonged to as well.

“Jin Taekyung. That’s my name.”

“Are you the Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan in Shanxi Province?”

“You know me?”

“Of course I do. I’ve heard so much about the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi becoming the Fire King’s Disciple that my ears are ringing.”

A year could be short or long, depending on how you looked at it.

But it was more than enough time for rumors about me and the Fire King to spread throughout the continent.

“What about you?”

“Ah, as for me…”

The young man grinned and continued.

“Jongni Chu. I’m Jongni Chu from Yunnan. I have my reasons for not revealing my sect, so I hope you’ll understand.”

“Jongni Chu from Yunnan?”

“My epithet is the Always-Victorious Sword. Have you ever heard of me?”

I knew Yunnan, but this was my first time hearing his name or epithet.

Considering I had spent the past year holed up in Fire Gate Cavern, that was only natural.

“Sorry, but I haven’t.”

“Is that so? Well, it’s understandable that you wouldn’t know.”

Would you look at that positivity? Most martial artists his age would have been disappointed, but he showed no sign of it.

The freakishly positive guy continued with a serious expression.

“That’s because I just came up with the epithet. A swordsman who always wins. Isn’t it cool?”

“…”

Is he crazy?

As I stood there speechless, Jongni Chu made a motion of twisting his wrist.

“How about it? Shall we have a drink to celebrate becoming friends?”

“Not interested. Besides, there aren’t any seats at the nearby inns.”

“What are you talking about? I’ve been following you this whole time, and every inn had at least one or two seats open.”

“…The waiters said there weren’t any.”

“Hm? Then why did they tell me there were empty seats and invite me inside?”

“…”

Damn it. Of course.

Even with the Star-Array Grand Banquet right around the corner, how could every last seat in dozens of inns possibly be taken?

I’m washing because I’m filthy. Because I’m filthy.

I would have to draw water from a stream and wash myself. At this rate, I would end up sleeping on the street despite leaving perfectly good inns unused.

“I know a decent inn, so come with me. I’ll pay for the drinks to celebrate our new friendship.”

“What friendship? You said your name was Jongni Chu, right? You should go on your way too.”

It was not as though I was completely penniless. I had no intention of getting tangled up with some weirdo and wasting time chatting.

Hadn’t someone said there was a stream if I kept following this road?

As I searched my memory and walked on, Jongni Chu called after me.

“Hey, where are you going?”

“None of your business. Don’t follow me.”

“Then answer just one last question! Where can I see you again?”

“The Star-Array Grand Banquet.”

That was my final answer. I used qinggong[1333] and quickly left the area. After covering more than a hundred zhang[1334] in an instant, I heard Jongni Chu shouting behind me.

“See you next time!”

Not a chance, punk.

One man left, and one remained.

Jongni Chu stared in the direction Jin Taekyung had disappeared and murmured,

“The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung…”

Before long, a deep dimple formed beside his smooth, unlined mouth.

After standing there alone and chuckling to himself for a while, he turned toward an inn not far away.

The waiter who had driven Jin Taekyung off fifteen minutes earlier bent at the waist with a broad smile.

“Welcome!”

“Do you have any seats left?”

“Of course, sir!”

Jongni Chu’s smile deepened.

Splash!

When I sat up, the hot water filling the wooden tub sloshed around me.

I had found the battered old tub lying in the grass, filled it with cold stream water, and heated it with Scorching Yang Qi.

[1333] Qinggong is a martial-arts skill for moving swiftly and lightly.

[1334] A zhang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). More than a hundred zhang is more than 303 m (994 ft).

After dumping and refilling the water several times to scrub away the accumulated grime, I felt as though I had lost several kilograms[1335].

"I feel like I've undergone Bone Transformation[1336]."

I finally felt alive again.

It would have been nice to have shampoo or body wash, but this was more than enough to satisfy me.

The inventories for Murim and the modern world were separate, so bringing any over had been impossible from the start.

But these clothes are a problem.

I frowned as I put the rags back on. It was hard to tell whether they were clothes or garbage.

The discomfort was one thing, but putting these back on made the bath feel completely pointless.

I wandered through the streets, intending to buy at least one cheap set of clothes.

The streets of Henan had been crowded with people from every class and profession even a year ago, but given the timing, martial artists were especially conspicuous now.

Naturally, snippets of their conversations reached my ears.

"Have you heard? The Sword Dragon of the Namgung Family won't be participating in this year's Star-Array Grand Banquet."

"Good heavens. Why would the Sword Dragon suddenly drop out? Is there some sort of problem?"

"Who knows? It's a shame. He was one of the favorites to win. The outcome is getting harder and harder to predict."

"Among the young prodigies, the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes probably have the best chance, but…the age limit is thirty-five. There's no telling what will happen."

"That's a fair point. The world is vast, and there are many masters. A powerful newcomer from outside the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families could easily appear."

"You mean someone like the Heaven Shaking Sword of the Jin Family of Taiyuan and the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?"

"Exactly. Though I don't know whether either of them will attend this year's Star-Array Grand Banquet."

Hearing them talk about me made my face burn.

I quickened my pace and left the road behind.

As soon as I reached a main street lined with large buildings, a cloth shop displaying silk and dozens of different outfits caught my eye.

[1335] One kilogram is about 2.2 lb.

[1336] Bone Transformation refers to an advanced bodily transformation in martial-arts fiction.

“Excuse me.”

“Why, they say clothes make the woman, but those suit you wonderfully. Are you perhaps a fairy? A fairy… What do you want?”

The cloth-shop employee had been enthusiastically showering a group of pretty female customers with flattery, but he frowned the moment I called out to him.

The change in his expression was so extreme that I barely resisted punching him in the face.

“Why do you think I came to a cloth shop?”

“To beg, obviously.”

“…”

No matter how ragged my clothes were, there was no hiding my massive frame.

If anything, the rags left so much skin exposed that my muscles stood out even more.

When I stared at him while subtly tensing my body, the employee flinched.

“W-why are you looking at me like that? Was I wrong?”

“That’s enough of the kind of remark you’ll regret. Let me see some clothes.”

“C-clothes?”

“Here. I have money, so don’t treat me like a beggar.”

The employee’s expression changed when I pulled out a silver nyang[1337] and waved it around.

Contrary to my expectations, it changed for the worse.

“That’s all?”

“It is. Is there a problem?”

“Good grief. What kind of clothes do you think you can buy with one lousy silver nyang[1338]?”

“…One lousy silver nyang[1339]?”

Had there been some major currency reform in the past year that caused the value of silver to collapse?

As I stood there in confusion, the employee snorted.

“Did you even read the price list before coming in?”

I reflexively turned and checked the sign.

A wooden board at the front of the shop had these words written across it in enormous letters:

[1337] A silver nyang is a historical unit of silver currency, not Korean won.
[1338] A silver nyang is a historical unit of silver currency, not Korean won.
[1339] A silver nyang is a historical unit of silver currency, not Korean won.

> The owner has gone mad! Star-Array Grand Banquet special discount! Martial-artist's outfit—two silver nyang[1340]!

"…Two silver nyang[1341]? For a martial-artist's outfit?"

"With that, you could buy underwear at best. Our cloth shop handles only the finest silk. Even our martial-artist's outfits are made from Shu brocade[1342]."

"…"

So this was a department-store brand.

Of all the places I could have walked into, I had chosen this one. What an embarrassment.

The other employees and customers inside the shop began whispering as they watched me.

"Oh my, he must be a beggar. How pitiful. Don't you agree, dear?"

"He certainly looks like one. He seems strong enough to put those muscles to use, though. Should we take him in as a servant?"

"You're so merciful, dear. I'm sure that beggar would be delighted."

Being called a beggar was irritating enough, but hearing it from a couple made me twice as angry.

I shouted with all the anger I could muster.

"Who are you calling a beggar?"

"Gasp!"

"Eek!"

"H-how dare you!"

People recoiled in fright at my booming shout.

At the same time, several burly employees came rushing over and surrounded me, brandishing clubs threateningly.

"You bastard! How dare you make a scene here!"

"Do you even know where you are, you filthy beggar?"

"What? A beggar? Oh, you sons of bitches…"

Fine. You said it.

I rolled up the sleeve that was already half torn off.

"All right, let's be a real pain in the ass today. Who owns this place?"

That was when it happened.

"You're the kind of bastard who won't come to his senses until he sees a coffin. How dare you make a scene here?"

A grave voice rang in my ears.

[1340] A silver nyang is a historical unit of silver currency, not Korean won.

[1341] A silver nyang is a historical unit of silver currency, not Korean won.

[1342] Shu brocade is a fine silk textile traditionally made in Sichuan, China.

I slowly turned around and saw a man.

He wore a bamboo hat pulled low over his face and black silk clothes embroidered with dragons. One hand rested on the hilt of his sword as though he might draw at any moment.

The lips visible beneath the bamboo hat curled as he let out a quiet laugh.

“You seem to have learned a move or two somewhere, but if you don’t want to see blood, step aside.”

I cocked my head.

“And if I don’t?”

“Nameless martial artist, the price of reckless bravado is death.”

The people nearby erupted in cheers at the line straight out of a martial-arts movie.

Once the cheering died down, I spoke.

“Hey, can I ask you one thing?”

The martial artist answered casually,

“Speak. They will be your last words.”

I stared into the shadow beneath the martial artist’s bamboo hat and continued.

“You’re Hyuk Mujin, right?”

“…!”

I let out a deep sigh and looked up at the sky. A signboard written in vigorous, soaring calligraphy caught my eye.

Hyuk Family Cloth Shop

“You have three seconds. Put your head on the floor.”

Chapter 243

Hyuk Mujin had been living a dream day after day. Every now and then, he even pinched his own cheek.

Mujin, are you really allowed to be this happy? This isn't a dream, is it?

He had every reason to feel that way.

Just over ten years ago, he had been nothing more than a boy who admired martial artists.

No, I don't need to go back that far.

Even two years ago, he had thought his life was a cesspool.

His working hours were long and tedious, and his martial arts had stagnated.

And when the person he saw most often was the drunken, good-for-nothing Third Young Master, anyone short of the Buddha himself was bound to take a bleak view of the world.

I held it in and held it in, then finally threw one punch.

The day he drove his fist into the Third Young Master's jaw, Hyuk Mujin's life changed.

Countless battles. One brush with death after another…

The Third Young Master—or rather, his Captain—was like a magnet that drew every danger in the world toward him.

Hyuk Mujin fought through the threats flying at them from every direction, and by the time he came to his senses, he had grown by leaps and bounds.

Ohhh, power! Power is surging through me!

…Patient, come over here. Your crazy spell is acting up again, so it's time for your beating.

Bam! Ba-ba-bam!

He had taken an awful lot of beatings, too. There had even been times when he secretly set out a bowl of pure water and prayed behind Jin Taekyung's back.

Please, please don't let the Captain hit me anymore. Just take him somewhere far away.

Had his prayer been answered?

One day, Jin Taekyung left without warning.

As Hyuk Mujin watched him depart with the Fire King, he felt both sad and liberated.

And at last, the prime of his life began.

You're Hyuk Mujin?

Gasp! Great Hero Wipeng, how do you know me…

Draw your sword. Let's see what you can do.

He began receiving instruction from Wipeng, the Peak master known as the Ghost Sword.

Did you say the Jin Dragon Squad?

That's right. It's made up of the family's finest. I've been appointed its Squad Leader.

Wow! The Jin Dragon Squad! Congratulations!

Pack your things.

Pardon?

You're the Vice Squad Leader. This is our lord's command, so you cannot afford a single mistake.

Gasp. I pledge my eternal loyalty to the Jin Family of Taiyuan. At your command! At your command!

He had become Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad, the Jin Family of Taiyuan's most elite unit.

A young man who had once dreamed of becoming the Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion had, in just a year or two, grown into a martial artist capable of standing shoulder to shoulder with the family's leading figures.

They truly had been dreamlike days.

…At least until a moment ago.

"You're Hyuk Mujin, right?"

"…!"

Wild hair. A thick, unkempt beard. A muscular beggar dressed in rags.

At the words that came from his mouth, Hyuk Mujin's hands and feet went numb.

That voice was unmistakably familiar. How had he failed to recognize it at once?

No wonder the back of his head had been itching strangely…

Where did it all go wrong?

Was it when he came to Henan as Jin Wikyung's escort?

Or when he accepted his father's request to inspect the Henan branch of the Hyuk Family Cloth Shop?

He didn't know. There was only one thing he could be certain of.

I'm fucked.

Cold sweat slid down his back as he heard the words that turned his journey to Henan into a journey to hell.

"I'll give you three seconds. Put your head on the ground."

His mind screamed no, but his body knew better.

Hyuk Mujin, a rising talent of the Jin Family of Taiyuan and Vice Squad Leader of its most elite unit, slammed his head into the ground with a thunderous cry.

"Yesssss, sir!"

Thud!

A white stone wall, with five or six rooftops visible beyond it.

The large estate where the Jin Family of Taiyuan was staying drew steadily closer.

“This the place?”

“…Yes.”

Hyuk Mujin answered in a half-dead voice. His once-impressive martial uniform hung in tatters, and one eye was swollen and bruised dark blue.

To borrow his own words from half an hour ago, this was the price of reckless bravado.

“Oh. You found a nice place to stay. The family must be doing pretty well these days.”

I wasn’t the only one who had changed over the past year. Hyuk Mujin had changed, and so had the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s standing.

The fact that they had rented an entire estate this large with the Star-Array Grand Banquet right around the corner told me all I needed to know.

“Lead the way, punk.”

“Urgh! That hurts! It hurts!”

“I’m kicking you because it’s supposed to hurt, punk.”

I walked along, booting him in the rear.

Two Jin Family martial artists standing rigidly on guard before the estate spotted their superior and gaped.

“Gasp!”

“Vice Squad Leader!”

Hyuk Mujin subtly averted his gaze and cleared his throat.

“Ahem. Have you been keeping proper watch? This gentleman is…”

Shing! Shing-shing!

“You bastard!”

“How dare you do this to our Vice Squad Leader!”

He was the Vice Squad Leader of some newly formed unit called the Jin Dragon Squad, and apparently his subordinates thought quite highly of him.

I gave the Jin Dragon Squad members pointing their swords at me an amiable smile.

“Put those away. I’m with the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“Vice Squad Leader, are you all right?”

“Where did this beggar bastard come from, spouting nonsense?”

At his subordinates’ response, Hyuk Mujin nodded with a stricken expression.

“Not a beggar bastard. He’s the Third Young Master.”

Pardon?

“But no matter how you look at him, he’s a beggar…”

I could let it go once, but not twice.

Hyuk Mujin noticed my expression change and spoke gloomily.

“Hocheol.”

The martial artist named Hocheol promptly answered.

“Yes, Vice Squad Leader.”

“Put your head on the ground.”

“…”

Right. That was the least I could expect from my right-hand man.

Leaving Hocheol behind to commune with the earth, I stepped onto the estate grounds. Almost immediately, I came face-to-face with someone strolling through the courtyard.

“…!”

“…!”

His eyes trembled with emotion.

Even if ten years had passed instead of one, he would have recognized me. It wouldn’t have mattered how disheveled I looked.

That was what blood ties meant. That was what it meant to be brothers.

“Well, look who it is.”

The massive man staring at me, frozen like a statue, was Jin Wikyung. A radiant smile spread across his face.

He strode toward me and spoke.

“Are you from the Beggars’ Sect?”[1343]

“…”

Brothers, my ass.

“I recognized you at a glance, actually.”

“Are you kidding me?”

“I’m serious. Did you really think I wouldn’t recognize you, my youngest?”

“Do I look like a complete idiot?”

Don’t try to pull that on me. He had even asked what position I held in the Beggars’ Sect.[1344]

Jin Wikyung fidgeted under my stare, then turned to Hyuk Mujin.

[1343] The Beggars’ Sect is a martial faction of beggars, traditionally counted among the Nine Sects and One Gang.

[1344] The Beggars’ Sect is a martial faction of beggars, traditionally counted among the Nine Sects and One Gang.

“Vice Squad Leader Hyuk. Didn’t I send you a Sound Transmission earlier? I told you I was going to pretend not to recognize him and asked you to play along.”

“Ah, well, you see…”

“That’s what happened, isn’t it? Hmm?”

Hyuk Mujin furrowed his brow.

“Ow. Lesser Family Head, why are you suddenly stepping on my foot?”

“V-Vice Squad Leader Hyuk!”

“Aagh! It hurts!”

“…”

He was trying. He really was.

I didn’t need to look under the table to know exactly what was happening.

As I watched the two of them, a quiet laugh escaped me.

They haven’t changed.

Jin Wikyung and Hyuk Mujin.

They were the same two people I remembered. The events of the past year had lent them more experience and composure, but underneath it all, they were unchanged.

That alone was enough.

I wonder how everyone else is doing.

It didn’t take long to find out.

Jin Wikyung gave me a detailed account of everything that had happened since I left, including what had become of the people I had yet to see again.

Lee Seowol was still fighting to restore the Mount Heng Sword Sect to its former glory, while Wolhwa was building a city of entertainment in the relatively desolate reaches of northern Shanxi.

And then…

“Cheongpung is missing?”

“That’s right. Not long after you left, he set out for Huashan with the Three Plum Blossom Elites, but apparently ran away along the way.”

That wasn’t going missing. That was escaping.

From what I heard next, Cheongpung’s disappearance had caused quite an uproar.

An influential Elder from Huashan had even come in person to ask them for a favor—if they saw that Cheongpung bastard, they were to contact him.

“The sect’s most senior elder and its young prodigy vanished one after another. Their reaction was understandable. Just watching them made my heart ache.”

The Sword Saint and Cheongpung… At this point, shouldn’t I start wondering whether they were actually related by blood?

“Huashan is really thriving.”

"It's still doing better than our family."

"Why? Didn't they wipe out the mounted bandits in the north and continue to prosper? That sounds like they're doing pretty well to me."

Jin Wikyung shook his head gloomily.

"Huashan at least has a Sect Leader and plenty of disciples. Our Family Head's seat is vacant."

"Oh."

"Perhaps that's why their situation didn't feel like someone else's problem. We agreed to help each other from now on. Struggling martial factions have to support one another."

So that was how they ended up helping each other out.

I thought of the man who had been missing for years—the Family Head—then promptly erased him from my mind.

In this Murim, he might be my father, but I had never even seen his face. He was a complete stranger.

I felt no familial affection for him, much less any desire to see him.

If I see him, I see him. If not, whatever.

Instead, I was far more concerned about Jin Mukyung, whom I'd traded snarls with every chance we got.

"Come to think of it, where's Second Hyung?[1345] Did he go somewhere?"

Quite a bit of time had passed, but he still hadn't appeared.

Wipeng might have stayed behind to guard the Jin Family of Taiyuan in Jin Wikyung's absence, but Jin Mukyung should definitely have come…

"He's in closed-door training."

"Huh? Again?"

"Still would be more accurate."

"…You mean he's been in there this whole time?"

I was dumbfounded when Jin Wikyung nodded.

In martial-arts novels, everyone and his dog spent decades in closed-door training or meditating before a wall, but anyone who actually tried it would quickly realize it was nearly impossible.

Even a single year would be unbearable without extraordinary mental fortitude.

When did Jin Mukyung enter closed-door training?

It had been right after he lost his duel with Cheongpung, which meant he had been in there for a year and six months by now.

[1345] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

For all that time, he had not taken a single step out of the dark training hall. He had devoted himself to ceaseless training, surviving on water and fasting pills for all three meals.

"Could he have been in there so long that he lost track of the date? Maybe he didn't know about the Star-Array Grand Banquet."

"I went to see Mukyung before we left and told him about it. I asked if he wanted to come with us."

I didn't need to hear his answer. Jin Mukyung's absence told me everything.

Jin Wikyung continued in a low voice.

"He said he wouldn't leave until he achieved Great Completion. He asked me to tell you that."

Great Completion…

To Jin Mukyung, the Star-Array Grand Banquet was a fruit he could reach simply by stretching out his hand.

He was already one of the foremost young prodigies in the Central Plains. If he entered, he could prove his martial arts and win even greater fame.

But Jin Mukyung had chosen his martial arts over that sweet fruit.

He's an incredible guy.

While everyone else reached for the fruit and scrambled up the tree, Jin Mukyung had turned his back on it and devoted himself to training.

And one day, when his training was complete, he would possess not the fruit, but the tree itself.

A tree laden with fruit.

Yeah. That's a true martial artist.

I respected his choice. I didn't know what lay at the end of the path Jin Mukyung had chosen, but I believed its direction was more correct than anyone else's.

That was enough.

I murmured with a sigh.

"So that's how it turned out."

"Are you disappointed?"

"A little. I was hoping the three of us would get together again."

"Even without those two, the world is full of exceptional masters. The Ten Dragons and Phoenixes are right there, aren't they?"

"I guess."

At my lukewarm response, Jin Wikyung smiled faintly.

"Then I'll have to turn that disappointment into joy."

Pardon?

"I brought you a present."

A present? As I stared at him in confusion, Hyuk Mujin rose from his chair.

A short while later, he returned carrying something long and tightly wrapped in thick cloth.

“Do you know what it is?”

Of course I did. The moment I saw it, my heart began to pound and my fingertips twitched.

It was instinct.

Not Jin Taekyung’s instinct, but a spearman’s.

“This is…”

“Fifteen days ago, Elder Jang Taebo handed this to me and said something.”

Shrrk.

As Hyuk Mujin peeled away the cloth, Jin Wikyung’s voice rang in my ears.

“He said he finally understood how Gan Jiang and Mo Ye must have felt.”[1346]

Vrrrrm.

The spear let out a low hum.

[1346] Gan Jiang and Mo Ye are a legendary husband-and-wife pair of swordsmiths from Chinese lore.

Chapter 244

I had loved the sea ever since I was a child. I loved its distinctive salty scent that pierced my nose, and I loved standing still and watching the waves crash against the shore.

And now, there was a sea inside me.

The qi sea.

Another name for the dantian.

As always, I swam through that endless sea of qi.

I took hold of the horn of the fire dragon curled within my dantian, leisurely made the rounds of hundreds of acupoints, then opened my eyes.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You have successfully completed circulating your qi!
The realm of the Scorching Sun Divine Arts has risen to the sixth stage!
All Fire Gate Clan martial arts have become more refined and powerful!
All fatigue has been cleared, and all stamina has been restored!
Level Up!

Finally, the sixth stage?

I neither saw nor heard any of the other System notifications. The only thing that mattered to me was that the realm of the Scorching Sun Divine Arts had reached the sixth stage.

This is where the real thing begins, right?

The Fire Gate Cavern had been created by the first Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan for his successors.

Filled with fire energy, it was ideal for absorbing Scorching Yang Qi and particularly well suited to learning the Fire Gate Clan's greatest martial arts.

Simply put, it was a double-EXP event zone.

But even that place had a clear limit.

Hmm.

"Why are you groaning like a dog that needs to take a dump?"

That was from a conversation I'd had with Jeok Cheongang around six months after entering the Fire Gate Cavern.

At the time, I was brimming with confidence after achieving the remarkable feat of reaching the third stage of the Scorching Sun Divine Arts.

“Oh, it’s nothing. I was just wondering whether I should spend another year in closed-door training here.”

“Here? In the Fire Gate Cavern?”

“Yes.”

“What about the Star-Array Grand Banquet?”

“I’m improving by leaps and bounds here. Why would I leave? If I stay just one more year… Why are you looking at me like that?”

“It’s nothing. I was merely marveling at how much of a blockhead you are.”

“That sounds like a pretty big deal to me.”

Jeok Cheongang looked at me as though I were hopeless, then let out a deep sigh.

“Do you know how old this old man is?”

“If even you don’t know, how would I?”

“I am one hundred and one years old this year.”

“Oh. One hundred and one Dalmatians.”

“I swear by the ancestors of the Fire Gate Clan, if you spout one more piece of nonsense, I’ll throw your body into the sacred flame as firewood.”

“…Yes, sir.”

“In any case, even this old man, who has lived for so many years, remains at the eighth stage. What was that you were saying?”

“Wait. The eighth stage? Haven’t you already achieved Great Completion?”

“Do you think a divine art is called a divine art for no reason? Although your progress is fast, even the martial arts that can be learned in the Fire Gate Cavern have their limits. In the case of the Scorching Sun Divine Arts, that limit is precisely the fifth stage.”

“…Then what comes after that?”

“Martial arts are like weapons. You must sharpen and hone them without end. The only answer is to gain enlightenment through countless hardships and experiences.”

“Then I should at least reach the fifth stage of the Scorching Sun Divine Arts before our time here is up.”

“Would you look at this greedy brat. Reaching the third stage in a mere six months is already an incredible achievement. Don’t start spouting nonsense just because you have the Heavenly Martial Physique.”

“How long do you think it’ll take me?”

“Who knows? It took this old man exactly five years to go from the third stage to the fifth… Even with the Heavenly Martial Physique, it should take you two years.”

Exactly six months later, I found myself staring at a half-dazed Jeok Cheongang.

“T-This can’t be happening. It makes no sense.”

“But it did happen. Did it really take you five whole years?”

“You little bastard! I was one of the greatest geniuses of my generation!”

“Yeah. Heavenly Martial Physique.”

“This is impossible! Why did it have to be someone like you!”

Remembering Jeok Cheongang howling in despair, I let out a quiet laugh.

Putting the old memory aside, I rose and stood before a large full-length mirror.

Reflected in it was a perfectly proportioned body with compact, powerful muscles, hair carelessly twisted up and tied, and a clean-shaven chin.

It would’ve been fine if I’d left it alone.

Now that the thick beard was gone, my face felt oddly bare. But there had been no overcoming Jin Wikyung’s forceful insistence.

“The Star-Array Grand Banquet is a gathering watched by every martial artist under heaven. The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi is appearing in the Central Plains, and you plan to go out looking like this? It’s a crime!”

I had thought he was being a little dramatic, but after getting it cut, I liked this better.

Whatever else anyone might say about this body, its face was ridiculously handsome.

You look like a gisaeng’s brother.[1347]

I was inwardly muttering the highest compliment one man could give another when I suddenly realized I had forgotten something.

Clink.

“Oh, right. These.”

The shackles, iron chains, and iron ball I had continued to drag around even after arriving at the estate of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

I gazed silently at the objects that had practically become parts of my body, then opened my mouth.

“Inventory open. Summon.”

Whoosh!

The next moment, a solid spear shaft filled my hand.

The weapon summoned from my Inventory was a spear approximately two meters long.[1348]

Perhaps because it had been forged from an enormous quantity of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, it gleamed with a beautiful, translucent light from the spearhead to the butt of the shaft.

[1347] Gisaeng were traditional Korean entertainers trained in music, dance, and the literary arts; the phrase refers to a handsome, delicate-looking man.

[1348] Two meters is about 6.6 ft.

“White Flame.”

Vrrrrm. Vrrrrm.

As though it had recognized its own name, a faint vibration traveled from within the shaft.

White Flame was a weapon forged solely for me by Jang Taebo, the former Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild and a man hailed as the greatest smith under heaven.

Perhaps that was why White Flame was special.

Both to the naked eye and in the System window.

However…

“Captain, it’s time to leave.”

As Hyuk Mujin’s voice outside the door reminded me, it was time to go.

Sunlight flooded the world outside the window, and the people of the Jin Family of Taiyuan—including Jin Wikyung—were moving about busily.

“All right.”

As I answered, I choked up on the spear and slashed.

With four streaks of light, everything that had bound me for the past year fell away. The shackles, chains, and iron ball rolled noisily across the floor.

Clatter! Boom!

Bang!

Startled by the tremendous noise, Hyuk Mujin opened the door and rushed in.

“What was that?”

“Nothing. Let’s go. Oh, bring the chains with you.”

“…You’re planning to tie me up with those, aren’t you?”

“Those chains are made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.”

“Gasp! They’re mine. Mine!”

Clicking my tongue, I stepped outside. Jin Wikyung sat astride a large black horse, and he grinned when he spotted me.

“Let’s go.”

“Yes.”

Our destination was Mount Song.

There, the curtain would rise on the Star-Array Grand Banquet, an event drawing the attention of the entire Murim.

“Yah!”

Jin Wikyung and I led the way, with fifty members of the Jin Dragon Squad following behind us.

Through the rushing wind, someone’s distant cry echoed faintly.

“Wait! Wait for me! Don’t leave me behind!”

"…"

I still couldn't believe that bastard was the Vice Squad Leader.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, muttered with an annoyed expression.

"…Does this old man really have to attend something like this?"

The Dharma King, Hong Dao, was sitting with an endlessly benevolent expression.

"This old monk is bored enough to attain Buddhahood, so keep your mouth shut and sit still."

"Why? You said you were bored too."

"I am already bored. What do you think will happen if an old man with little time left starts whining beside me like a seven-year-old child?"

"I would get annoyed."

"Exactly. If I become both bored and annoyed, I may smash my wooden fish[1349] and return to my quarters."

"You've attained enlightenment."

"Amitabha.[1350] Amitabha."

Tok. Tok. Tok-tok-tok-tok…

The clear sound of the wooden fish echoed through the room. Those who had been listening with pricked ears looked utterly dumbfounded.

They say the Fire King and Dharma King are famous for their eccentric behavior. I can see why.

Those two haven't changed at all.

Why won't that old bastard just die?

Their thoughts differed, as did their clothing and the auras they exuded.

Some were middle-aged men without a single white hair, while others were old men with heads of pure white.

The dozen or so people gathered there, each so different from the others, were not ordinary mortals.

They belonged to the fifteen pillars supporting the Murim of the present day: the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was already familiar with some of them.

"Oh, if it isn't Family Head Namgung."

Namgung Ryong, the Family Head of the Namgung Family, rose and offered a fist-and-palm salute.

[1349] A wooden fish is a wooden percussion instrument used in Buddhist practice.

[1350] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, spoken here as a Buddhist invocation.

“Please forgive my late greeting. The two of you were having such an entertaining conversation that I found myself listening…”

“It’s fine. I left in a hurry last time and didn’t even get to see your face. My apologies.”

“Not at all. I am the one who should apologize.”

“So, is your son competing in this Star-Array Grand Banquet?”

“He won’t be able to compete this time.”

“That’s unfortunate.”

Jeok Cheongang’s face showed not the slightest trace of regret as his gaze shifted to the man beside Namgung Ryong.

“Who are you?”

The man with the sycophant’s beard asked sourly, “Are you speaking to me?”

“Yes. You, with the beard like a sycophant’s.”

“I am Gong Iljung, Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect.”

“Ah. Are you that fellow they call the Wind-and-Cloud War God or something?”

“Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord.”

“What does that matter? Young man, why are you so rigid?”

Gong Iljung, a “young man” who had long since passed sixty, had to steady his breathing.

Only a year earlier, he had been shocked when the Roaring Fury Swordsman—his Senior Brother, who had studied under the same Master—returned with a severe Internal Injury.

But he had to endure it. The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was quite literally a mad tiger.

“Did you hear about it from your Senior Brother?”

“…Yes.”

“Keep him under control so he doesn’t come to my attention. Shoving him into the Repentance Cave for about twenty years might not be a bad idea.”

Gong Iljung barely managed to swallow the curse rising to his lips.

What Jeok Cheongang meant was that he could easily live another twenty years, so Gong Iljung had better not act up.

Even those who normally regarded Jeok Cheongang with displeasure inwardly clicked their tongues.

What a vicious old man…

Is he planning to live forever?

You’ve caused enough trouble. Go already, old man. Let the rest of us breathe.

I should have brought my Master.

They might have belonged to different sects, but the Murim had a strict order of seniority.

Jeok Cheongang was a figure from two generations earlier, which naturally placed his seniority far above theirs.

That was one reason the leaders gathered there could do nothing but tremble before him, no matter how much they dominated the world.

Martial arts, seniority, or verbal skill—there was not a single area in which they could beat him.

“Ahem. Ahem.”

“Erhm.”

Several people were clearing their throats to avoid Jeok Cheongang’s questions when a booming voice rang out.

“Hahahaha! With the tiger away, the fox has been playing king. Jeok Cheongang, have you been well?”

Jeok Cheongang turned toward the thunderous voice, his brow already deeply furrowed. He knew exactly who had arrived.

“Goddammit. You’re still not dead?”

“Listen to the way this little old man talks.”

An enormous old man threw back his head and laughed. Although his mouth split open in a broad grin, his sharp eyes swept over Jeok Cheongang.

“I welcomed a great-great-grandson not long ago. There’s no chance I’ll die before I see that boy get married.”

“A great-great-grandson?”

“What, are you jealous? My great-grandson’s wife is Hebei’s greatest beauty, and the boy looks just like his mother. He’s adorable.”

Jeok Cheongang replied with an indifferent expression.

“The greatest beauty in that neighborhood can’t be trusted. Isn’t Hebei the place where anyone with fists this big and a thick waist gets called Yang Guifei?”[1351]

“What!”

“Anyway, congratulations. With ten children, I suppose you’ll never have to worry about heirs.”

“…What kind of bullshit are you trying to pull?”

“What do you mean? To celebrate seeing your great-great-grandson, why don’t you change your title while you’re at it? Forget Thunderbolt Saber King. How about Virility Saber King?”

“GRAAAAGH! You old man!”

“Sit down while I’m asking nicely. Don’t you remember breaking your bones when you challenged me during the Great Faction War?”

Sssshhhh!

[1351] Yang Guifei was a Tang-dynasty imperial consort celebrated for her beauty.

Powerful waves of qi poured from the two Supreme Peak masters. Their auras were so overwhelming that everyone present felt a chill run through them.

If the Dharma King had not been there to mediate, blood might have been spilled.

“Now, now. Amitabha, Amitabha… Both of you, calm yourselves. The heroes outside are waiting. How can you make such a disgraceful spectacle? Do you wish to smear the names of the Fire Gate Clan and the Hebei Peng Family with shit here today?”

His final words proved effective. The two men hesitated, then withdrew their auras.

“Ahem. Jeok Cheongang, I’ll teach you a lesson next time.”

“I’ll be waiting, Virility Saber King.”

Having delivered the final blow to the Thunderbolt Saber King’s title, Jeok Cheongang leisurely walked away.

The Dharma King, the Thunderbolt Saber King, and the overlords of the various regions followed behind him.

They passed through a corridor draped in blue cloth and stepped out into the blazing sunlight.

Three zhang[1352] below, tens of thousands of people gathered at the foot of Mount Song greeted them with a tremendous roar.

“Waaaaaaah!”

[1352] A Chinese zhang is approximately 3.33 m (10.9 ft); three zhang is about 10 m (33 ft).

Chapter 245

Waaaaaaah!

The deafening roar of tens of thousands of martial artists made my ears ring.

They had gathered here to attend the Star-Array Grand Banquet, each carrying dreams of rising to prominence, and their cheers seemed endless.

The noise, which seemed as though it would never end, gradually died down the moment Dharma King Hong Dao raised his hand.

In that hand was the Green Jade Buddha Staff, the symbol of a thousand years of Shaolin. Shaolin Temple was the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim, and its immense authority silenced the crowd.

The old monk's deep voice, infused with profound internal energy, spread across the grounds.

"I often look up at the sky. Over the long years, I have seen, read, and watched countless stars."

I had heard something once.

They said the greatest reason Dharma King Hong Dao had become the Abbot of Shaolin was not his formidable martial arts, but his learning and wisdom.

"The Star-Array Grand Banquet. If you wish to become the brightest star at this banquet, think brightly and act brightly."

After a brief silence, he added one short sentence.

"That is how one survives even in darkness."

The shorter a congratulatory speech, the better. Better still if it contained a hint of profound wisdom, and better yet if the speaker was the Abbot of Shaolin.

Another roar of cheers and applause erupted.

"Waaaaaaah!"

As I watched, I suddenly wondered how many of the tens of thousands gathered here had actually understood what he meant.

Probably one in ten.

No, not even one in a hundred.

But I understood. I knew what Hong Dao's words referred to.

Dark Heaven.

My training in the Fire Gate Cavern had been harsher than everything I had endured before it combined.

Jeok Cheongang had pushed me relentlessly, so much so that he had seemed not merely impatient, but downright anxious.

At first, I had thought it was because of his infirmities of old age.

But before long, Jeok Cheongang revealed something after much deliberation. Only then did I understand his urgency.

Dark Heaven. A powerful enemy that had yet to reveal its true nature.

We don't have much time. Keep training and preparing. That is the best thing you can do.

I looked at the old man standing to Hong Dao's right.

His small frame was noticeably different from Hong Dao's, yet he gave off an overwhelming presence. Jeok Cheongang somehow spotted me and flashed a crooked grin.

He looked visibly older than he had a year ago. My chest churned before I knew it.

You'd better know you're dead if you don't win.

"…"

Especially if you run into some bastard with the surname Peng. Beat the shit out of him. Break him and tear him apart!

A cold wind swept through my queasy chest.

One dose of the Fire King's motion-sickness medicine, delivered through Sound Transmission, cured me completely. I quietly looked away.

Until I arrived, I had been fairly confident. But seeing the sheer number of martial artists with my own eyes made it difficult to guarantee victory.

I'd better not answer. If I give him a definite answer and then lose, he'll ride my ass even more.

In any case, the opening address was over, so the preliminaries would begin soon.

Like a salmon swimming upstream, I pushed through the tightly packed martial artists toward the back. Then I spotted a familiar face.

"Huh?"

What was that guy's name again?

Oh, right. Jongni Chu of Yunnan. The guy with the self-styled epithet Always-Victorious Sword.

I had wondered why he had come all the way here from some remote backwater. Apparently, he had come for the Star-Array Grand Banquet after all.

With his skills, he should make it pretty far.

I considered saying hello, but decided against it. It seemed like it would only become a hassle.

Instead, I sent a greeting to the guy standing blankly and looking around, one he could not hear.

Yeah. Good luck to you too.

And prayed that, if possible, he wouldn't run into me.

"I like duels. There are winners and losers, but no draws. What could be more clear-cut than that?"

The middle-aged man muttered in a relaxed voice.

A pair of glasses imported from the Western Regions[1353] rested on his nose. They had the marvelous ability to make objects appear several times larger, which naturally made them extremely expensive.

“That’s why people bet money on them. The result is certain.”

Gambling was an inseparable part of the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

From the preliminaries, which filtered out the unqualified among tens of thousands of applicants, to the finals, hundreds of duels would be held.

For that reason, the Star-Array Grand Banquet was not only a feast for the martial artists of the world. It was also the greatest season of the year for gamblers across the continent.

“So, who would you like to bet on, and how much?”

The bald man sitting across from the middle-aged man asked the question. At a glance, he looked like someone with one foot in the underworld, but his manner was polite.

“You’re still as impatient as ever.”

“We have a lot of customers waiting.”

“I see. Well, let’s see…”

After a moment’s pause, the middle-aged man pulled a money pouch from his robes and tossed it onto the table.

Unable to withstand the weight, the pouch opened, and gleaming silver yuanbao[1354] spilled across the tabletop with a clatter.

“A thousand silver nyang[1355] on the Iron-Water Divine Dragon of the Yangtze River Channel League.”

“…”

It was an enormous sum.

Especially considering the preliminaries had not even begun.

The middle-aged man’s nerve was clearly extraordinary.

The bald man’s eyelids trembled as he stared at the silver yuanbao[1356].

“Are you betting on the Iron-Water Divine Dragon to win the whole thing?”

“Of course not. Cheol Soo may be one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, but he’s not capable of that yet. His Master, the Seafaring King, would be another matter.”

“Then…?”

“I’m betting he’ll take first place in the preliminaries.”

“Hmm.”

[1353] The Western Regions is a historical East Asian term for lands to the west of China, especially Central Asia.

[1354] A yuanbao is a Chinese ingot used as money.

[1355] A nyang is a traditional Korean unit of currency. It is not a Korean won.

[1356] A yuanbao is a Chinese ingot used as money.

The bald man let out a low groan.

The preliminaries of the Star-Array Grand Banquet were commonly called a “sieve.” With so many applicants, those below the required level had to be filtered out.

Naturally, judging tens of thousands of applicants created countless possible outcomes.

Which also meant the odds would be enormous.

“That’s different from what you said earlier.”

“How so?”

“You said you liked duels because there were only winners and losers, making the result clear-cut.”

“You really shouldn’t gamble.”

The middle-aged man laughed heartily before continuing.

“That’s the kind of wager third-rate gamblers make. All or nothing. One of the two sides is bound to win, so there’s a limit to how much you can earn. But who am I?”

“A Dogon.”

“Exactly. That’s why I like duels. People want the easy road. They don’t want the difficult one.”

“Ah.”

A gambler among gamblers. A gambler who had reached the Peak of his craft was called a Dogon.

The middle-aged man had come here with a conclusion drawn from meticulous research and calculation.

The bald man bowed deeply in admiration.

“I’ve learned a great deal, Great Hero Kwak.”

“If you learned something, you should pay the tuition.”

“What would you like?”

“Keep your mouth shut, just as you have until now.”

“Of course.”

“Then that’s enough. Let’s see… The preliminaries should be starting soon. I’ll have a drink and come back to collect my money.”

He had absolute confidence that his prediction would prove correct.

That was a Dogon for you.

The middle-aged man pushed up his glasses and left.

A swordsman guarding the door, practically dying of curiosity, cautiously asked, “Boss, who was that?”

“That gentleman? A Dogon.”

“Gasp! A Dogon?”

"And one of the most renowned Dogons in the world."

"Is he really that incredible?"

"There are exactly three legendary Dogons."

The bald man spread three fingers.

"A-Gwi[1357] in Sichuan. Jjak-Gwi[1358] in Guangdong. And the last one…"

One of his fingers folded down.

"On a continental scale, that gentleman. Kwak Cheolyung."

"Kwak Cheolyung…!"

"So go keep an eye on the Iron-Water Divine Dragon. Now that I think about it, that rookie's gotten pretty damn cocky."

Whack!

The bald man kicked the swordsman in the shin.

A short while later, he welcomed his next customer. This one was rather strange, with a mask pulled up over his nose.

"Where would you like to place your bet?"

"Will this be kept confidential?"

The masked man's voice was uneasy.

He flinched as if people beat him up every chance they got. Anyone could tell at a glance that he was a Third Rate martial artist.

The area around his eye is all black and blue. Someone must've worked him over pretty good. Well, as long as I get paid, it's none of my concern.

A gentle smile spread across the bald man's lips.

It was his professional smile, the one that appeared automatically whenever he saw a sucker.

"Of course. Go ahead."

The masked man glanced around nervously before pulling out a money pouch.

"A hundred silver nyang[1359] on Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, taking first place in the preliminaries."

"Those from there to here, follow me."

The Star-Array Grand Banquet had so many participants that it required hundreds of supervisors and multiple testing grounds.

More than a hundred applicants followed their assigned supervisor. Naturally, I was among them.

[1357] A-Gwi means "hungry ghost," a being in Buddhist tradition.

[1358] Jjak-Gwi is a Korean nickname meaning "one ear."

[1359] A nyang is a traditional Korean unit of currency. It is not a Korean won.

There really are a lot of people.

Not only were they numerous, but they came in every possible variety.

There were skinny people and fat people, fresh-faced youths with downy hair and wandering martial artists who looked as though they had been through every hardship imaginable. There were women who immediately drew the eye and handsome men with flawlessly smooth features.

A hundred people, a hundred different appearances. The saying fit perfectly.

One massive man stood out even among that crowd. He looked like the very definition of a man's man, and judging by our eye levels, he was at least a head taller than me.

Fuck, is this the continent or Norway?

He stood over two meters[1360] tall. His forearms bulged with enough muscle to look ready to burst, and one bore a tattoo of a salmon impaled on a harpoon.

Even his features looked oddly Western. He looked so much like a Norwegian that I began to wonder if he actually was one.

I stole a sideways glance at him, only for our eyes to meet.

"…"

"…"

I cautiously opened my mouth.

"Ah, aim fine, thankoo. An' yoo?"

"…?"

That wasn't it. What was it again?

I had stopped studying English after my elementary-school red-pen workbooks,[1361] and now I was so nervous the words barely came out.

"Ah! Where are you from?"

Norway answered.

"You fucking asshole, what are you doing?"

"Oh, I'm sorry."

"You little shit, are you picking a fight with me right now?"

A hearty stream of curses and the gazes of everyone around us came flying my way.

Just as I was about to answer, the supervisor shouted sternly.

"Anyone who causes trouble will be forcibly disqualified!"

Norway opened and closed his mouth like a salmon as he glared at me.

Then a strand of Sound Transmission reached me, carrying an aura and killing intent as rough and sharp as a harpoon.

I'll make you regret this.

[1360] Two meters is about 6 ft 7 in.

[1361] Red Pen is a Korean home-study workbook brand.

Talk about vicious. A true descendant of the Vikings.

Still, I was the one in the wrong.

I bowed my head in apology and continued walking. A forceful snort sounded behind me, but I pretended not to hear it.

He's pretty strong, though.

He looked to be in his twenties, yet he was already a formidable opponent. My pulse quickened at the thought that I had encountered someone like him right from the start.

The world really is wide.

If the preliminaries were already this intense, genuine monsters might come crawling out during the main event. Remembering Jeok Cheongang's warning, I steeled my resolve.

"The first thing we will assess is your fist-and-foot techniques."

The supervisor led us to an unnamed cliff.

I did not need to ask how the test would be conducted.

Other applicants were already taking it.

Whack! Crack!

"Graaagh!"

A foolish martial artist with his wrist twisted rolled across the ground. The supervisor sighed and broke a bamboo marker.

"Jangyu of the Butterfly Sect, eliminated. Next!"

The next martial artist stepped forward and punched the cliff.

Boom!

This martial artist was around the First Rate level. At least he knew how to put internal energy behind his strike.

A clear mark appeared on the cliff, which was a hard-packed mixture of roughly equal parts rock and soil.

The supervisor measured its depth and width, then nodded.

"Gobul of the Sodang Sect, passed. Next!"

Those who passed moved aside, while Third Rate martial artists whose punches left faint marks—or who hurt their hands with a single blow—were eliminated in droves.

"You've seen enough to understand how this works. Let's begin. Now, let's see…"

The supervisor pulled out a bamboo marker.

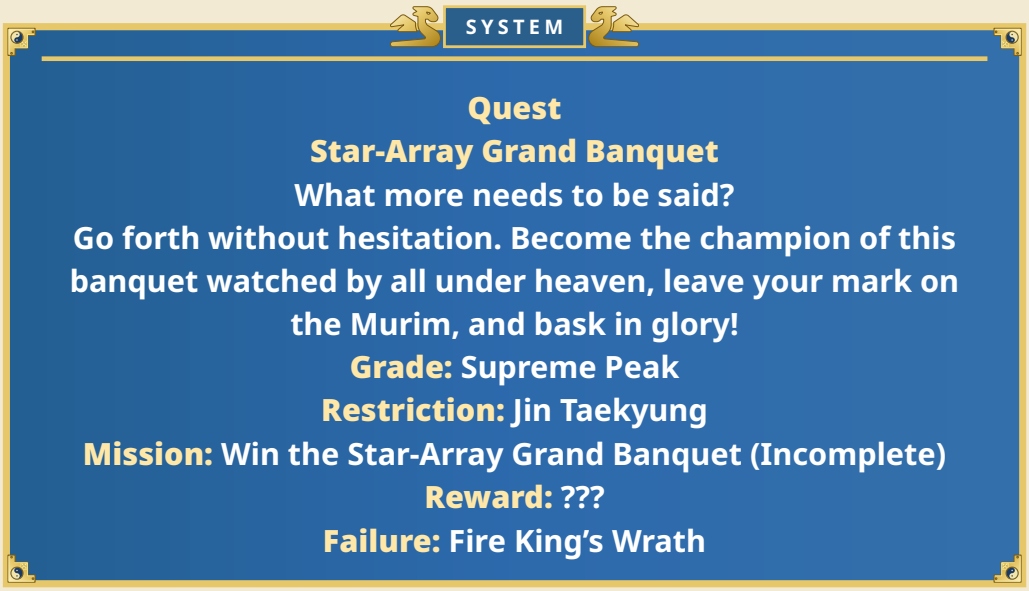
Then he called a name.

"Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

As the gazes of the people around me turned toward me, a System notification rang out.

Ding.

Chapter 246



"…"

I paused at the penalty for failure.

I mean, I might not win the Star-Array Grand Banquet. Is that really something to get angry about?

Imagining Jeok Cheongang flying into a rage left me feeling a little wronged.

Especially after teaching me for barely a year.

Granted, I was an extremely unusual case.

Even so, the fact that the Quest window went out of its way to spell it out suggested just how much Jeok Cheongang expected of me.

"Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Where are you?"

"Oh, here."

At the supervisor's call, I closed the Quest window and stepped forward.

With every step I took, I felt the people's gazes on me. Along with them, murmuring voices pierced my ears.

"Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan…"

"The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?"

"Is that him? The young man the Fire King took as his Disciple?"

"That's him. I'm sure of it."

I also heard Norway's familiar gruff voice.

"Hmph. So you did have something to rely on. You may look the part, but you're still a weakling."

Ignoring the whispers from every direction, I stopped in front of the cliff.

The supervisor, who had been staring at me in surprise, addressed me in a suddenly more respectful tone.

“If the mark is at least three Korean inches[1362] deep, you pass. Anything less is a failure.”

“Yes.”

Three Korean inches[1363] was roughly ten centimeters.

Any ordinary First Rate master who had consistently trained in fist techniques should be able to pass without much trouble.

But now that it was my turn, I found myself growing tense.

Damn. I have no idea how much force to use.

I honestly had no clue. Exactly how much strength did I need to apply to leave a mark three Korean inches[1364] deep?

After staring at it for a moment, I decided to use the Help function.

“Excuse me, Supervisor.”

“Yes?”

“As long as I make the mark at least three Korean inches[1365] deep, I pass, right?”

“That is correct. However, once your fist lands, the test is over.”

“Oh, I see.”

Well, that makes it easy.

I nodded, placed my fist against the cliff, and gave it a gentle push.

Thump! Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The cliff face split as softly as tofu. Fragments of rock and clumps of dirt came pouring down.

With my arm buried up to the elbow, I looked at the supervisor.

“I pass. Okay?”

“…”

The supervisor’s expression was a sight to behold.

His mouth hanging open, he looked back and forth between my face and the arm embedded in the cliff. Then he stammered out a question.

“H-How did you do that?”

“I pushed.”

“I mean, how did you…”

“I just put some strength into it and pushed.”

“…”

"Anyway, I passed, right? My fist never left the cliff, and it went in plenty deep."

"W-Well…"

The supervisor's pupils wavered.

"I-I'm not entirely sure. Nothing like this has ever happened before."

"Then it's settled. This is how you handle it from now on."

"Y-Young Hero Jin, I'm sorry, but could you do it a little more normally? I'm finding it rather difficult to judge…"

"Normally?"

I did it this way because I don't think I can do it normally, you idiot.

I was wondering whether I should just throw a moderately powerful punch when —

"Bwahahaha!"

The sudden burst of laughter made everyone, myself included, turn toward it.

Norway, the massive man who stood out from the crowd, was looking at me with open mockery.

"You're desperate to stand out, aren't you?"

I scratched my chin and answered.

"Not particularly. But why are you so desperate to pick a fight with me?"

"You?"

"Yeah. You."

A vein bulged on Norway's forehead.

"I heard the Fire King's Disciple had only just passed the age of twenty."

"I'm twenty-two. I'm all grown up."

"I am thirty."

"Thirty? That's pretty close to my age. Wanna be friends?"

"How dare a fresh-faced brat like you…"

Does he have a fetish for honorific speech or something?

He glared and stepped forward, but the supervisor moved to stop him.

"Control yourself!"

"To hell with self-restraint. The only person who can speak to me like that is my Master."

I leisurely folded my arms.

"So this is what you've been dying to tell us. Fine, let's hear it. Who's your Master?"

"The Seafaring King."

The Seafaring King? Could it be…?

I cried out in shock.

"Jang Bogo!"[1366]

[1366] Jang Bogo was a ninth-century Korean maritime commander and trader.

"What the fuck are you talking about? My Master's name is Pa Ryun! The Seafaring King, Pa Ryun!"

"Oh. Right. Of course not."

Unlike me, who was disappointed, everyone else reacted strongly to the name that had just come out of Norway's mouth.

A stir spread among the applicants and supervisors in our group. Even the people being tested more than ten jang[1367] away began to murmur.

"Th-The Seafaring King, Pa Ryun!"

"Pa Ryun, the Alliance Leader of the Yangtze River Channel League and one of the Ten Kings?"

"Then that young man must be the Iron-Water Divine Dragon. No wonder he dared to pick a fight with the Fire King's Disciple."

"What is going on over there? Two disciples of the Ten Kings in the same group…"

Norway—or rather, the Iron-Water Divine Dragon—snorted at their reactions.

He was probably proud to have such an impressive Master, but pride in his own abilities also showed in every one of his actions.

Well, he's certainly strong enough to justify it.

Perhaps that was only natural for the Disciple of one of the Ten Kings.

Unlike me, he also seemed to have trained under the Seafaring King, Pa Ryun, since childhood.

I didn't know exactly how powerful the Yangtze River Channel League was, but he had clearly received unstinting support—martial arts, elixirs, and everything else he could need.

As I watched with my arms folded, the Iron-Water Divine Dragon gave a short laugh.

"So you're the Fire King's Disciple? Don't get cocky just because you come from some provincial martial family and received a mere year of instruction."

He wasn't exactly wrong. Shanxi Province lay on the outskirts, far from the Central Plains, and the Jin Family of Taiyuan was indeed a provincial martial family.

That may be true, but…

"You're a pirate. And your Master is a pirate chief."

"A pirate? How dare you insult the Yangtze River Channel League! We are heroes who roam the rivers and the open sea!"

"Sure. But boil that down to two syllables and you get 'pirate,' don't you?"

"You insolent wretch! What kind of vile nonsense is that? The heroes of our League are worlds apart from such scum!"

[1367] A jang is a traditional length of ten chi, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“Worlds apart? Do you guys eat those weird-looking fruits,[1368] too? The ones that make you unable to swim?”

“You son of a—!”

“You ate the Son-of-a-Bitch Fruit.”

Crack-crack-crack.

A vicious sound came from the Iron-Water Divine Dragon’s enormous fist.

He glared at me with killing intent in his eyes and stepped forward. The supervisor hurriedly moved between us.

“Wait! If you fight here, you’ll be disqualified—!”

“Move.”

“Gasp!”

Given the scale of the Star-Array Grand Banquet, every supervisor overseeing the examinations was a formidable martial artist, ranging from Supreme First Rate to Peak.

The supervisor assigned to our group was at Supreme First Rate, but the moment the Iron-Water Divine Dragon seized his shoulder, his face turned deathly pale.

“W-What is this…”

“You don’t need to stop me. My Master gave me strict orders to win the Star-Array Grand Banquet, after all.”

“Th-Then…”

“I’m not going to fight. I’m only going to show that brat one move.”

The Iron-Water Divine Dragon released the supervisor and strode toward the cliff. Without the slightest hesitation, he pushed his fist into it.

Craaaack!

Shattering the solid rock, he drove his arm in up to the forearm. Then he looked at me and clicked his tongue.

“This is all you accomplished.”

I had known it from the moment I first saw him, but the Iron-Water Divine Dragon was a master of exceptionally advanced external martial arts.

His size and strength couldn’t be explained by natural gifts alone.

Martial arts had built that body—an external qigong technique of the highest order had tempered it.

“Whoa…!”

“As expected of the Iron-Water Divine Dragon!”

Exclamations rang out at a feat of strength worthy of being called divine.

[1368] This refers to Devil Fruits in the Japanese series One Piece. They grant powers but leave those who eat them unable to swim.

Even an ordinary Peak master would have found it impossible without using internal energy. Yet the Iron-Water Divine Dragon had done it as easily as breathing.

And, as if to make a point, he had created a hole far deeper than mine.

“The Fire King’s Disciple is impressive too, but is he still outmatched?”

“That’s understandable. He’s much younger, and it’s only been a year since the Fire King took him as his Disciple.”

“The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi must have been aiming to win as well, but… it looks like that’ll be difficult this time.”

Whatever the people around me were whispering, the Iron-Water Divine Dragon was undeniably impressive.

Regardless of who his Master was, no one could dispute that he was skilled enough to hold his head high anywhere in the Murim.

Clap, clap, clap.

“Now that’s some strength. Congratulations on passing.”

“Pathetic. There’s no need to force yourself to act calm.”

“I mean it.”

The Iron-Water Divine Dragon snorted at my applause and turned toward the supervisor.

After one unbelievable spectacle after another, the supervisor was still dazed.

“Did I pass?”

“Ah. W-Well…”

“It doesn’t matter. I had no intention of stopping here anyway.”

Rumble-rumble-rumble.

The Iron-Water Divine Dragon pulled his arm free with absurd ease and looked around.

Reading the envy, jealousy, and despair in the gazes fixed upon him—the looks people reserved for the strong—he bared his teeth at me.

“Brat, consider it an honor to witness the Ship-Breaking Fist.”

“The Ship-Breaking Fist?”

He didn’t answer.

Instead, internal energy as vast as the open sea surged in waves from his entire body.

His waist, thicker than a bear’s, and his pillar-like arms bent far backward. Blue internal energy, like a flowing river, already surged around his fist.

Gooooong.

The air around us trembled.

Then—

Kkwaaaang!

The Ship-Breaking Fist.

A single punch capable of splitting a sailing ship slammed into the cliff.

A deafening boom rang out, followed by a storm. People covered their faces with both arms and groaned as dirt and fragments of rock rained down.

“Gasp!”

“Urgh!”

Amid the chaos, I stood perfectly still and watched without missing a thing.

That was why, when the dust cloud finally settled, I could fully understand the cries of astonishment that erupted around me.

Wow…

The cliff stretched over a hundred jang[1369] in both height and width, a natural formation that had stood there for countless years.

Now, a massive hole had appeared where none had existed before.

No. It would be more accurate to call it a small cave.

It was over ten jang[1370] across in every direction and five jang[1371] deep.

“I-I can’t believe it.”

“This is the Seafaring King’s unique martial art…!”

An unmistakable tremor passed through the crowd.

Everyone gathered here revered martial arts above all else and yearned to grow stronger.

Their awestruck gazes converged on the martial artist who had just displayed a level of martial arts they couldn’t hope to approach.

“Huff. Huff.”

His broad back heaved. Muscles swollen to the point of tearing rippled beneath his skin.

After catching his breath for a while, the Iron-Water Divine Dragon turned around with a composed expression.

A single short question slipped between his thick lips.

“The result?”

Only then did the supervisor come to his senses and barely manage to speak.

“P-Passed. You passed.”

“I see.”

The Iron-Water Divine Dragon’s lips curled upward as his gaze swept over the crowd.

The heat in his eyes had yet to fade. Finally, they stopped on my face.

“Did you see that?”

[1369] A jang is a traditional length of ten chi, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[1370] A jang is a traditional length of ten chi, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[1371] A jang is a traditional length of ten chi, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

I gave a small nod.

“What did you think?”

“It was impressive.”

“And?”

“Hmm. Congratulations on passing.”

“That’s all?”

“What else? You want me to pat you on the ass?”

Grind.

At the sight of the Iron-Water Divine Dragon grinding his teeth, my head instinctively shook from side to side.

I told him it was impressive. What more does he want from me?

What is he, a fucking child?

Maybe it was because he was a pirate, but he was as simpleminded as they came. The fact that he had poured out enough strength to leave himself breathless during the preliminaries was just as ridiculous.

I clicked my tongue inwardly and spoke to the supervisor.

“Let’s keep things moving. We’ve already wasted quite a bit of time.”

“Ah, yes. Understood. Then, next…”

I was turning away as the supervisor called the next name when the Iron-Water Divine Dragon spoke again.

“Looking at you, I can tell what level the Fire Gate Clan is.”

“What?”

I stopped without meaning to. The Iron-Water Divine Dragon continued in a mocking voice.

“Single-heir succession. No teaching to outsiders. It sounds grand, but in the end, aren’t you running away from me like a fucking dog with its tail between its legs?”

“That’s your opinion.”

“Is it only my opinion?”

“What?”

I suddenly looked around.

Countless gazes surrounded the Iron-Water Divine Dragon and me.

I could read the emotions in their eyes.

Disappointment. Contempt.

Beep.

The System notifications pierced my ears.

At that moment, I came to my senses as though waking from a long sleep.

So that's how it is.

For a moment, I had forgotten.

No—I had known, but I hadn't truly understood what it meant.

Even though the curtain had risen on the Star-Array Grand Banquet, this magnificent and dazzling stage where the martial artists of the world had gathered in one place…

This is the Central Plains. This is the world.

A world where everything was proven through strength alone.

Winners and losers.

A world divided into those two kinds of people.

That was the Murim.

"Hoo."

The Iron-Water Divine Dragon sneered when he saw me heave a sigh deep enough to sink the ground.

"Looks like you're finally ready to give it a try."

"Yeah. Thanks. That really woke me up."

"I heard you're fairly skilled with a spear. I'll graciously permit you to…"

"You called it the Ship-Breaking Fist, right?"

"Huh?"

"It might be able to split a ship, but a cliff is beyond it."

Whoosh.

One step.

The distance of five jang[1372] vanished.

By the time my foot touched the ground again, I had already passed the Iron-Water Divine Dragon.

[1372] A jang is a traditional length of ten chi, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

A belated cry of shock came from behind me.

“You—!”

Instead of answering, I looked up at the cliff before me.

The fire dragon sleeping in my dantian awoke and surged through every limb and bone. Hundreds of acupoints grew scorching hot.

“Jin Taekyung!”

“You fucking weakling. Consider it an honor to witness the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.”

Blue flames filled my vision.

Chapter 247

In a dank underground gambling den, a middle-aged man sat in a corner, fiddling with a set of bone tiles. His head drooped.

"…I'm done for."

A pair of glasses—an item imported from the Western Regions—rested on his nose. Until a few days ago, they would easily have been worth dozens of silver nyang.[1373]

Not anymore.

The lenses, said to magnify objects several times over, were cracked like rice paddies in a drought.

Two men watched him from a distance.

"Is that him? Is he really…?"

"That's Kwak Cheolyung. No doubt about it."

"Good heavens. I never thought I'd live to see one of the legendary Dogons in person."

One had narrow, birdlike eyes, while the other sported a goat's beard. Otherwise, they were ordinary gamblers of the sort one could find anywhere.

As they watched Kwak Cheolyung shuffle the bone tiles again, the goat-bearded man asked, "But what happened to him?"

It was a fair question. Kwak Cheolyung looked dreadful.

His face was haggard, and his beard had gone untrimmed. His silk clothes were black with grime and torn in several places.

They said he had spent his entire life moving from one gambling table to another, amassing an enormous fortune along the way.

Now, however, he looked like nothing more or less than a gambler who had lost everything.

"Did something happen?"

"It did. Something serious."

The narrow-eyed man nodded. Unlike the goat-bearded man, who had arrived in Henan late, he knew exactly what had happened to Kwak Cheolyung recently.

"What was it? Don't keep me in suspense. Tell me."

"He lost a bet."

"Winning and losing are common in this business, aren't they?"

"They are. But what if a thousand silver nyang[1374] were at stake?"

[1373] A silver nyang is a historical silver currency unit, not Korean won. Its value cannot be converted using a modern won exchange rate.

[1374] A silver nyang is a historical silver currency unit, not Korean won. Its value cannot be converted using a modern won exchange rate.

“Gasp! A thousand silver nyang[1375]!”

The goat-bearded man’s eyes widened.

That was enough money for someone to live in luxury for the rest of his life—no, enough for three generations to live like kings.

Regretting that he had missed such a massive game, he smacked his lips and asked, “It must have been the biggest wager since the founding of the country. Who was his opponent? A-Gwi? Or Jjak-Gwi?”

“My friend, I already knew you were hard of hearing, but you’re completely out of touch with recent news. A-Gwi had his wrist cut off by a fellow called the Mount Qingcheng Guillotine a couple of months ago, and Jjak-Gwi disappeared long ago.”

“Then who besides those two could possibly have beaten Kwak Cheolyung?”

“The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi.”

“Who?”

“Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. The Fire King’s disciple.”

The Fire King was one of the Ten Kings and a Supreme Peak master whose reputation resounded throughout the world. There was no reason for such a man’s disciple to gamble with a Dogon.

The goat-bearded man thought for a moment before crying out as if in a groan.

“Dodo![1376] He played Dodo[1377] at the Star-Array Grand Banquet.”

“Correct.”

The Star-Array Grand Banquet’s betting games were considered the greatest gambling matches anywhere under heaven, and were therefore called Dodo.[1378]

At last, the goat-bearded man understood what had happened and clicked his tongue.

“Tsk, tsk. Kwak Cheolyung did something stupid. The odds on the preliminaries may have been high, but he should have realized that meant the risk was high, too.”

“Do you think he bet without thinking? He must have had his reasons for being confident.”

“What did he bet on, and against whom?”

“The Iron-Water Divine Dragon taking first place in the preliminaries.”

“I suppose he’s strong, being the Seafaring King’s disciple, but I don’t think he’s quite that good.”

[1375] A silver nyang is a historical silver currency unit, not Korean won. Its value cannot be converted using a modern won exchange rate.

[1376] “Dodo” is the Star-Array Grand Banquet’s term for a gambling match; the name repeats the Chinese character for “gamble” (□□).

The narrow-eyed man shook his head.

“He seems to have gained some insight recently. I heard the Iron-Water Divine Dragon blew away a tenth of a cliff with his Ship-Breaking Fist.”

“…Is that even possible?”

The goat-bearded man had heard tales of Murim masters shattering the earth and cleaving the sky, but he had never imagined they were capable of anything like that.

While he was still reeling in astonishment, the narrow-eyed man said something even harder to believe.

“What’s so impossible about it? Right afterward, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi brought down the entire cliff.”

“…!”

The goat-bearded man asked haltingly, his eyes as wide as plates.

“H-He brought down a cliff?”

“That’s right. According to the witnesses, the whole thing came crashing down.”

“…”

The goat-bearded man said nothing. He merely stared at his friend in disbelief.

“Isn’t that just a wild rumor?”

“Everyone else, myself included, dismissed it as one at first. A man of flesh and blood bringing down a cliff with his bare hands? It didn’t seem possible.”

“Exactly.”

“But what can we do when it’s true? Kwak Cheolyung sitting over there is living proof.”

“Why would Kwak Cheolyung be proof…? Ah. He must have lost a thousand silver nyang.[1379]”

“Five thousand.”

“What?”

“What do you think it feels like to lose money in a game you were certain you’d win?”

“C-Could it be…?”

“Is Kwak Cheolyung any different from the rest of us? In the end, he’s just as addicted to gambling.”

The narrow-eyed man looked at Kwak Cheolyung with pity.

The disheveled man was staring blankly at the tiles in his hand.

“Three days ago, when the Iron-Water Divine Dragon withdrew from the Star-Array Grand Banquet and returned to the Yangtze, Kwak Cheolyung completely lost his mind.”

[1379] A silver nyang is a historical silver currency unit, not Korean won. Its value cannot be converted using a modern won exchange rate.

“Did he keep playing Dodo?[1380]”

The narrow-eyed man nodded.

“After the Iron-Water Divine Dragon, Kwak Cheolyung chose Jong Sam of the Hunroe Leg. He bet on him receiving the highest score in the leg-technique assessment.”

“That Peak master who was said to have no equal in kicks throughout Guangxi?”

“Yes. Though by now, he probably has quite a few equals. One of his legs was broken.”

“Don’t tell me the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi did that, too.”

“Are you starting to understand? That’s right. The two of them got into a minor dispute and agreed to exchange one clean blow each before calling it even. But one kick from the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi supposedly broke Jong Sam’s shin.”

“H-How?”

“I don’t know. They say he gave it a casual kick, and the shin snapped with a crunch.”

“…”

“The Hunroe Leg even struck first, but the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi just scratched his calf a few times afterward, and that was it. And next was probably…”

The stories that continued to pour from the narrow-eyed man’s mouth about the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi were nothing short of shocking.

The Kunlun Sect’s Kunlun Cloud Dragon, said to possess the finest qinggong[1381] among all the young prodigies under heaven, leaped five jang[1382] from a standing position—only to come crashing down with Jin Taekyung’s foot planted on his face.

The Beggars’ Sect’s Successor Beggar flew into a rage when he could not close the distance between himself and Jin Taekyung during the movement-technique assessment. Unable to contain his anger, he grabbed Taekyung by the back of the neck and was promptly beaten like a dog.

“The fifth assessment was mechanisms and formations. This time, everyone was certain the Zhuge Clan’s Lesser Family Head would take first place, but…”

The goat-bearded man, who had been listening with a vacant expression, cut him off.

“It was the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi again, wasn’t it?”

“Exactly.”

“But seriously, how? What kind of freak is proficient in mechanisms and formations, too?”

[1380] “Dodo” is the Star-Array Grand Banquet’s term for a gambling match; the name repeats the Chinese character for “gamble” (□□).

[1381] Qinggong is a martial-arts movement skill associated with light, swift leaps and travel.

[1382] A jang is ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Five jang is about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

“He isn’t. He’s just proficient in martial arts. The ignorant bastard had no idea what anything was, so he smashed everything in his path and forced his way through.”

“…”

“Anyway, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi took first place in the preliminaries, and Kwak Cheolyung, who bet on someone different every time, was left completely penniless. I heard he sank all the money he’d earned into it, then even mortgaged the estate and land where he’d planned to retire to borrow from loan sharks… Tsk, tsk.”

The narrow-eyed man gazed at Kwak Cheolyung with sympathy.

Only a few silver nyang[1383] sat before the legendary Dogon who had once amassed a tremendous fortune. They were probably all he had left in the world.

“Whether you earn it or lose it, it all happens in one shot. Isn’t that right?”

Only then did the goat-bearded man come to his senses. He licked his parched lips.

“Five thousand silver nyang.[1384] Whoever won that must have hit the jackpot.”

“He certainly struck it rich. Why else would they call him the Gold-Faced Young Master?”

“The Gold-Faced Young Master? Did he bet on the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?”

The narrow-eyed man nodded.

“He has incredible foresight. He must have won tens of thousands of silver nyang[1385] from this Dodo[1386] alone. Why else would he go around wearing a mask made of gold?”

“Good heavens.”

“They say he hasn’t even turned thirty yet… I suppose some men are simply destined to succeed.”

“Damn it. Some of us have reached this age without even owning a proper house. Hoo…”

The two men let out a deep sigh.

Then a chair scraped across the floor as someone rose to his feet.

Kwak Cheolyung staggered out of the gambling den. All he held were a few iron coins[1387] he had received as a consolation handout.

[1383] A silver nyang is a historical silver currency unit, not Korean won. Its value cannot be converted using a modern won exchange rate.

[1386] “Dodo” is the Star-Array Grand Banquet’s term for a gambling match; the name repeats the Chinese character for “gamble” (□□).

[1387] Iron coins are lower-value currency than the silver nyang mentioned earlier.

The Star-Array Grand Banquet was a long race, lasting at least half a month and sometimes as long as a full month.

After the three-day preliminary assessments ended, the applicants were given a day of free time.

That included me.

“Ahem. Ahehem!”

“Youngest! Youngest!”

“Captain! Captaiiin!”

“…Oh, please.”

Don’t. Don’t shout in a place this crowded. I’m already dying from all the attention, and now you’re making even more people stare.

Tap-tap-tap-tap!

I hurried toward my companions as quickly as I could.

As though he had been waiting for me, Jin Wikyung’s bear-like bulk charged forward with both arms spread wide.

“Youngest! My wonderful little brother!”

Whoosh! Grab!

The moment his bear paw locked around my upper body, Hyuk Mujin seized the back of my hand and rubbed his cheek against it.

“Ohhh, Captain! Top scorer in the Star-Array Grand Banquet preliminaries! The pride of the Jin Family of Taiyuan! The beacon of Shanxi Province! Our Captain! My lord!”

“…”

Jin Wikyung is my brother, so I’ll let it slide. But what the hell is wrong with Hyuk Mujin?

Doing my best to hide my bewilderment, I asked, “Are you out of your mind?”

“Yes. I’m insane! Your strength has driven me mad!”

“Are you seriously crazy? Let go. Let go already!”

Whack! Whack! Whack!

Even after I struck the crown of his head three times at lightning speed, Hyuk Mujin refused to budge.

Tears welled in his eyes from the pain, but he still would not release my hand.

“Thank you! Thank you for hitting me!”

“…Are you into that kind of thing?”

I had only heard rumors about people who took pleasure in being hit.

I had always wondered why he had never left despite the countless beatings I had given him. Now that I considered the possibility that he was one of those people, a chill ran down my spine.

“Respect-Your-Preferences Fist!”

Thump!

The blow landed squarely on Hyuk Mujin’s temple, and he collapsed to the ground.

At the same time, something bright and glittering slipped from inside his robes and landed on the floor.

“Huh? A gold mask?”

What is this now?

Is it a prop for that kind of play?

With a grave expression, I tucked the mask into my robes.

Hyuk Mujin, you dangerous bastard. This mask is confiscated for life.

Not a chance.

As I steeled my resolve, I noticed someone I had momentarily forgotten.

“Ahem. Ahehem!”

“Do you have a throat problem?”

Jeok Cheongang, who had been staring off at a distant mountain and repeatedly clearing his throat, flinched.

“W-What nonsense are you spouting?”

“You’ve been coughing this whole time.”

“Ahem!”

He kept looking away, clearly wanting to say something but pretending otherwise. The corners of my mouth rose on their own.

“I did well, didn’t I?”

“…”

“Perfect scores in all five assessments. Unanimous first place overall. That pretty much says it all, doesn’t it?”

“Ahem. Don’t get so pleased with yourself over something so trivial. Anyone could have done it, so stop making a fuss.”

“I heard it was the first time in the history of the Star-Array Grand Banquet.”

“These were merely the preliminaries. Have you forgotten what this old man told you? The world is vast, and there are many masters.”

“I beat three of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.”

The Iron-Water Divine Dragon of the Yangtze River Channel League. The Kunlun Cloud Dragon of the Kunlun Sect. And finally, the Divine Marvel Dragon of the Zhuge Clan.

The Beggars’ Sect’s Successor Beggar was a master comparable to them, and the Hunroe Leg was a Peak master who had already made a brilliant name for himself throughout Guangxi.

Their backgrounds and specialties were all different, but the five of them now had one thing in common.

“I beat every last one of them.”

“That…”

For a moment, Jeok Cheongang was at a loss for words. Then he shook his head again and again.

“Bah. Pathetic weaklings.”

“I’m the strong one.”

“There you go, acting cocky again.”

“Could you just tell me I did well? I brought honor to you—Old Master, no, Master—and to the Fire Gate Clan.”

“You still have a long way to go!”

His words were stern, but the corners of his mouth were twitching.

It was obvious that he was barely holding back laughter.

I would have known that even without the Sound Transmission Jin Wikyung sent me a moment later.

—Don’t let it bother you too much. It seems he already went and bragged about you to the leadership to his heart’s content.

“Ahem!”

As if he had overheard us, Jeok Cheongang cleared his throat again at the perfect moment. Forcing a stern expression onto his face, he said, “Do not grow arrogant merely because you defeated a few nobodies. Compose your body and mind, and prepare for the main event. Understood?”

He was right.

Only the preliminaries had ended. The main event, where the true masters would reveal themselves, had not even begun.

Among those who had passed through the sieve of the preliminaries, there were likely quite a few masters comparable to the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes—or even stronger.

I had already spotted several such people while watching the assessments.

The world really is vast. He was right about that.

Anyone who had concealed their true ability during the preliminaries was not only strong, but clever.

I grinned and gave Jeok Cheongang a fist-and-palm salute.

“I’ll keep that in mind, Master.”

“That boy. Ha ha. Ahem!”

An unmistakable smile appeared at the wrinkled corners of Jeok Cheongang’s mouth.

Chapter 248

Hong Dao, the Dharma King, sat dozing in the main hall when his eyes suddenly opened.

The first thing he saw upon waking was the small back of someone standing motionless, gazing up at the Buddha statue.

“When did you get here?”

“About fifteen minutes ago, I suppose.”

“So, did you go see your proud Disciple?”

Jeok Cheongang answered gruffly without turning around.

“What Disciple? How many times do I have to tell you? He isn’t.”

“Oh, so you are proud of him.”

“Ahem. Of course he should be able to manage at least that much. What’s so special about the Star-Array Grand Banquet preliminaries?”

“You’ve never done anything like that yourself.”

“There was nothing like this in my day. Back then, even the orthodox factions were busy fighting among themselves, going on about the Southern Murim and Northern Murim.”

“That’s true.”

Hong Dao stretched. Cracks echoed from all over his body.

“Still, this is enough to make a ghost wail. I didn’t sense your presence at all. Have you grown even stronger since I last saw you?”

“Why would a ghost wail? Buddha should be furious. The Abbot of Shaolin is dozing in the main hall like a sick chicken.”

“Don’t be so hard on me. We’re growing old together.”

Jeok Cheongang turned around and shouted.

“Who says I’m old? You should have kept up with your martial-arts training. Look at me. Don’t I look spry enough to last another ten years?”

Hong Dao studied Jeok Cheongang, then rolled his prayer beads between his fingers.

“Benefactor Jeok. May you be reborn in the Pure Land.[1388]”

“Look at this damn bald monk!”

Hong Dao let out a quiet laugh at his old friend’s reaction.

“I don’t know about ten years, but you should be fine for another three.”

“Was that the heavenly patterns or whatever telling you?”

“The heavenly patterns? According to what this poor monk saw long ago, you should have died years ago.”

[1388] The Pure Land is a Buddhist realm into which devotees hope to be reborn.

"What?"

Jeok Cheongang's face hardened. He could tell from Hong Dao's expression and manner that he was serious.

"Why didn't you tell me sooner?"

"Because the flow changed."

"The flow changed?"

"The heavens are vast, yet ever-changing. Just as your star was beginning to lose its light, a Morning Star rose in the northern lands."

"…Jin Taekyung. So it was that boy."

"The heavenly patterns told this poor monk that the Fire King stood in the Morning Star's path. I have watched for the past year, and so it proved. Your star now shines brighter than ever."

Everything that had happened flashed through Jeok Cheongang's mind.

He had grown old and suffered from the infirmities of old age. He had begun searching for Jangcheon, whom he had sent away long ago, so he could settle his final affairs before leaving this world.

He had intended to deal with his former Disciple—who might still be committing evil somewhere in the world—with his own hands, then entrust the Fire Gate Clan's future to the Sword Saint of Huashan.

And then…

I met him.

The infirmities of old age were both the curse of passing years and an illness of the heart.

When Jeok Cheongang was about to let go of the word life, a hand named Jin Taekyung reached out and caught it.

And so Jeok Cheongang changed.

The more he watched that talkative, reckless boy, the more the ember lingering in a corner of his heart flared back to life.

Longer. I want to live longer.

To do that, he had to free himself from the infirmities of old age that gnawed at his mind with every passing moment.

Over the past year, he had immersed himself more deeply in martial arts. He learned while teaching, and gained insight through contemplation.

Jin Taekyung was not the only one who had grown in the Fire Gate Cavern. Jeok Cheongang had taken another step forward as well.

"Three years…"

Jeok Cheongang's low voice echoed through the main hall.

"I'll turn those three years into ten soon enough. No, a hundred."

Hong Dao burst into hearty laughter.

“That’s excessive greed. How long exactly do you intend to live?”

“I don’t know. I’ll somehow keep dragging myself along and live.”

“You’d have to undergo Bone Transformation about three times.”

“Damn it. Then I’ll just have to settle for ten years. So you hang on until then, too. You still need to show that you’re going strong.”

Hong Dao silently rolled his prayer beads.

“We are already waves that have flowed past. The Spear King, who was once so robust, and the Wave King, who was more spirited than anyone, have already left this world. The others have grown old enough, too. Someone whose whereabouts are unknown may already be dead.”

The Ten Kings was the name given to the ten Supreme Peak masters who had swept across the Murim during the Great Faction War.

Some had been worn away by time. Others had died at the hands of their enemies.

Though they were called the Ten Kings, there were only eight in reality, and they were now old enough to prepare for death.

Jeok Cheongang let out a low groan, then suddenly shouted.

“Enough of that defeatist talk! What’s with all this gloom?”

But Hong Dao opened his mouth with a peaceful expression.

“Unnamed. I entrusted him with the Green Jade Buddha Staff last night.”

“…!”

“By the time he finishes his preparations in Arhat Cave and emerges, he should have grown into a worthy vessel. I have already chosen someone to serve as Abbot until then.”

“W-What did you say?”

Jeok Cheongang found himself stammering.

The Green Jade Buddha Staff was a sacred treasure handed down through Shaolin for a thousand years. Hong Dao had not only entrusted such a treasure to his Disciple—he had even chosen the next Abbot.

To Jeok Cheongang, Hong Dao looked like a man preparing to lay everything down and leave.

“You bald monk. Are you, by any chance…”

Jeok Cheongang let the end of his sentence trail off, but what he meant to say was easy enough to guess.

A faint smile touched Hong Dao’s lips.

“This poor monk intends to step down after this Star-Array Grand Banquet. If the heavens permit it, I may cling to life for another year or so. But no longer than that.”

“The heavenly patterns… Is that what they told you?”

“I need to rest. Please leave for today.”

"Hong Dao!"

"Amitabha.[1389]"

Hong Dao picked up his wooden fish and began striking it. The clear notes echoed through the main hall, silencing Jeok Cheongang. Only after a long while did he finally turn and leave.

The three days of preliminary assessments had done their job admirably.

Of the more than fifty thousand applicants, only 1 percent—barely five hundred people—had earned the right to advance to the main event.

The organizers gathered them all in one place.

Naturally, I was among them.

"Look over there. It's Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi."

"What? That greenhorn? He looks younger than my youngest Junior Brother."

"What does age matter? Martial talent is what counts. Still, he's incredible. He's come this far after becoming the Fire King's Disciple only a year ago…"

"For fuck's sake. Is he supposed to have a Heavenly Martial Physique or something?"

I turned toward the voice. A man who looked to be in his early thirties flinched, then quietly avoided my gaze.

He must have thought I was going to say something to him, but he had read me completely wrong.

The guy's got good instincts.

The System's possibilities were endless. My Muscles and Bones, which had already been so exceptional that Jeok Cheongang called them the Heavenly Martial Physique, had developed even further during my training on Mount Jiuhua.

Eventually, even Jeok Cheongang had shaken his head again and again.

"Monster. Just how much higher do you intend to climb?"

"I should at least see how far I can go."

"If this old man had possessed even half your Muscles and Bones, there would be Two Gods in the martial world by now instead of One God."

"But you don't."

"…Add another hundred geun[1390] to the iron ball."

Acting cocky had only made me suffer more, but in the end, every bit of it had helped me immensely.

After all, hard work—no, the System—never betrayed me.

[1389] Amitabha is the Buddha associated with the Pure Land. Saying his name is a Buddhist invocation.

[1390] A geun is a Korean weight unit of 600 g (1.32 lb); a hundred geun is 60 kg (132 lb).

The System paid out points and EXP with perfect precision, and my basic stats were absurdly high, so any martial art I used was several times more effective.

That was how I managed to beat three of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, each among the best in their respective fields.

The Iron-Water Divine Dragon of the Yangtze River Channel League had even voluntarily withdrawn from the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

When I asked why he would go that far, he said he couldn't win as long as I was around, so he might as well hurry home.

I couldn't decide whether that made him simple or smart, but he was definitely a cool guy.

On the other hand…

"Alas, the martial world's sense of decency has fallen to the ground. How could such a frivolous and violent man gain power? Oh, heavens!"

"You bastard who'd mix rice with dog shit and eat it. Even leaving you in a cesspit for three months and ten days wouldn't satisfy me."

"This is impossible. Are you saying this Young Master's knowledge is inferior to that man's martial arts? That cannot be. I must establish a new theory of mechanisms and formations."

Those three were simply beyond saving.

I had been listening to their endless muttering from behind me when I spun around.

"Hey, you three idiots."

Their muttering stopped dead at my call.

A moment later, the three idiots snapped their heads up and expressed their anger one after another, each in his own way.

"Alas, an idiot? How vulgar."

The Daoist in spotless white robes was Baek Woo, the Kunlun Cloud Dragon. I had sent him plummeting during the third assessment by stepping on his face.

I learned later that he had severe cleanliness issues and spent two shichen[1391] showering as soon as the assessment ended.

"I'll stuff shit into your mouth, you bastard."

Unlike Baek Woo, whose mere presence suggested cleanliness, this man reeked of piss and was a beggar to the bone.

Born and raised in the Beggars' Sect, he had eventually risen to the position of Successor Beggar—the man who would one day lead the sect.

His name was Gung Gibang.

The so-called Beggar Prince, pure-blooded beggar,[1392] ultimate beggar.

[1391] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; two shichen is about four hours.

[1392] "Pure-blooded" echoes seonggol, the highest hereditary rank in the ancient Korean kingdom of Silla.

During the fourth assessment, Gung Gibang had grabbed me by the back of the neck and been rewarded with a punch to the solar plexus.

"Idiot? Was that directed at this Young Master? If you could explain what you intended by it—and, assuming you know the exact meaning of the word idiot, define it for me—I would appreciate it."

The last was Zhuge Gyun, the Divine Marvel Dragon of the Zhuge Clan.

He wore the neat clothes of a scholar and a tidy hero's headband. Judging by his clothes alone, he looked like the most sane of the three.

That was only natural, considering he was wedged between a cleanliness-obsessed Daoist who couldn't stand a single speck of dust on his clothes and a beggar who looked as though he would happily eat filth even if it splashed into his mouth.

But as I had guessed, he was no ordinary eccentric.

He had expressed considerable regret over losing in the mechanisms-and-formations assessment, the fifth one.

Just look at this lineup…

A group more stacked than Manchester United's squad under Sir Alex Ferguson.[1393]

Seeing the three of them lined up together made my breath catch and my vision go dark. I took a moment to compose myself before speaking.

"Shut your mouths, all of you. Stop chattering. You're driving me crazy."

"Alas, did you just say 'shut your mouths'? Fellow Daoist Jin Taekyung, how can every word out of your mouth be so vulgar?"

"A bastard who wouldn't feel satisfied even after being rolled up in a mat, hung from a post, and beaten with a dog cudgel for forty-five days."

"'Shut your mouths. Stop chattering…' Those are not expressions commonly used in our family. I am personally quite curious, so could you write down some of the words you often use and give me a copy?"

"…"

I wanted to beat the crap out of all three of them.

Lamenting the fact that reality wouldn't allow it, I addressed the three idiots.

"If I meet any of you in a duel, consider yourselves dead."

"…!"

"…!"

"…!"

As expected, a cudgel was the best medicine for lunatics.

The three idiots clamped their mouths shut and exchanged glances.

Then it happened.

[1393] Manchester United is an English football club. Sir Alex Ferguson managed it during a period of sustained success.

Click. Click.
The sound of something hard striking the floor pierced everyone’s ears.
An old man soon appeared on the dais, one leg fitted with a wooden prosthetic.
“Sorry I’m late. As you can see, my leg’s in this state.”
He grinned, baring yellow teeth, and introduced himself.
“Nice to meet you. I’m Song Ho, the Thousand-Faced Fox.”

Chapter 249

The Thousand-Faced Fox. A fox with a thousand faces.

I had never seen a nickname suit someone so poorly.

Song Ho, the old man known as the Thousand-Faced Fox, was bigger than most burly men, with the warm, genial face of the grandfather next door.

He was about as far from a fox as a person could get. If anything, he seemed like the exact opposite.

He looks like that grandpa. The one who stands outside the chicken shop whether it rains or snows.[1394]

Put a pair of glasses on him, and they could have been twins.

But while I entertained such carefree thoughts, the air around me was taut as a drawn bowstring.

Faces were tense. I could hear people swallowing nervously.

The Thousand-Faced Fox…

He couldn't have gotten that nickname for nothing.

Once I changed my perspective, everything began to look different.

The aura I sensed from Song Ho was that of a Peak master—nothing more, nothing less—but there was something else about him.

Something unrelated to martial arts. Something only he possessed.

What is it?

As I studied Song Ho's profile, his head turned, and our gazes met.

He beckoned me over, so I took a step toward him.

"So you're the one?"

"Pardon?"

"Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. I've heard plenty about how the Disciple of Great Hero Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King, performed exceptionally well in the preliminaries."

Judging by the way he spoke, he seemed to have known Jeok Cheongang to some extent. I quickly bowed my head.

"Thank you."

"And you're also the reason there are so many more finalists in this Star-Array Grand Banquet."

I had heard plenty of things said about me, but this was a first.

I tilted my head. "Because of me?"

"Of course."

[1394] The grandfather outside the chicken shop is Colonel Sanders, whose image appears outside KFC restaurants.

A deep smile spread across Song Ho's lips.

"Aren't you the one who destroyed every mechanism and formation we installed for the final assessment?"

"Oh."

"Thanks to you, there must be a hundred more qualifiers. Once you destroyed the core, everyone else had a much easier time passing."

That happened?

Come to think of it, everyone had seemed to clear the assessment unusually quickly.

At the time, I had simply assumed the locals knew all about mechanisms and formations, unlike a foreigner like me.

"Judging by your expression, you had no idea."

"Yeah, well. I'm completely clueless when it comes to that stuff."

"Don't you regret it?"

"Regret what?"

"Destroying the core of the mechanisms and formations. There could have been far fewer competitors than there are now."

"Four hundred or five hundred—what's the difference?"

"'What's the difference,' you say…"

At my breezy answer, Song Ho pointed behind me.

"It won't be easy."

I turned in the direction of his finger.

The martial artists filling the training ground—including the three idiots—were all staring at me.

There were more than five hundred of them.

Every single one was either a Supreme First Rate martial artist recognized anywhere under heaven or a Peak master.

Some were scions of prestigious families who had learned martial arts with every possible advantage. Others were wandering martial artists whose bodies bore countless scars like medals.

That is a lot.

But it didn't matter. Four hundred, five hundred, even a thousand—my answer would remain the same.

I looked at Song Ho and slowly spoke.

"It doesn't matter. All I have to do is win."

"What? Ha! Hahaha!"

Damn, that was embarrassing now that I'd actually said it.

Song Ho must have loved my answer, because he burst into laughter. At the same time, though, I had drawn plenty of aggro.

I scratched the back of my head, which was beginning to prickle.

They're all thinking the same thing, so why pretend otherwise?

Everyone had come to the Star-Array Grand Banquet with a single goal: victory.

At this point, pretending otherwise would have been more ridiculous.

"You're an interesting young friend. Great Hero Jeok really raised quite the man."

Song Ho patted me on the shoulder and laughed with satisfaction.

Just then, a middle-aged supervisor who had been about to climb onto the dais spotted him and stopped short.

"Is that you, Sir Song? What brings you here…"

Song Ho's hand fell from my shoulder.

"I heard the qualifiers had arrived, so I stopped by to see their faces. Aren't they future pillars of the world?"

He swept a pleased gaze over the crowd, then turned away.

"Then this old relic will take his leave. It was a pleasure, everyone."

"…"

I didn't answer.

It had lasted only an instant, but I had definitely seen it.

His eyes had narrowed like those of a fox stalking its prey, his gaze suddenly razor-sharp.

The Thousand-Faced Fox.

I was beginning to understand why that genial-looking old man had been given such a nickname.

Where was he looking?

And who had he seen? What had he seen in them?

That gaze had flashed past in an instant, but it had certainly not been the gaze of a Senior surveying juniors far beneath him.

I was quickly scanning everyone's faces when—

"Hey! Friend!"

At first, I wondered what kind of lunatic was shouting.

A booming voice rang through the quiet training ground as someone waved enthusiastically.

I recognized his face from somewhere and let out a deep sigh.

What? That bastard passed too?

The Always-Victorious Sword, Jongni Chu.

The sight of his beaming smile made my curiosity vanish in an instant.

"All qualifiers, follow me."

I had no idea how long we walked behind the middle-aged supervisor before we arrived at a long line of carriages stretching into the distance.

“Wait. Where are we going?”

I didn’t know who had asked, but whoever it was must have been getting dirty looks from everyone around him.

The schedule following the preliminaries had already been explained several times.

The middle-aged supervisor answered curtly.

“Luoyang.”

The Star-Array Grand Banquet’s preliminaries had been held on Mount Song with outsiders barred from entering, but the main event would take place in Luoyang, with a different format.

I had heard that spectator stands had even been prepared so people could watch the duels.

That was probably why the main event was called the true beginning of the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

“Everyone, board the carriages. It isn’t far, so we’ll arrive soon.”

Clip-clop-clop!

The instant the carriage doors closed, the horses’ hooves pounded against the ground.

I gazed out the window at Mount Song receding into the distance.

Three days of beautiful memories…

I wish that had been the reason.

The truth was that I simply didn’t want to look at the faces of the idiots riding with me.

“It’s been a while. Have you been well?”

“Fuck off. Don’t talk to me.”

Jongni Chu started us off lightly.

But it was too soon to relax. The war had only just begun.

“Good heavens, gentlemen. Did you hear what that Fellow Daoist just said? ‘Fuck off’! What is he, some common street thug? How vulgar and undignified…”

It was Baek Woo, the Kunlun Cloud Dragon and one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.

Without taking my eyes off the window, I said, “Shut your mouth. I won’t say it twice. And this ‘Fellow Daoist’ shit—I’ll turn you into cheese crust with the Flame Divine Palm.”

“What? ‘Shit’? You were speaking to this poor Daoist?”

“Yep.”

“You seem awfully high and mighty just because you happened to get ahead of me once in qinggong[1395]…”

“Hey, you.”

I turned my head and stared at Baek Woo.

“I told you to shut up.”

Our gazes collided in midair. A brief silence passed, and we both reached out at the same time.

No—Baek Woo was half a beat faster. He made the first move.

Whoosh! Rattle-rattle-rattle!

And then it was over in an instant.

Baek Woo’s eyes widened as I immobilized both his wrists.

“S-Striking Second, Hitting First?”

“Trying to get the first hit in, you bastard?”

What mattered in a fight was not who moved faster.

The result. The result was all that mattered.

I had definitely started later than Baek Woo, but I reached my target faster. That was all there was to it.

“Your grappling technique is a mess. Did you put everything into qinggong[1396]?”

“H-How did you…”

“What do you mean, how? You’re weaker than me, and I’m stronger than you.”

I grinned at his stunned face and continued.

“Now, you have three choices. Number one: take one hard hit from the Flame Divine Palm right now.”

“…”

“Judging by your expression, you don’t like that one. Number two: take a gentle hit from the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist. For reference, I brought down a cliff with it. If you think your body is tougher than a cliff, go ahead and try your luck.”

“I-Is there no third option?”

“‘Is there no’? What’s with that formal -so ending? You’re using haoche.[1397] Are you from the Lower District Sect? I thought you were from the Kunlun Sect.”

Baek Woo bit down hard on his lip.

“I-I am twenty-six this year. Four years older than you.”

“Oh, four years. Then would you rather take four Flame Divine Palms?”

“Gasp!”

Baek Woo shook his head vigorously.

“All right. Say it again.”

[1395] Qinggong refers to martial-arts movement techniques associated with speed and lightness.

[1396] Qinggong refers to martial-arts movement techniques associated with speed and lightness.

[1397] Haoche is a formal Korean speech register traditionally marked by sentence endings such as -so.

“Is there no third option…please?”

“There is. Number three: keep your mouth shut in front of me from now on.”

“I’ll take that one!”

“Good. Let’s travel in silence.”

I released Baek Woo’s wrists.

Conflict flickered in his eyes, but his face soon fell, and he lowered his head.

Unless he was exceptionally stupid and shameless, that was the obvious response.

That takes care of one, at least.

I looked over the others in turn.

Jongni Chu stared wide-eyed between Baek Woo and me.

Gung Gibang stopped scratching his thigh, while Zhuge Gyun closed the book he had been reading so intently.

“Hey. Beggars’ Sect.”

“…”

“Does this bastard only open his mouth when he’s talking about shit?”

Gung Gibang was the quietest of the three idiots. Whenever he did speak, it was usually some curse-like remark that began with dog shit, continued through cow shit, and ended with horse shit.

He was filthy beyond belief.

“Anyway, you get a choice too. The same three I gave him. You heard them, right?”

Gung Gibang nodded, his matted hair bobbing up and down.

“Pick quickly. I can’t be bothered waiting.”

After remaining silent for a while, Gung Gibang finally opened his mouth.

“The Beggars’ Sect’s Eighteen Dragon-Subduing Palms is one of the five greatest martial arts under heaven. Anyone who masters even eight-tenths of it will have few rivals in the world.”

“So?”

“Unfortunately, I have only mastered five-tenths of the Eighteen Dragon-Subduing Palms.”

“…?”

Gung Gibang continued, his eyes shining with determination.

“Therefore, I choose number three.”

“…”

I almost smacked him across the head, but stopped myself. Hitting him would probably only dirty my hand.

“Then keep your mouth shut from now on, Gibang. And make sure you speak politely.”

“G-Gibang? Politely?”

"Might Makes Right. Haven't you heard of it?"

"Even so, that's a bit…"

"Oh, right. You're twenty-six too, aren't you? Since you're four years older than me, would you like four Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fists?"

"…!"

The wavering light in Gung Gibang's eyes slowly settled.

He clenched his fists and shook out both hands.

Swish! Clack!

With lightning-fast movements, Gung Gibang formed a fist-and-palm salute and bowed his head.

"From now on, I shall call you Jin hyung.[1398]"

"Good."

Having neatly dealt with two of them, I turned toward the last idiot.

Zhuge Gyun had closed his book and was stroking a spotless white fan made from crane feathers.

"Galgyun."

"My surname is Zhuge. My given name is Gyun."

"Right. Galgyun. You've already chosen, haven't you?"

"Choosing is difficult."

"If you still haven't decided after watching the two Seniors in front of you, then you'll end up a corpse."

Zhuge Gyun regarded me calmly.

"My honored ancestor, Zhuge Wuhou, decided to enter public service only after Liu Bei's Three Visits to the Thatched Cottage.[1399]"

"What the hell? I told you to give me a number, and this lunatic starts talking about Romance of the Three Kingdoms. So what am I supposed to do?"

"Three Visits to the Thatched Cottage.[1400] Since Wuhou opened his heart after three visits, this Young Master chooses option three."

"…"

As expected of the Zhuge Clan.

Just look at that strategic buildup. He had even dragged his ancestor into it.

Maybe I should turn that crane-feather fan into a blood-feather fan.

Only one person remained, but Jongni Chu gave a sheepish laugh and raised both hands in surrender.

[1398] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[1399] "Three Visits to the Thatched Cottage" refers to Liu Bei's repeated visits to recruit Zhuge Liang as his strategist.

[1400] "Three Visits to the Thatched Cottage" refers to Liu Bei's repeated visits to recruit Zhuge Liang as his strategist.

"How frightening. I'll keep my mouth shut for the entire journey."

"Don't keep pestering me. Understood?"

"I understand. If that is what you want, so be it."

I had no particular grudge against Jongni Chu, so I decided to leave it at that.

Just as I began enjoying the peace I had won by subduing the three idiots, the speeding carriage slowed and soon came to a stop.

"We have arrived at our destination."

I looked out the window.

Lofty walls dozens of jang[1401] high. A massive iron gate. And a signboard bathed in the soft glow of sunset.

Murim Alliance

[1401] A jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Chapter 250

The Demonic Cult.

If they had never existed—if those who called themselves the Heavenly Demon Divine Cult had never appeared—the Murim under heaven would never have united as one.

But when Qinghai, Gansu, and Sichuan fell into the Demonic Cult's hands in a mere four months, everything changed.

The leaders of countless orthodox factions, including the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families, gathered in one place. Even major figures from the unorthodox factions and dark-path forces, such as the Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance, lent their strength.

And at the center of it all stood the Martial God.

An unparalleled master known as the greatest beneath heaven. An invincible man who belonged to no faction.

Let us raise a single flag. It is the only way.

Thus, after years of joining together and splitting apart, the orthodox factions, unorthodox factions, and dark-path forces united beneath a single flag.

The Murim Alliance was born.

Not long after the fierce ten-year Great War ended, the Murim Alliance was dissolved along with the Martial God's disappearance. But the site where the heroes of old had once gathered remained, carrying on in a new form with new people.

"Good grief, it's packed."

A middle-aged man stared wearily at the long line stretching out in front of the Murim Alliance.

They hadn't even entered yet, and it was already this crowded. Just imagining the chaos inside was enough to make his vision go dark.

To make matters worse, he still hadn't recovered from yesterday's drinking.

"Honey, why don't we just take a lap around the market and go home? Hm?"

At his desperate whisper, his wife firmly shook her head.

"No. Do you have any idea how excited he is? He's been begging us for three whole days, ever since the main event began."

"No, no. It'll be fine. We can take a lap around the market and put some candy in his mouth. That'll keep him quiet. To hell with the Star-Array Grand Banquet and all that. What's so impressive about watching Murim people fight anyway… Huh?"

The middle-aged man sucked in a startled breath.

His son, who had been asleep on his wife's back, was now awake and staring at him.

The boy's large eyes were moist, as if he might burst into tears at any moment.

"Dad. Aren't we going to see the Star-Array Grand Banquet?"

"No, son. That's not what I—"

"Sniff… Sob…"

"W-Wait. Just hear me out."

"Waaaaaaah!"

"…My boy sure has a powerful set of lungs."

A short while later, the child held candy in one hand and a wooden doll the size of an adult's palm in the other.

The unexpected expense left the middle-aged man grumbling.

"Damn thieves. How can a little chunk of wood cost that much?"

But he was still a parent. The sight of his son's beaming face eased his irritation a little.

"You like it that much?"

"Yes! Jin Taekyung is so cool! The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi is the best!"

"Jin Taekyung? The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi? Is that wooden doll's name Jin Taekyung?"

"Dad, you don't know Jin Taekyung?"

"O-Of course I do."

"Really?"

"Of course. There's nothing your dad doesn't know."

He couldn't sacrifice his dignity as a father over some wooden doll.

Having narrowly escaped the crisis, the middle-aged man waited until his son was looking away, then quietly asked his wife, "Honey. Who's Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi? You don't know either, do you?"

"Why wouldn't I?"

His wife looked at him as if he were hopeless.

"We came here to watch his duel today."

"…"

"The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung. Hyeok has told you over and over that he's won three straight duels in the main event… How can a father take so little interest in his own child?"

As his wife continued lecturing him, the middle-aged man had only one thought.

I hope this Sleeping Dragon or whatever gets his ass kicked today.

Whoosh!

I calmly watched the sword sweep toward me.

Fast as an arrow, agile as a snake.

After a bewildering series of forms, red Sword Energy shot toward me.

Shhk-shhk-shhk-shhk!

I flipped through the air. The Sword Energy passed less than half a span[1402] from me, and I thrust out my fist.

One punch wreathed in blue flame—the first form of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Boom!

A powerful collision.

Sword Energy and Fist Energy crashed together, sending a thunderous boom across the arena. Stone dust from the dueling platform billowed up, blocking my view.

I stepped forward.

Again. One more time.

Boom! Kraa-boom!

The shock wave bursting from my fist split the air. The flames of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist devoured the cloud of dust.

Beyond it stood a man.

Blood trickled from the corner of his mouth, his face deathly pale. He clutched a broken sword and stared at me with wide eyes.

“H-How?”

“Well.”

The moment I answered, I kicked off the ground.

Crack.

As my foot left the ground, spiderweb cracks spread across the solid bluestone. I tore through the fierce wind and threw a third punch at him.

“I surrender!”

The words burst from him like a scream.

My fist stopped directly in front of his nose. The pressure from its tremendous speed and force sent his hair whipping back.

The hero’s headband slipped from his forehead, fluttered out of the arena, and landed with a thud.

“S-Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, victory!”

Waaaaah!

At the referee’s declaration, the cheers the crowd had been holding back erupted from every direction.

[1402] A ppyeom is a hand span, measured between the outstretched thumb and little finger. Half a span is roughly 10 cm (4 in), though the length varies by person.

Hundreds—thousands—of spectators surged to their feet, throwing flowers and all manner of objects.

“Yeah! Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi!”

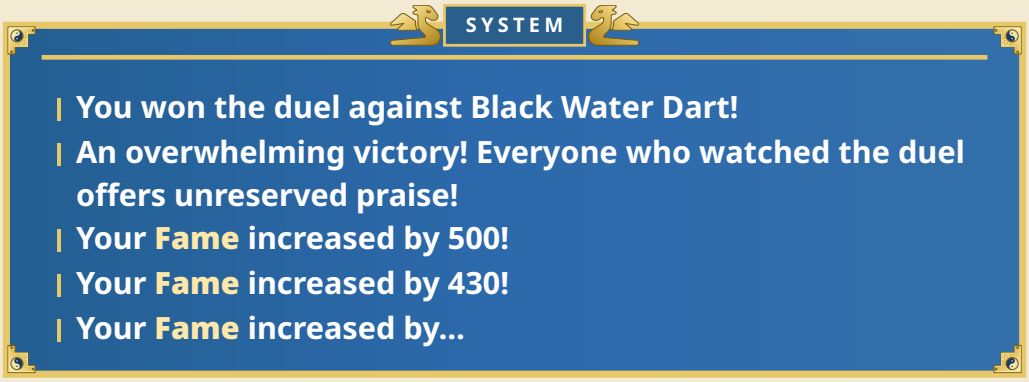
“Dad! I can’t see! Put me on your shoulders!”

“You’re the best, you punk! I even bought your wooden doll!”

The stands weren’t filled with martial artists alone. Plenty of ordinary people had come from Henan and even farther away to see the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

I waved to one particularly noisy father and son, then turned away.

Ding.



I listened to the familiar notifications as I stepped down from the dueling platform. At the same moment, someone landed lightly in front of me using an elegant movement technique.

Tap!

“Good heavens, what are all these specks of dust on your precious body? This poor Daoist[1403] will wipe them away for you.”

Damn it. This bastard’s here again.

No matter how many times I told him not to come, he refused to fucking listen. There was no helping him.

I snatched the towel from his hand.

“If you’re going to come, at least walk over like a normal person. Stop using the Cloud-Dragon Eight Forms or Oh Tae-sik or whatever.”

Baek Woo, the Kunlun Cloud Dragon, answered glumly.

“It is the Cloud-Dragon Eight Forms. Even so, it is one of the Kunlun Sect’s secret arts. You could at least remember its name…”

“Right. Imagine how heartbroken your Master would be if he saw you using that secret art to deliver towels. He’s probably watching from the VIP seats right now.”

“My Master told me to get along with Fellow Daoist.[1404]”

[1403] A Daoist is a follower of Daoism. “Fellow Daoist” is an address for another practitioner; “this poor Daoist” is a self-effacing way to refer to oneself.

[1404] A Daoist is a follower of Daoism. “Fellow Daoist” is an address for another practitioner; “this poor Daoist” is a self-effacing way to refer to oneself.

"…"

"I heard Great Hero Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King, once saved my Master's life…"

No wonder Baek Woo had been so unusually friendly since the day after we arrived.

He must have scampered over to his Master to tattle on me, only to have the whole thing blow up in his face.

Then there were my last three duels—or four, counting the one just now. Watching them must have driven one fact home.

I was far stronger than he was.

The same went for the other two idiots.

"Our sect's Eighteen Dragon-Subduing Palms is one of the five greatest palm arts beneath heaven."

"Sure. But you've only mastered it to the fifth level, right?"

"That is correct."

"Is that why you brought that?"

"Yes."

Gung Gibang approached with a solemn expression, carrying a basin of water for me to wash my face.

"…"

The whole thing was absurd, but I thanked him, washed my face, and dried it with the towel Baek Woo had brought.

The Beggars' Sect's Successor Beggar had brought me water, and the Kunlun Cloud Dragon, one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, had brought me a towel.

To everyone else, this must have looked like a very strange sight.

Wait.

Come to think of it, one of them was missing.

"Where's Galgyun?"

Normally, he would have rushed over by now and started rambling about his ancestor, Zhuge Wuhou,[1405] but he was nowhere to be seen.

Baek Woo answered, "Young Master Zhuge went to fight his duel."

"No wonder he's not here."

There were no fewer than five hundred competitors in the main event, so the duels were held in sequence across several different arenas.

Today was the third day. Once all the scheduled duels ended, only around thirty competitors would remain.

There have been more injuries than I expected.

Every participant was a master with at least one remarkable skill.

[1405] Wuhou is an honorific title of Zhuge Liang, a statesman and strategist of China's Three Kingdoms period.

Injuries were unavoidable. Some people even won a razor-close duel only to withdraw afterward.

I'm the unusual one.

Counting the victory I had just secured, I had won four duels, and not one had lasted more than fifteen minutes.

The longest had gone for a little over two hundred exchanges, and only because I'd wanted to experience my opponent's unusual martial art.

I'm glad I entered the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

From what I had seen, some of the competitors possessed a deeper understanding of particular martial arts than I did.

I was simply far superior in several other respects, and facing unfamiliar martial arts I had never encountered before was giving me valuable experience.

I never would've gained this kind of experience if I'd stayed in Fire Gate Cavern.

My gaze naturally drifted toward the VIP seats.

Jeok Cheongang was trying his hardest to control his expression, while Jin Wikyung looked so delighted he could barely contain himself.

And beside them…

"That old man's here again today."

"Who?"

"Who?"

"The Thousand-Faced Fox, Song Ho. He hasn't missed a single day."

Baek Woo and Gung Gibang started to turn, then froze.

"Why? Is he that important?"

"Sir Song?"

"You mean the Thousand-Faced Fox?"

They both asked at once, then lowered their voices.

"He is certainly an impressive man. No—perhaps frightening would be more accurate."

"The Murim Alliance's Hidden Shadow Pavilion once possessed an intelligence network that rivaled the Beggars' Sect's. It may even have surpassed ours."

"The Hidden Shadow Pavilion?"

Gung Gibang nodded.

"I heard it performed truly astonishing feats during the Great Faction War. Of course, the Thousand-Faced Fox, who was its head, deserves much of the credit for the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's existence."

So in modern terms, was he something like the director of the FBI?

If even the Beggars' Sect's Successor Beggar spoke of it that way, the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's intelligence network must have been extraordinary.

Judging from the past tense, it had probably followed the Murim Alliance into dissolution.

The former head of a retired intelligence organization…

As I watched him closely, Song Ho rose from his seat and disappeared somewhere.

I followed his retreating figure with my eyes until it vanished. Then a roar from the crowd rang in my ears.

“Waaaaah!”

“The Life-Sustaining Sword won again!”

I turned toward the cheers and saw Jongni Chu descending from a dueling platform, his clothes reduced to rags.

His entire body glistened with sweat, and he was gasping for breath.

The two idiots muttered as they watched him.

“Life-Sustaining Sword? Whoever came up with that epithet certainly has a way with names.”

“He does keep scraping out victories by a hair. In that sense, the Always-Victorious Sword truly is always victorious.”

The nickname Life-Sustaining Sword had been given to Jongni Chu because he won every match by barely surviving.

Even I hadn’t expected Jongni Chu to reach four wins, but apparently he was stronger in a real fight than I’d thought.

If he’s made it this far, he must have some skill.

Just how did he fight to earn a name like Life-Sustaining Sword?

A quiet laugh escaped me as I watched Jongni Chu frantically gulp down cold water.

Maybe I’ll meet him on the dueling platform later.

I hadn’t had much contact with Jongni Chu since three days ago. We merely acknowledged each other whenever we happened to cross paths.

If our next meeting was on the dueling platform, I might end up feeling a little sorry for him.

“Anyway, thanks for the towel and the water. You can clean these up while you’re at it.”

Baek Woo and Gung Gibang took the towel and basin respectively, then asked, “Where are you going?”

“Our sect’s Eighteen Dragon-Subduing Palms is one of the most renowned martial arts beneath heaven… Where are you going?”

“To watch Gyun’s duel.”

I had heard Zhuge Gyun practiced an unusual fan technique using a folding fan. I figured I might as well watch his duel and broaden my knowledge of martial arts.

I was about to head toward another dueling platform when I suddenly stopped.

“Oh, right. Who did they say his opponent was?”

The Invincible Divine Sword.

Zhuge Gyun gasped for breath.

When he had first heard his opponent’s epithet, he had laughed inwardly. It was far too grand a name for some unknown nobody with no reputation.

But…

How has someone like this remained unknown until now?

The hand gripping his fan trembled.

His legs had already lost half their strength, and merely staying upright was becoming difficult. His eyes ached from straining to follow sword strikes that moved too quickly to see.

The internal energy in his dantian had run dry long ago.

Zhuge Gyun was one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, yet he had been reduced to this state while the Invincible Divine Sword remained utterly at ease.

No—he even seemed excited.

“Wow! You’re the first person I’ve ever seen use a fan technique! Do you have another one? Another one?”

“…”

At the innocent voice drifting from beneath the deeply lowered bamboo hat, Zhuge Gyun threw away his fan.

Chapter 251

My prediction that Zhuge Gyun would win turned out to be spectacularly wrong.

By the time we reached the area where his duel and several others were being held, the crowd was roaring the Invincible Divine Sword's name while Zhuge Gyun sat there in a daze.

"What happened? You lost?"

Zhuge Gyun gave a bitter nod.

"I was completely toyed with. I couldn't touch so much as a hair on his head."

Zhuge Gyun was a direct descendant of the Zhuge Clan, one of the Five Great Families.

As his epithet, the Divine Marvel Dragon, suggested, his true weapon was his brilliant mind. But he had also learned his family's secret arts and was an exceptional martial artist in his own right.

Intelligence alone wasn't enough to earn a place among the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.

And someone toyed with him?

Then his opponent was clearly a league or two above him.

My curiosity piqued, I asked Zhuge Gyun, "Where is he?"

"He probably left right after the duel… Huh? There he is."

I followed Zhuge Gyun's finger and narrowed my eyes.

"That guy? The one stuffing his face with dumplings?"

"Yes."

"…Hmm."

"What's wrong?"

"Nothing. There's just something familiar about him."

He wore a baggy robe and a bamboo hat pulled low over his face. I couldn't make out his features or even his build, but there was something strangely familiar about the sight of him shoveling dumplings into his mouth.

Where have I seen him before?

At times like this, the direct approach was best. I headed toward the Invincible Divine Sword.

The closer I got, the less certain I became that I recognized him. But I did realize one thing.

He's strong.

His posture was full of openings, and he looked so carefree that he didn't seem remotely on guard.

Yet the energy I sensed from the Invincible Divine Sword was in no way inferior to mine.

Was there always someone like this around?

After a moment's thought, I spoke.

"Excuse me."

Chomp, chomp.

The Invincible Divine Sword's mouth stopped in the middle of devouring dumplings as if possessed.

"You're the Invincible Divine Sword, correct?"

"…"

"Sorry to bother you when we've never met, but I have something I'd like to ask."

"…"

"Excuse me?"

What was wrong with this guy? Why wasn't he answering when I was talking to him?

As I stared, the Invincible Divine Sword's Adam's apple bobbed beneath his bamboo hat.

Gulp.

"Ahem. Ahem."

"…?"

"Ahem. J-Just a moment."

After clearing his throat several times, he spoke in a low baritone.

But how should I put it? The voice was painfully forced.

"Why? No—I mean, what is it?"

"I have something I'd like to ask."

"Please go ahead. No—speak."

"…"

What the hell was this guy doing?

I regarded the Invincible Divine Sword through narrowed eyes. Perhaps sensing my suspicion, he tugged his bamboo hat even lower.

I'm starting to get a feeling about this.

I casually tossed out some bait.

"Oh, I should've introduced myself first. I'm Park Taekyung of the Taiyuan Park Family."

"Huh? When did you change your surname?"

"…"

"…!"

An icy silence fell.

Realizing his mistake, the Invincible Divine Sword frantically waved his hands. Instead of the forced baritone, a clear, youthful voice spilled out in a rush.

“No, that’s not what I meant. The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi is so famous that I already knew who you were.”

“Oh. I see.”

“Yes. Yes.”

“May I ask your name?”

“The Invincible Divine Sword.”

“Your name, not your epithet.”

“K-Kang Pung.”

What kind of Pung?

What a talent for names.

I let out a quiet laugh of disbelief.

There was no need to confirm it with the Qi Sense Skill. At this point, it would have been stranger if I still hadn’t figured it out.

“W-Why? I’ve never met you before.”

“Really? Then should I send a messenger pigeon to Huashan?”

“…!”

The Invincible Divine Sword slowly raised his bamboo hat.

A young man with an innocent face looked at me, resignation and delight mingling in his eyes.

“Hello, Benefactor.”

It was a welcome face I hadn’t seen in a year.

Laughing, I flicked the brim of Cheongpung’s bamboo hat.

The Murim Alliance was practically a city unto itself. It had residential areas, along with every facility needed for daily life.

So it wasn’t particularly surprising that it had an entertainment district as well.

We settled into an inn tucked away in the most secluded alley we could find.

Other than the ancient, nearly deaf proprietor, there wasn’t another customer in sight.

“I heard what happened. You ran away on the way back to Huashan?”

“Yes. Right after Benefactor left with Grandpa Jeok.”

“Why? Huashan is practically your home.”

“I didn’t want to go back. Grandpa wasn’t there anymore, and I hadn’t seen much of the world.”

“Still, I’m surprised you managed to escape.”

“My Martial Nephews tried to stop me, so I used a little force. They probably wouldn’t have woken up for three days. I ran away while they were out. Hehe.”

“…”

Just how much force had he used?

Still, only someone like Cheongpung could have pulled that off.

Baek Museong might be known as Huashan’s Lone Crane and one of the Three Plum Blossom Elites, but Cheongpung was a true genius on an entirely different level.

Even a Third Rate sword technique like the Three-Talent Sword Technique became a Peak martial art when performed by him.

From what I had seen, no one could match the depth of his understanding or the speed at which he learned martial arts.

If there were another genius like him, it would probably be Jin Mukyung.

Lost in thought, I listened to Cheongpung’s excited account of his travels through the martial world.

I had expected as much, and sure enough, he hadn’t done a damn bit of martial arts training. His stories were all about roaming around, goofing off, and eating to his heart’s content.

“I ate dumplings in Sichuan, but they were spicy!”

“Ah, yes. How astonishing.”

“Dumplings in Guangdong and Hainan have seafood in them!”

“That makes sense. They’re near the sea.”

“Dumplings in Zhejiang Province…”

Had this bastard done nothing but eat dumplings all year?

By the time he started talking about dumplings in Hunan Province, I couldn’t take it anymore and cut him off.

“So what are you going to do now?”

“About what?”

“The Invincible Divine Sword. Are you going to keep this up?”

“Yes. Martial Nephew Baek Museong knows I’m participating in the Star-Array Grand Banquet. If I disguise myself like this, no one will recognize me!”

“…”

“Hehe. I’ve fooled everyone completely.”

I would have bet my right hand and my entire fortune that they had already found him out. I was even willing to double down.

No wonder there were so many Huashan disciples near the dueling platform earlier.

The Star-Array Grand Banquet was open to martial artists from across the world, so there were no real restrictions against hiding one’s identity.

But Huashan was one of the Nine Sects and One Gang. There was no question its disciples had noticed Cheongpung long ago.

And yet they were merely watching him from a distance.

At this point, this is basically a group hidden-camera prank.

They could make a whole movie out of it and call it The Cheongpung Show.

I clicked my tongue inwardly as I watched Cheongpung enjoying himself. Then a thought occurred to me.

“Then I guess we’ll meet later?”

The smile on Cheongpung’s face widened.

“I hope so.”

“You hope so?”

“Yes. I was curious how strong Benefactor had become. I’ve wanted to spar with you at least once.”

The feeling was mutual.

Cheongpung and Jin Mukyung were two of the reasons I had decided to participate in the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

“What do you think, now that you’ve seen me again?”

“Hmm…”

“Be honest.”

I leaned back against the old chair.

Amid the creaking sounds, Cheongpung was silent for a moment. Then he suddenly tapped the scabbard hanging from his waist.

“Grandpa used to say that martial artists should speak with their weapons.”

“He was right.”

Straight from the Sword Saint himself.

I let out a quiet laugh and rose from my seat.

“Where are you going, Benefactor?”

“To prepare for the finals. We’ll finish our conversation there. With our respective martial arts, of course.”

“The finals…”

Cheongpung slowly repeated the word, then nodded with an unusually serious expression.

“Good. I’m going to win anyway.”

“Big talk from someone who spent the entire year eating dumplings.”

“I trained sometimes too.”

“Sure you did.”

Ignoring Cheongpung’s disgruntled muttering, I paid the bill and left the inn.

As soon as we emerged from the narrow, dark alley, we ran into a familiar face.

"Jongni Chu?"

Jongni Chu smiled and waved.

"Oh, we meet again. It seems we must be bound by fate."

"What fate? It's probably just a coincidence. What are you doing here?"

"I came to grab a bite."

"Here?"

The secluded alley held only a few shops lined up beside one another. Even those looked so old they were on the verge of collapsing.

It didn't look like a good place to find a meal by anyone's standards.

But Jongni Chu nodded calmly.

"I had some thin noodles at a nearby street stall, and the vendor told me that shop's dumplings were exceptionally good."

By sheer coincidence, he was pointing at the sign of the very inn Cheongpung and I had just left.

"Really?"

"Of course. Apparently, it's a hidden gem known only to a select few. Have you tried it?"

Cheongpung, who had already pulled his bamboo hat low over his face, abruptly joined in with his awkwardly altered voice.

"They're incredibly delicious. No, I mean, delicious they are."

Jongni Chu turned toward Cheongpung.

"I don't believe we've met. Would it be rude of me to ask who you are?"

"The Invincible Divine Sword, Kang Pung."

"Now that is an impressive epithet. I'm Jongni Chu, the Always-Victorious Sword. I hope we'll get along, friend."

"F-Friend?"

Cheongpung raised his bamboo hat slightly and stared at Jongni Chu before nodding furiously.

"Great! No—I mean, good! I'm delighted! You're the first person who's ever asked to be my friend!"

"…Enough. That's more than enough."

Why didn't he just walk around with Cheongpung of Huashan written across his forehead?

Jongni Chu smiled gently as he watched Cheongpung bouncing with joy while I tried to calm him down.

"It seems you already have a good friend at your side. In any case, I'll see you next time, friends."

"Yeah, let's just happen to run into each other once in a while. Not too often."

"Farewell! Farewell, my friend!"

“I’ll keep that in mind.”

He dipped his head and disappeared into the dark alley.

Once we stepped onto the bright, sunlit street, Cheongpung grinned.

“He seems like a good person. I can just tell.”

I offered him some serious advice.

“Not everyone who likes dumplings is a good person.”

“Oh, I should have told him to dip them in only a little soy sauce.”

“…”

He really didn’t listen to a word I said.

Cheongpung’s concern proved unnecessary.

Jongni Chu never entered the inn.

His steps didn’t stop even after he passed it.

How long had he walked through the dark alleys tangled together like a maze? At last, in a place containing nothing but a few rats and filth, Jongni Chu stopped.

A quiet voice slipped from his lips.

“The Invincible Divine Sword. The more I think about it, the better that epithet sounds. What do you think?”

The moment he finished speaking, the silent alley erupted into motion.

Swish, swish, swish! Pak!

Three streaks of light shot toward Jongni Chu’s vital points.

At the same time, a small masked figure shot into the air. His steps as he ran along the wall were swift and stealthy as the wind.

His qinggong[1406] was exceptional, and his concealment technique surpassed even that. Just as the masked man gathered his strength to leap—

Thud.

“Where are you going in such a hurry?”

“…!”

“Come down. Let’s talk.”

An immense force pressed down on both his shoulders. Breath brushed the back of his neck.

The masked man’s plummeting body trembled as if struck by lightning.

How can this be?!

He had completed hundreds of missions, but never once had anything like this happened.

Overwhelming. Irresistible.

[1406] Qinggong is a martial arts technique for moving swiftly and lightly, often across difficult terrain.

Never had those words felt so real. He realized that only one path remained to him.

Pavilion Master, it seems this is as far as I go.

The face of the superior he had loyally served for decades—the Thousand-Faced Fox—flashed before his eyes.

Just as Shadow Killer—the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's finest agent, whose name had since been forgotten—was about to bite down on the poison pellet hidden in his tooth—

"As expected of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion. Not a moment's hesitation. But…"

Tap, tap.

Lightning-fast fingers struck Shadow Killer's entire body. A low voice burrowed into his ears as his body stiffened.

"You should have known who you were following."

Consumed by utter despair, Shadow Killer felt his consciousness plunge into the abyss.

Chapter 252

One day, two days, three days.

As time passed, the tournament bracket steadily shrank. More than five hundred participants had entered the main event on its first day. Now barely ten remained.

And as the crowd's excitement rose with each passing day, one man's spirits soared with it.

"This old man has been giving it some thought…"

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, continued in a solemn voice.

"I'm beginning to think our sect's martial arts truly are the greatest under heaven. What does everyone think?"

"…"

The people in the seats of honor struggled to keep their faces from twisting.

This was hardly anything new, and they had all expected it. That did not make it sting any less.

What made it even more infuriating was that they could not refute him.

Their inability to risk offending the Fire King was one thing. More importantly, the performance of his disciple, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, had been nothing short of astonishing.

He had caused a tremendous stir from the preliminaries onward, then continued advancing triumphantly while displaying overwhelming skill against one renowned master after another.

Yesterday, he had even beaten the Hebei Peng Family's Hunyun Saber as mercilessly as a dog marked for slaughter.[1407]

Damn old man. He couldn't even wait before bragging again.

The greatest martial arts under heaven, my ass. All he did was raise one talented brat.

Still, the kid's the real deal. Where did he find such a monster?

Their thoughts were written plainly across their faces. Under normal circumstances, Jeok Cheongang would have threatened them for failing to control their expressions.

But right now, he was the very image of a benevolent Buddha.

He smiled contentedly as he looked around, then his gaze stopped on one man.

"Hey, Virility Saber King."

"…"

The enormous old man, the Thunderbolt Saber King, pretended not to hear and stared toward a distant mountain. His face had turned bright red.

[1407] The Korean comparison refers to Boknal, the hottest days of summer, traditionally associated with eating dog meat.

“When someone calls you, you should answer. I’m three years older than you, too. Isn’t that right?”

“…Shut your mouth while I’m still asking nicely.”

“Oh, come now. Why are you so angry?”

Jeok Cheongang responded slyly, widening his eyes in feigned surprise.

“Is it because that eldest grandson of yours—the one you praised until your mouth went dry, calling him the greatest prodigy in Hebei or whatever—spent fifteen minutes getting beaten by my disciple?”

“…!”

“Good grief. Haven’t you heard that victory and defeat are simply part of war? Why get so worked up over it?”

Only then did the Thunderbolt Saber King, who had been snorting furiously, slowly turn his gaze toward Jeok Cheongang.

“Th-That’s right. Sometimes you win, and sometimes you lose.”

“Exactly. That’s how it goes at that age.”

“You’re finally saying something sensible. Since we’re on the subject, my grandson was exhausted from such a long journey. That’s why he couldn’t display his full strength.”

Jeok Cheongang smiled kindly and nodded.

“I understand. When someone’s skill is lacking, he needs an excuse.”

“…What did you say?”

“Come to think of it, they aren’t even the same age. Your eldest grandson is over thirty, isn’t he? Our Taekyung is only twenty-two. Heh heh. It can happen. It can.”

“Y-You damned old bastard!”

“Hm? What was that? I can’t hear you very well. You’re the Grand Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family who was eliminated in the quarterfinals, after all. Hahahaha!”

The Thunderbolt Saber King’s eyes rolled back as he started to surge to his feet.

A hand holding a string of prayer beads blocked him.

The Dharma King, Hong Dao, sighed as he looked at the two men.

“Amitabha.[1408] The two of you should act your age. Have you forgotten where you are?”

This was the dueling arena of the Star-Array Grand Banquet, with thousands upon thousands of spectators watching.

Only then did the Thunderbolt Saber King notice all the curious gazes directed toward the seats of honor. He lowered himself back into his seat.

“Urgh.”

[1408] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha invoked in Buddhist prayer.

“Benefactor Jeok, what about you?”

Jeok Cheongang stared at Hong Dao for a moment, then gave a small nod.

“…Fine. I understand.”

“Good. Everyone should get along. What will you do when I’m no longer here?”

“What do you think? I’ll break that old man’s nose.”

Despite the Thunderbolt Saber King’s taunt, Jeok Cheongang did not react.

After glancing sidelong at Hong Dao, he merely stared toward the dueling arena with a heavy expression.

Something Hong Dao had said before continued to echo in his mind.

I intend to step down after this Star-Array Grand Banquet.

His old friend was preparing for death.

Had he said he had a year left at most? Hong Dao could no longer read the heavenly patterns as clearly as before, but if the Dharma King said it was so, then it was so.

Damn bald monk. You should live another ten years at least.

No matter how high Jin Taekyung’s victories lifted his spirits, thoughts of Hong Dao soon weighed them down again.

Just as they were now.

Sensing the change in Jeok Cheongang’s mood, Hong Dao suddenly spoke.

“In any case, there have been an unusual number of upsets at this Star-Array Grand Banquet. Wouldn’t you agree?”

“The Abbot is right.”

“None of us expected these results.”

The Sect Leaders in the seats of honor nodded.

“The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi goes without saying…”

At the mention of Jin Taekyung, the muscles in Jin Wikyung’s face twitched from his seat at the lower end of the table.

He remained silent only because he still lacked the age and standing in the martial world to speak freely among those present. Given the chance, he would have leaped to his feet and danced for joy long ago.

The Sect Leaders looked at him with undisguised envy as they continued.

“But the most unexpected upsets were the Life-Sustaining Sword—or rather, the Always-Victorious Sword—and the Invincible Divine Sword.”

“Ah, yes. Those two surprised me the most as well.”

What kind of place was the Star-Array Grand Banquet?

It was a gathering attended by countless young, renowned martial artists from every corner of the world.

Yet the Always-Victorious Sword and the Invincible Divine Sword were not disciples of any famous major sect, nor had either of them ever made a name for themselves.

That they still remained in the bracket was even more surprising than Jin Taekyung's advancement. After all, Taekyung was both the Fire King's disciple and a member of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

"The Invincible Divine Sword is particularly impressive. He seems capable of holding his own against even an Elder of our sect."

At the words of one of the Sect Leaders from a mid-sized sect, Jeok Cheongang, who had been quietly listening, suddenly spoke.

"Keep your mouth shut. At least then you might pass for average."

"…Excuse me?"

"I don't know what sect you belong to or who you are, but that child is already far beyond the level of a young prodigy. Are you truly unable to guess, or are you pretending not to know even though you do?"

Hong Dao and the Thunderbolt Saber King also chuckled in agreement.

"Benefactor Jeok's words are harsh, but he is right."

"I hate agreeing with that old man, but he's right. Perhaps that's only natural. He is the Sword… Ahem. In any case, the kid is incredible."

The Thunderbolt Saber King abruptly trailed off and glanced sidelong at someone.

It was a middle-aged man with a gentle smile—the Sect Leader of Huashan, the Heavenly Sword True Person.[1409]

"Hahaha. As expected, there is no deceiving the eyes of my esteemed seniors."

At the Heavenly Sword True Person's ringing laughter, the others asked suspiciously,

"Could it be…?"

"That's right. The Invincible Divine Sword is a disciple of our sect."

"Ah, I knew it!"

"You have an outstanding disciple, True Person."

A few of the stronger martial artists nodded silently, as though they had already guessed. Others exclaimed in astonishment.

But an even more shocking statement soon passed the Heavenly Sword True Person's lips.

"Not my disciple. He is my junior brother."

"Th-Then you mean…"

"By a twist of fate, we came to serve the same master. The last time I saw him was more than ten years ago… It pleases me to see how splendidly he has grown."

The same master.

[1409] "True Person," or zhenren, is a Daoist honorific for someone regarded as spiritually accomplished.

No one properly heard what followed. Not a single person present was unaware that the Heavenly Sword True Person's master was the Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak.

The Invincible Divine Sword is the Sword Saint's disciple?

As the people around him were swept up in shock, the Heavenly Sword True Person merely smiled in silence.

He looked like a Daoist who had attained enlightenment.

His thoughts, however, were another matter entirely.

I finally caught you, you little punk!

First his master, the Sword Saint, had run away. Then his youngest junior brother had done the same.

A year ago, the Heavenly Sword True Person had thought he had finally caught up with the boy, only for Cheongpung to beat down his disciples and flee again.

Every time the Invincible Divine Sword stepped onto the dueling platform, he had to suppress the urge to grab the boy by the collar and drag him back to Huashan.

"Heh heh heh. He is a treasure of our Huashan."

The Heavenly Sword True Person hid his true feelings behind the smile of an immortal. Congratulations poured toward him.

"What a joyous occasion. The Sword Saint's name will remain in Huashan for another generation."

"Congratulations, True Person."

"My congratulations!"

"A duel between the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi and the Invincible Divine Sword… This makes the finals even more exciting. Hahaha!"

Amid the warm atmosphere, Jeok Cheongang's brow furrowed.

At the same time, a strand of Sound Transmission reached Hong Dao's ear.

—Everyone is forgetting one person.

Hong Dao quietly rolled his prayer beads.

—You mean Jongni Chu, the Always-Victorious Sword?

—That's right. Him.

The Star-Array Grand Banquet was a gathering of the martial world where anyone could participate regardless of background or affiliation. As a result, participants did not have to undergo a particularly detailed verification process before applying.

But that was only how things looked from the outside.

—I mobilized the Hidden Shadow Pavilion to investigate the identities of every participant who advanced to the main event.

A year ago, when Hong Dao first sensed the existence of Dark Heaven, the first person he sought out was the Thousand-Faced Fox, Song Ho.

After hearing the circumstances, Song Ho summoned his former subordinates without hesitation. Thus, the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, which had been reduced to little more than a name, was reborn.

—And the result?

—The result remained the same no matter how many times we checked. Everyone's identity was confirmed except for one. We could find no trace of the Always-Victorious Sword, Jongni Chu, anywhere.

—Are you certain? If he had thoroughly concealed his identity for some reason…

—It was only a suspicion—until we lost contact with Shadow Killer three days ago.

—Shadow Killer? You mean someone got to him?

Shadow Killer was extraordinary enough that even Jeok Cheongang knew of him.

He was the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's finest intelligence agent, as well as an assassin who had reached the Supreme Peak.

It was not difficult to imagine Shadow Killer as a cold corpse by now.

—What do you think? Can you identify Jongni Chu's martial arts?

Hong Dao's Sound Transmission caused Jeok Cheongang's gaze to deepen.

—I don't know either. In fact, that is the greatest mystery.

He had encountered countless martial arts throughout his life.

He had witnessed them with his own eyes, faced them himself, and defeated them.

But the martial arts Jongni Chu displayed were utterly unfamiliar to him.

—His martial arts don't even seem particularly powerful…and yet he has somehow won every time and made it this far. They are unlike anything I have ever seen.

—Then are you saying his martial arts defy common principles?

—Defy common principles?

Jeok Cheongang's face hardened.

Decades ago, saying that something defied common principles meant only one thing.

The Demonic Path!

At the same time, the same word crossed both men's minds.

Hong Dao and Jeok Cheongang had lived through an age of war. They understood its meaning better than anyone.

—Then are you saying he is a descendant of the Demonic Cult?

—I don't know. Dark Heaven, the Demonic Cult… He may belong to either one, or perhaps to something else entirely.

Just as the two men ended their Sound Transmission with grim expressions, a shout infused with internal energy shook the dueling arena.

“Fellow martial artists, allow me to introduce the rising young master known as the Invincible Divine Sword—and Wudang’s Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon!”

The Invincible Divine Sword—or rather, Cheongpung—looked especially excited as he climbed onto the dueling platform.

As thunderous cheers poured down on him, he hopped up and down in place and waved.

“Wow! Woooow! Hello! This is my first time reaching the quarterfinals of the Star-Array Grand Banquet!”

His opponent, the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon, was warming up with a stiff expression.

He was one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, the finest young prodigies of orthodox Murim. Along with Jin Mukyung, he was said to stand at the very top.

He’s definitely strong.

He was already over thirty and the direct disciple of Wudang’s Sect Leader.

According to Zhuge Gyun, he had accumulated considerable real-world combat experience while traveling from place to place for duels.

But still…

Well, you never know how a duel will turn out.

I leaned back comfortably in the spectator stands.

Only yesterday, I had crushed the Lesser Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family as Jeok Cheongang had wished and advanced to the semifinals.

Barring a major upset, I should make it to the finals without much trouble.

And my opponent there would probably be Cheongpung.

Let’s see what you can do.

At the same moment my eyes began to shine, the flag signaling the start of the duel rose.

Chapter 253

Swish!

There was no opening stance or anything of the sort. The instant the flag signaling the start of the duel rose, the two combatants charged at each other.

As the distance of roughly ten zhang[1410] closed in a flash, a dazzling beam of light erupted from the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon's waist.

Sword Energy right from the start?

Everything had its advantages and disadvantages.

Sword Energy was tremendously powerful, but it consumed an enormous amount of internal energy.

The Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon had chosen a swift victory over a drawn-out battle.

Whoosh!

Blue energy streamed from his Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword and slashed down toward Cheongpung's shoulder.

A clean strike, stripped of all wasted motion. He had probably followed that same trajectory countless times since the day he first picked up a sword.

But…

If I can see it, Cheongpung can see it too.

Boom!

Half a step. That was all it took for Cheongpung to evade. The Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword, wreathed in blue Sword Energy, slammed into the dueling platform.

But the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon was an experienced Peak master. As though he had anticipated the dodge, he twisted his sword and swept it toward Cheongpung's ankle.

"Oops!"

Swish! Swish-swish-swish!

Cheongpung twisted away from the sword with a playful cry.

The Sword Energy raked and split the air in every direction like the claws of a wild beast. The loose hem of his robe caught in its path was shredded into tatters and scattered through the air.

Screams and gasps rose from the crowd.

"Eek!"

"Gasp!"

But I could see clearly. Cheongpung didn't have so much as a scratch on him, and a smile played across his lips.

[1410] A zhang (Korean jang) is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten zhang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

He was enjoying himself. Dancing lightly out of the sword strikes, Cheongpung broke into a broad grin and clapped.

“Wow! That was the Great Clarity Sword Technique, right?”

“Y-Yes.”

The Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon answered reflexively, his face blank with bewilderment.

And who could blame him? Anyone would have reacted the same way. What was that? How did that bastard dodge? His mind had to be overflowing with questions.

“The sword path is really interesting. Have you perhaps not learned the Taiji Wisdom Sword?”

“Why would you ask that…?”

“I’ve always wanted to see it. My grandfa—no, someone I know praised it several times. He said it was an excellent martial art.”

The Taiji Wisdom Sword was Wudang’s greatest secret art, famous enough that even I had heard of it a few times.

Cheongpung had spoken with pure intentions, but to anyone unfamiliar with his personality, his words were unbearably rude.

The Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon standing before him was no exception.

“Our sect’s martial arts exist neither to be judged by you nor to entertain you.”

His expression stiff, the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon raised his Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword and pointed it at Cheongpung.

“But if you desire it so badly, I will show you just how fearsome it is.”

A gentle yet powerful aura arose and bore down on their surroundings. At the same time, the tip of his sword moved slowly, tracing a circle.

Taiji.[1411]

The essence of Wudang’s martial arts was about to unfold in his hands.

“The Taiji Wisdom Sword! It’s the Taiji Wisdom Sword!”

“Give this everything you have. Otherwise, you will regret it.”

Whoosh!

The moment he finished speaking, the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon vanished like a phantom.

The next moment, blue Sword Energy rippled through the air and aimed at Cheongpung’s upper body.

That was when Cheongpung’s sword, which had remained sheathed throughout the duel, finally appeared.

Screeeech—boom!

[1411] Taiji is a Chinese concept associated with the interplay of yin and yang.

Sword Energy collided with Sword Energy. It was only a single clash, but who held the advantage was obvious.

The Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon skidded back a full zhang, his eyes wide. Blood flowed from his torn hand.

“W-What is this?”

“Can I go this time?”

With that question, Cheongpung’s figure scattered like an illusion.

The Dark Fragrance Drift of Huashan. It was the exact movement I had grown sick of watching during my duels with him in the past.

A year had passed, and his Dark Fragrance Drift had become even more secretive and faster.

Swish!

A faint violet aura gathered around the tip of the sword sweeping toward the crown of the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon’s head.

He avoided attacks as much as possible, and only used Sword Energy at the exact moment of striking.

It was proof that he was reducing unnecessary expenditure of internal energy while controlling his own power perfectly.

“Gah!”

The Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon, startled, hurriedly knocked his sword upward. But this time, things were different from before. The Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword slid along Cheongpung’s blade and changed direction.

Softness overcoming hardness.

That was the foundation of Wudang’s martial arts and the principle embodied by the Taiji Wisdom Sword.

But…

“Oh, I know how to do something similar too.”

Shhk.

Cheongpung’s wrist rotated fluidly as he spoke with childlike innocence.

The Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword had clung tenaciously to Cheongpung’s blade, pressing it down. But with that single motion, it was swept aside as if it had no strength at all.

The Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword wavered in midair, and Cheongpung’s blade immediately ensnared it.

“Got it. This is how you do it, right?”

“…!”

“Or not? Wait, I think it’ll work better like this. Ah, that’s it.”

Cheongpung abruptly withdrew his sword and sank into thought. Then he smiled brightly.

In contrast, the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon stared at him in utter shock.

So did every martial artist watching the duel.

“Gah!”

“T-The Taiji Wisdom Sword…!”

Strength was overcome by greater strength. Softness, by even greater softness.

Wudang had built its martial arts upon the principle of softness overcoming hardness, and the Taiji Wisdom Sword was its greatest supreme technique. Cheongpung had just defeated it through that very same principle.

The shock was immense.

Cheongpung is one move ahead of the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon. No, at least two moves ahead.

There was no way the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon, who was facing him directly, hadn’t realized it.

“H-How did you do that?”

“Hmm. You just have to think of embracing your opponent. Then your body reacts on its own and knows where and how to move. Easy, right?”

“…”

Easy, my ass. You crazy bastard.

More importantly, was that really something a person could do?

And this is the guy who supposedly spent a whole year eating nothing but dumplings.

As I stared at Cheongpung in disbelief, the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon’s eyelids trembled from the shock.

Then he suddenly charged.

Tzzzz!

Blue Sword Energy blazed more brightly than ever. He had clearly gathered every last bit of his internal energy into that one strike.

The blade approached as though it would split Cheongpung’s chest open at any moment. Just as the spectators began screaming at the sight of Cheongpung standing there blankly—

Swish-swish-swish-swish!

Brilliant violet light-flames filled the dueling arena. The sword in Cheongpung’s hand traced a beautiful path through the air.

That single movement told me exactly which martial art he was using.

The Thirty-Six Plum Blossom Swords.

It was supremely fast and smooth.

For a moment, it seemed as though the scent of plum blossoms brushed the tip of my nose. The violet Sword Energy of the Zaha Divine Technique burst like flower buds and bloomed into thirty-six plum blossoms.

The next instant, the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon's Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword stopped dead in front of Cheongpung's chest.

Crack.

The Sword Energy that had poured from it in torrents only moments ago had vanished. Hairline fractures spread like a spiderweb across the straight, snow-white blade.

The Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon stared at his cherished sword, and a weak voice slipped from his lips.

"Plum blossoms… I see. You are a disciple of Huashan."

Cheongpung jumped and stammered.

"Ah, I'm not."

"Well, I suppose it hardly matters."

Resignation—and understanding.

The Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon's arm slowly sank. His Pine-Pattern Ancient Sword shattered into hundreds of fragments that tumbled across the dueling platform.

"I concede."

Only then did the silence break.

The judge came to his senses and lowered the flag. The pent-up roar of the crowd burst free like a dam, sweeping through the arena from every direction.

"How was I? I did well, right?"

The innocent voice pulled me from my thoughts. Cheongpung's face was inches from mine, his eyes sparkling like a child's.

"Whoa, you scared me. Let's cut that out."

"Benefactor, I asked how I did."

Was the young man pestering me for an answer really the same person who had just fought?

The Invincible Divine Sword had utterly overwhelmed the Willow-Cloud Divine Dragon, one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes and the future of Wudang.

Watching the duel had reminded me once again that Cheongpung had long since surpassed the realm of young prodigies.

Was he always this strong?

The higher you climbed, the more of the landscape you could see. The same was true of the mountain called Cheongpung. A year ago, I hadn't been high enough to see this view.

He's incredible. It's almost impossible to believe that all of this comes from natural talent.

His martial prowess was astonishing, but his talent was even more so.

Watching him, even I could almost believe he was a System user.

“Benefactor. Why aren’t you answering?”

“Are you a child? Do I have to praise you for that too?”

Cheongpung muttered with a slightly downcast expression.

“Grandpa always told me I did well…”

“That’s your problem.”

Just as I answered him curtly on purpose—

“Wow, that was a great duel, friend!”

At the sudden voice that seemed to leap out of nowhere, Cheongpung turned around with a brightened expression.

“Jongni Chu!”

“Oh! You remember me, friend!”

“Of course I remember you. Of course I do—uh, yeah, of course!”

“…”

What a pair of fucking idiots.

I silently watched Jongni Chu and Cheongpung embrace and laugh together. Then a thought occurred to me.

“Wait. You two.”

“Hm? What is it?”

“Why?”

“Aren’t you each other’s next opponents?”

The two of them stared blankly at each other, then both gasped.

“T-That’s right!”

“I-I see. You’re my next opponent, Kang Pung.”

I could already hear their friendship cracking.

I clicked my tongue as they awkwardly pulled apart.

Well, the result is more or less obvious anyway.

As with everything else, luck played a part in the Star-Array Grand Banquet. In that respect, Jongni Chu had been blessed by the heavens.

For some reason, he had kept drawing middling opponents and made it all the way to the semifinals.

Of course, the opponents he had defeated only seemed middling to me. They had all been comparable to Jongni Chu or even stronger.

And apparently he even got a bye yesterday.

From what I’d heard, Jongni Chu’s quarterfinal opponent had suffered a severe injury and withdrawn.

Whatever else one might say about him, the bastard’s luck was phenomenal.

Still, making it to the semifinals is no small feat.

Cheongpung wasn't someone who could be defeated through luck. Perhaps they knew that too, because they exchanged a few words with regretful expressions.

"Sorry. I'll go easy on you. No, wait—sorry, pal. I'll go easy on you."

"If you would, I'd be grateful. Please do."

One openly promised to go easy on the other, while the other thanked him without a shred of pride. Neither of them was in his right mind.

I shook my head.

"You two childhood friends can settle that yourselves. I'm leaving. I have a prior engagement."

"A prior engagement? But Benefactor, you don't have any friends."

"What? Did you have any friends besides me?"

"…"

The saddest part was that I couldn't deny it.

Just as I found myself at a loss for words, the judge's shout, amplified by internal energy, rang through the arena.

"Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung! Come up to the dueling platform!"

"Yes, I'm coming."

Cheongpung and I each had one more step to climb before we could face each other in the finals.

I stepped lightly onto the dueling platform and looked at my opponent.

"You got lucky too. I never thought you'd make it this far."

My semifinal opponent muttered gloomily.

"Our sect's Eighteen Dragon-Subduing Palms is one of the five greatest palm techniques under heaven."

"But you've only mastered five tenths of it."

"That is correct."

"Then concede."

"If I did, my Master would beat me like a dog on Boknal.[1412]"

"Then?"

"There is only one path left."

Gung Gibang, the Successor Beggar of the Beggars' Sect, spat out a thick gob of phlegm. He pointed his well-worn bamboo staff at me and continued.

"Our sect's Dog-Beating Staff Technique is the greatest under heaven. I'll beat you senseless like a back-alley dog."

"Sure. Go ahead."

[1412] Boknal refers to the hottest days of the Korean summer, traditionally associated with eating dog meat.

Exactly fifteen minutes later, Gung Gibang clung to my calf, both eyes swollen, and shouted,

“I’ve only mastered five tenths of the Dog-Beating Staff Technique!”

“…”

Why was this bastard stuck at five-tenths mastery with everything?

As I tossed aside the bamboo staff, now split in two, the judge lowered the flag.

“Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung advances to the finals!”

Chapter 254

“Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung, wins!”

At the judge’s shout, tens of thousands of spectators rose to their feet as one.

As Jin Taekyung came down from the dueling platform beneath a storm of cheers and applause, the eyes of the man watching him were sunk deep in thought.

What a strange fellow.

The Dog-Beating Staff Technique was the Beggars’ Sect’s greatest secret art, one that could only be taught to someone who had become the Successor Beggar.

Despite its comical name, its power and the subtlety of its forms ranked among the top ten martial arts in the world.

And yet Jin Taekyung had countered it far too easily without using any particularly notable martial art.

He had shattered a bamboo staff infused with internal energy using his bare fist, and even after taking the Eighteen Dragon-Subduing Palms head-on, all he did was frown.

He had even seemed to deliberately take attacks he could have avoided. No, that had undoubtedly been his intention.

Why?

At first, Jongni Chu wondered if Taekyung was some kind of oddball who enjoyed pain, but judging by the agonized faces he made each time, apparently not.

Besides, what kind of lunatic would take the Dog-Beating Staff Technique head-on just to raise his Toughness?

Whatever the reason, he’s interesting.

Jongni Chu still could not forget the surprise he had felt when he first saw Jin Taekyung.

His Muscles and Bones seemed to have been bestowed by heaven itself. If there was such a thing as the Heavenly Martial Physique, surely this was it.

A Disciple of the Fire King… I’ll have to watch him closely.

With that final thought, Jongni Chu, the Always-Victorious Sword, turned away and blended into the cheering crowd.

Several pairs of eyes followed him.

A merchant with a generous belly, a hunched old man, a Third Rate martial artist and a wandering martial artist dressed in cheap martial-arts uniforms…

All of them had ordinary faces one might see anywhere.

Yet whenever their lips moved, Sound Transmission passed between them—a technique only Peak masters could use.

—Your orders, Pavilion Master.

—Two and Three will follow him. But stay at least a hundred zhang[1413] away.

—We may lose track of him.

—I know. But this is our best option.

—…Understood.

—Four and Five, keep an eye on Jin Taekyung and Cheongpung. If he approaches again, report it immediately.

—Yes, sir.

—Then I wish you all good martial fortune.

The brief conversation ended without another reply. The ordinary-looking figures continued walking as though nothing had happened and disappeared into the crowd.

Meanwhile, a middle-aged beggar sitting by the roadside continued bowing to the people who tossed him a few coins. Only after some time had passed did he rise to his feet.

The transformation began in a deserted alley.

Crack. Sssrk.

His hunched shoulders straightened, and his twisted spine grew perfectly erect. Then his facial muscles began to quiver as though invisible hands were kneading them.

Before he had taken ten steps, the middle-aged beggar had become a genial-looking old man.

Tap. Tap.

A wooden prosthetic leg made of ebony, hard as steel, struck the stone pavement.

Jongni Chu, the Always-Victorious Sword.

The old man, Song Ho, the Thousand-Faced Fox, repeated the name in his mind.

Before he was the Pavilion Master of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, he was also an intelligence operative and a master of disguise.

He never forgot a face he had seen even once, and the smallest habit or the structure of a person’s bones was enough for him to recognize them. Even disguise techniques could not deceive his eyes.

But there was one exception.

Jongni Chu.

I’ve definitely crossed paths with that bastard before.

But when? And where?

Song Ho was deep in thought, recalling Jongni Chu’s face, when a stab of pain from his leg brought him to a halt.

It’s starting again. It’s been getting worse lately.

[1413] A zhang is ten cheok, a traditional length unit. Using 30.3 cm per cheok, a hundred zhang is about 303 m (994 ft).

It was a very old injury.

Decades ago, when he was still young, he had taken part in the final battle against the Demonic Cult and lost one of his legs.

After countless twists and turns, he had barely survived. But the memory of that day remained branded deep into his mind.

So did the voice of one man, deep and dark as a bottomless abyss.

Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho. You're quite large for a fox. Shall I start by tearing off a leg?

Song Ho shuddered all over, endured the pain, and started walking again.

That past was long gone. Not even its dregs remained. He had to focus instead on the far more tangible present.

Jongni Chu… who are you? And what are you plotting?

He had already finished making every possible preparation. Even so, the unease lingering in his chest kept shaking him.

Am I getting old? Or has the peace simply lasted too long?

A quiet sigh escaped the old man's lips.

I closed my eyes.

In the darkness, I pictured one person: a boyish face that always wore a bright smile and an unremarkable build.

But the moment he drew his sword, everything changed.

Whoosh!

I could see it without seeing. I could hear it without hearing.

Violet Sword Energy shot forth, leaving no opening in any of the thirty-six directions.

It was as swift as a ray of light and as gentle as drifting flower petals. As I watched that beautiful sight, I thought,

The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, the Flame Divine Palm, or…

Several other martial arts flashed through my mind before disappearing again.

Cheongpung was an opponent I would have to face with everything I had. In the end, there was only one answer.

After a brief moment of thought, I reached for the cool shaft of my spear.

Creak.

"Captain. Captain."

The voice boring into my ear shattered my thoughts. Cheongpung and the illusory Sword Energy he had conjured vanished as if washed away.

When I lifted my eyelids, I saw Hyuk Mujin poking his head through the crack in the door.

“Hehe. I’m here.”

I stared at him for a moment before speaking.

“What are you doing here?”

“I came to keep you company in case you were lonely.”

“Keep me company?”

“Yes. Isn’t that thoughtful of me?”

“Thoughtful?”

I let out a deep sigh and pulled a leg off the chair.

“Get down on your stomach, you despicable bastard.”

“W-Why are you doing this?”

“Did Cheongpung send you to interrupt my training?”

“Gasp! You were training?”

“Then do you see people sitting cross-legged and falling asleep?”

Mujin glanced around nervously before speaking hesitantly.

“I heard that when you were young, you tried to practice Horse Stance while sitting in a chair.”

“That wasn’t me… Wait. Did you just talk back to me?”

“What? Am I not even allowed to talk back?”

What the hell? Had this guy gone crazy?

I stared at Hyuk Mujin in disbelief. In the past, he would have thrown his hands over his head at once. Now he merely flinched before puffing out his chest.

“What are you doing?”

“Now that the subject has come up, I believe I’ve made no small contribution while serving you, Captain.”

“So?”

“Treat me accordingly.”

“What kind of treatment? The four mandatory insurances? Workers’ comp if you get hurt from now on?”[1414]

“I don’t know what the four mandatory insurances or workers’ comp are, but if you keep treating me like this, I’ll quit and take over the textile shop.”

I thought it over, then nodded.

“Go ahead.”

“Pardon?”

[1414] Korea’s four mandatory social-insurance programs cover national health insurance, national pension, employment insurance, and industrial accident compensation insurance.

“Good work. No—thank you for your hard work, Mr. Mujin. May your textile shop prosper from here on out.”

“Wait. Wait a moment.”

“Oh, right. I don’t know about the other locations, but prepare to close the main branch in Shanxi Province.”

Grab!

Hyuk Mujin wrapped his arms around my calf and spoke with an imploring look in his eyes.

“I misspoke.”

“Did you?”

“Yes. Please hit me once on the back of the head.”

“Didn’t you ask me to treat you accordingly?”

“No. I’ve become a man who can’t live even a day without your blows.”

“…”

Had he gone insane?

I shook my head and lightly tapped him on the forehead.

“Enough nonsense. Get to the point. Why are you here?”

“The thing is, I really did come to keep you company.”

“What?”

When I glared at him, Mujin’s voice grew even smaller.

“I thought you might be feeling pressured since the final is tomorrow…”

“My opponent hasn’t even been decided yet. Don’t you know today is the last day of the semifinals?”

The sun was beginning to set, so Jongni Chu and Cheongpung’s duel would start soon.

The winner would face me in the final, and barring some enormous upset, Cheongpung was certain to win.

Mujin shrugged at my words.

“I know. I stopped by anyway.”

“What a silly guy. Use this time to train, you idiot.”

That was what I said, but something stirred warmly in a corner of my heart. Come to think of it, Mujin had been through a lot while following me around.

Maybe his occasional deranged behavior was because I had destroyed too many of his brain cells by smacking him in the back of the head.

Now that I think about it, I feel bad.

I was resolving to treat him better from now on when Mujin asked,

“Cheongpung will win, right?”

“Of course he will… Wait. How do you know that?”

“Even if no one else does, I need to know. With that ridiculous epithet, Invincible Divine Sword, his name being Kang Pung, and the fact that he used the Zaha Divine Technique in his last duel, how could I not?”

“You’re smarter than I thought.”

“Rumors have been spreading too. Cheongpung isn’t particularly famous, so most people have only figured out that he’s a disciple of Huashan.”

He had a point. The Zaha Divine Technique was distinctive enough for people to deduce that much.

“So Cheongpung is definitely going to win, right?”

“Isn’t it obvious?”

“It has to be certain. Absolutely!”

What was with that greedy look in his eyes?

The moment I nodded uneasily—

“Waaaaah!”

A roar echoed from not far away.

I picked up White Flame, the spear resting beside me, and rose to my feet.

Cheongpung will advance anyway. That won’t change.

This was clearly a fight between an egg and a rock.

But watching how the egg collided with the rock, and how the rock shattered the egg, would be a great help in the final duel.

“What are you doing? Aren’t you getting up?”

“Yes, sir.”

“Life-Sustaining Sword!”

“I bet one silver nyang[1415] on you! Pull off the upset!”

“Hahaha! You bet on the Life-Sustaining Sword instead of the Invincible Divine Sword? There’s no bigger sucker!”

Jongni Chu was climbing onto the dueling platform amid blazing torches and peals of boisterous laughter when he suddenly stopped.

It was because of the gazes looking down at him from the seats of honor.

No fewer than three of the Supreme Peak masters known as the Ten Kings were present. He could also see the leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families, as well as Song Ho, the Thousand-Faced Fox, watching quietly from the very back with gleaming eyes.

“Jongni Chu, the Always-Victorious Sword. Take your designated position.”

[1415] A silver nyang is a historical denomination of silver currency; its value varied by time and place.

His pause lasted only an instant. At the judge’s words, Jongni Chu trudged onto the dueling platform and drew his sword without hesitation.

Ssshing!

The sudden action made the surrounding crowd fall silent for an instant, but quiet snickers soon broke out.

The hilt was so caked with dirt that its pattern could not be made out, while the blade was covered in reddish rust.

Martial artists ordinarily cherished their weapons as they did their own lives, but Jongni Chu’s sword looked as though it had never been cleaned once since the day it was forged.

“What the hell is that?”

“I thought something serious was happening. Gave me quite a start.”

“That’s why they call him the Life-Sustaining Sword. What did you expect?”

Ignoring the laughter behind him, Jongni Chu scrutinized the rusty blade and clicked his tongue.

“I can’t use this for now.”

Just then, Cheongpung, who had been enthusiastically waving to the crowd, held out his own sword.

“Want to borrow mine? Ah, would you care to use mine?”

“No. You should use that.”

“I’m fine, though…”

“You’re fine? Then what will you use?”

“It doesn’t matter. We’re friends.”

Cheongpung nodded vigorously, and Jongni Chu let out a genial laugh.

“I appreciate the thought. Mine will be enough.”

“But we’re friends…”

“Listen.”

Sssrk.

The rust-red blade pointed at Cheongpung.

The playfulness in Jongni Chu’s eyes had vanished. Now only torchlight flickered within them.

“I’ve never had a friend like you.”

Chapter 255

Crash!

Jeok Cheongang shot to his feet, not even noticing the chair toppling behind him.

Every one of his senses was focused on a single person: Jongni Chu.

“This is…”

The moment had been so brief it could scarcely be called an instant, but he had definitely felt it.

The wave of qi emanating from Jongni Chu had been powerful enough to make his eyes fly open.

“Returning to Simplicity… He was hiding his strength.”

Dharma King Hong Dao groaned the words, his voice filled with sheer astonishment.

Returning to Simplicity. It was a realm that allowed a martial artist to appear no different from an ordinary person. Their bulging temples flattened, and they could control their aura at will.

To reach such a realm, one had to set foot beyond Peak—into the realm of supreme mastery permitted only to the greatest martial artists.

“That young punk is a Supreme Peak master? Have you all gone mad? How could that possibly make sense?”

At the Thunderbolt Saber King’s barrage of questions, Hong Dao and Jeok Cheongang shook their heads.

“Amitabha.[1416] Then how would you explain this, Benefactor Peng?”

“He has reached the realm of Returning to Simplicity. Enough to deceive even our eyes completely.”

The people in the seats of honor, who had been listening closely to the three men’s conversation, gaped in shock.

Jongni Chu had scraped through every round from the preliminaries onward, always advancing by the narrowest of margins. Why else would people have given him the mocking nickname Life-Sustaining Sword?

But no longer.

The qi they had sensed from that supposedly lucky young martial artist, brief though it had been, was powerful enough to send chills down the spines of even the leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Family Heads of the Five Great Families.

“What in the world…”

The Thunderbolt Saber King fell silent.

[1416] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, spoken here as a Buddhist invocation.

He, too, was a Supreme Peak master and one of the Ten Kings. Deep down, he agreed with Jeok Cheongang and Hong Dao, but he could not bring himself to accept it so easily.

"How could someone who isn't even thirty be a Supreme Peak master?"

As the Thunderbolt Saber King muttered in dismay, someone who had been silently observing the situation spoke up.

"It's possible."

"What?"

Every head turned in the same direction.

Their gazes demanded an explanation, and Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho gave them one.

"If he has Returned to Youth."

"…!"

Leaving the shock spreading through the gathering behind him, Song Ho leaned back in his chair and stared at Jongni Chu with brooding eyes.

Who are you?

The more the question swelled within him, the worse the pain grew at the stump where his leg had been severed decades ago.

Song Ho knew now.

This was no mere coincidence.

Jongni Chu was closely connected to the day he had lost his leg.

Show me your true face.

At that moment, the judge's flag shot into the air.

Whoosh!

A red arc swept through the air without hesitation. Cheongpung had stood there blinking, and by the time he twisted aside, it was already too late.

Jongni Chu's strike was faster than he had expected.

Slice!

A searing pain spread across his chest. The long slash through the front of his robe welled with beads of crimson.

The sharp scent of blood stung his nose.

"…Ah."

Cheongpung stumbled backward and stared blankly at Jongni Chu.

His friend—or rather, the man he had thought was his friend—gazed back with disconcerting calm.

"Too bad. It was too shallow."

Just as Jongni Chu had said, the wound was shallow. The blade had only grazed the skin, leaving no deeper injury.

But Cheongpung's wound was not merely one of flesh.

"J-Jongni Chu."

He was the first friend Cheongpung had ever made in the Murim—no, in all his twenty-two years of life.

The man who had first held out a hand and asked to be friends was now pointing a sword at him. Without the slightest hesitation, he had swung it and cut Cheongpung across the chest.

"Why…?"

"I don't understand what you mean."

Jongni Chu casually flicked the blood from his sword.

"This is the Murim, isn't it? Don't tell me you completely trusted someone you'd only just met after exchanging a few words."

"…!"

"Judging by your expression, you did. How have you survived this long with so little sense? I heard you were a Disciple of Huashan."

He glanced at the Heavenly Sword True Person, the Huashan Sect Leader seated among the honored guests, and clicked his tongue.

"The Sect Leader did a terrible job teaching his Disciple. Pathetic."

At those words, Cheongpung's tightly pressed lips parted. Unlike before, his voice was low and formal.

"The person who taught me martial arts was my grandfather. Not that man."

"Really? Whoever he is, he must be a senile old fool. What's the old man's epithet?"

"The Sword Saint."

"The Sword Saint Mae Jonghak?"

Cheongpung nodded, and astonished cries burst from the silent stands.

Not a single person present was unfamiliar with the illustrious name of Sword Saint Mae Jonghak. He had long since become a living legend.

And now the Disciple of the Sword Saint, who had vanished for decades, had appeared.

Right here!

Countless eyes widened in shock. Only one man remained unmoved.

"The Sword Saint's Disciple…"

Jongni Chu stroked his smooth chin out of habit, then gave a quiet laugh.

"Then the Sword Saint is nothing special either."

"…!"

"A child is still a child, no matter how strong he is. You shouldn't carelessly leave one by a river. Look away for a moment, and the current will sweep him off."

Cheongpung suddenly remembered something his grandfather had always told him.

Always remember this. The world is vast, and there are many strong people. Your martial arts are not yet complete, so you must always beware those who harbor malicious intent.

At the time, those words had meant little to him. Huashan had been peaceful, and his days with Mae Jonghak had been happy.

But his curiosity about the outside world had grown with each passing day, until he finally left without his grandfather's knowledge.

And then…

Ah. So this was what he meant.

Only now did he understand.

It merely hurt that he had needed to bleed by the sword of his first-ever friend before realizing it.

Grandpa.

Cheongpung tightened his grip on his sword hilt. The scent of blood lingering beneath his nose faded, and his mind cleared.

Ssshing.

With a sound that set his hair on end, a pure white blade slid from its sheath.

At the same time, the internal energy coiled in his dantian rose like a cloud, covering his acupoints and spreading in billowing waves.

Tzzzzzz!

The distinctive purple qi of the Zaha Divine Technique blossomed across Cheongpung's entire body. His eyes, filled with the colors of sunset, fixed on Jongni Chu.

"You'll regret this."

"Then…"

Jongni Chu rested his lowered sword against his shoulder.

"Let's see what you can do."

Whoosh!

Cheongpung jerked his head back. Jongni Chu's sword passed within a paper's width of the bridge of his nose. Instead of Sword Energy, the blade was thickly coated in reddish rust.

Fast!

Cheongpung had mastered a supreme eye technique under his grandfather's guidance, but Jongni Chu's movements surpassed even that.

A warning bell rang in his head as a wave of sword strikes followed.

Whoosh! Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

The blade slashing toward his chest changed course in midair.

A thrust became a slash, then the slash gave way to an unexpected palm hurtling toward his shoulder.

Boom!

“Urgh!”

The palm struck Cheongpung’s shoulder and sent him flying more than ten zhang.[1417]

He spun through the air like a top. The instant his feet touched the ground—

Boom!

The bluestone paving the dueling platform exploded into powder.

Cheongpung surged toward Jongni Chu even faster than he had been thrown back.

His sword streamed purple Sword Energy as it danced with effortless grace, flowers blooming in its wake.

Ssshhh!

The Thirty-Six Plum Blossom Swords, executed with eight-tenths mastery, scattered around Jongni Chu from every direction.

Surrounded by purple Sword Energy, Jongni Chu suddenly curled his lips into a smile. It was wholly out of place amid such mortal peril.

“This is more than I expected.”

Before he had even finished speaking, the sword in his hand moved.

A blinding flash and deafening roar erupted, so intense that the spectators could not keep their eyes open.

Boom! Krrrraaaash!

Sword Energy exploded, spraying shattered fragments through the air.

The thick cloud of dust billowed upward, then split apart to reveal a lone figure.

Cheongpung’s eyes widened as he watched Jongni Chu cover his mouth and cough softly.

This man…

This time, he had seen it clearly.

He had seen Jongni Chu deflect every last strand of Sword Energy.

The dozens of Sword Energy attacks capable of piercing steel had been countered by none other than his rusted sword.

Not a trace of Sword Energy coated the blade, yet it had swept every attack aside, redirecting them as naturally and effortlessly as flowing water.

How is that possible?

Along with his astonishment, Cheongpung was seized by a strange emotion he had never felt before.

[1417] A zhang is a traditional length of ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten zhang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft); five zhang is about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

His heartbeat thundered in his ears, and the hand gripping his sword hilt would not strike.

A bead of sweat gathered on his forehead, rolled down the bridge of his nose, and fell.

“Are you afraid?”

Jongni Chu strolled toward him at a leisurely pace. His deep, cold gaze made Cheongpung’s heart sink.

Then Cheongpung realized that the word Jongni Chu had just spoken was the name of this strange emotion.

“…Afraid?”

It was an emotion he had never experienced before.

Fear was a foreign feeling he had only ever heard of from his grandfather. Now it constricted both his body and mind.

Pung. Do you know fear?

Fear? What’s that?

Something that hides deep in everyone’s heart. Not knowing fear is your greatest weakness.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak had deeply loved the grandson who shared none of his blood. His gaze had always been warm, and he had cared for Cheongpung day and night.

Just as beautiful flowers bloomed from good soil, Cheongpung had grown into a lovable child.

This old man is at fault. I shouldn’t have done that…

Having grown up surrounded by boundless love, he had learned only how to love.

On the mountain peak where grandfather and grandson lived happily together, there was none of the arrogance, greed, jealousy, or anger that overflowed in the outside world. The child had grown without ever learning how terrifying human malice could be—or what it meant to feel fear.

If that day ever comes, do not let fear devour you. That is all I can tell you.

His grandfather had said those words the day before Cheongpung secretly left Lotus Peak.

Perhaps he had known this would happen.

But faced with a master unlike any he had ever encountered, Cheongpung found himself backing away without even realizing it.

Grandpa, what do I do?

Step.

Whenever Jongni Chu advanced a step, Cheongpung retreated.

Another step.

Then another.

The distance between them remained fixed at five zhang[1418] as Jongni Chu raised his sword.

“This could go on forever. I expected more from the Sword Saint’s Disciple. Is this all you amount to?”

“I-I…”

“You do know what it means to lose in the Murim, don’t you?”

Ssshhh.

A ghostlike movement.

Paralyzed by fear, Cheongpung could not react. In a world slowed to a crawl, Jongni Chu alone seemed to move unhindered.

One step erased the distance between them, and his sword glided forward.

Just as the rusted blade was about to pierce Cheongpung’s throat—

Swoooosh! Boom!

A terrifying sound split the air, followed by a boom loud enough to leave his ears ringing.

Jongni Chu twisted his sword at the last instant and blocked the attack. At the sight of the translucent spearhead, he grinned.

“As expected, you’ve got a good friend.”

“He’s not a friend. He’s my Benefactor. But…”

Jin Taekyung spat out a wad of phlegm and continued,

“What the fuck are you?”

[1418] A zhang is a traditional length of ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten zhang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft); five zhang is about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

Chapter 256

“What the fuck are you?”

Jongni Chu’s eyes curved like half-moons at the loaded question.

“Do I need to tell you again?”

“Jongni Chu from Yunnan. Yeah, I know. So…”

My next words came out calm enough to surprise even me.

“Who are you? You.”

“Shouldn’t you catch that friend behind you first?”

Jongni Chu was right. I caught Cheongpung by the arm as he crumpled.

There was a little bleeding from the shallow cut across his chest, but it was nowhere near enough to bring down a master of Cheongpung’s caliber.

“What did you do to him?”

“Nothing. His mental strength merely took a blow.”

“If anything happens to Cheongpung…”

“You worry too much. It was only a feint, so nothing like what you’re imagining will happen.”

“A feint? That strike just now?”

“If you don’t believe me, I can’t help that. Friendship is a wonderful thing.”

As I watched Jongni Chu smile gently, my stomach burned as though I had swallowed a ball of fire.

He fooled me completely.

I remembered when we had first met.

He had been a cheerful loudmouth who asked to become friends, saying even brushing sleeves was enough to forge a connection. Annoying, yes, but I hadn’t disliked him.

Now, though, I didn’t know what to think. Everything about him was shrouded in mystery.

My hand tightened around White Flame of its own accord.

“W-Wait!”

The urgent voice belonged to the judge. He was visibly flustered by the unexpected turn of events.

“Both of you, step back. And Young Hero Jin, barging into a duel violates the rules of the Star-Array Grand Banquet.”

Without taking my eyes off Jongni Chu, I answered.

“So I’m supposed to stand there and watch while someone nearly gets killed?”

“B-But he said it was only a feint!”

“That’s what he says.”

The judge bit his lip at my firm reply.

“If you don’t withdraw now, you may be disqualified under the rules.”

“Disqualified?”

“Of course. You don’t want to be disqualified with the final still ahead of you, do you?”

I laughed under my breath.

Winning the Star-Array Grand Banquet would certainly earn me a huge amount of EXP and Fame, or perhaps an even greater Reward.

Jin Wikyung would hug me for raising the family’s reputation, and Jeok Cheongang would be pleased as well.

But that’s all it would be.

The year I had spent in Fire Gate Cavern had not been for the sake of winning the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

And the same was surely true of the sinister bastard standing before me.

“Let’s fight.”

Jongni Chu deliberately widened his eyes.

“Now?”

“Yeah.”

“Good grief. If you don’t withdraw immediately, you’ll be disqualified.”

“I don’t give a damn about that.”

“Thank you. Thanks to you, I’ll be able to win easily and make my name known throughout the world.”

“Cut the crap. Drop the lousy acting and tell me what you really think.”

Jongni Chu paused, then grinned.

“I was right about you. You really are an interesting friend.”

“Friend? That’s not the word you use in a situation like this. Especially not between you and me.”

“That stings a little, but… well, it can’t be helped.”

“So what’s your answer?”

“I did want to fight you at least once.”

The judge, who had been listening to us, cut in with a grim expression.

“Did you not hear what I said? Under the rules, the Star-Array Grand Banquet final must take place tomorrow.”

At that moment, a low voice pierced everyone’s ears.

“Then change the rules as of today.”

“Who dares!”

The judge spun around with a roar, only to freeze at the sight of the tiny old man who had approached like a ghost.

“G-Great Hero Jeok?”

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang. His eyes glowed faintly red as they passed over me and Jongni Chu before settling on the judge.

“That’s right. It’s me.”

“I-I apologize. I misspoke.”

“Forget it. Get the next duel underway immediately.”

“B-But…”

“But?”

The judge swallowed hard.

“To change the schedule, we must hold a meeting and receive the presiding chair’s approval.”

“The Martial God presided over the first Star-Array Grand Banquet. After he disappeared, the position passed to the Abbot of Shaolin, who could be considered the organizer. Is that correct?”

“Y-Yes, that’s correct.”

“Then it’s settled.”

“Pardon?”

“Hong Dao had to step away on urgent business. Considering seniority and standing in the Murim, I am the presiding chair now.”

Everyone’s eyes turned toward the seats of honor a hundred zhang[1419] away. Just as Jeok Cheongang had said, the seat where Dharma King Hong Dao should have been sitting was empty.

No. There was one more person missing.

Song Ho, the Thousand-Faced Fox.

Two important people had left at the same time. What was going on?

The question flashed through my mind, then vanished. That wasn’t what mattered right now.

“Now we can forget about those damn rules or whatever they are. Am I wrong?”

The judge hesitated, then nodded.

“No. We’ll proceed.”

“Good. And you.”

Jongni Chu, who had been watching the scene with great interest, pointed at his own chest.

“Me?”

“Yes, you, the bastard with half a tongue.”

“My tongue hasn’t been cut in half, but I understand.”

[1419] A zhang (丈) is a traditional length unit of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred zhang is about 303 m (994 ft); eighty zhang is about 242 m (795 ft).

Even though he clearly knew who he was dealing with, he remained completely unruffled.

Jeok Cheongang fixed Jongni Chu with a grave, steady glare.

“I’ll ask you directly. Did you come from Tianshan?”

The Tianshan Mountains. The headquarters of the Demonic Cult.

The judge flinched as though he had touched a flame, while Jongni Chu wore a faint smile, as if enjoying the situation.

“I think I’ll save that answer for later.”

“If you don’t want to die young, you’d better think carefully before answering.”

Jongni Chu rubbed his smooth chin.

“What will you do if some unfortunate accident occurs before you hear my answer?”

“An accident?”

“You never know what might happen in the Murim. For example, a certain master might lose his only Disciple.”

At that moment, a deathly silence pressed down on the surroundings.

Jeok Cheongang stared at Jongni Chu with emotionless eyes before speaking.

“If such a regrettable thing were to happen… the master who lost his Disciple would become very angry.”

“Would you kill the culprit even if you had to spread a net over heaven and earth?”

“Of course not. I’d burn him alive. You have my word.”

“Aren’t you making quite a promise? You don’t even know who we’re talking about.”

“Coincidentally, it’s someone I know very well.”

“Oh, dear.”

Jongni Chu burst into cheerful laughter.

“Then I suppose I’ll have to go easy on him.”

“Are you underestimating my Disciple?”

“I’m looking forward to it, but he probably won’t be a match for me.”

“That’s what he says. What do you think?”

At Jeok Cheongang’s question, I tightened my grip on the spear shaft.

“That bastard’s thinking is pretty screwed up.”

Jongni Chu looked at me with amusement.

“I can’t tell whether that’s confidence or arrogance.”

“Neither. I want to live a long, full life. But there’s one thing I do know.”

I enunciated each word clearly.

“You don’t know anything until you try.”

“Good thinking. But will that still hold true this time?”

“I hope so.”

“You could die.”

“That’s why I have to give it everything I’ve got. If I die after that… well, I’ll feel like shit, but someone will avenge me. Won’t they?”

Jeok Cheongang nodded.

“Go in peace. I’ll avenge you, so don’t worry about what comes after.”

“Seriously? You call that comforting?”

“Then stop talking nonsense and remember one thing. If that bastard kills you, I’ll kill you myself.”

“If I don’t want to die twice, I’d better work hard.”

Jongni Chu burst into loud laughter as he listened to us.

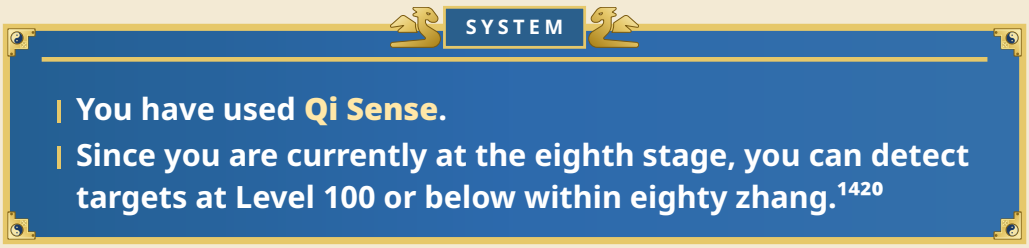
“Ha-ha-ha! What an interesting Master and Disciple pair.”

I stared at him and muttered inwardly.

Before we fought, I needed to peel back even a little of the veil surrounding him.

Skill, Qi Sense.

A chime rang.



I possessed two kinds of Qi Sense: the Qi Sense that existed as a Skill, and the Qi Sense I had developed as a martial artist.

When I first came to the Murim, I had relied entirely on the former. But as time passed, I realized that Level and strength were not directly proportional, so I gradually used it less and less.

The Murim had too many variables to judge anyone by Level alone.

Show me something. Even a little. Show me what you really are.

Swoooosh!

Once Qi Sense reached the eighth stage, I could focus it entirely on a single person.

A blue line visible only to me shot forward without hesitation and reached Jongni Chu.

No—just as I thought it had reached him—

Beep!

[1420] A zhang (丈) is a traditional length unit of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred zhang is about 303 m (994 ft); eighty zhang is about 242 m (795 ft).

SYSTEM

Qi Sense has failed!
Unable to identify the target!
An unknown force is rejecting the Skill!

"...!"

What?

My eyes flew open at the unbelievable System notification. I stared at Jongni Chu in confusion.

The blue line of Qi Sense had seemed to strike something, circled around him, then disappeared.

"What the hell did you do?"

"That's what I'd like to ask you."

Jongni Chu had stopped laughing. His interested gaze settled on me.

"You have quite an interesting trick."

His words suddenly brought back a memory from a year ago—the first person who had ever detected my Qi Sense.

Well, aren't you an interesting fellow?

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

As befitted a Supreme Peak master, he had been able to control his qi freely. Through that encounter, I had first realized that the System was not omnipotent.

But even Jeok Cheongang couldn't repel the Skill.

And now an unknown force had rejected the Skill. I had never heard of anything like it.

The more I saw Jongni Chu violate common sense, the more one word floated through my mind.

Demonic martial arts.

Martial arts that defied reason.

My suspicion hardened into certainty. At last, I understood the meaning behind the question Jeok Cheongang had asked him earlier.

"You really are from the Demonic Cult, aren't you?"

"Beat me and I'll tell you. What kind of trick did you use?"

"Even if you beat me, I won't tell you."

"That puts me at quite a disadvantage. It can't be helped."

Sssrk.

The rusted sword slowly rose and pointed between my eyebrows.

A humming voice followed, utterly at odds with the suffocating edge of his sword.

"Come. Let's have some fun."

I raised White Flame and answered.

“Yeah. Let’s have a brutal good time.”

Fwoosh!

The fire dragon curled within my dantian awoke from its slumber and stretched.

Give it everything you’ve got.

Jeok Cheongang used Seizing an Object Through Empty Space to pull Cheongpung toward him, then stepped through the air as he retreated. At the same time, the judge’s frantic voice rang out.

“Under the revised schedule, the Star-Array Grand Banquet final will begin immediately! The Life-Sustaining Sword—no, the Always-Victorious Sword, Jongni Chu, and the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung…!”

The judge’s announcement was already meaningless.

We were already charging toward each other.

Swoooosh!

One step. The distance vanished.

Krrrraaaash!

Two steps. Two streaks of light bursting from our hands collided in midair.

Chapter 257

Rrrrrumble.

The ground trembled faintly as a distant roar rolled in.

The commoners who knew nothing of martial arts merely tilted their heads and continued on their way.

But the Thousand-Faced Fox, Song Ho, was different.

This is…

The Hidden Shadow Pavilion agents secretly following him sent messages through Sound Transmission.

—About seven hundred zhang[1421] north.

—Something appears to have happened at the dueling platform.

—Pavilion Master, your orders.

Song Ho hesitated. His wealth of experience told him that the roar had been caused by the aftereffects of martial arts.

And not just any martial arts…

A Supreme Peak master?

Even if one turned the entire world upside down and scraped it bare, there might not be more than thirty Supreme Peak masters in existence.

The aftermath he had sensed clearly indicated a clash between Supreme Peak masters.

This was no ordinary matter. Had the Always-Victorious Sword, Jongni Chu, finally made his move?

But adequate precautions should already be in place.

They had already searched every inch around the Murim Alliance. They had thoroughly inspected everyone and everything in preparation for any possible situation, even taking into account the possibility that explosives might have been brought in and planted.

A tiger was still a tiger even after losing its teeth. The Hidden Shadow Pavilion might not have been what it once was, but its intelligence network was still capable of controlling Henan Province.

And three of the Ten Kings are there.

Then there were the leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang, the Family Heads of the Five Great Families, and the elites of the sects and families they had brought with them.

It would be no exaggeration to call that place the Murim world in miniature.

I must be getting old. Perhaps I've worried too much.

[1421] A zhang is a Chinese unit of length equal to about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Seven hundred zhang is about 2.1 km (1.3 mi).

It was all because of those unknown beings who had yet to reveal their true identities.

Song Ho clearly remembered the conversation he had shared with the Dharma King, Hong Dao, when the man had come to find him a year ago.

Dark clouds are covering the sky.

Could they be clouds from Tianshan?

I don't even know where they're coming from or when they'll arrive. All I have are two words: Dark Heaven.

Dark Heaven…

Help me. I need your strength.

Half a century had passed since the Great Faction War.

The fox who had left the secular world and buried himself in the countryside had returned to the realm of martial artists, only to be reminded of just how much time had passed.

The Thousand-Faced Fox, Song Ho, let out a shallow sigh and moved his lips.

—Tell the Abbot I'll leave once I finish my business.

A Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent who had joined them seven and a half minutes later replied.

—Dharma King Hong Dao left after you did, Pavilion Master.

—The Abbot left?

—Yes.

Song Ho hesitated briefly, then shook his head. He did not know what had happened, but he trusted Hong Dao's judgment.

Hong Dao would trust his in turn.

—One of you, go to the dueling platform. Two will remain here. Report immediately if anything happens.

—Understood.

—The rest of you, follow me. As soon as we arrive, seal off the entire area. Let nothing slip through.

—Yes, sir.

Whoosh!

Black figures scattered through the alleyways.

As Song Ho raced across the endless rows of rooftops, his thoughts remained fixed on the report he had received fifteen minutes earlier.

We found Shadow Killer.

Tap!

He drove his wooden crutch down harder, accelerating with qinggong.[1422]

[1422] Qinggong is a Chinese martial-arts skill associated with swift, light-footed movement and extraordinary leaps.

The pain intensified in equal measure.

Bang!

White Flame's transparent spearhead collided with the rusted blade.

A single exchange.

A roar that seemed to split the heavens rang out, and a violent blast of wind engulfed my entire body.

Kraaaaoom!

A whirlwind rose around us, blocking everyone else's view.

Amid the dust clouds raging in every direction, I saw Jongni Chu staring wide-eyed at me over our locked weapons.

"Impressive. I didn't expect to be pushed back."

Sssrk.

Just as he said, he had been forced several steps backward. Clearly, he could not withstand my strength, which had long since surpassed the limits of the human body.

But…

What the hell is this bastard?

If Jongni Chu was surprised, I was stunned.

I had spent an entire year training with an iron ball weighing more than a thousand catties[1423] attached to me. Both my martial arts and my stats were worlds apart from what they had once been.

And he withstood that?

That exchange should not merely have given me the upper hand. I should have overwhelmed him completely.

Yet all Jongni Chu had done was retreat a few steps.

Even that rust-covered sword had not broken.

Who the hell is this guy?

A bead of cold sweat slid down the back of my neck.

A playful smile tugged at Jongni Chu's lips.

"Four Ounces Deflecting a Thousand Catties. Rather than trying to overpower your opponent, you must read the flow."

"…"

Kaaaang!

His blade coiled around my spearhead and wrenched it aside.

[1423] In this Chinese setting, a catty (jin) is about 500 g (1.10 lb). A thousand catties is about 500 kg (1,100 lb).

I tightened my grip on the shaft, but the more force I used, the more it felt as though I were sinking into a swamp.

Jongni Chu's sword was the horse, and my spear was the cart. The cart had no choice but to follow wherever the horse led.

The instant White Flame's transparent Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron spearhead plunged into the ground, Jongni Chu thrust out his palm.

Boom!

Compressed air exploded in front of my chest, and my vision swam.

I barely kept myself from being hurled backward. Clinging to the spear shaft buried deep in the ground, I spun around it and closed in on Jongni Chu.

Blue flames gathered around my right foot, which carried one jiazi[1424] of internal energy.

Flame Wheel Kick.

The blazing flames slammed into the back of Jongni Chu's neck.

Bang!

He slid backward and lowered his elbow.

His blackened sleeve crumbled into ash and scattered through the air.

"Too bad. I liked this outfit."

Crack. Crack.

He rolled his neck from side to side like some Third Rate street thug, then grinned.

"But truly, you're impressive. I'm liking you more and more. Now…"

Whoosh!

His figure vanished with a sharp rush of wind.

A quiet voice pierced my ear from right beside me.

"Let's get started for real."

Hummm.

The wind stopped.

This time, my senses were one step ahead of my body. At the last instant, I crossed my arms, and Jongni Chu's fist slammed into them.

It was a strike carrying an enormous amount of internal energy, unlike anything he had used before.

Kra-boom!

Its power surpassed all ordinary limits. Though it was only flesh colliding with flesh, the resulting roar sounded like a bomb exploding.

Even after anchoring myself with the Thousand-Catty Drop at the last instant, I bent backward until my waist nearly touched the ground.

Crack.

[1424] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; here it describes sixty years' worth of internal energy.

Even my extraordinary Muscles and Bones, fine enough to be called the Heavenly Martial Physique, were useless this time.

I clenched my teeth and endured the sharp pain running along my spine.

How dare this bastard.

Boom!

I slammed my free left hand into the ground.

I shot upward two or three times faster than I had fallen. Jongni Chu's brightly smiling face appeared before me.

I roared.

"I haven't even gotten to use this back yet!"

The fire dragon stretching through my four limbs and hundred bones surged toward my open palm.

A scorching gale erupted with lava-like heat.

The martial art that had once driven me to the brink of death—the Flame Divine Palm—collided with Jongni Chu's punch.

Bang!

My ears rang, and the ground shook.

Still gripping White Flame, I was hurled backward.

I sprang to my feet and saw Jongni Chu standing perfectly still beyond the hazy cloud of dust, the entire dueling platform charred black around him.

"That was a poor choice. As you can see, internal energy happens to be one of my strengths."

I glared at his serene smile, then coughed up a surge of blood.

The blood was black.

Proof that I had suffered an Internal Injury.

Damn it.

My opponent was a Supreme Peak master who had reached the realm of Returning to Simplicity.

I had expected him to be strong, but he was far stronger than I had imagined.

Even allowing for the fact that he had learned demonic martial arts, it was difficult to understand how someone that young could possess such martial power.

"What the hell are you, really?"

I wiped the blood from my mouth with my sleeve.

Jongni Chu let out a hollow laugh.

"That's what I'd like to ask you. I never thought I would encounter a monster like you in my lifetime."

"Now you're fucking with me, too?"

"I'm sincere."

“Sincere, my ass. If I’m a monster, what does that make you?”

“I’m… a little special. Let’s leave it at that.”

I studied Jongni Chu’s enigmatic smile, then spat out a mouthful of bloody phlegm.

My insides burned from the Internal Injury.

“Is this another one of those legendary demonic martial arts?”

“Whenever people encounter something beyond the bounds of common reason, their thoughts turn to the word ‘demonic.‘ It is difficult to accept things for what they are.”

“Yeah, it really isn’t easy. So what kind of demonic martial art did you learn?”

“Any further exchange of questions would be a waste of time.”

Jongni Chu raised his sword and pointed it at me.

Streams of qi as clear as mountain water flowed from the blade and took shape.

Sword Force.

The concentrated manifestation of energy permitted only to those who had set foot in the exalted realm of the Supreme Peak.

Tzzzzzzzz!

The mere sight of it chilled me to the bone.

The aura pouring from Jongni Chu left my palms damp and my lips parched.

This is… dangerous.

I drew a deep breath.

I had lost count of how many brushes with death I had survived.

What mattered was that I had survived every one of them.

And it would be the same from now on.

Wasn’t that why I had followed the Fire King and endured training that had seemed utterly impossible?

One shichen of sleep a day. Every moment left over goes into training!

That damn old man.

The words Jeok Cheongang had spoken before my training began in earnest suddenly came to mind, drawing a short laugh from me.

One shichen, my ass.

I had been allowed only half a shichen.

Without the System’s power to rapidly restore my body, I could never have endured those days.

My sleeping time had dwindled while the iron ball grew heavier and heavier. Even under those brutal conditions, I had punched, kicked, and swung my spear.

“That really was the perfect move.”

“Hmm?”

“My Master was right. Sleep is a luxury for a martial artist. And…”

Status Window, open.

As soon as I muttered the words inwardly, a holographic window filled my vision.

A great deal had changed over the past year—the Level displayed in my Status Window, the numbers, and even the number of Titles.

But only one thing mattered right now.

“Repeat Quests are fucking awesome.”

Endlessly repeating the same training meant one thing: Repeat Quests.

Then there were the points I had gained from leveling up.

The points I had diligently deposited over the past year had become a hefty lump sum. Just looking at them filled me with satisfaction.

“This is why people need to save.”

“What does that mean?”

Jongni Chu tilted his head, unable to understand my words.

I grinned at him and raised White Flame.

“It means things are about to get a little harder for you.”

At the same time, countless System commands echoed through my mind.

Strength. Agility. Stamina.

Muscles and Bones. Sinews and Meridians.

Everything advanced another step. New power gathered, connected, and seeped into me.

In a world slowed almost to a standstill, I took a step.

Swish.

There was no sound.

One step carried me directly in front of Jongni Chu.

The Fire Dragon Divine Spear, now at the seventh stage, danced along the spearhead, burning through air and sound alike.

Papapapapat!

The spearhead became streaks of light that poured toward every part of Jongni Chu’s body.

At the same time, his sword, wrapped in transparent Sword Force, moved.

Kwaaang!

Within a moment split and split again, we exchanged dozens of blows.

I saw Jongni Chu’s eyes widen in astonishment.

The roars erupted without end, overlapping one another.

Perhaps this was what it would sound like if the heavens collapsed.

Screeech! Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

Whenever spear and sword parted, fist met palm.

Each time I narrowly evaded an attack and retreated, another was already waiting where I landed.

Krrrzzzt!

A single punch and a single kick created massive craters, laying waste to everything around us.

The impossibly solid dueling platform became riddled with pits and cracks spreading like a spiderweb.

But more astonishing than anything else was Jongni Chu.

“Incredible! Truly incredible!”

He laughed as he unleashed one form after another, his eyes shining with joy.

Even though I was fighting with all my strength, his movements kept growing faster.

Stronger.

What the hell is this bastard…?

My mind wavered, and my hands and feet fell out of rhythm.

That shattered composure immediately led to a mistake.

Pow-pow-pow!

“Gah!”

My vision flashed white as excruciating pain surged through me.

I staggered backward.

Jongni Chu watched me with open admiration.

“Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. I’ll remember you well. You truly are…”

At that moment, Jongni Chu’s expression hardened.

As if drawn by something, he stared fixedly into the distance.

Then he abruptly kicked off the ground and shot upward.

Bang!

It all happened in an instant.

I stared blankly at his back as he stepped on empty air and vanished.

Then I snapped out of it and screamed after him.

“Where are you going, you son of a bitch!”

Chapter 258

I saw red.

“Where the hell are you going, you son of a bitch!”

If this had happened before, my first thought would have been, Why is he suddenly leaving? Maybe I would even have breathed an inward sigh of relief at escaping the crisis.

But not now.

This bastard beats the hell out of me and then runs?

Unlike me, who was still at the Peak realm, Jongni Chu was unquestionably a Supreme Peak master. I could admit that he was several levels above me.

But to leave before the duel had even been decided?

I gritted my teeth. Ignoring the Internal Injury needling my insides, I focused all my internal energy into my lower body.

“Stop right there.”

Crack! Boom!

I launched myself into the air with a thunderous blast. Cold wind slapped my face, and Jongni Chu’s foot appeared right in front of me.

He was close enough to touch if I simply reached out. One certainty flashed through my mind.

Got you.

Whoosh!

But the spearhead I thrust out with a triumphant smile sliced uselessly through empty air.

I blinked, unable to understand what had happened.

How?

Even with my seventh-tier grades[1425], I knew the law of universal gravitation. Jongni Chu’s body had already reached its highest point and was falling, while I was still rising with the momentum of my leap.

He had definitely been close enough for me to grab his ankle with my bare hand.

But in my certainty, I had overlooked one crucial fact.

Martial artists—Supreme Peak masters in particular—were beings who shattered common sense.

“What the hell…”

The curse slipped through my parted lips. The sight unfolding before me was that shocking.

[1425] South Korean school-record grades run from 1, the highest, to 9, the lowest. Seventh-tier grades are low marks.

Papapapat!

He was stepping on the air.

There were no walls. No branches. Nothing at all.

As though invisible stairs had appeared beneath his feet, Jongni Chu climbed through empty air, soaring higher and higher.

Stepping on Empty Air…

What kind of bullshit was this? How was I supposed to catch him?

Cursing inwardly as I fell, I saw the confused crowd below.

Among them stood a tiny old man, his eyes gleaming coldly.

“You bastard! How dare you run!”

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

His roar shook the heavens as a streak of red light shot from his wrinkled hand. A sword imbued with Extreme Yang internal energy crossed dozens of zhang[1426] in an instant and struck its target.

Rumble-rumble-boom!

The air trembled, and a flash of light burst in midair, stabbing at my retinas. When I opened my eyes again, I saw Jongni Chu plummeting.

No. I had to correct myself.

That isn’t a fall.

Unfortunately, unlike my previous prediction, I was right this time.

Jeok Cheongang’s low groan was the proof, and Jongni Chu’s body shooting away like an arrow was the result.

He blocked it.

Jongni Chu had not only blocked Jeok Cheongang’s sword. He had used the tremendous internal energy behind it as propulsion, accelerating in the direction he wanted.

It was an astonishingly clever and efficient choice—one that was difficult to believe he had made in that split second.

Screeeeeech!

Now there was no one who could stop Jongni Chu as he shot through the sky like a meteor from that dizzying height.

Tap.

The instant I landed on the devastated dueling platform after experiencing the law of gravity firsthand, Jeok Cheongang’s furious voice rang out.

“What are you doing? Chase that bastard immediately!”

Everything had happened without warning. Only Jeok Cheongang’s shout jolted the leaders in the seats of honor into action.

[1426] A zhang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“Capture Jongni Chu, the Always-Victorious Sword!”

“Seize the Demonic Cult spy plotting some vile scheme! Whoever captures him, dead or alive, will receive a great reward!”

The Nine Sects and One Gang. The Five Great Families. Even influential sects that wielded considerable power in their respective provinces.

Everyone gathered here was a key figure who moved the Murim.

Naturally, their attendants were renowned Peak masters in their own right.

“Yes, sir!”

Hundreds of martial artists scattered in every direction. At their head were Jeok Cheongang, the Thunderbolt Saber King, several other leaders, and me.

Screeeeeech!

We raced ahead of everyone else. I could not keep pace with Jeok Cheongang, who had mastered the Fire Gate Clan’s signature movement technique, Flamefire Path, to the ninth stage, but I was fast enough to keep his back in sight.

When you don’t have teeth, you make do with your gums.

My movement technique was still at a low stage, and my martial arts had yet to break past the uppermost reaches of the Peak realm. But my physical abilities had already surpassed their limits, making such speed possible.

“How’s your Internal Injury?”

“I can manage.”

I nodded in response to Jeok Cheongang’s voice through the fierce wind.

At that moment—

Ding. Ding. Ding.

As System notifications relentlessly rang in my ears, the changes began.

Vitality flooded my exhausted body, and the Internal Injury that had been stabbing at my insides vanished without a trace. The fire dragon in my dantian, drained by our all-out exchange, stirred and surged through my limbs and every corner of my body.

I never expected to win the Star-Array Grand Banquet like this.

But I had no time to check the System messages.

Finding Jongni Chu, who had vanished ahead of us, came first.

"Damn it. Whoever that bastard is, he's fast as hell."

Just as Myriad-Mile Pursuit—the Beggars' Sect Leader and a master of qinggong[1427]—had said, Jongni Chu was unimaginably fast.

He had long since disappeared from everyone's sight. Jeok Cheongang quickly issued orders.

"We'll lose him at this rate. The Beggars' Sect will take the west. The Kunlun Sect and the rest of you cover the gaps."

"Yes, Great Hero Jeok."

"Understood."

Papapat!

[1427] Qinggong is a martial-arts movement skill associated with exceptional speed and lightness.

The Sect Leaders of the Beggars' Sect and Kunlun Sect—two sects renowned for their movement techniques—vanished with their disciples in tow. Jeok Cheongang turned to the Thunderbolt Saber King.

"You take the east."

"Then what about this direction?"

"I'll handle it."

The Thunderbolt Saber King's expression was grim.

"Be careful. That bastard calling himself the Always-Victorious Sword… He'll be difficult to handle alone."

Difficult to handle?

Those words had come from the Thunderbolt Saber King, a man whose pride was second to none.

In other words, Jongni Chu was comparable to the Ten Kings—or perhaps even stronger.

Jongni Chu was that powerful?

How had someone so young reached such a realm?

He was a monster among monsters. As I swallowed my surprise, Jeok Cheongang snorted.

"That only applies to weaklings like you. Don't lump this old man in with the rest of you."

He said it like a joke, but it was obvious he had not dismissed the Thunderbolt Saber King's warning.

The corners of Jeok Cheongang's mouth were raised, but his eyes had gone cold and still.

"That's enough grumbling. Get going."

"Damn it. Even the heavens are heartless. Why did Hong Dao, that damn monk, have to disappear at a time like this?"

After leaving behind a single lament, the Thunderbolt Saber King turned away and vanished from sight.

Now only Jeok Cheongang and I remained.

We continued at high speed, leaping over rooftops and racing past the hundreds of buildings stretching endlessly before us as we exchanged words.

"If you find him, do not act rashly. Understood?"

"I can't promise that. I have a score to settle."

"Jongni Chu is beyond your ability to handle. Do not engage him until I give the order."

"Just how strong is he?"

After a brief silence, Jeok Cheongang's lips parted.

"I don't know."

“What do you mean by that…?”

“Even I could not determine what martial arts he had learned or what realm he had reached.”

“…!”

First the famously proud Thunderbolt Saber King, and now Jeok Cheongang—who ranked among the strongest of the Ten Kings in terms of sheer martial power—had given such an answer.

I was licking my parched lips when—

Kwoooong!

Far in the distance, a cloud of dust rose with a thunderous roar. Screams and shrill whistles rang out from every direction, announcing the enemy’s appearance.

I opened my senses wide and gathered the information.

West. About five hundred zhang[1428] away.

That was the direction of the Beggars’ Sect.

If I pushed my movement technique to its limit, I could reach it in moments.

“Old Master!”

“I know.”

Boom!

Jeok Cheongang and I shot forward like cannonballs.

The scenery whipping past us began to change. The endless rows of pavilions dwindled one by one, and tall city walls came into view.

The harder we ran against the fierce pressure of the wind, the heavier my chest felt.

What is this feeling?

Could it be the pressure of facing Jongni Chu again?

I glanced sideways. Jeok Cheongang’s expression had hardened. The emotion etched across his face was unmistakable foreboding.

A moment later, we discovered the source of that inexplicable feeling.

“Chase that bastard!”

“Master! Please come to your senses, Master!”

A massive pit about thirty zhang[1429] wide.

Through the gathered Beggars’ Sect disciples, I caught sight of a blood-soaked monk’s robe.

A wrinkled hand trembled at irregular intervals. Below where both legs had been severed, a pool of blood had formed, and prayer beads stained crimson with their owner’s blood bobbed on its surface.

“…Damn monk?”

[1428] A zhang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[1429] A zhang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Jeok Cheongang's steps stopped dead when he saw his friend.

Jeok Cheongang's vision went hazy.

Their last conversation echoed endlessly in his ears.

"Something came up. I need to step away for a while."

"Now?"

"I'll take care of it and be right back."

"Is it something small or something serious?"

"Amitabha.[1430] As Shakyamuni[1431] said, if you resolve the greater matter first, the smaller matter will resolve itself."

"That damn Amitabha. This is why people call you a damn monk."

"What does it matter whether I'm a Buddha or a damn monk? Ha-ha-ha."

He remembered clearly how Hong Dao had left with a laugh half a shichen[1432] ago.

But why…

Why are you lying here like this?

Splash.

Mud and bloody water splattered. The Beggars' Sect disciples surrounding the fallen old monk hurriedly stepped aside and bowed their heads.

"G-Great Hero Jeok!"

"Our Sect Leader is pursuing Jongni Chu. B-but by the time we arrived, it was already too late…"

"Move."

The voice that slipped from Jeok Cheongang's lips was as dry as spent ash.

Every sound stopped. It was as though the world itself had frozen.

His senses were already focused on one person alone.

"I'm here."

It was the same greeting as always. But instead of Hong Dao's sly voice, a labored cough answered him.

Cough.

The Dharma King Hong Dao's chest heaved, and black blood spilled from the corner of his mouth.

A grave Internal Injury. Fragments of his organs were mixed into the blood. There was no need to examine him to know what had happened inside his body.

[1430] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha, used here as a Buddhist invocation.

[1431] Shakyamuni is a name for the historical Buddha.

[1432] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

“Well, now. Your friend is here, and you couldn’t even wait for me before lying down again?”

Jeok Cheongang spoke calmly as he dropped down beside Hong Dao.

He grasped the blood-soaked old monk’s wrist and sent internal energy into him. What he had suspected became reality.

Beyond saving.

The painful, crushing verdict filled Jeok Cheongang’s mind.

“Do you remember when we first met? Back when we fought those Demonic Cult bastards in Gansu almost every day?”

Was Hong Dao listening? Could he even hear him?

Everyone shared the same question, but Jeok Cheongang paid it no mind and continued speaking.

“At first, I wondered what kind of damn monk you were. But they say even dislike can become affection, and when the time came to part with you, I found myself reluctant.”

Although he had never once said it aloud, Hong Dao was the only friend Jeok Cheongang had ever opened his heart to.

To his Master, he had needed to be a reliable Disciple. To the first Disciple he later accepted, he had needed to be a dependable Master.

But with Hong Dao, it was different.

When he was with Hong Dao, he did not have to be anyone’s anything. He could simply be Jeok Cheongang, an ordinary human being.

“Did you know?”

Jeok Cheongang sent internal energy into Hong Dao’s Mingmen acupoint and spoke in a low voice.

“You’re my best friend.”

The breath that had been so weak it seemed ready to stop at any moment eased. The eyelids that looked as though they would remain closed forever finally opened a sliver.

A final rally.

Jeok Cheongang gazed into Hong Dao’s gray eyes as the final flame of life flickered within them.

“Speak. Anything at all.”

Hong Dao’s blood-soaked lips moved faintly. Jeok Cheongang put his ear to Hong Dao’s mouth and listened to his final words, his expression changing by the moment.

Anger. Shock. The realization of something.

And the final emotion to appear was sorrow.

Slowly. Then with a soft thud.

The coughing voice fell silent. The heaving chest and trembling eyelids settled peacefully.

Hong Dao closed his eyes as though he had fallen asleep, a satisfied smile still resting at the corners of his mouth.

Jeok Cheongang stared at him before opening his mouth.

“We’re going to Shaolin.”

His voice boiled like molten lava.

Chapter 259

Dharma King Hong Dao.

He was the Abbot of Shaolin, known as the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim[1433], and one of the Ten Kings. He had breathed his last.

Here in Henan, of all places—at Shaolin's doorstep, where the Star-Array Grand Banquet was being held.

"H-How could this happen?"

"Master Hong Dao!"

Sorrow and shock weighed upon everyone gathered there, but my gaze remained fixed on one person.

I spoke toward his back, which had gone rigid as a plaster statue.

"Old Master—no, Master."

Jeok Cheongang, who had been looking down at Hong Dao's corpse, turned his head.

"I'm going to Shaolin."

His voice boiled like molten lava.

The blade-sharp aura pouring from the entire body of the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, made it difficult to breathe and prickled my skin.

Only his eyes were cold and still.

He was clinging to the last thread of his reason, suppressing the urge to hunt Jongni Chu down and tear him apart this instant.

What could possibly take precedence over avenging his dearest friend?

"Was that Master Hong Dao's final wish?"

"Later. Every moment counts right now."

Just as Jeok Cheongang finished speaking, dozens of presences rapidly approached from the distance. At the head of the group, the Thunderbolt Saber King stared wide-eyed at the scene before him.

"H-Hong Dao!"

"There's no time to be shocked. Listen carefully."

Jeok Cheongang continued without pause.

"I'm heading straight to Shaolin. Inform everyone and gather them together. Not a single moment can be wasted."

"Do you intend to cast a net over heaven and earth to capture Jongni Chu?"

"The opposite."

"What?"

[1433] "Mount Tai and Northern Dipper" is an expression for a figure or institution held in the highest esteem.

"The Myriad-Mile Pursuit[1434] is tracking him, but he is certain to fail. Once everyone is assembled, bring them straight to Shaolin."

"Did you say Shaolin?"

"Yes."

Jeok Cheongang nodded gravely.

"If Hong Dao's final words are true… a storm of blood will soon descend upon Shaolin. It may have already begun."

"…!"

The shocking declaration plunged everyone into silence. Even the Thunderbolt Saber King stood there gaping, and I was no different.

Shaolin Temple?

What kind of place was Shaolin Temple?

It was a temple and martial sect of such stature that it was only natural to call it the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim. Shaolin had stood for a thousand years.

Some even claimed that the Murim itself had begun with the arrival of Bodhidharma.[1435]

It was the holy ground of Buddhism and the central seat of martial arts. Even if Shaolin's power waned, its deep-rooted history and the respect of the people remained unshaken.

And now a storm of blood was going to descend upon Shaolin Temple.

"W-What do you mean? Hong Dao's final words? And who would dare to—"

"Hah!"

Kwoooong!

Jeok Cheongang's roar jolted everyone back to their senses. The Thunderbolt Saber King stopped rambling and clamped his mouth shut.

"Dark Heaven. They've begun to move. If this old man's guess is correct, we'll eventually see Jongni Chu—that bastard who deserves to be torn apart—in Shaolin as well."

"Dark Heaven…!"

Several leaders, including the Thunderbolt Saber King, opened their eyes wide. Judging by their reactions, they had clearly received at least some warning already.

"Do you understand now why every moment counts?"

Jeok Cheongang turned away from the Thunderbolt Saber King and swept his deeply sunken gaze across the gathering.

[1434] Myriad-Mile Pursuit is the epithet of the Beggars' Sect Leader, renowned for his movement techniques.

[1435] Bodhidharma was a Buddhist monk traditionally associated with the origins of Chan Buddhism and with Shaolin.

"Do exactly as I have said. That is Hong Dao's final will."

There was no time left to waste. Jeok Cheongang and I exchanged a glance, unleashed our movement techniques, and left the area simultaneously.

Whoooosh!

As I raced through the fierce wind, something cold touched my cheek.

The sky was clear and cloudless. There was no sign of rain.

But the eyes of someone running after losing a friend and postponing his revenge must have been brimming with tears.

No. It's rainwater.

I'll call it rainwater.

Damn it.

I clenched my teeth as I thought of Jongni Chu.

I have a feeling today is going to be a long day.

Shrill whistles pierced the air.

"Find the culprit!"

"He may still be hiding nearby!"

"Everyone, remain calm! Nothing is going to happen!"

The Murim Alliance buzzed like a kicked hornet's nest.

The countless martial artists attending the Star-Array Grand Banquet were scouring the surrounding area for Jongni Chu with fire in their eyes, while anxious commoners followed the orders of those directing them.

They're wasting their time.

They still did not know that Jongni Chu had already fled far away—or that Dharma King Hong Dao was dead.

For a moment, I considered telling them, but quickly dismissed the thought.

It would only add to the confusion.

Besides, I had no time to seek out every leader and explain what had happened. It was only a matter of time before they found out for themselves.

Right now, keeping pace with Jeok Cheongang took everything I had.

Fortunately, Shaolin Temple isn't far.

That was our one piece of good fortune. After I passed the preliminary competition, the carriage ride from Mount Song to the Murim Alliance had taken roughly three shichen.[1436] At the speed we were traveling with our movement techniques, we could shorten the journey dramatically.

Whoooosh!

[1436] A shichen is a traditional period of about two hours; three shichen are about six hours.

After racing like the wind for some time, the bustling crowds and tightly packed buildings fell away, giving way to fields and rice paddies.

As we crossed the broad plain, Jeok Cheongang, who had led the way in silence the entire time, suddenly spoke.

“Jongni Chu. Dark Heaven. Unnamed. Buddhist Staff.”

Four words uttered in a hoarse voice.

To anyone unaware of the circumstances, they would have sounded like a random list. I understood immediately.

They were the answer I had been waiting for.

“Were those Master Hong Dao’s final words?”

“Yes. Even that took every last bit of strength he had.”

“…”

“It would not have been strange if his breath had already stopped. He held on only to deliver those words to me.”

Jeok Cheongang’s voice trembled faintly, then settled again.

“What do you think?”

“It’s as you suspected, Old Master.”

“It is only a suspicion, not a certainty. Tell me everything. Leave nothing out.”

“The first two words seem to mean that Jongni Chu belongs to Dark Heaven. That hardly needs explaining.”

“And?”

“Unnamed and the Buddhist Staff… I’m not sure. Honestly, I don’t know.”

“Do you remember Hong Dao’s Disciple?”

“Oh, of course.”

The memory of our meeting a year ago remained vivid.

The young warrior monk I had met at an inn in Henan had been Dharma King Hong Dao’s Disciple. He had introduced himself as Unnamed.

So that was the Unnamed Hong Dao meant.

Had Hong Dao used his final moments to ask Jeok Cheongang to look after his Disciple?

“But what’s this Buddhist Staff? Do you mean the kind of staff monks carry around?”

Jeok Cheongang nodded.

“Yes. But the Buddhist Staff Hong Dao meant was the Green Jade Buddha Staff, Shaolin’s sacred treasure.”

“The Green Jade Buddha Staff?”

A scene suddenly came to mind from the day Jeok Cheongang and Hong Dao had reunited after a long time and chatted with laughter.

What choice did they have? They were the ones who forced the Abbot's seat on someone who said he didn't want it.

The Green Jade Buddha Staff. To entrust a sacred treasure of thousand-year-old Shaolin—one with such immense authority—to a damn monk like this… They must all have been completely blind.

The staff Hong Dao had taken from his robes that day had been absurdly short, its smooth surface gleaming with a faint green light.

I had wondered what it was, and the revelation that it was Shaolin's sacred treasure had surprised me.

"But why would the Green Jade Buddha Staff be part of his final words?"

"Not long before his death, Hong Dao told me he had entrusted the Green Jade Buddha Staff to his Disciple."

I frowned slightly, and Jeok Cheongang continued.

"The Green Jade Buddha Staff is not only Shaolin's sacred treasure. It is also the symbol of office that the Abbot always carries."

"Ah!"

The exclamation escaped me before I could stop it. A realization flashed through my mind.

Hong Dao's final words, wrung from him with the last of his strength.

The reason Jeok Cheongang had turned toward Shaolin, postponing even the revenge for his dearest friend.

"The Green Jade Buddha Staff!"

"Exactly."

Jeok Cheongang's low voice continued.

"Dark Heaven's true objective is not Hong Dao's death. It is the seizure of the Green Jade Buddha Staff."

Now everything was clear.

Jongni Chu—or rather, Dark Heaven—clearly wanted Shaolin's sacred treasure.

Hong Dao had squeezed out the last of his strength to leave those final words and reveal that fact.

Now that Dark Heaven knew the Green Jade Buddha Staff was not in Hong Dao's possession, even a three-year-old could tell where they would go next.

A storm of blood will descend upon Shaolin.

As I recalled Jeok Cheongang's warning to the Thunderbolt Saber King, my thoughts went cold.

"Huff, hoo…"

Tap-tap-tap-tap!

Ragged breaths. Feet pounding without pause.

An aged voice brought the middle-aged man racing along the mountain path to a halt.

“You seem to have urgent business, young friend.”

The speaker was an old man with a beard that hung to his chest.

Tall, with his hair neatly arranged, he looked at first glance like a retired scholar.

“The weather is lovely. Why not slow down and enjoy the scenery?”

The middle-aged man’s throat bobbed heavily.

His voice emerged taut with tension.

“Who are you?”

“Just an old man out for a stroll. I heard the scenery on Mount Song was splendid, so I came to pass the time.”

“Pass the time?”

The middle-aged man shouted through clenched teeth.

“Enough bullshit! You must be another vile fiend!”

“Hm?”

The old man’s eyes widened before he let out a quiet laugh.

“You have quite a fiery temper, young friend. Still, you’re much better than the people I met earlier. They were far too busy lying.”

“You met people earlier… Don’t tell me?”

“A woodcutter, an herb gatherer. Why are there so many kinds of gatherers around here? Ah, the pair who disguised themselves as husband and wife to pray for a child were at least convincing. I almost fell for them myself.”

“…!”

“So I killed every last one of them, martial artists and commoners alike. It seemed much easier that way.”

The middle-aged man trembled as if struck by lightning.

There could be no doubt. His companions, who had scattered in every direction to deliver the urgent report, were already dead.

He would probably suffer the same fate soon.

At least I should be grateful that my death will not be meaningless.

Those on the ground had been caught in the net.

The sky was another matter.

He found a sliver of comfort in the sight of a messenger eagle flying powerfully across the distant plain.

Screeeeech!

A strange, piercing cry rang out as something black swooped down upon the messenger eagle.

It was three or four times larger at a glance. The battle between the two birds that collided in midair ended far too quickly to leave any hope.

Kreeee!

The messenger eagle plummeted with a final shriek. Blood seeped between the middle-aged man's tightly clenched teeth.

"Dark Heaven…"

"Oh? You know us?"

"How could I not? You old bastard who has outraged heaven and man!"

"Most of the Beggars' Sect beggars knew nothing about us. Your martial arts are too respectable for you to be Lower District Sect riffraff… Ah, that's it. You're from the Hidden Shadow Pavilion."

The old man stroked his beard and raised the corners of his mouth.

"But I find that 'outraged heaven and man' remark rather unpleasant. What do you think?"

"You dare do something like this and still—"

The middle-aged man opened his bloodshot eyes wide and was about to shout when the old man shook his head.

"No, not you."

He raised one withered finger and pointed over the middle-aged man's shoulder.

"I was asking that fellow."

"…!"

Crack!

The middle-aged man could not turn his head.

Heaven and earth flipped, and his vision shook.

Only one sensation remained at the end.

Hot.

Fwoosh. Thud.

His charred corpse crumpled.

A foot came down upon the middle-aged man's head, crushing the lump of charcoal beneath it.

"Han Su, you bastard. What kind of bullshit are you pulling? Wasting your time playing with trash like this."

The rough voice belonged to a thickset old man. His beard had grown wild and, strangely enough, was red.

At the appearance of an old friend who had been with him for decades, the old man who looked like a scholar smiled faintly.

"I was just about to wrap things up and leave. How are things up the mountain?"

"They're busy having their fun. Oh, apparently that Disciple of his has the Green Jade Buddha Staff."

“Is that so? Then let’s go together, Flame Tiger.”
The two exchanged faint smiles and began walking at a leisurely pace.
With each step, the screams coming from Shaolin Temple drew closer.

Chapter 260

“Young Hero Cheong. Young Hero Cheong, wake up.”

Smack! Smack!

“Mmm…”

Cheongpung opened his eyes with a groan.

Someone was slapping him hard across the face. It was his first time being slapped, so the experience was fascinating in a way, but for some strange reason, it also felt rather unpleasant.

Ah. So this is why people don’t like being slapped.

With that small insight, Cheongpung opened his mouth.

“Excuse me.”

Smack! Smack!

“I’m aw—”

Smack! Smack!

“I’m awake…”

Smack!

Only after landing one last slap did the hand finally stop.

A familiar-looking young man spoke with a stiff expression.

“You’re awake. Do you remember who I am?”

“It’s been a while, Warrior Hyuk Mujin.”

Hyuk Mujin sighed.

“So you do remember me.”

“Of course. I just never expected we’d meet like this.”

Cheongpung remembered Hyuk Mujin as a good person.

But when a good person he had not seen in a year was slapping him across the face, even Cheongpung could not help but feel hurt.

“I apologize if I offended you. I suddenly remembered the money I lost.”

“What?”

“No, the situation was so urgent that I forgot my manners.”

“Oh…”

If that was the reason, Cheongpung could understand.

He nodded and looked around. Shouts rang out from every direction, and people were running everywhere.

“Is this a festival?”

“…Does this look like a festival?”

“It isn’t?”

“No.”

Hyuk Mujin answered firmly, then gave him a brief account of the situation.

Dharma King Hong Dao had been found dead, and the culprit was none other than…

“Jongni Chu?”

“Yes. The Always-Victorious Sword, Jongni Chu. That bastard. His exact identity remains unknown, but most believe he was an assassin sent by the Demonic Cult.”

“The Demonic Cult…”

It was a name Cheongpung had heard countless times from his grandfather, the Sword Saint. A place where fiends and vicious killers who had once stained the entire world with blood had gathered.

And Jongni Chu was an assassin from that very Demonic Cult.

Cheongpung shook his head without realizing it.

“No.”

“What do you mean…?”

Hyuk Mujin continued with an incredulous expression.

“You suffered at his hands yourself, and you still don’t understand? The shock must have been so great that you can’t remember, but you nearly died at his hands.”

No. Cheongpung remembered everything clearly.

The helplessness and fear he had felt before a master against whom nothing worked. Even that final moment, when he had contemplated death for the first time in his life.

I was scared. Truly scared.

The mere thought made the fine hairs on his body stand on end and his palms turn clammy.

But why?

Why did Jongni Chu’s face keep appearing before his eyes—that bright smile he had worn when asking Cheongpung to be his friend?

Cheongpung’s lips remained pressed tightly together for a moment before finally parting.

“He’s my friend.”

“…What?”

“That man is my friend. He couldn’t have done it.”

“Young Hero Cheong!”

Startled, Hyuk Mujin hurriedly glanced around.

Only after confirming that no one was paying attention to them did he lower his voice.

“Are you insane? Jongni Chu is already as good as an enemy of the entire Murim. How can you call someone like that your friend…?”

He was an assassin who had murdered the Abbot of Shaolin Temple and fled. Simply being acquainted with Jongni Chu could be enough to earn Cheongpung a brutal beating.

Even if he was the disciple the Sword Saint had raised like his own flesh and blood, people would still glare at him.

“Never mention him out loud again. Do you understand?”

“But…”

Cheongpung was about to say something, but he closed his mouth at the look in Hyuk Mujin’s eyes.

“He’s a demonic fiend. I don’t know what kind of underhanded trick he used to win your favor, but it was all a disguise meant to help him assassinate Master Hong Dao.”

“Are you certain? Did anyone see him kill him?”

“All the circumstances point to it. The pursuit party formed to capture him and the thousands of heroes who gathered to save Shaolin have finished preparing to depart.”

“Shaolin…”

“The Demonic Cult’s vile scheme has placed Shaolin in danger. Great Hero Jeok and the Captain have already gone on ahead.”

Cheongpung slowly closed his eyes.

In the pitch-black darkness, the faces of Jin Taekyung and Jongni Chu flashed before him in turn.

He did not deliberate for long.

“I’ll go ahead.”

“What?”

By the time Hyuk Mujin asked back with a dazed expression, Cheongpung had already shot far into the distance.

His feet carried him toward Mount Song.

Mount Song was beautiful and peaceful enough to be counted among the Five Sacred Mountains.

But the place that should have been green and lovely was stained with blood and filled with screams.

“Aaaaaagh!”

“Kill every last one of them.”

Slash! Shhhhhhk!

Blood spurted from every direction whenever a flash of sword light gleamed.

In broad daylight on the peaceful day of Baekjung,[1437] hundreds of masked men had appeared without warning and begun slaughtering people with emotionless eyes.

“Protect the pilgrims! Do not retreat!”

Shaolin martial monks with Buddhist precept seals carved into their foreheads stood against them, but the situation showed no sign of improving.

The masked men were all exceptional masters and difficult enough to fight on their own. On top of that, the martial monks had to protect the scholarly monks who had never learned martial arts, the young novices, and the countless pilgrims.

“Wh-what is this?”

“Kraaagh!”

No one had expected anything like this to happen today.

Who would dare invade the grounds of Shaolin Temple, the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim, in the very heart of the Central Plains?

The monks were being swept aside by the cruel, treacherous masked men when—

“You bastards! Do you even know where you are?”

A short old monk barely five feet tall[1438] appeared with a thunderous shout.

He glared at the masked men staining Shaolin Temple’s grounds with blood, cold blue sparks blazing in his eyes.

“Demonic martial arts! So you’re the demonic fiends of Tianshan!”

Palm force erupted from the old monk’s hands and swept across the grounds.

Kwoooong!

The masked men rushed him after noticing his presence too late, only to be swallowed by the palm force and killed.

It was an overwhelming sight. More than ten masters were crushed by a single attack.

However…

“The Lord of Heaven has commanded us. Kill the enemy.”

“Follow Heaven’s command. Kill them all.”

The hundreds of masked men did not stop.

They possessed neither agitation nor hesitation. They merely muttered as though possessed by ghosts and swung their swords.

Slash. Slash. Slash.

The old monk’s expression hardened at the sight.

How ruthless…

[1437] Baekjung is a traditional Korean Buddhist observance held on the fifteenth day of the seventh lunar month.

[1438] The source gives his height as five cheok. One cheok is 30.3 cm (11.9 in), making five cheok about 1.52 m (5 ft).

Even when their limbs were severed and their intestines spilled out, they did not so much as twitch an eyebrow.

They slaughtered without feeling pain or fear, then dropped like puppets with their strings cut. The sight sent a chill through him.

These things aren't human. They're Fiends incarnate.

If even an old monk who had fought his way through the Great Faction War felt that way, how much worse must it have been for everyone else?

The more experienced middle-aged martial monks were struggling valiantly, but the young monks witnessing such carnage for the first time trembled with fear.

Yet they did not retreat.

Perhaps it was the sense of duty that came with being disciples of Buddhism standing face-to-face with Fiends.

I never thought this day would come.

The old monk lamented inwardly.

During the last Great Faction War, Shaolin had been at the forefront more than anyone and shed more blood than anyone.

It had been a noble sacrifice that saved the Murim, but Shaolin had lost many elders and much martial knowledge. And the sacrifices of that era had returned today as tragedy.

Of all times, this had to happen while my Senior Brother, the Abbot, was away!

There was no helping it. He was the only one who could defend Shaolin now.

The old monk, Hongcheon, gritted his teeth and unleashed a lion's roar.

"This is Shaolin!"

His name might have been overshadowed by that of his Senior Brother, Hong Dao, but he too was a master who had reached the Supreme Peak realm.

Though the outside world knew nothing of his abilities, his ceaseless devotion to martial arts had already carried him beyond Hong Dao.

"Come at me, all of you!"

Kwoooong!

Palm force imbued with mighty Buddhist internal energy swept out in every direction.

At that moment—

"Oh-ho. The Hundred-Step Divine Fist?"

"We get to see that damned martial art again."

Two voices pierced Hongcheon's ears.

Two men slowly entered the temple grounds. As soon as they appeared, the masked men lowered their swords and withdrew in perfect unison.

"Was it you bastards?"

At Hongcheon's snarled question, the red-bearded old man picked his nose and answered.

"That's right. This old man right here."

"You're the vile demonic fiends of Tianshan."

"The demonic fiends of Tianshan? Well, that's half right and half wrong. But I'll let it pass."

Hongcheon paused.

"You're not from the Demonic Cult?"

"What does that matter? All you need to know is that I'm the one who'll grab your shiny pate and rip it off."

The old man with the air of a great scholar answered with a quiet smile.

"Flame Tiger, are you going to handle him?"

"Naturally. Now that I've seen the Hundred-Step Divine Fist, I can't just let it go."

"I keep telling you to rein in that temper of yours."

"I'll think about it later. Right now, I want to kill that bald monk more than I care about my temper."

Hongcheon stared at the two old men in turn, his eyes wide.

The name Flame Tiger.

The immense auras radiating from the two old men, who could not have seemed more different.

"Could you two be…?"

Flame Tiger gave a ferocious laugh and nodded.

"You're only realizing it now? You must still be a youngster. All those damned monks of the Beom generation[1439] have been dead for ages… Are you the Dharma King's youngest Junior Brother?"

"…!"

"Judging by that reaction, I guess I'm right. Han Su, what was the name of that old monk you killed at the end?"

"Beomgong."

Hongcheon's fist trembled at the Dharma name of the Martial Uncle who had died during the Great Faction War.

There's no doubt. It's them.

How could he not know the names Flame Tiger and Han Su?

Or the epithet shared by the villains who had killed countless Shaolin disciples?

"The Yin-Yang Twin Freaks."

It was a story from the distant past.

[1439] In Buddhist naming traditions, monks of the same generation may share a character in their Dharma names. Here, that character is Beom.

The two demonic fiends had ruled the tropical rainforests of Nanman[1440] and the Great Snow Mountain of the north, respectively. They had emerged into the Central Plains and stained the world with blood, while the orthodox faction's net over heaven and earth, spread to hunt them down, had been torn apart by the Demonic Cult's invasion.

The two fiends had escaped death by the narrowest margin, entered the Demonic Cult's service, and earned a terrifying reputation during the Great Faction War.

"The Yin-Yang Twin Freaks… It has been a long time since I heard that name from someone else's lips."

"Those were good times. Few things have ever been as enjoyable."

Flame Tiger fondly reminisced about that horrific past, then shook his head.

"No, that's not right. I still prefer things as they are now."

"Of course. We couldn't even set foot in Henan back then."

"It was all because of that damned Martial God."

"But the Martial God is gone now."

"Hardly any of those so-called Ten Kings and Three Saints are left, either."

Han Su watched Flame Tiger with a faint smile before abruptly bringing his palms together toward Hongcheon.

"Ah, come to think of it, I'd forgotten for a moment. Please accept my condolences."

Hongcheon, who had stiffened at the appearance of the two old monsters, sensed something ominous and asked:

"Condolences? What are you talking about?"

"On our way up, we heard that someone had died. Dharma King Hong Dao—your Senior Brother."

"…!"

Shock struck him, making the world before his eyes seem to go dim.

His Senior Brother, who should have been at the Murim Alliance, was dead?

That was impossible.

"Nonsense!"

Han Su gave a short laugh as he looked at the shaken Hongcheon.

"Whether it's true or not is for you to decide. And…"

Flame Tiger continued in a heated voice.

"All the monks here, including you, will die. That's our judgment."

Rustle.

As if they had sensed their leader's aura, the masked men took a step forward with emotionless eyes.

A deadly edge rising from hundreds of sword blades filled Shaolin Temple.

[1440] Nanman is a historical Chinese term for peoples and regions south of the Central Plains.

Hongcheon’s eyelids trembled at the sight.

Senior Brother… Is it true?

But the trembling soon subsided, and light returned to his eyes.

The old monk, who had devoted eighty years to martial arts, clenched his fists.

“I never thought I’d have to face the Yin-Yang Twin Freaks at the same time. Come, you damned old monsters.”

“Wahahaha! You’ve got quite a foul mouth for a monk. I like that you’re still so full of youthful vigor.”

Flame Tiger burst into hearty laughter and stepped forward.

“Unfortunately, one old man is enough for you. Han Su has a more pressing matter to attend to.”

“Very urgent business.”

Han Su smiled faintly and continued.

“So will you step aside? I have to go to the Face-Wall Cave.”

The Face-Wall Cave.

The moment those words left Han Su’s mouth, Hongcheon felt his heart plummet.

Unnamed was there. His Senior Brother’s only Disciple.

And…

The Green Jade Buddha Staff.

At last realizing the enemies’ objective, Hongcheon let out a lion’s roar.

“Stop them by whatever means necessary!”

“Stop us? That won’t be enough.”

The Yin-Yang Twin Freaks flicked their hands, dark smiles spreading across their faces.

As though they had returned to the days of fifty years ago, horrifying killing intent surged from their entire bodies.

“Kill them all.”

Fwooooooosh!

Chapter 261

Blood gushed up.

The middle-aged monk's beard, streaked here and there with white, was soaked in blood. He forced out the words in a broken voice.

"D-Demon. You're a demon."

A calm voice slipped into his ear.

"Shakyamuni[1441] drove away the demons' temptations and attained enlightenment beneath the Bodhi tree, or so they say. But…"

Shaaak!

A hand wreathed in bitterly cold blue Force pulled free of the monk's chest.

The gaping wound had already frozen over, and frost-covered drops of blood fell to the ground like shards of ice.

"No enlightenment can endure in the face of death."

The monk trembled as a chill swept through his entire body.

He did not know whether it came from the extreme Yin-Cold Technique that had frozen even his internal organs or the aura of death looming before his eyes.

No. He could not know.

Ssslip. Thud.

Yin Ghost Han Su looked down at the monk, who had died with his eyes wide open. His gaze darkened.

That was dangerous. More dangerous than I expected.

He looked around. Four corpses lay sprawled before the collapsed entrance to the Face-Wall Cave, including the middle-aged monk who had just fallen.

The Four Great Vajras.[1442]

As martial monks counted among Shaolin's finest, each of them possessed formidable martial arts.

The last bald monk in particular had been a master at the threshold of Supreme Peak. If Han Su had not traded flesh for bone, he might have lost his life to the Four Great Vajras' combined assault.

Persistent bastards. Somehow, they've managed to keep their lineage alive.

Shaolin had suffered losses approaching ninety percent during the last Great Faction War.

The damage had been so catastrophic that it could no longer compare to the days when it had been called the greatest sect under heaven. Even so, the strength Shaolin had accumulated over a thousand years still remained.

[1441] Shakyamuni is a name for the historical Buddha.

[1442] Vajras are Buddhist guardian figures; the Four Great Vajras is the title of these four elite Shaolin monks.

But that ends today.

Every part of the plan was proceeding smoothly. Dharma King Hong Dao was dead, the Four Great Vajras had fallen, and Hongcheon would soon meet his end at Flame Tiger's hands.

The hundreds of killers stripped of every sensation would drench Mount Song in blood and withdraw only after burning the martial arts manuals in the Scripture Depository.

If Shaolin lost both its leading masters and its martial arts, its decline would be certain.

And one mission took priority over everything else.

The Green Jade Buddha Staff.

Han Su could not guess why Shaolin's sacred treasure mattered so much, but he had to complete his task.

Because it was none other than the Lord of Heaven's command.

Was that not why he, the man who enjoyed the Lord of Heaven's absolute trust, had come with them?

"I'll take care of Hong Dao. You bastards take care of Shaolin. If you fail to find the Green Jade Buddha Staff… I'll leave what happens next to your imagination."

Han Su's face stiffened as he recalled the last thing he had said.

There could not be a single mistake. If Han Su failed, he would pay dearly for it.

Boom!

Han Su flicked his sleeve, clearing the blocked entrance to the Face-Wall Cave.

Even the massive stone gate revealed beyond it could not halt his advance.

Rumble!

The stone gate collapsed with a deafening roar. Beyond the billowing cloud of dust and powdered stone, a pair of eyes gleamed with piercing light.

"Benefactor. What brings you here?"

Han Su curled his lips as the young monk, Unnamed, unfolded his crossed legs and slowly rose.

"Are you Hong Dao's Disciple?"

"And what will you do if I am?"

"I've come to collect something."

"I have nothing to give you, Benefactor."

"Then let me correct myself. I've come to take it."

"I cannot surrender so much as a single grain of rice to someone reeking of blood."

"Don't trouble yourself over it. I'll take your life along with it."

"Amitabha."[1443]

[1443] Amitabha is the name of a Buddha invoked in Buddhist prayer.

Unnamed brought his palms together, his prayer beads wrapped around one hand. Determination gleamed in his eyes.

"It won't be easy."

The battle between Hongcheon and Flame Tiger, two fist masters who had reached Supreme Peak, was fierce.

Screeeech! Boom!

Every thrust, swing, and rising kick carried tremendous power.

It was a clash between superhumans who had stepped into the lofty realm of Supreme Peak—a battle no one dared interfere with.

But as time passed, the scales began to tip.

Boom!

The instant their Force-wreathed fists collided, a line of crimson blood trickled from one man's mouth.

"Cough."

The monk's gray robes turned bright red.

Flame Tiger bared his yellow teeth as Hongcheon was driven back a dozen steps, as if swept away by an invisible wind.

"Brat. When you were still suckling at your mother's breast, this old man was rampaging through Nanman.[1444] You're thirty years too early to challenge me."

Hongcheon wiped his mouth with his sleeve. Despite his pallid complexion, the old monk's eyes burned fiercely.

"You truly are an old monster. How about climbing into your coffin already?"

"Even when the orthodox faction cast a net over heaven and earth, they couldn't catch this old man. A bald monk like you doesn't stand a chance."

Hongcheon bit his lip as Flame Tiger's aura blazed even more fiercely.

He knew those words were not mere confidence. They were simply the truth.

What kind of monster is he, to still be going this strong?

The Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts had already been over sixty during the Great Faction War.

Yet despite clearly being well over a hundred now, Flame Tiger showed no sign of fatigue.

Internal energy whose depths Hongcheon could not begin to fathom. Experience accumulated through countless acts of slaughter. Even the one weakness Flame Tiger should have possessed—old age—seemed to have passed him by.

Despair closed in around Hongcheon.

[1444] Nanman is a historical Chinese term for peoples and regions to the south.

But there's still hope.

His eyes shifted slightly toward the more than one hundred martial monks fighting the masked men.

One hundred and eight, to be exact.

They were the Hundred and Eight Arhats,[1445] the face and pride of Shaolin Temple.

The carefully selected elite wielded their precept blades and Zen staffs, steadily driving back the masked men.

"They are the greatest criminals under heaven. Show them no mercy!"

"Open the Killing Gate!"

The Hundred and Eight Arhats displayed their true strength when they deployed the Hundred and Eight Arhats Formation.

Each of them performed his assigned role flawlessly, calmly reproducing in battle what they had practiced thousands of times.

Clang-clang-clang! Slash!

The Hundred and Eight Arhats Formation bore down like the palm of the Tathagata,[1446] and the masked men began to fall one after another, spraying blood.

The battle, so one-sided at first, had become evenly matched.

If this continues… we can win.

The Murim Alliance was only a few shichen[1447] away. Once reinforcements arrived, the Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts and the masked men would be the ones in danger.

A glimmer of hope crossed Hongcheon's eyes.

"Wahahaha!"

"…?"

"Every thought is written all over your face. What an innocent monk you are."

Hongcheon's expression stiffened. Something about Flame Tiger's attitude struck him as strange.

Did he already know this would happen?

But why?

Before he could pursue the question, a deafening explosion left his ears ringing and shook the earth beneath his feet.

Kwooooom!

Hongcheon stared at the sight before him, his mouth hanging open.

The world seemed to slow. Amid the earth thrown more than ten zhang[1448] into the air, severed limbs tumbled through a downpour of blood.

[1445] An arhat is a person who has attained liberation in Buddhism.

[1446] Tathagata is a title of the Buddha.

[1447] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[1448] A zhang is approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft); ten zhang are approximately 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

One section of the Hundred and Eight Arhats Formation had vanished as though swallowed by a gigantic monster.

“No!”

Time lurched back into motion with Hongcheon’s scream.

The explosion had devastated an area more than ten zhang across. More than twenty Arhat monks had been reduced to chunks of flesh.

The masked men surged into the gap like a wave.

Slash. Slash. Slash!

The Arhat monks were still only human.

Flashing blades filled the vision of those frozen in shock.

The battlefield allowed not a moment of carelessness. The price of hesitation was horrific.

“Aaaaaagh!”

“Junior Brother!”

The Hundred and Eight Arhats Formation, once as solid as an invincible shield, crumbled helplessly. Several old monks belatedly tried to restore it, but their efforts were in vain.

Their opponents were no ordinary men.

They were beings worthy of being called demons.

“The Lord of Heaven has commanded us. Kill the enemy.”

Tss-tss-tss-tss.

As one masked man muttered in a toneless voice, red light seeped from his eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouth.

The Arhat monks stared in stunned disbelief at the bizarre phenomenon they were witnessing for the first time.

“W-What is that?”

“Demonic martial arts! It’s demonic martial arts! Everyone, get away!”

But it was already too late.

The red light swelled until it enveloped the masked man’s entire body, then erupted in every direction, swallowing dozens of Arhat monks and several masked men.

Boom!

An explosion. A deafening roar. Screams.

Severed limbs flew through the sky, and the rain pattering down was red.

Blood vessels spread across Hongcheon’s eyes as he stared blankly at the scene.

“H-How dare you…”

Shaolin was collapsing.

Shaolin Temple, which had stood unshaken even through the Great Faction War, now overflowed with corpses and death.

The young Disciple who had greeted him with a smile every morning lay dead. The Junior Brother with whom he had shared decades of friendship had vanished without a trace.

As the hellscape unfolded before his eyes, blood dripped from his tightly clenched fist.

“This can’t… This can’t be happening.”

Flame Tiger threw back his head and laughed heartily at Hongcheon’s muttering.

“It’s called the Exploding Blood Demonic Art. It’s a damned tricky art, so it’s difficult to master, but it’s perfect for times like this. I brought a couple of them along… and they’re even more useful than I expected.”

“How dare you bastards—!”

Hongcheon shot forward with a cry that was nearly a scream.

A fist wreathed in crimson Force was waiting for him.

Bababoom!

His Body-Protecting Qi shattered, and a barrage of powerful blows hammered Hongcheon’s limbs.

The pain was so intense that his vision went dark. Blood gushed from his mouth, mixed with pieces of his internal organs.

“Gwaaaargh!”

Through his blurred vision, Hongcheon saw Flame Tiger approaching at a leisurely pace.

“You stupid bastard. You spent all those years learning Shaolin’s martial arts, yet you forgot your Unshakable Mind?”

“Cough! Cough!”

It had been an undeniable mistake. No matter what happened, Hongcheon should not have lost his composure. Whatever he witnessed, he should have responded calmly.

His opponent was a monster who had already been considered comparable to the Ten Kings during the Great Faction War.

The best course of action had been to maintain the standoff somehow and buy time.

“You bastard…”

But Hongcheon still forced himself upright, gasping for breath.

Not yet.

If he fell, Shaolin would fall with him. He had to defend this place until his final breath.

For one moment longer. So that even one more person might escape alive.

That was the final duty of an old monk who had devoted his entire life to Shaolin.

“Come.”

Flame Tiger frowned at the fire burning in Hongcheon’s eyes.

“This is why I hate monk bastards. They’re about to die, but they still insist on putting on airs.”

“What would a demonic fiend like you know?”

“I think I know one thing.”

Flame Tiger laughed savagely.

“You’re about to die.”

Whoosh!

Already gravely wounded, Hongcheon could not follow his speed.

In the blink of an eye, Flame Tiger closed the distance and slammed a fist into Hongcheon’s shoulder.

Thud!

The Force behind that single punch tore through flesh and bone.

Hongcheon screamed as everything below his shoulder vanished.

“Aaaaaagh!”

“You damned bald monk. You dare dodge this old man’s fist? Let’s see you dodge this one too.”

Flame Tiger planted a foot on Hongcheon’s head as the old monk writhed in agony.

Even a tenth—no, a hundredth—of his strength would crush Hongcheon’s skull like a watermelon.

“What do people say at a time like this? Ah, right.”

Flame Tiger tapped his forehead theatrically and continued.

“May you be reborn in paradise.”

Grrrrk.

The pressure slowly increased.

Just as death closed in before Hongcheon’s eyes, two voices reached them.

“Take that filthy foot off him. Before I reduce even your filthy spirit to ash.”

“And make your little chili pepper extra crispy.”[1449]

The first voice belonged to an old man. The second was young—shockingly young.

Flame Tiger turned toward the voices, and his face stiffened.

“The Fire King…!”

[1449] Gochu basasak is the name of a Korean crispy chicken dish. Gochu means “chili pepper” and is also slang for a penis.

Chapter 262

What awaited us when we arrived at full speed was a scene so horrific I could barely look at it.

Corpses. Pools of blood. Ownerless arms and legs…

If the Shaolin Temple I had seen with my own eyes a year ago had been a beautiful painting of a utopian paradise, then what lay before me now was a painting of hell.

These fucking lunatics.

They had clearly been killing civilians and Murim warriors alike, indiscriminately.

Beyond the masked men battling Shaolin's monks, I spotted a red-bearded old man.

"The Fire King…!"

Without taking my eyes off him, I asked, "Know him?"

"No."

"What about the monk pinned beneath him?"

"Hongcheon. Hong Dao's youngest Junior Brother. He's grown a lot since I last saw him."

"…He sure has."

So much that he looked well over seventy.

As I found myself at a loss for words, the old man's blazing gaze swept over us.

"Are you the only ones?"

Jeok Cheongang answered indifferently.

"What if it is?"

"Heh heh. Looks like you've finally found a place to die, old man."

"Even if your head is empty, you should still speak properly. It isn't a place to die. It's a place to kill—and that includes every one of you."

The old man's eyebrow twitched.

"Still as arrogant as ever. You haven't changed."

"Haven't changed? Have we met before?"

"I saw you once from a distance. I regretted for years that we never had the chance to see which of us was stronger."

"What's your name?"

"Flame Tiger! I am the tiger of Nanman[1450]!"

"The Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts? Good. There should be one more, so there's no need to take you alive. I can kill you."

[1450] Nanman is a historical Chinese term for peoples and regions to the south, literally meaning "southern barbarians."

Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue.

“You’re one lucky bastard, though. You turned back with the Sanzu River[1451] right before your eyes.”

“Is that so?”

Flames blazed in Flame Tiger’s eyes. At the same time, Fist Force gathered around his rough, rock-hard fist.

I had expected as much, but the old man was also a Supreme Peak master. What was more, he had trained in the same kind of Scorching Yang Qi as we had.

“You arrived much sooner than I’d heard… but that changes nothing.”

Than he’d heard?

For an instant, I wondered how Flame Tiger could have received word so quickly.

Even if he used a messenger pigeon, we should have been faster.

But I had to set the question aside. Flame Tiger was gripping Hongcheon’s head as though he meant to crush it.

Blood trickled from the mouth of the old monk, whose entire body was drenched in red.

“Cough. Cough.”

“Want this monk to live?”

“…”

I felt Jeok Cheongang tense.

More than thirty jang[1452] separated us from Flame Tiger. Even Jeok Cheongang could not charge in recklessly. If he did, Hongcheon’s head would be crushed like a block of tofu.

“Put him down. Now.”

Beneath Jeok Cheongang’s calm voice, I could feel rage boiling like lava.

Flame Tiger grinned.

“I heard you were close to that bald monk, Dharma King Hong Dao. I suppose it was true. Did he ask you to look after his Junior Brother before he died?”

“Hong Dao was wiser and more virtuous than any monk I knew. His name does not belong in your filthy mouth.”

Jeok Cheongang stared at Flame Tiger, his gaze dark and still, then parted his lips.

“Go on.”

“What?”

“I said go on. Did you truly think that would be enough to shake this old man?”

“Y-You damned old monster.”

[1451] The Sanzu River is a river in Buddhist tradition that the dead cross on their way to the afterlife.

[1452] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[1453] The Sanzu River is a river in Buddhist tradition that the dead cross on their way to the afterlife.

Flame Tiger's face flushed red as he shook Hongcheon by the head.

"Are you saying you don't care if this monk dies?"

"I don't."

"W-What?"

"It's regrettable that I can't save him, but Hong Dao did not ask me to look after his Junior Brother. He entrusted Shaolin to me."

Tss-tss-tss-tss!

At that moment, an immense amount of internal energy gathered in Jeok Cheongang's hand. It rapidly took shape, then shot forward like an arrow.

Not toward Flame Tiger, but toward the masked men ceaselessly swinging their swords.

Kwooooooong!

The terrifying mass of internal energy unleashed from Jeok Cheongang's hand plunged straight into their midst.

Like a starving fire dragon, it rampaged through the masked men, devouring and incinerating everything it touched.

Whoosh!

For the first time, emotion surfaced in their otherwise lifeless eyes.

Fear and pain.

"Aaaaaagh!"

"Aaaaargh!"

Flames soared amid horrific screams.

Dozens staggered away with their bodies ablaze. Dozens more were already dead.

The masked men froze at the sight, and the monks' precept blades and Zen staffs flew toward them.

"It's not over yet!"

"Drive out these villains!"

Fwoosh! Slash!

Jeok Cheongang had reversed the situation in an instant. He fixed Flame Tiger with an icy glare.

"If you're going to kill him, do it. Otherwise, put him down gently. You're a bear, you bastard. Stop trying to play the fox."

"Y-You goddamned old bastard!"

Whoosh!

Flame Tiger played the fox to the very end.

He hurled Hongcheon at us and rushed close behind him, plainly intending to use the monk's body as a shield while he struck at the opening.

—You take Hongcheon.

A thread of Sound Transmission pierced my ear.

Jeok Cheongang and I kicked off the ground at the same instant.

Four figures shot toward one another.

I caught Hongcheon while Jeok Cheongang vaulted over him and attacked the fox—or rather, the bear—hiding behind him.

Kwoooong!

I let the pressure wave from their terrifying collision carry me backward.

After sliding more than twenty jang[1454], I laid Hongcheon in a nearby patch of grass. Then I charged toward the two Supreme Peak masters locked in a vicious exchange.

Of course, Flame Tiger was not going to stand around chuckling while I joined the fight.

“You bastard!”

Fwoosh—thud!

My knee rang with a sharp vibration as it blocked a foot as thick as a log.

But that was all.

Supreme Peak and Peak were separated by a gulf no amount of luck could bridge.

But I had more than mere luck.

I had heaven’s luck.

The System.

I can handle him.

One-on-one would have been impossible, but Flame Tiger was already struggling just to hold off Jeok Cheongang.

His only mistake was underestimating me.

“I’m confiscating your dentures for four months.”

Flame Tiger’s face turned red enough to burst at the sight of my grin.

“You green little brat!”

“You yellow old geezer!”

“Kraaaagh!”

Flame Tiger threw Jeok Cheongang off and charged at me with a roar.

“I’ll kill you first!”

Whoosh!

A devastating punch hurtled toward me. Even I would not walk away unharmed if I took a strike wrapped in Fist Force with my bare body.

I stepped back, grabbed White Flame from my back, and swung.

Clang!

The punch stopped with a deafening crash.

[1454] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Flame Tiger's eyes grew as wide as lanterns.

"Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron?"

"Expensive weapons really are the best. Don't you agree, Old Master?"

Jeok Cheongang did not answer.

Instead, his blue-white fist was already flying toward Flame Tiger.

Kwoong!

The ground shook with the thunderous impact.

The two fists had met perfectly, but one man's fist had its bones crushed and was charred black.

Flame Tiger muttered with a dazed expression.

"H-How?"

"Did you think all who cultivate Scorching Yang Qi were equal?"

Jeok Cheongang's voice was indifferent, but lava burned in his eyes.

Heat that made Flame Tiger's paltry blaze seem insignificant poured from his entire body, pressing down on everything around him.

Flame Tiger groaned.

"The Fire King…"

"That's right. This old man is Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King and eighteenth-generation successor of the Fire Gate Clan."

"That's imposs— Cough!"

As Flame Tiger coughed up blood and tried to flee, I launched myself after him.

"Where do you think you're going?"

Crack!

My foot came down hard, crushing his instep and driving deep into the ground.

A pained groan escaped through Flame Tiger's clenched teeth along with a spray of blood.

The next moment, two streaks of light pierced into his abdomen as his upper body staggered.

Whoosh!

The difference in our realms meant a difference in power, but the martial art we used was the same.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Thud!

The Body-Protecting Qi encasing him like armor shattered.

A fountain of blood erupted from Flame Tiger's gaping mouth.

"Gueeegh!"

Both men were Supreme Peak masters, but the difference between them was vast.

Jeok Cheongang looked down at Flame Tiger, who was panting from his severe Internal Injury.

“Your luck ends here.”

“Cough. W-Wait a moment.”

“I have neither the time nor the reason.”

“I’ll tell you everything! R-Right, Dark Heaven! Everything about Dark Heaven…”

“Didn’t this old man tell you to stop playing the fox?”

Fwoosh—thud!

There was not a trace of hesitation in Jeok Cheongang’s strike.

Flame Tiger’s head vanished. His body swayed for a moment before collapsing into a pool of blood.

I casually wiped the blood splattered across my face and said:

“Wouldn’t it have been better to keep him alive?”

“You don’t reveal important secrets to a bear as stupid as that.”

“Even so…”

“The bear is dead. Now we catch the fox.”

With those cryptic words, Jeok Cheongang turned his head.

More than a hundred jang[1455] away, an old man stood rooted to the spot, staring at us.

In his hand was a short staff glowing with green light.

“The Green Jade Buddha Staff!”

“Yin Ghost Han Su. He’s next.”

The next moment, as though he had understood those words, Han Su’s figure shot away at blinding speed.

Whoosh!

Han Su drove his movement technique to its limit.

Behind him, he could feel two auras drawing closer, little by little—ever so slowly.

Damn it!

He had recognized the man at first glance.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

He had never expected that a monster reputed to be among the very first of the Ten Kings would arrive so quickly.

But who is that young man?

The question briefly crossed his mind, then vanished.

[1455] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The brat's identity did not matter.

What mattered was that Flame Tiger, whose martial prowess equaled his own, had died at their hands.

What an idiot. He attacked the Fire King instead of the Thunderbolt Saber King.

Han Su had first met Flame Tiger during the Great Faction War and spent decades at his side, but they were not sworn brothers bound by a Peach Garden Oath[1456]. He had no intention of dying on the same day and at the same hour as Flame Tiger.

Just a little farther. Just a little more!

His mission was complete.

The Green Jade Buddha Staff in his hand was proof. If he could reach the designated location and rendezvous with him…

He would survive for certain.

Because he was a master beyond even the Fire King's ability to defeat.

Flame Tiger. If that happens, I'll avenge you.

Just as Han Su tightened his grip around the Green Jade Buddha Staff, his face hardened.

This is…!

Another aura was approaching in the distance.

This one was not behind him.

It was ahead.

At first, he thought it might be reinforcements from the orthodox faction, but the aura he sensed this time belonged to only one person. Its momentum was not particularly strong, either.

Damn it. This complicates things.

If anything delayed him, even for a moment, the Fire King might catch him.

Han Su bit down hard on his lip and wrung every last ounce of strength from his body. The instant he burst through the undergrowth—

"Ah!"

A short cry escaped him, his face lighting with joy.

No emotion could compare to the relief of returning from the brink of death.

Han Su called out to him, his voice brimming with elation.

"Blood Lord!"

As though by prior agreement, Jeok Cheongang and I stopped at the same time.

[1456]The Peach Garden Oath refers to the famous oath of sworn brotherhood in Romance of the Three Kingdoms.

Han Su, who had gone from a desperate fugitive to a swaggering predator, stood waiting for us.

“There they are! The Fire King—that goddamned old man—and the young brat killed Flame Tiger!”

No.

Han Su was no predator.

He was merely a fox borrowing a tiger’s might.

The real predator was the man standing quietly beside Han Su.

I could sense nothing from him, which was strange in itself.

And that made him seem all the more dangerous.

Jeok Cheongang’s reaction was different. His face stiffened as he asked, “Who are you?”

“Your enemy.”

The young man smiled faintly.

“The enemy who killed your most precious friend.”

…What?

Chapter 263

“That makes me the enemy who killed your most precious friend.”

At those words, I froze.

The same thought must have crossed Jeok Cheongang’s mind.

What did I just hear?

For a moment, I couldn’t make sense of it. The words that had come from the unfamiliar young man’s mouth tangled together in my head.

Wait…

He killed Hong Dao? That bastard?

Memories etched deep into my mind surfaced, then vanished.

Jongni Chu disappearing in the middle of the duel. Hong Dao gasping at death’s door. And the four words he had left behind as his final message.

Jongni Chu. Dark Heaven. Unnamed. Buddhist Staff.

What, exactly, had everything I’d seen and heard until now meant?

Where had it all begun, and how had it unfolded?

I stood frozen like a statue, desperately trying to grasp the thread connecting everything. But before I could put my thoughts in order, a dry voice escaped Jeok Cheongang’s lips.

“You… killed… Hong Dao?”

Each word came out separately, strained with restraint, rage, and disbelief.

The young man smiled faintly at Jeok Cheongang and nodded.

“I told you, didn’t I? It was much easier than I expected. I told him I was going to set off a Heaven-Shaking Thunder in the spectator stands, and he followed me without a fuss.”

“Heaven-Shaking Thunder? Had you planted explosives?”

“Ah, that? Of course it was a lie.”

“…What?”

“Why do people lie? Because every now and then, some idiot falls for it.”

Blood dripped from Jeok Cheongang’s fist as he clenched it hard enough to crush something.

“He wasn’t fooled. He allowed himself to be fooled. That was the kind of man Hong Dao was.”

“He allowed himself to be fooled? I suppose that’s possible. He was the damned Abbot of Shaolin, after all. Saying he wanted to prevent even the slightest chance of a massacre would make sense.”

“You bastard!”

“Don’t give me too much grief. I hadn’t planned anything this shoddy, either. But things went wrong where I least expected them to. Of course, part of that was because of…”

The young man’s gaze suddenly shifted toward me.

“The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung. You played your part.”

My body seemed to stiffen just from meeting his eyes.

I didn’t know whether it was because of my hostility toward him or because I could sense the overwhelming difference in power between us.

Maybe both.

I bit my lip and glared at the young man.

“What the fuck are you talking about?”

“You barged into the duel, forcing me to move the plan forward by a day. The biggest complication was that bastard, the Always-Victorious Sword Jongni Chu.”

“…!”

That confirmed it.

Jongni Chu had not been the culprit—or even an accomplice.

“Well, everything worked out neatly in the end.”

The young man extended a hand.

Realizing what he wanted, Han Su hurriedly held out an object.

“Shaolin’s sacred treasure—the Green Jade Buddha Staff.”

“So this is the…”

The young man’s long fingers slowly brushed over the softly glowing Green Jade Buddha Staff.

But the next moment, he stared intently at Han Su’s face.

Han Su’s wrinkled hand was still gripping the staff.

“You can let go now.”

Han Su swallowed hard before answering.

“B-Blood Lord, I have one request.”

“A request? Go ahead. You worked hard, so I’ll do my utmost to grant it.”

It was a strange sight—no, a bizarre one.

An old man groveling before a young man who looked young enough to be his grandson.

Even more so when that old man was the infamous demonic fiend who had turned Shaolin Temple into a river of blood.

Who the hell is that bastard?

There were only two possibilities.

Either his status within Dark Heaven was unimaginably high, or he was much older than he looked.

There was also a good chance that both were true.

Whatever the case, Han Su's face brightened at the answer from the young man called the Blood Lord.

"R-Really?"

The Blood Lord clicked his tongue.

"Have you spent your whole life being deceived? You completed your mission perfectly, so a Reward is only natural. But I wonder what kind of difficult request our Senior Yin Ghost is taking so long to bring up."

"It is not that difficult a request."

"But it's difficult for you to handle yourself?"

"…I am ashamed to admit it, but yes."

"Ah. I think I know what it is."

The Blood Lord jerked his chin toward Jeok Cheongang and me.

"You want me to kill those two, don't you? Am I right?"

Han Su nodded, his eyes filled with killing intent.

The Blood Lord let out a short laugh.

"Well, this is unexpected. I suppose the two of you were closer than I thought."

"He was at my side for half my life. Nothing less will satisfy me."

"Loyalty… Well, that's admirable in its own way."

"Kill them as cruelly as possible. I will lend a hand."

"Will that be enough? If the orthodox faction comes swarming in, things will get troublesome. If we want to finish quickly and leave, you'll have to work up a little sweat too, Senior."

"Then?"

"You take the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. I'll take the Fire King. We should be finished within an ildagyeong at the latest."

"You want me to take that young brat? Wahahaha! Very well!"

Their conversation was absurd. They spoke of our lives as though they were objects already tucked inside their pockets.

At the same time, a chill ran down my spine.

He means every word.

The Blood Lord had just declared that he could kill the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, within the time it took to drink a cup of tea.

The way Jeok Cheongang's face had stiffened proved that his words were no empty boast.

—If things turn against us, run.

At the Sound Transmission that suddenly reached my ear, I gave the slightest shake of my head.

A fierce battle was already raging above us. We couldn't expect help from Shaolin.

If I withdrew, Jeok Cheongang would have no choice but to face the concentrated assault of two Supreme Peak masters.

Our best option is to hold out here until the very end.

Jeok Cheongang knew that too.

And yet he had told me to run because he was warmer and worried more than anyone realized.

This time, we might really be in trouble.

I licked my parched lips and tightened my grip on White Flame.

Han Su sneered at the sight.

"Pathetic fool. Do you think that will change anything? Your attainment is impressive enough, but even if you died and came back to life, you could never defeat this old man."

"Go fuck yourself."

I spat a wad of phlegm onto the ground where he could see it.

"Give me a few shichen[1457] of solid sleep in this world, and when I wake up, you'll die by my hand."

"What kind of bullshit is that?"

"If you don't believe me, put it to the test."

"How dare you, you green little brat!"

It was unfortunate.

If I hadn't been in the middle of a battle, and if time stopped completely when I used Logout instead of merely slowing down, I could have used all the time in the world to escape this crisis.

But those thoughts were nothing more than personal wishful thinking.

Now was the time to face reality, not indulge in delusions.

"I'll freeze you alive."

Step. Step. Crack.

Now I understood exactly why that damned old man was called the Yin Ghost.

The ground froze beneath every step he took, and frost settled over the branches.

"What vicious Yin-Cold Qi. But…"

Jeok Cheongang stepped in front of me.

"You dare not lay a hand on my Disciple."

Whoosh!

If Han Su's Yin-Cold Qi was an iceberg, Jeok Cheongang's Scorching Yang Qi was the sun.

[1457] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

If Flame Tiger's martial arts had truly been equal to Han Su's, then Jeok Cheongang's overwhelming victory had been inevitable.

But Han Su looked perfectly at ease.

He knew there was a tiger behind him.

"Blood Lord, I will need you to step in."

"Of course. It's about time we got started."

The Blood Lord tucked the Green Jade Buddha Staff into his robes as carefully as if it were a priceless treasure.

Then he moved.

No—he vanished.

And in the next instant—

Slash! Thump!

A round object flew through the air with a sickening sound and rolled to a stop at my feet.

White hair. Dignified features. A faint smile still lingering around the mouth.

"…!"

"…!"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes widened along with mine.

Han Su, the infamous great demonic fiend and Supreme Peak master known as the Yin Ghost, had been beheaded in a single strike.

By the hand of the ally he had trusted without question.

Unlike us, the Blood Lord—the one responsible for everything—remained perfectly calm.

"Fucking old man. This is why you should never take in rootless trash."

Clicking his tongue, he casually nudged Han Su's headless body.

Splash!

The corpse toppled like a dead tree, spraying a fountain of blood across the ground.

"If you're a sword, act like a sword. Go wherever the person holding you swings you. How dare you…"

Thud! Thud! Crack!

His kicks, loaded with internal energy, tore through flesh and shattered bone.

After repeatedly stamping and grinding Han Su's lifeless corpse beneath his feet, the Blood Lord swept his fallen hair back.

"There are always people who don't know their place. They don't know how strong they are or how far they should stick their necks out. Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, don't you agree?"

…Me?

What was I supposed to say?

I hesitated, then answered honestly.

“No. You just look like a crazy bastard to me.”

For a moment, the Blood Lord stared blankly at me.

Then a smile spread across his lips.

“You’re bold for a young one.”

“You’re still a young brat yourself, and you already seem a little unhinged.”

“Thank you for thinking I’m young. I’m older than I look.”

“Not that old.”

“Don’t push it. I’ve lived at least twice as long as you have.”

I looked him up and down in disbelief.

He stood at roughly my eye level, his body perfectly proportioned.

His face made him look like some inexperienced young man in his early to mid-twenties at most.

This went far beyond merely looking young.

But if there was anywhere something like this could happen, it was the Murim.

“What? Surprised I’m so much older than you expected?”

I shook my head.

“No. If that’s true, I was thinking you’re a bastard who really doesn’t act his age.”

“Wahahaha!”

The Blood Lord burst into cheerful laughter.

His behavior, his tone—everything about him was light, almost frivolous.

That only made him feel more dangerous.

Even now, bent over with laughter and his shoulders shaking, he showed not the slightest opening.

Jeok Cheongang, who had been glaring at him as his shoulders shook, suddenly spoke.

“You will regret this.”

“Regret?”

The Blood Lord stopped laughing and frowned.

“Why would I regret it?”

“If you wanted to finish this cleanly, you should not have killed the Yin Ghost.”

“He was a rusty sword. His usefulness had run out, so disposing of him was only natural.”

“A Supreme Peak master is a rusty sword… Then what does that make this old man?”

The Blood Lord stroked his chin.

“You are worth rating highly, Fire King. If the Great Faction War had continued for one more year, you probably would have become one of the Four Saints instead of merely one of the Three Saints.”

“Then it seems my edge has not gone dull yet.”

“You are good enough to be called a fine sword.”

“What would happen if that fine sword were driven into your heart?”

“Who knows… I’m sturdier than I look. I doubt that would draw even a single drop of blood.”

“When Hong Dao died, this old man swore to heaven.”

The Blood Lord smiled faintly as Jeok Cheongang’s gaze grew dark and still.

“Even if his killer were a demon god rather than a human, I would see this vengeance through to the end.”

“That’s touching and all, but…”

The Blood Lord’s smile vanished as he caressed the hilt of the sword at his waist.

“I have a feeling the Fire Gate Clan’s lineage will end today.”

Without taking his eyes off the Blood Lord, Jeok Cheongang asked me:

“What do you think of that?”

“I think his mouth needs a circumcision. It’s been spewing nothing but dickhead bullshit for a while now.”

The smile disappeared from the Blood Lord’s face.

“…You really are an interesting bastard.”

Step.

The Blood Lord took one step toward Jeok Cheongang and me, then suddenly spoke.

“But how long does that little rat over there plan to keep hiding?”

Rustle.

A suspicious-looking figure emerged from the distant grass and scratched the back of his head.

“Benefactor. I’m sorry. I’ve never been this frightened in my life…”

I had never been so happy to see Cheongpung.

Chapter 264

I never expected to be this happy to see that dumpling ghost. At a time when even a cat's paw would have been welcome, Cheongpung's arrival could be an enormous help.

A delighted shout burst from my lips before I knew it.

"Cheongpung!"

"Yes, Benefactor."

As Cheongpung answered hesitantly, the Blood Lord recognized him.

"Oh-ho. I was wondering what kind of rat it was, but aren't you Huashan's Invincible Divine Sword?"

I had hoped otherwise, but it was just as I feared. That was all the Blood Lord knew about Cheongpung's identity.

The duel had revealed that Cheongpung was a disciple of Huashan, but there was no way he knew that Sword Saint Mae Jonghak had raised his youngest disciple like his own flesh and blood.

This was the perfect chance to lull him into carelessness…

"Or should I call you the Sword Saint's Disciple? Perhaps his grandson?"

"…"

Son of a bitch. There was nothing he didn't know.

Then again, Dark Heaven had recruited the Head Elder and planted him there decades ago. The Blood Lord was clearly one of Dark Heaven's highest-ranking members.

It would be stranger if he didn't know.

The Blood Lord gave a quiet laugh at my disappointed expression.

"No need to look so disappointed. That friend of yours joining you won't change anything."

Would you look at this bastard…

Although Cheongpung and I had yet to advance beyond the upper reaches of Peak, neither of us could be compared to an ordinary Peak master.

I had overwhelming stats and extensive combat experience. Cheongpung had innate martial talent and a genius for combining dozens of martial arts as the situation demanded.

And on top of that, we had the Fire King Jeok Cheongang—the greatest of the Ten Kings.

I thought we had more than a fair chance.

"You're underestimating us."

"I'm only stating a fact."

"What?"

“If you wanted to kill me, you should have brought the Sword Saint instead of his Disciple.”

“…You little bastard.”

The Blood Lord spoke with casual confidence and beckoned to us with one finger.

“Prove it with your martial arts.”

That was the only thing he had said so far that was actually right.

He was correct. A martial artist had to prove himself through martial arts.

Victory would prove our strength. Defeat would prove our weakness.

“When you meet Yama[1458], tell him the Fire King sent you.”

Whoosh!

Along with his dry, ashy voice, Jeok Cheongang’s figure shot forward. At the same time, a familiar alert pierced my ears.

Ding.

SYSTEM

A sudden Quest, Life-or-Death Crisis, has been generated!

You cannot refuse the Quest. The Quest will be forcibly accepted!

Damn it. What a perfect title for the Quest.

I kicked off the ground and charged. Instead of cursing, I remembered to shout one name.

“Cheongpung! Now!”

Cheongpung flinched, bit his lip, and lunged forward. The blue-steel sword in his hand danced gracefully, tracing plum blossoms through the air.

Fwoosh! Shhhhk!

On a secluded mountain path, Scorching Yang Qi heated the cool breeze as spear and sword tore through the burning air.

Watching us charge from the front and rear, the Blood Lord parted his lips.

“Well, then… Let’s see what you can do.”

Crack-crack-crack!

Jeok Cheongang flicked his hand. Palm force brimming with Scorching Yang Qi burst from his wrinkled palm.

The Flame Divine Palm, already at Great Completion.

[1458] Yama is the Buddhist lord of the underworld.

Just as the Extreme Yang palm technique—said to burn even the soul—was about to engulf the Blood Lord—

Whoosh!

A single gust of wind blew past.

A saber had appeared in the Blood Lord's hand. Its saber force blazed an ominous red, cleaving the Flame Divine Palm's force in two.

Whoom! Boom!

The massive trees lining both sides of the path exploded.

Flames surged into the air amid a thunderous roar, while dirt, roots, and splinters of wood poured down like a sudden rainstorm.

Two streaks of light pierced through the debris.

Whoosh! Shhhk!

A spear and sword shot toward him from the front and rear.

The Blood Lord curled his lips and released his saber. At the same time, his newly freed fists struck the empty air.

Boom!

Compressed air exploded outward, unleashing a violent gale. The viciously thrusting spearhead and the plum blossoms blooming from the sword's tip were both swept away by the wind pressure.

Jin Taekyung and Cheongpung's eyes widened as their bodies were pushed back against their will.

"…Fuck. He's insanely strong."

"H-How can this be?"

Crack.

The Blood Lord rolled his neck and drew his saber back into his hand. He had fended off both men while controlling it with Seizing an Object Through Empty Space.

"Is that all you've got?"

"…!"

Jeok Cheongang's eyelids trembled.

Who would have thought that a single form of the Flame Divine Palm at Great Completion could be defeated so easily? The Blood Lord had not dodged or deflected it.

He had cut it apart.

Jeok Cheongang's heart sank as he realized the Blood Lord was an even greater master than he had imagined.

When he said we should have brought the Sword Saint if we wanted to kill him… That was no empty boast.

His opponent was a master who could easily stand beside the Three Saints.

No—perhaps he was even stronger.

Neither his internal energy nor his enlightenment in martial arts fell short of Jeok Cheongang's own.

And on top of that, the Blood Lord possessed the youthful vigor and strong body needed to unleash both without the slightest loss.

Today, Jeok Cheongang's wrinkled hands seemed smaller and more wretched than ever.

If only I were thirty years younger... No, even twenty...

When his body had been whole, he had lacked enlightenment. By the time he attained that enlightenment, his body had grown too old.

Water inevitably leaked from an old jar riddled with holes.

That was Jeok Cheongang now.

Perhaps this place will become my grave.

The Blood Lord did not miss the shadow that settled over Jeok Cheongang's eyes.

His lips twisted into a sneer, and he snickered.

"Old man. Starting to get the picture? Do you understand the situation now?"

Jeok Cheongang calmly shook his head.

He knew that Jin Taekyung and Cheongpung were watching his mouth. He could not destroy their morale with careless words.

"You talk too much. We have only just begun."

"Maybe you three have. I haven't even started."

"What?"

"I heard the orthodox factions like to prattle on about courtesy and have masters yield three forms to their inferiors. I thought I'd give it a try."

"...!"

The Blood Lord pointed a long finger at each of them in turn.

All three had unleashed one form apiece, making three in total. Just as he had said, he had yielded three forms without taking a single step.

"Now it's my turn to go first. Struggle all you like."

A crimson gleam flared in the Blood Lord's eyes. His sclera flooded bloodred as a vast and hideously ominous qi erupted from his body.

And then—

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

Mount Song trembled.

Shhhhk! Boom!

Streaks of light filled the air in every direction. Blinding flashes erupted amid the ceaseless thunder of explosions.

Dominating them all was a single saber scattering black-red qi.

Boom!

Powerful saber force swept through the air, leaving a pale trail of light in its wake.

Its destructive arc erased everything in its path, knocking aside every attack sent toward the Blood Lord.

Mine included, of course.

Boom!

The spearhead of White Flame rang sharply. The shaft I gripped with all my strength vibrated violently in my palm.

Even though I had poured an enormous amount of internal energy into it, the force was unbelievable.

It was hard to believe such power belonged to a human being.

What a monster.

Gritting my teeth, I twisted around.

Whoosh!

The black-red blade passed within a hair's breadth of my head, slicing off several strands of hair.

The wind pressure alone split my skin, sending blood trickling down my face.

I caught the drops running along the bridge of my nose in my mouth and swung my spear.

"Hah!"

Whirrrrrl!

The spearhead spun fiercely toward the Blood Lord's chest.

Perhaps because I had poured in all the Points I had received as the reward for winning the Star-Array Grand Banquet, my movement and strength had risen another level.

But—

Crack!

The Blood Lord's free hand snatched the spearhead from the air.

It was a bare hand, but not truly bare. Immense black-red internal energy blazed around it.

"That won't be enough."

With those quiet words, he pulled the spearhead toward him with tremendous force.

Then his eyebrows shot upward.

The spearhead that had been trapped in his grip a moment ago was gone.

As if it had never existed.

“You—!”

Before the startled word had fully left his mouth, I had already plunged deep inside his reach.

Inventory Open. Summon.

In the blink of an eye, White Flame—burning hot with Scorching Yang Qi—was back in my hand.

The Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, harder and sharper than anything in the world, tore through his Body-Protecting Qi and pierced the flesh beneath it.

Thud! Boom!

The Blood Lord snapped his sleeve, and a powerful burst of force slammed into my abdomen.

After being driven back ten steps in a row, I saw the Blood Lord’s wide-eyed face—and the fountain of blood erupting from his chest.

I did it.

Only I could have pulled off that attack—and it had worked precisely because I was merely me.

It landed because I had used the System, something no one could possibly have anticipated, and because the Blood Lord had not considered an attack from someone like me worth guarding against.

Now’s my chance.

It was an opportunity that might never come again. Our last lifeline, one I could not afford to let slip away.

I swallowed the blood surging up my throat and shouted.

“Old Master!”

My voice rang across the devastated mountain path. It pierced the air, rode the wind, and reached one man’s ears.

A heated voice slipped between his lips.

“Well done.”

The old man hurtling toward the Blood Lord had transformed into the Fire King.

Fwoooosh!

A colossal blaze erupted from his small body. It burned the air and crushed the wind.

If the Blood Lord’s qi was something so ominous that merely looking at it made one uneasy, then Jeok Cheongang’s was heat itself—as though it could burn the world.

“Son of a bitch…”

The Blood Lord muttered the curse like a groan.

But it was already too late. He might not have known, but I did. I knew what Jeok Cheongang was doing and how much power that martial art possessed.

He had used it only once before and become a legend by killing a thousand members of the Demonic Cult.

Dance of the Fire God and Demon.

At that moment, Jeok Cheongang vanished.

He approached the Blood Lord on light footsteps, as though dancing, while his hands and feet blurred like mist.

Red and blue fire qi filled heaven and earth. It was a beautiful flash of light—and terrifyingly destructive.

“Fire King!”

Whoosh!

At the Blood Lord’s rough shout, black-red saber force mingled with the fire qi. A thunderous roar rang out, as though cliffs were collapsing and the sky itself were being torn apart.

This is…

I could hardly follow the exchange with my eyes. It lasted less than the smallest fraction of a moment, but I still understood.

Hundreds of tremendously powerful attacks had passed between them in that brief instant.

And I knew who had won.

Boom!

A wave of heat swallowed the black-red saber force. Something flashing shot into the sky and plunged deep into the churned-up earth.

A saber.

Its owner was receiving the final blow.

“This old man told you, didn’t he? Even if you were a demon god instead of a human, I would kill you.”

With those quiet words, Jeok Cheongang drove a palm into the Blood Lord’s chest.

Sizzle.

His flesh burned, and his breastbone collapsed. After vomiting a mouthful of blood, the Blood Lord fell to his knees with a hazy look in his eyes.

And… that was all.

Jeok Cheongang gazed down at the Blood Lord’s motionless head. Then his body staggered.

“Old Master!”

“Grandpa Jeok!”

Cheongpung and I rushed over, supported Jeok Cheongang, and carried him to a nearby patch of grass that was still more or less intact.

The Dance of the Fire God and Demon.

No flame burned forever. When the dance ended, the fire went out and the heat faded.

That was why Jeok Cheongang, despite all the long years he had lived, had only ever been able to use it once.

“Well? Wasn’t it just as this old man told you?”

“What are you talking about?”

“The Dance of the Fire God and Demon. Wasn’t it incredible?”

At Jeok Cheongang’s faint smile, I let out a sigh of relief.

Then I smiled with him.

“It was incredible.”

I meant it. Everything about it had been incredible.

Except for the voice that came from behind us the next moment.

“The Dance of the Fire God and Demon… That’s one hell of a name.”

We slowly turned our heads.

The Blood Lord rose to his feet before our eyes, perfectly unscathed.

Chapter 265

I was certain—absolutely certain—that he was dead.

Even if he had not breathed his last, I was convinced he could no longer be called a living human being.

But…

Slither. Crack-crack!

I could hardly believe what I was seeing.

Pale new flesh spread over skin that had been burned black and looked ready to crumble at the slightest touch. Protruding bones slid back into place and disappeared beneath it.

What the hell is this?

What was I supposed to call it? Recovery?

No. This was regeneration.

Regeneration beyond anything human—like something out of a monster.

Cheongpung let out a strangled gasp at the horrifying sight.

“Ah… Aah…”

Meanwhile, the last of the changes came to an end. The face that had been stripped down to the muscle rapidly regenerated.

Crack.

The Blood Lord rubbed his neck and flashed us a crooked grin.

“You should have crushed my head. Made sure of it.”

Jeok Cheongang had gone rigid as a statue. He barely managed to part his lips.

“How?”

The Blood Lord answered casually.

“For now, let’s just call it demonic martial arts. It’s all the same to orthodox bastards like you anyway, isn’t it?”

“You… Cough!”

“Old Master!”

I was startled and hurried to support Jeok Cheongang. His face had gone pale, and a stream of red blood ran down his chin.

This is bad.

Jeok Cheongang had already exhausted all his strength.

Even the Dance of the Fire God and Demon, unleashed by wringing out the last of his power, had come to nothing. The man in my arms was no longer the Fire King, merely an exhausted old man.

“R-Run…”

Jeok Cheongang could not finish. His head drooped.

I hurriedly checked his pulse. It was faint, but still beating.

He's all right for now.

But it was far too soon to breathe a sigh of relief.

"From the look of things, even the great Fire King has reached his limit."

The Blood Lord stepped forward with a delighted expression.

"This was more entertaining than I expected. No, to be honest, it was even frightening. I never imagined things would reach this point."

"You smell like shit. Shut your mouth."

I rose to my feet and tightened my grip on White Flame, which I had set down for a moment.

Jeok Cheongang was already out of the fight. If he used any more strength here… something truly irreversible would happen.

"You intend to stop me alone? How admirable."

"Did you trade one of your eyes for taffy[1459] or something? There are two of us."

The Blood Lord shook his head.

"No. There's only one. I don't count terrified little rats as people."

Terrified little rat?

I turned my head.

Cheongpung stood frozen beside me.

His pupils shook uncontrollably, and the hand clutching his sword hilt trembled violently.

Fear.

That was the only emotion I could sense from him.

"To send a wet-behind-the-ears brat out into the martial world… The Sword Saint spoiled his Disciple far too much."

Step.

The Blood Lord was still more than fifty paces away. But when he took a single step, Cheongpung flinched as though burned and retreated.

This is…

My heart sank.

I knew exactly what it meant.

The path I had experienced myself, the path countless others had walked—Cheongpung was only now beginning to walk it.

Of all times, why now?

It was a growing pain every martial artist and Hunter had to experience, but for the genius standing before me, the timing was unbearably late.

[1459] Yeot is a traditional Korean sweet similar to taffy. "Trading an eye for yeot" mocks someone for failing to see what is obvious.

The Blood Lord read the realization on my face and grinned.

"You know it too, don't you? He's already finished. That helplessness he's feeling for the first time. The fear of death. Once those things take hold of you, they're not easy to escape."

"…Jongni Chu."

There was no doubt.

This was because of Cheongpung's duel with Jongni Chu.

Jongni Chu was the one who had planted the seed of fear in Cheongpung. And that seed had sprouted after meeting another powerful figure—the Blood Lord.

"Exactly. I have no idea where that fellow came from, but he did quite a job. He drew the attention of the orthodox factions and even neatly disposed of the Sword Saint's Disciple. Ha-ha!"

My mouth felt gritty, as though I were chewing sand.

Cheongpung was still paralyzed with fear, while the Blood Lord leisurely closed the distance between us.

Damn it.

Fortunately, I still had one final move left.

The problem was that it really was my final move.

Even if it succeeded, there was no guarantee what the outcome would be. If it failed, all that awaited us was death.

But I have no choice.

I slowly drew up what little internal energy remained—not even ten percent.

One Annihilation.

My only hope was to pour everything I had into a single strike and crush his head.

I folded up the question Can I do it? and burned it away.

I have to. Somehow.

I had to choose certainty over doubt, and desperate resolve over certainty. Only by staking my life on every tiny movement would I have even the faintest chance.

"Young sir."

Click. Clack.

I knew what it was without looking.

Cheongpung's teeth were chattering.

I shouted with all my might.

"Cheongpung!"

He gasped and jerked his head up.

"I won't say this twice. Listen carefully and decide for yourself."

"Y-Yes?"

"You have two choices. First, carry Old Master and run as far away as you can."

“Benefactor!”

“I’m not finished. Second, stop shaking like a fucking coward and fight that bastard beside me with everything you have.”

“…!”

His trembling breath betrayed the turmoil inside him.

Then the feet that had retreated several steps began moving forward again.

Step.

We stood side by side in front of the unconscious Jeok Cheongang.

“Your answer. I haven’t heard it yet.”

“This is my answer.”

“Be honest.”

“I’m scared, Benefactor.”

“Fuck. You’re brutally honest.”

“But I really am scared. I’ve never felt anything like this in my life.”

I kept my eyes fixed on the approaching Blood Lord.

“If you’re that scared, why not run?”

“I don’t know. I just feel like if I run away now… I’ll regret it for the rest of my life.”

That regret.

I knew what he meant.

I glanced at Cheongpung. He was still terrified, and his hands still trembled, but the step he had taken forward was firm. His feet were rooted in place, refusing to retreat.

Yes.

For now, that was enough.

I had just given a small nod when—

“Regret? Run away?”

Twenty paces away, the Blood Lord stopped and laughed aloud as though he had heard the greatest joke in the world.

“What audacious nonsense from a pair of fledglings. I’m the one who decides whether you run. That is the right of the strong and the inevitable fate of the weak.”

“Well, you’re partly right…”

I raised my spear and aimed it at him. White Flame’s transparent spearhead shattered the sunlight into countless fragments.

“But why does every word out of your mouth sound so fucking disgusting?”

“The truth is uncomfortable. Especially for the weak.”

“This won’t do. Open wide, patient. It’s time for your circumcision. It might hurt a little—I’ll be using a spear without anesthesia.”

“Puhahaha!”

“You’re laughing? You think it can’t happen to you? That’s how life gets you. I should’ve known something was up when Mom said we were going out for something delicious.”

The Blood Lord’s smile deepened.

“Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. The more I see of you, the more entertaining you become. Those bizarre martial arts of yours that I can’t identify, that spirit… I like you.”

“And if you like me?”

“Come under me. I might even spare the Fire King.”

“Why don’t you eat a dick, sir? After today, I’ll never have to deal with a bastard like you again.”

“Someone once said that the first meeting is coincidence, the second is a connection, and the third is destiny.”

“Listen to this son of a bitch, writing a goddamn romance novel.”

The Blood Lord shrugged.

“Perhaps. It isn’t a relationship between a man and a woman, but if we’ve crossed paths twice in this vast world, wouldn’t you call that a connection?”

“Twice?”

For a moment, I didn’t understand.

What the hell was this bastard talking about?

“Did you see me at the Star-Array Grand Banquet or something?”

“Of course I saw you.”

His playful voice continued.

“At Eight Spring Gorge.”

“…What?”

“It was quite a spectacle. Corpses piled into mountains, blood flowing like a river… Watching you take Jin Baekyang’s life was especially memorable. Wasn’t that when they started calling you the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?”

“What are you talking about…”

“Jin Baekyang, the Blade of Flowers. What a useless bastard. At first, he acted as though he would tear out his own liver and gallbladder for us, but as he grew older, he must have developed some pathetic doubts. Ruined the entire job. What incompetent fool recruited such a half-assed bastard? Tsk, tsk.”

I stared blankly at the Blood Lord as he clicked his tongue.

Every word coming from his mouth sounded hollow and alien.

“Oh, what about that Third Rate sect called the Mount Heng Sword Sect? Is it still around? I did hear from one of my subordinates that one of its Sect Leader’s sons had been killed. I lost interest after Eight Spring Gorge, so I haven't paid much attention."

"…!"

A shudder shot along my spine like a bolt of lightning.

"Then… it was you?"

"I told you."

The Blood Lord's eyes curved into crescents. His next words came in a gentle voice that did not suit him at all.

"The first meeting is coincidence, the second is a connection, and the third is destiny. What do you think? Wouldn't you say you and I have a connection?"

My breath caught.

The bastard standing before me was the one who had started that war.

The Blood Lord saw my expression and roared with laughter.

"Why the long face? Things worked out smoothly thanks to me. The Jin Family of Taiyuan is the foremost family in Shanxi. You became the Fire King's Disciple and even seized victory at the Star-Array Grand Banquet. Shouldn't you thank me?"

I did not answer.

One thought filled my mind.

How many people died again?

I didn't know.

A thousand? Two thousand?

Countless people had died in a Great War that had been meaningless from beginning to end. There had been no true victor or loser.

Martial artists who had merely swung their weapons when ordered died. So did innocent commoners who had nothing to do with the conflict. Even more children were left orphaned by the war.

When the Murim of Shanxi began to reel, the mounted bandits of Gaoyuan ran rampant.

The war had barely ended before the same history repeated itself.

And he expects me to thank him.

I licked my dry, cracked lips. My grip around the spear shaft tightened on its own.

An unknown strength filled my exhausted body.

A stat that did not appear in the System window.

Anger.

"Hey."

"Hmm?"

"That bullshit about once being coincidence and twice being a connection."

I took a deep breath. Without it, I felt as though fireballs might pour from my mouth.

"You and I are different. Let's skip all that and go straight to destiny."

"Destiny?"

"Yeah. The destiny where one of us dies."

Before I had even finished speaking, I kicked off the ground.

The distance vanished in an instant, and his smiling face appeared before me.

One Annihilation.

Gooooong!

The spearhead cleaved through space.

Crack!

"Gaaaaah!"

The young man's arm broke, and white bone burst through his skin.

He screamed at the agony, worse than anything he had ever experienced. Spurting blood splattered across his own face.

The foul reek made bile rise in his throat. The instant he bent over to retch, a thick leg slammed into his abdomen.

Thud. Boom!

"You pathetic fool. I pity the Sword Saint for having a half-wit like you as his Disciple."

The young man—Cheongpung—went flying. He struggled to turn himself over.

It hurt.

He wanted to collapse.

His entire body screamed in pain, and a deep despair weighed upon him.

My body… My body won't listen to me.

In the end, he could not rise. He collapsed, and the vast sky filled his vision.

The sky above Lotus Peak on Huashan had always been clear and beautiful. By day, the clouds gleamed; by night, the stars glittered. Roe deer and rabbits bounded energetically across the mountain.

But…

Why is the sky here so red?

This sky was different.

Red and bleak.

Cheongpung blinked and realized that the tiny blood vessels in his eyes had burst. It was the first time that had ever happened, but he was not surprised.

I've already broken bones for the first time, and I've lost so much blood.

Thinking about his condition made his breathing quicken without him realizing it.

As he lay sprawled on the ground, gasping for breath, a chilling sound pierced his ears.

Whoosh—crack!

“Urk!”

“You bastard!”

Cheongpung turned toward the sound. Two figures locked in a bloody struggle came into view through his tilted vision.

No.

It could no longer be called a fight.

Thud! Thud! Thud!

“Hngh!”

“You’re still not dead? Even after this? Even after this?”

Bam-bam-bam! Crash!

His nose collapsed. His ankle broke, and his shoulder was wrenched out of place.

Once. Three times. Ten times…

Yet no matter how badly he was injured or how many times he fell, he rose again.

He would do the same a hundred times.

That was the kind of man Cheongpung knew him to be.

Benefactor.

But reality was merciless.

The outcome had been decided almost immediately.

Cheongpung did not know what martial art Jin Taekyung had used, but the power of that one strike had been unparalleled. It had shattered the Blood Lord’s Red Blade, infused with Sword Force, and wounded him.

Yet in less than a moment, the Blood Lord regenerated and drove them both into a corner.

“You lunatic… I’ve never seen a more tenacious bastard.”

Everything was about to end.

The Blood Lord shook his head, looking thoroughly appalled. His entire body was drenched in blood as well.

Unlike before, however, his wounds no longer healed. The easy smile he had worn throughout the battle was gone, and he breathed raggedly as he pulled Jin Taekyung’s spear from where it stood embedded deep in the ground.

“Huff, huff… Fine. I’ll kill you.”

Kill.

The moment Cheongpung heard that word, his palm pressed against the ground.

The pain from his broken arm and leg faded, along with the smell of blood.

A strange, floating sensation spread through his entire body.

What is this?

He did not know.

At the end of his staggering steps stood the Blood Lord.

“Huh. What’s this now? Do you want to die too?”

His hands trembled when he met the Blood Lord’s ferocious gaze.

But then he saw Jin Taekyung lying behind him, and the trembling slowly subsided.

“Benefactor… Benefactor.”

“What a pair of lunatics…”

The Blood Lord let out an incredulous, hollow laugh and swung the spear.

Slash!

Cheongpung staggered aside, twisting his body. Blood sprayed from his chest.

It hurts.

But he did not stop.

He did not fall.

The sword hilt had slipped from his powerless grip long ago.

“What the…”

The Blood Lord stared at him in disbelief, then seized Cheongpung’s throat with one powerful hand.

“Ghk!”

“What the hell is wrong with you people? Why are you both so desperate to die first?”

His voice held genuine curiosity.

As his consciousness faded, Cheongpung opened his mouth. A strained voice escaped him.

“Because… I think I’d regret it for the rest of my life if I backed down.”

“That’s your reason? A cowardly bastard like you refuses to retreat for such a pathetic reason?”

The Blood Lord’s killing intent grew even more savage.

But something was strange.

Cheongpung was not frightened at all.

It felt as though he had returned to his days on Lotus Peak. Before he knew it, the corners of his mouth had lifted.

“Hehe. Yes.”

The Blood Lord’s face twisted viciously.

Cheongpung had smiled.

He had smiled while standing before him.

It was impossible.
It was something that should never have happened.
“I heard your last words loud and clear.”
The Blood Lord was about to drive the spearhead into Cheongpung’s chest when—
“You’ve broken free of your shell.”
A clear voice rang out.
A voice exactly like the blue sky over Huashan that Cheongpung remembered.
A voice he felt he finally recognized.

Chapter 266

“You’ve broken free of your shell.”

A clear voice rang out.

Cheongpung thought of the sunlight and blue sky over Lotus Peak. The Blood Lord felt as though his heart had dropped into his stomach.

He had failed to sense someone barely two hundred feet away. He, of all people.

His eyes narrowed at the man walking up the mountain path.

That bastard…

He had a slender build and an approachable face. He looked to be in his mid-twenties at most.

A sword had been shoved carelessly through his belt without a scabbard, its blade covered entirely in reddish rust.

A dry voice slipped from the Blood Lord’s lips.

“The Always-Victorious Sword?”

The young man, Jongni Chu, smiled faintly.

“I was always worried.”

“What?”

“About what kind of storms a fearless, innocent child would face once he entered the martial world.”

“What the hell are you talking about…?”

The Blood Lord was about to continue when realization struck him.

From the very beginning, Jongni Chu’s every word and action had been directed at one person alone.

“But it’s all right now. You overcame it so well.”

His gaze and voice were warm.

At last, a faint smile touched Cheongpung’s lips as he struggled for breath.

Watching that, the Blood Lord let out a hollow laugh.

“Would you look at these two…”

They were treating him as though he did not even exist.

Him—the man who inspired fear and awe in countless people, even within Dark Heaven.

The blatant disregard of these young pups made his grip tighten.

Crack.

“Ghk!”

With the sound of bones twisting out of place, a gush of blood burst from between Cheongpung’s lips.

As Cheongpung groaned in pain and lost consciousness, Jongni Chu's quiet voice reached the Blood Lord's ears.

"That's enough."

Seeing the smile vanish from Jongni Chu's face made the Blood Lord feel considerably better.

He grinned and opened his mouth.

"So now you can finally see me."

"I saw you from the beginning. I merely lost you while chasing your retreating back."

The Blood Lord frowned as he listened.

"Was that you? The fearless bastard who interfered with me?"

"I was one step too late. A regrettable thing."

As Jongni Chu calmly answered, the Blood Lord slowly looked him up and down.

The Always-Victorious Sword, Jongni Chu. He's the one?

Jongni Chu had intervened just as the Blood Lord was about to finish off Dharma King Hong Dao. The rapidly approaching presence had forced him to turn away before he could deliver the final blow.

From what I sensed then, his aura was at least beyond the Ten Kings.

Even the Blood Lord would be in trouble if he were held back inside the Murim Alliance. After withdrawing and leaving the dying Hong Dao behind, that bastard had continued chasing him for quite some time.

He nearly caught me.

Fortunately, the martial art the Blood Lord practiced transcended all common sense.

And yet that mysterious master had been Jongni Chu. The Blood Lord shot him a suspicious look.

"You've already chased me this far. You're quick on your feet."

"Not as quick as you. That movement technique of yours was unlike anything I've ever seen or heard of."

The Blood Lord's eyes narrowed.

His opponent was absurdly young. He also seemed close to Cheongpung, and his realm of martial arts was almost impossible to believe.

"You. What is your relationship with the Martial God?"

Jongni Chu stroked his smooth chin, as was his habit.

"The Martial God… I did receive a few teachings from him."

"Are you his Disciple?"

"Even a suckling infant can teach us something. Everyone we encounter in life is both teacher and student to one another."

"Enough with the vague Zen riddles. Answer me before I break this brat's neck."

Instead of answering, Jongni Chu merely regarded him with calm eyes.

They were deep enough to draw a man in forever, yet tranquil as a lake on a windless day.

What is this feeling?

It was strange. They had only met each other's eyes, yet the Blood Lord could not make his hand tighten.

No—it felt as though the strength were slowly draining from his fingers. As if something invisible had seized his wrist and refused to let go.

This is almost like…

The Blood Lord clenched his teeth as the thought surfaced.

No.

That was impossible. How dare he think of that person while looking at some worthless orthodox-faction stray?

It can't be. All I have to do is cut down a bastard like him in one stroke.

He forced himself to regain his composure, but an inexplicable unease was already growing inside him.

Could he truly defeat this man?

Could he escape this place?

The Blood Lord slowly licked his parched lips.

"You… Who the hell are you?"

Dark Heaven's information network stretched wide and ran deep throughout the land. Yet it had failed to uncover the identity of one person: Jongni Chu.

A mysterious figure whose face and origins were entirely unknown.

Jongni Chu tilted his head.

"Is that important?"

"What?"

"If a few words could persuade you to stop, I would tell you. But you won't stop."

His tranquil voice continued.

"There are people hovering between life and death even now. If you refuse to stop on your own, I have no choice but to stop you by force."

Shhk.

With that, Jongni Chu drew the sword shoved carelessly through his belt. As the hopelessly rusted blade emerged, a sneer curled the Blood Lord's lips.

"You'll stop me? With that thing that barely qualifies as a sword?"

"Well, it still seems more useful than one might think."

"Have you ever cut anyone with that sword?"

"Countless people. They aren't memories I take much pride in."

“Don’t compare me to some pack of nobodies. Who was the last person you cut down? A bandit no better than a slash-and-burn farmer? Or perhaps…”

At that moment, a low voice slipped from Jongni Chu’s lips.

“The Heaven-Poison Demon Lord.”

The Blood Lord went rigid.

The Heaven-Poison Demon Lord.

No martial artist could fail to recognize that title.

During the Great Faction War, he had been the greatest of archfiends, sweeping across the land while worshiping the Heavenly Demon—the Cult Leader of the Heavenly Demon Divine Cult—as a god.

He had been second-in-command of the Demonic Cult, which had once devoured half the world.

That was the Heaven-Poison Demon Lord.

But even he had been unable to escape the fate of a mere martial artist.

One day, after his evil reputation had grown darker with every passing day, he encountered a certain person. The Heaven-Poison Demon Lord met his death that day, and the one who killed him gained a new name.

“The Sword Saint…!”

The Blood Lord trembled as though struck by lightning.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

That name had briefly crossed his mind when he tried to guess Jongni Chu’s identity. But he had soon shaken his head.

It was impossible.

It could not be allowed to be true.

A strained voice finally escaped his lips.

“You… How could you…?”

Jongni Chu—or rather, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak—ran his fingers along the blade as he answered.

“When the Great Faction War ended, I found myself wondering what I should do next. It didn’t take me long to decide. I simply loved martial arts.”

Scrape. Scrape.

Each pass of the violet Palm Force coating his hand stripped away the reddish rust, revealing the clear blade beneath.

“I devoted myself ceaselessly to martial arts. The child I took in late in life, who was like a grandson to me, became my Disciple—and at times, my teacher as well. Just when I thought I had reached Great Completion, I saw another wall before me.”

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

The great martial artist, who had already reached an exalted realm decades ago, had once again stepped into a new domain.

For a man already prepared in every way, a higher enlightenment had arrived.

“Even I didn’t expect to be Returned to Youth. In any case, finding myself unexpectedly young again made me curious about the outside world. I also found myself thinking about that aggravating grandson of mine who ran away a year ago.”

And so Sword Saint Mae Jonghak had entered the world and traveled throughout the land under the name Jongni Chu.

He was already a figure from the distant past. No one suspected that Mae Jonghak had returned to the body of a twenty-year-old.

Not even Dark Heaven, whose web stretched across the land.

“It was an enjoyable time. Until you people appeared.”

Shhk!

The last traces of rust peeled away.

At last, his cherished sword regained its true form and gleamed coldly.

Hundreds—perhaps thousands. The sword that had drunk the blood of countless fiends now pointed at the Blood Lord.

“Just as I said, isn’t this sword still useful?”

The next instant, a violet flash erupted.

Slash!

“…Huh?”

The Blood Lord blinked.

Time seemed to slow as Cheongpung’s body toppled into view.

So did a familiar wrist—the one attached to the hand gripping the unconscious Cheongpung’s throat.

That’s…

My hand.

The next thought was drowned beneath a surge of blood and pain. His mouth dropped open, and a scream tore from it.

“Gaaaaah!”

But it was not over yet.

As the Blood Lord staggered backward, screaming, a cold voice pursued him.

“You’ve accumulated sins that can never be washed away. Shouldn’t you pay the price?”

Whoosh!

Every hair on the Blood Lord’s body stood on end.

It was like a hallucination. The entire landscape vanished, and a single sword aimed at his chest consumed his every sense.

Shhk.

The sword glided through the air. The violet Force of the Zaha Divine Technique transformed into thirty-six plum blossoms that scattered in every direction.

At the beautiful sight, the Blood Lord murmured as though groaning.

“The Thirty-Six Plum Blossom Swords.”

But it was different.

Unmistakably different.

If the Thirty-Six Plum Blossom Swords Cheongpung had used earlier were a supreme technique, what Mae Jonghak now displayed was a divine feat beyond martial arts.

That very divine technique was boring into the vital points throughout the Blood Lord’s body.

I can’t stop this.

Horrified, the Blood Lord tried to throw himself aside.

Grab!

A hand clamped around his ankle.

Jin Taekyung, whom he had thought spent and unconscious, grinned up at him through bloodstained teeth.

“Where do you think you’re going, motherfucker?”

“You—!”

Papapapapat!

The rest of his words never came.

Violet flashes filled his eyes. Blood sprayed, and flesh split apart. The immense agony wiped his mind blank.

“Ghk!”

This was on an entirely different level. There was no way to block the Sword Energy hurtling across more than a hundred feet.

Slash! Slash!

Then, as his consciousness began to fade, the Blood Lord’s eyes suddenly flashed.

No. If I use that—if I use that, I can survive.

His mission was already complete. The Green Jade Buddha Staff in his hand—the only one left—was proof of that.

It was regrettable that he had failed to kill the Fire King, but…

As long as he lived, there would always be another chance.

He glared at Jin Taekyung with a resentful gaze. Even as he vomited clots of blood, Taekyung was smiling.

“Just you wait. I’ll kill you with my own hands.”

“What?”

“Stay alive until then. Make sure of it.”

The Blood Lord’s lips curled upward.

Mae Jonghak, who sensed what he intended, stiffened and sent Sword Energy flying with a rigid expression.

“Stop!”

Shriek! Slash!

The Blood Lord’s one remaining arm was severed cleanly at the shoulder.

“Lord of Heaven!”

Whoosh!

With that shout, he drew upon the last of his strength and shot forward like lightning. His teeth clamped down hard on his own severed arm—or rather, on the Green Jade Buddha Staff it still held.

And then—

Fwoom!

A black radiance, ominous even to behold, swallowed his entire body.

Then it vanished without a trace, taking the Blood Lord with it.

As though it had never existed in the first place.

Chapter 267

Fwoom!

I merely blinked at the black light that exploded like a flash.

That was all…

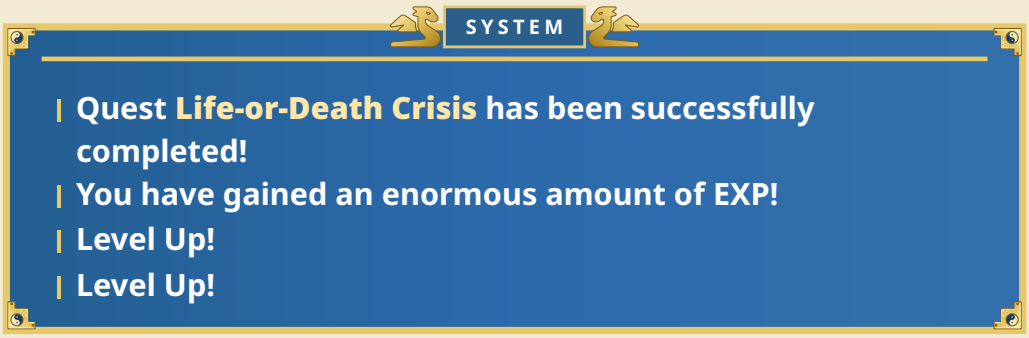
Where the fuck did that bastard go?

The shock was enough to make me forget the pain. I stared blankly, my mouth hanging open.

He was gone. As though he had been erased with an eraser.

The blood spattered around us and the Blood Lord's wrist, still gripping Cheongpung's neck, were the only proof that he had ever existed.

Ding.



With the System notifications, my body began to recover at a staggering rate.

My broken bones knitted back together, and my cut and mangled flesh healed. My empty dantian filled to the brim, and vitality surged through my muscles.

But one thing remained unchanged: my utter bewilderment.

"What the actual fuck was that?"

The Blood Lord. No matter what it took, I should have killed that bastard.

I was muttering dejectedly while staring at the ground when a familiar voice spoke, and a hand suddenly appeared in front of me.

"Are you all right?"

I was mentally exhausted, but my body was fine. I took Jongni Chu's hand and rose to my feet.

"Yeah, I'm fine. I owe you my life."

"That's a relief. Then help me tend to the injured first… Wait. What did you just say?"

Jongni Chu blinked.

His face clearly said, What did I just hear?

"Why?"

"H-Hm?"

"Is there a problem?"

Jongni Chu stared blankly at me for a moment, then waved it off.

"No, no. What problem could there be? But didn't you hear… that thing earlier?"

"That thing? What are you talking about? I did pass out for a moment."

There was a limit to how much punishment I could take. I had been hit, gotten back up, been knocked down again, and gotten back up dozens of times over.

Then, at some point, I took a direct blow to the jaw and briefly lost consciousness.

"When I opened my eyes, it was almost over. I saw that bastard's ankle, so I grabbed it right away."

"…I see."

Jongni Chu's lips moved as though he wanted to say something, but he ultimately kept his mouth shut.

I wanted to ask how everything had unfolded and who Jongni Chu really was, but I held back too.

What matters is that he's on our side.

That was enough for now. More urgent matters surrounded us.

"Old Master!"

I was worried about Cheongpung, but Jeok Cheongang was old, and his injuries concerned me even more.

I rushed over and examined him. His pulse was faint and his breathing shallow, but both were still there.

"Would you step aside for a moment?"

After carefully lowering Cheongpung, whose emergency treatment he had finished, Jongni Chu placed a hand over Jeok Cheongang's Mingmen acupoint.[1460]

As internal energy flowed into him, the strain visibly eased from Jeok Cheongang's face.

"How is he?"

"His injuries aren't that serious. He expended too much energy all at once, so he probably won't regain consciousness for a while."

"What about Cheongpung?"

"The same. He has internal injuries, but he's young. He should recover soon."

"Phew…"

"A blessing amid all this misfortune."

Jongni Chu smiled faintly at my relieved sigh.

That was when—

Shshshshk!

[1460] Mingmen, meaning "Gate of Life," is an acupoint on the lower back.

Countless presences rapidly approached from below. Their aura was vicious beyond description.

Don't tell me there's another one?

My expression hardened as I tightened my grip around the spear shaft, but Jongni Chu waved a hand.

"Put it down. They're allies."

He was right. Hundreds of martial artists soon appeared, with several familiar faces leading them.

Someone from the Nine Sects and One Gang. Someone from the Five Great Families.

They were the people who had occupied the seats of honor during the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

For some reason, however, several key figures—including the Thunderbolt Saber King—were nowhere to be seen.

"Stop."

The footsteps of the hundreds of martial artists, which had seemed as though they would never stop, came to an abrupt halt in front of us.

The man who had given the order limped toward Jongni Chu and me. Sunlight filtering through the leaves glinted off his steel prosthetic leg.

The Thousand-Faced Fox, Song Ho.

As his piercing gaze swept over Jongni Chu and me, I suddenly remembered something I had forgotten.

They didn't know Jongni Chu was an ally. To them, he was a public enemy of the Murim who had assassinated Dharma King Hong Dao and brought a bloodbath down upon Shaolin Temple.

Step. Step.

As the Thousand-Faced Fox advanced on his prosthetic leg, hundreds of martial artists moved with him.

This looked like it was about to turn into a bloody clash over a stupid misunderstanding.

"W-Wait a second. I think there's been a serious misunderstanding…"

I was about to step forward amid the ominous tension when Jongni Chu suddenly spoke.

"Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho."

"Gasp."

Was this bastard insane?

At a time when explaining the situation and clearing up the misunderstanding should have been the bare minimum, he had started by speaking informally.

"Hey, hey!"

I hurriedly jabbed him in the side, but it was already too late. A bombshell burst from Jongni Chu's mouth.

"How's your leg?"

"…!"

Was he actually out of his mind?

I gaped at Jongni Chu.

This time, he had crossed the line completely. First the casual speech, and now he was mocking a disabled person.

I hurriedly stepped forward before the Thousand-Faced Fox could yank off his prosthetic leg and charge at Jongni Chu.

"I'm sorry. He's not usually like this. Let me explain. So, what happened was—"

"Hm? I can explain it myself."

"Explain, my ass. What the fuck are you going to explain in this situation? Apologize first, you bastard."

To hell with him being my lifesaver.

Before things could get any worse, I grabbed Jongni Chu by the back of the neck and forced his head down.

When I raised my own head, I saw the Thousand-Faced Fox's face, stiff and frozen as though he had seen a ghost.

He's really pissed.

Of course he was. Anyone who didn't get angry in this situation wasn't human. They'd have to be Jesus or Buddha.

But the thoughts racing frantically through my mind as I tried to defuse the situation ground to a halt at the Thousand-Faced Fox's reply.

"It has been a long time."

Jongni Chu nodded with a genial chuckle like an old man.

"It's good to see you doing well. I thought you would be the first to recognize me."

"It took me quite some time. Until two shichen[1461] ago, I thought the Blood Ghost Sword Demon—that damned bastard—had Returned to Youth."

"My, my. You've grown old too."

"I owe the fact that I lived long enough to grow this old to you, Great Hero. If you hadn't saved me back then, I wouldn't be standing here now."

The Thousand-Faced Fox laughed as he lightly tapped his prosthetic leg, then continued.

"I discovered Shadow Killer two shichen[1462] ago. You were playing a mischievous prank."

"Ah, that fellow. Come to think of it, he should be waking up around now."

[1461] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[1462] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

"Someone who should have died was alive. That was when I realized I had been barking up the wrong tree."

"I didn't want anyone to find out. I wanted to keep it hidden until the Star-Array Grand Banquet ended, at least."

Jongni Chu added with a bitter expression,

"I never imagined something like this would happen, though."

"I feel the same. Despite all our precautions, a bloodbath occurred at Shaolin of all places…"

"You wouldn't be here unless the situation at Shaolin had been settled. Did the Thunderbolt Saber King go?"

"Yes. As soon as we grasped the situation, we divided our forces and took two separate routes. Great Hero Peng should be handling matters at Shaolin by now."

"The losses are too great. Something that should never have happened has happened."

"I have much to tell you about that."

"As do I."

A heavy silence settled over us.

I had been listening to their conversation in a half-dazed state, but somehow managed to speak.

"Hey, no. Excuse me."

Jongni Chu—or rather, he—blinked.

"Are you talking to me?"

"Yes. Um, there's something I'd like to ask you…"

"Ask me anything."

Hundreds of pairs of eyes turned toward me. Everyone wore the same expression.

That lunatic has finally come to his senses.

"May I ask your name?"

The answer came without hesitation.

"Mae Jonghak."

"…Ah. Mae Jonghak."

Every hair on my body stood on end.

From our first meeting to this moment, every conversation I'd had with him and everything I'd done flashed rapidly before my eyes.

"I think it's a coincidence, but your name is the same as someone I know."

"Is that so?"

I drew a deep breath. My heartbeat thundered in my ears.

It's cold.[1463]

A dagger had flown straight into my chest. But don't worry. There were more people with the same name than you might think.

Maybe he was Fake Jonghak.

Clinging to that final hope, I opened my mouth.

"Do you happen to have an epithet…?"

"The Sword Saint."

"Ah. Yes."

Fuck. He's the real thing.

As darkness swallowed my vision, an amused voice slipped into my ear.

"Let's remain good friends from now on. Friend."

"…"

I want to die.

An enormous cavern of unknown depth in an unknown location.

At its center, where complex patterns and characters no one could decipher had been carved into the stone, black radiance erupted.

Whoosh!

The deep darkness stretched, dimming even the fiercely burning torches.

When the pitch-black darkness vanished a moment later, unrest spread among the dozens of black-clad figures surrounding the cavern's center.

"The Blood Lord!"

"What is going on…?"

Their gazes converged on a staggering, bleeding figure.

A young man drenched in blood and breathing heavily.

Sword wounds covered the Blood Lord's entire body, and blood gushed nonstop from the severed stumps of both arms.

"Call the sorcerers! Bring them here!"

"The Blood Lord is gravely wounded!"

As the desperate shouts echoed through the cavern, the Blood Lord slowly opened his mouth.

The severed arm he had held on to until the very end dropped to the floor with a thud. Its hand still clutched a short staff.

The staff gave off a faint green light even in the darkness, drawing a quiet gasp from someone nearby.

[1463] The lines about a chill and a dagger in the chest parody a well-known line from the Korean film Tazza: The High Rollers (2006).

“The Green Jade Buddha Staff…!”

It was none other than the sacred treasure of thousand-year-old Shaolin.

No one had been able to guarantee the mission’s success. Yet despite the wretched state he had returned in, their superior had completed it splendidly.

Just as expected of the Disciple cherished by that person.

“Congratulations!”

“Congratulations?”

A red glow filled the Blood Lord’s eyes as he stared at the subordinate bowing deeply with a fist-and-palm salute.

Whoosh—crack!

The subordinate’s chest shattered, and he slammed into the wall amid a fountain of blood.

His body trembled with a wheezing sound, then went still. There was no need to check. He was dead.

“Throw that bastard to the beasts.”

The moment the Blood Lord’s frigid voice left his lips, one of his subordinates hoisted the corpse over his shoulder and disappeared.

This was hardly the first or second time such a thing had happened. They were merely reminded once more of how terrifying their superior was. Not one of them mourned or showed any agitation over the death of the ignorant newcomer who had stepped forward.

“Blood Lord, you must receive treatment first…”

“I’m dizzy. Begin.”

The Blood Lord surrendered himself to the sorcerers who had just arrived.

He wanted to slaughter everything in sight, but barely managed to suppress his murderous impulse.

He needed to conserve his strength for now. He had to recover as quickly as possible so he could tear those bastards apart and kill them.

The Sword Saint. The Fire King. Cheongpung. And…

The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung.

The memory of that bastard grinning through blood-soaked teeth made his blood boil.

Unable to contain his rage, he smashed a fist into a sorcerer’s head.

Boom. Thud.

The headless body collapsed like a rotten old tree. Feeling the frightened gazes of the remaining sorcerers, the Blood Lord spat through clenched teeth,

“I can’t afford to kill any more valuable sorcerers. Continue.”

The treatment resumed after its brief interruption. It was a bizarre sight that defied explanation. Broken bones knitted together, and flesh grew back.

The Blood Lord clenched his teeth against the pain that accompanied the recovery. As his vision began to turn white, one man’s face appeared before him.

You… I’ll kill you with my own hands. I swear.

Chapter 268

The death of Dharma King Hong Dao. And the mysterious bloodbath at Shaolin Temple, the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper[1464] of the Murim.

Word travels faster than a galloping horse.

Countless eyewitnesses spread the rumors far and wide.

“Did you all hear the news? About the Star-Array Grand Banquet…”

“Martial artists are surrounding Mount Song. I heard there was a bloodbath at Shaolin Temple.”

Henan Province, which had been swept up in the festive excitement of the Star-Array Grand Banquet, was thrown into an uproar.

The elderly recalled the Demonic Cult’s rampage across the land several decades ago. The young realized that the war they had dismissed as a dusty relic of the past had become a present-day reality.

“The Demonic Cult has appeared? This is terrible. Just terrible.”

“I heard someone else was behind it, not the Demonic Cult.”

“You’re saying there are others besides the Demonic Cult capable of such a thing?”

“I don’t know the details myself. It’s just something I overheard.”

“That can’t be right. They say the terrifying Yin-Yang Twin Freaks led the attack on Shaolin.”

“The Yin-Yang Twin Freaks? I heard the Heavenly Demon of the Demonic Cult personally made a move.”

“T-The Heavenly Demon?”

As one rumor piled onto another, the story snowballed.

With everyone lost in a jumble of truth and lies, it was only natural for their attention to turn toward a single place.

The former site of the Murim Alliance.

The place where the great and small pillars of the orthodox faction stood.

“I heard what happened. About Jongni Chu—or rather, Great Hero Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint.”

“…”

“Keep your chin up. These things happen.”

“…”

“I’m completely broke myself now. Whew… Anyway, that’s what happened to me. But when I heard your news, Captain, I felt strength surging through me.”

[1464] “Mount Tai and Northern Dipper” is an East Asian honorific for a preeminent authority.

"Why?"

"Pardon?"

"I asked why that gave you strength."

"Isn't it obvious? As the ancient sages said, pain grows lighter when shared…"

Thwack!

"Guh."

A precise blow to the solar plexus folded Hyuk Mujin at the waist and knocked the wind out of him.

When I saw the back of his head sitting wide open, my hand moved on its own. It just moved.

Smack!

"Feeling stronger now? Huh?"

"W-Wait. You hit me in the solar plexus. The solar plexus."

"You're making my blood pressure shoot up, you bastard. You've got my blood running backward!"

Smack-smack-smack!

After raining blows down on the back of his head, I finally felt a little better.

I already had enough on my mind. Why did this bastard have to rile me up on top of everything else?

"Things are serious right now, so watch your mouth. Got it?"

Rubbing the back of his head, Hyuk Mujin muttered, "You looked too serious, so I was trying to lighten the mood."

"Just keep quiet."

"…Yes, sir."

Having silenced Hyuk Mujin, I gazed out the window.

Martial artists hurried frantically in every direction. Though none of them openly showed it, tension hung thick in the air.

Yet amid it all, the sky was brilliantly clear.

Hyuk Mujin's subdued voice reached my ears.

"It feels strange."

"What does?"

"Everything. None of it feels real. It's only been one day."

"I feel the same way."

Even tumultuous wasn't enough to describe it. Nothing that had happened the day before felt real. It all seemed like a dream.

Hong Dao breathing his last. Shaolin Temple drenched in blood. The Yin-Yang Twin Freaks, the Blood Lord, and finally Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

The scenes passed before my eyes like a panorama.

The problem is, this is only the prologue.

If this were a movie theater, it wouldn't be strange for the end credits to start rolling by now. But this was nothing more than an ominous prelude.

The vague sense of crisis that everyone anticipated was so palpable I could feel it on my skin.

Something is changing.

The world had already become a massive powder keg. The orthodox faction held the fuse, but Dark Heaven had the flint.

And just yesterday, the fuse had been lit.

I didn't know how all this would end, but I could guess what would happen along the way.

There's going to be a war.

A war on an entirely different scale from the one in Shanxi Province.

There was no way the people at the top had failed to realize what even I suspected.

The leaders of the orthodox faction were already consumed with handling the aftermath and holding meetings about the incident.

"Come to think of it, Captain, didn't you attend yesterday's meeting too?"

I nodded slightly.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan might not compare to the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families, but it was still the undisputed hegemon of Shanxi Province.

And since Shanxi Province was where Dark Heaven had first revealed itself, it was only natural that the leaders would take a keen interest in it.

"What did they say?"

"They asked about the Head Elder and the Red Wind Band. I told them everything I knew."

"The Head Elder is one thing, but why the Red Wind Band?"

"The Temporary Strength Pill used by Pung Yang, the Red Wind Band Leader, is connected to Dark Heaven."

"Ah."

Hyuk Mujin was now a high-ranking member of the family, so he had some idea of what was going on. He knew about both the Temporary Strength Pill and Dark Heaven.

"Did they say anything else?"

"I just left. My eldest brother will hear the important news and pass it on anyway…"

My voice sank without me realizing it.

"I didn't feel comfortable leaving Old Master alone for too long."

My gaze drifted from the window toward a lone figure.

A small elderly man lay on the bed as though deeply asleep.

When I took his wrinkled hand, I could feel his pulse. The faint rise and fall of his chest told me he was breathing. But even after a full day, he still hadn't regained consciousness.

"When do you think he'll wake up?"

"That's the problem. No one knows."

"Didn't some famous physician come by?"

"He said there was nothing he could do. Since Old Master wasn't gravely wounded like the others, he told us to wait and see."

The Dance of the Fire God and Demon. The supreme technique of the Fire Gate Clan.

It possessed enough power to contend with a thousand martial artists, but everything came at a price.

A man well over a hundred years old simply didn't have the stamina or strength left to withstand the aftermath.

Maybe…

I shook my head, driving away the thought that had suddenly surfaced.

There was no point dwelling on the worst.

Both the Sword Saint and the physician had said his life wasn't in danger. For now, the best thing I could do was stay by Jeok Cheongang's side and watch over him.

"There weren't any suspicious people around while I was gone, were there?"

The Abbot of Shaolin had been assassinated inside the Murim Alliance. No one was safe. Just as Jeok Cheongang had protected me from the Blood Lord, I had to protect him.

Hyuk Mujin nodded confidently.

"The Jin Dragon Squad has the pavilion completely surrounded. No one can slip through. Don't worry."

"The Jin Dragon Squad? The elite force of the Taiyuan Jin Family?"

"Yes. The Lesser Family Head was concerned for Great Hero Jeok's safety, so he assigned me here. Who do you think I am? I'm Hyuk Mujin, Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad."

"Uh…"

I looked him up and down, then quietly averted my eyes.

Hyuk Mujin's confident expression instantly turned sour.

"What was that reaction?"

"Nothing. I just realized I shouldn't leave again."

"Don't tell me you don't trust the strength of the Jin Dragon Squad, the family's finest?"

"Come on. I said that's not it. Let it go."

Hyuk Mujin glared at me through narrowed eyes, then shot to his feet.

“Fine. I’ll report to the Lesser Family Head and have everyone withdrawn.”

“Hey, why are you taking it that way? Are you going through puberty or something?”

“Because you keep saying such hurtful things, Captain! Is this only the first or second time? Huh?!”

“Keep your voice down. You’ll wake Old Master.”

“It would be nice if he woke up.”

“…”

He had a point.

As I found myself momentarily at a loss for words, Hyuk Mujin headed for the door.

One glance told me he was putting on an act because he wanted me to stop him. At times like this, I had to give him what he wanted.

“Hey, where are you going?”

Hyuk Mujin huffed, “Forget it. I can put up with anything else, but I won’t tolerate you insulting the subordinates I care about!”

“Gasp.”

“What now?”

“I never thought I’d hear words like that come out of your mouth. Mujin, you’ve really grown up. Guess your mouth doesn’t need circumcising after all.”

“…I’m really leaving.”

“Fine, fine. Sit down. Calm down and have a glass of water.”

“Hmph. No.”

“Well, well. Our Mujin really has grown up. Making me say it twice now.”

“…!”

Hyuk Mujin froze, then quietly lowered himself onto the chair.

“I still deserve an apology.”

“Huh? For what?”

“For insulting my subordinates.”

“Why should I apologize? I never insulted them.”

“You just said you didn’t trust them. Wasn’t that because you look down on them for being weaker in martial arts than you?”

I sipped my cold tea.

“Well, we’re not the Nine Sects and One Gang or one of the Five Great Families, so of course there’s a difference in strength. But you said every member of the Jin Dragon Squad is young and talented, didn’t you? They distinguished themselves yesterday too. Weren’t they the ones who saved Unnamed?”

Shaolin was a mighty tree. Yesterday's tragedy had cost it a great branch called the Dharma King and countless fruits, but its roots remained.

Shaolin's martial arts. And Unnamed, who had survived.

Those were its roots.

Oh, and hadn't they said that old monk Hongcheon survived too?

"That's right. They fought Dark Heaven without giving an inch."

Hyuk Mujin puffed out his chest, his face filled with pride.

"Exactly. Then what's the problem? The kids looked sharp to me. They're fiercely loyal to the family too. There's only one problem."

"What's that?"

"You're their Vice Squad Leader."

"…"

"Your subordinates are standing at attention down there, while their Vice Squad Leader sits up here shooting the breeze?"

"Th-That's…"

"You said you cared about them. That you were proud of them."

"It's true! Do you have any idea how much I care about those guys…?"

Hyuk Mujin faltered for a moment, then quickly recovered and poured out the words as though he had been waiting for the chance.

"Besides, my current mission is to guard Great Hero Jeok and you, Captain."

"And before that?"

"Pardon?"

"What was your previous mission?"

"Guarding the Lesser Family Head, obviously."

"Really?"

I chuckled, pulled that from inside my robes, and tossed it onto the table.

Clatter.

Hyuk Mujin sucked in a breath at the sight of the golden mask gleaming on the table.

"Gasp! W-Where did you get that…?"

"Where do you think? I knew you weren't usually that kind of guy, but you stuck to me like a bad smell after the preliminaries."

"Wait. You've got it all wrong. I was genuinely so busy with guard duty that I barely had time to open my eyes—"

"A misunderstanding? Fine. Want me to make sure you never open them again?"

Crack!

The golden mask crumpled into a little ball in my hand. Hyuk Mujin's eyes shook as though caught in an earthquake.

“You were handling an escort at a gambling house, you bastard? You were so famous I didn’t even need to ask around. Apparently, some guy won a hundred thousand silver nyang[1465] in one go, then lost a hundred thousand silver nyang[1466] right afterward. They were treating him like a legend—no, an absolute legend.”

If the story had reached my ears even in the middle of this crisis, that said everything.

I’d even heard a rumor that one of the servants working at the Murim Alliance had hit the jackpot on Toto[1467]—no, Dodo—slapped the Chief Steward across the face, and walked out.

“If you cared about your subordinates that much, you should’ve collected dues and placed the bet with their money. Did you really gobble it down by yourself because you were afraid the payout odds would drop?”

“…”

No answer. Nothing to say.

Even if he had ten mouths, he wouldn’t have anything to say. Hyuk Mujin stood there frozen and pale before finally forcing out a few words.

“Life is… all about one big score.”

“…”

This bastard still hadn’t come to his senses.

I stared at Hyuk Mujin in disbelief and raised my fist.

That was when—

Swish. Tap.

There had been no noticeable presence. No sound.

As if by magic, a young man—or rather, an old man—had ascended more than ten jang[1468] and landed on the windowsill. He grinned and waved.

“Want to talk for a moment, friend?”

Friend, my ass.

I looked at Sword Saint Mae Jonghak and heaved an inward sigh.

[1465] A silver nyang is a traditional currency unit; it is not Korean won.

[1466] A silver nyang is a traditional currency unit; it is not Korean won.

[1467] Toto refers to sports betting in South Korea.

[1468] One jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten jang is approximately 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

Chapter 269

It felt like sitting on a bed of thorns—or rather, walking down a path covered in them.

As I walked beside Mae Jonghak, the countless gazes coming my way made my face prickle.

They were filled with awe and curiosity.

Everyone knew now. The young martial artist who had been dismissed as a lucky country bumpkin just days ago was actually the great martial artist known as the Sword Saint.

“Is that really him? Great Hero Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint.”

“Good heavens, he looks so young. I thought Returned to Youth was nothing more than an absurd fairy tale.”

“As expected of Great Hero Mae Jonghak. He’s turned the Murim upside down.”

Their hushed conversations slipped straight into my ears.

“But who’s that next to him?”

“That’s the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung. I heard from someone yesterday that he grabbed Great Hero Mae Jonghak by the neck and talked to him like he was some punk, and—well, you know?”

“Good heavens. At that point, shouldn’t he be called the Mad Dragon instead of the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?”

“…”

Fuck. It wasn’t like I’d done it knowingly. I hadn’t known who he was.

When I glared at the whispering crowd, Mae Jonghak burst out laughing.

“It’s all right. Friends can act that way with each other.”

He was killing me twice over.

We moved to a quiet rear garden away from the crowd.

It was still early spring, but the weather was warm and the flowers were in full bloom. Mae Jonghak gazed at blossoms whose names I didn’t know as we walked, then spoke.

“First, I should thank you.”

“For what…?”

“I heard you were a great help to Cheongpung.”

“I wouldn’t exactly call it help.”

“I don’t know the details, but if he went so far as to call you his Benefactor, you must have done a great deal for him.”

“…”

He didn’t know the details. He really, really didn’t.

I almost wanted to see the look on Mae Jonghak's face if he learned that a few candied hawthorn skewers[1469] were all it had taken for Cheongpung to start calling me his Benefactor.

"To be honest, I'd been very worried about that boy. But after meeting you, I was able to put my mind at ease. I owe you a debt."

"Oh. Right."

I decided not to mention the candied hawthorn skewers[1470]. If the Sword Saint said he owed me a debt, there was no reason to sell myself short.

"How is Cheongpung?"

"He's recovered enough to move around. The moment he opened his eyes, he threw a fit and insisted on coming to see you."

"Oh, dear. What happened?"

"Hmm? He quieted down when I gave him some dumplings."

Twenty years of child-rearing experience hadn't gone to waste. He knew exactly how to handle Cheongpung.

"And Great Hero Jeok?"

"He still hasn't regained consciousness. I actually wanted to ask you about that…"

"Ask me anything."

I struggled to force the words out.

"Is there a chance he might never wake up…?"

"Hmm."

Mae Jonghak stroked his smooth chin.

"What did the physician I sent say?"

"Ah, that man?"

Remembering the mouse-faced old physician who had briefly visited yesterday instantly soured my mood.

"He seemed like a complete quack."

"A quack? The Luoyang Strange Physician?"

"The Luoyang Strange Physician or whatever. He took one quick look, said there was nothing he could do right now, and walked straight out. How is that not quackery?"

What kind of old man had such a fierce temper? When I grabbed his arm in sheer disbelief, he screamed so loudly my ears nearly fell off.

Then he shouted that he would never examine Jeok Cheongang again, leaving me no choice but to let him go.

Mae Jonghak clicked his tongue after hearing the story.

[1469] Candied hawthorn skewers are fruit skewers coated in hardened sugar.

[1470] Candied hawthorn skewers are fruit skewers coated in hardened sugar.

“The Luoyang Strange Physician is renowned throughout the Central Plains. His temperament is every bit as eccentric as his epithet suggests, but his skill is beyond question.”

“Then…”

My heart sank at Mae Jonghak’s nod.

It must have shown plainly on my face, because he gave me a few reassuring pats on the back.

“Don’t worry too much. If Great Hero Jeok’s life had been in immediate danger, the Luoyang Strange Physician wouldn’t have simply left.”

His words were warm and comforting, but they didn’t completely dispel my unease.

Jeok Cheongang had seemed like he would shake it off and get back on his feet in no time.

For the past year, he had been my Master, passing everything he had on to me without reservation. At the same time, he was as good as my own grandfather.

No. He’ll be all right.

I forced down the anxiety rising inside me.

A martial artist counted among the ten greatest in the world and a renowned physician had already examined Jeok Cheongang. For now, all I could do was trust them.

Having settled on that, I changed the subject.

“Have you learned anything more about Dark Heaven?”

“Dark Heaven…”

Mae Jonghak gazed at the flower garden with an odd expression.

“I can’t make heads or tails of it.”

“Which parts?”

“All of it.”

“What?”

“Let me ask you something. Did anything about this incident strike you as strange?”

I thought for a while before answering.

So much had happened so urgently yesterday that I hadn’t noticed it at the time, but there were certainly several things that raised questions.

“There were a few things that seemed strange…”

“Such as?”

“For one thing, I don’t understand what those bastards were trying to accomplish.”

“Go on.”

“If Dark Heaven intended to deal a serious blow to the Murim, they should have prepared something much bigger.”

The leaders of the orthodox faction's Murim had all gathered in one place.

If Dark Heaven's goal was to destroy the orthodox faction and seize control of the world, they could at least have tried planting explosives.

Whether it succeeded or not, it was a golden opportunity to wipe out the enemy's leadership in one stroke.

Yet the only ones sacrificed were Dharma King Hong Dao and Shaolin Temple. Those bastards chose specific targets from the beginning and acted accordingly.

"Coming out into the open like this means they must have made at least some preparations for a fight… Yet it feels like they openly revealed themselves only to pick up iron coins instead of silver nyang."

Mae Jonghak, who had been listening in silence, suddenly spoke.

"That comparison is wrong. Shaolin Temple is a symbol of the orthodox faction. By destroying that symbol, Dark Heaven made sure the world knew they existed."

"Was that really necessary?"

"Several theories have emerged. The first is that they want a direct confrontation."

"Surely not."

"Don't underestimate demonic practitioners. They are people ruled solely by blood and power. The Demonic Cult during the Great Faction War was no different. They're impossible to read."

Mae Jonghak shook his head and continued.

"The second theory is that Dark Heaven is nothing more than a smokescreen."

"A smokescreen?"

"Do you know who caused the bloodbath at Shaolin Temple?"

"The Yin-Yang Twin Freaks… Ah."

"That's right. They were great fiends who earned fearsome reputations beneath the Demonic Cult's banner during the Great Faction War. Many years have passed, but there's still a strong possibility that they remain followers of the Demonic Cult."

So Dark Heaven might be a Demonic Cult franchise. No, a subordinate organization.

As Mae Jonghak said, it was entirely possible.

But there was still one thing bothering me.

"What about the Blood Lord? Is he part of the Demonic Cult too?"

"I don't know."

Mae Jonghak answered without the slightest hesitation, then scratched his chin.

"The Temporary Strength Pill you acquired, the Exploding Blood Demonic Art used by those who attacked Shaolin, and the Blood Lord himself. They all clearly carry the scent of the Demonic Cult, but… something is different. It has become darker and stranger."

Mae Jonghak was a living witness to the Great Faction War. He must have fought countless enemies and experienced their martial arts firsthand.

He was one of the orthodox Murim's foremost authorities on demonic martial arts. Anything he said might as well have been academic consensus.

"Especially that sorcery I witnessed at the end. Even I had never encountered anything like it."

It wasn't a movement technique or qinggong.[1471] It was sorcery.

I had heard that the Demonic Cult possessed all sorts of bizarre sorceries, but I had never imagined anything like that was possible.

Even I, someone accustomed to magic, had been left gaping in astonishment.

Wasn't that practically magic?

Martial artists had scoured the surrounding area in case he was still nearby, but the Blood Lord was nowhere to be found. He had truly vanished as though the earth had swallowed him.

"There has also been considerable debate over where so many enemies came from. If they can use that kind of sorcery on a large scale…"

"That's horrifying just to think about."

Calling it a surprise attack wouldn't even begin to cover it. If the enemy could pop up east and west like Hong Gil-dong,[1472] it would be like a bolt from the blue every time.

The leadership must be in chaos too.

The atmosphere had already been disorderly when I briefly attended the meeting the day before. By now, it could only have gotten worse.

I was clicking my tongue at the thought when Mae Jonghak asked,

"Have you ever wondered about something?"

Mae Jonghak's clear eyes fixed on me.

"Why were they so obsessed with the Green Jade Buddha Staff?"

"Who knows? Because it's Shaolin Temple's sacred treasure?"

"They could have simply broken it."

"I think they were more interested in taking it. Honestly, I'm not even sure what they planned to do with it."

As far as I knew, the Green Jade Buddha Staff was nothing more than a slightly unusual staff.

I thought it only seemed more impressive because it carried the authority of Shaolin's Abbot and the history of a thousand-year-old Shaolin Temple.

[1471] Qinggong is a martial-arts skill associated with swift, light-footed movement.

[1472] Hong Gil-dong is a legendary Korean outlaw famed for appearing in different places with astonishing speed.

It wasn't the Elder Wand[1473] or anything. What were they going to do with a fluorescent green staff?

"Yes, that may be so. The others thought the same."

Mae Jonghak fell into thought for a while, then abruptly spoke again.

"Did you know that Master Hong Dao left me a letter?"

"This is the first I've heard of it since I grew pubic hair."

"Perhaps he sensed his own fate and made preparations. In the letter, he wrote that you were the Morning Star who would drive away the darkness."

"…"

"You're a genius unlike any I've ever seen. Look around you. Who else your age has reached such a realm?"

I thought for a moment before answering.

"Cheongpung."

"Oh. I see."

"…"

"Pung broke through the wall to the Peak realm when he was eighteen. I'd have thought you had done about the same by that age."

"I was doing well in a different sense back then. My epithet was the Night King."

"Oh, did it mean you were comparable to the Ten Kings?"

"No. I went in and out of pleasure houses too often."

"Oh. I see."

"…"

"…"

An icy silence descended.

Mae Jonghak scratched the back of his head, momentarily unable to find anything to say, then let out a hollow laugh.

"That's my grandson."

"…I think I'll be going now."

As I turned away, Mae Jonghak shouted after me.

"I'll drop by again soon! And I'll bring news that will surprise you!"

Ugh. Why did I feel so drained?

"Have you returned?"

When I returned to the room where Jeok Cheongang lay, Hyuk Mujin greeted me with a bow. Unlike before, he now stood rigidly at attention, and I smiled with satisfaction.

[1473] The Elder Wand is a powerful magical wand in the Harry Potter stories.

“That’s how you stand guard. You can draw your sword at any moment. Isn’t that nice?”

“Of course. I’ll guard this place like an iron fortress.”

“Yeah. You can go now.”

“Yes, sir!”

Hyuk Mujin was about to dart out of the room when I spoke.

“Put the lump of gold in your sleeve back down.”

“…”

“If it isn’t down by the time I count to three, you’re getting murdered today. One, two.”

Clatter.

Hyuk Mujin put down the gold mask I had crushed into a lump earlier and lowered his head dejectedly.

“Ah. You knew?”

“Do I look like an easy mark?”

“Captain, please. I even took on Yama’s Debt[1474] this time…”

A hundred thousand silver nyang hadn’t been enough, so he had even borrowed from a loan shark. What a lunatic.

I clicked my tongue and tucked the lump of gold into my robes.

“We’ll see. It depends on how you behave.”

“Gasp. Does that mean…?”

“I’m going to rest now, so don’t let anyone in. Not even my eldest brother.”

“E-Even the Lesser Family Head?”

“That’s right. Tell them I’m exhausted and asleep.”

I looked out the window. The sky was slowly turning red.

“Until tomorrow morning. Can you manage that?”

Hyuk Mujin nodded resolutely.

“I’ll give my life.”

“I already know you won’t, so just do what I told you.”

“Yes, sir!”

Some “yes, sir.”

Hyuk Mujin’s face lit up, and he moved aside with a broad grin.

I gazed at Jeok Cheongang’s face, which looked as though he were sleeping soundly, then lay down on the bed beside him.

How long had it been?

[1474] Yama is a judge of the dead in Buddhist tradition. “Yama’s Debt” is Taekyung’s joking name for a ruinous loan.

I had spent the past year running without a moment’s rest. Now, I desperately wanted to loosen the reins a little and return to my family’s embrace.

Logout.

Ding.

With the familiar notification sound, my vision went black.

Chapter 270

Ding.

My eyes flew open with the familiar System notification.

Instead of the familiar ceiling, I found two pairs of eyes staring down at me.

The moment our gazes met—

“Eek!”

“Oh my God!”

They both let out piercing shrieks and fell backward onto their butts.

I yawned as though I had just woken up and looked at Mom and Hayeon.

“What are you so surprised about?”

“Gasp… Haaah…”

“Huuh… Huuuuu…”

They looked as though they had seen a ghost. Still sitting on the floor and catching their breath, they shouted at the same time.

“You nearly gave me a heart attack!”

“You little bastard! You little bastard!”

Smack! Smack!

Hayeon’s eyes blazed, while Mom charged in and mercilessly pounded my back.

Somehow, the palm of a woman in her fifties hurt worse than the fist of an average martial artist.

Was this some kind of Inner-Family Heavy Hand?

The Mother’s Palm Strike, remembered by both body and soul.

It was only after I had taken many more blows that the barrage of slaps finally stopped.

Of course, getting hit a few times didn’t solve all my problems.

“Son.”

I swallowed hard at the weight in Mom’s voice. As expected, the mood was ominous.

“Yes, yes, Mother.”

“Do you know you’ve been sleeping for two whole days?”

Hayeon added, “Forty-two hours, to be exact.”

“That’s right. You wouldn’t wake up, so we almost called an ambulance.”

Forty-two hours.

I'd slept quite a while. I had spent more than a year in Murim, after all, so it made sense that this much time had passed.

To be honest, I hadn't expected it to take this long either.

"Do you have narcolepsy or something? How can you sleep that long? You didn't even react when we shook you."

Hayeon stared at me in disbelief, and I casually began piling lie upon lie.

"What are you talking about? I woke up once or twice in the middle."

"You didn't. Every time Mom and I checked, you were sleeping…"

"I woke up around dawn each day. How could you have seen me?"

"Huh?"

"Every time I opened my eyes, it was around dawn. I was tired, so I just kept sleeping."

"No, but even so, can a person really do that?"

Of course not.

But I had long since mastered the art of dealing with this distrustful little menace of a sister.

"Hey, Jin Hayeon."

I deliberately hardened my expression as I called her by her full name, and Hayeon flinched.

"Y-Yeah?"

"Don't you know what I was like in high school?"

"I-I don't."

"I slept straight through all seven periods without even eating, then slept again during evening self-study."

"…"

"You think that's all?"

"There's more?"

"Of course. After sleeping at school, what do you think I did at home?"

"Could it be…"

"That's right. I came home from school and went back to sleep. That's the kind of person I am."

"That's incredible."

Hayeon nodded solemnly. Mom, who had been listening quietly, looked utterly crushed as she spoke.

"Son, that's not something to brag about…"

Sorry, Mom.

But something similar might happen again, so it seemed better to hammer the point home now.

The problem was that I was hammering another huge nail into my mother's heart.

There goes another point on my unfilial-son score.

I quietly avoided Mom's gaze. It wasn't as though my poor academic performance was anything new. Thankfully, the whole narcolepsy business disappeared from the conversation.

Before Hayeon could say anything else, I changed the subject.

"Oh, right. The massage chair. Weren't we going to buy one?"

Hayeon answered with a look of utter contempt.

"We already bought one, you idiot."

"Oh, really?"

"Yeah. I picked the most expensive one. It was worth every penny. I reclined in it for a minute and nearly went straight to heaven."

"You're taking the express train to hell when you die. Where did you get the money?"

"What do you mean, where? It was all your money. Here. I put your card to good use."

"…Right. Good job."

When had she taken my card?

But I had my own crimes to answer for, so I couldn't say anything.

How much did the most expensive one cost, anyway? Maybe I should have kept more of the money from selling the raid monster last time.

I was mulling it over as I took back the card when—

Ding-dong.

Mom and Hayeon's ears perked up at the doorbell.

"Could that be them?"

"They're here!"

What was here?

I asked with a bewildered expression.

"Is someone coming?"

"Of course. The delivery driver."

Hayeon answered excitedly and dashed out of the room.

But a moment later, the voice that accompanied the sound of the front door opening did not belong to the delivery driver Hayeon had been waiting for.

"Excuse me. Is Jin Taekyung here?"

"Who…? Are you perhaps a reporter?"

"No."

A soft yet low voice continued.

"I'm a Team Leader. The Peace Guild's Team Leader."

There was only one Peace Guild Team Leader I knew.

When I stepped into the living room, I saw a man in a black coat over Hayeon's shoulder.

"Team Leader."

Team Leader Choi dipped his head in greeting.

"Have you been resting well?"

"…More or less."

In truth, spending over a year struggling in Murim had left me mentally exhausted.

It had been a while since I'd seen him, but I felt more uneasy than glad. If this man had come all the way to my house, his business was obvious.

"I'm glad to hear you've had a good rest."

"I didn't say I'd had a good rest. No, wait—what brings you here? I thought I didn't have any media appearances scheduled for a while."

"That's only natural. You aren't a celebrity, after all."

"Then?"

"The workshop for our new Guild members is today."

"A workshop?"

"Yes."

That was fine. I was curious what the new Guild members were like, and I could go for a little while before coming home and getting some proper rest.

"When does the workshop end?"

"It's scheduled to last about six nights and seven days."

"What kind of workshop lasts a whole week? Are we going to Pyeongchang or Gapyeong?"

"Think bigger."

"Then maybe… an overseas resort in Southeast Asia?"

"Hmm."

"Phuket? It's Phuket, isn't it!"

Team Leader Choi beamed at me.

"We've secured an A-rank Gate."

"Oh."

"We'll build team unity while hunting monsters together."

"…"

A workshop with monsters.

Wonderful.

Rumble. Boom!

The ground shook every time the five-meter-tall[1475] giant took a step.

Its entire body, from head to toe, was made of solid rock. Moss clung to it here and there, and the whole thing looked damp with moisture.

A red light flashed from the uppermost rock, where vines hung down like hair.

The monster's eye.

Someone groaned under their breath as that lifeless eye swept over them.

"Golem…"

A bona fide A-rank monster.

The rookie B-rank Hunters who had just graduated from the training center felt their knees weaken at the mere sight of it.

"How are we supposed to take that down…?"

"I feel like one hit would kill me."

Just as the roughly twenty new Guild members were watching the Stone Golem loitering in the distance and swallowing dryly, someone spoke.

"There's no need to be afraid. The Stone Golem approaching us possesses tremendous destructive power and durability, but it does have one weakness: it's slow."

At the young Team Leader's words—he looked as though he had just stepped out of a fashion magazine—the female Hunters nodded with dreamy expressions.

"They say it's slow."

"If Team Leader Choi Minwoo says it's slow, then it's slow. He's right."

At that moment, the Stone Golem's head slowly turned toward them.

A brief silence followed.

Then its rocky legs accelerated, devouring three meters[1476] with every stride.

Boom, boom, boom, boom!

"…It's really fast, though."

"Fuck, I should've gone with damage dealer instead of tank."

"Excuse me. Do you think damage dealers are people who sit around and eat for free?"

"Then take my shield and tank it for me."

"I'd rather not."

The dark clouds hanging over the new Guild members' faces scattered when a clear voice rang out.

"The wind dwells within you. Haste!"

"Power that can shatter stone. Strength!"

[1475] Five meters is about 16 ft.

[1476] Three meters is about 9.8 ft.

“Breathe life into your weary bodies. Healing!”

Fwoooosh.

The incantations rang out one after another.

A refreshing breeze swept over them, and halos of light descended onto the new Guild members’ heads.

Feeling their bodies grow vastly stronger than before, they turned around in astonishment.

What is this? The difference is incredible.

She’s a B-rank healer like me, but her effect is this strong?

Wow. So she really is from the Ares Guild.

Under their collective stare, Song Song’s flawless brow furrowed.

“What are you all doing? Do you want to keep standing there glassy-eyed until you have your workshop in heaven?”

They had been left dazed once by her buff magic—powerful enough to make them mistake her for an A-rank healer—and a second time by her beauty.

Only then did the new Guild members snap out of it.

Boom, boom, boom, boom!

—Grrrroooar!

The Stone Golem had already closed to within twenty meters.[1477] It swung its arm.

Whoooosh!

With an air-splitting roar, a massive tree that had stood rooted deep in the ground moments before shot toward them like a cannonball.

“S-Shields!”

Clack-clack-clack!

At the panicked cry, several tower shields filled with mana rose to block the front.

But could those shields really stop a massive tree fired at them like a bullet?

Everyone gritted their teeth, bracing for the impact.

“Fire Wall.”

Fwoooosh!

A massive wall of flame surged upward.

The intense heat incinerated the dry branches and leaves. The blackened trunk crumbled the instant it struck the tower shields.

“Whoa…”

“What is this?”

A rich baritone worthy of a coffee commercial drifted down from above the new Guild members’ gaping faces.

“I blocked that one for you. There won’t be a second time.”

[1477] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

It was strange. His words and actions were impeccably polite, yet the old gentleman's eyes held the same viciousness as the training Instructor who had tormented them until recently.

No, it was even worse.

"Fire Wall."

With the second incantation, another wall of flame surged upward.

The only difference was that this time, it appeared behind them instead of in front.

"Ah, hot!"

"What the hell is this?"

"Guild Master! Guild Master?"

Kim the Butler blocked off the new Guild members' rear with a curtain of fire and smiled faintly.

"You cannot grow by receiving nothing but help inside a Gate. Fight as though your lives depend on it."

"…"

"Mages, locate the core with detection magic. Tanks, protect the healers and draw its aggro. Damage dealers… I trust I don't need to explain any further."

Swoosh.

Kim the Butler flicked his fingers, and Team Leader Choi and Song Song's bodies rose into the air.

The abandoned new Guild members were just about to fall into a panic when a shout rang out.

"Tanks, forward!"

Boom!

With a thunderous cry, a massive man in full armor slammed a tower shield into the ground.

Several of the new Guild members frowned at the sight.

The first man to step forward was a middle-aged D-rank Hunter whose only claim to distinction was twenty years of experience.

"What are you doing? Get your heads in the game!"

But they had no choice. Their bodies, already sensing the threat to their lives, moved toward the front line of their own accord.

"Formation!"

"Formaaation!"

Clack-clack-clack!

With a deafening chorus repeating the command, the tower shields formed a solid wall.

The mages and healers drew up their mana, while the damage dealers prepared the strongest strikes they could unleash.

Crouched behind the shields, Im Kkeokjeong shouted with a grim expression.

“Hold!”

—Grrrroooar!

The Stone Golem charged straight into the wall of shields.

Kra-boom!

“Gasp… Haaah…”

“Ugh…”

Heavy breathing and groans rose from every direction.

The tank with a broken arm and the mages and healers who had exhausted all their mana collapsed onto the ground, while the damage dealers lay sprawled across the Stone Golem’s remains.

“Ugh, I’m dying.”

“Did we really take down this Stone Golem?”

The raid had lasted a full five hours. Despite their numbers, it had been a long, grueling fight, but the rookie Hunters who had only just graduated from the training center felt their chests swell with pride.

“I took down an A-rank monster…”

“Let’s take a group picture later. I’m going to frame it and hang it in my living room.”

“Who takes down a Stone Golem for their first raid?”

“Good work, everyone.”

Just as everyone was looking back on their achievement with moved expressions

—

—Grrrrooooar!

—Roooooar!

The new Guild members’ faces went rigid as they spotted more golems approaching in the distance with thunderous roars.

What is that?

There were more than ten at a glance, and they looked larger and tougher than the Stone Golem. Light flashed from their massive bodies with every violent movement.

Someone shrieked.

“Iron! Those are Iron Golems!”

“Eeeek!”

The appearance of Iron Golems, among the highest-ranking of all golems, was more than enough to send everyone into a panic.

“W-Why are they here?”

“Aren’t they supposed to be scattered all over the place?”

They had never heard of golems living in tribes.

But the sight of them drawing closer by the second, and the ground trembling as though an earthquake had struck, told them this was all too real.

In the end, they had only one lifeline left.

“Please help us! We’ll all die at this rate!”

The cry rose toward the sky. Team Leader Choi, who had been floating in the air and watching the situation from beginning to end, smiled.

“There’s nothing for us to help you with.”

“…What did you say?”

Has that bastard gone insane?

Just as everyone began to doubt their own ears—

Whoooosh! Slash!

A red flash tore through the air.

The charging Iron Golem split cleanly in half, from the crown of its head to its crotch.

Crash!

A man emerged between the masses of steel collapsing to either side.

“Mob farming is fucking sweet.”

The young man, Jin Taekyung, grinned.

Chapter 271

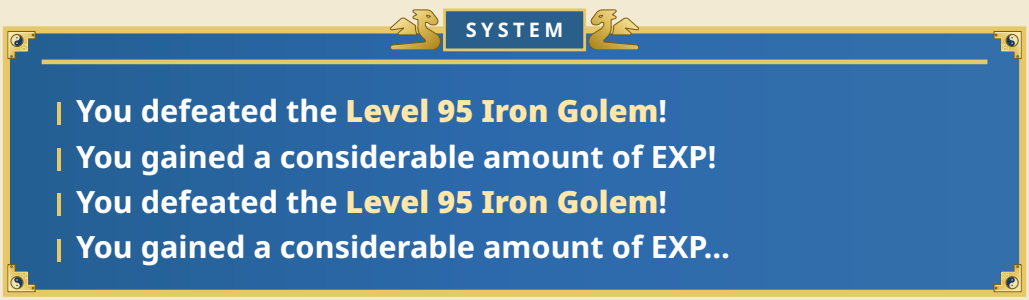
Shhk!

The Iron Golem's impossibly sturdy body was sliced apart like soft tofu.

Even steel imbued with mana couldn't withstand Scorching Yang Qi.

Everywhere the spearhead cut and pierced, it carved a trail of fire, leaving molten metal dripping to the ground.

Ding. Ding.



"Why is it so weak?"

Even I was bewildered by what I'd just done.

Iron Golems were difficult monsters. No, extremely difficult. They couldn't be killed without destroying their cores, and their destructive power and durability were both tremendous.

Regeneration that surpasses a Troll's and destructive power that rivals an ogre's.

On top of that, they had inexhaustible stamina and resistance to magic.

Their only flaw was that they were somewhat slow, but considering their countless advantages, could that really even be called a flaw?

There was a reason they were considered some of the strongest A-rank Golems. And yet...

Why is this so easy?

Whoooosh!

The pressure from the wind sent my hair flying. An Iron Golem's fist came crashing down toward the crown of my head.

A scream erupted from among the rookie Guild members.

"Look out!"

That rookie needed some training. If a teammate looked like they were in danger, they should have picked up a rock lying nearby and at least tried to distract the enemy. What were they doing?

Well, he is a rookie.

I clicked my tongue and clenched my fist.

In the brief instant that remained after splitting a second in half, then splitting it again, decades of internal energy raced down my arm.

Scorching Yang Qi transformed into blue flames and gathered around my fist.

And then…

Claaang!

I drove my fist forward.

Fist against fist. Iron Fist against the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

The ground caved in with a metallic clang, and compressed air exploded outward. Through the swirling wind, I saw the Iron Golem stagger backward.

Only seconds ago, its arm had been solid and gleaming. Now it melted and dripped away as if a fire dragon had swallowed it.

—Grill?

Iron Golems were magical puppets without emotions.

Yet at that moment, I could have sworn I sensed bewilderment from the creature.

“Yeah. Of course I’m grilling you.”

I kicked off the ground and shot upward.

The Iron Golem’s gleaming steel chest filled my vision. And then I sensed it.

Deep within its enormous body, which contained not a trace of qi, something pulsed and poured out mana.

The Golem’s core.

“This Hunter offers free grilling.”

I slammed my open palm into its chest. The cool metal was consumed by the heat of the Flame Divine Palm.

Hisssss!

Molten metal sprayed outward as a huge hole opened in the Golem’s chest. The core that had supplied it with mana shattered without resistance.

—Grrrrr…

Rumble!

Deprived of its core, the enormous body lost all strength, broke into pieces, and collapsed.

Just as a person couldn’t breathe with a ruptured heart, neither could an Iron Golem.

I landed lightly atop the heap of metal piled up like a small hill.

“All right. Next.”

—Griiiill!

With mechanical roars, waves of gleaming steel surged toward me from every direction.

If I kill all of these, I should level up at least once, right?

Anticipation rising, I swung my spear.

The Fire Dragon Divine Spear, now at the seventh stage, burned through air and sound alike, carving a path of fire.

Fwoooosh!

Rumble!

The final Iron Golem collapsed with a deafening crash.

It had taken only a few minutes to dispose of more than ten A-rank monsters.

When I looked around, everyone was staring at me in shock.

“This is insane…”

“Did you see that? Did you just see that?”

“Yes. I saw it.”

“Wow, he was playing with an A-rank monster. I couldn’t even see him move.”

“I told you I saw it.”

A voice rang out above the murmuring rookie Guild members.

“Is the raid over already? After combat, clean up the remains and keep watch over the surrounding area. Guild Master and Miss Song, please take charge.”

His words were polite, but his tone cracked like a whip.

Team Leader Choi landed lightly, and the rookies flinched before hurrying off to find something to do.

He really does have charisma sometimes.

Maybe it was that unique aura of his. You had to be born with something like that.

As I was thinking this, Team Leader Choi approached and spoke with a grave expression.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung. I’ve been thinking about this for a while, but I can’t hold back any longer.”

“Yes.”

“Where did you buy that spear?”

“…”

Right. This was the kind of person he was. I’d forgotten for a moment.

Whether he knew what I was thinking or not, Team Leader Choi’s gaze remained fixed on the spear in my hand—White Flame.

“It’s like looking at a work of art. A classical yet beautiful Chinese-style design. Don’t tell me it’s made from Magic Gem?”

No. It’s made from Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

Of course, telling him the truth would only cause trouble, so I gave him a vague answer.

"I'm not sure. I don't know much about it myself."

Team Leader Choi's covetous gaze traveled up and down the spear.

"If you don't mind my asking, would you consider selling it to me…?"

"No. It's not for sale."

Even if I wanted to sell it, I couldn't. It was a bound Item that only I could use. The Item information said so, too.

Perhaps for that reason, it was the only object in my two separate inventories—the ones divided between Murim and the modern world—that could travel between the two worlds.

"Ah…"

Team Leader Choi smacked his lips in disappointment, then changed the subject.

"Regardless, I'm truly impressed. You just keep getting stronger."

I answered half-jokingly and half-seriously.

"All it takes is training like hell for a year under a Supreme Peak master with dementia."

"Dementia? What did you say?"

"A Supreme Peak master."

"Isn't that a term from wuxia[1478] novels? Peak master, Supreme Peak master."

"That's right. I'm thinking of writing a novel as a hobby after I retire. Something like Login Murim."

"That title isn't very good. It won't be a hit."

"I'm not actually planning to write it."

Team Leader Choi let out a short laugh before speaking.

"I know I've said this before, but sometimes, when I look at you, Mr. Jin Taekyung, a certain thought crosses my mind."

"What thought?"

"Whether you and I are truly the same kind of person."

His light brown eyes seemed to grow hot and reddish.

"A perennial F-rank Hunter becoming this powerful in only a few months? If I hadn't seen you with my own eyes, I never would have believed it."

It was a reasonable suspicion.

Second-awakened Hunters were uncommon, but not so few that they could be considered exceedingly rare.

In my case, however, I had reached a realm far beyond any ordinary second awakening.

What's more, Team Leader Choi had watched my transformation from closer than anyone else.

[1478] Wuxia is a genre of Chinese fiction about martial artists and their adventures.

I might fool everyone else, but not Team Leader Choi.

To him, I was no different from a second-, third-, or fourth-awakened Hunter.

I licked my dry lips.

This was a secret I had to take to my grave.

If it ever got out, I might be dragged off by the NIS[1479]—or no, NASA—and spend the rest of my life as a test subject.

"Team Leader. I'm sorry, but that's…"

Team Leader Choi shook his head slightly and cut me off.

"I know. I understand that you have secrets you can't even tell me. In a way, I'm in a similar position, so I have no intention of pressing you."

A similar position?

Before the question could fully form in my mind, he continued.

"An unprecedented second-awakened Hunter unlike anything the world has ever seen. That explanation should be enough, shouldn't it? Butler Kim feels the same way I do."

Song Song and Im Kkeokjeong had joined us later, but Butler Kim had been at Team Leader Choi's side, watching me grow.

News articles were already pouring out under headlines like The F-Rank Hunter's Rebellion and A Miracle. If the two of them kept their mouths shut, I could probably bring things to an end here.

I dipped my head.

"Thank you. I owe you one."

"Don't mention it."

"But may I ask you one thing?"

"Anything."

"Why are you going this far for me?"

"Oh, that?"

Team Leader Choi gave a breathy laugh.

"You just said it yourself. You owe me."

"I did."

"And I intend to collect that debt in full—with interest."

"…?"

"That's all you need to know. Well, then."

Team Leader Choi turned to leave, then paused.

"That novel you mentioned earlier—if you ever write it, let me read it. I enjoy novels more than you might think."

"Then you won't be able to read mine."

[1479] The NIS is South Korea's National Intelligence Service.

"Why not?"

Because if I ever write it, it won't be a novel you'd enjoy. It'll be an essay about my own experiences.

Team Leader Choi tilted his head at my silent smile.

The workshop—or rather, the raid—scheduled to last six nights and seven days ended after only three.

I had wandered around alone and beaten down every monster I saw, leaving nothing else to hunt.

"It was supposed to be a raid for team bonding, but somehow it turned out like this."

I quietly avoided Song Song's incredulous stare.

Wiping out all the Golems inside the Gate hadn't been enough. I'd even soloed the boss monster.

That EXP was so sweet.

"Ahem."

"The rookies need raid experience, too. Why are you so desperate to jump in every time you see a monster?"

"Come on, it all worked out. Let it go."

"Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"Now, now. Let's just let it go, Miss Song."

"And if I just can't let it go?"

"I'll punish you by confessing my feelings."

"…"

Song Song pressed her lips shut and slowly backed away with a frightened expression.

I got what I wanted, so why do I feel like crying?

Hah. I loved you…

I trudged away like the tragic male lead of a romance.

The moment I exited the dungeon, the reporters camped outside the Gate set off a barrage of camera flashes.

I had spent an entire year in Murim, but only a few days had passed in the modern world.

It would take more time for all the interest and excitement surrounding me to die down.

"Please step back, reporters!"

"Only authorized personnel are allowed beyond this point!"

Only after the guards rushed in and held back the press did I escape the barrage of flashes.

Once the shutter sounds finally stopped, the rookie Guild members, their faces flushed with excitement, shouted loudly.

“Thank you for your hard work!”

Their eyes sparkled. Their gazes were filled with admiration and respect as they looked at us.

Though, of course, most of that attention was focused on me.

Feeling awkward, I turned toward the founding members. That was when I realized someone was missing.

“Where’s Uncle Kkeokjeong?”

“Huh? Now that you mention it, he isn’t here.”

Team Leader Choi answered.

“He told me privately on the way here, then slipped away. Apparently something came up.”

“What could be so urgent that he left without even changing out of his gear?”

“It must be urgent if he left like that.”

What was going on? Had something happened at home?

An uneasy feeling settled in the back of my mind.

Come to think of it, I didn’t get to talk with him much after returning.

I had spent most of the raid operating alone, so I hadn’t had many chances to talk with the others.

Looking back, Im Kkeokjeong’s expression had seemed a little dark. At the time, I’d assumed he was simply nervous, but…

Did something really serious happen?

Even after I changed out of my gear and everyone went their separate ways, I couldn’t stop thinking about it.

I debated for a long time whether to call him, but in the end, I sent a quick message to the number saved in my contacts. It simply said that we should grab a drink together soon.

He probably had his own problems to deal with, and sticking my nose in where it didn’t belong might be rude.

That should be enough.

I was staring at the stubborn number 1[1480] that refused to disappear when—

Bzzzzt.

My smartphone vibrated. A phone icon appeared on the screen, along with the saved name.

[1480] In Korean messaging apps, a number beside a sent message indicates how many recipients have not read it.

It was a name I had saved several months ago and completely forgotten about.

Garam Middle School Classmate Park Jihoon

I had run into him by chance on the day I went to buy a house, and he hadn’t contacted me once since.

What could he want?

Mildly curious, I answered the call.

Chapter 272

“Hello?”

The voice on the other end of the phone sounded unfamiliar.

The Park Jihoon I remembered from middle school hadn’t even finished going through his voice change, and since then, we’d only exchanged a few words in passing when we ran into each other a few months ago.

Is this really him?

I was still hesitating when he spoke again.

“Is this Jin Taekyung’s number?”

“Oh, yeah, it’s me. I thought you might be someone else.”

“What the hell? You didn’t save my number last time?”

“I did, but for a second I thought you might’ve called the wrong number. I didn’t recognize your voice.”

“Fair enough. That was the first time we’d seen each other since middle school.”

“True. I didn’t even recognize you then.”

“Of course you didn’t. Do you have any idea how much money I poured into this face?”

A low laugh came through the phone. There wasn’t a trace of awkwardness between us; the mood felt warm and familiar.

I laughed along as I climbed into the VIP limousine provided by the Gate Management Agency. The driver met my eyes in the rearview mirror and gave me a polite nod before smoothly pulling away.

“So, what’s up?”

“Nothing much. I called to see if you wanted to grab a drink.”

“Drinks? Out of the blue?”

“Yeah. I said I’d get in touch when we had our class reunion, but I never did.”

Did he?

Thinking back, it seemed like he had. I’d been so busy since then that I’d completely forgotten.

“Something came up at the last minute, and I had to go overseas on business. I couldn’t even make it to the reunion.”

“An overseas business trip?”

“There was a problem at our European branch. I only got back recently.”

I went to Murim, and this guy went to Europe.

I had no idea what he’d done there, but for some reason, I felt cheated. I spoke with as much envy as I could muster.

“You lucky bastard. Must’ve been nice getting to see Europe.”

"You're jealous of me? You?"

Park Jihoon burst out laughing on the other end of the line.

"That feels really weird coming from you. Are you trying to rub it in?"

"No, that's not what I meant."

"I'm kidding. So, are you free tonight?"

I glanced at the time. It was already eight in the evening.

I'd moved out of our family home and into an officetel[1481] in Bucheon three days ago, so even if I went home, the only person waiting for me would be Jinho hyung.[1482]

I had time. The problem was…

He doesn't have some other motive, does he?

But I only hesitated for a moment.

I'd been a Hunter for seven years. Even the close friends I'd been inseparable from during my school days had gradually stopped contacting me long ago.

Out of sight, out of mind didn't apply only to romantic relationships.

And yet here I was, suspecting a friend who had contacted me after all this time without any ulterior motive.

Have I developed trust issues or something?

The aftermath of the Won Myunghoon incident, along with the harassment I'd endured from certain trash reporters, must have left a lasting mark. I was left with a bitter taste in my mouth.

"You must be pretty busy. I guess that makes sense. Then maybe next time…"

"No, I'm free now. Where should we meet?"

A little while later, the limousine gliding down the road changed course.

"You got here faster than I expected."

Park Jihoon was already outside waiting for me.

The weather was gradually turning toward winter. In his cashmere coat over a crisp white shirt, he looked completely different from me.

"What's with the outfit? Why are you so dressed up?"

"I have something important to take care of today. And let's get one thing straight. It's not that I'm dressed up—you're dressed down."

"Hey, what's wrong with what I'm wearing? Jeans and a sweatshirt are perfectly fine."

[1481] An officetel is a Korean mixed-use unit designed to function as both an office and a residence.

[1482] Hyung is a familiar term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend.

This was me making an effort, too. Hayeon had kept squawking at me to stop wearing tracksuits when so many people were watching.

“Where did all the money you earned go…? Oh, right. You donated it.”

“Don’t bring that up. It still hurts.”

“That’s why I called you. When something’s eating at you, alcohol is the best medicine.”

Park Jihoon grinned and jerked his chin toward the entrance, then started walking.

We passed a uniformed security guard and countless surveillance cameras installed throughout the grounds before finally making it inside.

The sight that greeted me left my mouth hanging open.

What the hell is this?

The marble floor glittered beneath the lights, while paintings that looked as though they had come straight out of the seventeenth century hung in frames along the walls.

I think I saw that one in an art textbook. There’s no way it’s genuine, right? Yeah. It can’t be.

I followed him, gawking like a country bumpkin.

We stopped in front of five elevators lined up side by side.

There weren’t even any buttons, so I had no idea what I was supposed to do. Then Jihoon placed his hand on a black panel, and an elevator descended in the blink of an eye with a mechanical whine.

Bzzzzing.

“What are you doing? Get in.”

“…Wow.”

“What are you so surprised about?”

“Nothing. I just thought you said this was an officetel.”[1483]

“It is. An officetel.”[1484]

“…”

The officetel[1485] he knew and the one I knew seemed to be two entirely different things. I swallowed the words before they could slip out.

Maybe it was because we were in Cheongdam-dong, but the place practically reeked of wealth from the entrance onward.

“You really made it. You even bought a place like this.”

“It came onto the market recently, so I bought it. I thought I could stop by now and then to clear my head.”

[1483] An officetel is a Korean mixed-use unit designed to function as both an office and a residence.
[1484] An officetel is a Korean mixed-use unit designed to function as both an office and a residence.
[1485] An officetel is a Korean mixed-use unit designed to function as both an office and a residence.

Anyone listening to him would think he'd bought a pair of shoes.

As I shook my head in disbelief, the elevator stopped and the doors opened. Instead of a cold, dark hallway, a living room decorated in shades of gray spread out before me.

I didn't know the exact square footage, but the living room alone was about the same size as our family home.

"Come in."

I had no idea whether he'd really bought the place just to clear his head, but one thing was certain: I'd never been anywhere like it.

The enormous lounge suite and wine cellar in the living room made it look as though someone had picked up an upscale bar and moved it inside.

Park Jihoon took off his coat and asked, "What do you want to drink?"

"What do you have?"

"Château Cheval Blanc, Screaming Eagle Cabernet Sauvignon, Royal de Maria…"

What the hell is he talking about?

I blinked at the stream of alien words.

"Chateau Shibal, what?"[1486]

"Château Cheval Blanc."

Whether it was château or shatto, every single name was impossibly complicated.

After a brief silence, I asked, "Don't you have any somaek?"[1487]

Park Jihoon let out a short laugh.

We stacked up a crate each of soju and beer and drank without pause.

It had been eleven years since we'd lost touch in our third year of middle school, so we had a mountain of things to talk about.

"Remember that guy No Jaehun from the class next door?"

"Who was No Jaehun?"

"The tall guy who used to brag about working out. Anyway, when he got into a fight with Seon Woongje from our class, you—"

"Wait. Who the hell is Seon Woongje?"

"…Do you have amnesia or something?"

We talked about everything from trivial memories of middle school to what we'd been doing since we lost touch.

The only time either of us stopped talking was to drink.

[1486] Shibal is a Korean profanity; here, Taekyung mishears the similar-sounding "Cheval."

[1487] Somaek is a drink made by mixing soju, a Korean distilled spirit, with beer.

At some point, I realized the corners of my mouth had been turned up for quite a while.

This is fun.

How could I put it? Drinking with someone you felt comfortable around was always enjoyable, but there was something a little more special about sharing a drink with a friend who shared the same memories.

The atmosphere was so warm and friendly that I felt like an idiot for having suspected him, even briefly, during our phone call.

I also learned a few things about him that I'd never known before.

"You were born with a silver spoon?"

"Silver spoon is a bit much. My father just runs a small business."

"A Hunter-related business that he's been running for more than thirty years?"

"Yeah."

"That makes you a silver-spoon kid, you deceitful bastard. Guys who talk like you always turn out to be the ones who are genuinely rich."

I looked at him.

It wasn't that he suddenly looked different now that I knew he was rich. I just found it fascinating.

The neighborhood where we'd lived back then had been perfectly ordinary. If it hadn't been, someone like me—whose school grades had been determined by rolling a mechanical pencil to guess the answers—would never have gotten in.

The Hunter industry, on the other hand, was practically a gold mine.

If his family had survived for thirty years amid such fierce competition, it wouldn't have been strange to find gold bars rolling around their house.

"Why are you looking at me like that?"

"It's just weird. Don't rich kids usually go to Gangnam's famous School District 8 or somewhere like that?"[1488]

"I guess I'm not a rich kid, then. Besides, I transferred in, remember?"

"You transferred? That's the first I've heard of it."

"Yeah. In our second year of middle school. There wasn't any reason to mention it."

"Wasn't there?"

"No."

I tilted my head and took another drink.

Then again, what did it matter that he'd transferred schools in middle school? It had happened more than ten years ago.

[1488] Gangnam's School District 8 refers to one of Seoul's most prestigious education districts, associated with affluent families and elite schools.

“We didn’t meet until our third year, anyway. We’d never crossed paths before then, so it makes sense that I wouldn’t know.”

“But we crossed paths plenty of times.”

“Huh?”

“A week after I transferred, I saw you for the first time in front of the teachers’ office. Then we ran into each other in the hallway. We crossed paths in the bathroom, too.”

Memories from more than ten years ago, already blurred into an indistinct mosaic, flowed from Park Jihoon’s lips.

“Wow… How do you remember all that?”

His perfectly smooth lips curved into a smile.

“I have a better memory than you’d think. Unlike some people.”

I topped off his empty glass and chuckled.

“Hey, my memory might be terrible, but there’s one thing I remember.”

“What?”

“You never did your homework. Every time we had a test, you guessed all the answers, put your head down, and went to sleep.”

“Oh, that.”

“If your memory was so good, why were your grades in memorization-heavy subjects so awful? Did you even go to college—ah, is that rude to ask?”

“What’s rude about it? I don’t care.”

“Then that’s a relief.”

“And I did go to college. Business Administration at Hankuk University. I awakened out of nowhere, so I still haven’t graduated.”

“Wait, where? Hankuk University?”

“My parents wanted me to go.”

“…You crazy bastard. Are there parents who don’t want their kid to get into Hankuk University?”

Hankuk University was the most prestigious university in the country. Only the brightest students from across Korea could get in.

Park Jihoon laughed lightly at my incredulous stare.

“When I actually tried, I got in. It wasn’t as hard as I expected.”

“Huh.”

How could I put it? The more I heard about his life, the more it sounded like a wide-open highway.

A wealthy family, a sharp mind, admission to the university everyone dreamed of, and then becoming an A-rank Awakened in one shot.

Unlike me, who’d been forced to provide for my family, becoming a Hunter had been just one of countless options available to him.

“Why?”

“Huh?”

“You were looking at me strangely.”

“Was it that obvious?”

“Very. Taekyung, are you perhaps…”

Park Jihoon propped his chin on one hand.

His alcohol-soaked voice continued in a low murmur.

“Are you jealous of me?”

Jealous?

The question was so unexpected that I stared blankly for a moment. Then I burst out laughing.

“Yeah. I guess that’s what it is.”

“…You’re honest.”

“It’s true. Longing for something I never had? Envy, maybe. Something like that. I don’t regret anything, though. I worked hard enough.”

Park Jihoon stared at me, his eyes widening slightly as though he hadn’t expected that answer.

“So you get jealous of people, too.”

“Hey, what am I, some kind of big shot?”

“You are. Look at yourself now. You’re a Hunter drawing attention from the foreign media as well as the domestic press. Before long, you might even become one of Korea’s five S-rank Hunters.”

“That sounds impressive—except I’m also the guy who made a donation and still trembles every time he thinks about the money.”

I let out a short laugh and emptied my glass. Park Jihoon gazed at me in silence, his lips parting as though he were about to say something.

That was when—

Bzzzt.

The smartphone on the table began to vibrate. Park Jihoon stared intently at the screen and licked his lips.

“Who is it?”

“My Guild Team Leader.”

“At this hour? Does the Myeongdong Guild have some kind of twenty-four-hour standby team?”

“Nothing like that. It’s about something important.”

“Then…”

“Sorry, but I think we’ll have to call it a night.”

“Don’t apologize. It’s not like we don’t understand each other’s circumstances.”

I set down my glass and stood. Then I gave Park Jihoon, who was looking at me apologetically, a light tap on the shoulder.

I had a good time tonight.

I meant it. Now that I had become famous in the modern world, there weren't many people left with whom I could have an ulterior-motive-free conversation like this.

I stopped him when he tried to follow me into the elevator.

"I'm heading out. Don't bother coming down just to see me off. Take care of your problem."

A faint smile touched Park Jihoon's lips.

"Okay. Let's meet again. Definitely."

With those final words, the elevator doors closed.

Park Jihoon stood before the window and looked down.

A lone figure was leaving the officetel[1489] entrance below, swallowed by the darkness.

"Hello? Mr. Jihoon? Mr. Jihoon?"

"Go ahead."

"Ah, we finally connected. You were listening, so why didn't you say anything…?"

"I think you've misunderstood something, Team Leader."

The other person's breathing faltered at the dry voice.

Park Jihoon lifted a crystal tumbler to his lips. Instead of the somaek[1490] he'd been drinking moments ago, amber whiskey rippled inside.

"From now on, wait until I speak. And stop trying to play boss with me."

Park Jihoon, Hunter of Team 1 in the Myeongdong Guild.

That was the affiliation printed on his business card.

But the Team Leader of Team 1 in the Myeongdong Guild remained silent on the other end of the phone.

They both knew the truth. That title was nothing more than a hollow position.

"You're not answering."

"…Understood."

"So what is it? This important report of yours?"

The Team Leader of Team 1 answered carefully.

"You know Team Leader Jung Hyunwoo, right? The one in charge of Team 8."

[1489] An officetel is a Korean mixed-use unit designed to function as both an office and a residence.

[1490] Somaek is a drink made by mixing soju, a Korean distilled spirit, with beer.

"Of course. He's skilled, but his flexibility isn't even half as impressive as his ability. That's the problem."

"It seems he's caught the scent."

"Really? He's more perceptive than I expected."

"Yes. But I wasn't sure how we should handle it…"

"What is there to think about? Schedule a raid for the earliest possible date. An A-rank one."

"You mean…"

"Team Leader, do you know how many Gate accidents happen every year? I don't. Neither does anyone else. Nobody cares."

"…"

Park Jihoon clicked his tongue.

"You're not answering again."

"Ah. Understood."

"And regarding the Peace Guild—or rather, the Jin Taekyung matter…"

Park Jihoon trailed off.

The face of the man who had smiled and tapped him on the shoulder came to mind.

I had a good time tonight.

It had been a sincere statement.

That only made Park Jihoon even less willing to stop.

"Mr. Jihoon?"

Park Jihoon tossed back the rest of his whiskey.

The crystal tumbler crumpled in his hand like a sheet of paper.

"I finished speaking with the higher-ups today. They find him irritating."

That was all. A single passing remark over dinner with that person. The matter had been as good as settled from that moment on.

"What? But this isn't really the right time for something like that…"

Park Jihoon's cold voice cut off the Team Leader's startled protest.

"Isn't it only natural for a gardener to pull weeds from the lawn? Your Guild Master has probably already heard the news. I'm hanging up."

Click.

The call ended.

In the silence that followed, Park Jihoon stared through the spotless window at the view outside.

Jin Taekyung was long gone.

Chapter 273

“Good morning!”

“Good morning!”

I felt like a mob boss. Every time I took a step, rookie Guild members bowed ninety degrees and greeted me from every direction.

They were fresh out of training camp, still wet behind the ears. In terms of years on the job, I was certainly their senior by a wide margin.

This industry does take seniority and junior status pretty seriously.

The problem was that some of the rookie Guild members were late-blooming Hunters older than me.

“It’s an honor to meet you!”

A rookie who looked well into his mid-thirties bowed, his eyes sparkling.

Then I saw the top of his head shining even brighter, and my heart ached.

“Right. Good luck…”

“Thank you!”

“Thank you!”

What are you, an echo?

And I wasn’t talking to you guys. You thick-haired bastards.

I clicked my tongue inwardly as I studied the rookies, then stopped when my gaze reached one young man.

That one might actually be useful.

He was the most promising of the new recruits. His aura was impressive, and every movement he made was as controlled as a martial artist’s.

Noticing my gaze, the young man grinned.

“Good morning, Senior.”

He was definitely different. Unlike the other rookies, he wasn’t nervous or obsequious.

In my experience, guys like him fell into one of two categories.

Either they had absolutely nothing to back up their pride, or they were confident in their own abilities.

The guy in front of me belonged to the latter.

“You there. What’s your name?”

“My name is Kim Jinsoo. I graduated at the top of the training camp’s B-rank course. I was also the first person to destroy a Golem’s core during this raid.”

“Really?”

“Yes. It was my first A-rank Gate, but it wasn’t as difficult as I expected.”

What an interesting guy.

He had no hesitation about gilding his own face. He was the type who would always make sure he got his share wherever he went.

When I stared at him, Kim Jinsoo gave me an easygoing smile.

“And you don’t need to speak so formally with me, Senior.”

“We just met. I’ll speak casually once we know each other better. The same goes for everyone else, so I’d appreciate it if you skipped the loud greetings from now on.”

“Yes!”

“I’ll keep that in mind, Senior!”

“…”

He hadn’t listened to a word I said.

The deafening noise echoed through the hallway, and the office door at the far end slowly opened.

A crisp white dress shirt and neatly pressed black slacks. There was only one Hunter in our Guild who came to work dressed like that.

“You’re all lively this morning.”

“Too lively, if you ask me.”

Like a scene from a commercial, Team Leader Choi held a coffee cup and jerked his chin toward the office.

“Come in and have some coffee. Let’s calm things down.”

The office was spacious and comfortable. Perhaps because it had been decorated to suit Team Leader Choi’s tastes, expensive furniture stood everywhere, and a silver nameplate sat on the desk.

Team Leader Choi Minwoo

Even the nameplate looks expensive.

Moving the Guild House and recruiting all those new Guild members must have cost a fortune. Apparently, it was true that the Peace Guild had extracted an astronomical settlement from the Star Guild, where Won Myunghoon had been Guild Master.

As I admired the nameplate, a cup of black coffee suddenly appeared in front of me.

Team Leader Choi followed my gaze.

“Would you like me to have one made for you? A nameplate.”

“I’m fine. I don’t have a position to put on it.”

“We can always create one. General Team Leader. Division Head. Whatever you want.”

“Anything?”

"Yes."

"Then I'll keep it modest. Guild Master."

"…"

"I'm joking. If I became Guild Master, I'd run the Guild into the ground."

Besides, even if I did become Guild Master, I'd obviously be nothing but a mascot—a puppet Guild Master. What would be the point?

I accepted the coffee and sat on the sofa. More than twenty newspapers were stacked on the glass table.

They ranged from major domestic dailies to foreign newspapers filled with writing I couldn't even begin to decipher. Just looking at them made my eyes spin.

"You actually read all of these?"

"I read them to keep track of overseas developments and collect industry information. It's nothing special. Knowing around five languages is enough to read them."

"…"

That was extremely special. Five languages? What kind of life had this man led?

Shaking my head in amazement, I glanced at one of the open newspapers.

A clear color photograph of a man who looked to be in his thirties caught my eye, along with several headlines in bold print.

- The Late Hunter Jung Hyunwoo (pictured)
- Accidents Continue: Gates Remain Deadly Even for A-Rank Hunters
- Myeongdong Guild Expresses Regret over Unexpected Death…

It looked like there had been another accident.

The Myeongdong Guild? That's Jihoon's Guild.

Just as I was about to take a closer look, Team Leader Choi elegantly tilted his coffee cup and continued.

"The Peace Guild will continue to grow. We've already recruited twenty B-rank Hunters and thirty C-rank or lower Hunters. That kind of growth is unprecedented in Korea's long-stagnant market."

Just as he said, the Peace Guild was growing at a terrifying rate.

Only about four months had passed since the Guild was founded, but if we maintained this momentum, we could easily call ourselves a mid-sized Guild.

Of course, we still have far fewer Hunters than other mid-sized Guilds.

That was because we hadn't recruited more yet, not because we couldn't.

The Guild website had already gone down from excessive traffic. I'd heard that hundreds of job inquiries poured in every day.

"And I played a major role in that. I'm the number one contributor."

"That's true."

Team Leader Choi continued smoothly.

“It is true, but I’m not giving you a bonus.”

“…You’re quick to catch on.”

I’d tested the waters just in case, but he hadn’t taken the bait.

As he watched me silently smack my lips, Team Leader Choi smiled.

“However, I’ll consider it favorably if you do me one favor.”

“What favor?”

“I’d like you to take charge of the rookie Guild members for a while.”

“…The rookies?”

“Yes. We were very selective when we recruited them, and they’re all talented, but they’re still rough around the edges.”

“Of course they are. They’re beginners.”

No matter how much training someone went through, a real battle felt completely different from the training camp.

There was a reason people said a lower-rank Hunter with ten years of experience was better than a higher-rank Hunter fresh out of training camp.

“But why ask me? There are other people here.”

“I already spoke to Butler Kim and Song-i this morning. I suggested that we take turns teaching the rookies.”

“What did they say?”

“They agreed. Gladly, without the slightest hesitation.”

“…What about Uncle Kkeokjeong?”

“I haven’t been able to ask him yet. It’s long past his usual arrival time, and he isn’t answering his phone.”

Team Leader Choi checked the time and continued.

“Wouldn’t it be a good idea? The rookie Guild members are hoping that Mr. Jin Taekyung will teach them, too. Most of them applied to our Guild because of you.”

“I appreciate the flattery, but…”

I scratched the back of my head.

Dark Heaven had revealed its fangs in Murim, and Jeok Cheongang was still unconscious.

Even if I spent thirty days in the modern world, only three hours would pass in Murim. I had time to spare, but with A-rank Gates to clear, teaching a bunch of greenhorns wasn’t exactly the most rewarding use of it.

If I was going to spend that time on something else, I’d be a hundred times better off with my family.

“Leave me out of it. From the Guild’s perspective, wouldn’t it be more efficient for me to clear another A-rank Gate instead of teaching those guys?”

“More efficient…”

“Yes. Efficiency.”

“Then I suppose it can’t be helped.”

A sinister smile curled Team Leader Choi’s lips.

“I’ll be counting on you with our rookie Guild members.”

“What?”

“All the A-rank Gates are booked solid. You won’t get into one for at least a week.”

“Don’t lie to me! You scam artist!”

“If you don’t believe me, see for yourself.”

I snatched the paper Team Leader Choi held out. It was densely packed with the reservation schedules for A-rank Gates across the country.

Damn it. He was telling the truth.

“I’ll give you a two-hundred-percent performance bonus this month. You get to go on raids and teach your juniors. How wholesome.”

“…”

“Or you can stay home and do nothing.”

The corners of Team Leader Choi’s mouth rose in an infuriating smile.

I was just about to shout, I’m not doing it!, when a System notification rang.

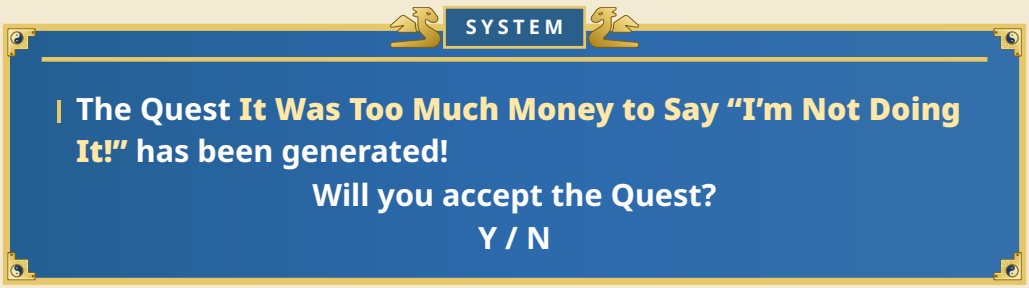
Ding.

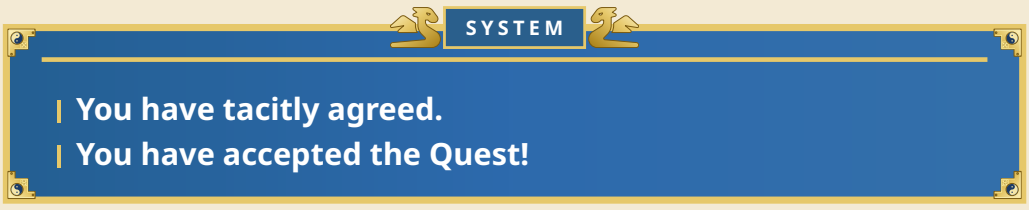


“What do you say?”

“…”

“I’ll take that as a yes and get the rookies ready. I’ve already reserved several B-rank Gates.”

Ding.



Goddamn it.

—Grrrrr.

The monsters' harsh breathing closed in from every direction. Twenty pairs of anxious eyes swept their surroundings.

Huff. Huff.

Their breathing grew ragged, and their hands turned white around their shields and weapons.

Perched on a branch high above the ground, I watched the scene unfold.

My face was expressionless, but my mind was occupied by a serious dilemma.

What should I have for dinner?

Galbi,[1491] or whole boiled duck for the first time in ages?

Both were too good to pass up…

"Hold the line!"

"What are the damage dealers doing? Damage dealers!"

The shrill screams drew my attention back to the chaos below.

More than a dozen Lycanthropes were charging the shield wall and hammering against it. The pale-faced tanks were being driven steadily backward.

Of course they're getting pushed back. They're trying to overpower the monsters head-on.

It wasn't entirely the tanks' fault, though. The damage dealers were so flustered that they weren't doing their jobs, either.

If they had launched suppressive attacks at the right moments, this situation would never have happened.

I'd warned them several times before the raid began, but they were still making the same mistakes.

That line is about to break.

The moment I thought it, the shield wall collapsed amid a chorus of screams.

A gap opened in an instant. One of the most agile-looking Lycanthropes charged through with a characteristic roar.

Its bright yellow predator's eyes fixed on the healers sheltering behind the shield wall.

—Graaaargh!

—Awoooooo!

To me, it sounded no different from a dog barking, but these rookie Hunters, who were only beginning their second raid, were terrified.

"Aaaah!"

"Eeeek!"

The mage and healer's screams shook the dark forest.

[1491] Galbi means ribs in Korean; as a dish, it commonly refers to grilled beef or pork ribs.

It's already noisy enough. Those screams are going to draw another twenty or so over here.

I memorized the faces of the two people who had screamed.

From now on, their nickname is the Pied Pipers.

"Senior! Senior Jin Taekyung!"

"Please help us, Senior!"

Several round faces looked up at me and cried out desperately.

The front line had already collapsed, and the rookies had nothing behind them but an enormous boulder.

The Lycanthropes closed in triumphantly, tightening their encirclement.

How did the monsters end up being better at forming ranks than they are?

I rubbed the sleep from the corner of my eye and answered.

"I told you. If I help, your skills won't improve."

"We don't care if they improve!"

"Well, I do. You know what happens if you make a habit of getting help? You'll make a habit of shitting the bed during raids, too."

"We still don't want to die like this!"

"But… nobody wants to die, you know?"

"Please help us!"

"Don't give up. Keep fighting. You can do it!"

"Please save us!"

"By the way, what should I have for dinner—galbi[1492] or boiled duck?"

"Hey, you fucking bastard!"

It was the balding rookie from that morning. The admiring light that had shone as brightly as his crown was gone, replaced by a gaze full of fury.

"Get down here, you young bastard…"

Thud!

A tank came flying in from somewhere and crashed into him, sending them both sailing into the distance.

The momentum had effectively shifted to the monsters. I was wondering whether it was time to step in when—

Shhk!

—Kauuugh…

A flash of light streaked through the air, and one of the Lycanthropes groaned. Blood gushed from its gaping throat before it crumpled to the ground.

The young man who had landed the precise, powerful strike shouted at the top of his lungs.

[1492] Galbi means ribs in Korean; as a dish, it commonly refers to grilled beef or pork ribs.

“Formation Three!”

His booming voice snapped the others back to their senses one by one.

Soon, the twenty Hunters had re-formed their ranks and begun advancing slowly.

At their head stood Kim Jinsoo.

“Keep pushing! Archers, get your skills ready!”

That kid has potential.

I let out a quiet laugh and jumped down from the tree. Then I swung my spear at the dozens of Lycanthropes drawn by the sound of battle.

Whoooosh!

“You did well.”

“Thank you, Senior!”

Kim Jinsoo grinned and bowed. Behind him, I saw three people with their heads pressed into the ground.

Two were the Pied Pipers, and the other was the balding rookie.

I’d given the balding rookie the special privilege of holding the push-up position.

I had to help him protect what little hair he had left…

“Keep it up next time. You’ll improve quickly.”

“Yes. I won’t disappoint you, Senior.”

“Then go get some rest, Jinsoo. We have another raid in two hours.”

Team Leader Choi had really gone all out. He’d scheduled three raids in a single day.

I was grinding my teeth inwardly when the phone in my pocket began to vibrate.

Designer-Brand Junkie

What was this? Had we developed telepathy?

Still baffled, I answered the call. Team Leader Choi’s urgent voice struck my ear.

“Taekyung. Come to the hospital in Ilsan right now!”

Hospital?

Chapter 274

Hospital? Why so suddenly?

I was just about to ask what had happened when the call ended amid the sound of hurried footsteps.

I tried calling back two or three times, but it was no use.

—The number you have dialed cannot be reached. After the beep, you will be connected to voicemail…

I hung up when the automated message began repeating. Unease crept into my chest.

This was a first. Team Leader Choi was always calm, but he had sounded frantic.

Could it be…?

No. Don’t jump to conclusions already.

This wasn’t the time to think. It was time to move.

Ilsan Hospital. He said Ilsan Hospital.

I grabbed my things and left the changing room. The rookies waiting outside turned their heads when I appeared.

Kim Jinsoo, who had been chatting animatedly in the middle of the group, sprang to his feet.

“Ah, Senior. Are we leaving right away?”

“No. Something urgent has come up.”

The timing could have been worse. There were two hours until the next raid, and thankfully, the next Gate was nearby. It wouldn’t take long to get there.

“Mr. Kim Jinsoo.”

“Yes.”

“You’re the acting team leader for the next two hours.”

“What?”

“Take the others to the next Gate. And don’t start the raid under any circumstances until I get there.”

Kim Jinsoo nodded, looking dazed. I gave him a light tap on the shoulder, then hurried out of the building.

I climbed into a taxi waiting for a passenger, told the driver where to go, and immediately started making calls.

Pick up. Please pick up.

Ring. Ring.

The longer the phone rang, the more anxious I became.

Just as I was about to hang up and try again—

Click.

"Hey, son."

"What? Is that my brother?"

"Be quiet. Don't play with the phone while you're eating."

"Seriously? Is what Mom's holding a brick instead of a phone?"

"You little brat!"

"Whew."

Thank God. It wasn't them.

The tension left me all at once when I heard my family's voices on the other end of the line.

Mom asked what was going on, so I gave her a vague excuse and hung up.

Then it must be a problem with the Guild.

Who was in trouble?

If Team Leader Choi wasn't answering, Butler Kim would have the clearest picture of the situation.

But then someone else's face flashed through my mind—how quiet he had become lately, and the heavy expression he'd been wearing.

Uncle Kkeokjeong.

My guess was right.

When I called the number saved in my phone, I was greeted not by Im Kkeokjeong's gruff voice, but by a cold automated message.

—The phone is turned off. After the beep…

I raced to the hospital. Song Song, who had apparently been contacted in advance, was waiting outside with an anxious look on her face.

"You're here?"

"Tell me while we walk."

The hospital's distinctive smell hit me as soon as we passed through the revolving doors.

Civilians, Hunters, hospital staff—the place was packed. We pushed our way through the crowd.

A few people who recognized me pulled out their phones and started taking pictures.

"Hey, hey. Look over there."

"That's Jin Taekyung."

"Jin Taekyung? Lord Fuck?"[1493]

"Wow, he looks incredible in person."

[1493] Lord Fuck is an online nickname coined after Taekyung's accidental profanity was broadcast.

I forced down the stress surging inside me.

As the crowd parted before us like the Red Sea, I whispered to Song Song.

“What happened?”

“I don’t know all the details, either…”

“Just tell me what you do know.”

She bit her lip.

“He seemed to have a lot on his mind lately.”

“On his mind?”

“You know how things are. The Guild keeps growing, and talented young rookies keep joining…”

“That’s enough. I get it.”

Im Kkeokjeong had been with the Peace Guild since its earliest days. But he was also the only D-rank Hunter among us.

Once the Peace Guild began drawing media attention because of me, people had started talking about him, too.

They called him the Guild’s only weak link. Some even left hateful comments telling him to quit instead of trying to ride our coattails.

Im Kkeokjeong had laughed heartily and stopped the rest of us from getting angry over it.

But…

“Whew.”

My chest felt tight.

I had promised myself that I would always look after my people, yet I had failed to pay enough attention to someone so close to me.

“So what happened after yesterday’s raid?”

“Apparently, he went out drinking alone and got into an argument.”

“Go on.”

“I heard he was completely drunk when the fight started… He was badly injured.”

My heart dropped.

Strangers could run their mouths about him being a low-rank Hunter or whatever else they wanted, but Im Kkeokjeong was a D-rank Hunter with twenty years of experience.

Even ten grown men attacking at once wouldn’t be able to bring him down.

“So the other side were Hunters.”

Song Song gave a small nod.

“How badly was he hurt? Is it serious?”

“His treatment is finished for now, but…”

Unable to continue, Song Song hesitated and came to a stop.

A sign reading Special Treatment Ward swayed above her head.

This wasn't a ward where doctors treated patients. It was staffed by practitioners known as healers.

That alone showed how severe his injuries were.

"You'd better see for yourself."

The words left Song Song like a sigh as she slid open the hospital-room door.

Rattle.

A harsh medicinal smell washed over me, and I saw three people pacing around the bed.

Team Leader Choi. Butler Kim. And a middle-aged woman I assumed was Im Kkeokjeong's wife.

My heart pounded as I approached the bed.

"…Uncle?"

Hhhk. Hhk.

Only faint, ragged breathing answered me. Im Kkeokjeong lay beneath the stark white sheets with an oxygen mask over his face.

And then…

The hairy arm he always wrapped around me in a crushing hug had been cleanly severed below the elbow.

The silence stretched on.

Even after leaving the hospital room and climbing to the rooftop, I couldn't figure out what I should say first.

I listened quietly as Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim explained what had happened. At last, I opened my mouth.

"Where are those bastards now?"

Everyone there knew exactly who I meant.

Team Leader Choi's lips moved. Then he silently shook his head.

No way.

"You didn't catch them?"

"No. All three fled the scene."

"What about the CCTV footage? They were drinking at a store. Their faces should have been recorded."

"The investigators have already examined it. They have the results."

Security cameras these days offered practically the same image quality as regular cameras. If the bastards' faces had been captured clearly, catching them should only be a matter of time.

Hunters and Awakened people were few enough in number to make them easy to track down.

“Then that’s fine. We’ll find those bastards right away and—”

“They say their identities are unknown.”

“What?”

Had I heard him wrong?

When I stared at him in confusion, Team Leader Choi continued with a sigh.

“Their identities are unknown. Apparently, they aren’t any Awakened or Hunters registered as existing in this country.”

“…Could they be ethnic Koreans from China? Or Chinese or Japanese?”

“No. According to the witnesses, the suspects were definitely Korean. They were also the ones who started the argument.”

“Then what the hell is going on…?”

Butler Kim, who had been silently listening to my conversation with Team Leader Choi, suddenly spoke.

“They may be Black Hunters.”

Black Hunters?

Even the name sounded filthy. Butler Kim continued in a low voice.

“Not every Awakened person is registered with the Gate Management Agency and the Association.”

So that was what this unfamiliar term meant?

I rubbed my throbbing temple.

“Aren’t those just unregistered Awakened people?”

In modern society, Awakened people were both powerful shields against Gates and dangerous blades that had to be handled with care.

Even the lowest-rank Hunter possessed strength far beyond that of an average person.

That was why Awakened people were always kept under strict supervision.

Even if they had no intention of becoming Hunters, their names were still placed on the list of Awakened people.

The only way off that list was to die.

An unregistered Awakened person was someone who had failed to register with the Association within the designated period.

Of course, they were sometimes called something else.

Madman.

There was a reason unregistered Awakened people were treated like lunatics.

If they didn’t voluntarily report their Awakening within a month, they stopped being Awakened people and became inmates instead.

To hell with suspended sentences or any other bullshit. They were thrown straight into a prison for Awakened criminals, and when they got out, they even received an electronic ankle monitor as a free gift.

Who would be insane enough to gamble their entire life like that?

“Are there still lunatics like that these days?”

“There always have been, and there still are. Why else do you think crime continues to exist?”

“So the people who attacked Uncle Kkeokjeong were unregistered Awakened people. Then how do we find them…?”

Butler Kim gently cut me off.

“They’re Black Hunters.”

“Yes. In other words, unregistered Awakened people.”

“They’re different.”

“Hunter Jin Taekyung, what do you think is the greatest difference between an Awakened person and a Hunter?”

The question came out of nowhere. I felt like we were going around in circles.

If the person asking hadn’t been Butler Kim, I might have said something.

Suppressing the anger boiling inside me, I answered.

“Training. Just because someone owns a gun doesn’t make them a hunter.”

“The same distinction applies to unregistered Awakened people and Black Hunters.”

“So what you’re saying is…”

Butler Kim nodded.

“Exactly. An unregistered Awakened person who has received the same systematic training as a Hunter. That is a Black Hunter.”

For a moment, my mind went blank.

It was a very simple concept when you thought about it, but I had never considered it before.

And for good reason.

“How is that possible?”

Unregistered Awakened people were felons. Where would they get weapons, and who would provide them with systematic training?

“Are criminal organizations training Black Hunters or something?”

“Criminal organizations… That’s half right and half wrong.”

“Then what is it?”

The answer burst tersely from Team Leader Choi’s mouth.

“Guilds.”

"…What?"

"Money gathers wherever people gather. And wherever money piles up, conflict inevitably follows. Do you really believe today's Guilds exist purely to protect the world from the monsters inside Gates?"

I couldn't answer.

I hadn't become a Hunter to protect the world, either.

The Great Cataclysm was already a thing of the past. When people thought of Hunters, they no longer imagined noble duty or a spirit of self-sacrifice.

They envied the money and fame Hunters possessed, and the people who grew up watching that became Hunters themselves.

Guilds were nothing more than collections of those Hunters.

"Do you know the country's corporate rankings? From first to tenth place? On the surface, they're all private companies, but in reality, they're little more than puppets of massive Guilds. Things aren't much different overseas."

Team Leader Choi let out a cold laugh.

Only then did I finally begin to recover from the shock.

"Is… is all of that really true?"

"You once asked me why I left Ares Guild."

Team Leader Choi said nothing more, but I understood what he meant.

They were all pieces of shit in the same cesspool.

To them, Black Hunters were like daggers concealed up their sleeves. No one knew they existed.

No, they might know and simply pretend not to.

While I was still reeling, another unanswered question came to mind.

"Fine. Let's say all of that is true."

I took a deep breath, cooling my head.

"But why did those Black Hunters specifically target Uncle Kkeokjeong? Why go this far just to keep a Guild so far beneath them in check?"

"Taekyung."

Team Leader Choi cut me off and licked his parched lips.

There was something strange in his eyes. He was looking at me as if I were a greenhorn.

It felt as though I had gone back to the day I first became a Hunter.

"You're naive."

Before I could answer, he continued.

"This place is crawling with monsters. It's the kind of place where one bothersome person—or even an entire Guild—can simply be erased. Get rid of that half-baked common sense."

That cold sentence pierced my chest.

Chapter 275

You're naive.

That one sentence I'd heard the day before wouldn't leave my mind.

I sat in the caregiver's chair beside the bed, staring blankly at the humidifier spraying mist. Then a thought suddenly occurred to me, and I said it aloud.

"No. It wasn't naivety."

Murim was a world that lived up to the phrase a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords.

Bloodshed was commonplace, and death was part of daily life. Might made right, and whoever survived was the winner.

Whenever I witnessed Murim's cruelty, I thought of the modern world.

An organized welfare system and laws. People's sense of ethics. A civilization incomparably more advanced than Murim.

But I had been wrong.

"It wasn't that I was naive. I was just stupid."

Murim people wore swords at their waists, but modern people hid daggers up their sleeves.

Monsters weren't confined to Gates. They existed outside them, too.

People wrapped in expensive clothes and wholesome public images who ruled over the concrete jungle. The moment those bastards began drawing the daggers hidden in their sleeves, they revealed themselves as the monsters outside the Gates.

Like Won Myunghoon.

I'd been too soft in my thinking. Even though I knew the world was unfair and fucked-up, I hadn't been able to let go of my complacency.

This is the modern world. A democratic society in the twenty-first century.

There might be a vicious struggle to prove one's abilities, but I'd believed something like this could never happen here.

And this is what that got me.

I stared at Im Kkeokjeong sleeping on the bed. Both arms, severed below the elbows, had been treated with recovery magic from a high-ranking healer and advanced potions.

He probably wouldn't have much trouble with daily life, but there was no guarantee he could return as a Hunter. Potions weren't a cure-all.

Which bastard was behind this?

Various thoughts swam through my cold mind.

Who had sent the Black Hunter, and why? What were they after?

Cutting off Im Kkeokjeong's arms could have been a warning to stop here. Or it could have been the opening shot.

I'll find out what they meant soon enough.

Until then, I had no intention of sitting around and waiting.

Neither did Team Leader Choi.

"Get some rest, Uncle."

I had just pulled the rumpled blanket over Im Kkeokjeong when—

Bzzzz.

A vibration broke the silence, and my smartphone lit up the darkness.

A short text message from Team Leader Choi.

> Team Leader Choi: Come to the Guild House.

I left the hospital as soon as I read the message. It was the dead of night, and two people were waiting for me at the Guild House after everyone else had gone home.

"Ah, Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"Welcome."

Team Leader Choi and Song Song.

Butler Kim, whom I'd naturally expected to be there, was nowhere to be seen.

Team Leader Choi noticed my gaze and spoke first.

"He stepped out for a moment."

"Really?"

It was unusual for Butler Kim to leave Team Leader Choi's side when he usually followed him like a shadow, but that wasn't important right now.

I got straight to the point.

"What happened?"

"I should offer you a cup of coffee before I explain, but… take a look at this first."

Instead of a coffee cup, Team Leader Choi held out his smartphone. The screen displayed the country's largest online portal.

His long finger tapped an internet article, and a stream of articles divided into different categories appeared.

Among them, I skimmed the article at the very top.

> [The Judiciary Bows Before the Fame the Public Has Created. Where Is the Fairness?]

> [United Party Supreme Council Member Assemblywoman Yoon Seoyoon: “A Death Brought About by One Individual’s Rash Actions. Won Myunghoon Should Have Faced the Judgment of the Law.” Strong Condemnation…]
>
> [Self-Defense or Murder?]

The articles dominated the politics and society sections. They didn’t mention my name, but it was obvious who they were talking about.

“When was this posted?”

“An hour ago. And it already has over a hundred thousand views and more than five thousand comments.”

“An hour ago? That would’ve been around four in the morning.”

“Apparently, netizens are more diligent than we thought. Or perhaps I should say the paid commenters are.”

“Interesting.”

Team Leader Choi took a sip of coffee that had gone as cold as the smile on my lips.

“There’s an even more interesting article.”

“More interesting than this?”

“Scroll down a little. It’ll be more than you expected, Taekyung.”

He was right. My finger stopped moving before I realized it.

I stared silently at the bold headline.

> [Exclusive Preview of Interview with Former Colleague K: “Famous Hunter J Is a Vile Human Being.”]

When I tapped the article, a preview video of an interview lasting just over three minutes appeared. After a fifteen-second advertisement for a cosmetics brand, the screen filled with the image of a potbellied man in a sharp suit.

His face had been lightly pixelated, but I recognized him at a glance.

“Ha.”

The moment I realized who the middle-aged man—or rather, “former colleague K”—was, a hollow laugh escaped me.

That face was all too familiar. Someone I’d thought I would never see again was right there on the screen.

“I didn’t expect to see him again like this.”

Song Song, looking at the phone over my shoulder, asked, “You really know him?”

“Of course. How could I not?”

“If things were bad enough for him to give this shitty interview, you obviously didn’t get along.”

“No.”

"Then were you close?"

"It's not that…"

What word could describe the relationship between that man and me? I thought about it for a moment before answering.

"It was fucking awful."

"Oh."

No matter how I thought about it, those words fit perfectly.

Our relationship had been that terrible. Considering everything we had been through together, it was almost strange that we had never crossed blades.

I stared at the face that had somehow grown even fatter since the last time I'd seen him.

Mr. Common Sense. Long time no see.

Kim Sangshik, Team Leader of the Sopung Guild.

Back when I was an F-Grade Hunter, he had been the one who goaded the Guild Master into firing me.

The last time I'd seen him was when I ran into him at the Association while getting my Grade reassessed. And now, here he was again.

I heard he got fired from the Guild afterward.

Kim Sangshik was short on ability and overflowing with greed. Despite his name, he was short on common sense, too. He'd gone around doing every idiotic thing imaginable until the Guild finally fired him.

He was the very definition of a petty little man, so there was no doubt he'd been grinding his teeth at the thought of me ever since.

That was probably why he had even filmed an interview like this.

Let's hear what kind of bullshit he's spouting.

Right on cue, the reporter began asking questions.

"I hear you have something to say about the recently famous Hunter J. First, is it true that you were his former colleague?"

Kim Sangshik nodded with an uncharacteristically serious expression.

"That is absolutely true. I was Jin Tae… No, I was J's direct supervisor."

"More specifically?"

"He was on my team. I became team leader after the Gate accident two years ago. I was also the one who informed J of his dismissal this summer."

"Oh dear. Was there a reason?"

"There wasn't just one reason."

Kim Sangshik then launched into an indignant tirade about why he had fired me.

Every single excuse was a gem of bullshit, but his final exchange with the reporter was the crowning touch.

"I was falsely accused of employment corruption and driven out of the Guild where I had worked for more than twenty years. But I did not fire J for personal gain."

"Are you saying there was another reason?"

"Yes."

There had been a reason they had released only a three-minute preview. Kim Sangshik ended it with the solemn expression of a martyr for the nation.

"During the mutated Gate accident two years ago, J threw his teammates to the monsters as prey and fled. He is the kind of man who won't hesitate to do any ugly and dirty thing to survive…"

I couldn't properly hear what came after that.

Even after the video ended with a caption promising that the full interview would be released soon, I continued staring silently at the screen.

As if Kim Sangshik might leap out of it if I stared long enough.

Team Leader Choi broke the heavy silence.

"What did you think?"

Ah, what did I think?

Well. I felt like I'd been clubbed in the back of the head, but part of me wanted to laugh. At the same time, something was boiling in my gut.

"Very interesting. Just like you said, Team Leader."

"I laughed when I first saw it, too. I have a rough idea of what K—or rather, Kim Sangshik—is like. The problem is…"

"The public won't find it very funny."

"Exactly."

The comments section was already on the verge of exploding.

There were more than ten thousand comments now, and I didn't need to read them all. The most upvoted comment caught my eye.

> ㄴ (Best comment): I knew it. I heard it through the grapevine and thought, No way, but I always had a feeling this would blow up someday.

What vine? And what the hell is supposed to blow up?

I didn't know what kind of asshole had written it, but it was a relief he wasn't standing in front of me.

If he had been, I would have made sure that at the very least, he heard the next rumor from the overpass to the Yellow Springs.[1494]

"Well, I don't think there's any need to read more."

[1494] The Yellow Springs is a traditional East Asian name for the realm of the dead.

I closed the comments with a hollow laugh.

Team Leader Choi took back his smartphone, loosely folded his arms, and spoke.

“This is organized. It’s clear now that they planned to send the Black Hunter from the very beginning.”

“And they’re the ones creating the hostile public opinion, too.”

“That’s how people are. Once someone starts muddying the waters in earnest, it’s hard to keep your bearings.”

“And I doubt there will be even a single line in the news about Uncle Kkeokjeong being attacked in the middle of all this.”

“You understand the situation well.”

“If I didn’t, I’d be a fucking idiot. Has the investigation team handling the case said anything?”

Team Leader Choi shook his head slightly.

“Don’t tell me they’re in on it, too.”

“There seems to be outside pressure. The CCTV footage is in the other side’s hands, too.”

“Didn’t you say there were witnesses?”

“We’ve lost contact with all three.”

That’s just fantastic.

My fist clenched without me realizing it, and my knuckles cracked.

“They’re really coming at us with a plan.”

“They seem intent on isolating you completely. The interview with Mr. Kim Sangshik is part of that.”

We weren’t dealing with some Third Rate media company that made its money selling gossip.

This was one of the country’s ten largest media outlets.

They would wrap even the most ludicrous bullshit in glossy packaging and present it as credible. Then they would use money and power to lend it even more weight.

For example… testimony from people who knew me well.

“Looks like I’ll get to see my old coworkers again. Though I guess they’ll be hard to recognize once their faces are pixelated.”

I asked Team Leader Choi, who was looking at me with an unreadable expression,

“Why are you looking at me like that?”

“As I recall, Jin Taekyung had a good reputation within the Sopung Guild.”

“I got along with everyone. It was such a dinky little Guild.”

“Then why did you think that?”

“Because there’s one thing that works on everyone. This. And this.”

I brought my thumb and index finger together and wiggled them.

In the end, it all came down to cash. Money was everything.

And for Hunters who risked their lives to make money, the temptation would be even stronger.

“Maybe it’s because I’ve been stabbed in the back so many times in a row, but… these are people I spent seven years laughing and joking around with, and I still can’t trust them.”

If this had happened a few days ago, I might have naively believed in my old coworkers.

But not anymore. The world where dreams, friendship, and common sense meant anything had already vanished from my mind.

“Looking at how the article made it into the politics and society section, it seems like they greased some lawmaker’s palm, too. You think they couldn’t buy off a few low-Grade Hunters who are struggling to make ends meet?”

“…”

“It’s obvious. I’ll become the worst bastard alive and get carved up all over the internet. The image I’ve built up until now will come crashing down, and our Guild will come crashing down with it.”

Team Leader Choi, who had been wearing that strange expression the entire time, let out a quiet laugh.

“You’ve improved a little. You can think like a jaded adult now.”

“Are you taking back what you said yesterday about me being naive?”

“I’ll decide after I see what you do from here.”

“What?”

“We can’t just stand by and let them do this to us.”

As he spoke, he tapped his smartphone screen. The phone rang, and someone answered.

“I found it. The tail.”

Butler Kim’s low, smooth voice flowed through the speaker.

Chapter 276

The middle-aged man looked like any other ordinary guy from the neighborhood.

A bluish shadow of stubble ran from his sideburns to his chin. His practical hiking clothes bulged around his belly.

At the crack of dawn, he finished stretching with sleep still heavy in his eyes, then began jogging slowly along a path between the rice paddies.

“One-two, one-two,” he chanted in the hearty rhythm peculiar to middle-aged men everywhere.

He was the “tail” Butler Kim had found.

“Are you sure this is the man?”

Inside an equally ordinary minivan, Song Song watched the footage Butler Kim had recorded with magic and muttered doubtfully.

“He looks normal.”

“Wouldn’t it be stranger if he looked extraordinary? It’s not like you can recognize a Black Hunter the way you can a ninth-grade civil servant.[1495]”

“Still, that man looks way too normal. Is there something only combat Hunters can recognize?”

“There is.”

I stared intently at the middle-aged man as he finished his jog and entered the mansion.

All I was looking at was a recording, so I couldn’t sense his internal energy. But no matter how talented an actor was, some tiny movement would always give them away.

And I had the eye to see through an act.

“A Peak master…”

“Hm?”

Song Song wasn’t the only one who reacted to my mutter.

Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim looked at me as if to ask what I meant, so I continued.

“…I mean, an A-rank Hunter.”

“You seemed to say something else. Did you say ‘Peak master’?”

“Nope. You must have misheard.”

At times like this, the only answer was absolute denial. If I said I hadn’t said it, what could they do?

Their doubtful looks lasted only a moment before Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim nodded in agreement with my assessment.

[1495] In South Korea, grade 9 is the entry-level rank for civil servants.

“I also believe he is an A-rank Hunter.”

“From what I observed, he ranks fairly high even among A-rank Hunters. I had no choice but to keep my distance because I thought he might detect the surveillance magic.”

Butler Kim’s assessment made sense. He was a battle-hardened veteran of the Great Cataclysm and had observed the man in person.

But Team Leader Choi had a far keener eye than I’d expected.

This wasn’t something just anyone could recognize.

Well, that isn’t important right now.

I asked what I was most curious about.

“But how did you find him? I heard the investigation team had collected all the nearby CCTV footage.”

“We went and retrieved it again.”

No, I meant, how did you manage that?

Before I could ask, Team Leader Choi pressed his thumb and index finger together to form a circle.

“You said this works on just about everyone, Taekyung.”

“Ah…”

“It’s an immutable truth. I’ve made frequent use of it myself for some time.”

So he had bribed someone on the investigation team.

Considering Team Leader Choi’s generosity, whoever it was must have made quite a haul.

“Didn’t you say there was outside pressure?”

“When there’s outside pressure, you give them enough money to withstand it.”

Impressive.

But judging by what he said next, even money had its limits.

“It appears that someone fairly powerful has gotten involved. Normally, they should have told us everything without much resistance, but perhaps they were frightened. No matter how much money we fed them, they refused to talk. The CCTV footage was the best we could get.”

“And that man was caught on it?”

“Yes. There were slight discrepancies, possibly because he used an artifact enchanted with Illusion magic, but there’s no doubt it was him.”

I had expected as much, but it seemed the people pulling the strings wielded considerable power.

They had greased the palm of a supreme council member from a political party and manipulated public opinion online as easily as breathing. Even the police and prosecutors—corrupt enough to accept bribes—were afraid to make a move.

It has to be one of the major Guilds.

A major Guild ranked among the top twenty could pull this off. They were effectively corporate giants operating under the name of a Guild.

They had even cultivated an illegal private army of Black Hunters. That told me everything I needed to know.

“So what does that bastard do?”

“He’s a city dweller who fulfilled his dream of moving to the countryside and becoming a farmer.”

Butler Kim smoothly added one more sentence as he handed me a tablet.

“On the surface.”

The tablet contained everything about the “tail.”

He was now in his mid-forties. He had amassed a considerable fortune in the stock market over a decade ago, but after repeatedly collapsing from a chronic illness, he had decided to move to the countryside.

“A chronic illness?”

“We even have the hospital records.”

What kind of chronic illness could an A-rank Hunter have?

I snorted and flicked through the medical records.

“I’ll bet my left wrist that all of this is bullshit.”

Team Leader Choi nodded as if that went without saying.

“Then I’ll bet Jin Taekyung’s right wrist.”

“…”

Was this lunatic serious? Why was he betting my wrist?

Casually ignoring my incredulous stare, Team Leader Choi continued.

“In any case, on paper, he’s a perfectly ordinary citizen. Apparently, he was sociable from the day he first settled there. He throws a village feast once every two weeks, so the villagers stopped treating him like an outsider long ago.”

“And no one suspects him in a remote mountain village?”

“He’s a rich, good-natured man.”

“It’s the perfect place to hide and do things. For example, train Black Hunters.”

I examined the final image closely.

A picturesque two-story house. The building itself looked relatively small compared to the spacious yard.

A luxury SUV and a sedan were parked beside the gray stone wall.

How many people are inside?

There had been three men in the group that attacked Im Kkeokjeong. They had no reason to scatter like the Dragon Balls,[1496] so I had to assume they were all inside that house.

[1496]The Dragon Balls are magical objects scattered across the world in the Japanese series Dragon Ball.

Ah, wait. Hold on.

"You said he throws a village feast once every two weeks."

"Yes. Each time, he orders a large quantity of food from outside, but… Ah!"

The village feasts were probably a cover for procuring food.

There might be a lot more of them than I thought.

Did he keep the rest crammed into a basement to train?

Or were they hidden somewhere in the dense forest surrounding the house?

Personally, I hoped they were all huddled together in the basement.

That would make things easier.

"Approaching carelessly could backfire. So for today, we should stop here and—"

"Yes. It's about time we got started."

I pulled my hood low and opened the car door.

"I'll be back."

"Pardon?"

"The three of you can follow in twenty minutes. It should be almost over by then."

All three of them stared at me in bewilderment.

Butler Kim, the most experienced among them, spoke first.

"Hunter Jin Taekyung. There is nothing more frightening than an enemy whose capabilities you have not assessed."

"Yes. I know."

"I understand that your skills are exceptional, but…"

Butler Kim continued in a grave voice.

"There could be dozens of A-rank Hunters like the man I observed waiting for you."

"It's fine. Honestly, the Three Idiots looked stronger than that guy."

"…?"

"Don't worry about it. He just reminded me of some people I know."

Song Song asked incredulously, "You're thinking about people you know at a time like this?"

"No. I'm always thinking about you."

"Eek."

"Be quiet before I punish you with a confession."

"Aah!"

Whew. I'm fucking cool. No wonder women run screaming.

I was about to step out of the minivan after chalking up another easy win when Team Leader Choi spoke.

"I want to stop you, but I can't."

His expression was impossible to describe.

“Every crazy thing you’ve done has always succeeded.”

“You’ve got me figured out. Then move exactly as I said. It’ll all be over within an hour at most.”

“Black Hunters… Those men have been trained to hunt humans, not monsters. Be careful.”

I couldn’t hold back a short laugh.

“Good. That happens to be my specialty, too.”

“Pardon?”

Leaving the wide-eyed Team Leader Choi behind, I stepped outside.

Beneath a rural night sky strewn with stars, I drew the cool air deep into my lungs and stretched.

As I walked toward the Black Hunters’ base, shrouded in darkness in the distance, I was no longer Hunter Jin Taekyung.

I had become Jin Taekyung, a man of Murim.

Grrrrr.

A beast’s eyes flashed in the pitch-black darkness.

I directed my killing intent at the two Tosa mastiffs baring their teeth at me from behind the iron bars.

“If I hear you bark, you’re becoming dog-meat soup.”

Unless the dogs had attended a Korean language academy, there was no way they could understand me.

But killing intent was another matter.

Killing intent, honed through countless battles and brushes with death, awakened a primal fear.

Even a person with exceptional nerve could wet themselves from it. Dogs, which were even more sensitive to such things, were no exception.

Whine. Whimper.

The Tosa mastiffs sensed my killing intent, hid their teeth, tucked their tails beneath their bellies, and flattened themselves against the ground. Their anxious eyes trembled, and they dared not look my way.

“That’s right. Good dogs.”

Slice.

The moment I cut through the iron bars with Palm Force gathered around my hand and stepped into the yard, I felt as though I had passed through a soft membrane.

Then a blaring siren rang out.

Wheeeeeeeeng!

Ding.

They had taken some precautions.

Even better.

The instant the magic activated, the lights inside the mansion blazed to life.

I sensed dozens of people moving hurriedly inside. A moment later, the steel front door burst outward as if it had exploded.

Bang!

Five men emerged first. The “tail” stood at their center.

The ordinary-looking middle-aged man’s eyes now belonged to a killer.

“You…”

His face twisted, and his eyes trembled. He had clearly recognized me.

I gave him a broad smile.

“I’m with the village youth association.”

“Jin Taekyung!”

“Nope. This is Patrick.[1497]”

“How did you find this place?”

“We have a rich Young Master in our Guild. Whatever else you say about him, he knows how to get things done.”

Im Yeongjun’s sharp gaze swept our surroundings.

“Don’t tell me you came alone.”

“What if I did?”

“Looks like you did.”

His mouth twisted.

[1497]Patrick Star, called Ddung-i in the Korean dub of SpongeBob SquarePants, is known for answering, “No, this is Patrick.”

“Fucking idiot. There’s a limit to how ignorant you can be of the way the world works.”

“That’s what I wanted to say to you. You should’ve chosen your target more carefully.”

“That D-rank nobody who barely qualifies as a Hunter? Did they reattach his arm?”

“They did, but… Apparently, he has some lingering aftereffects. So I came to collect a little compensation.”

“I was going to kill him, but I held back. Be grateful that it ended there. If you don’t want to suffer something worse, lie flat and quiet as a dead mouse.”

“I’ve already seen something worse, and lying flat like a dead mouse isn’t my style. I’m not particularly grateful, either, so isn’t that why I came here?”

Im Yeongjun gave a short laugh.

“Kid, I know you’re excited because everyone around you treats you like a big shot, but don’t make the mistake of thinking we’re ordinary Hunters.”

Just as he said, the aura and killing intent emanating from the Black Hunters were far denser and stronger than those of ordinary Hunters.

I swept my gaze over the mansion.

I could feel them—the presences hiding inside, waiting for orders.

“One, five, ten… Twenty-eight in all. You’ve gathered quite a crowd.”

“…How?”

“I’m not an ordinary Hunter, either.”

Watching his face stiffen, I continued.

“Three. Hand over the three who took part in the attack two days ago, including you. The rest of you, disarm yourselves and tell me everything you know. Then I’ll spare your lives.”

“You crazy bastard.”

“Good. I was worried you might accept.”

That was my first and last offer.

There wouldn’t be another.

Open Inventory. Equip White Flame.

The moment the cool spear shaft filled my grasp, Im Yeongjun shouted, his voice rising almost to a scream.

“Kill him!”

That was the signal.

Dozens of Black Hunters who had been waiting in breathless silence smashed through the walls and windows and surged toward me.

Crash! Shhhhk!

A rain of countless blades and arrowheads poured in from every direction.

My eyes had already gone cold as I watched them.
“You picked the wrong person to mess with.”
Fwoooosh!

Chapter 277

An endless rain of blades and arrowheads poured in from every direction.

I didn't need to think about how to move. A picture formed naturally in my mind, and my hands moved at the same time as my thoughts.

Fwoosh!

Blue flames wrapped around the spearhead and traced a semicircle.

KRAAASH!

The arrows and weapons caught in its path split apart like tofu.

Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron was hard and sharp enough to destroy Body-Protecting Qi on its own. With Spear Energy added to it, the result was only natural.

Though perhaps not to them.

"Gasp!"

The closest Black Hunter gasped as he stared at his sword, melted by the fiery qi of the Fire Gate Divine Technique.

He was my first target.

Crack!

My grip could crush stone and rebar. When I tightened my fingers around his forearm, his flesh was mangled and bone burst through.

"Gyaaaaaah!"

I had memorized the descriptions of every man who had attacked Im Kkeokjeong. I stared intently at the Black Hunter's face as he screamed in agony.

"You're not one of them."

"Die!"

With a venomous shout, he drove a dagger up beneath my chin. Even in that much pain, his hand didn't hesitate.

This wasn't how someone moved in a raid.

These were the movements of a skilled killer.

And I tried to reason with people like these.

Once again, I reflected on what a fucking idiot I'd been.

I let out a hollow laugh and dodged the dagger. At the same time, I seized his other arm and pulled with all my strength.

No, I tore it off.

Crack-crack-crack!

"Urrrrgh…!"

His mouth gaped wide, but the pain was too great for him to scream.

I kicked him in the back as his whole body convulsed. He gasped raggedly, barely clinging to life, while blood gushed from the torn stumps.

I tossed both arms onto the lawn.

“One down.”

“…!”

“…!”

A heavy silence descended over the yard.

The Black Hunters faltered after seeing a comrade on their level taken apart in an instant. Behind them, Im Yeongjun’s eyebrows twitched as he watched.

“So you had something to rely on.”

“Yeah. That’s why I came. You don’t seem to have anything, though.”

“You fucking bastard, Jin Taekyung…”

“You should’ve listened while I was asking nicely. Because of you and the other two, this bastard can’t even jerk off by himself anymore.”

My voice remained flat as I swept my gaze around. Wherever my eyes passed, anger and confusion churned across their faces.

Sensing the shift in the atmosphere, Im Yeongjun glared and roared.

“What are you waiting for, you bastards?! I’ll save every last one of you even if I have to bathe you in potions! Don’t be afraid—beat him to death!”

I blinked. For a moment, I wondered if I had heard him correctly.

Ah, right. Potions.

“If you lose an arm or a leg, you’d need at least a high-grade potion. You guys must be loaded.”

“If that’s what it costs to remove one major obstacle, it’s worth every penny. We should’ve eliminated you from the start… I never liked the order we were given.”

“Should you really be blabbing about having someone powerful behind you? Aren’t you worried they’ll kill you to silence you?”

“Kill me to silence me?”

A sneer spread across Im Yeongjun’s lips.

“We’re the ones who silence witnesses. Besides, you’re going to die here anyway.”

“Sure, let’s put that aside for now. There’s something I’ve been wondering.”

I asked with complete sincerity.

“Those potions of yours—can they bring the dead back to life? Or do you carry three or four spare lives around?”

“What?”

Slice!

The spear answered for him. The Black Hunter groaning at my feet lost his head.

I gave the severed head a light kick, sending it rolling toward the others.

“Go on. Save him.”

“…!”

“Oh, right. Even potions can’t save you if your heart bursts or your head comes off.”

Shhk!

Without hesitation, I flicked my hand.

Two daggers shot out with terrifying speed, becoming flashes of light.

Thwack!

Two Black Hunters staggered, then collapsed.

Their bodies had been unable to withstand the internal energy carried by the daggers. Half of each man’s head was gone.

“Ah. I was trying to plant them neatly between the eyebrows, but I couldn’t control my strength.”

“…!”

The air around us seemed to vibrate.

The sneer had vanished from Im Yeongjun’s lips. A tempest now raged in the eyes of the remaining twenty-five Black Hunters.

“H-How…?”

“What the fuck…?”

Suppressed groans rose from here and there. It was something they had never experienced before.

Hunters hunted monsters.

Black Hunters had been created to hunt those Hunters.

Murder, kidnapping, blackmail, and every other filthy job—they had served as enforcers for a major Guild.

But they had clearly never imagined that they might be hunted themselves.

Much less that it would be this one-sided.

I spat phlegm onto the headless corpse.

“You bastards are like dark-path knife fighters.”

No. In terms of their mindset, dark-path knife fighters were actually better.

At least those men accepted that they might someday be stabbed to death in a back alley.

“What… exactly are you?”

His voice was bone-dry, reflecting the turmoil inside him.

I grinned at Im Yeongjun as he stared at me.

“You already know. Why bother asking?”

His gaze turned cold.

“You fooled everyone completely. That’s not the skill of a man who’s only killed once or twice.”

“Killing beasts doesn’t count as murder. Usually, it’s called slaughter.”

Step. Step.

Every time I advanced slowly, the Black Hunters surrounding me in a semicircle took a step backward.

Even the dullest among them must have realized by now that I wasn’t merely an A-rank Hunter.

They could feel the qualitatively different killing intent and the thick scent of blood clinging to me.

“Jin Taekyung.”

Im Yeongjun spoke, his face rigid.

“Taking out that D-rank Hunter was a warning. The order came from above.”

“I didn’t like the way you delivered that warning. Not one bit.”

“I understand your position. Stop here.”

“And if I don’t?”

“The next warning could be worse.”

“Worse?”

“Aren’t you worried about your mother and younger sibling?”

“…!”

The words caught in my throat.

My slow but steady advance came to an abrupt stop, and strength returned to Im Yeongjun’s voice.

“I can negotiate with the people above us. I’ll act as the stepping stone between you.”

“A stepping stone…”

“You only have to give up one thing. Stop living as A-rank Hunter Jin Taekyung and live as the civilian Jin Taekyung instead. Of course, you’ll be generously compensated.”

I gazed into Im Yeongjun’s eyes.

They held wariness toward me, but they were also the eyes of a wolf constantly searching for an opening.

After a brief silence, a dry voice escaped my lips.

“A stepping stone. That sounds good.”

The corners of Im Yeongjun’s mouth began to rise slightly. I continued smoothly.

“Since you’re a stepping stone, I can just step lightly on you and pass over. I’ll find out who’s on the other side of the stream when I get there.”

“…!”

There would be no compromise.

They had crossed the line. They were already my enemies.

The modern way and the way of Murim. I had weighed the two against each other and agonized over the choice until the very end…

But today, I would choose the latter.

“And listen, asshole. When you make an offer like that, try doing it with a more trustworthy look in your eyes.”

“Jin Taekyung!”

I heard his shout as I kicked off the ground.

The Black Hunters charged at me with gritted teeth, and I brought my spear down upon them.

Slice!

Boom!

A single punch infused with three-tenths of my internal energy.

The enhancement magic shattered, and the Tower Shield broke apart.

The tank hiding behind it stared at me in shock.

Thrust!

White Flame’s spearhead pierced his chest and burst out through his back.

The mage behind the sturdy shield hurriedly stepped backward.

Thwack!

I flicked my hand, and a dagger buried itself in the back of his head.

But it wasn’t over yet.

“Die!”

Shhhhhk!

Neck, chest, shoulder.

Three blades hurtled toward me with a fierce rush of air. Faint Sword Energy shimmered along their edges, marking their wielders as A-rank Hunters.

Slice!

I pulled the spear from the dead tank’s chest and swung it.

The three swords shattered beneath that lightning-fast strike, and one of the men collapsed clutching his throat.

Blood sprayed over me like a fountain. I released my spear and thrust both palms toward the other two men as they tried to cut me down with their broken swords.

Crack—BOOM!

Compressed air exploded outward.

The Flame Divine Palm struck them squarely in the chest, and they sank to their knees as blood poured from all seven orifices.[1498]

Their melted magical armor clung to their upper bodies and burned into their flesh, but they were dead before they could feel the pain.

"Goodbye."

I had just wiped the blood from my face with my sleeve when—

Shhk! Shhhhhk!

I tilted my head slightly.

An iron arrow thick and heavy enough to pass for a small spear flew past me and buried itself in the stone wall behind me.

Boom!

A cloud of dirt erupted as the arrow drove deep into the solid rock.

Its power was tremendous.

They've been getting on my nerves for a while.

Like ordinary Hunters, these men had a balanced distribution of roles.

They had tanks, mages, and melee damage dealers. Naturally, they also had ranged damage dealers.

Three archers had remained inside the mansion from the beginning, loosing arrow after arrow from the second-floor windows.

Shhk-shhk-shhk!

I clicked my tongue and was about to knock the arrows aside with my spear shaft when the air rippled.

A black silhouette burst from empty space and brought a dagger down to cleave my skull.

Shrrrkk!

Fast and precise.

He was clearly a melee damage dealer with an exceptional stealth-type Skill.

How many people had he killed this way?

I didn't know, but one thing was certain.

Today, he picked the wrong target.

Bang-bang-bang!

I twisted the spearhead with a deft motion.

The iron arrows, which should have been swept aside like fallen leaves, changed course and pierced the Black Hunter who had been trying to bury a dagger in my crown.

Thwack-thwack-thwack!

"Urgh!"

[1498] The seven orifices are the two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, and mouth.

Struck by arrows out of nowhere in midair, the Black Hunter fell with a heavy thud.

I pulled an iron arrow from his upper body. His body convulsed, then went still. At the same moment, I hurled the arrow back in the direction it had come from.

Shhhhhk! Thwack!

The iron arrow infused with internal energy did its job perfectly.

It flew back toward its original owners twice as fast and with twice the force it had carried when first fired.

The three archers, who had been nocking their next arrows, died almost simultaneously.

“This is fucking insane…”

The men who had been about to charge stopped in their tracks. Their hands trembled around their weapons.

They had just watched more than ten of their comrades die in the blink of an eye.

But I had no intention of stopping there.

Shrrrkk! Slice!

I charged straight into them, cutting, stabbing, and smashing.

A mist of blood formed, and someone’s arms, legs, or head flew in every direction.

“Gyaaaaaah!”

“Argh!”

Screams erupted all around me.

From among the terrified enemies, a knuckle wrapped in Fist Energy shot out and slammed into my spear shaft.

Boom!

“Retreat into the mansion!”

I let out a short laugh at Im Yeongjun’s shout. He had bought them a brief moment.

“Did you set up some magic circles as traps?”

“Shut up!”

Whoosh!

He was their leader for a reason. As expected, he was the best of them.

No, at this level, he could even be called a Peak master in Murim.

He knows how to use qi.

One reason Hunters seemed so inferior to martial artists was the way they handled qi.

But Im Yeongjun and the other Black Hunters moved far more efficiently than ordinary Hunters.

Even so, this is as far as they go.

No matter how high someone flew or how low they crawled, there were walls they could never cross.

I drove my fist toward the knuckle.

Refusing to back down, Im Yeongjun gritted his teeth and met my punch head-on.

Boom!

One Strike.

The knuckle shattered.

Boom!

Two Strike.

Im Yeongjun's fist was crushed.

KRA-BOOM!

Three Strike.

The first move of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist slammed into his shoulder.

His flesh melted, and his bones were pulverized.

It was as though a fire dragon had devoured his entire shoulder.

Im Yeongjun spat blood and flew backward.

"Team Leader!"

But he still had subordinates left.

The Black Hunters who had waited until the last moment quickly hoisted Im Yeongjun onto their backs and rushed into the mansion.

Thud!

The door had barely closed when layer upon layer of transparent barriers wrapped around the mansion.

A defensive spell?

It had to be an extremely powerful one. It felt even sturdier than the defensive magic Butler Kim had once shown me.

But I didn't stop walking.

One step carried me to the door. I punched the dozens of defensive barriers.

Four Strike.

The Heaven-Destroying Divine Fist, unleashed with all my strength, hammered into them.

Just as it had shattered an unnamed cliff on Mount Song, the Heaven-Destroying Divine Fist broke and crushed everything blocking its path.

KRAAAAAASH!

With a roar like the sky splitting apart, the defensive barriers were torn to shreds.

The roof flew off, and the walls turned to ash.

Beyond the melted front door, I saw the enemies frozen in place.

Im Yeongjun stood at their center.

His jaw trembled. A single word, sounding almost like a groan, escaped between his lips soaked in blood.

“What… what the hell are you?”

I gladly answered him.

“A monster. Same as you.”

Team Leader Choi had said it before.

This world was teeming with monsters.

So I had decided that, every once in a while, I would become a monster myself.

Just like today.

“Have you ever heard of Tendon-Splitting and Bone-Twisting?”

It didn’t take long for Im Yeongjun to open his mouth.

Chapter 278

The beautiful two-story house had been transformed into a haunted ruin.

If the dozens of layers of defensive barriers hadn't absorbed part of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist's impact, the entire place would have been reduced to ash.

Just then, I sensed someone approaching from behind, and a quiet voice sounded in my ear.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung."

I had been sitting on a half-charred sofa. Turning my head, I answered,

"Yes."

Team Leader Choi, Butler Kim, and Song Song stood behind me.

Their expressions were complicated as they looked at me. Considering they had seen the bodies strewn miserably across the garden, it was only natural.

Being drenched from head to toe in blood probably didn't help my appearance, either.

Song Song cautiously asked, "Did you… kill all of them?"

"Yeah."

"…!"

"I'm kidding. I spared the ones who surrendered."

Then I added gently, "For now."

The answer was for Song Song, but the warning was meant for Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim.

Team Leader Choi asked with concern, "Are you hurt anywhere?"

"As you can see, I'm fine."

"What about the survivors?"

"I gathered them in one place."

"Without taking any other measures?"

"Of course I did. For the next few hours, they'll be no different from corpses that can still breathe, so don't worry."

The personal measure I had taken was a Pressure-Point Strike.

After striking their Mute Acupoints, Paralysis Acupoints, and Sleep Acupoints, I had stacked the Black Hunters neatly inside the only room left standing.

I had used force to subdue them, but I wasn't some blood-crazed murderer who intended to kill even those who surrendered.

More importantly, they might prove useful later.

"You did well. But…"

Team Leader Choi's gaze shifted to the man sprawled at my feet.

"Who is that?"

"The owner of this house."

I rolled him over with my foot, revealing a man in his forties.

Im Yeongjun, the homeowner and leader of the Black Hunters.

His entire body was so drenched in blood that he could easily have been mistaken for a corpse, but he was very much alive. In fact, there wasn't a single wound left on him.

Butler Kim examined him and muttered knowingly, "You used potions. Several times, at that."

"Yes."

"Did you torture him?"

"You have sharp eyes."

"It was common during the Great Cataclysm. There were plenty of people worse than Black Hunters."

Song Song's expression darkened at the word torture. But after a faint sigh, she placed a hand on my shoulder.

"That couldn't have been easy."

It was only natural for her to be repulsed. Even I, accustomed as I was to the ways of Murim, didn't feel comfortable about what I had done.

But Im Yeongjun had been far more tight-lipped than I had expected. Ordinary threats would never have made him talk.

"These aren't ordinary opponents. Someone had to do it," Team Leader Choi said.

"If you hadn't, Hunter Jin Taekyung, I would have," Butler Kim added. "Don't take it too much to heart."

They were right. Someone had to do it. My hands were already stained with blood, so there was no reason to balk at torture now.

I shook my head to clear away my troubled thoughts, then opened my mouth.

"There's no physical evidence. Apparently, they deleted all the relevant information the moment I broke in and the alarm magic went off."

"All of it?"

"Yes. There weren't even any computers in the house. Only two people, including Im Yeongjun, had cell phones. Even those were burner phones with no identifiable source."

I showed them the remains of the cell phone I had collected beforehand.

Even someone as hopeless with technology as me could tell that recovering anything from it would be impossible. Every component had been crushed, and they had burned the SD card.

Team Leader Choi clicked his tongue when he saw the wreckage.

“Thorough. At this point, there’s no way any documents would have been left behind.”

“They didn’t.”

“What about the other Black Hunters?”

“Ten survived, but none of them knows anything. I killed the one who was effectively their deputy. Im Yeongjun personally recruited and trained everyone here.”

From what I had gathered, they operated as a thoroughly compartmentalized organization.

Everything involving the Black Hunters—from laundering their identities to paying them—had gone through Im Yeongjun.

“It’s fortunate that Im Yeongjun survived, at least. What did he tell you?”

“That…”

I suddenly stopped speaking.

The one sentence he had screamed like a howl after experiencing Tendon-Splitting and Bone-Twisting three times still echoed in my ears.

“M-Myeongdong Guild! I said Myeongdong Guild!”

A major Guild that might not rank among the country’s top ten, but easily placed within the top twenty.

And…

Jihoon.

It was also the Guild where an old friend I had met again recently belonged.

After some thought, I spoke again.

“Could you give me a little time?”

“…?”

“There’s something I need to check personally.”

Team Leader Choi studied me for a moment, then nodded.

“We’ll start cleaning up the scene. Look into it and let us know.”

“I will.”

“Let’s get started right away.”

At Team Leader Choi’s words, Butler Kim swung the staff he had been using like a cane.

The tightly shut door opened. The ten Black Hunters whose acupoints I had struck floated into the air and filed out of the house one after another.

Im Yeongjun was among them, of course.

“Everyone, stand back.”

After delivering the warning in a low voice, Butler Kim began chanting.

Mana surged. Enormous flames engulfed the two-story house, which had barely managed to retain its shape.

The fire swept through the garden and would not stop until it had erased everything.

Fwoooosh!

A cloud of acrid smoke billowed up with the flames.

Yet the quiet rural village surrounding the mansion remained peaceful.

With magic blocking all sight and sound, the mansion wouldn't be discovered until much later.

"Will this be enough?"

"More than enough. Even if we left it alone, they would step in and erase every trace of this place themselves."

People had vanished overnight, and a house had burned down. But that was all.

The villagers would talk about it for a while, but nothing would come of it.

That was how monsters with power and authority operated.

There was only one thing I wanted to know.

Garam Middle School Classmate Park Jihoon

Which side did the owner of the number saved in my phone actually belong to?

The darkness had yet to lift when Park Jihoon dressed and left his house at dawn.

A uniformed chauffeur was waiting for him at the entrance with a limousine.

"You're here, sir."

"What's going on? Why am I being picked up out of the blue at this hour?"

"I'm afraid I don't know. The Guild Master only instructed me to collect you from your home."

Fair enough. What would a mere driver know?

Clicking his tongue softly, Park Jihoon climbed into the car. Perhaps because of the early hour, the roads were deserted.

Some time later, the limousine glided to a stop in a part of Hannam-dong lined with luxury apartments and villas.

Before them stood a massive mansion.

One of the guards stationed along the stone wall ran over and bowed to Park Jihoon.

"He's waiting inside."

Park Jihoon passed through iron gates reminiscent of a European nobleman's estate and crossed a garden larger than an athletic field before finally meeting the man who had summoned him.

"Have you eaten breakfast?"

The man was in his fifties, with hair that had gone half gray. His age belied his imposing physique, and well-developed chest muscles showed beneath his white robe.

Park Jihoon bowed his head.

"Not yet."

"Then come eat. The beef-and-radish soup turned out especially well today."

It was barely six in the morning. No one would welcome breakfast this early, especially after being dragged out of bed.

Nevertheless, Park Jihoon thanked him and picked up his spoon without complaint.

"Aren't you eating, Guild Master?"

"I've already eaten. Don't mind me. Finish your meal."

The man casually unfolded a copy of that morning's newspaper.

The front page featured a photograph of a middle-aged man in a suit bowing his head solemnly.

Park Tae Seop, Guild Master of Myeongdong Guild, visits the wake of the late Hunter Jung Hyunwoo. "My heart is filled with grief. I bow my head and apologize to the bereaved family."

Only then did Park Jihoon understand why he had been summoned.

The old geezer's pissed.

The man, identical to the one in the color photograph, asked without looking up from the newspaper, "How's the picture? Did I come out well?"

"Yes. You're naturally handsome."

"That's your problem. No matter what you say, it always sounds like empty flattery."

"I mean it."

At the unhesitating answer, the middle-aged man—Park Tae Seop, Guild Master of Myeongdong Guild—raised his eyebrows.

It was a sign that his patience had run out.

"Jung Hyunwoo. Why did you kill him?"

Here it comes.

Park Jihoon quietly set down his spoon.

"I caught a whiff."

"Then you should have stopped at covering your nose."

"That was Myeongdong Guild's job. Mine is to wring the necks of anyone who catches the stink before they can go blabbing about it."

"Without my permission?"

"Do I need permission, too?"

Bang!

Park Tae Seop slammed his fist into the dining table. The table shattered with a splintering crack, sending glass and food flying in every direction.

“Guild Master!”

The guards who came rushing in were met by a furious roar.

“Get the hell out, all of you! Don’t take another step inside until I give the order!”

“…!”

They froze for a moment, then bowed and withdrew.

Park Jihoon calmly pulled out a handkerchief and wiped the soup splashed across his face.

“What a shame. It was delicious.”

“You insolent brat, still stinking of your mother’s milk…”

“We both reek of something rotten anyway. A little milk on top won’t make any difference.”

“I built this Guild with my own blood! And a little shit like you kills one of my Guild members without even telling me?”

“Come now, Guild Master.”

Park Jihoon’s smooth, unlined brow furrowed.

The handkerchief in his hand dropped onto the shattered remains of the table.

“What else was I supposed to do?”

“What did you say?”

“Don’t you know how troublesome it gets when people who catch the stink start talking? One spark, and the whole house burns down. If it were only your house at risk, I wouldn’t have said a word. But the fire would spread to our side, so I stepped in.”

“Even so, you—!”

“And I’d appreciate it if you got one thing straight. You’re a war hero who fought and bled during the Great Cataclysm? I’ll give you that. But claiming that Myeongdong Guild belongs to you is a bit…”

Park Jihoon let out a short laugh and rose from his seat.

“Thank you for breakfast. Though I barely managed a few spoonfuls.”

Park Tae Seop trembled as he watched him.

“Sit down.”

“If you have anything else to say, call me. If you keep this up, I’m going to lose my respect for a great senior like you.”

“I said sit down.”

The air around them churned violently.

Park Tae Seop, Guild Master of Myeongdong Guild, was a hero forged by the Great Cataclysm and one of the country’s highest-ranking rankers.

But Park Jihoon knew the man couldn’t lay a hand on him.

“I’ll see you next time.”

He bowed politely and was about to turn away when Park Tae Seop spoke again.

“The sparks you scattered are about to burn the whole house down. You didn’t know that?”

“What are you talking about? I handled Team Leader Jung’s matter thoroughly enough to prevent any loose talk.”

“The Black Hunters. I heard they recently went after a D-rank Hunter from the Peace Guild.”

Park Jihoon’s face stiffened.

He instinctively realized that something had gone seriously wrong.

“…What is it? What happened?”

At that moment, the phone inside Park Jihoon’s coat pocket began to vibrate.

As though possessed, he pulled it out and stared at the name filling the screen, his eyes darkening.

Jin Taekyung

Chapter 279

Jin Taekyung.

The three-syllable name stood out clearly on the screen.

Park Jihoon was about to press the call icon without thinking when a thunderous shout stopped him.

“I’m not finished talking. Put that damn phone away and sit down right now!”

“…”

“Are you deaf?”

“…No, sir. Go ahead.”

Park Jihoon turned off the screen and dropped heavily into a chair. Park Tae Seop glared at him with blazing eyes.

“Was killing a Team Leader-level Hunter without permission not enough for you?”

“I was under the impression that matter had already been discussed. ‘That person’ said they had personally contacted you to ask for your understanding.”

“Understanding? You mean threaten me?”

“They’d be hurt if they heard you say that.”

“What the hell do you have against Jin Taekyung and the Peace Guild that you’d go so far as to send Black Hunters…?”

“That’s enough.”

Park Jihoon cut him off, his voice hard.

“There’s no need for you to know things you’re better off not knowing.”

“…!”

“Isn’t it important that the Guild Master accepted the proposal? One way or another, the result matters more than the process.”

“Yeah. So is that why you turned that important result into this mess?”

Park Jihoon frowned. Park Tae Seop’s complaints were nothing new, but this was the first time he had been so openly hostile.

What the hell happened?

“That’s enough bickering. What went wrong?”

Park Tae Seop, breathing hard with anger, tossed out a single sentence.

“Two hours ago, Team 11 sent an emergency message.”

To the outside world, Myeongdong Guild had ten teams.

But that was merely its public face. Team 11, the team Park Tae Seop had mentioned, did not officially exist. It was made up entirely of Black Hunters.

“Did you say an emergency message?”

“If you have eyes, see for yourself.”

Park Tae Seop pulled something from his robe pocket and tossed it over. Park Jihoon caught an old-fashioned cell phone so outdated that he couldn't even guess when it had been made.

The call history had been wiped clean. The inbox held only a single text message, received two hours earlier.

> Intruder detected.

One short line.

But its contents were anything but ordinary.

Park Jihoon closed the phone and asked, "Where was it?"

"Far away. A backwater hole beside some nameless mountain. It's outside the safe zone, and there aren't any Gates nearby, so no one has any reason to go there."

"Any word after that?"

"If there had been, would I be bringing this up?"

"So they're out of contact."

"I sent people to check, but… I have a bad feeling about this."

Park Jihoon felt the same.

Seven years ago, as soon as he had been assigned to Myeongdong Guild, his first task had involved Team 11.

Park Tae Seop, the Guild Master of Myeongdong Guild, had strongly objected to hiding and training criminals. But he had been unable to defy the orders of that person.

That was how they had gathered roughly thirty Black Hunters.

Three A-rank Hunters. And twenty-five B-rank Hunters.

They were a force powerful enough to rival—or even surpass—Team 1, Myeongdong Guild's elite.

And now they had lost contact after an intruder appeared.

Just as unease began creeping through Park Jihoon's chest—

Brrrrr.

The phone in his inner coat pocket began to vibrate again. The longer it continued, the more his unease grew.

Ring. Ring…

The call went unanswered and ended in voicemail, just like every time before.

This was already my tenth call. I'd sent him a text ages ago, too, but he hadn't replied.

He should be at work by now.

The entrance of the high-rise building towering over the heart of Seoul was crowded with people. I was watching them absently when someone spoke to me.

“Excuse me.”

The man addressing me was dressed in a suit.

His face was angular, and his eyes were sharp. I could sense the solid build beneath his clothes and the energy coiled inside him. The man beside him, apparently his colleague, was much the same.

I put away my phone and answered,

“Yes, excuse me.”

The suited man hesitated, then opened his mouth. The name tag on his chest clearly displayed both his name and his affiliation: Myeongdong Guild.

“We’re from the Security Team. We received a report about you.”

“I’m not a sir. What kind of report?”

“We checked the CCTV footage and saw you loitering in front of our building for quite a while… Is there something you need?”

Their eyes were full of suspicion and wariness.

I was wearing track pants and a hoodie, with a cap pulled low over my face and sunglasses on top of that. A guy dressed like this peering into the building was bound to attract a report.

“Sir, would you mind moving somewhere else for a moment?”

“No, I’d rather not. And I told you, I’m not a sir.”

“It’ll only take a moment.”

Despite his fairly polite tone, his actions were anything but.

Whoosh!

With a short rush of wind, both men reached for me at the same time.

In the next instant, question marks appeared on their once-confident faces.

Tap. Grab.

“Huh?”

“What?”

I casually caught both their wrists and put on a stern expression.

“Y-You rude punks. How dare you lay hands on your teacher?”

“W-Wait a second.”

“Who the hell are you? Let go!”

The two C-rank Hunters from the Security Team were visibly flustered. No matter how hard they strained, they couldn’t move an inch, and their mouths fell open.

Should I break them?

I considered it for a moment, but the time wasn't right yet. I released their wrists before the commotion could grow any larger.

"Let's not go around putting our hands on people."

Rubbing their reddened wrists, the two men cautiously asked, "Were you… a Hunter?"

"Excuse me, but could we have your name and affiliation?"

"I'm Jin Taekyung of the Peace Guild."

"What?"

"Could you be the Lord Fuck I've heard about?"

"…You must have seen that internet broadcast."

I'd rather be the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. What the hell is Lord Fuck supposed to mean?

I sighed and lowered my sunglasses slightly. The two men gasped and immediately bowed deeply.

"It's an honor to meet you."

"You're much more handsome in person."

Their eyes sparkled like high school students who had just spotted their favorite idol. Judging by their reaction, they clearly knew nothing about what was really going on.

Of course. Anything involving the Black Hunters would be top secret. If an ordinary Security Team Hunter knew about it, the secret would have leaked long ago.

"But what brings you to our Guild…?"

"I came to see someone I know."

"Someone you know?"

I pulled a thin piece of paper from my wallet and held it out. It was Park Jihoon's business card, which I'd received a while back and kept.

"Hunter Park Jihoon of Team 1?"

The Security Team Hunter tilted his head at the card, then turned to his colleague.

"Senior, do you know who this is?"

"Who?"

"He's supposedly Hunter Park Jihoon from Team 1. I know all the Team 1 Hunters, but I can't quite place him…"

"Park Jihoon, Park Jihoon… Oh, him. You know. That guy."

He elbowed his colleague in the side, and only then did the other man let out an "Oh!"

The two of them looked back and forth between me and the business card with fascinated expressions.

What's with that reaction?

My eyes narrowed. Unable to see my expression behind my sunglasses, the Security Team Hunter asked, “Are you close with Hunter Park Jihoon?”

“We went to middle school together.”

“Ohhh, so you’re friends.”

I gave him a gentle smile.

“Well, for now.”

“Huh?”

“I’m joking.”

Maybe.

Oblivious to my thoughts, the Security Team Hunters laughed and kept asking questions.

“So you came to see Hunter Park Jihoon?”

“Yes. He wasn’t answering his phone, and he wasn’t at home, either. I thought I might find him at work.”

“We’re sorry. We had no idea.”

“You were just doing your job, so don’t worry about it. More importantly, is Jihoon inside?”

The senior Security Team Hunter answered, “He probably won’t come in today, either.”

“Today, too?”

“Yes. He hardly ever comes to work. Maybe once a month? I’ve been here almost a year and have only seen him a few times. This guy’s barely been here a month, so…”

“Sounds like Myeongdong Guild’s Hunters don’t come to work very often.”

“Of course they do. I don’t know why, but everyone just accepts that he doesn’t.”

Yeah. Why is that?

I’d never heard of a Guild Hunter who showed up for work once a month.

The question that had taken root in one corner of my mind grew deeper.

Without letting it show, I said, “Could you try contacting Jihoon for me? I understand there’s a separate phone for Guild summons.”

“Uh, that’s…”

The two men hesitated, so I made them an offer they couldn’t refuse.

“I came to discuss a cooperative raid. If I put in a word, I think I could get another person or two added…”

“Whoa.”

“Are you serious?”

Of course not.

It was all a lie from beginning to end. But I kept a perfectly straight face and continued.

“You’re both C-rank, right?”

“Yes, sir.”

“How did you know?”

“I can tell at a glance. But you two seem too good to waste away in the Security Team.”

Strictly speaking, a Guild’s Security Team was little more than a backwater department.

If a Hunter were truly skilled, why would the Guild waste him on guard duty? From the Guild’s perspective, sending him on raids would be far more profitable.

There was no way the two Security Team Hunters didn’t know that. Their eyes lit up.

“I’ll contact him right away!”

“I’d appreciate that.”

“Is there anything else you need?”

“Would it be all right if I looked around the Guild for a bit? I can wait for Jihoon inside.”

“Yes. Yes, of course.”

Unlike the senior, who was bowing obsequiously, the junior Hunter’s face had gone stiff.

He’d only joined a month ago. His sense of duty and loyalty to the company were probably still burning bright.

“Senior, I don’t think that’s right.”

“What? You little punk.”

“I really respect Hunter Jin Taekyung, too, but doesn’t this violate the Guild’s internal regulations?”

“Hey, you idiot!”

The senior seemed to realize he’d slipped up as soon as he shouted. He glanced at me, then lowered his voice to a whisper.

“Are you crazy? It’s an A-Rank Gate. You could rot in the Security Team for three years and never get another opportunity like this.”

“Then we should report it to the Team Leader first…”

“God, you’re so damn rigid. Why do we need to report that he wants to look around for a moment? It’s not like he’s just anybody. He’s Hunter Jin Taekyung.”

“No, even so…”

“Please. Try to live with a little yutori, okay?”[1499]

[1499] Yutori is a Korean colloquialism borrowed from Japanese, meaning leeway or flexibility. Cheol Soo objects to the Japanese-derived word.

"Yutori?"[1500]

The junior Hunter's expression suddenly turned grave.

"In the current climate, please refrain from carelessly using words like that. It makes me uncomfortable."

"You're out of your mind. Do you want your life at the Guild to get uncomfortable?"

What a complete circus.

Clicking my tongue, I stepped forward. The junior Hunter flinched, then thrust out his chest.

"D-Do you have something to say?"

"No. I was just moved by what I heard."

"What?"

"You're a true patriot, and your loyalty to the company goes without saying. I'll be sure to mention it when I meet the Guild Master of Myeongdong Guild later."

"T-The Guild Master?"

"Yes. Jihoon said he'd speak to the Guild Master, too. I should make sure to mention that there's an excellent talent here."

I glanced at the name tag on the junior Hunter's chest and added, "Hunter Kim Cheol Soo."

"…!"

The eyes of Kim Cheol Soo, devoted company man, trembled with emotion.

With my most amiable smile, I asked, "Can I go in now?"

Kim Cheol Soo shouted at the top of his lungs, "Irasshaimase!"[1501]

"…Ah, yes. Arigato."[1502]

The luxurious twenty-story building belonged to Myeongdong Guild.

The senior Hunter had pulled rank to ditch his junior and come with me. He chattered away as we walked.

"The first through ninth floors house the civilian departments—tax, accounting, corporate affairs, and so on. From the tenth through the nineteenth floors, each floor belongs to a raid team."

"What about the twentieth?"

"The Guild Master and the board of directors, obviously."

"I see."

[1500] Yutori is a Korean colloquialism borrowed from Japanese, meaning leeway or flexibility. Cheol Soo objects to the Japanese-derived word.

[1501] Irasshaimase is a Japanese greeting called out by shop staff to welcome customers.

[1502] Arigato is Japanese for "thank you."

"Team 1 is the Guild's elite team, so they're on the nineteenth floor."

Ding.

The elevator arrived as he finished speaking. I pressed the button for the nineteenth floor and was waiting for the doors to close when—

"Hey, hey! Wait!"

The senior Hunter hurriedly pressed the open button.

The doors slid open, and a middle-aged man with a receding hairline stepped inside.

He gave us a sidelong glance, then covered the receiver with one hand as he spoke.

"Yes, yes. No, it's nothing. Just the elevator. Yes."

The energy coming from him as he continued his important call was formidable.

An A-rank Hunter?

The senior Hunter had gone rigid at the man's appearance. I gave him a questioning look, and he discreetly raised one finger while mouthing the answer.

Team 1 Leader.

No wonder he hadn't pressed a button.

As Team 1 Leader, he was naturally headed for the nineteenth floor. I listened to his call.

And in the next instant, a familiar voice pierced my ears.

"How does it make any sense that all twenty-eight of them were wiped out? Hurry up and—"

"…!"

My body trembled as if I'd been electrocuted.

That familiar voice.

And the number twenty-eight.

So it was you.

My hand moved the instant the thought struck me.

Grab!

"Ghk! Who the hell are you…?"

I clamped a hand around the Team 1 Leader's throat like a shackle and whispered into the receiver.

"Park Jihoon. You fucking bastard."

Chapter 280

“Park Jihoon, you fucking bastard.”

“…”

The voice on the other end cut off mid-sentence.

I couldn’t see him, but his confusion and agitation at that moment came through clearly enough.

“What’s the matter? If someone calls you, you should answer.”

After a moment, he replied.

“Is that you?”

“Yeah, it’s me, you bastard.”

My voice came out heated. Blood raced through my veins, and my heart hammered in my chest.

But my head was as cold as if I’d been doused with ice water.

Maybe some part of me had already seen this coming.

I kept thinking, surely not. Surely not.

But the number twenty-eight falling from his lips had been enough to turn a faint suspicion into certainty.

What I wanted to know was whose orders they were acting on—and how deeply he was involved.

“Did you send those bastards?”

A low, smooth baritone answered.

“Who knows? If that’s what happened, then I suppose I did.”

“…”

“What? Did you think I’d deny it?”

Well, look at this guy.

His attitude—as if he had nothing whatsoever to be ashamed of—drew a hollow laugh from me.

“Who told you? Im Yeongjun? Of course. He’s the only one it could’ve been. I thought he knew how to keep his mouth shut…but I misjudged him.”

Park Jihoon clicked his tongue and continued.

“Fucking idiot. I never should’ve left it to him.”

“What did the shit do wrong? The asshole who dropped his pants and started straining in public is the one to blame. But you…”

Crack.

The Team 1 Leader, still struggling with his neck trapped in my grip, turned blue.

“Did you think about how you were going to clean up after taking that dump?”

"It's unexpected that things turned out this way…but do you really think I'd have done my business without considering the cleanup?"

"Yeah. That's exactly what it looks like."

"What?"

"Can you handle me?"

Silence followed.

One second. Two. Three.

Then, at the end of that brief silence, came a cold, razor-edged voice unlike any I had ever heard from him.

"Take one more step, and both you and the Peace Guild are finished."

"So?"

"It's not too late. Don't make this any bigger. Come out. Let's end it here."

Hearing that, it suddenly occurred to me that the way the world worked wasn't so different from a fight.

The one who seized the advantage pressed forward without mercy. The one who was afraid took the first step back.

And I knew exactly what Park Jihoon feared.

Black Hunters.

The existence of the Black Hunters—the illegal private armies maintained by major Guilds.

The thought that they were holding Park Jihoon back made the corners of my mouth curl upward.

"End it?"

"Yes."

"Who says?"

"…!"

"You people started this. I'll decide where it ends."

On the other end of the phone, Park Jihoon's breathing grew ragged.

"Well, this is something. I knew you were stupid, but you're even worse than I thought."

"The result will be beyond anything you imagined, too. Please fucking look forward to it, you son of a bitch."

That was when it happened.

Ding.

"Nineteenth floor."

With the mechanical announcement, the tightly closed elevator doors slowly slid open.

A broad hallway with a high ceiling came into view. Dozens of people moved through it.

Several naturally glanced in our direction. A moment later, their mouths dropped open.

“T-Team Leader?”

“You there! Who the hell are you…?”

Instead of answering, I hurled the Team 1 Leader at them. A Hunter approaching with an accusing finger outstretched went crashing into the wall along with him.

At the same time, an employee sitting at the desk screamed and pressed the emergency button.

WEEEEEE!

“Emergency! Emergency!”

“Intruder! Team 1, arm yourselves!”

Amid the piercing alarm, Park Jihoon’s final words reached my ears.

“Go ahead, then. Let’s see you try.”

Beep. Beep. Beep…

I shoved the Team 1 Leader’s phone, now disconnected, into my inner pocket.

When my hand emerged again, it held two daggers instead.

Let’s see me try?

I’d been planning to.

“Who are you?!”

“Drop your weapons! Now, unless you want to die!”

Myeongdong Guild’s elite Hunters armed themselves with astonishing speed and surrounded me in a semicircle.

The elevator was behind me. The only other person there stood frozen like a plaster statue, muttering to himself.

“This is a dream. It has to be.”

I glanced at him, half out of his mind, and asked,

“What phone do you use?”

“Gasp!”

“Your phone. What kind?”

“I-I use an AdultPhone 25.[1503]”

“Ah. The apple you bit into and spat out.”

“Y-Yes, yes. That’s right.”

“Take it out and start recording.”

“Yes, sir!”

[1503] “AdultPhone” is a pun on iPhone: the Korean word ai means “child,” while eoreun means “adult.”

He answered at the top of his lungs, then froze halfway through pulling out his phone.

“Y-Yes, sir? I’m sorry, but what did you just say?”

“You said you have an AdultPhone 25.[1504] Its camera’s much better than mine, so I figured you should do the filming.”

“F-Film what?”

“Everything.”

Just then, the fallen Team 1 Leader sprang to his feet and roared.

“What are you waiting for, you bastards? Beat the shit out of him!”

“Team Leader, isn’t that Hunter Jin Taekyung? What is going on all of a sudden…?”

“I’ll take responsibility.”

In any Guild, Team 1 was both its symbol and its elite force.

For Myeongdong Guild, consistently ranked among Korea’s top ten, that went without saying. Its Team 1 members were consummate professionals—living combat machines.

“This is an order from above. Don’t think of him as a person. Think of him as a monster and fight.”

The moment their Team Leader gave them a firm order, dozens of gazes sank into cold focus.

Five tower shields at the front slammed into the marble floor in perfect unison.

Boom!

“Formation—!”

In the middle of their peaceful daily lives, the downtown building became a battlefield.

What am I looking at?

Lee Minsu, a C-rank Hunter assigned to Myeongdong Guild’s Security Team, blinked.

The scene unfolding before him was simply too unreal.

Krrr-crack! Boom!

A tower shield as sturdy as an armored vehicle shattered, and a massive tank flew far away as if it had been struck by a giant’s hammer.

For the briefest instant, a gap opened—barely wide enough for one person.

A pale figure slipped through it.

And then—

Shriiiik! Slash! Slash!

[1504] “AdultPhone” is a pun on iPhone: the Korean word ai means “child,” while eoreun means “adult.”

“Gaaah!”

“Gasp!”

The shield wall collapsed in a flash of light.

The tanks pitched forward in an undignified heap, the tendons in their calves cleanly severed.

How did he…?

He couldn’t even see the strikes properly.

Blink once, and two people fell. Blink twice, and three or four went down.

Every time the young man in the gray hoodie, Jin Taekyung, took a step, blood spurted and screams overflowed.

“S-Stop him!”

“Damage dealer!”

The front line where the tanks had been holding had already collapsed the moment the battle began. Five blades swung powerfully toward Jin Taekyung as he advanced one step at a time.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

Both shoulders. His chest. Both legs.

Three attacks targeted his upper body, while two went for his lower body. There was no way to evade them without retreating.

“We got him!”

At the instant someone cried out in delight, the dagger in Jin Taekyung’s hand blurred like mist.

Clang-clang-clang-clang-clang!

All five blades, which everyone had been certain would connect, shot into the air.

The Hunters who had wielded them stared at Jin Taekyung in shock. The force of the deflection had torn their palms open, leaving them drenched in blood.

“W-What the…?”

“That’s impossible!”

Jin Taekyung answered their cries in a flat voice.

“Looks possible to me.”

Slash!

A single line swept horizontally through the air.

An attack that could neither be seen nor avoided.

Directly in its path stood the five Hunters who had just attacked him.

Fwoosh!

As the Hunters fell, spraying fountains of blood from their chests, a streak of light pierced between them.

Whooosh! Thunk!

The arrowhead stopped just short of Jin Taekyung's chest.

An A-rank Hunter had fired it with perfect accuracy, mana coursing through the shaft.

But what stopped it was neither a shield coated in various magics nor a sharp weapon.

Crack.

Jin Taekyung snapped the arrow shaft between two fingers and flicked his hand.

With a terrifying whistle, the arrow shot back along its original path, shattered three defensive spells, and buried itself in its owner's shoulders.

Thud!

"Ghk!"

"Fire one more arrow, and I'll make sure you end up with an odd number of balls."

"…!"

"The rest of you, back off unless you want your balls lopsided too. It's annoying having to hold back."

He had been holding back?

The Hunters of Team 1 felt as if they had been possessed by ghosts. It was hard enough to believe that he had rendered more than a dozen people unable to fight in the time it took to drink a glass of cold water.

And he had been holding back while doing it?

The same thought flashed through every mind.

What kind of monster is this?

Who were they?

They were Myeongdong Guild's elite, battle-hardened veteran Hunters. Even the least experienced had eight years under their belt, while the most senior had been Hunters for more than twenty.

They had earned their positions through skills far surpassing those of other Hunters at the same rank, and they had taken immense pride in that fact.

At least, they had—until they faced Jin Taekyung here today.

"Please move aside while I'm still speaking politely, Seniors. I'd really like to smash every one of your faces in, but you don't seem to be directly involved, so this is all I'm doing."

Loose track pants and a gray hoodie. He looked as if he had stepped out to visit the café down the street.

Yet no one dared dismiss his words.

He had already displayed his strength and seared it into their minds.

"So clear a path."

An overwhelming aura crushed the corridor, leaving even veterans of countless brutal battles inside Gates struggling to breathe.

It awakened a primal terror unlike anything they had ever felt from a monster.

Monster. That bastard is a real monster.

Step. Step.

The monster walked straight toward them.

The Hunters unconsciously moved aside to let him pass.

That was when—

"Burning Hands!"

Whoosh!

A hand wreathed in flame came crashing down on Jin Taekyung amid fierce heat.

The fire spell could melt solid rock, but the enormous hand of mana vanished without a trace the instant it struck Jin Taekyung's palm.

"M-Magic?"

"It's called the Flame Divine Palm. Pretty useful, right?"

The Team 1 Leader's eyes widened at the sight of his palm engulfed in blue flame.

Jin Taekyung stared at him and ran his tongue over his dry lips.

He looked like a predator that had just discovered prey it had forgotten about.

"Ah. You're the one exception to what I said earlier."

"Gasp."

Whoosh!

Jin Taekyung's form scattered like a ghost.

But the Team 1 Leader was an exceptional battle mage in his own right, accomplished enough to command Myeongdong Guild's elite team. Even in his panic, he reacted quickly.

"Blink!"

It was a teleportation spell that allowed him to move anywhere within ten meters,[1505] provided he could see the destination.

If I move behind him and unleash my attack spells all at once, even someone as skilled as him…

The Team 1 Leader used Blink to move behind Jin Taekyung.

For an instant, it felt as though the world had stopped.

Jin Taekyung's clear, deep-black eyes were right in front of his face.

Thud.

A palm still radiating heat pressed down on his shoulder.

"Why are you so surprised?"

"…!"

"You practically advertised where you were going with your eyes."

Had he predicted the direction from the movement of his gaze?

[1505] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

No. That wasn’t all.

The Team 1 Leader’s body trembled as though he had been struck by lightning.

His movement was faster than my Blink.

What kind of monster was he?

And what kind of monster had Park Jihoon—and Myeongdong Guild—provoked?

With a trembling voice, the Team 1 Leader recited the final spell he had prepared.

“P-Poison.”

Whoosh.

A cloud of green poisonous fog burst forth and enveloped Jin Taekyung’s face.

But just as the Team 1 Leader’s instincts had warned him, the monster proved once again that he truly was a monster.

“Ugh. Smells like a fart.”

His handsome brow furrowed.

That was his entire reaction to the Poison spell.

Having reached Peak and attained the realm of Unaffected by a Hundred Poisons, Jin Taekyung blew on the frozen Team 1 Leader.

“Hoo.”

“Gasp.”

The Team 1 Leader inhaled the poisonous fog, and his face turned blue.

Jin Taekyung grabbed him by the nape as the paralyzing poison stiffened his entire body, then looked around and asked,

“Where’s that bastard Park Jihoon’s office?”

Ssssk!

Ten fingers pointed toward a single door.

Chapter 281

The limousine sped down the road without so much as a jolt.

Park Jihoon took a bottle of water from the refrigerator and offered it to the middle-aged man sitting across from him.

“Would you like some?”

“At a time like this? And where did you learn to offer someone else’s things as if they were your own?”

“Then I suppose it’s all right if I drink only half. I have at least that much of a stake in bringing Myeongdong Guild to where it is today.”

“…”

Myeongdong Guild Master Park Tae Seop glared silently as Park Jihoon tipped back the bottle.

“You’re awfully calm.”

After drinking exactly half, Park Jihoon leaned back against the plush seat.

“Is there some reason I should be worried?”

“This whole mess has erupted, and you’re acting as though nothing’s wrong?”

“It’s nothing more than a minor incident.”

“A single drop of water can bring down a tower of sand.”

“Because it’s made of sand.”

“You’re saying Myeongdong Guild is different?”

“Five hundred Hunters under its banner. Twenty of them A-rank. At this point, it wouldn’t be wrong to call it an iron tower instead of a tower of sand. And…”

The corners of Park Jihoon’s mouth curved gently upward.

“Myeongdong Guild shouldn’t even be part of the comparison. We have ‘that person,‘ after all.”

“…That’s true.”

Park Tae Seop nodded reluctantly, though his expression remained displeased.

Park Jihoon studied him.

“What is it? What has you so anxious you can’t sit still?”

After a brief silence, Park Tae Seop spoke.

“A feeling.”

“What?”

“When you reach my age, you develop instincts you can’t explain.”

Ha.

Park Jihoon suppressed a laugh. He had wondered what the man was going to say, but in the end, it was nothing more than the grumbling of an old man past sixty.

Just a feeling? What a load of nonsense.

The thought showed plainly on his face, and Park Tae Seop had lived too long not to notice.

“You may think it’s nonsense. I understand. It’s beyond greenhorns like you.”

“Ah, I’m sorry if you took it that way.”

“And only a greenhorn could apologize in a tone without a shred of sincerity.”

“I simply don’t understand. What exactly is bothering you so much?”

After a short silence, a name slipped out.

“Jin Taekyung.”

He breathed the name like a sigh. It had haunted his thoughts ever since they lost contact with Team 11.

For a moment, he had dismissed it as lingering unease over the operation going awry.

But that wasn’t it.

His intuition, which had even endured the Great Cataclysm, had given him the answer to what troubled him.

“He’s a siege cannon. One capable of cracking not just a tower of sand, but an iron one.”

Without waiting for a reply, Park Tae Seop reached out. He picked up the bottle of water Park Jihoon had left behind and drained it in large gulps.

His throat had become unbearably dry as soon as he finished speaking.

Park Jihoon watched with a deep frown.

Has the old man gone senile?

He could admit that the operation had not gone entirely smoothly. There had been unexpected complications, particularly with the Black Hunters and Team 11.

But even taking that into account, Park Tae Seop’s reaction was far too extreme.

It was only natural that Park Jihoon, who absolutely worshiped “that person,” should feel displeased.

“I didn’t realize you held Jin Taekyung in such high regard.”

“He’s proven himself.”

“Jin Taekyung only began attracting attention recently.”

“And he’s shown us a great deal in that short time.”

“Shown us?”

A mocking smile touched Park Jihoon’s lips.

“Won Myunghoon was trash. He was at the very bottom of the rankers, and even then, they only put his name on the list once as an act of charity during all that Korean Wave[1506] hype. You know that too, Guild Master.”

[1506]The Korean Wave refers to the international popularity of South Korean entertainment and culture.

“I heard he was stupid and greedy, and that his fame made him look more skilled than he really was.”

“And the Named Monster? They called it a Named Monster, but that Black Drake was the weakest one to appear in nearly twenty years. The Magic Gem recovered from its corpse wasn’t much different from one taken from an A-rank monster.”

“Then could you kill that weak Named Monster by yourself?”

“I don’t see why not.”

Park Jihoon answered without hesitation.

He took pride in his own abilities.

His natural talent had earned him the honor of being chosen by “that person.” It was why, despite not yet being thirty, he could sit across from the Guild Master of Myeongdong Guild and look him in the eye.

But the next question made him falter.

“Then what if you fought Jin Taekyung? Are you certain you could defeat him?”

“…Of course.”

His answer came half a beat late. Realizing it, Park Jihoon pressed his lips together.

“That hesitation just now seems to say something about what kind of person Jin Taekyung is.”

Park Jihoon replied coldly, “I was merely reminded of the past.”

“Ah. You said you two were friends, didn’t you?”

“I don’t want to discuss that. My point is that this incident isn’t as serious as you think, Guild Master.”

“We don’t even know whether Team 11 is alive or dead, and the most talked-about public figure in the country has stormed Myeongdong Guild headquarters. Yet you’re saying this isn’t serious?”

“He’s an idiot. He couldn’t control his temper, so he recklessly barged into Myeongdong Guild headquarters.”

About ten minutes earlier, Park Jihoon had been speaking with the Team 1 Leader when Jin Taekyung’s voice suddenly came over the phone.

He had been startled.

And relieved.

This will make things easy.

Myeongdong Guild had more than five hundred Hunters. Even if half were away on raids, an enormous number remained at headquarters.

Among them was Team 1, the Guild’s elite force.

“Jin Taekyung walked straight into the tiger’s den. All we have to do is keep him there while we sort everything out.”

Even if reporters caught the scent of the story and swarmed in, there was nothing to fear.

He had—no, “that person” had—the power to render cameras and microphones useless.

“I’ll have everything cleaned up by the end of the day.”

Park Tae Seop’s face suddenly looked much older as he muttered, “This feels wrong. Maybe it’s my age, but I’m starting to feel the strain.”

“It’s only a passing breeze. It wouldn’t do for the legs of a man who survived the Great Cataclysm to start trembling now.”

The remark held more reproach than encouragement. Park Tae Seop recognized that and fell silent.

Just then, the dull chime of a phone notification sounded.

“That isn’t mine.”

“It’s mine.”

“Who is it?”

“Manager Kim, the man in charge of my security. I sent him to find out what happened to Team 11. It seems he’s just arrived.”

“Good. Tell him to erase every trace of Team 11 first.”

“Are you giving me orders now?”

Frowning, Park Tae Seop answered the phone.

“It’s me. What happened? Hm? Ah, I see.”

His brow furrowed, then smoothed. His pupils dilated and contracted.

As his expression grew increasingly strange, Park Tae Seop pulled the phone away from his ear.

“What happened?”

“Take it.”

Park Tae Seop thrust the phone toward him, a vein bulging on his forehead.

“What?”

“Hurry!”

Bewildered, Park Jihoon took the phone and pressed it to his ear.

A voice as soft as a cat’s paw slipped into his ear.

“Hunter Park Jihoon of Myeongdong Guild Team 1?”

Park Jihoon knew the instant he heard it.

The caller was not Manager Kim, whom he had encountered in passing several times.

The voice was young and polite, yet carried an air that discouraged familiarity.

“This is Park Jihoon. Who am I speaking to?”

Something felt wrong.

The unfamiliar voice answered the unease in his question.

“My name is Choi Minwoo.”

"Who?"

"Ah, I'm with the Peace Guild. I'm a Team Leader there."

"…The Peace Guild?"

"Yes."

Fuck.

Park Jihoon's lips twitched.

Those few words were enough for him to understand what had happened. Myeongdong Guild's people had walked straight into the Peace Guild's trap.

There was no need to see what had happened to Manager Kim, the phone's owner. He was obviously either bound tightly and unconscious or helplessly watching someone else use his phone.

Myeongdong Guild, you fucking idiots.

Team Leader Choi's voice drifted leisurely through the receiver, as relaxed as a victor's.

"I called because I'd like to have a conversation."

"Well, the thing is…"

Park Jihoon clenched his teeth, his mind racing.

Then he felt a vibration against his chest.

It had not come from Park Tae Seop's phone.

"Hunter Park Jihoon?"

"Wait. Just a moment."

With his free hand, Park Jihoon pulled his own phone from the inner pocket of his suit.

A text message had arrived. The sender was…

[Team 1 Leader]

It's done.

Relief spread across Park Jihoon's lips in a smile. Jin Taekyung, who had entered the tiger's den known as Myeongdong Guild, had finally been forced to his knees.

The scales that had tipped against him were balanced again.

But then—

"…Huh?"

The smile vanished from his lips.

Filling the six-inch screen was not a report that the Team 1 Leader had captured Jin Taekyung, but a single photograph.

What is this?

He recognized the faces.

A young man grinned broadly at the camera, blood spattered across his face. Beside him, caught firmly in his grasp, was a middle-aged man whose complexion had turned as blue as a drug addict's.

Jin Taekyung…and the Team 1 Leader?

That wasn't all.

The background was familiar too.

The nameplate reading Hunter Park Jihoon, Myeongdong Guild Team 1 made it unmistakably clear where they were.

And there was one more thing.

No way… Did no one stop him? That one Jin Taekyung?

A reality he did not want to believe.

Park Jihoon's eyes darted helplessly around as they began to tremble.

Bzzz.

Another text arrived. Its contents were brief but devastating.

Five Korean characters were enough to shatter Park Jihoon's composure.

> Team 1 Leader
> └ Team 1 Leader: Bring Melona when you come.[1507]

"This—this fucking…!"

Crack.

The phone in Park Jihoon's hand crumpled like a sheet of paper.

Watching him, Myeongdong Guild Master Park Tae Seop muttered quietly,

"We're fucked."

> Team Leader Choi
> └ Team Leader Choi: We've captured the people dispatched by Myeongdong Guild.

The text was from Team Leader Choi.

A few hours earlier, after burning down the safe house used by the Black Hunters, we had split up.

Team Leader Choi and the others would lie in ambush to secure solid evidence, while I had insisted on acting alone.

[1507] Melona is a popular Korean melon-flavored ice cream bar.

It was because Team Leader Choi had argued that we absolutely had to capture something that could serve as evidence or a witness.

He was right.

Every Black Hunter, including Im Yeongjun, had been managed so meticulously that their identities had already been laundered clean. There wasn't even the slightest link connecting them to Myeongdong Guild.

Team Leader Choi had identified that problem exactly.

He's always calm and composed.

Looking back, he had never once lost sight of the right path.

Having Butler Kim as both an excellent mage and a wise adviser probably helped, but at this point, Choi had to be a natural.

Now we have solid leverage.

On top of the captured Black Hunters, we had official Myeongdong Guild employees in our hands.

That should make an excellent shield.

Or a dagger.

I sent him a message thanking him for his hard work, along with the photograph I'd taken earlier.

Maybe it was because it was an AdultPhone,[1508] but even a picture taken with my foot came out great.

"Maybe I should replace my phone while I'm at it."

Someone flinched at my mutter. It was the Security Team Hunter I'd hired as my personal cameraman for the day.

Of course, I wasn't paying him.

"What's wrong?"

"N-Nothing, sir!"

"Make yourself comfortable. Don't just stand there. Sit on the sofa or something."

"I'm comfortable like this!"

"You look pretty uncomfortable to me."

"I'm fiiiine!"

Was it my imagination, or was there a sob mixed into his shout?

As an ordinary Security Team Hunter, he'd just watched me beat the living shit out of Team 1, the Guild's elite—people he normally wouldn't even dare look in the eye.

His reaction was understandable.

The ones who came later weren't much different.

[1508] "AdultPhone" is a Korean pun on iPhone: ai can mean "child," while eoreun means "adult."

The other Myeongdong Guild Hunters who arrived afterward didn’t dare attack me after seeing the scene before them.

Of course, quite a few of them were armed with fierce devotion to their Guild.

Unfortunately, they didn’t have the skills to back it up. Everyone who charged me got beaten to a pulp and carried away.

After I had knocked down around fifty of them, no one else tried to attack me. Park Jihoon’s office became forbidden territory that no one could enter.

I sank into his chair.

He must be racing here like a madman by now.

Just thinking about him made my heart turn cold.

A middle-school classmate I had happened to run into on the street after ten long years.

How much of what I saw was the real Park Jihoon?

Hurry up and get here. Before I get any angrier.

Crack.

The armrest snapped beneath my grip.

“H-He’s here!”

“Guild Master!”

Murmurs spread beyond the office door like a wildfire.

At the same time, I sensed two immense presences approaching without hesitation.

He’s here.

And in the next moment, the door blew apart with a thunderous roar.

BOOM!

Chapter 282

BOOM!

Two people appeared amid the thunderous roar.

I waved at the familiar face among them.

“Well, look who’s here. You fucking bastard.”

“…You.”

I’d been planning to punch him in the mouth the moment I saw him, but the sight of his face twisting with rage drew a quiet laugh from me instead.

Eyeing Park Jihoon’s tightly clenched fist, I put on a disappointed expression.

“You didn’t bring it?”

“What?”

“Melona.”[1509]

“You little—”

A huge hand closed around his shoulder as his face flushed red.

“There are still too many eyes on us.”

Biting his lip, Park Jihoon took a step back.

I watched in amusement as the middle-aged man beside him cleared everyone from the immediate area, then addressed me.

“Do you know who I am?”

I nodded. There was no way I wouldn’t recognize that face.

His name carried plenty of weight, and he appeared often enough in newspapers, magazines, and other media.

Park Tae Seop, Guild Master of Myeongdong Guild.

A war hero who had distinguished himself during the Great Cataclysm, and one of Korea’s top rankers.

He had survived countless brutal struggles to become the master of a major Guild. To Hunters, he was both an inspiration and a respected elder.

I used to respect him too.

Not anymore.

My good memories of Park Tae Seop had expired two days ago.

What you thought tended to show in your attitude. Reading the undisguised hostility in my gaze, Park Tae Seop spoke.

“You… consider me your enemy.”

“I can’t exactly consider you a friend. We both know what’s going on.”

“Don’t be so quick to decide. Live long enough, and you’ll realize there are no eternal friends or enemies.”

[1509] Melona is a popular Korean melon-flavored ice cream bar.

“I don’t know about the part where there are no eternal enemies.”

I looked at Park Jihoon beside him.

“But the part about there being no eternal friends makes a lot of sense.”

Park Jihoon replied coldly.

“Your premise is wrong from the start. We were never friends.”

“We were never friends.”

I sank deeper into the chair and repeated his words under my breath.

One thing I still couldn’t understand was Park Jihoon’s sudden change in attitude.

But…

“Then again, what does that matter now? Whatever we had was already over the moment you sent those Black Hunters.”

At the mention of that sensitive term, Park Tae Seop waved a hand.

At the Guild Master’s command, the hundred or so Hunters filling the hallway receded like the tide.

Listening to their footsteps fade into the distance, I curled my lips.

“You’re not exactly being open about it.”

“And you’re irritatingly honest.”

“I’m personally ashamed of it.”

“For someone who considers himself ashamed, you gave a pretty damn despicable order.”

“…”

“Why?”

Discomfort flickered across Park Tae Seop’s face, but it wasn’t directed at me.

For the briefest instant, his gaze touched Park Jihoon beside him before darting away.

Well, well…

That reaction hadn’t been deliberate.

If it had slipped out unconsciously, he was definitely hiding something.

I thought back over everything that hadn’t quite added up.

Something stinks to high heaven. It reeks.

As I muttered to myself, Park Jihoon abruptly spoke.

“To keep you and the Peace Guild in check.”

“Keep us in check?”

“A new powerhouse emerging means a smaller slice of the pie for someone else. I’m sure the other Guilds feel the same way we do.”

On the surface, it made sense.

Korea's Guild market was already oversaturated. Its tiers had been divided and its pecking order established. The old powers had no desire to see a new competitor emerge.

"The Peace Guild is dangerous. For now, you're confined to Bucheon, but soon you'll grow at a frightening pace and expand your influence."

"So you sent the Black Hunters?"

"We did. But didn't I already tell you? It was only a warning."

"And I believe I already told you that your pathetic warning left someone crippled."

"Crippled? They reattached his two severed arms without any problems. His daily life won't be affected at all. Is that what people call crippled these days?"

"He might as well be. His career as a Hunter is over."

"Better his career than the entire Guild."

"What?"

Park Jihoon snorted.

"This is only the beginning. Every high-rank Gate worth entering has already been closed off to your Guild. With the surrounding Guilds shutting you out, you'll slowly wither away and die."

Something Team Leader Choi had told me a few days ago suddenly came to mind.

The other Guilds had snapped up every A-rank Gate.

Because of that, I'd been forced to drag the rookies from one C-rank or B-rank Gate to another, unable to gain any meaningful EXP.

"Don't tell me that was—"

"You're slow. Did you think it was a coincidence?"

The corners of Park Jihoon's mouth rose. He had not only fully regained his composure, but was even relaxed enough to lean back against the sofa.

"I heard you recruited a lot of Guild members recently. What are you going to do now? At this rate, you'll have to let them all go within a year. You'll be lucky if they don't sue when you can't pay their allowances."

"…"

I slowly relaxed my folded arms.

"You're good at this. No wonder you're a major Guild."

"Well, I suppose we are."

"But… we've got a pretty decent card too. I think it'd be interesting if everything Myeongdong Guild did behind the scenes after scraping together a bunch of criminal bastards came to light. What do you think?"

I continued without waiting for Park Jihoon to respond.

“Judging by how things work around here, you’d just snatch them away if we handed them over to the police. So I figured we could play a little truth game on an iTube livestream instead.”

“…iTube? A livestream?”

“Oh, right. You don’t know we opened a Guild channel, do you? Subscribe and hit Like. Don’t forget to turn on notifications.”

“…”

“Wow, we’re already at three hundred thousand subscribers. If this blows up, we might break ten million. Half the country will probably tune in.”

The smile vanished from Park Jihoon’s lips without a trace.

“You shouldn’t start something you can’t handle.”

“I’ll handle it.”

“Do you want to make every major Guild your enemy?”

“If I raise hell here, can you handle the fallout?”

“…”

Park Jihoon’s mouth snapped shut as though it had been glued.

After glaring at me with burning eyes for a while, he spat out a single sentence.

“Tell me what you want.”

“What I want?”

“We’ll accommodate your demands as much as possible. Don’t make this any bigger. Let’s negotiate and end it here.”

“Negotiate.”

“If we take this all the way, we’ll both come out wounded. You know that as well as I do.”

He was right.

If I were the only one who had to bear the consequences, I would have taken this all the way.

But the lives of countless people connected to the Peace Guild were at stake.

Someone’s friend, lover, family…

Their futures too.

I quietly licked my dry lips.

“What can you give me?”

“Money and power. And all kinds of benefits that will help the Peace Guild grow.”

“Didn’t you say the Peace Guild’s growth bothered you enough to send the Black Hunters?”

“Which is why we need to set boundaries.”

“You’re telling us not to stray outside the fence you build?”

“That’s right.”

The longer I listened to Park Jihoon's proposal, the clearer the picture became.

What we stood to gain in exchange for handing over the Peace Guild's prisoners and keeping quiet about the incident was substantial.

No, it was enormous.

Buildings and land. Exclusive rights to high-rank Gates currently controlled by Myeongdong Guild. Even a staggering amount of cash.

The overall deal looked good.

But…

"You left out the most important part."

"Those terms are already more than generous enough—what?"

Park Jihoon frowned.

"What did you just say?"

"I said you left out the most important part."

"You're insane. You're demanding even more?"

"To be honest, there's no point explaining all this to me. I understand that it's valuable, but our Guild Master and Team Leader Choi are the experts on which terms are good or bad for us."

"Then what exactly did I leave out?"

I stared at Park Jihoon.

"An apology."

"…What?"

"If you did something wrong, you should apologize. But the most important thing—an apology—is missing."

His offer was packed with extravagant terms, but there was no apology.

The one thing that should have come before everything else was nowhere to be found.

"Ha."

Park Jihoon let out an incredulous laugh. The way he looked me up and down made his anger and disbelief plain.

"Fine. I'm sorry. Happy now?"

"That's not how you apologize."

Crack.

The bones in Park Jihoon's tightly clenched fist shifted with an ugly pop.

A moment later, he drew a deep breath, looked me in the eye, and enunciated each word.

"I'm sorry."

"That's a little better."

"Are you satisfied now?"

I gave a small nod.

“But next time you do it in person, try putting a little more sincerity into it. Bow your head politely, too.”

“…What the hell are you talking about now?”

“What good does apologizing to me do? You need to apologize to the victim and his family.”

Park Jihoon’s eyelids trembled.

“You want me to apologize to that D-rank Hunter?”

“Why? Can’t do it?”

“I already told you we’d pay him compensation. It’s more money than most Hunters will ever see in their lives.”

“That works out nicely, then. A heartfelt apology accompanied by a massive compensation payment as a token of remorse should be even more effective.”

“You…”

I gently added one more remark as Park Jihoon glared daggers at me.

“If it hurts your pride, bring someone else along and apologize together.”

Myeongdong Guild Master Park Tae Seop, who had listened in silence until now, finally spoke.

“I’ll visit him in person and apologize. Sincerely.”

“At least you understand the basics, Guild Master. I suppose that makes you a slightly cleaner piece of shit.”

Cleaner shit.

At that moment, I couldn’t think of a more fitting—or more paradoxical—description.

But Park Tae Seop wasn’t the other suspect I had in mind.

I leaned forward in my chair and stared into Park Jihoon’s eyes.

“Bring the person who gave you your orders. Make that person apologize too.”

“…!”

A violent storm churned in his eyes.

It lasted only an instant, but that brief flash of agitation was more than enough to turn my suspicion into certainty.

“Fine. Guild Master Park Tae Seop just agreed, anyway.”

Park Jihoon continued in the calmest voice he could manage.

“We’ll go together and apologize.”

“Cut the bullshit. Bring that person here.”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

I rose with a quiet laugh and walked toward the reception sofa where Park Jihoon sat.

“No matter how much I thought about it, I just couldn’t make sense of it.”

I dropped into the seat across from him.

With the large solid-wood table between us, I slowly studied him as he pretended to remain calm.

His solid build. The muscles visible beneath his shirt.

And the power lurking within him.

It was immense and powerful.

Even without checking his Level, I could tell how wide the gap was between him and the Team 1 Leader.

“What couldn’t you make sense of?”

“How someone strong enough to chew up that Team Leader lying over there with one hand isn’t even a deputy team leader. He’s just an ordinary Hunter.”

“…!”

“Not to mention you show up for work so rarely that you might come in once a month. And from the way you spoke to the Team 1 Leader over the phone, you were practically his superior.”

There were too many suspicious details to count.

And as our conversation continued, those suspicions had gradually hardened into certainty.

“We’re discussing terms on this scale, but the man supposedly in charge stays silent while an ordinary team member with no position does all the talking… How am I supposed to interpret that, Guild Master Park Tae Seop?”

Myeongdong Guild Master Park Tae Seop held my gaze, then slowly closed his eyes.

That was answer enough.

I laughed quietly and looked at Park Jihoon.

“So bring that person here. I don’t know who it is, but bring them here and make them apologize first.”

Park Jihoon’s tightly sealed lips finally parted.

“And if I refuse?”

“Then we take this all the way.”

“You crazy bastard. Do you even know who that person is?”

“No. I don’t particularly want to know, either. But I do want to see that bastard come here, slam his head down, and apologize. Then I’ll be satisfied.”

Swish!

At that same instant, I shot out a hand at blinding speed.

Park Jihoon cried out in alarm.

“You bastard!”

Pap-pap-pap!

Our hands collided and tangled in an instant.
Five exchanges passed in the blink of an eye.
Crunch.
His wrist broke, and his eyes flew wide.
I seized his neatly waxed hair and slammed his head into the table.
BANG!
“Like this.”

Chapter 283

BANG!

The air in the office vibrated with a sharp hum.

Park Jihoon's forehead smashed through the table and slammed into the floor. With a sharp crack, spiderweb fractures spread across the ground.

"Guh."

I pressed my knee into his back, applying the principles of the Thousand-Catty Drop.

I stared at the back of his head in surprise.

Huh. Look at this bastard.

Modern Hunters had no concept of martial arts.

Even among close-combat types, it was extremely rare to find someone like Im Yeongjun, a Black Hunter who focused primarily on hand-to-hand combat. Most concentrated on weapons.

Because that was the better way to improve their survival rate.

But Park Jihoon was different. Though it had lasted only an instant, the movements he had shown were comparable to those of a Peak master from Murim.

It was a little clumsy, but it was almost like a grappling technique wielded by someone who had reached a higher realm.

I had underestimated him and been caught off guard. The fight had ended almost immediately, but the fact that he had exchanged moves with me five times already put his ability far beyond what I had expected.

Has this level of hand-to-hand combat survived into the modern era? Why hasn't anyone heard of it?

With those questions in mind, I asked.

"You. Where did you learn that just now?"

Park Jihoon answered in a strained voice.

"Let go right now, before you regret it."

"I see. Still full of energy, are you?"

BANG! BANG! BANG!

Once. Twice. Three times.

Every time I grabbed his hair and slammed his head down, a muffled groan escaped him. Blood spattered across the office floor, which had been spotless only moments ago.

As his body went limp, Park Tae Seop, who had been observing the situation, suddenly spoke.

"That's enough."

“Is this bastard your son, Guild Master?”

“Would he be my son?”

“Then is he your daughter?”

“Obviously not that, either.”

“Then this isn’t your problem. If you cross the line here, I can’t guarantee what I’ll do.”

Park Tae Seop’s eyebrow twitched.

“You’ve got quite a spicy tongue.”

“My hands are even spicier. My old nickname was the Haengsin-dong Fire-Chicken Stir-Fried Hand.[1510]… Want a taste?”

“I have a reputation to uphold. I have no intention of fighting someone as young and green as you.”

Park Tae Seop uncrossed his arms and continued.

“But if that fellow is seriously injured, it will put me in a difficult position. He’s an important business partner.”

“He’s a manager sent by your business partner, isn’t he? No, seeing how he pushes you around, it’s embarrassing to even call you partners. You’re practically a figurehead. Does he have something on you?”

I must have struck a nerve, because he made a show of frowning.

“You’re more perceptive than I expected. Though I heard you weren’t very bright.”

I didn’t need to ask which bastard had said that.

I grabbed Park Jihoon’s wax-stiffened hair even more roughly and answered.

“I’m a slow learner. But once I learn something, I don’t forget it.”

“He learned his lesson properly this time, so let him go now.”

“I was planning to do that anyway.”

As I lifted Park Jihoon by the hair, Park Tae Seop gave a small nod.

“Good thinking…”

I drove the fistful of hair back down with all my strength.

BANG!

One more time.

CRUNCH!

The floor shattered beneath the deafening impact. As Park Jihoon flopped around like a raw fish, I drove my toe into his solar plexus.

THUD!

He flew backward and slid all the way to the door.

“Ghk!”

[1510] Buldak-bokkeum-myeon means “fire-chicken stir-fried noodles.” The nickname replaces myeon (“noodles”) with son (“hand”).

The impact jolted him awake. He trembled violently and spat out a mouthful of blood.

"…"

Park Tae Seop was unable to continue speaking, so I addressed him.

"I let him go. There. Happy?"

"You… You're quite something."

"Am I really as bad as the bastard who cuts people's arms off and calls it a warning?"

"I don't particularly like that fellow myself, but you would've been better off taking my advice."

His expression and voice had turned rigid.

He was serious.

Rather than feeling afraid, I became curious. Who was this person that even Park Tae Seop—a war hero of the Great Cataclysm and one of Korea's top rankers—was wary of?

I asked with a questioning look.

"Who is it? That bastard only called him 'that person.'"

"I can't tell you. Even if I did, you'd only resent me later."

"Why make such a big deal out of it? Is that person Asmodeus or something?"

"If you made him your enemy, you'd be better off facing the Demon King. At least then, the whole world would fight alongside you… But what are you doing right now?"

Park Tae Seop stared at me wide-eyed.

Or, to be precise, at the phone in my hand.

"I'm looking at this phone."

"Suddenly?"

"Yes."

He had the exact expression of a man wondering what kind of lunatic he was dealing with.

Completely baffled, Park Tae Seop asked, "What are you doing with it?"

"What do you think? Since you won't tell me, I'm trying to find his number myself."

"His number?"

"Yes. That person's number."

"Wait. Is that…?"

"That's right. I took it from that bastard's pocket earlier."

Park Tae Seop's eyes widened. Park Jihoon, who had been coughing up blood, shouted as though he had forgotten his pain.

“Give it back right now!”

“Nope. Can’t.”

I toyed with the mysterious phone, whose make I couldn’t identify.

It looked completely different from the phone I had seen when I visited his officetel[1511] last time. There was no way he had replaced it in the past few days, so it was probably a separate phone he kept for secret communications.

It wasn’t that strange. Even people secretly cheating on their partners carried two or three phones.

He has so many secrets, after all.

When I touched the screen, two messages appeared alongside a lock icon. One asked for a fingerprint, and the other for an iris scan.

I could understand the fingerprint part, but what the hell was with the iris scan?

I beckoned to Park Jihoon, who was staggering to his feet.

“Hey. Come here. Let it scan your fingerprint and iris.”

“Jin Taekyung, you crazy bastard. Do you even know what you’re doing?”

“Yeah, I know. So get over here and put your eye and finger against it before I rip them out.”

“Don’t rush me. I was planning to do that without you telling me.”

Park Jihoon ground his teeth with a crunch and wiped at the corner of his mouth.

But unlike before, when he had been gasping for breath, he was now brimming with strength.

Aside from the blood covering him here and there, his cracked forehead and broken nose had already healed completely. His stamina was as good as new.

Only then did I notice a small reinforced-glass vial rolling around by his feet.

“A potion?”

“When there’s an enemy in front of you, never let your attention wander until the very end. Didn’t they teach you that at the training center?”

He must have taken out the hidden potion and gulped it down during the brief moment I was looking at my phone. I shrugged.

“That only matters when the two sides are evenly matched. That’s not the case here, is it?”

“What?”

“I don’t know where you learned that or who taught you, but…”

As I circulated my qi according to the formula of the Fire Gate Divine Technique, the fire dragon coiled within my dantian awakened.

I fixed Park Jihoon with glowing, reddish eyes.

“You and I are in different classes, you fucking scrub.”

[1511] An officetel is a Korean building with units designed for both office and residential use.

The next moment, the fire dragon formed from a jiazi's[1512] worth of Scorching Yang Qi scattered into hundreds of streams. As they dispersed, they awakened my acupoints and raced forward without restraint.

The internal energy met again at a single destination and merged into one.

Disperse, compress. And…

Release.

WHOOSH!

Early winter was already setting in, but the frigid office transformed into the sweltering heat of midsummer beneath a blazing sun. An enormous burst of fiery qi erupted in an instant and surged through the room.

"Hah."

I exhaled a scorching breath.

Beyond the wavering heat haze, I saw a man whose face was filled with shock. His expression had gone rigid, and turbulent waves churned in his eyes.

"You… You…"

Park Jihoon's voice emerged as a groan.

"How?"

"I told you. We're different."

As though someone had doused him in ice water, he shuddered and bit down on his lip. He bit so hard that the flesh split at once and blood began to flow.

"This… This is impossible. How could you…?"

The man muttered with a twisted expression, then abruptly opened his mouth.

"I'm going to need your help."

There was no question who he was addressing.

Park Tae Seop, Guild Master of Myeongdong Guild, had been watching me with astonishment. He answered in a heavy voice.

"Is there any way for me to refuse that proposal?"

"No."

"And if I refuse anyway?"

"Guaranteed rewards and punishments according to the choice you make. You know how 'that person' operates, Guild Master."

"…I'm sick to death of this."

Park Tae Seop sighed and pulled a sixty-centimeter-long[1513] rod from his waist. When he stroked the Magic Gem attached to its end, a snow-white blade surged upward.

HSSSSSS!

"Don't blame me."

[1512] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

[1513] Sixty centimeters is about 23.6 in.

With that bitter remark, he pointed the sword at me. Blue aura engulfed its blade.

My opponent was a hero of the Great Cataclysm and one of Korea's top ten rankers. An immense aura rose from his body to confront my Scorching Yang Qi.

With a powerful ally at his side, Park Jihoon smiled coldly.

"You're finished."

"Finished?"

I laughed aloud.

Since I had heard he went to Hankuk University,[1514] I had assumed he was at least somewhat intelligent. But it seemed he had completely forgotten what I'd told him last time.

"I'm the one who decides whether this ends, you fucking idiot."

Park Jihoon had forced me onto the starting line and pulled the trigger to signal the beginning of the race. But he had failed to anticipate the most important thing.

This race had no finish line.

And that wherever I stopped was the finish line.

Open Inventory.

Summon White Flame.

FWOOSH!

I stepped forward amid the flames.

Blue fire streamed along the spearhead, scorching everything around it as it surged toward the enemy.

"Haah!"

With a powerful battle cry, a massive greatsword came flying at me. The blue aura gathered at its tip was denser and longer than anything I had ever seen in reality.

As expected of one of Korea's top rankers.

Internal energy and mana.

The names were different, but their essence was the same. In that sense, the energy Park Tae Seop possessed exceeded mine.

But…

That's as far as it goes.

At the thought, I sprang upward.

My hair narrowly grazed the ceiling as the blade sweeping toward my waist cut through empty air.

WHOOM! CLANG-CLANG-CLANG!

[1514] Hankuk University is presented as the country's most prestigious university.

The tremendous pressure wave swept everything away. The reinforced glass covering one side of the office shattered and plummeted toward the ground.

Before the screams from below could reach me, I brought the spearhead down toward the crown of Park Tae Seop's head.

WHOOSH! BANG!

With a deafening roar, Park Tae Seop's knee struck the floor.

His eyes widened in shock as he hurriedly blocked the attack with the shield in his other hand.

"What is this?"

By now, he must have felt as though a massive boulder weighing ten thousand geun[1515] was crushing him.

That was partly the difference in our physical abilities and partly the gap created by the way we used our energy.

Hunters really aren't very efficient.

In contrast, Murim cultivation techniques explosively increased the efficiency of internal energy. That was why renowned great powers like the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families were so strong.

Superior internal cultivation techniques formed the heart of the martial arts they wielded.

Only when all those tiny gears meshed together with perfect precision could an art truly be called divine.

Disperse, compress, release.

Internal energy was like a scarce resource. You had to draw it out only when absolutely necessary and use it to maximum effect.

Even Park Tae Seop, one of Korea's top rankers, had not completely escaped that limitation.

BANG! BANG! BOOM!

The instant Park Tae Seop's shield split in half after blocking a total of four attacks, a flash streaked toward my side.

"Die!"

The wielder of the thin, sharp rapier could only be Park Jihoon.

Just as I thought I had dodged it, the aura extending from the blade's tip suddenly lengthened and grazed my side.

SIZZLE!

Disappointment flashed across Park Jihoon's face.

His aura had only cut through my clothes and passed by.

I checked my uninjured side and licked my lips.

[1515] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,000 lb).

"…This is pretty interesting."

"Interesting? You're not afraid?"

"Did the guy you call 'that person' or whatever teach you?"

"Shut your mouth. You're not worthy of even speaking of that person."

"Huh. So I was right. This isn't some kind of cult, is it?"

"You son of a—!"

WHOOM! SHH-SHH-SHHK!

Park Tae Seop's greatsword came from the right, while Park Jihoon's rapier flew in from the left.

Watching the two men tear through the space between us, I thrust out both arms.

BANG! BOOM!

I blocked Park Tae Seop's greatsword with White Flame and Park Jihoon's rapier with the dagger I had just summoned, then smoothly rotated my wrists.

KRRRANG!

The four blades, locked in a tense clash, tangled around one another.

I remembered my duel with Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

His sword, which had let everything flow past.

His movements.

And I put them into practice.

Flow.

Sliiide.

The spearhead and dagger slipped forward like snakes. Neither the massive greatsword nor the slender rapier could block their path.

A moment later, the keen edges of my two weapons touched their throats.

Swish.

"Drop your weapons."

"…!"

"…!"

Two shocked gazes turned toward me.

Park Jihoon spoke in a voice filled with rage and despair.

"How could you…?"

"You didn't hear me, did you?"

CRACK!

There was no hesitation.

I raised my foot and drove it down onto his knee. Cartilage shattered, and a scream burst from him.

"Aaaaargh!"

"We're down two arms on our side. One leg doesn't balance the books."

I was about to crush his remaining knee when—

“I think that should be enough.”

An unfamiliar voice pierced my ears.

It was impossibly deep and low. A chill ran down my spine, and every fine hair on my body stood on end.

This was…

A Supreme Peak master?

Chapter 284

"I think that's enough."

I hadn't expected that.

The voice from behind me sent a chill through my mind, as though someone had dumped ice water over my head.

When did he get there?

I hadn't sensed his presence. Even considering that I'd been in the middle of a fight, that should have been impossible.

If he had slipped past senses honed to the very edge of Peak, there was only one answer.

A Supreme Peak master.

I slowly turned around. A man stood amid the rubble of a wall brought down in the fighting, gazing steadily at me.

"Nice to meet you."

He was a middle-aged man who looked to be in his early forties, with bold features drawn in strong brushstrokes and a solid build that even his clothes couldn't conceal.

And…

He's strong.

The moment I sensed the qi coiled within him, my heart sank. At the same time, all my accumulated experience and keenly honed instincts whispered a warning.

The middle-aged man before me was a Supreme Peak master beyond anything I could handle in my current state.

"Young man, you've got good instincts. Better than I expected."

The middle-aged man looked me over with interest, then suddenly tilted his head.

"Or is it because you recognize my face?"

"Both."

His appearance had shaken me badly.

I tried my best to look calm, but I couldn't hide the crack in my voice or the tremor in my eyes.

"Well, it's not as if my face has only been plastered around once or twice."

The middle-aged man nodded as if it were nothing and strode forward.

He crossed the wrecked office and held out his hand.

"Nice to meet you. I'm Lee Jungryong."

A short, simple introduction.

But the meaning and influence carried by the three characters of Lee Jungryong's name were anything but short or simple.

He was the kind of man who could use his face and name as identification anywhere in the world, not just in Korea.

The second-in-command of Ares Guild. And one of Korea's two S-rank Hunters.

That was Lee Jungryong.

A powerful man who wielded absolute authority over Ares Guild in place of its Guild Master, the other S-rank Hunter.

Ares Guild was said to rank among the top five Guilds in the world. Its influence over Hunters was immense, to say nothing of politics and the economy.

People even said that Korea had two Blue Houses.[1516]

Why had someone so powerful appeared here of all places, at this exact moment?

Fuck. It's obvious.

Suddenly, the conversation I'd had with Park Tae Seop flashed through my mind.

"Who is he? That bastard earlier only called him 'that person.'"

I can't tell you. Even if I did, you'd only resent me later.

Why make such a big deal out of it? Is that person Asmodeus or something?

If you made him your enemy, it would be better if he were the Demon King. At least then, the whole world would fight alongside you.

The answer had already formed in my mind.

If Lee Jungryong was the "that person" Park Jihoon had mentioned, and Ares Guild was behind this whole affair, every piece fell perfectly into place.

This is turning into a real goddamn mess.

The unexpected arrival of such a major figure made my blood run cold.

Unlike me, frozen stiff, Lee Jungryong smiled gently and spoke.

"I've heard a great deal about you. You look much better in person than you do on television."

"Thank you."

"You don't look happy to see me at all."

"How could that be? You're an S-rank Hunter recognized throughout the world."

"It's an empty reputation. I'm nowhere near the Guild Master. Anyway…"

Still wearing his distinctive smile, Lee Jungryong opened and closed his outstretched hand.

"When are you going to shake my hand? This is starting to get embarrassing."

Watching his good-natured smile and listening to the easy joke, I had one thought.

This man has at least a hundred snakes coiled in his belly.

And I hated snakes.

"I'm sorry, but I don't have a hand free right now."

[1516] The Blue House was the South Korean president's residence and office. Calling Ares Guild a second Blue House compares its power to that of the presidency.

“Is that really a problem? Just put down whatever you’re holding and it’ll be easily resolved.”

“I can’t drop a problem that needs to be dealt with right now just for a handshake.”

I tightened my grip on the weapons in each hand.

Swish.

With a faint sound, thin lines of blood appeared across Park Tae Seop’s and Park Jihoon’s throats.

The two men had closed their eyes and pressed their lips tightly together the moment Lee Jungryong appeared. Even so, I could sense something like resolve from them.

“I hear you’re quite close with these two gentlemen. Why don’t you at least say hello?”

“Close? Me?”

Lee Jungryong let out a hearty laugh.

“I’ve known Guild Master Park since the Great Cataclysm, so we’re at least acquainted. Isn’t that right?”

Park Tae Seop, Guild Master of Myeongdong Guild, bit his lip before answering.

“It’s been a long time, Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong.”

“Yes, it has. But what happened here?”

“There was an unpleasant incident… I apologize for letting you see me in such a sorry state.”

“I don’t know what sort of misunderstanding there has been, but surely it can be settled through conversation. And who is that young man beside you?”

“He’s a member of my Guild. He’s been with us ever since he completed his training center course.”

Park Jihoon spoke in a trembling voice.

“Nice to meet you. I’m Park Jihoon of Myeongdong Guild’s Team 1.”

“…!”

I wasn’t surprised that Lee Jungryong spoke down to Park Tae Seop despite looking at least ten years younger than him.

I was surprised by their shamelessness.

Everyone here knew that Lee Jungryong was the one who had given Park Jihoon his first orders.

Yet the exchange I had just witnessed between the three men could mean only one thing.

The lizard’s tail.

The old lizard, already prepared to cut off its tail, smiled gently at me.

“See? I’ve never even met that young man before, and Guild Master Park and I merely exchange the occasional greeting.”

I let out a hollow laugh.

“By ‘exchanging greetings,‘ do you mean secretly sending Black Hunters to cut off the arm of some innocent person?”

“Black Hunters? Enough. Your delusions are getting out of hand. In any case, regarding Guild Master Park…”

He shook his head and continued.

“I think I may be able to help a little with that problem.”

“Help?”

“Yes, help. The problem needs to be resolved, doesn’t it?”

My earlier thought had been only half right. The lizard wasn’t planning to cut off its tail just yet. He wanted to clean up the mess.

Lee Jungryong’s gaze met mine. A bead of cold sweat that had formed at some point trickled down my neck.

This was both an offer and a warning.

Let these men go.

But…

“It’s a personal matter, so I don’t think that’ll be possible.”

I would decide whether I stopped here or kept going.

I had already made up my mind.

“Hmm? Ha ha.”

Lee Jungryong laughed aloud and regarded me with amusement.

“Young man, you’ve got quite a bit of grit. Plenty of nerve, too.”

“I hear that fairly often.”

“What about arrogant?”

“I hear that even more.”

“High-spirited young men are often misunderstood.”

“I think so too.”

“Yes. I’m glad you understand, but…”

An unreadable light flashed in Lee Jungryong’s eyes.

“Don’t you think it’s time you changed?”

“How?”

“You’re a well-known public figure, and you’re nearing thirty. It would be best to avoid those sorts of misunderstandings.”

“I appreciate the advice, but I’m not planning to change yet.”

“Why not?”

“Because the people who tell me that are always fucking idiots whose only achievement is getting older. There’s no reason to run away just because a few neighborhood mutts are blocking the road.”

“You wouldn’t enjoy being bitten by a vicious dog.”

“No matter how vicious it is, a dog is still a dog. No offense, but I consider myself at least a wolf.”

“A wolf… Then what would you do if the creature blocking your path wasn’t a dog, but a tiger?”

The corners of Lee Jungryong’s mouth curved gently upward.

He was the tiger.

A tiger blocking my path. A predator with teeth and claws capable of killing a wolf.

“I’d run. A wolf can’t beat a tiger.”

“Exactly.”

“But add a few details to the setup, and the wolf might still attack.”

“Details?”

“Yes. For example…”

I continued slowly as I looked at Lee Jungryong.

“What if that tiger was the bastard who badly hurt the wolf’s friend? Something like that.”

He studied me with a peculiar expression.

“It seems the wolf’s friend was badly hurt.”

“Both his legs were cut off. How could he not be? He has a young child, too.”

“That’s an awfully detailed setup.”

“I came up with it while trying to make the setup plausible. It’s only hypothetical, so don’t worry about it.”

“If that’s all it is.”

Lee Jungryong shrugged.

“Still, a wolf taking on a tiger for his friend… He’s certainly loyal.”

“You’d understand if you watched a documentary about wolves. Their loyalty is no joke.”

“But it would be reckless.”

“Why?”

“Because attacking a tiger would get him killed.”

I let out a quiet laugh.

“You never know. Maybe a young, strong wolf could beat an old tiger.”

“…A tiger losing to a wolf? That doesn’t sound like a very well-made documentary.”

“I enjoyed it. The part where every animal in the mountains came running to feast on the tiger’s corpse after the wolf won was especially memorable.”

“…”

For the first time, the smile vanished from Lee Jungryong’s face.

Naturally. He had understood the meaning behind my words.

Watching his face stiffen felt like finally dislodging the formula that had been stuck in my throat since infancy.

“You’re irritating. More than I expected.”

After a brief silence, he spoke again.

Lee Jungryong slowly withdrew the hand he had kept extended until now.

“What do you want?”

I answered without hesitation.

“An apology and compensation. And one person’s life.”

“A life?”

“Yes. I want one person’s life.”

Park Jihoon’s neck twitched.

A tremor traveled through the dagger pressed against his throat. He hadn’t made a sound since Lee Jungryong appeared, but now he was trembling with fear of death.

“That’s out of the question. I can’t allow it.”

“I’m not asking for permission. I’m making a demand.”

“Learn to distinguish courage from recklessness. I’m a patient man, but I’m also quite fickle.”

“I’m short on basic decency, so I can’t rest until I’ve paid back at least as much as I received.”

“Your demand is excessive. The compensation should already be more than enough.”

“Who settles for getting back the principal? I want the interest too—compound interest.”

“And if I refuse?”

“Do you remember the documentary I mentioned?”

“…!”

“Tiger hide or not, do you really think a wolf’s teeth won’t sink into it?”

Lee Jungryong’s gaze sank heavily as he looked at me.

In the strangely tranquil silence, his mouth slowly opened.

“You truly don’t know how frightening a tiger can be.”

WHOOSH!

Before he had even finished speaking, a palm wreathed in red aura shot toward my chest.

Only five steps separated us. I made my decision in an instant.

White Flame. Unequip.

As White Flame was stored in my Inventory, I thrust out my freed right hand.

Disperse, compress, release.

The fire dragon that had been waiting for its chance to awaken transformed into blue flames and settled into my palm.

Flame Divine Palm, with everything I had.

Our palms collided.

BOOOOOOM!

A deafening roar left my ears ringing as the entire building shook like it had been struck by an earthquake.

I took the brunt of the impact.

I danced three steps backward and coughed up a mouthful of blood surging from deep within my lungs.

“Cough!”

Through the pale dust falling from the ceiling, I saw Lee Jungryong standing firmly in place.

“You…”

His eyes were filled with surprise.

But I was just as shocked.

I had felt him manipulate qi in a way I never could have encountered in the modern world.

He’s different. He’s no ordinary Hunter.

We had exchanged only a single blow, but that was enough.

Lee Jungryong’s strike had resembled the palm technique of a Supreme Peak master. He didn’t merely know how to use his qi properly. He could do far more than that.

So this is an S-rank Hunter.

The power I had felt in that brief instant rivaled the great fiends I had encountered at Shaolin, the Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts.

What kind of monster is this?

I had never expected to experience anything like this in the modern world.

Lee Jungryong stared wide-eyed at me as I swallowed the blood in my mouth, gripping Park Jihoon in one hand and the dagger in the other.

“How could someone as young as you know that method…?”

That method?

He was probably referring to an internal energy cultivation technique in those terms.

I was about to answer, but instead I bared my bloodstained teeth in a grin.

“I’m taking what I demanded.”

At the same time, I plunged the dagger into Park Jihoon’s chest.

Shnk. Shnk-shnk-shnk!

A scream burst from his mouth along with a spray of blood.

“Aaaaargh! Master!”

I’d wondered how this bastard knew about it. Now I saw—they were master and Disciple.

“Stop!”

Even as he shouted, Lee Jungryong couldn’t easily take a step forward.

Every time he tried, I pressed the dagger tight against Park Jihoon’s throat.

“Now, now. If you want to save your adorable Disciple, you’d better stay right there.”

“…!”

Shnk! Shnk-shnk!

Without hesitation, I drove the dagger down again and again. I hacked indiscriminately at his upper body, avoiding his heart, then tore through the muscles of his thigh.

Slash!

I cut down along his calf and severed the tendons in his ankle. Then I straightened my back, which I had briefly bent, and slashed diagonally upward through his shoulder.

Slash! SPLASH!

“Aaaaaaargh!”

A horrific scream.

Uncle Kkeokjeong must have screamed like that too. He must have passed out from the unbearable pain and woken again, over and over, screaming each time.

And that wasn’t all. The wife who saw her husband return without both arms had her heart butchered as well.

“Save your screams. There’s still one left.”

“…!”

Slash! Thud!

Park Jihoon’s body, now missing both arms, trembled violently.

“Ghk… guh…”

He had screamed so much that his voice had gone completely hoarse. Only strange noises escaped his throat.

I seized him by the hair. His once-neat, waxed hair was drenched in blood.

“P-please… spare me…”

My blood was boiling hotter than ever, but the voice that slipped through my lips was colder than ice.

“Jihoon.”

“Please. I’m sorry…”

“I had to move away so suddenly back then that I never got to say this.”

I stared into his bloodshot eyes and delivered a congratulatory message ten years past its expiration date.

“Congratulations on graduating, you fucking bastard.”

I hurled him aside.

Thud.

Lee Jungryong picked up the sprawled man in his arms. His eyes burned fiercely.

“You bastard!”

“I left him alive. Whether he’ll ever be a Hunter again, I can’t promise.”

“Do you truly want to die?”

“How about we keep going? Bring down this entire building and let half of Korea find out what happened here. That doesn’t sound so bad to me.”

Lee Jungryong’s face twisted hideously.

Chapter 285

How dare you do this to my Disciple!

I only paid him back in kind. That settles the principal, so consult your Guild's leadership about the remaining compound interest.

…You bastard.

I'll take that as your agreement.

I will never forget what happened today.

That was the conversation we'd had only a few minutes ago.

Lee Jungryong had left after delivering that final line, every word dripping with killing intent.

He had administered emergency treatment with a potion, but Park Jihoon's wounds were too severe for potions alone to heal. With his Disciple in that condition, he must have been in a hurry to get him treated.

"Phew."

Once Lee Jungryong's presence, which I could still sense in the distance, disappeared completely, a sigh of relief escaped me.

"Man, that was exhausting."

The moment I released the tension I'd held on to until the very end, all the strength drained from my body.

I was tired. My clash with Lee Jungryong had left me with a slight Internal Injury, but the mental exhaustion was even worse.

I really caused one hell of a mess today.

Today, I had made an S-rank Hunter recognized throughout the world and a colossal Guild my enemies.

It had been a precarious tightrope walk with a sheer, bottomless cliff as the stage.

Lee Jungryong and I had met in the middle of that tightrope, and in the end, he had been the one to back down.

He had no choice. I hit him exactly where it mattered.

People with a lot to lose were bound to fear danger.

If the tiger known as Lee Jungryong—or the tiger known as Ares Guild—were to fall, the mountain lord's[1517] honor would hit the ground, and its carcass would become an excellent meal for the animals of the forest—in other words, its competitors.

Of course, the cleanest solution would've been Silencing the Witnesses, but…

Lee Jungryong knew I wasn't an easy opponent.

[1517] San-gun (□□), meaning "mountain lord," is a traditional epithet for a tiger.

A single clash had confirmed that he held the upper hand, but it had also been enough for him to realize that the wolf before him posed a genuine threat.

I wiped the blood from the corner of my mouth and thought.

Three steps.

Today, I had taken three steps back against Lee Jungryong.

But today's three steps would soon become two, and before long, two would become one.

And after that…

I'll surpass you.

I had never seen any documentary where a wolf defeated a tiger one-on-one, despite what I'd told Lee Jungryong.

But I had the potential to grow without end. Just like my epithet, the Hidden Dragon.

By then, my Guild and I will both be stronger than you ever imagined.

Revenge for Im Kkeokjeong wasn't the only thing I had gained from this incident. I had also secured a golden opportunity for the Peace Guild to grow.

If we had been frightened into backing down when the Black Hunter first attacked, the Peace Guild would have remained just another mid-sized Guild. But because we had fought back, we had won both revenge and compensation. What came next would depend on Team Leader Choi.

He'll handle it well.

A conversation I'd had with Team Leader Choi several hours earlier suddenly came to mind.

"What are you planning to do?"

"Hard to say. If my hunch is right, I might see red, and even I don't know what I'll do."

"Are you thinking of storming Myeongdong Guild?"

"I can't promise I'm not."

Song Song had called me crazy after hearing that, while Butler Kim had only stared at me in silence.

But Team Leader Choi had reacted differently.

What he said went far beyond anything I'd expected.

"Then go."

"Excuse me?"

"To Myeongdong Guild. Go smash the place up and turn it upside down. Ah, I'm not telling you to collapse a building in the middle of Seoul and kill people. If you go too far, we might end up using a prison as our Guild house."

"…I thought you'd try to stop me."

“I would have, if you weren’t Jin Taekyung. I would’ve racked my brain for some other solution.”

“Then why?”

“You may look reckless at first glance, Mr. Jin, but you always act with the worst possible outcome in mind. And you always bring back the best possible result.”

“Are you really sure about this?”

“I intend to make the Peace Guild the greatest Guild in the world. If we back down when one of our Guild members has been attacked, we can never become the best in the world.”

“Then you really want me to…”

“Do it. Whatever happens, I’ll take responsibility.”

Team Leader Choi’s final words still seemed to echo vividly in my ears.

“I trust you, Mr. Jin. Perhaps even more than I trust myself.”

I had repaid the boundless trust he’d placed in me.

I had given Park Jihoon more than Im Kkeokjeong had suffered, and I had tacitly secured apologies and compensation from enemies no one could dare approach.

The greatest Guild in the world, huh?

Remembering Team Leader Choi’s bold ambition, I let out a quiet laugh.

I took out my phone and made a call.

Someone answered almost before it had begun ringing.

“Yes. This is Choi Minwoo.”

Team Leader Choi. The man himself.

“I have a lot to tell you. Where should I go?”

“Mr. Jin! You’re alive!”

“…?”

“I thought you were dead. Is this really Jin Taekyung?”

“…”

You said you trusted me more than yourself, you son of a bitch…

“Jihoon! Wake up!”

A master’s anguished cry for his young Disciple rang out alongside hurried footsteps.

Park Tae Seop, the Guild Master of Myeongdong Guild, followed close behind Lee Jungryong and stared at his back in surprise.

Did Lee Jungryong have this side to him?

Park Tae Seop had watched Lee Jungryong for many years.

During the Great Cataclysm, he had merely thought of him as someone who was strangely difficult to approach.

But after the war ended and Ares Guild was established, Lee Jungryong seized real power within it. Only then did Park Tae Seop come to understand his true nature.

Hard as steel. Sly as a viper. A man who committed acts that would make others shudder without the slightest hesitation.

That was Lee Jungryong in Park Tae Seop's eyes—a man he never wanted to face as either an enemy or an ally.

So he's human after all.

But the strange impression Park Tae Seop had felt vanished without a trace the moment they emerged from the long corridor and entered the hall.

"Welcome."

"…!"

The speaker was a middle-aged man. His movements were as crisp and disciplined as a soldier's, and even his black suit couldn't conceal his supremely trained physique.

The same was true of the twenty men and women standing behind him like iron towers. Each wore the emblem of Ares Guild over their chest.

I didn't sense any of them.

That wasn't the only shock awaiting Park Tae Seop.

He looked past the middle-aged man and spotted roughly a hundred Myeongdong Guild members sprawled across the floor. His eyes widened.

"What is the meaning of this…?"

The middle-aged man answered in a dry voice.

"We merely put them to sleep with sleep magic. For now."

For now.

The words carried a clear implication. At the moment, they were merely asleep under the influence of magic.

But they could just as easily be put to sleep forever.

Park Tae Seop was about to shout in fury when—

"Is there a problem?"

Lee Jungryong slowly turned around.

The instant Park Tae Seop saw his face, he realized how gravely mistaken he had been.

It was all an act.

Lee Jungryong's face was devoid of emotion, his eyes deep and cold. There was no trace of his hurried footsteps or the anguished cries of a master fearing for his Disciple's life.

An icy chill crept up Park Tae Seop's spine.

"Guild Master Park."

There was a blade hidden in Lee Jungryong's gentle voice. It was as though venom dripped from the viper's tongue every time it moved.

"Was it about twenty years ago? One day, you came to me and dropped to your knees without warning."

"…!"

"Do you still remember?"

"…Of course."

Park Tae Seop clenched his teeth.

How could he possibly forget? Nearly twenty years had passed, but the desperation he'd felt then remained etched into his bones.

A string of massive business failures, debts totaling an enormous sum, and the looks people gave him as though they were staring at a failure…

To Park Tae Seop, it had been a living hell worse than the Great Cataclysm.

After being turned away by countless acquaintances, he had finally sought out Lee Jungryong.

Lee Jungryong had gazed down at the kneeling Park Tae Seop and asked him a single question.

If I help you, what can you do for me?

Park Tae Seop had answered without hesitation.

Anything.

I like that answer.

What would have happened if he hadn't said those words?

He had asked himself that question hundreds, even thousands of times over the past twenty years, but it was meaningless. He had already come too far to turn back.

No favor came without a price, and he had been forced to commit every manner of crime for Lee Jungryong.

By the time he came to his senses, he was already being dragged along by a leash around his neck.

"Whenever I look at you these days, Guild Master Park, I can't help thinking about that day. Everything you said when you came to me back then is beginning to sound hollow."

"How could that be?"

"No, that's simply human nature. No matter how much someone owes you, they soon forget their gratitude and begin piling up complaints. Save a man from freezing to death, and he changes his tune the moment he warms himself by the fire. What can you do? Ha ha."

"…"

Despite the upward curl of his lips, Lee Jungryong's eyes were as cold as ice.

When Park Tae Seop lowered his head, his expression rigid, Lee Jungryong continued in a gentler voice.

"I only brought it up because I hope we'll continue working well together. Your Guild members will be perfectly safe, so don't worry. Isn't that right, Team Leader Seok?"

The middle-aged man responsible for Lee Jungryong's security, Team Leader Seok, answered in a flat voice.

"Of course."

"Well, I should be on my way. I'll see you again."

Pat, pat.

Park Tae Seop stood frozen as Lee Jungryong patted him on the shoulder and walked away.

Inside the descending elevator, Team Leader Seok spoke.

"Shall I take care of him?"

"Who? Ah, Park Tae Seop."

"Yes. His expression looked rather uneasy."

"That man's every thought shows on his face. He was obedient enough for the first few years, but once he got warm and well-fed, he began entertaining other ideas."

"He knows too much. He also handled this incident so poorly that the fallout reached you, Vice Guild Master."

For the first time, emotion entered Team Leader Seok's voice.

Anger.

Seeing the man's unwavering loyalty, Lee Jungryong smiled faintly.

"Leave him alone for now. We've only just started tasting the dish. Of course it's still bland."

"Excuse me?"

At that moment, the elevator doors opened with a ding.

Lee Jungryong continued as he walked.

"I'm saying I only gave them a little prod. I wanted to see how they would react."

"Then…?"

"You occasionally underestimate me. If I had truly set my mind to it, would I have entrusted the job to half-baked fools like them?"

Team Leader Seok let out a low exclamation.

"You anticipated all of this."

“I’ve barely taken a single spoonful to taste it. If it doesn’t suit my palate, I can always add some salt and pepper.”

“As expected of you, Vice Guild Master.”

Lee Jungryong smiled gently at the admiration in Team Leader Seok’s eyes.

But his true thoughts were different. There was something he couldn’t reveal even to Team Leader Seok, his right-hand man.

Jin Taekyung is no ordinary bastard.

From the beginning, it had been the Peace Guild that bothered Lee Jungryong, not Jin Taekyung.

Even if he had personally intervened, he couldn’t guarantee that something like this wouldn’t have happened. After all, he wasn’t the sort of man who used a cleaver meant for cattle to kill a chicken.

It was certainly efficient, but if an unforeseen variable appeared, the entire plan could go awry.

Who would’ve thought there was a wolf hiding among the chickens?

Lee Jungryong rubbed his tingling wrist.

For a moment, he had felt tremendous heat and power radiating from the young man. It was far too strong to dismiss as some fresh-faced brat’s cute little display.

He knew how to control mana properly. Where could a man who was only an F-rank Hunter until recently have learned…?

He did have a fairly good idea.

After finishing that thought, Lee Jungryong addressed Team Leader Seok.

“Keep a close eye on Jin Taekyung.”

“Don’t worry. If he becomes a nuisance, I’ll deal with him personally.”

Team Leader Seok had always been reliable. He was a born fighting prodigy and the finest of all the youths Lee Jungryong had personally selected and trained. His skill was beyond question. Even a high-level ranker like Park Tae Seop was no match for him.

But a question suddenly occurred to Lee Jungryong.

Was Team Leader Seok really superior to Jin Taekyung?

“Team Leader Seok. No, Go Jun.”

His form of address had shifted from the man’s position to his name.

Team Leader Seok understood the meaning immediately. If he had lacked even that much perception, he could never have become Lee Jungryong’s prized Disciple.

“Yes, Master.”

“Hmm. It’s nothing. I entertained an absurd thought for a moment.”

Lee Jungryong clicked his tongue softly and walked out through the main entrance.

Five men and women were waiting outside the building, dressed in robes covered with elaborate patterns and carrying staffs.

"We greet the Vice Guild Master."

"Those outfits are certainly gaudy. Can't you dress a little more ordinarily?"

"They'll look ordinary to everyone else."

They were A-rank mages under Lee Jungryong's direct command.

Just as the oldest-looking mage had said, not one of the hundreds of people hurrying along the sidewalk paid them any attention.

None of those people even knew that an incredible battle had taken place directly above them—one that had nearly brought down a high-rise building.

"This is why magic is so convenient."

The mages had used brute force to blanket everything within a radius of roughly two hundred meters[1518] with illusion magic. Only the handpicked A-rank mages of Ares Guild could pull off something on that scale.

They would remain there and maintain the illusion until the entire aftermath had been dealt with.

"Good. Use that convenient magic of yours to make sure no rumors get out. If anyone looks dangerous, use mental magic to tamper with their memories."

"Yes, sir. Understood. But that man is badly injured."

"Ah, him?"

Lee Jungryong glanced at Park Jihoon, who was being carried on the back of a Hunter from his security team, and casually tossed out an order.

"Treat him just enough, then dump him somewhere."

If he died, so be it. Even if he recovered, he would not be able to properly use even half of the skill he currently possessed.

Lee Jungryong had no interest in collecting spent batteries. He already had countless others. All he had to do was replace this one.

Still, he was useful at the end.

Through Park Jihoon, Lee Jungryong had confirmed the extent of Jin Taekyung's ruthlessness.

Once blood had been drawn, he should have killed him. If Lee Jungryong himself had been in that position, he would have done so without fail.

You couldn't take that one step.

What did it matter if he cut off both arms and carved the man's body to pieces? As long as his enemy still drew breath, it wasn't complete revenge.

It was nothing more than venting his anger.

That half-measure will come back to poison you someday.

[1518] Two hundred meters is about 660 ft.

Lee Jungryong let out a derisive chuckle and climbed into the waiting car.

Chapter 286

In the early hours of that morning, a short post appeared on a popular forum frequented by Hunters.

> Guys, I had a weird dream. Can someone interpret it for me?
>
> I can't reveal the specifics, but I'm a member of the Security Team of a major Guild with some clout. Anyway, that part isn't important.
>
> I was working as usual when I nodded off for a moment. Then Lord Fuck appeared in my dream.
>
> My senior said some weird guy kept hanging around, so we went to catch him together. (My senior's a traitorous bastard. I think his real name is Yamamoto, but he's hiding it.) Anyway, the weird guy turned out to be Lord Fuck.
>
> But that's all I remember clearly. After that, my senior did yutori[1519], and I did irasshaimase.[1520]

> ㄴ Best comment: Before we interpret the dream, can someone translate this post? I have no idea what the hell this guy is talking about.
>

> ㄴ What a lunatic. "Yeah," my ass. LOL.
>

[1519] Yutori is Japanese for leeway or flexibility. The Korean post uses the Japanese word without saying what the senior actually did.

[1520] Irasshaimase is a Japanese greeting used to welcome customers into a shop.

>
> ㄴ I want to beat the OP's ass.
>
> ㄴ OP: I'm serious;;; Then he started yelling at me because his phone was gone;; He was probably pissed because it was the latest-model AdultPhone.[1526]

>
> ㄴ OP: Whoa, are you really a shaman?

> ㄴ No. I'm lying.
>
> ㄴ OP: Whoa. Are you a crazy bastard?

The post was deleted less than ten minutes later.

The people who had seen it didn't give much thought to one attention-seeking lunatic disappearing, and no one suspected that Ares Guild had intervened in the whole affair.

Well, no one except me.

They must have tampered with everyone's memories using mental magic.

It was obviously illegal, but expecting people who raised Black Hunters to care about the law would have been even more ridiculous.

Judging by the comment about the AdultPhone[1527] disappearing, it seemed they had thoroughly checked everyone's phones as well.

That was decisive evidence.

My personal cameraman had bolted outside the moment Park Tae Seop and Park Jihoon appeared, only to fall straight into Ares Guild's hands.

Not that I was particularly disappointed. They had searched me before letting me leave the building anyway. They even checked my shared cloud folder before returning my phone.

They had also been considerate enough to add a warning.

"Just in case you're hiding anything, delete it now. If we catch you concealing something, it won't be pleasant."

I was already in a foul mood because they had found the porn on my phone, and the guy's tone was beyond obnoxious.

If the situation had been any different, I would have given him a good one.

I memorized your face, you square-headed bastard.

[1526] AdultPhone is a Korean pun on "iPhone": ai can mean "child," so the post jokingly replaces "child phone" with "adult phone."

[1527] AdultPhone is a Korean pun on "iPhone": ai can mean "child," so the post jokingly replaces "child phone" with "adult phone."

He had an angular face and a crew cut. He had been put in charge of the cleanup, and everyone else kept calling him “Team Leader,” so he was probably Lee Jungryong’s right-hand man.

Qi Sense had revealed his name as Go Jun. His skill was part of the reason I’d bothered to find out.

That bastard seemed to have learned something resembling martial arts, too.

Once suspicion took root, I could see things more clearly than before.

Every Ares Guild member Lee Jungryong had left behind was exceptional. Any one of them could easily take down two ordinary A-rank Hunters alone.

But the impression Go Jun had given me was… honestly, enough to surprise even me.

His obnoxious manner came from confidence in his own ability.

How did Lee Jungryong train people like this?

Could it really be martial arts? Or perhaps a martial art developed independently within Ares Guild.

One question led to another.

I was mulling all this over when a nurse shouted from the hallway.

“Mr. Lee! Patient Im Hyeokjun is conscious!”

I sprang to my feet.

Im Hyeokjun. Im Kkeokjeong’s real name, though hardly anyone ever used it.

After three long days, he had finally regained consciousness.

“Darling! Jun’s dad!”

“Daddy!”

I forced myself to resist the urge to throw open the door to his hospital room. This was time for his family.

The sobs of a wife and children reunited with their husband and father after three days of unconsciousness drifted through the crack around the door.

Only after a wave of weeping had swept through the room and quite some time had passed did our turn finally come.

“Oh, you’re all here?”

Damn it. My throat closed up at his very first words.

Im Kkeokjeong spread his arms with a bright smile, then scrunched up his nose.

“Ugh.”

“Your arm! Be careful with your arm!”

“I thought it would be fine, but it aches a little when I move it.”

“They reattached a severed arm. Did you think it would be fine right away? What are you, a transforming robot?”

Song Song scolded him while casting a healing spell. Once the pain subsided, Im Kkeokjeong’s expression relaxed considerably.

“Thank you, Miss Song.”

“If you’re grateful, please be careful. Didn’t you hear the healer? You need to rest and avoid overexerting yourself for at least two weeks.”

“And thank you for saying that, too.”

“Uncle!”

“Ow, there go my eardrums.”

I never would have imagined how happy it could make me to see him laughing heartily like a bandit.

After letting out the same boisterous laugh as before, Im Kkeokjeong turned to the others.

“Hyung[1528] Kim—no, Guild Master. Thank you so much. The kids’ mother told me how well you looked after me while I was unconscious.”

Butler Kim shook his head slightly.

“There’s no need to thank me. It was only natural. When one of our Guild members suffers something like this, of course we step up.”

“I heard you spent quite a lot of money, too…”

A famous healer had been brought in to treat Im Kkeokjeong, and high-grade potions that casually cost hundreds of millions of won[1529] per bottle had been poured into him without restraint.

It might have been the same in the past, but this was a world where even a human life had a price. Who would go this far for a D-rank Hunter with nothing to his name but years of experience?

Butler Kim chuckled softly at the emotion thickening Im Kkeokjeong’s voice.

“If you really must thank someone, thank the man footing the bill. I’m just the figurehead, so leave me out of it.”

At those words, Im Kkeokjeong’s gaze slowly shifted toward the man footing the bill.

“Team Leader Choi.”

His voice burned as though it carried Scorching Yang Qi. Before Im Kkeokjeong could continue, Team Leader Choi cut him off.

“This wasn’t your fault, Mr. Im. It happened because our Guild was looked down on. I failed to prevent it, so if anyone owes an apology, it’s me.”

[1528] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[1529] Hundreds of millions of won per bottle means roughly 100 million to under 1 billion won: about $71,000–$710,000, or €65,000–€650,000, at the project rates.

“Team Leader Choi!”

Im Kkeokjeong was the sort of man who could make a hardened criminal look like a model prisoner simply by standing beside one, and now tears brimmed in his eyes.

When he reached out to embrace him, Team Leader Choi flinched and stepped back.

“B-be careful with your arm.”

“It’s fine. I just want to hug you once.”

“…I’d like to pass that glorious opportunity on to the last person.”

It didn’t seem like much of an honor, but in the end, my turn came.

“…”

“…”

Silence fell.

There was something I had desperately wanted to say to Im Kkeokjeong once he woke up, but now that I was standing face-to-face with him, my mouth clamped shut like a clam.

Im Kkeokjeong broke the silence first.

“What do you think?”

“About what?”

“My wife and kids. Pretty, right?”

His out-of-nowhere bragging about his family drew a quiet laugh from me.

“Yes. They are.”

“Your sister-in-law is quite the beauty.”

“I’ll give you that. Did you imprison or threaten her?”

“There’s no tree that won’t fall after ten chops. Remember that. I succeeded on the forty-seventh.”

“You just said every tree falls after ten chops.”

Im Kkeokjeong snickered.

“Turns out there are some that won’t. Ten chops didn’t even make a dent.”

“It’s a miracle you weren’t booked as a suspect.”

“You idiot. If I’d given up back then, do you think I could have gotten a beauty like that?”

Im Kkeokjeong’s wife, her face swollen from crying, covered it with one hand and waved the other dismissively.

His two children, both still in elementary school, stared at me with bright, curious eyes as though they had never cried at all.

“Daddy, who is he?”

“Who is he? Who?”

Im Kkeokjeong pulled the clinging children into his arms and answered.

“He’s your uncle. Uncle Taekyung.”

“Uncle Taekyung?”

“Yeah. I’ve told you about him before, right? The handsome, strong uncle.”

So he had told his family about me.

Warmth spread from somewhere deep in my chest. The children’s eyes sparkled even more brightly as they looked at me.

Children were cute and beautiful by nature, but these sisters could have been child actors. So this was the victory of maternal genes.

“Wow! You’re Uncle Taekyung?”

“Nice ta meet you!”

A fond smile spread across my face.

I patted both girls on the head and said to Im Kkeokjeong, “They’re adorable. So innocent.”

“Obviously. Get married and have a daughter yourself. Then you’ll understand why people call men doting dads.[1530]”

I’d been nicknamed a doting dad[1531] in high school, too. Of course, I hadn’t had a daughter.

In any case, the sight of this close-knit family of four made my heart swell.

Im Kkeokjeong raised his arm stiffly and embraced me. His hand, far weaker than before, patted my back.

Tap. Tap.

“Thank you. I’m always grateful.”

The moment I heard those words, my resolve hardened around a decision I had been carrying all this time.

I can’t make the same mistake again.

I repeated the words to myself and hugged Im Kkeokjeong tightly.

Today, one man had returned to his family and friends.

An hour later, only five members of the Peace Guild remained in the hospital room, including Im Kkeokjeong and me.

Im Kkeokjeong’s wife wanted her husband to rest, but his resolve was firm.

“I almost left my beloved wife and kids behind. I need to hear it now. Everything that happened, without leaving out a single detail.”

[1530] The Korean term for a doting dad is ttal-babo, literally “daughter fool.” Ttal also appears in slang for masturbation, giving Taekyung’s high-school nickname a second meaning.

[1531] The Korean term for a doting dad is ttal-babo, literally “daughter fool.” Ttal also appears in slang for masturbation, giving Taekyung’s high-school nickname a second meaning.

The good-natured man who had always been softhearted and full of laughter had gained firm resolve and steel in his spine.

By the time he had heard the entire story, Im Kkeokjeong's face was rigid.

"It was Ares Guild?"

"Yes."

"And the Lee Jungryong you mentioned really is that Lee Jungryong?"

"I'm sure."

"…Hah."

A groanlike sigh escaped him.

We had followed the tail called Black Hunter and found Myeongdong Guild. When we stepped on Myeongdong Guild's torso, the head that emerged was Ares Guild.

The problem was that this was no ordinary head.

"We followed a snake's tail and found a dragon's head."

As I said that, I cast a sidelong glance at Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim. Both of them wore their usual calm expressions.

But I had seen it clearly.

Before Im Kkeokjeong regained consciousness, when they first heard the name Ares Guild, a storm had raged in the eyes of both men.

There's definitely something going on…

I didn't know exactly what. Song Song and I had sensed something strange and questioned them relentlessly, but they had clammed up after briefly saying they would tell us once Im Kkeokjeong woke up.

But now it's time for them to talk.

Perhaps he sensed Song Song's and my gazes. Team Leader Choi was just about to open his mouth when—

Thud. Thud.

All kinds of sounds mingled together in the hospital hallway. But their footsteps were different. They were unusually heavy, with a deep, resonant echo.
